King Iames became a Monke before his death

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of an ancient and memorable Cuſtome, obſerued by the Inhabitants of the Prouince of Carinthia, at the Coronation of their Prince: and how cruell their puniſhment is to Theeues.

POpe Pius the ſecōd of that name, who was a man of great learning, & a diligent inquiſitour for the truth of Hiſtories, as wee haue in many places formerly alledged, ſaieth in his deſcription of the world; that the Prouince of Carinthia, is encloſed within the territory, and vnder the gouernment of Auſtria. Hee likewiſe relateth a cuſtome, which the Inhabitants of that Prouince haue anciently obſerued, at the election and Coronation of their Princes; appearing ſome-what ſtrange, yet honeſt and very commendable. Which cuſtome is alſo confirmed by A. Sabellicus, in his tenth Decade: and by Sebaſtian Munſter, in his compoſed Coſmography, which is after this manner.

Aeneas Sylvius in Coſmograph Mund lib. 5. cap. 7.

A. Sabellius in Decā. Hiſt. Sebaſt. Munſt. in Coſmogra.

In this Prouince of Carinthia, there is a very great and ſpacious plaine of olde ruined buildings, which ſeeme to bee the foundation of ſome former auncient City.

In which place alſo there is a great ſtone, and when obeyſance is to be giuen at the new creation of a Prince; there is a day appointed, and a country labourer, or meane husbandman (allowed to this preheminence in regard of his linage) hath order to ſeate himſelfe vpon that ſame ſtone. On his right hand ſtandeth a poore Cow, that hath lately calued, which hee holdeth faſtened by a corde, and on his left hand ſtandeth a very leane and wretched Mare, tyed in like māner, and round about him is no meane crowd of labourers and country Boores. In this place, and at this Stone, the Prince that is to be enſtalled, muſt make his apparance, attended with a great number of men on horſe-backe, ryding in very formall order, with twelue Banners borne before him: among which there is one more large and ſightly then all the reſt, carried by an Earle, thereto admitted by eſpeciall priuiledge.

The manner of the Princes comming to his election.

The Princes being at the Stone before him that muſt elect him.

The Arch-Duke, Prince or great Lord howſoeuer ye meane to tearme him, clothed in a Shepheards habite, commeth to the Stone wheron the poore man ſitteth, & as he perceiueth him to approch ſomewhat neere, hee demandeth with a loud voyce, what he is, that commeth towards him with ſuch glory and felicity? Anſwer is inſtantly made him, that it is the man, who commeth to bee created Prince of the Country. Then as it were with a voyce like thunder, the labourer cryeth out. Is he a iuſt Iudge? Will he wel maintaine iuſtice? Will hee preſerue the defence and ſafety of this Country? Is hee a man franke, and free-borne? Is he valiant, vertuous, and worthy of honour and reuerence? Is he a Chriſtian? Is hee a Defender of the faith of Ieſus Chriſt? And all the company maketh anſwer, that he is ſuch a man, and will ſo continue. Then he beginneth againe, and maketh another demand. By what right or reaſon cometh he to diſpoſſeſſe me of this place, which belongeth onely to me? To which queſtion, the Earle that beareth the cheefeſt Standard, replyeth thus. If thou wilt quit and forſake this place, threeſcore Ducates of gold ſhall be frankly giuen thee, & this Cow, as alſo this Mare ſhall both be thine owne, beſide the rich Robe, which our King did laſt of all put off, ſhall alſo bee thine: moreouer, thou and thy family ſhal bee free, from paying any manner of tribute. After theſe words, the Prince approcheth neere to the Stone, & the poore man giueth him a gentle blow on the cheeke, commanding him (in any caſe) to be a good Iuſticer: & ſo deſcending from the Stone, he leadeth along with him the Cow and Mare, and departeth.

The ſeuerall queſtions of the poore husbandman.

The Earle that carrieth the cheefeſt Standard, his anſwer to the poore man.

The Prince created with a boxe on the eare.

Then the Prince diſmounting from his horſe, aſcendeth vp, and ſitteth vpon the ſtone, where drawing foorth his Sword, and turning to each ſide of the ſtone, ſtill flouriſhiug the weapon round about him; hee maketh a ſolemne promiſe before all the people, vttering the words as loud as he can ſpeake, that he will be a iuſt Iudge, and a good Prince. This done, one bringeth him (in a Shepheards bonnet) a ſmall quantity of water to drinke: and ſo deſcending from the ſtone, hee re-mounteth on horſebacke, and rydeth on to a Church with all his company, there to heare Mas. Which being finiſhed, hee changeth his former plaine and rurall garments, to very Royall and Princely habites: and after a pompeous Dinner with his whole train, he returneth againe into the open fielde, where hee heareth all the Officers of Iuſtice ſpeake vnto him, to enſtruct him in the lawes of the Country: and theſe are the vſuall ceremonies, obſerued at the creation of euery Prince.

The Prince mounteth on the Stone.

The Princes promiſe before all the people.

The Prince changeth his humble garments.

There is another cuſtome in vſe among theſe people, for the puniſhment of thefts and robberies; which I hold to be vniuſt, and ouer-cruell, eſpecially to bee vſed among Chriſtians. For hauing but ſome note or apprehenſion onely, that ſuch a man ſtandeth in repute to be a theefe; they forthwith ſend him to execution, without any other proceeding againſt him. Then three dayes after his death, they examine the witneſſes with all care and diligence; when if it ſhall appeare by ſolemne inquiſition, that he proueth to be guilty of the crimes alledged; they ſuffer him to hang vpon the Gibbet, vntill his limbes fall peecemeale from him. But if he be found to be innocent, they take him thence, and giue him honourable obſequies and funerall, with many prayers and almes-deeds, for the ſaluation of his ſoule.

A cruell ceremony, for the puniſhment of theeues & robbers, too barbarous among Chriſtians.

A poore recompence for the loſſe of a mans life and reputation.

With this ſeuerity doe they chaſtiſe theeues and robbers, neuertheleſſe, I read of ſome other Nations, that greatly haue ſupported and countenanced them therein. As the Egiptians, of whom Aulus Gellius writeth in his Attick nights. And the Lacedomians likewiſe, who permitted their children to bee theeues, and learne climbing in at windowes, and wandring abroad in the night ſeaſon, that they might be the more bolde and hardy for warre. Notwithſtanding, Draco, hee that gaue

In regard whereof, Solon ſaide, that hee had written that Law with blood, which made him (afterward) to allay and mitigate it. The cuſtome which yet to this day is obſerued for hanging of theeues, was firſt of all appointed by the Emperour Fredericke, the third of that name; according as Lodouicus Viues, that learned man in all Artes and Sciences, writeth in the third Booke of his Diſciplines.

At what time the hanging of theeues was firſt ordained.

Men are naturally deſirous to know all things whatſoeuer.

THE learned Philoſophers ſay, that men are naturally curious & couetous of knowledge. Moreouer, ſuch is the zeale of their affection in this caſe, and the bent of humane vnderſtanding ſo full of ſtrange queſtionings, as they cannot content themſelues to know ſuch things as they may with ſome eaſe comprehend onely: but ouer and beſide, they are ſcrutinous and ſearching (through bold preſumption) to know ſuch cauſes as are very hard, and almoſt impoſſible. Nor hath this painefull deſire beene altogether fruitleſſe and vaine, though many times it fayled, and came farre ſhort of expectation: becauſe by contemplation and continuall ſtudy, they haue found out ſuch matters, as ſeemed before vtterly impoſſible and ſupernaturall, or that they ſhould any way be attayned vnto by the capacity of men. As namely, the motions of the Heauens; the courſe of the Planets and other Starres, with their ſeuerall influences and power, and the like things beſide: among which is comprized my preſent intended argument, and what in this Chapter I purpoſed to diſcourſe on, to wit; how to know the beginning of times & yeares; and on what day the world began, or to ſpeake better; when, or in what ſeaſon God created the world; when began the yeare and times; and where was the Sun, or where God placed it at firſt, when hee began his courſe; & likewiſe the Moone, with the other Starres and Planets.

The benefit of contemplation and ſtudy in high and difficult matters.

Curious queſtions, yet coueted to be knowne.

Ariſtotle did little care for theſe queſtions, and infinite other Philoſophers beſide, who thorow defect of the light of faith, did verily beleeue, that the world was eternall, without any beginning or ending. But ſuch as haue declared themſelues not to be ignorant in theſe things, but verily beleeued the beginning of times, ſeeme to ſtand diuided betweene two opinions. There are ſome among them, who ſay, that in the inſtant when the world was created, the Sunne was found to be in the firſt point of Aries, or the Ramme, which is in the Equinoctiall of Summer, the time comming then to the eleuenth day of March. Others ſay, that the world began, the Sunne then being in the firſt point of Libra, or the Ballances, which is the other Equinoctiall of VVinter, commonly happening in theſe our dayes, on the thirteenth or foureteenth day of September. Of this opinion were diuers Egiptians, Arabes, and Greekes likewiſe; according as Lincolnienſis reporteth, in a Treatiſe of the world, which he wrote to Pope Clement; & Vincentius in his hiſtoricall Mirrour.

1. Lincoln. in Tract. Mund. & incent. in Mir. Hiſtoriale.

Such as haue followed this opinion, alledge a reaſon for it, which (in my iudgment) is very weake, and of no force. For they ſay, that then the principall fruites of the earth were fully ripe, and in the very beſt of their ſauour; becauſe it was moſt requiſite, that (at the beginning) the earth ſhould preſent it ſelfe in the height of perfection. To this purpoſe, they produce authority out of Deuteronomy, where it is ſaid; That God made all things perfect and compleate. There are ſome others, who affirme, that the entrance of times, and of yeares, was on the very greateſt day of all other; which was then, when the Sunne entred into the ſigne of Cancer, as now it is the eleuenth or twelfth day of Iune. Iulius Firmicus, an ancient Author,and of great authority in Aſtrologye,in the beginning of his third Booke,which he wrote of the worlds creation,ſaith: That when the world began, the Sunne was in the fifth degree of the ſigne Leo; which is the ſigne wherein hee hath moſt dominion, becauſe it is called the houſe of the Sunne: the like he ſaieth,in diſcouering the other Planets,by their order and degrees.

Iul.Firmicus in lib.3.de creat.Mund.

The ſigne Leo the houſe of the Sunne.

But that which relliſheth of moſt reaſon in all theſe opinions, and appeareth moſt conformable to truth, is; that when both time and the heauens began to bee mooued; the Sun was in the firſt point of Aries,which is (with vs) in March, and at which time is the entrance of Summer. This is affirmed (beſide all other reaſons that we can alledge) by the greater part of Hiſtorians, as well Chriſtians as Heathens; among whom are S. Hierome,S. Ambroſe,S.Baſile,and others, who doe all maintaine, that the beginning of the world, and likewiſe of the yeare, was in the Equinoctiall of our Summer. And although there may appeare ſome difference among them, becauſe ſome will haue the worlds begining to be in March, and others in Aprill: it may well bee endured,for they all agree together, that it was in the Equinoctiall, which now is in March. Notwithſtanding, as wee haue formerly affirmed,the Equinoctiall is not alwaies firme or conſtant:for Ieſus Chriſt ſuffered his paſſion on the fiue and twentieth day of March, which was then the Equinoctiall, and now it is the eleuenth day of the ſame Moneth, whereby may well be preſumed,that heeretofore it was in Aprill.

The moſt probable opinion of all other.

On what day was the paſſion of our bleſſed Sauiour.

For this cauſe,ſome would haue April to be the firſt Moneth,and others March; yet notwithſtanding, they all ſay, that whē the Sun enters into the firſt point or degree of Aries,then is the Equinoctiall. This opinion is grounded on the Scripture, eſpecially on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus,where it is ſaid: *The Moneth * Niſan* (which is March with vs) is the entrance to your yeare. Vincentius,in the beginning of his hiſtoricall Mirrour, ſaith: The Hebrewes began their yeare in March, becauſe in the like Moneth was the Equinoctiall, when as the world began. This opinion was likewiſe helde by ſome of the Gentiles; as Elpaeus in his Aſtrologicall Treatiſe, where he ſaith: The Chaldeans being very great Aſtrologers, beleeued likewiſe,that on the firſt day when the world was made,the Sunne entred into the firſt point or degree of Aries: and this is alſo confidently maintained,by the moſt part of Aſtrologers,both ancient and moderne. Therfore when the Sunne came in his courſe thither,or to that Signe; then was the beginning of the yeare, and thence enſued the principall or beginning day. For it is a matter moſt manifeſt,that the firſt day wherein the world began to be made,was alſo made the firſt day of the yeare:conſidering, that till then, there was neyther time nor yeare. And therefore the ſigne of Aries is reckoned (aboue all the reſt) to be the firſt in order among the twelue ſignes.

Now, as when we come to iudge of the reuolution of yeares, and things to happē therin,as of neceſſity we muſt equal the figures,by the beginning of the world; euen ſo it is as eaſie to prooue, that God placed the Sunne in the firſt degree of this ſigne, at the beginning and creation of the world. And this may bee coniectured without any great labor, by our profe made in the ſixt Chapter of the ſeuenth Book,in our firſt Volume,where diſcourſing on the time and day, when as our bleſſed Lord and Sauiour ſuffered; it is affirmed, that the Sunne was in the ſelfeſame at the creation, as it was when the great Sunne of righteouſneſſe made the regeneration of the world,ſuffering death and paſſion in humane fleſh,and that happened (as is formerly ſaide) in the Equinoctial of Summer,which is an argument and preſuppoſition, that euen ſo hee placed it,when as he created it.

Of the time and day when as Chriſt ſuffered his Paſſion,compared with the day of the worlds creation.

Moreouer, it appeareth very credible, that it was ſo made, becauſe ſuch as know any thing in Aſtrologye, and in the Sphere, do well perceiue, that the Sunne entring into the degree of this ſigne, and making his reuolution by the ſpace of a whole day: there is not any part of the world, which he leaueth vnlookt on with his bright ſplendour. And this he doth not in any other place of the Zodiaque, becauſe in what place elſe ſoeuer hee is; there are ſome parts of the earth where he is not ſeene that day; but beeing in this firſt degree, as we haue ſaide, there is no place where he is vnſeene, as hee walketh along along in his diurnal course,or dayes iourney. And it standeth with good reason and conueniency, that the first day of the Sunnes setting foorth on prograce, hee should begin in such a place, where hee may best visite the whole world with his beames. And that it should bee in the signe Aries,rather then in that of Libra, appeareth plainly by our former relation, that on the day of our Lords passion, the Sunne was in the selfe-same place, therefore there is some particular power in this signe.

A reason alledged of good consequence for the Sunnes first appearing.

Holding this opinion then for the most certaine, I say,that the reason alledged,by such as would haue the beginning of the world,to bee in the Equinoctiall of September,is very weake. For it is not sufficient to say, that all the fruites were ripe and mellow; in regard it is no vniuersall rule: for when the fruites are ripened towards the Northerne latitude,they are not so in the South, but wholly quite contrary. And therefore I craue no helpe of their reason,who say, that the Equinoctiall of March (already prooued) is the beginning of the Spring-time,& of flowers ouer all the earth,all things beeing thē in procreation; for if with vs it be the beginning of Spring-time, it is then winter in the Southerne parts. Let our reasons then suffice, & the authority of such worthy men,to cleare all other doubt or scruple; although the Romane yeare, now in vse, seemeth to begin the first day of Ianuary: for this matter came so to passe, onely through the superstitious deuotion, which the Gentiles had to their God Ianus, coueting to haue their yeare beginne with his name, as the Christians began theirs with the Natiuity of Iesus Christ, albeit the yeare doth not then begin.

Against such as maintaine the worlds beginning in the Equinoctiall of winter

At what time is the beginning of the Spring.

Of the Romane yeare, beginning the first day of Ianuary.

The Romanes (in like manner) began their yeare in March, according as Marcus Varro writeth, and Macrobius in his first Booke,Ouid in his Fasts, and many more beside. Also God shewed his immense goodnesse, in placing our first Parents Adam and Eue, in the Northerne parts of the earth,when he banished them out of the terrestriall Paradise; & that the first season which they saw in this world, was the Spring-time,finding the earth to be greene & flowry, with the ayre milde, sweete and temperare, which was done for the consolation of their misery and nakednesse, and so they could not haue found it,if it had not beene Spring-time.

Marc. Varro in lib.9
Macrob.in lib. 1.
Ouid in Fast.

The first season that Adā and Eue saw in the world was the Spring time.

This matter being sufficiently prooued, wee must know that there are other Planets,and especially the Moone, as being one of the principall, whom some do maintaine, to be set by God in coniunction with the Sunne, on the first day of her creation. Others say,that she was in opposition,and at the full. Saint Augustine reporteth these two opinions,in his booke vpon Genesis,the fift Chapter,saying further, that such as maintaine her to bee in opposition,and at the full; do alledge for their reason; that it was very inconuenient,that at her beginning, God should create her any way defectuous. Others vrdge the contrary, and say it is more credible; that she began her first day in coniunction, encreasing in her age answerable to our account. But to quiet this controuersie,I say (in mine opinion) that God at such time as he created her,made her at full, and in opposition of the Sun. And it seemeth, that this iudgement is the most receiued, as of S. Augustine, in the place before alledged, and Rabanus on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, saith the very same. This appeareth conformable to holy Scripture, where it is saide: God made two great lights, the greater light to gouerne the day, and the lesser light to illuminate the night. Now in the very same instant as the Sunne began his light, hee gaue splendour to the moity of the world, because in that moity or halfe part, hee made day. But the other moity could haue no light of the Sunne, by reason of the earths shadow; therefore it seemeth consonant to reason, that in the other moity of the earth,where it was night,the Moone should extend her office of shining. For like as they were both created at one instant; so should they both fulfill their offices in one and the same instant, and the one to gouerne the day, as the other the night, according to the words of the Text, verefied apparantly, that the world was wholly lightened at one & the same time.

Contrariwise, if the Moone had bene in coniunction, the light common and vniuersall could not haue come till fifteene dayes after; and beside, three or foure dayes must needs haue passed, before she could lend any light to the earth,and that must must be but very little too, euen as when we see her to be but four or fiue daies old. Therefore it was very conuenable, that these two famous lights shold illuminate the earth at one instant. I say moreouer, that the Moone then being in opposition with the Sunne, shee must needs haue her being on the other side of the signe Libra, for in her so being, she performd the same day the effects as the Sunne did, illuminating all the world, by her measurable pace of that dayes iourny; which else she could not haue done, if she had bin in any other place of the Zodiaque. Heereby it appeareth, that this opinion is the most likely; although Iulius Firmicus will needs say, that the Moone (at the time of her creation) had her first seating in the fifteenth degree of the signe Cancer, where shee affecteth most to be; & of this opiniō is Macrobius, in his first Book of Scipios dreame.

Of her then being in opposition with the Sunne.

Macrob. in lib. 1 de Somn. Scip.

As for the other Planets, it is very difficult to certifie them, and lesse profitable to know them: in which respect, I am willing to bestow the lesse paines on them. Neuertheless, Iulius Firmicus, in his second Booke before alledged, is so bold as to name the places where each of them is seated, saying: Saturne should bee in the signe Capricorne; Iupiter in Sagittarius; Mars in Scorpio; Venus in Libra; & Mars in Virgo; which are the signes wherein they haue most power, and being signes likewise appointed to these Planets. Elpacus himselfe maintayneth as much, according as Ioannes Agricanus declareth in his Summary, entitled Agricano; with Macrobius in his fore-named Booke of Somno Scipionis, and thereunto consenteth Iulius Firmicus, naming expresly the same signs, yet there are others, who haue thought, that in the recited instant, all the Planets were found to be in coniunction with the Sunne. Gaultierus the Monke, in his book of the Ages of the world, saith, that the ancient Indians held firmely this opinion. As for my selfe, I am of the minde, that God did then set the Planets in such distant places, one from another, especially from the Sunne; that on such a chosen day, each one of them might illuminate the earth with his beames. VVhich could not be, they beeing in coniunction with the Sunne, because his presence, within any certaine space or proportion, so hindereth the greatest luster of their light, that they cannot bee discerned on the earth. Notwithstanding, beeing created according to the will of God; It sufficeth (saith Augustine) that they were made, in beeing perfected by the hand of God, whose workes (in what kinde soeuer they be) are perfect.

CHAP. XXXV.

That men may learne examples by Birdes, Flyes, Wormes, and other Creatures, to leade the course of a vertuous life.

VVEe haue already declared in our first Volume, how Beasts & Birds haue enstructed men in a great part of the properties appertaining to Physicke, by purging and preseruing themselues from harmes: now I am briefely to entreate, how their example may bee profitable to vs, both in body and soule. And vndoubtedly, whosoeuer wil consider & contemplate, on the nature & properties abiding in beasts; shall not onely thence deriue good enstructions for life and safety of our humane bodies; but rules and examples beside, of good, commendable, and vertuous manners. VVhy do not men striue to purchase peace with their neighbours; seeing what concord and amity is among Beasts of all kindes, and how they keepe company, vnite themselues together in each kinde, and stand defensiue one for another? VVhy shame they not to bee slothfull and negligent, perceiuing & obseruing the care and sollicitude of the Ant, and after what manner shee maketh her prouision in Summer for VVinter? VVhat vassals and subiects are they, that will not serue and honor their good Princes; noting with what loue and obedience poore little Bees serue and honour their King, and that which they doe for him beside? In which respect, such Commonweales as haue no Prince, but enioy all things in common; may not they learne an example of liuing in peace and concord, by imitation of the poore Ants, who are so great in multitude, and yet preserue an order of peace & iustice among themselues? And why do not great Lords and Princes consider, what mansuetude and clemency all of them are obliged vnto; when

Our great Seigniors and high-minded men, may learne humility of the Camell, who falleth on his knees, to accept a heauy and ouer-chargeable burden. True and loyall married couples, may take example by the good custome among some Birds: especially Pigeons and Turtle-Doues, noting both in the Male and Female, that nothing but death can impeach their continuall companying, or hinder eyther from their first choyse. I finde written moreouer, concerning Turtle-Doues, that the one dying, the other remaineth in the condition of a widdow, & finisheth the remainder of her life in widdowhood. Saint Ambrose writeth, that widdowed women may learne chastity of the Turtle-Doue. As touching continency, all beasts (well neere) do lesson vs therin: for after the Female hath conceiued, she neuer seeketh, or hath any appetite to the Male, till her full time be determined. They are likewise examples of temprance in all vices; because they eate no more then sufficeth to maintaine life, neyther sleepe they any more then necessity requireth.

To keepe our selues well and discreetly gouerned, the Peacoke may be our direction. For he will part with the food out of his owne Beake, to giue it to his Hens, and when need requireth, he will expose himselfe to all perils in their defence. The great obligation, wherein children standeth bound to their Parents, and how they ought to serue and assist them, the Storke plainly witnesseth; by nourishing their aged Parents in their owne nests, as they fedde and maintayned them in their youth. Why should not men blush and be ashamed, to commit frailty and sinne through feare, knowing the inuincible courage of the Lyon? Faithfulnesse, friendship, and acknowledgement of receiued benefits, wee are notably taught by the meere behauiour of Dogs; that neuer forget the Masters they haue serued, but continually loue them, neuer ceasing to bee thankfull for the poorest bread they eate. If a man would benefit himselfe by the vse of another mans goods, yet without any harme or iniury done him; let him so carry himselfe in that case, as doth the little laboring Bee, who draweth hony out of the fairest flowers, and yet no wrong at all done to them.

VVhat meanes and order we should daily obserue, for healthfull conseruation of our liues, we are not to learne it of any one beast onely, but of many, that know what food doth soonest offend them, as also in with-drawing from one place to another, according to the mutation of times. Moreouer, they will liue in such soyles, as are answerable to their complexions and natures: excelling men herein as well as in all other things beside. VVhy should not men be absolutely learned, and ignorance in any thing quite remoued from them, beeing endued with hearing and vnderstanding: considering that an Elephant learneth whatsoeuer is shewne and taught him; a Dog attaineth to many familiar qualities; and Birds can speake, being thereto enstructed? He that heareth the Nightingales sweet Songs, and some other mellodious Birds; how can he but desire to sing musically? What better Astrologye, then that of the Ante, & likewise of a Fish (according to Galen) called * Vranoscopos, that hauing but one eye, yet lookes continually vp to heauen? What Physicall rules they haue taught men, and knowledge in the changes of weather, hath else where bene handled; and yet notwithstading we make such prouision of them, for supply of hunger and other necessities, as I know not how wee could liue without their helpe. Our garments are made of theirs, and their flesh is our best Foode: both beeing brought home to vs from far remote countreyes, and whatsoeuer is needfull for vs, or else we send abroad to seeke after them. They labour, and make the earth plyable for our vse; whence we get our bread, and the best fruites of sustentation, so that they are the principall maintenance of our liues. And although they are sore laboured, pursued, and euill entreated by the spleenes of men: yet are they still obedient, both knowing, following, and euermore dooing them seruice.

Examples concerning the soule.

Come wee now to examples concerning the soule, as a matter of higher Argument, and much greater importance. Whence can a man deriue more worthie examples, both for vertues and good manners meete to bee in men, then from beasts? All those Vertues which naturall Philosophers hath perswaded vnto vs, are grounded on the similitudes and parables of Beasts: Oratours serued their turnes with them; and all that haue spoken or written elegantly.

All moral Parables grounded on beasts.

Beasts commended to vs in holy Scripture, for our imitation.

God and his Saints haue oftentimes in sacred Scripture, instructed and perswaded vs, by the properties & conditions of beasts, for the perfection of our liues: And the rules of vertue and ciuil manners do tell vs, that we should be wise like Serpents, and simple as Doues; milde, like Lambes, and strong and constant as Lyons. In like sort, by the example of bruite beasts, and voide of reason; we are taught to become men reasonable, and spiritually affected. We finde many Offices & estates in the Church, applyed and figured by beastes, and according vnto theyr properties. By Oxen (according to S. Augustine, writing on the second Chapter of S. Iohn) such men are signified, as doe publish and preach the holye Scriptures: for they till and plough vppe the knotted furrowes of our soules, sowing therein the seedes of Gods most glorious word.

Saint Gregorie speakes it on the wordes of Iob: Quorum non dignabar patres ponere cum canibus gregis mei. The same Saint Gregorie, inuiteth men vnto a contemplatiue kinde of life, by the immitation of Goates, that alwayes climbe vp to high places, spending there their time in contemplation as it were: the wordes in Leuiticus seem his motiue thereto, Leuitic. chapt. 14. verse 12. Out of the Herd let the Goate be offered.

If I wold continue longer on this argument, I could finde matter enough to discourse on. But aboue all other, that of our Sauiour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, is the most notable, who would bee figured by a Beast, as Saint Iohn speaketh in his Apocalypse, chapt. 7. verse 14. The Lyon of the Tribe of Iudah hath beene victorious. And Dauid sayeth in his Psalmes, Rouze thee like a Lyon: and so in many other places, which were too long to rehearse. Beside, in S. Mathew, he tearmeth himselfe a Hen, saying; O Ierusalem, Ierusalem, how often would I haue gathered thee & thy children together, as the Hen gathereth hir Chickens vnder her wings, and ye would not.

Seeing

Christs works compared to the properties in beasts.

Seeing then, that Christ compareth his workes to the properties of Beastes; men may doe well to receiue instruction from them, in leading a good and holie life. And contrarywise, what shame and confusion is it to vs, to see and know, that all kinde of Beasts do follow theyr nature perfectly, and men (onely made reasonable) vse their owne so badly, abusing that super-excellent gift very vilely. For, he that ought most to honor God, dothmost of all offend him, and farre beyonde all other creatures, dayly peruerting and adulterating his works. So that there are some beasts, of whome men may learne much better examples, then from some kind of men among whom they liue. For they haue more apprehension of iustice, and offend farre lesse, then men that knowe what is their dutie, and yet do it not. And therefore, God deliuereth it by the mouth of the Prophet Esay: The Oxe knoweth his Master, and the Asse his Cribbe; but Israel knoweth him not, neither will his people vnderstand him.

Man more offensiue vnto God then all his other creatures.

Some men do giue worse examples to men, then bruite beastes can do.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of neglect in Martiall Discipline: and of an Army of Christians, that lost all their liues thorow drunkennesse, and vvant of following such courses, as are to be obserued in Military affayres.

In the eight chapt. of the 2. Book in the first volume.

WEE haue already declared, how Bayan Chinsan, Lieutenant to the Tartarian Emperor Cublay, and director of his Military forces, tooke 12 Cities and Townes (by assault) at his first arriuall, for conquering the great Prouince of Maugy, before all the rest would yeeld themselues tributary. One of them was vtterly ruined to the very foundation and worse vsed then any other known to be, during the Empire of the said Cublay, which was aboue fixe and thirtie yeares. This City being called Cinguinguy, was the second in wealth, greatnesse, and multitude of inhabitants, in all the rich Kingdome of Maugy, and the reason why it was wholly ruined, followeth thus.

Cinguinguy the second Cittie in the kingdome of Mangy.

Bayan Chinsan, pursuing his Conquests, was much withstood by a strong Castle, builded vpon a small mountaine, very potent by naturall situation, and artificiall constructure. For therein continued a powerfull Garrison, that preuayled with great aduantages on his Army, passing along the foote of that Mountain: and this was the reason that he would proceed on no further, till hee had deriued some better correspondencie from the people of this Garrison. And yet he durst promise to himselfe, that (within some small distance of time) he should preuaile against them, as afterwardes it prooued true indeed.

A strong Castle resisteth Bayans passage.

In the meane while, and at the selfsame instant, the explorators or scoutes vvere come backe againe, which he had sent to surueigh the estate of Cinguinguy, who made knowne vnto him, that the people of the Citty appeared, to knowe nothing of his comming, neyther stood vpon any guard, or preparation to expect a besiedging. This was the cause (to the end hee might the better preuent them) that hee forthwith dispatched a squadron of thirty thousand men, armed at the lightest, and very good soldiers, all of them being christians (which came among the Tartarian Idolaters in open liberty, as the Iews haue done from all times of antiquity, and dayly yet doe) to possesse themselues of the Citie, and hinder the entrance of any succour, either by way of power or victuals, assuring them likewise, that he would follow them with all conuenient speede that might be.

Return of his scoutes from Cinguinguy.

The commād that Bayan gaue to his squadron of Christians.

This warlike band of Christians, made such speedy diligence, that (within three dayes) they arriued before the Citty, and lodged themselues on the Ditches side, before any in the Citty took notice ther-of. They made the scalado in so many seuerall places, and disposed their Archers so conueniently, as no one durst peep out at any of the battlements, or elsebe seene vpon the wals. At length, the besiedged (imagining the army that had thus engirt thē, was of far greater strength then it vvas indeed) being ouercome with feare, rendred themselues to the discretion & mercy of the assaylants, to the end, they might finde the more humanity at their handes. The gates being set open, the Christians entred, taking vp their lodgings in seuerall houſes. And theſe indiſcreete conquerors, without any other care of military diſcipline, finding the Citty well furniſhed with victuals of all kindes,& whatſoeuer was needfull for the life of man, but (aboue all) plenty of rich wines; fell to making themſelues good cheere, and drinking hard, after the German manner, till they fell aſleepe with the pots in their hands.

The careleſſe neglect of Chriſtians in their victory, continuing ſtill in ſurfet and drunkenneſſe.

Heereuppon the Inhabitants finding themſelues deceiued,in yeelding to ſo ſmal a number of people,that had no better vnderſtanding in actions of warre,neither knew how to vſe the fortune ſo fairely befalne them; began to conſult heereon with themſelues, and how to worke their deliuerance with as much ſpeed, as they were ouer-haſty in loſing their liberty. The Chriſtians continuing in this drunken behauiour, without any feare at all of the Inhabitants, that lodged the Soldiors in their houſes,though not halfe ſo many as they were able to receiue: in one night it was fully concluded,that euery hoſt ſhould kill his gueſt, and ſo it was accordingly performed. Afterward,they threw their bodies into the great Riuer, which runneth through the midſt of the Citty,ſaying: Theſe are the renegadoes and faith-breakers, men of Chriſtian Religion, of whom the Emperour Cublay made no great account,but ſuffered them to carry croſſes in their Enſigns,to ſhame them the more in their leaſt ill demeanour.

The Army of Chriſtians ſlaine in their drunkenneſſe and ſhamefully vſed by the Inhabitants.

Bayan Chinſan hauing ſurprized the foreſaid caſtle,commanded the Captains to be hanged,and the caſtle quite ruined; but pardoned all the Soldiours, iourneying afterward on to Cinguinguy: but within leſſe then two dayes iourney,hee heard how all his men were ſlaine,therefore hee brought a ſtrong ſiedge before the Citty. The Inhabitants were not a little amazed, beholding ſo powerfull an Army to beſet them, and conducted by a man ſo highly renowned: and therefore deſired to haue a Parlee before any farther proceeding,which accordingly was granted. The ſumme of the Oration propounded by the Deputies, was thus. That they could not deny a manifeſt truth, but that they had ſlaine a number of runnagates, maſterleſſe men,ſeeming to haue no faith or honeſty,neither ſhewing any open apparance of their power;but ſuddenly ſurprized their Citty. Moreouer,that they were all Chriſtians, more addicted vnto wine and gourmandizing, then any reſpect of valour or manhood: in which regard,his loſſe was little or none at all, by the deſerued ouerthrow of ſuch careleſſe people, and they humbly deſired pardon, if in this caſe they had tranſgreſſed.

A Parlee required before further proceeding,and anſwer returned by them of Cinguinguy.

Wine and gourmandizing more reſpected then manhood.

Bayan returned his anſwer brauely and ſuccinctly,ſaying. His men were warriours, that had no other direction in this buſineſſe, but commaund from his mouth onely, and he had beene well enformed,that they tooke the Citty by faire order of warre; without offending any one in their goods, or violence offered to wiues or mayds, or diſarming any Inhabitant, but ſuffering them to continue in their wonted liberty. And in being Chriſtians,they did not therefore deſerue death, becauſe he could as well tollerate them, as his Maſter the Emperour, who not onely ſuffered them to liue in all his Countries, without the leaſt iniury done vnto them; but hauing conquered kingdomes,wholly Chriſtian, he neuer innouated any matter touching their Religion. Moreouer, the greater part of Officers in his Court, and the very worthieſt of his warriours, were all Chriſtians, being men more faithful,and of better conuerſation,then any other Religion whatſoeuer.

Bayans reply to the men of Cinguinguy.

The Chriſtians defended in their profeſſion,and whole kingdomes conquered,permitted to enioy the benefit of their religion.

As for their neglect in martiall diſcipline,he did not allow it in them,but confeſſed, that they deſerued death therein, which (doubtleſſe) himſelfe would haue inflicted on them; condemning them for beeing ſo forward, in executing any authority belonging onely to him. For which boldneſſe (with an abſolute denyall of pardon or fauour) he vowed to bee reuenged on the men of Cinguinguy; becauſe (againſt all fidelity) they had ſlaine his men, and declared monſtrous ingratitude for their extraordinary manſuetude, and thence hee pretended to deriue his reaſon.

Bayan denieth pardon or fauour,vowing death and bloody reuenge.

Hauing thus ſpoken, hee would ſee them no more, but in this rough manner diſmiſſed them. About an houre after, he cauſed his Rammes and other Engines of battery, to bee mounted, for deſtruction of the walles and houſes, and within few dayes after, tooke the Citty, with-without any great resistance, putting all the men to the sword, that were aboue 14 yeares of age. Women and maides went whither themselues pleased; but for their children, they were sold at the Out-crie, to such as would giue the most mony for them: for there were certaine merchants of Bengala, which followed the army that did trafficke onely in such kinde of merchandise, and so do yet to this day. Afterward, vittailes beginning to faile, & the warlike enemy, hauing emptied the cittie of all the wealth; he commanded it to be set on fire, and that the Army should not boudge thence, vntil it were intirely consumed.

The description of the situation of the City of Cinguinguy, and the commodities made therein.

This Citty was seated on a goodly riuer, large and nauigable, whereby, the cõmerce which it made with other countries, returned infinite profit and wealth. In it was made the richest & faireſt works wrought with the needle, both in cloth of golde and siluer, as no other Citty in the world beside had the like. There were also made sumptuous vessells (for all vses) both of gold and siluer, by most admirable cunning, and in great plenty: besides costly clothes of fine Cotten, gold, siluer and silke. In briefe, it was the second or third Citty (as then) in all those parts: which was thus destroyed, thorow the drunkennes of Nestorian Christians, and by the perfidy of the Inhabitants, euen as Troyan Illium by luxurie & whoredome, since when it was neuer rebuilded, or inhabited. The ruines thereof may bee seene to this day, whereat full many haue stoode amazed, it being scituated in so potent a territory: but it was thought to proceed from the iust displesure of God, and for the bloudy massacre of so many Christians.

Cinguinguy the second or third citty in al those parts.

A view of som such disorders among our selues.

We may now come homeward, and nearer to our selues, and speake of the like faults, as were among these Tartarian Christians, thorow lacke of knowledge, how to make vse of victorie: As not long since was seene in Fraunce, in the first battaile giuen neere to Dreux, betweene the French Protestants and the Catholiques, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1562. vnder Charles the ninth. The Prince of Conde, being chief of those Protestants, ouerthrew with his horsemen (wherein he was strongest) a great part of the royall Catholique Armie, whereof Anne de Montmorancy, Constable, was commanded, putting the Zuitzers to flight, and the sayde Constable taken prisoner. Hereupon the Protestants becomming insolent, and vtterly vnmindfull of Militarie Discipline: left their rankes, brake their order, gaue the chase, pursuing after certayne runawayes, and, before they had fully conquered all their enemies; they beganne to gape after pillage with the Swart-rutters and Launce-knights. During this disorder, Monsieur de Guyse, a most wise and valiant Captaine, hauing yet left him a band of braue men, beganne to set vpon those negligent fellowes with his troupes, and running on the Protestants (who imagined they had the whole victorie, which they knew not how to holde) got the better of them, and tooke their Leader the Prince of Conde, becomming sole maister of the field. Thus, not knowing how to vse Militarie Discipline, by breaking their rankes, following the chase, and scraping for pillage, when they had gotten the better of their enemies safe and soundly, yet not hauing wholly ouercome them: did they not declare themselues very vnaduised, becomming guilty and well worthie of death? I am perswaded, that all good warriours are of that opinion. And so it happened, for thus the Protestant Armie was vtterly foyled, which was (wellneare) equall in great Captaines and good men to the Royall. But such losse doth almost daily happen, where Military discipline is not obserued.

The fault of the Protestãts in the battel at Dreux.

The Duke of Guise a verie worthie and tried warrior, ouerthrew the Protestants, and tooke the Prince of Cõde prisoner.

The Protestãt Army vtterly foyled.

They that (at so cheape a rate) tooke the Citty of Cinguinguy, should haue disarmed the Cittizens, seazed the strongest places into their owne power, planted Courts of guard in all the most frequented parts of the Citty, imprisoned the chiefest persons, expelled out of the Citty, a greater part of the youthfull and most forward men, if they would not kill them, without vsing such courtesie after conquest. In so doing, they had kept Martiall discipline on foote, and auoyded the losse of their owne liues, besides the reproach, to their great infamie. But ouer and aboue all the rest, they should (as much as in them lay) haue abstayned from wine: For there is not anie thing, that sooner bereaueth a

CHAP. XXXVII.

¶ Of the miserable ends, and other strange trauerses, endured by diuerse Kings, Emperours, Dukes, and other great Princes, within an hundred and fiftie yeares of these times.

The Authour shapeth his course in this argument after Petrarke.

ACcording to the imitation of Petrarke, I am desirous to describe the vnhappie ends, and other aduersities, happening vnto diuerse famous Christian Princes; as Kings, Emperours, Dukes, Popes, and other Prelates, liuing within an hundred and fiftie yeares of these dayes, some of them being familiarly knowne to vs; omitting such as the Greekes and Latines haue set downe in their writings, because I would not be troublesome to the Reader, by repeating Histories else-where to be read; (and perhappes) knowne to him before. And if it come to passe, that any worthie person, constituted in some eminent dignitie, chaunce to feele the fickleness of Fortune, by such occasions as shall ensue in this Chapter; let him take comfort, and forsake all sadnesse; for it is no meane consolation to the miserable, to haue store of companions ranked with them in their disasters.

Aduice to persons of honor and eminence

George King of Bohemia in Anno 1466.

We will begin then with a king of Bohemia named George, who liued in the yere 1466, who was reputed to be a man of great wisedome, and was elected (in sede vacante) or inter-regnum after the death of Iadislaus, who died on the very day of his marriage, solemnized at Prage, the capitall cittie of his Kingdome, hauing taken in marriage Madame Magdalen, daughter to Charles the seauenth King of Fraunce. This George hauing obtayned the amitie of many in the Kingdome, and making himselfe much feared beyond many other; was installed King, and gaue his daughter in marriage, to Mathias King of Hungarie. In his elder yeres Ferdinand King of the Romaines, brother to Charles the fifth, Emperour, possessed himselfe of his Kingdome, he holding then but a small portion thereof, because hee was molested many yeares before, by the Kings of Poland, Hungaria, and some Emperours, by the solicitation of Pope Paule, the second; for sauouring of the Hussites Doctrine, in which cause he was so vehemently afflicted, that it shortened his dayes. He dyed much bemoaned; for in his youth, and while his body held the strongest vigour, hee performed many notable and worthie exploits in warres against the Turkes.

King George one of the Hussites religion.

Another Prince, some short while before, Charles Bourgony, Sonne vnto Phillip, one of the most potent and vndoubted Christian Princes, that was in those times, beeing in the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand foure hundred and two and twenty. Hee vnderstoode himselfe to be so rich and mightie, that hee pretended to create himselfe a King. But Fredericke the third of that name, beeing then Emperour, would not admit such an aduancement of his Countrey. His father left him great store of coyne, and many large reuenewes of diuerse Seigneuries: hauing lent foure hundred thousand crownes to Charles the seauenth, holding all the Townes and Countries, on, and about the riuer of Somme; as Amiens, Abeuille, Saint Quintines, and others beside. Hee held also (by way of mortgage) of Sigismund, Archduke of Austria in Germany, the lands to him belonging, both on this side, and beyond the Riuer of Rheine, and the Earledome of Ferrat, for three score and tenne thousand florins: whereby ensued, the Gouernour which he placed ouer those Lands, was the cause of diuerse mis-happes and ignominies, that followed vpon him very suddenly.

Charles duke of Burgogne, ton to Phillip.

400000. thousand crownes lent to King Charles the seauenth.

Moreouer, hee was Lord of foureteene goodly Prouinces; as the Dutchy of Bourgogne, the French Court, of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, Frizeland, Henault, Artois, Namures, Gueldres, Luxembourg, Vtrecht, and Embourg, all which Countries valewed well a large Kingdome.

wealth, he became so proude, that hee durst vndertake the boldnesse (vpon some small suspition conceiued, that Lewes the eleuenth King of Fraunce, had intelligence with them of Liege, beeing then his enemies) to imprison the sayd King in the great Tower of Peronne, where they met both together, vnder the colour of friendly conference. And there he made him condiscend to follow him (like a water Spaniell) in the warres, which hee had against the Inhabitants of Liege, euen vntill hee had ruined theyr Townes, and all the Countrey: Heere seated Edward king of England, beeing expelled from his Kingdome; giuing him mony, and an armie by Sea, to bring it to passe.

The bold presumption of Charles duke of Burgogne.

Afterward, hee would needes coape in Armes with the Emperour, and (almost) all the Princes of Germanie: besieging the Towne of Nuz (which is not farre from Cologne) for the space of a yeare, but all in vaine. Euery one reputed him to be great, happy, and inuincible: but we shal soone perceiue the contrary, and how (by little and little) hee trode the path to his owne ruine, as briefly I purpose to relate. It fortuned, that this Charls had instituted as Gouernour ouer those Lands, which he held mortgaged by the Arch-Duke of Austria: a thiefe and tyrant, named Peter de Hagembach, Counte of Thierstein, who (so much as in him lay) tormented both them of Mulhuse, and the Switzers: whereupon, they took him prisoner, and hauing proceeded against him by due forme of Lawe: they degraded him of his order of Knighthoode, and afterwards beheaded him in the open Market place.

Peter de Hegembach Count of Thiersteine, Deputie to Duke Charles in Austria, degraded and beheaded.

Next, the seauenty thousand florins were consigned ouer to a Banquer of Basile, and to the Duke it was signified by an Herald, that hee held no more right ouer the Country, then what the Arch-Duke had mortgaged vnto him. Hereat hee grew verie highly offended, and sought all meanes how to be reuenged; especially for the death of Peter de Hagembach. Then hee assembled an Armie, being assisted by the Duke of Millaune, and the Dutchesse of Sauoy; taking Lausanna, which was confedered with the Switzers.

The beginning of the Dukes downfall and misfortunes.

Thence hee went and besieged the Towne and Castle of Granson, soliciting them to yeeld themselues. They hauing humbly submitted themselues, the Duke commaunded foure score of them to be hanged, and an hundred more to bee drowned, in the neareſt Lake adioyning to the Cittie. This inhumane act did not onely moue the Switzers; but likewise them of high Germanie, who with an Army belonging to the Arch-Duke of Austria (whereof Harman d'Extingen was the conducter) expelled the Duke from Granson, and slew a great part of his Army; taking beside, his Artillerie and furniture for warre, which was great and rich. Afterward, taking downe all their friends, which the Duke had caused to bee hanged; in their places they hung vp as many Bourgognions.

An Armie assembled by the Duke.

A most inhumane deed of the Duke.

The Duke chased from Granson, and his furniture for warre taken.

The moueables of his house, which hee would alwayes haue carryed along with him, were of extraordinary valew: for among them were so many rich tents, all of costly silkes, and vessells both of golde and siluer, embellished with store of precious stones, that it would require too long time to recount them. There were some Switzers, that sold great store of siluer plates, for two great blankes a peece, not knowing their valew and estimation. A Diamond, thought to bee the greatest and cleerest that those times affoorded; and, esteemed more worth then fiftie thousand crownes, was solde for twelue Sols. A faire bathing tubbe of siluer, richly guilded, wherein he vsed to bathe himselfe, was solde for foure pounds. I cannot heere set downe, the rich clothes of Tapistrie, wrought with vn-ualuable workes of silke and golde, for him to treade on whereſoeuer hee went. To be briefe, the Reader would be wearied in rehearsall of the incredible wealth and riches, which this vnfortunate prince lost, and whereof his greatest enemies made their triumph.

The Dukes moueables caried alwayes with him in warre.

The great simplicitie of the Switzers, in making sale of the Dukes treasure.

Then falling into a long and greeuous sickenesse, at the length hee recouered, and taking courage to himselfe againe, hee returned the second time against the power and force of the Switzers. Hee had formerly taken Nancie from Renè, Duke of Lorraine; wherefore the sayde Duke of Lorraine forthwith ioyned his forces with the Switzers.

The Duke of Bourgongne being before Morat, the people of the Towne yſſued forth, and ſo beſet the army of the Bourguignons, that twenty thouſand (according to Faſciculus Temporum) or twentie two thouſand, and ſeuen hundred (according to the Mother of Hiſtories) were ther ſlaine. The ſpoyle was left to the Duke of Lorraine, who likewiſe recouered Nancy againe afterward.

Rene Duke of Lorraine.

A third time likewiſe, the Duke of Bourgongne, being not a little offended, that he ſhold be vanquiſhed by ſo mean a Prince as the Duke of Lorraine, and hee recouering the Towne of Nancy; returned with freſh forces, and beſiedged it againe with fourteene thouſand able fighting men, beſide ſome other bandes in expectation. The Duke of Bourgongne was diſcomfited, and all his army; but by no meanes could his body be found. The Bourguignons could not be perſwaded that hee was ſlaine: but hauing eſcaped from the field, hee had retyred himſelfe into Germanie, where he had vowed to liue in ſeuen years penitence.

A third battel vndertaken by the Duke of Bourgongn and loſt alſo.

The vanity of the Bourguignons concerning the Dukes death.

There were ſome Bourguignons, that made ſale of precious Stones, Horſes, and ſuch like things, to be paide againe vpon his returne, and namely to Brachelles, in the Dioceſſe of Spire. There was a poore Begger, immagined to bee the Duke of Bourgongne, becauſe he liued in the like eſtate of penance; which made verie many trauaile to ſee him, and beſtow very liberall almes on him. Nauclerus reporteth, that he ſaw the poore man begging in the ſame place. The King of France, hearing the Duke was dead, ſeized on Montdidier, Roye, Peronne, Abbeuille, Monſtreul, Arras, Heſdin, and the two Bourgongnes, to wit, the Dutchy and Countie. The men of Gaunt tooke his Daughter, that gouerned his eſtates very poorely, and marryed her as themſelues pleaſed; ſhe hauing put to death the Chancellor, and other of his beſt officers. Thus you ſee how this great Prince ended his life, accompanied vvith many misfortunes.

Naucler. in lib. 7. cap. 10.

The vnfortunate end of ſo great a Duke.

Vladiſlaus, King of Poland, a young and gallant Prince, was called by the Hungarians to be their King, in the yeare 1440. He conceiued ſuch glory by ſeeing himſelfe King of two ſuch mighty Kingdoms, that he thought himſelfe to be inuincible. Whereuppon, being deſirous to imploy his valour in warre againſt ſome enemie, that might take notice of his courage and power; he brake faith and Truce, which the Hungares had made with the Turk the yeare before. In the firſt battayle hee gaue, he was quickely ſlayne, and hadde but a ſhort enioying of his two Kingdomes; for, thorow the inconſtancie of Fortune, his pretended felicity was ſoon cut off, and all his ſuppoſed power vtterly quailed.

Vladiſlaus K. of Poland and Hungaria, & howe little a while hee enioyed both his kingdoms, thorough his owne folly.

The Emperor of the Eaſt, Conſtantine Paleologus, ſome fifteen yeares after, went to keepe company with this young King Vladiſlaus, in the other world. For Conſtantinople, the Metropolitane Cittie of his Empire, was beſiedged and taken by Mahomet the ſecond, ſir-named the Great, thorow the negligence and treacherie of Iohn Iuſtinian of Geneway; Mahomet hauing 300000. able fighting men, and foure hundred Cannons, and the ſiedge continued threeſcore dayes. The Emperour (in flight) was met withall, and murthered neere vnto the Gate: his head being carryed vppon a Launces point, and ſo conueighed quite thorow the Cittie, while his bodye was trodden vnto dirte with their feete. Mahomet alſo cauſed a Crucifixe to bee erected, and wrote vppon it (in ſcornefull deriſion) theſe words: This is the GOD of the Chriſtians: commanding likewiſe, that euery one ſhould caſt dung and filthe vppon the fayre Image.

Conſtantine Paleologus, Emperour of the Eaſt.

The Emperors body troden vnder foote, and his head cut off.

The wife to the Emperour, with her daughters, and the very Nobleſt Ladyes attending on them, were brought before Mahomet; and after all reproach was done vnto them, euen the verie greateſt Villanies in the world, their bodies were hacked and hewne in peeces.

The ſhame done vnto the Empreſſe, and her daughters

Some few dayes after, there was another King (but of three dayes ſtanding) put to death likewiſe. VVhich I may by no meanes omit, becauſe it was the forenamed Iohn Iuſtinian the Genoueſe, a trayterous Villaine. For hee had concluded with Mahomet, that if he would make him King, he would yeelde vp Conſtantinople, or be the meanes whereby hee ſhoulde ſurprize it. Mahomet kept promiſe with him; for hee conſtituted him a King for three dayes ſpace: and on the fourth day, hee commanded his head to bee ſmitten off. So ſayeth Faſciculus Temporum; and that that theſe things happened in the yeare, one thouſand foure hundred fifty three, about the Moneth of May.

Of Charles the eight, K. of France.

I am ſure few people are ignorant, in what Beds of ſtate, the noble Kings of France vſe to take their reſt, and vnder what rich Pauillions; yet the inquity of our times hath beene ſuch, that a Kings lodging hath bene more vile then a Iaxe. I ſpeake of King Charles the eight of that name, who returning home to his kingdome, hauing beene in Italy, where hee conquered the kingdome of Naples, and the great Dukedomes of Calbria and Apulia, and wonne two famous battailes in thoſe countries: vpon a Palme Sunday Eeue, being the ſeuenth of Aprill, one thouſand foure hundred ninety eight, leading his Queene by the hand, Anne of Bretaigne, to ſee certaine Gentlemen play at the Tennis, in a Ditch belonging to the Caſtle of Amboiſe, entred into an olde, broken, vncouered Gallery, where he gaue his head a great blow againſt the vpper part of the doore, albeit himſelfe was but of lowe ſtature. Taking hold vpon ſome ſtayes for his recouery, neere vnto a noyſome place, where euery one that would (by cuſtome) vſed to let paſſe their vrine, and other vncleanneſſe of the body; he was contented to endure it, and ſtood there merrily diſcourſing with the Queene, and other noble perſons there preſent, iudging who deſerued beſt of them that played. Suddenly hee was ouercome with a rheume or catarre, which taking from him all his ſtrength and motion in euery part of his body, he was depriued likewiſe of his ſpeech. This was perceiued by all there-about him, and how he lay vppon the ground, in ſuch a foule, ſtinking, and vnſeemely place; yet no one had the care, or ſubiect-like affection, to beare him thence to his royall bed, which was not aboue twenty paces off.

His conqueſt of Naples, Calabria and Apulia.

What fate hath ordayned to a man, cannot be auoyded.

Little care had of ſo famous a King, & in ſo great an extremity, to let him die in ſo ſtinking a place.

Hee languiſhed in this manner, for the ſpace of nine houres, and dyed there in that noyſome place. Is it not a matter deſeruing admiration, that ſo worthy a King ſhould dye in ſo vile a place, being in his owne houſe, among his Officers, and many of the Nobility? Hee that was King of the ſweete ſmelling Floure-de-Luce, to expire and ende his dayes, not among hearbs or flowers of pleaſing ſauour: but in a place full of filth, then which, the whole world could yeelde no worſe?

And to ſhew yee, that great Princes are as ſubiect to dye in battailes, as the ſimpleſt Souldiours: Iames, King of Scottes, may ſerue as an example, for hee was ſlayne in the field, with twoo Biſhoppes, a great part of his Nobility, and many men of warre, that happned in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred and thirteene. And the yeare following, Iohn d'Albret king of Nauarre, loſt his Kingdome, which was ſeazed by Ferdinand King of Spaine, becauſe hee ſtoode accurſed by Pope Iulius, for aſſiſting King Lewes the twelfth, in warre againſt him; and aboue all, in the battaile of Rauenna, which vntill this preſent his Succeſſours neuer enioyed.

Iames the fourth, King of Scots, ſlain in battaile.

Iohn d'Albret King of Nauarre loſt his kingdome.

And Lewes Sforza, Duke of that rich and goodly Countrey of Millaine, was led priſoner into Fraunce, flying before the French to Nauarra, a Citty of his Dukedome; hee was confined to impriſonment, within the great Tower of Bourge, where (in great want and pouertie) hee finiſhed his dayes.

Lewes Sforza, Duke of Millaine, confined in priſon, where he dyed.

What ſhall wee ſay of King Frances, firſt of that name, the Father of Learning, whoſe wiſedome and magnanimitie, could not warrant him againſt the Ambuſcadoes of Fortune, no more then any of them before remembred? Hee fell into the hands of Charles the fifth, Emperour, enuious of his greatneſſe, and had beene his competitour in the Empire, oppoſing himſelfe againſt many of his deſſignes. Hee detayned him priſoner aboue a yeare; during which time, hee had a moſt yrkeſome diſeaſe, which compelled him (for enioying of his liberty, to yeeld to many hard and grieuous conditions. As, to renounce and diſclayme a multitude of rights, which hee pretended to many Dukedomes, Earledomes, and Kingdomes. Beſide, he gaue ſo great a quantity of money, as well for his expences, as diſcharge of martiall affaires, and his ranſome withall, that his kingdome (for euer after) felt the ſmart thereof.

howſoeuer high and great degree they haue carried in the world. For in the year 1410. Pope Iohn was put in priſon, flying from the Councell of Conſtance, and was giuen in guard to Lewes, Count Palatine, depoſed from his Office, and one called Martine, fifte of that name, ſeated in his place, being likewiſe very inhumanly entreated, for the ſpace of three yeares. Afterwardes, by the humanity of the ſayde Martine, he was ſet at liberty, and created Cardinall: whereby euery man may perceiue, how farre this Iohn was falne from his former degree.

Pope Iohn depoſed and impriſoned.

The biſhop of Liege, Brother vnto the Duke of Bourgongn, a lord both ſpirituall & temporal.

In the yeare 1466. the byſhop of Liege brother to the fore-named Duke of Bourgongne, by his wife, who was of the houſe of Bourbon: beſide his Office, hee was a Prince of the Empire, a Lord both ſpirituall and temporall, and holding ſo great and rich a countrey, as that of Liege. He was taken priſoner by his ſubiectes, and a great ſort of his friendes and officers (among whome were ten Abbots and Protonotaries, or Canons, al of worthy houſes) maſſacred in his preſence, & himſelfe kept priſoner for long time, and in great miſery. At length hee got ſafely away, hauing (by money) won his Guards conſent thereto.

The butchering of an archbyſhop, and 4. Cardinals.

At Florence, in the yeare 1448. the arch-Byſhop of the ſaide place, being cloathed in his habiliments of Prieſt-hood, and ſaying Maſſe, was ſodainely ſurprized, and hanged or ſtrangled at a Window, by the hands of the hangman; beſide foure Cardinalles maſſacred by the people, and many other Eccleſiaſticall perſons beheaded.

Pope Clemẽt taken priſoner, & Rome ranaged or pilled by greedy Soldiours.

And although Popes (as hath beene held) by their great and ſpirituall authority, might impoſe ſilence vpon Chriſtian Princes, from vndertaking warres, but to keepe themſelues in quiet, and likewiſe to take armes at his command, for the affairs of the Chriſtian world; yet it came ſo to paſſe, that Pope Clement was taken priſoner, and locked vp ſeuen months ſpace in his caſtle of S. Angelo, kept by a guard of Spaniards and Germaines, and all of them Heretikes (wel-neere) about him. The City of Rome was greeuouſly pilled, the Temples ranſacked and prophaned; all which happened by the Souldiers of Charles the fift, a Catholike Emperour, in the yeare 1527.

The death of three Kings, all in one day

After theſe men of Eccleſiaſticall profeſſion, it ſhall not differ much from our purpoſe, to conclude this chapter with the death of three potent Kings, that died all three in one day: to the end, wee may obſerue how vnhappy it is for Princes, to thinke that they can well manage their affaires, in medling amongſt the quarrels of other Princes, as puiſant euery way as thẽſelues.

The memorable Hiſtory of Muley Mahumet, & Abdelmelec, Kings in Barbarie.

It came to paſſe, that two Princes contended for the kingdome of Fez and Marocco, ſituated in Barbarie of Affrica: the one of them being named Muley Mahumet, Nephew to the other that demaunded theſe Realmes, called Abdelmelec. This Mahumet, who enioyed thoſe Kingdomes ten or twelue yeares, was aſſayled three or foure times by Abdelmelec, hauing gotten aſſiſtance of the Turke, and wonne ſtil the beſt in foure fought battailes. So that in the end, the inhabitants of Fez and Marocco receyued Abdelmelec: becauſe Mahumet was a Tyrant, had very few frends, contemning euery one, and truſting altogether in his ſtrength and Treaſures, after all his loſſes in thoſe former Battayles.

Abdelmelec expelled Muley Mahumet out of Fez & Marocco.

Sebaſtian K. of Portugall, offereth aide to Mahumet, & is denied.

Sebaſtian, King of Portugall, made offer to him of his ayde and friendſhip, but hee refuſed it; vntill ſuch time as hee had neyther place or perſon to retire vnto, nor any to follow him. Moreouer, he had ſpent the great heapes of money which hee had gotten together during his reigne, & now withdrew himſelfe into the Mountaines, which are ſixe Leagues off from the City of Marocco. There hee liued about ſeauen or eight months, like a theefe or robber, with ſome few companies of needie perſons, which yet againe were cut off by the troopes of Abdelmelec; and Mahumet conſtrained to wander in the moſt vnacceſſable places of the Mountaines, where he endured a million of miſeries, for the ſpace of a whole yeare, liuing in continuall feare and diſtruſt, onely thorough his conceyued opinion, that hee ſhould bee taken, or betrayed in his ſecret walkes.

The miſerable eſtate and condition of Muley Mahumet.

Mahumet is enforced to requeſt the ayd which he had formerly denied.

In breefe, neceſſity compelled him to repent his former denials, and to require the friendly ſuccour offered him, by that braue King of Portugall, Sebaſtian: vnto whom he ſent an expreſſe Meſſenger, and (afterward) two of his Captaines. In the meane while, he found the means to deſcend cend from the Mountaines, by wayes of little or no reſort, and ſought for his ſafety in * Tanger, a Towne which the Portugales held in Affrica: where hee was well entertained by the Gouernour, who knew ſome part of Sebaſtians minde towards him, and therefore furniſhed the two Captaines with well armed horſemen, for the diſpatch of their Embaſſie in Portugall.

* An olde City of Mauritania, heeretofore called Tingi.

King Sebaſtian was very ioyfull to ſee theſe Ambaſſadors, becauſe he was naturally addicted to Armes, and the diſpoſition of his perſon (ioyned with his height of courage) inceſſantly ſpurred him on to this buſineſſe. And in this reſpect, hee did but awaite ſome apt ouerture, for making his paſſage into Affrica, forming his pretext, vppon an earneſt deſire (as hee would alwayes ſay) which hee had to aduance Chriſtian Religion, and to extirpate that of the Mahumetiſts. Whereuppon he ſuddenly promiſed (without any better conſideration of the buſineſſe) to ſuccour Muley Mahumet, and to re-ſeate him in his kingdomes againe: hee made promiſe (I ſay) to ſuch a one, as himſelfe had before ſought vnto, for this effect, by ſo large a paſſage ouer the Seas, and two ſeuerall times had beene miſprized by him. The Pope, the King of Spaine, and many other great perſonages, could not diſſwade him from this enterprize, but ſtill he perſiſted in treading the path vnto his owne death, death that followed him ſo hard at the heeles. So did hee ſet on into Affrica, with thirteene hundred ſayle, as well of great as ſmall Veſſelles in that Fleete, the very fayreſt and goodlieſt that had bene ſeene in thoſe times. His Army was compoſed of Lance-knight, Spaniards, Italians, Portugales, and ſome ſmall number of Affricane Moores, which took part with the Portuguizes, and thirty ſixe Pieces of Ordenance for the fielde, well fitted and furniſhed. In all, there was not aboue ſixteene thouſand men of warre; ſetting aſide the Soldiours boyes, Waggoners, Strumpets, Caſtadours, and other ſuch like people very vnprofitable for the field.

King Sebaſtian alwayes ſeeking opportunity to enter Affrica, and his pretence, for the aduancement of Chriſtian Religion.

King Sebaſtian paſſed into Affrica againſt the opinion of all his friends.

The Army in full preparation for the field from Portugall.

Abdelmelec (wee may well perſwade our ſelues) ſlept not all this while careleſly, for hee brought threeſcore thouſand men to the field, as well Pykes as Harquebuziers, and twenty ſixe Peeces of Ordenance for the field, well appointed & gouerned by moſt expert men. Abdelmelec was very ſorry, that hee ſhould haue any conqueſt againſt Chriſtians, in regard he bare them much affection; not becauſe he feared the Portuguizes, but as fore-ſeeing, that Barbary would proue the graue to the King of Portugall; who (indeede) was too weake to encounter with him, that went ſo farre beyond him in power. And in due conſideration of the caſe, hee would oftentimes thus ſay to himſelfe. King Sebaſtian ſhould bee more reſpectiue, then ſo vnaduiſedly to runne vpon his owne ruine: for he would take two kingdomes from me, which in right and iuſtice doe appertaine to me, and giue them vnto a Negro, wherein Chriſtendome can no way be eaſed or accommodated, neyther is it a thing which God (being iuſt) will permit.

The care of Abdelmelec, to encounter with his enemie.

How Abdelmelec did oftentimes commiſerate the caſe of King Sebaſtian.

The report and rumors ſpread abroad, of Abdelmelecs valiant carriage, was the cauſe that euery one came to offer him ſeruice and obeyſance; and from euery Prouince they brought him goodly preſents and gifts of ineſtimable value. Many Chriſtian Kings tooke pleaſure in his friendſhippe, and embraced him as their kinde well-willer: eſteeming themſelues happy in his acquaintance. So that from diuers places, great ſtore of Chriſtians trauailed into his countries, where they receiued gracious entertainment, and hee ſhewed them much better countenance, then to any other men that reſorted thither, helping them liberally in their neceſſities. On the contrary part, Muley Mahumet oppreſſed the Chriſtians all the time of his reigne, or elſe permitted, that all greefes and moleſtations ſhould bee done vnto them: wherefore King Sebaſtian (in this reſpect) did greatly forget himſelfe.

The loue, riches, and ſeruice voluntarily offered to Abdelmelec by Chriſtians and others.

Muley Mahumets oppreſſing the Chriſtians.

Now to deteine the Reader no longer in ſuſpence, the two Armies diſpoſed theſelues for the encounter, and mette in a field, which contained aboue two miles in ſpaciouſneſſe, ſo euen and plaine, that there was not any tree, graſſe, brambles, or ſtones, to offer the leaſt hinderance. The Army of Sebaſtian, had the Riuer of Arache behinde it, and that of Abdelmelec, the Riuer of Alcaſſar. Muley Mahumet, for whom this Tragedy was to bee acted, contrary to his oath and promiſe, did not bring with him any ayde for Sebaſtian; hauing hauing formerly made him beleeue, that more then halfe the Army of Abdelmelec, would come and ioyne with him: which came not so to passe, for both the Armies meeting together, each side fought valiantly for it selfe, and the Christians sustained the worse. Muley Mahumet was one of the first that fled, shaping his course towards the riuer of Arache, where thinking to passe the foord, & it being choked with mud and slime, and his horse sticking fast therein, he gaue him the spur so furiously, that losing his stirrops, and not knowing how to helpe himselfe by swimming, hee fell into the water, and so was both drowned and suffocated in the myre. As for K. Sebastian, after that all his men were slain, or (at least) put to flight; he was assayled on al sides (hauing but 7 or 8 knights with him) among whom also he was slaine, & lay on the ground among his owne people, that fought for their liues as much as men could do.

Muley Mahumet flying from the fight was drowned in the Riuer of Arache.

King Sebastian slaine among his own Souldiors, but hardly known

Now concerning Abdelmelec, some 8 or 10 dayes before the battaile, he fell into a greeuous sickenesse, by eating a messe of milke in a neere adioyning Village, which so curded on his stomacke, as hee could not compasse any auoydance of it. Neuertheless, on the day of battaile, hee would needs mount on horse-backe, and presse into the thickest of the fight, where finding himselfe more weake then euer; he was conuayed into his Litter, wherein he died immediately. But his death was very closely concealed, vntill the battaile was finished, and won on his side. Thus we may see, that (in one day) three Kings died by three seuerall meanes: for Muley Mahumet was drowned; Sebastian finished his life in fight; & Abdelmelec dyed by sickenesse. Their bodies also receiued diuersity of handling or vsage: for the body of Mahumet was flayed, & the skinne stuffed with haire, was carried thorow all the Citties in the kingdomes of Fez & Marocco, in signe of open infamy. The body of the king of Portugall, Sebastian, was buried in the Town of Alcassarquibier, without any Priest for the funerall obsequies, or any sheete to couer his body; but stark naked, according as it was found, when acknowledgement was taken of it among the other dead bodies: yet one of the groomes of his chamber, despoyling himselfe thereof, gaue him a poore paire of linnen breeches, & a most wretched doublet, which was no way disliked by the Mahometanes. The fore-said groome saued himself miraculously, for of the whol Christian Army, either Soldiors or other, there did not escape 200. Abdelmelec was carried away dead in his Litter royally apparelled, and more then twenty miles off from that place, hee was buried in a costly Sepulcher, among his Predecessors, and there was granted rents and reuennues, to diuers Priests of the Mahometane Religion, to pray to God (after their manner) for his soule.

Abdelmelec fell deadly sicke some 8 dayes before the battaile, and dyed in his Litter in the midst of the fight.

Three Kings ended their liues in one day diuersly.

The death & burial of three Kings bodies very strange as sildome the like hath beene heard of.

Not two hundred saued of all the Christian Army.

The royall burial of Abdelmelec.

Their successors also were as strange and diuers; for to Muley Mahumet, succeeded his mortall enemy, Hamed. To Abdelmelec, not his owne children, albeit he had diuers; but his bastard Brother, the said Hamed, for the father would haue it so. To king Sebastian, Philip King of Spain, who was (a farre off) a kinesman to him, yet then the neerest that could bee found, because the other was neuer maried. Here we may apparantly perceiue, how fortune playeth with miserable life, or vnsuccessefull ending in the very greatest, or of highest aduancement in this world, as well as those of much meaner condition, & that thorow some secret iudgement of God, who can & will dispose of all things, according to his owne good will and pleasure. These matters happened in Affrica, in the kingdomes of Marocco and Fez, on Monday, being the fourth day in the Moneth of August, and in the yeare 1578.

Of the successors to the seuerall Kings in their dominions, after their deaths.

God disposeth of all things, as himselfe best liketh.

I could heere alledge many other examples of Christian Kings and Princes, whose endes haue bin scarsely honorable or happy, and that within thirty yeare of this instant: but becausse I know, that these times do affoord some passionate spirits, who take no delight in such sad relations, and others are of a freer temper, but as void of pitty, as the other are too forward in compassion, not carrying any meane betweene such two extremities; I will forbeare to proceede any further in this argument, & enter into some other more apt discourse.

The Author vnwilling to wade in tedious relations.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

That Peoples are commonly such in their actions, manners, and pietie, as they perceyue their Kings, Princes, and Rulers to bee.

THere neede no doubt to bee made, but that it was verie true which Theodorick, King of the Gothes (writing to the Romaine Senate) alledged: That the course of Nature shoulde sooner faile, then people bee any other then their Princes. This is not onely to bee vnderstood of their vertues and vices; but likewise of the gesture of their bodies, yea euen so farre as to their wearing garmēts. This may easily be prooued; for Alexander the Great but bending his Neck a little towards his right shoulder, al his yong Princes, and other cheefe followers in his Court, did bend theirs also in the very same manner.

Alphonsus King of Arragon and Sicilie, hauing a wry necke, all such as followed and affected him, inforced to wry theyr neckes like his; as being perswaded, that it was most commendable in them, because their King and Maister carryed his necke so: as wee finde it recorded in the Booke of the Courtier, and in the life of Pyrrhus.

Plut. in vit. Pyr.

King Frances, the first of that name, vsed continually to weare his haire verie long, and (as it was saide) looking out at a Window, he receiued a wounde on the head; by meanes whereof hee was enforced to cut his lockes, and weare them a great deale shorter then formerly hee had done. Many of his Courtiers, especially such as wore their haire as he was wont to do, caused their long locks to be cut likewise, and ware them in the same manner as he did. Heereupon afterwardes, diuers Noble and high descended French-men, left off from longer wearing false Lockes and Periwigs, or Gregorians, which they reputed as a signe of Nobility and comelinesse, for holding some place of eminencie in the Commonwealth, & thenceforward esteemed it as a ridiculous fashion.

Charles the fifte, Emperour, wore his beard long, but cut round below, in shape of a pouch or purse. In imitation of him, the Noblemen of Spaine, Italy, Flanders, Germany, and Bourgongne, with some other that were his subiects, hadde their beards after the selfesame fashion, which they tearmed to bee an Imperiall Beard. King Charles the ninth, King of Fraunce, being at Metz, where the Count of Mansfeld, and Marquesse of Baden came to see him, because he should shew them a gracious countenance, he tooke off the Marquesses Bonnet from his head, and put on (insted thereof) his owne, which he commonly vsed to weare, that was a German cap, great, thicke, thrummy, and flat, in forme of a Cheese. In regard whereof, all the attendants in his Court (which was a great company at that time) would needs weare Bonnets after the same fashion. And it grew to such an extremity in affection, that such Cappes and Bonnets, as were vsually sold in Metz for *thirty Sols, within three dayes after, could not bee bought vnder three French Crowns; and yet (at so deare a rate) they were not to be had, albeit the Bonnet-makers laboured night and day in making them, the crowd and presse for them was so great, without any other profite or commoditie ensuing by them, but only that they wold be in the Kings fashion.

King Henrie the third, by reason hee had some Vlcers in the fore-part of his head, was subiect to a continuall paine & greefe: therefore he wore thicke gummy haire, bound vp behinde (like womens) to couer that defect. The Noblemen and Gentlemen of his Court, had their hayre gummed and bound vp in like maner, although no paine thereto prouoked them: whereupon some were verily perswaded, that men would fall likewise to weare womens garments, they were so forward in the fashion of their haire. If I would insert all the courses and behauiour of the people, in imitating their Princes fond fashions and habits, I must needs be too troublesome to the Reader: therefore I will now discourse on their vertues and vices, with as much breuity as I can.

and from Greece more then any other country (as did many great and excellent Philoſophers, amongſt whom were Plato, Democritus, and others) was for no other end; but in regard of a King of that Countrey, named Ptolomy Philadelphus, the onely louer of Learning, and ſeeker after ſuch men as were learned. And in imitation of him, the Egyptians his ſubiects addicted themſelues ſo ſtudiouſly, to ground their vnderſtanding in the moſt laudable Sciences, and that for ſuch long continuance of time, as a man was reputed to haue ſeene nothing, if he had not trauayled into Egypt. Whereuppon, it is ſayde, that Plato (admiring their wonderfull erudition) cryed out by way of exclamation: The Greekes are no better then Children in knowledge, beeing compared with the Ægyptians. Heere we may obſerue, what honour this good King Philadelphus won to his ſubiectes, becauſe by his immitation they made themſelues vertuous, and giuen to all commendable qualities.

The example of a Learned King, is no meane motiue to his ſubiects to affect learning.

The words of Plato the great Philoſopher.

The like happened vnder the reigne of Manſor, Emperour of Affrica, and all the Spaines, who gouerned in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand, one hundred, & fiue. This King was ſuch a louer of learning, that he cauſed all Bookes written in Greeke, eyther concerning Philoſophie, Phyſicke, or Hiſtorie, to be tranſlated into the Arabian tongue. He founded many Colledges, wherto he gaue very great rents, for the maintenance of poore Students, and profeſſors of learning, whereof a great many are at this day to be ſeen, in the Cities of Fez and Marocco in Affrica, in Treuiſſen, Tunis, Argiere, Hippona, and elſe-where, although he was a Mahometane in Religion, yet many other of his ſucceſſors, that afterwardes followed him, and the people themſelues (to this day) in thoſe Affricane countries, doe reliſh of the good conditions, maners, and vertues abiding in that King, addicting themſelues to Learning. Nor appeared this in men onely, but likewiſe in Women, according as Leo Affricanus teſtifyeth, ſaying; The Women of Lybia, in theſe our dayes, are very Learned and Studious, and aboue all things elſe, they are ſooner buſied in good Bookes: then medling with cloathes, Garments, or other Vtenſels belonging to houſhold. And I dare boldly maintaine (with many other Learned men, well read in Hiſtories) that but for this King Manſor, and his Arabian ſucceſſors: Phyſicke had neuer beene halfe ſo fertile in remedies, as we finde it now to bee in theſe our dayes.

Garcias d'Horta, Phyſitian to the Viceroy of the Indiaes, who liued within leſſe then thirty yeares, ſayeth, that hee had conferred with many Kings both of the Arabes and Affricanes; and found them to bee learned, as alſo notably skilfull in the Mathematikes. The like is affirmed by him that hath written the generall hiſtorie of India, that Almanſor, King of Tidora, one of the verie greateſt Iſlandes of the Moluccaes; was one of the greateſt Aſtrologers in our times, and that the people are not ſo rude and barbarous, as heere among vs they are reputed to bee. Before Manſor, none of them had euer ſeene the Bookes of Ariſtotle, Plato, Hippocrates, Galen, and other Greeke Authours, in any other Language then the Grecian.

African and Arabian kings learned nowe in theſe daies

In the time of this King Manſor, flouriſhed great ſtore of Learned men and Philoſophers: ſuch as were Auerroes, Meſuus, Raſis, Rabbie Moſes, and diuers others, whoſe workes (at this very day) are reade in our Vniuerſities, and Commented vpon, by diuerſe and ſundrie great Schoolemen, and it is not to be doubted, but poſteritie (for euer) will reſt beholding to them.

King

Frances, King of France, first of that name, the father of learning.

King Frances, first of that name, because himselfe was learned, and cherished men of learning and knowledge; beheld his reigne furnished with a great number of learned and vertuous Schollers, more then any other that went before him. In the same minde continued his Sonne, successor to his Crowne, and all the children of his successour; not meanely cherished and enriched by king Henry the fourth. Margret, Grandmother to the King now reigning, was a most learned Lady, of whose excellent & most elegant Poems, we haue great store remaining among vs. As also of Iane her Mother, both of them being Queenes of Nauarre, (and in their imitation) many other great Ladyes of honour, gaue their mindes to the reading of graue Authors, as well Greeke as Latine. Nor is it any matter of meruayle, if in these dayes, wee behold so many Ladyes well seene in good Sciences, and among the rest, that Italy affoordeth such plenty of studious women: the custome of the countrey prohibiting, that women should be any great walkers, or so much seene as they are in France. And because that famous Queene of England, Elizabeth, was very skilfull in many Languages, and deeply read in the fayrest and most commended Sciences, as in the Mathematicks, & diuers others: it was also credibly reported, that her house and Court, was bounteously stored with learned and most vertuous Ladies. And that which filled France with such plenty of bold and hardy spirits, was by the meanes of king Henry the fourth, then reigning: who in all battailes, encounters, and charging of the enemy, was alwayes the formost man himselfe; which taught his Captaines & Souldiors to do the like, onely by imitation of his vnparaled exploits.

King Henry the fourth euer the first man in all Battailes, &c.

Now on the contrary, if the Prince bee vicious, his Subiects wil sauour of the selfe same taste. As we reade of one named Mithridates, king of Amasia, who because he was a notorious drunkard, and accounted it as a vertue to drinke immeasurably: his people addicted themselues to that foule vice, so that the most part of them were full of diseases, as gouts, conuulsions, palsies, & alienation of vnderstanding. Marke Anthony, who tearmed himselfe Emperor of the East, so wallowed with his beloued Cleopatra, in the delights of Egipt (that thē degenerated quite from the vertues of their former King Philadelphus) and became so affected to drinking & drunkennesse, intermixing rich flowers and precious stones among the wine they dranke; that he gaue such example to his men of warre, and to the people thorow the East, to drinke and gourmandize after the same manner, that they would be drunke euery day, and held it as an admirable vertue: forgetting the honest policy of the Romanes, who would drinke no wine while they were in Armes. And so Marke Anthony (albeit hee was a great and worthy Captaine) and all his followers, by hauing discontinued the vertuous exercise of Armes; when hee should come to cope with Octauius Augustus, was (with small labour) surmounted. And the best generous acte, that Anthony could then deuise to do, and for his latest piece of seruice, was to kill himselfe, like another brutish Sardanapalus.

King Mithridates a notorious drunkard, and his people followed his example.

A wonderfull neglect in so famous a Soldiour.

Darius also, the great Monarch and King of the East, about three hundred yeares before Marke Anthony, euen like to him, had (beside his married wife) a multitude of concubines, bardaching boyes, fidlers, vaulters, dancers, fooles, players, and other people of as small account in his Army, eating and drinking, before eyther hunger or thirst vrged any necessity. His Captaines and men of command, with all the rest of his Army, he licenced to the like liberty: for each of his Soldiours might haue his two concubines, beside as many Ganimedes, and cheefer men tripled, or (at least) doubled them. In the ende, his Army, thought to consist of eight hundred thousand able fighting men; there could not bee found twenty thousand among them all. For according to the example of their king, they were altogether addicted to luxury and drunkennesse, and became as people vtterly vnmeete for warre. Therefore both he and they were ouercome by Alexanders forces, with small trauaile, or losse on his side; because his men were sober, continent, and stout fighting Soldiors, as the king himselfe was. So the Persian Empire, and the Babylonian also, was lost and dissipated in a moment; in regard that their king was lasciuious and of soft temper, which caused his subiects to imitate his example.

Princes

The Authors aduertiſemẽt to Kings and Princes in theſe our times.

Princes then, and others, that are aduanced to gouerne ouer people, may be aduiſed by theſe examples and reaſons formerly alledged, to addict their mindes and bodies to vertuous exerciſes, to ſpeak diſcreetly, to be no blaſphemers, to liue in all ſobriety, and to declare modeſtie in their actions and apparrell: but aboue all the reſt, not to ſwerue from vertue and true piety. For therein (doubtleſſe) their people will follow them, and make theyr time of rule the more ſetled and aſſured: for where vice reigneth, rebellion (oftentimes) the ſooner enſueth.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Originall of Triumphs: why they were firſt granted and vſed in Rome: How many they were that triumphed: What a Triumph is: and that there are two ſortes of Triumphes.

Two thinges that mooue men to high matters.

TO ſpeake morally, & as men ſhould doe, there are principally two cauſes, which incite men to vndertake great matters, as well in peace as warre. The firſt is Honor and renowne; the ſecond is profite and commoditie, Magnanimous, Noble and Heroicke ſpirits do chiefly couet the firſt; & baſe and vnworthy ſoules ſeeke for ſalary and hire. Cicero ſaith in his Oration which he made for * Archias the Poet: We all are drawne to deſire commendation, and they of greateſt place and expectation, ſaile with full gale after honour and fame: coueting no other recompence, or greater guerdon for their Vertue, then glory onely. The ſame Cicero, in another Oration made for the defence of Milo, ſaith; Wiſe and valiant men do not ſo much labour in exerciſe of their vertue, for the receit of wages, as for the honor that enſueth thereby.

*A Poet of Antioch, much loued of Tully and Lucullus.

A Romaine, much maintained by Tully.

The carefull conſideration of the Romãs to honor men of merite, and how Rome came to bee Empreſſe of the world.

This being well conſidered by the Romaines, they (more then any other Nation) ſought how to honour and illuſtrate (beſide due recompence) ſuch as ſtroue to do any notable or vertuous acte. So that in ſhort time after, and proceeding on with the ſame determination; Rome affoorded the reſort (more then any place beſide) of no meane number of worthie men, excelling both in Armes and Gouernment, that by them ſhee attained to ſway the Empire of the whole world. In regard whereof, for example and inſtruction to theſe inſtant times, as alſo to delight ſuch as enquire after Antiquities: I thought it very conuenient, to ſupplye this place with ſome breefe declaration, of the manner obſerued amongſt the Romaines, in yeelding honour and renowne to ſuch men, as had obtayned any victory for them.

Triumph, the greateſt among all Honors, & what was ſignified by the word Triumph.

Now becauſe among all honors whatſoeuer, Triumph was reputed to bee the very greateſt; we will diſcourſe thereon, according as we finde it ſet downe for our inſtruction. Triumph was a forme of entrance, or (as we may well ſay) a kinde of Welcome, which they vſed in Rome, to their Captaines and Generalles, with the verie greateſt pompe and ſolemnitie that could bee expreſſed vnto men. And albeit Triumphs were much vſed among the Romaines, yet were they not the firſt inuenters of them. For Diodorus Siculus, and Pliny, doth both ſay, that Denis, called Dionyſe in Antiquitie, and named alſo Pater Liber, was the firſt that euer Triumphed in the worlde. It appeareth likewiſe, that the Carthagenians vſed to Triumph: for Iuſtine (among the other honours of Haſdruball) ſaith, that he Triumphed foure times.

Moreouer, wee reade of Triumphes among the Kings of Ægypt, and eſpecially of King Soſeſtris. Neuertheleſſe, to ſpeake truely, Triumphes were neuer ſo ſolemnized in any other Nation, as they were among the Romaines: for vpon the day that any Captaine triumphed, the people of Rome ceaſed from all kinde of Workes whatſoeuer, and not any matter (concerning profite) was permitted to be done.

No Nation comparable to the Romanes for Triumphes.

And to make this ſolemne Triumph the more compleate, the people of al places neere neighbouring thereto, came thicke and threefold thither to behold it. And all the Cittie, Temples, Streetes, Gates, and Windowes, were enriched & hung with clothes made of Gold, Siluer, Silke, Leaſes and Flowers of ſweete ſmelling ſauour, beſide all other magnificencies & coſts that might expreſſe any ſigne of of ioy. The Senate and all the Priests, with the whole Nobilitie of Rome, and generally the better sort of people, went forth into the fields very honourably apparelled, to entertayne the Triumpher: who entred Rome, cloathed in purple, crowned with Laurell, and mounted on a golden charriot, drawne by foure milke white horses. All his prisoners went before him, attired like slaues or seruants, hauing their heads close shorne or shauen: and the Captayne or King of the prisoners by him vanquished, went nearest to the Charriot before anie other. The Souldiours of his owne Armie entred in due order, bearing branches of Laurell in their hands. Then followed before him, Charriots and Waggons filled full of armour, which hee had taken fro n the enemy: beside other waggons laden in like manner, with Plate of golde and siluer, money, iewells and other rich shapes or trophees, with such gifts and presents, as hee had receiued of Kings, or any other friends to Rome. Great Castles, Towers, and other Engines of wood, made artificially, representing conquered Cities and Fortresses, were likewise carryed before him: making liuely representation, as they marched along, of such battailes as had happened in the last warre, and so exactly to the life; that they were very dreadfull to the beholders. These things were so many in number, so mighty, and of such rare diuersitie, that the Triumph (sometimes) required the vse of three seuerall dayes, becausе all the representations might be the more amply noted and conceiued. The Triumph consisted of various inuentions, with many rare deuices, too long to be reported.

Nor was this honour of Triumph, allowed and granted to euerie Captaine or Victor; but there were Lawes set downe, and notable occasions to be considered, before such fauour could be obtained. The Captaine that meant to demand it, came not at all into Rome: but abode at the Vaticane*, and thither the Senate returned him answere, whether such grace might bee permitted him, or no. First of all, no chiefe, or commander of an Army might triumph; except hee had beene Consull, Proconsull, or Dictator; for Triumph was neuer granted to any of meaner condition. In regarde whereof, Marcus Marcellus had triumph denyed him, albeit he had worthily conquered Siracusa; and Scipio also, although he had subdued Spaine. For, it was necessarily required, that the battell must be great and notable against the enemie, and aboue fiue thousand men at the least slayne therein. Of these matters, Valerius Maximus is Author. We likewise reade, that Cato, and L. Marius, being Tribunes, made a Law, whereby they ordayned seuere punishment for any Captayne, that deliuered a false report of the number slayne in fight. Nor was it enough for a man to win the battell, how doubtfull & bloudy soeuer it were; but hee must subdue the whole Prouince or Country, & leaue it peacefully to his successor, bringing home his army braue & victoriously; which was the cause (sayth Titus Liuius) that Triumph was denyed to Titus Manlius, notwithstanding all his great victories in Spaine: for hee should haue compassed the acquisition of som new country, or entred into a new warre, & not defend that only which was formerly won. Vpon the same occasiō also, great Quintus Fabius triumphed not, though he had conquered them of Campania.

It was obserued as a custome also, that on the day of Triumph, the Triumpher should invite the Consulls to supper with him; which they would refuse to doe, becausе (at this feast) no person should bee present, to whom greater honour might be done, then to the Triumpher. The Triumph alwayes ended in the Temple of Iupiter in the Capitoll, where the spoiles (wonne from the enemy) were altogether offred, and deliuered vp to publike vse. And becausе the triumpher shold not ouer-glory himselfe in these high honors and fauors done him: some say, that a slaue or bond-man was seated by him with permission, to ieast and scoffe at him all the day long, & to reproach him with such iniuries as seemed best to himselfe, as a plaine apparance, that such dignities depended but on transitory graces.

Now, to make this triumphall honor the more intelligible; we will make rehersall of some one or two, especially that of Paulus Æmilius, that worthy and famous Captayne of Rome, who obtayned his triumph iustly; for vanquishing & taking

The honorable triumph of Paulus Aemilius.

Perſeus, the powerfull king of Macedon, conquering and ruinating his kingdome, and therefore made his Triumph, according as it is remembred by Plutarch, in this manner. Our firſt remembrance, concerneth the people of Rome in generall, with them of all the neighbouring parts round about, attired after their very beſt ability of performance, and contending for places in houſes and windowes, where beſt they might take view of the triumph. All the Temples and Churches in Rome were ſet wide open, deckt and richly hung with Tapiſtry, greene boughes of Trees, beſide plenty of incenſe and ſweet ſmelling perfumes, and ſo were all the ſtreetes in like manner. Now becauſe in the Citty the concourſe of people was infinite, reſorting from ſo many ſeuerall places, in earneſt deſire to behold ſuch a ſolemne ſpectacle, there were certain men appointed with ſtaues in their hands, who had charge to make way for the Triumphs paſſage, and looke to the peoples ſafe ſeating, becauſe the matters prepared for this triumph grew ſo great, as they were enforced to diuide them into three ſeuerall dayes.

The firſt day was ſcarſely ſufficient for entrance of all the Banners, Standards, & vanquiſhed Enſignes; as alſo for paſſage of the Statues, Coloſſes, Tables, and Images, for all theſe were conuayed along in order, in rich and well appointed Chariots, VVaggons, and Thrones. On the ſecond day, the Armour and munition of the conquered king, and what elſe belonged to the Macedonians, was brought into the citty: which Armours being rich and gloriouſly glittering, were conueniently placed on beſt ſighted carriages, meeteſt for their full and ample beholding. After theſe chariots and waggons, entred three thouſand men, carrying ſiluer mony (open to be ſeene) on great Plates and Veſſels of ſiluer, each one weighing three talents, of which Plates and Veſſels there were 350 in number, and foure men allowed to carry each piece of Plate. The reſt that ſerued to make vp the ful number of three thouſand men, carried Fountaine Pots, Ewres, Baſons, Lauours, very curiouſly wrought in gold and ſiluer, beſide other veſſels of the ſame mettals, moſt rich and magnificent to behold: and the paſſage of theſe companies continued ſo long, that it required the ſecond dayes whole employment, marching along in due and comely order.

The third day being come, the breake of day no ſooner began, but in the firſt band, & beginning of the Triumph, went Drums, Fifes, Clarions, and Trumpets ſounding, not ſweet and delicately, but in ſuch ſtearne and vigorous manner, as if they were inſtantly to enter battail. After them were led ſix ſcore kine, all white, hauing their hornes richly guilded, and their bodies couered with coſtly cloathes: all theſe were helde as ſacred to the Gods, crowned and decked with garlands, and chaplets of faire flowers, & they that guided thē, were braue gallant youths, ſumptuouſly apparelled for this ſeruice, and for the ſacrificing of them; and by theſe kine went as many comely children, carrying Plates of gold and ſiluer for the ſacrifice. Next vnto the kine, were rancked ſuch as carried gold money in chargers of gold, being ſeuenty ſeuen in number. And behinde them, followed they that holpe to beare the great Bolle or Cuppe of golde, weighing ten Talents, which Paulus Aemilius had cauſed to bee made, enriched with many ſumptuous and vnualuable precious ſtones. They which carried the chargers of money, were ſuch as had bin neereſt in fauour, about the Kings Antigonus, Seleucus, and other Kings of Macedon, eſpecially the forenamed Perſeus. Next followed the chariot of the conquered King, with the Armes and Weapons which he vſed to weare, his Crown, Scepter royal and rich Robe laid vpon the Armour. Behinde the chariot, were the children to the poore king led as priſoners, with a great number of his cheefeſt Officers; as the Maſters or Gouernours of his houſhold, his Treaſurers, Chancellors, Secretaries, and others of high employment in his affaires. They all wept, & expreſſed extraordinary ſignes of greeſe, beholding themſelues brought into ſuch a ſeruitude; which moued all the beholders to much compaſſion.

The golden Crownes of the Cities of Greece borne before him, and he following in triumphall manner.

After the King, followed his friends & fauourites, with a great number of his familiars, who all looking on their King, confounded themselues with sorrow, to see his reuerend cheekes furrowed with teares, and many of the Romans bemoaned his misery. Then after were brought the crownes of gold, which the ancient Cities of Greece had presented to Paulus Aemillius, who followed thē triumphantly, mounted vpon a goodly Chariot, cloathed in purple tissue of golde, bearing a Lawrell branch in his hand, and a crowne of the same vpon his head. Behinde him followed the people both on foote and horseback, some hauing branches of Lawrell and Palme in their hands, and some with Banners and Pennons, singing in honour of their Captaine, triumphing thus after his victories, with other most delectable sights to behold; and in this order Paulus Aemillius triumphed throgh Rome. Others also did the like, with some things added or diminished, and so they went to offer their spoyles, in the Temple of Iupiter within the Capitoll; and there, according to the forme and manner, as their blinded religion then required, they gaue thankes to their Gods for the victory obtayned. And notwithstanding that in this fashion they obserued & performed their customary triumphs: yet they had a Law for it, according to which Law, they gaue triumph by desert, making a distinction of the gates & streets, whereat they were to enter, and whereby they should passe along, the times also beeing ordered and appointed. But concerning other things, as sports, playes, & Feasts of diuers kinds, it was permitted, that euery man might augment and enrich his triumph, and his chariot also: for it is found recorded, that they had a custome, to be drawne by four white horses, and yet notwithstanding, some haue bin drawne by as many Buls.

No great difference in the Romane Triumphs.

A Law for the order of triumphing, and by merit.

Sports and Feasts were by free permission.

The manner how diuers were drawne in their triumph.

Great Pompey, when hee triumphed for Affrica, he entred in a Chariot drawne by Elephants. Suetonius saith, that Iulius Cæsar when hee made his triumphall entrance, had his chariot drawn by forty elephants. VVith the like Beasts triumphed the Emperour Gordianus. And Flauius writeth, that the Emperour Aurelianus, who was king of the Gothes, triumphed in a chariot drawne by Harts. VVe reade also, that Mark Anthony in his triumph, had his chariot drawne by Lyons. The Roman Captains had a custome beside when they triumphed, to haue a young childe, or many in their chariots: whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration pro Munera. Others caused to be led in their triumphs, an infinite number of wilde and sauage Beasts, as Lyons, Ounces, Beares, Tygers, Rhinocerots, Panthers, Dromi-daries, & other kindes of beasts, as did Titus & Vespasian, according to the relation of Iosephus. Some other also would haue their entrance with diuersity of Musique, as well by instruments as voyces, with infinite other the like delectations. Among all which triumphs, some were more singular then the rest; as those of Pompey & Cæsar; of the two Brethren Scipioes; and likewise of the Emperors, wherof Elondus speakes in his Book of Rome triumphing, & according as Paulus Orosius saieth, that there were 320 Triumphers in Rome; the last wherof was the emperor Probus, from whose time since, Rome ran to her decadence.

Whence the forme of our Pageants wer at first deuised.

Some triumphs more singular then the rest.

In Rome there was yet another kinde of solemn welcom, which was somwhat lesse then triumphing. being called * Ouātio, and giuen for victories when as something wanted of such necessary conditions as required triumph. As for example, if the Captaine had not bin Consull or Proconsull, or had made war without great resistance, or little bloodshed in battaile, or had conquered people of slender esteeme; or if the war had bin done without expresse authority from the Senate, & such like other conditions, then in sted of triumphing, this Ouatio was granted to him, & it was performed in this manner.

* A small triumph of a Captaine, for a victory without slaughter of men, or very few.

The Captaine entred Rome on horseback, in stead of a chariot, and some of them (in elder times) entered on foote, crownd with the leaues of Myrrhe, which were offerings to Venus, because such triumphing was not reputed Martiall, but (as it were) veneriall, according as Aulus Gellius saith. The people attending on this Captaine, were not armed, neyther founded Trumpets, Drums, or any other instruments of warre; but Flutes & sweet musicall instruments, soft and delicate. Neuertheless, they entred in order, and with their booty, and the Senate went foorth of the Citty to meete and receiue him, making a great feast for him, as also highly praysing & commending him.

The first Ouation Triumphers, and that accepted thereof very gladly.

I finde that many excellent Captains haue requested & accepted of this honor, and the first was Posthumus Liberius, hauing vanquished the Sabines; and Marcus Marcellus, for his victory at syracusa. Suetonius affirmeth, that Octauius Cæsar entred thus, after the Phillippick battailes, & the warre of Sicily. The cause why this small triumph was so named, is described by Pliny, for in declaring that diuers Captaines were denyed this kinde of triumph, and could by no meanes obtayne it: hee proceedeth to yeelde a reason, why this Ouatio was so tearmed. The sacrifice (sayeth he) which the Captaine then offered, was a Sheepe, which in the Latine tongue is called Ouis: but the other Triumphers offered a Bull, and therefore vpon the word Ouis, the reception and entertainment made vnto thē, was called Ouatio, or Oualis. Some other say, that it took name by a certaine sound in the peoples voyce, of Oe, or else Oue; but because this is a matter of small importance, it shall suffice to say, that such a thing was named Ouatio, eyther of the word Ouis, or of the other voyce of Oe or Oue.

Plin. in lib. 9. cap. 22.

How this kinde of triumph tooke name at the first, by variety of opinion

It was also permitted to the Triumphers, to erect their Statues in Temples, & common places of resort: also to build Arches and Collombs, named Triumphall, framed of Marble, and in or on thē, to insculpt (most excellently) their battels and victories, for their owne perpetuall memory. The vestiges or footings of thē are (at this day) to be seene in Rome: and these things wer thus done, in imitatiō of Trophees, anciently vsed among the Grecians, helping themselues thereby in manner following. In the same place, where the Captaine had obtayned any victory, a great tree was prepared, the greatest therabout to be found, the branches whereof were all cut off; and then vpon the trunke was fastened all the coat-armours of the vanquished, as a victorious and honourable memory, and it was called Tropæum or Trophæum, after the greeke word Tropi; which signifieth a fleeting conuersion, or retreated, because (in that place) the enemy was put to flight, or disgracefull retreate, and so the Romanes afterward were glad to follow their fashion.

Trophees among the Grecians, and in what manner.

Salust writeth, that Pompey hauing ouercome the Spaniards, planted his Trophees on the top of the Pyrennean Mountaines: and this course (by tract of time) was in such esteeme, that they grew to be made of stone. But this matter can approue it selfe to be much more ancient, & that other Nations haue made vse therof: for we reade, that Saul hauing vanquished Agag, king of the Amalekites, and beeing come to Mount Carmell, he erected there a triumphall Arch, as a memory of his victory. In breefe, the honour of triumph was esteemed and affected, more then any other honour in Rome, so that for obtayning it, the Captaines would expose their liues to all trauaile and perill. Beside, the Triumphers grew to great wealth, both by the enemies spoyles, and the gifts of their friends, and so much the rather haue I reported these things, because Princes may thereby receiue example, how to honour and remunerate their Captains and Soldiers to their merits. But in these decaying dayes, sluggards, and such as doe nothing at all, are as well, if not better respected, then they that aduenture their liues and goods, both for seruice of their Prince, & profite of their natiue country

Triumph was more coueted then any other honour in Rome.

CHAP. XLI.

Of such names of immortall honour and renowne, which the Romane Captaines had granted and giuen them, according to their seuerall victories.

OVer and beside this high dignity of Triumphs, the Romane Captains had farre greater honours giuen them, by names & sirnames, which were imposed on them by the people and Prouinces, that had bin conquered and ouercome by them. And as it was a notable forme of exaltation to honour; so did they immortalize their houses of discent, by contrary names of glory glory and fame, onely through their memorable actions, which procured so many worthy and illustrious Families in the Citty of Rome.

A further addition of honour to the Romane Generals.

Metellus and two more of his name, had their sirnames according to their conquests.

For our first entrance into this discourse, wee may take an example by the three Metelli, whereof one (according as Salust and some others write) because he had ouercome King Iugurthe, conquering also his lands and kingdome of Numidia; was sirnamed Numidicus. The second being Quintus Metellus, for the victory he obtayned against the king of Macedon, was sirnamed Macedonicus. And the third, Creticus, because he conquered the Isle of Creete. But much more ancient then these, were Martius Coriolanus, and Sergius Fidenatus. The first was named Coriolanus, after the Towne Coriola in Latium, by him conquered. And the other by the like acte on Fidena, a Towne in Italy. Another Metellus also was sirnamed Balearicus, because he had conquered to the Romane Empire, the Iflands called Baleares, now tearmed Maiorque and Minorque.

Martius Coriolanus and Sergius Fidenatus.

Metellus Balearicus.

Lucius Mummius was sirnamed Achaicus, because hee had subdued Achaia and Corinthe. So the other Brutus, in regard he brought the Gaules in subiection, was sirnamed Gallus. The two Scipioes, being brethren, were honoured by the names of the people whom they had vanquished; the one in Affrica and Carthage, and the other in Asia, because he conquered also in Antioche and in Asia: for hee was the first that displayed the Romane Coullors or Ensignes in Asia. Another Scipio afterward, sonne to Paulus Æmillius (of whose triumph we haue already spoken) & Nephew adoptiue to great Scipio, was likewise sirnamed Affricanus; because hee assayled and won the great and puissant citty of Carthage. Neuertheless, he receiued a greater honor and guerdon, to be sirnamed Numantinus, and he himselfe held it in farre higher respect; because in Spaine he destroyed Numantia, and vtterly ouerthrew the Numantines.

Mummius Achaicus.

Scipio Affricanus. Scipio Asiaticus.

Scipio Affricanus and Numantinus.

I finde in like manner, that Emperours attributed vnto themselues the sirnames of conquered places, speaking them expressely in their Letters missiue and other instruments; namely Seuerus, and his successors after him; as for Arabia, Parthia, Armenia, Germania, and other Prouinces by them subdued. So one named himselfe Arabicus, another Parthicus, another Armenicus, so Germanicus, and Asiaticus: each man according to such victories as he had obtayned, so did hee magnifie himselfe.

Emperours sirnamed after conquered countries.

Moreouer, for other matters and reasons, the Romane Captaines were illustrated by especiall names, for their greater magnificence and splendour. As we reade of Marcus Manlius, who for defending the Capitoll from the forces of the French, was sirnamed Capitolinus. The family of the Torquati receyued that sirname, for taking a Chaine or Coller from the necke of an enemy, for a Coller or Chaine in latine is called Torquis, and so were diuers of them therefore named. Quintus Fabius Maximus, because by long delayes & dissimulations, hee had held out Hannibal in warre, only for the defence of Rome; they sirnamed him Cunctator, which is as much to say, as a temporiser or delayer. And for the same reason also, they termed him (beside) the Shield or Buckler of Rome, which redounded to his greater aduantage and honour.

Marcus Manlius Capitolinus.

Nouellus Torquatus & Manlius Torquatus. Quintus Fabius Cunctator.

Marcus Marcellus, who liued also in those times, in regard of his great power and valiancy, the continuall battels which (without ceassing) he gaue to the enemy, was called, The Sword of Hanniball. And that excellent Captain Sylla, though somwhat cruel, was sirnamed Happy, in regard of his prosperous victories. Pompey likewise was so renowned by his successe in warre, that he had the sirname of Great giuen him, then which title, I know not what could more haue raised and exalted him. So farre extended the dignity of sirnames, granted to Captaines in those dayes, especially to such as were vertuous Commanders and Generals, as they were also called Emperors, which in these more moderne times, is the title of supremest dignity, and which could not then bee giuen, but to a Captaine, Prætor, Consull, or Proconsull, that had bin victorious in some notable battaile, and had desolated the enemies country, by the death of a great number of enemies: As if two thousand of his men were slaine, there must then ten thousand perish on the enemies side, and not otherwise it was granted.

Marcus Marcellus, The sword of Hanniball.

Sylla the Happy.

Pompey the Great.

Captains scalled Emperors and vpon what respect or deserts.

With this so gracious and happy a sirname, was Iulius Cæsar, the Father of Iulius Cæsar honored, for the victory which he had against the * Samnites & Lucanes, in the time of Sylla. Pompey also was called Emperour, for the memorable victory he wonne in Affrica, against Domitius. Marcus Tullius Cicero, beeing Proconsull in the warre against the Parthians, was by them of the Army named Emperour, for the victory there obtained. Iulius Cæsar, before he was called to the Empire, was styled Emperour, by reason of his many victories. But if this Captaine had not suffered great resistances in his battailes, he had not beene worthy of that name, & yet notwithstanding he was reprehended, so that Marke Anthony murmured against him, and yet because he had taken a great City, on the further side of the Riuer Euphrates, he was content that they should call him Emperour. After Iulius Cæsar and his successours, inuesting themselues with the full Seigneury of Rome, & knowing well, that the name of King was in horror and detestation among the people, they would bee named Emperours, which title hath continued euer since, & is the very greatest of all.

So then we see, that for such honors, the Romanes fayled not in their gratification, aswell to their strange frends abroad, being vnder their reward, as to the home-borne sonnes of Rome. Because like as they were powerfull and rigorous, in fighting against enemies; so were they as gracious and liberall to such as assisted them. So that in the same kinde of bounty they gaue to king Atalus the Prouince of Asia, with the title of king: for which (afterward) he was ingratefull, because (by his testament) hee returned all his profits to Rome. To Eumenes the brother of this Atalus, because he had well serued and assisted the Romanes, in the war against Antiochus: the Senate gaue him all the Cities and Townes, which hee had conquered from Antiochus in Asia. To king Deiotarus of Galatia, because hee had ayded Pompey, in the warre against Mithridates, the Romans gaue him the Prouince of the lesser Armenia. In the like manner was king Massinissa of Numidia guerdoned, hauing beene embraced by Scipio, as his companion and friend to the people of Rome: to him was giuen all whatsoeuer he had conquered in the kingdome of Syphax, who had assisted the Carthagenians.

Nor were these gifts and presents allowed to Captaines, and men of apparancie onely; but likewise to them of the meanest condition, they gaue gifts, prerogatiues, and great honours. The Consull Marius, knowing the well deseruing of two companies, that had fought valiantly against the Cimbrians, a people among the Allemaignes, and were come into Italy with him, he receiued them as Citizens of Rome. When being reproued for doing such a thing contrary to their Lawes, he made answer: In the noise and clattering blowes of weapons, there is no voice of the Law heard.

CHAP. XLII.

Of such Crownes, with other recompences and salaries, which the Romanes gaue to Soldiors. Also of punishing offenders, comprehending (in this case) an excellent form for warre, and good gouernment of a common-wealth.

THE Romans were not carefull onely for honouring & gratifying their Captaines, but offered them (beside) infinite other graces & fauours, rewarding them honourably in diuers and sundry kindes, with Crownes & Iewels; as holding them in particular esteeme and reputation, and according to the merit of their actions in Armes, in the same sort were they respected and requited.

When a Captaine had obtained a victory in some notable battaile, were it vpon the Sea or Land, and had therein taken some Towne by force, or done any other singular enterprize; immediately after, they had a custome to make diligent inquisition, concerning the valour of the particular bandes and squadrons. Then mounting vpō the Theater, after they had giuen thanks to the Gods for the victory obtayned: in generall they commended the whole Army, and especially extolled the band or squadron, that had fought with most man-hood. Afterward they reuealed particular men in the companies by their names, publishing the worth of of their vertue and courage, in no leſſe meaſure then they had deſerued: terming them friends and louers of their country, ſaying alſo, that the Common-wealth ſtood highly obliged to them. And this beeing done, they gaue then preſents of Gold and Siluer, of Crownes, Girdles, Bracelets, Iewels, as alſo very excellent armour for horſſes, made ſo curiouſly, & deliuered with ſuch defences and prohibitions, as no man was ſuffered to vveare or haue the like, without he had deſerued it in the ſame manner. Hiſtories are full of theſe things, and particularly Titus Liuius, ſpeaking of the Conſul Papyrius Cenſor, ſaith; that he gaue Bracelets of Gold to fourteene Centurions; and afterward to a ſquadron, he gaue very rich & coſtly Ornaments. As much hee ſaith of Scipio, being in Spaine, and other places.

Tit. Liu. in li. 10 & 30. Papir. Cenſor.

Now, concerning the Crowns which they gaue, they had diuers names, and were according to the degrees of merite. They had the Crowne Obſidionalis, the crowne Triumphalis, the crowne Oualis; Corona Ciuica, Corona Muralis, Corona Naualis, and Corona Caſtrenſis. Pliny ſpeaketh of them all, and ſo doeth Aulus Gellius,

The ſeuerall crowns which the Romanes gaue.

Plin. in lib. 16. & 22. Aul. Gellius. in lib. 5.

But that Crowne of greateſt excellencie, and more eſteemed then all the reſt, was Corona Obſidionalis, which extended to the circkled or ſiedge of the Campe, and it was giuen onely, for hauing deliuered an army encloſed and beſiedged within a Towne or Citie, or when a camp was ſtrictly enuironed. So that by ſuch a worthy deede of armes, the place or people accounted themſelues to bee deliuered from death, or mercileſſe impriſonment: for no other action whatſoeuer, was this honor & reſpect to be giuen. The crown was made of greene leaues, for they cared not to haue it made of Golde, or other mettall, but of the graſſe and hearbes of the ſame field, where the enemie had bin ouerthrowne or forced to flight. With this Crown was crowned the Great Quintus Fabius, becauſe when Hannibal vvas before Rome, hee defended and deliuered it from his beſiedging. Æmilius Scipio, was alſo crowned therewith in Affrica, for hauing deliuered the Conſull Manlius, with certaine bands. Calphurnius obtayned it alſo in Sicily, and ſo did the valiant L. Cincinatus Dentatus, and ſome other.

Corona Obſidionalis, & wherfore it was giuen, being the Crowne for raiſing a ſiege

Such as had the honor to be crowned with this Crowne.

Corona Ciuica, or the Citizen crowne, was made of Oaken leaues and branches, with the fruite or Acornes hanging on it. This was giuen to him that had ſaued a Cittizen, when his life was in extreame perill, killing his enemy, & making good the place where the danger hapned. This crown was ſo much made account of, that ſometimes it fell to ſuch a mans Honour, who for ſauing one Romane cittizen, at his deliuerance ſlew two of his enemies. But becauſe he defended not and made good the place from future perill, doubt vvas made, whether he had deſerued this Citizen Crowne, or no. Neuertheleſſe, Law was diſpenſed withall, and it was concluded to be giuen him, ſeeing hee had deliuered the Citizen, and ſlaine two of his enemies in a place ſo perillous, which was not in his power ſtill to protect, although the Law imported ſo much. And albeit a man had deliuered a King, or a Captaine of confederates and friends, yet could he not haue his crowne to reward him, except he had deliuered a Roman: I find that Pliny recordeth, that this very ſame crown had beene giuen to one, who ſlewe the firſt enemie that mounted on the wals of a City or Fortreſſe, being defended by or for the Romanes.

Law may ſom time bee diſpenſed withal on needefull occaſions.

Plin. in l. 16. c. 7

This Corona Ciuica, was the moſt excellent, next vnto the Obſidionall, and might dayly be worne, and in all places. Likewiſe, he that deſerued this Crowne, was of ſuch account and eſteeme, as hee might ſit in the Theater, or at Feaſtes, where hee had alwayes his place neereſt vnto the Senate. And when hee entered, the Senate would riſe vpon their feete, to do him honor.

The reputation & eſteeme of this citizen Crowne.

He ſtood alſo free and exempt from any Office or charge whatſoeuer, except his pleaſure was to accept it: and moreouer, for his ſake, and in regard of him, his Father and Grandfather (if they were liuing) ſtood exempted alſo. Many Romans obtained to weare this Crowne, & eſpecially the moſt valiant Cincinnatus Dentatus, named before, who wonne fourteene of them. The ſecond Capitolinus had ſixe; and to Cicero, by particular diſpenſation, one of them was granted, becauſe he had defended Rome from the conſpiracy of Catiline. Theſe Crownes, whereof wee haue made relation, although they were made but of Hearbes and Leaues, and might might more properly be called Garlands, or like to the French chaplets of floures: yet were they (notwithstanding) much more esteemed and renowned, then if they had beene of the finest gold.

Corona Muralis giuen for first scaling the walles of a Citie or Castle.

As for the Murall Crowne, called Corona Muralis, it was of golde, and giuen to him that had assaulted and ascended the walls of a citty, or a castle, mounting first vp the scaling Ladder, and both freeing and defending the walles; which caused, that the Crowne was made in forme of an imbattelled wall. The first (according to Pliny) that obtained this crowne, was Manlius Capitolinus. Scipio also gaue it to Quintus Trebellius, and Sextus Digitus; because that they (both together) wonne first the enemies wall, before any other.

Corona Castrensis, as belonging to the Campe and Barriers ther of.

Corona Castrensis, siue Vallaris, was giuen to him that (in the fight) entred first into the Barriers, Railes, or Listes of the enemies Campe, comming off againe with credite and reputation: this Crowne also was made of gold, and shaped according to Bastions and Rampires of a field for warre.

Corona Naualis for boarding shippes at sea.

Of the like mettall was the Nauall Crowne, Corona Naualis, which was bestowed on the man, that first (in fight at sea) boarded and entred an enemies shippe: and it was in the shape of the prow or poynt of a ship. Marcus Varro made no disdaine of this Crowne, when it was offered vnto him by great Pompey, in the war against the Pirates. Octauius presented it also to Marcus Agrippa, and to Sylla: many other likewise had the honor thereof, wherof now I omit to speak.

Other worthy rewards for of merit.

When any Souldier of Rome, were he noble or ignoble, had made any proofe of his bodie, were it at the course of Launce, or in single combate: the Romaine Captaines or Generals were wont to giue him or them collers or chaines of gold and siluer, or bracelets, or girdles, accordingly as they had deserued, with other priuileges and preheminences. And such prizes they might giue to his frends, that had assisted them in the war: but as for the Crownes, they were reserued only for Romaines. Of all which things wee finde many notable examples in the Romaine histories.

Suet. in vita Octa. Cæsar.

Suetonius writeth, that Octauius permitted to Marcus Agrippa: that he might beare Banner of Azure colour: in regard of a victory which hee had obtayned at Sea, against Sextus Pompeius. He further affirmeth, that it was he who deuised first the gifts of Collers and Flagon chaines, with other particular presents beside, allowed only in such affaires, which would require too long a space heere to report. And heere it is well worth the remembring, that the Romanes were so valiant, that some one man hath wonne the honour of all these rewardes, or the greater part of them. For Pliny and Solinus doe name such men, amongst other Marcus Sergius, who obtained the most part of them. And in the warre at * Thrasymenus and Trobia, where the Romaines were vanquished by Hanniball, he wonne the crown called Corona Ciuica, as also in the ouerthrow at Cannas. This man was so valiant, that hauing lost his right hand in the battel, he shewed great valor with the left, and by meanes of a steele hand made him, in stead of the other lost, he foyled and slew 4. men in one day in the field of Battell ech after other: in which braue day of fight, and others beside, he receiued 23 wounds, & al in the fore part of his body.

Marcus Sergius a valiant Romaine.

Yet notwithstanding, neither this Marcus Sergius, nor any other beside, did euer deserue and attaine to so much as Lucius Cincinnatus Dentatus, Tribune of the people, of whom we spake alittle before. Of him write Plinie, Solinus Valerius Maximus, and Aulus Gellius, affirming, that in iewels and presents of price, some greater then other, he obtained onely by actions of Armes, 320. and more. Beside, that he entred Rome with 9. seueral Generals, when they performed their solemne triumphs, & whom he had assisted in their victories. He had a great number of broke Spears, shiuerd Lances, shafts of Iauelins, pikes without heads of steele, giuen to him as signalls of honour. He had 18. collers and gold chains; 83 of siluer: Of armors and furnitures for horses fitting war seruice, and thereunto particularly appointed, hee had fiue and twenty: an hundred and fortie bracelets; eight Castrenses; three Murales, one Eliodionale, and I know not how many Nauall. In seuerall fought battailes, hee had taken fiue and fourtie wounds, all of them before vppon his bodie; and no more then one only behind, and thirty foure times he

45. wounds all before on his body, and but one onely behind.

hee had disarmed and dispoyled the enemy, hauing personally bin present in sixe score encamped battells. Nay, he was so valiant and fortunate in Armes, that hee was sirnamed the Romane Achilles: and although his performances may seeme to the world incredible; yet notwithstanding the multitude and conformitie of histories doe auouch them.

The Romane Achilles Lucius Cicinnatus Ventatus.

The Romaines, for famous actions in Armes, conceded (beside) other honours and preheminences, as power of publique iudgements, and sitting in the chaire of Curules*, which was the seate of the Ædiles and Prætor, and which was permitted to Scipio. Somtimes also there they gaue consent, for the greatest authorities of Souldiers, according as they were suffered by the people to doe: concerning a degree or state, submitted to the libertie of the Patriottes and people. Captaines likewise were permitted to erect triumphall Statues, and to decke and cloathe themselues, euen as if they had beene Consulls. The Senate granted (by forme of salary and congratulation) that they might place in Temples, the armes and spoiles of enemies conquered by thē in battels: and such things were tearmed Manubiæ, as much to say, as spoyles and booties taken from an enemy.

* The chiefe Chaire in the Councell-house.

Statues allowed to be erected by Captaines and Generalls, & their enemies Armies in Temples.

Manubiæ, the spoiles of enemies.

Furthermore, the Romains had a commendable custome, concerning such as had beene slayne in their warres; that their children should haue and enioy the like wages, as they gaue vnto their fathers liuing. And to olde Souldiers, that had long time followed the wars; such good allowance of land, as they might well and easily liue thereon. Suffering them also to dwell in Cities, Townes, and Prouinces conquered and subiected, where themselues pleased to make election. In this manner the Cittie of Siuill was made a Colony for Rome by Cæsar: which Colonies (according to the common French saying) may be tearmed a new dwelling, or transmigration of people. In briefe, the Romaines neuer left a good action vnrequited, nor without some great priuiledge; for the which cause, more valiant men were found among them, then in all other nations beside.

Respect of slaine Souldiers children, and men of long seruice, for their dwelling and abiding.

I spare to speake of many other requitalls, which the Romaines vsed in respect of Armes, thinking already I haue sayde enough. Notwithstanding, it is a matter most certaine, that as they excelled all Nations, in both acknowledging and rewarding honest seruices: so they came not a iote behinde vs, in teaching and correcting where occasion required. For when men were not to bee moued by regard of honour and vertue, or by necessity and gaine, to doe what was good; yet they were compelld to doe no vile thing, both in respect of shame, and feare of punishment. For the paines were great and rigorous against such as shewed themselues to be slouthfull and negligent: because when they lost honour, beeing called thereto, and might by their owne indeuour haue had it; they were well and soundly whipt, till the blood followed. Some were manacled with yrons like slaues; and if they fled away, and forsooke their Captaines in battaile, they were impaled or spitted on stakes, or else crucified: for, answerable to the delict, so was their punishment.

No want of doctrine and discipline among the Romaines.

Correction and punishment for idle and negligent persons.

Titus Liuius writeth, that the Souldiours of a Squadron, belonging to Appius Claudius, to whom the keeping of a place was giuen in charge; forsooke and lost it. He being desirous to inflict punishment, and yet to mixe it with mercie: they were selected by numbers of tenne, and then to cast lottes, and they on whom the lot fell, were put to death for all the rest. Iulius Frontinus sayth, that Marke Anthony did the very like to a band, which had not defended the rampires, but suffered the enemies to set fire on them. Other inflictions also hee imposed vppon Souldiours, for disobedience and other offences, requiring more time then I am permitted. Wherefore I will shape my conclusion thus onelie, that as those times wanted not remunerations and honours for well doing; so, they were as forward in correcting wicked and bad actions.

¶ Of the reaſon wherefore Sleep was granted and giuen to man: And likewiſe, that too much ſleep is vicious and hurtfull.

SLeep was naturally giuen to man for his conſeruation; becauſe there is not any naturall worke, but it hath neede of reſt and repoſe. Ariſtotle ſayth, Euery creature that hath bloud, ſleepeth: and there he proueth by good reaſon, and likewiſe by experience, that fiſhes doe ſleepe. Sleepe is a repoſe of all the ſences, and proceedeth from the fumes and euaporations, which (in regarde of foode receiued) ariſe from the ſtomacke to the braine, by the coldneſſe whereof, the hot vapours are temperated, and make the exteriour motions and ſences ſleepy: then retyring the vitall ſpirits to the heart, all the members become drowſie, and reſt from their trauaile, vntill ſuch time as the vitall ſpirit (which is the inſtrument whereby the ſoule frameth her operations, gouerning and commanding the whole body) doth recouer new forces, and ceaſſing or diminiſhing thoſe vapours, man awaketh from ſleepe, and then the ſences and powers returne more freſhly, with farre greater power to their operations.

Ariſt. in Animal. lib. 4. ca. 3.

What ſleepe is ſaid to be.

What ſleepe worketh by his courſe in the body of man.

Concerning the occaſions of ſleepe, Ariſtotle diſcourſeth at large in his Booke of Sleepe and Vigilancie: and Plutarke declareth diuers opinions of the Philoſophers, beſide ſundry naturaliſts. But although it is for the reſt and health of the body, yet it muſt be taken moderately; Becauſe long ſleepe (ſaith Ariſtotle) weakeneth the naturall and animall ſpirit, euen as the moderation thereof doth giue them vigour: for many things are neceſſarie, which neuertheleſſe are hurtfull, if they be receiued exceſſiuely. Foode is both needefull and ſauourie, and yet notwithſtanding, if it exceede meaſure, it harmeth, and hath no reliſh at all. In like maner, moderate trauaile is wholeſome; but vſed with extremity nothing is more damageable. And ſo I ſay of ſleepe, that it ſhould not be taken but vpon neceſſitie, for recreation and repoſe of the ſences, the ſpirits and members of the body.

Ariſtet. in lib. de Som. & Vigil. Plutar. in Mor.

Too much ſleepe is very dangerous.

All things are to be vſed with moderation and diſcretion.

Ouer-much Sleepe (as it ouer-loadeth the members and ſences, making them ſlouthfull, and enfeebling them by idleneſſe) ſo it ingendreth ſo many humidities in the bodie, that they make it ſicke, and killeth it, becauſe in the time of ſleep, all the moiſtures of the bodie (with the naturall heate) retire themſelues to the exteriour partes, and then they make no enacuation of the ſuperfluities and humidities thereof. Alſo, ſleepe immeaſurably vſed, not onely is prohibited by naturall Philoſophers and Phiſitions; but likewiſe it is reproued by all wiſe men of vnderſtanding. Ariſtotle ſayth, During the time of ſleepe, there is no difference betweene the wiſe man and the foole. And queſtionleſſe, although a wiſe man had not any other occaſion to make litle vſe of ſleepe, but for equalling himſelfe with a ſottiſh Ideot; yet hee ſhould auoyd and ſhunne the exceſſe (though ſleepe maintaineth life, and is very wholeſome) in conſidering with his beſt cogitations, that he which ſleepeth, is not liuing. And as Plutarke ſayth in his Booke of the contention betweene fire & water: The man that ſleepeth hath no more ſtrength or knowledge in his ſleeping, then if hee were dead. Pliny is of the ſame opinion, ſaying; Sleep taketh from vs the halfe part of our life, conſidering, while we are in ſleepe, we neither know nor feele, whether wee are liuing or no. Ouid, and other Poets beſide, with men of no mean learning, do call ſleepe, The ſimilitude of death.

Exceſſiue vſe of ſleepe both ſickeneth and killeth the body.

Saint Paul, in the fourth chapter of his firſt Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians ſayth, Brethren, I would not haue you ignorant, concerning them that are aſleepe: in ſpeaking theſe words, hee plainely meaneth death. Then it followeth thus: Such as ſleepe in Ieſus Chriſt, will God bring with him. Sleepe likewiſe is the reſemblance of negligence and ſlouthfulneſſe, accorto Saint Gregorie, who ſaith; For a man to ſleepe, is to keep himſelfe and perſeuere in his ſinnes. If ſleeping thus had not beene vnderſtood to ſinne, Saint Paul would neuer haue ſayd ſo many times: Awake yee iuſt, and ſinne no more. A man then may very very well ſhame, to ſpend the moſt part of his life ſleeping in his bed; for therein he ſinneth no leſſe then he that ſitteth all day at a Table feeding: in regarde, that theſe things ought not to be taken, but for the ſuſtentation of life, and not the hurt thereof, and of the ſoule alſo; wherefore ſleepe is allowed for ſuſtenance, and not for voluptuouſneſſe.

Sleepe to be vſed for ſuſtenance, and not for voluptuouſneſſe.

Seeing then it ſhould bee employed onely for the health of the bodie; let vs now vnderſtand, after what maner a man ſhould lie in his bed for Sleep, to the end it may be profitable to him. I reade, that the moſt profitable kinde of ſleeping for any well diſpoſed perſon, is firſt to beginne ſleepe vpon his right ſide; and afterward (for the moſt part of the night) to turne and reſt vpon his left ſide; and in the ending of his ſleepe, to turne a while on the right ſide againe. The reaſon is, becauſe the ſtomacke of a man is ſeated in ſuch ſort, that the mouth thereof leaneth ſomewhat more to the right ſide then to the left; but the hollow heart or bottome thereof, declineth a little toward the left ſide. So that by lying down to ſleepe (for an houre or two) on the right ſide, the ſtomacke extendeth it ſelfe and reſteth vpon the liuer. And hence enſueth two eſpeciall commodities; the firſt, that the ſtomacke ordereth it ſelfe, and in that preparation, the foode deſcendeth downe the more eaſily: the ſecond, that the humidity of the meate receiued, refreſheth the liuer, and by that refreſhing, naturall heate taketh ſtrength in the ſtomacke, to beginne and cauſe digeſtion.

In what manner a man ſhould lie in his bed.

How the ſtomacke is placed in the bodie.

Two benefits by lying down and reſting on the right ſide.

After that theſe two good effects haue followed one another, then it ſhall be fitting to turne vpon the other ſide, becauſe by being ſo turned, the liuer cometh and couereth the ſtomacke, and embraceth it euen with wings, (as it were) ſo that his foode retaineth more to the liuer, and thereby perfecteth digeſtion. Neuertheleſſe, it is good in the morning, for a finall conſummation of that times ſleepe, to turne againe vpon the right ſide, to the end that the ſtomack may beginne to eaſe and diſcharge the liuer, and likewiſe to expell the ayre or ſuperfluitie of the paſſed digeſtion. This rule is good, and will bee well acknowledged by him that hath a qualified liuer, and his ſtomacke not cold, but that theſe two members are found and temperate in him. But he that hath an ouer-hot liuer, and a cold ſtomacke, as many times it commeth ſo to paſſe: it is not good for him to ſleepe vpon the right ſide, becauſe the ſtomacke falling vpon the liuer, ſtraineth and preſſeth it in euery part, heating and enflaming it exceſſiuely, ſo that the vpper part of the ſtomacke continueth vncouered by the ſuperiour part, cooling and weakning it more and more; whereby the very greateſt heate of the liuer carrieth and beareth vpon it, all the little left in the ſtomacke before, whence enſueth bad digeſtion, and conſequently a ſickly diſpoſition. Wherefore the man that hath a cold ſtomacke, and a hote liuer, it is not wholeſome for him to ſleep on his left ſide; becauſe the ſtomacke being wholly couered with the liuer, it maketh digeſtion; and as for the liuer, lying ſo aloft vpon the ſuperior part, it is both diſcouered and diſcharged, and by that meanes refreſheth it ſelfe, and is not enflamed at all.

The benefit by turning vpon the left ſide.

The reaſon for turning againe on the right ſide to finiſh ſleepe.

Of an ouer-heated liuer, and a colde ſtomacke, and what infirmities do attend thereon.

Of a cold ſtomacke and inflamed liuer.

There are ſome alſo, that make a cuſtome of ſleeping on their belly, which helpeth and comforteth digeſtion, becauſe it aſſembleth and retayneth naturall heate in the ſtomacall part, which is in the better diſpoſition for euacuating ſuperfluities. The contrary commeth to ſuch as ſleepe on their backe, with the face openly diſcouered: in regarde that naturall heate extendeth it ſelfe abroad, by which meanes digeſtion is weakened, and the ſuperfluities can not be purged by the mouth, nor by the ordinarie conduites and paſſages: but remaine in the breaſt and in the throat, which oftentimes cauſeth ſtuffings and ſuffocations, with Epilepſies and other infirmities.

Of ſuch as do ſleepe vpon thei face and belly.

Of ſuch as ſleepe vpon their backe, and what enſueth thereon.

The wiſe therefore doe alſo councell and aduiſe, that a man ſhould not ſleepe too much ſtretcht out in his bed, becauſe thereby digeſtion is greatly weakned and impaired: for according to the Philoſophers rule; when the vertues and forces are vnited together, the operation is ſo much the better. But being moderately and indifferently heaped or doubled, the carnoſitie which couereth the ſtomacke, ioyneth the more cloſely to it, heating and ſtrengthening it better then before. Theſe rules whereof I haue ſpoken, are neceſſa-neceſſary for ſuch as bee dainty and delicate, and thoſe of weaker diſpoſition, but that be healthfull, luſty, and able, the beſt rule that they can obſerue, is to keepe the cuſtome which they haue bene moſt vſed to.

CHAP. XLIIII.

Of an ancient vſe and cuſtome in Spaine, in making their account of times, by theſe words; Here de Cæſar: What that Here is, and wherefore, and when the vſe thereof was left.

IN auncient times they had a cuſtome in Caſtile, when-ſoeuer they dated writings & inſtruments of reckoning or worth; they wrote downe the words of Here de Cæſar, in ſuch ſort as we ſet downe the yeare of Grace, or of our Lord God, and the ſame ſtile was obſerued in Chronicles and Hiſtories, as hath bene obſerued by many diligent Readers. And although this matter hath bin ſeene and diſcourſed by many yet few people haue vnderſtood the occaſion and originall of this vſe, neyther wherefore the word is tearmed Here.

Here de Cæſar obſerued as we do the yeare of our Lord God.

In mine opinion, there may bee two good reaſons rendred. The firſt, that this word Here was written with an aſpiration, and ſo haue I found it in ſome places of the Spaniſh Hiſtory; although in ſome other it is not ſo. But being ſo, we ſay, that it commeth of the Latine word Herus, which is as much to ſay, as Lord: and thereby it followeth, that Here may be vnderſtood for Lordſhip, Soueraignty, Monarchy, or Reigne and Dominion: and that Here de Cæſar, implyeth the Monarchy of Cæſar, that is to ſay, the beginning of Monarchy, which is vnderſtood of Octauius. Of this opinion is Antonius Nebricenſis, for in his vacabulary for the Spaniſh Language, he ſaith; Here de Cæſar, is namely the Monarchy of Cæſar.

The firſt reaſon concerning the word Here.

Here de Cæſar, the Monarchy of Cæſar.

Anton. Nebricenſis in Vocabular.

Aſtrologers in their accounts, and eſpecially king Alphonſus in his Tablets, nameth the beginning of reignes by the word Here: as that of Philip, that of Alexander, that of Nabuchodonoſor, that of Cæſar, and many other. And yet notwithſtanding, although this may ſeeme to bee a caſe cleare and euident, yet there is a kinde of difficulty, wherein it is expedient to yeeld ſatisfaction. To wit, that as Euſebius, Paulus Oroſius, and diuers other writ, Chriſt was borne in the 42 yeare of the Empire of Octauius: if it be ſo, it appeareth that Here ſhould anticipate the 42 yeares of Chriſts Natiuity, in regard that it hath reſpect to the beginning of Cæſars Empire, according to due conſideration. Neuertheleſſe, it anticipateth but of thirty eight yeares, according to king Alphonſus his ſetting downe: wherefore the Text hath not fayled, for euermore Here de Cæſar, precedeth the birth of Chriſt thirty eight yeares.

Aſtrologers.

A queſtion concerning the Natiuity of Chriſt.

I vnderſtand this to enſue from Euſebius, Oroſius, and all the reſt, who naming the birth of Chriſt, to bee in the two and fortieth yeare of the Empire of Octauius; begin their account of his Empire, at the firſt day of his entring Rome, ſoone after the death of his vnkle Iulius Cæſar, where he arriuing, was made Captaine with the Conſuls Hirtius & Penſacus, againſt Mark Anthony. In ſetting downe the account of time ſo, and not otherwiſe, the birth of Chriſt commeth iuſtly to bee in the two and fortieth yeare of his Empire: notwithſtãding, they that make their account by Here, leaue out foure yeares at the beginning. And it ſeemeth they had good reaſon ſo to doe, becauſe in thoſe 4 firſt yeares, Octauius held no commaund in Rome, neyther had the gouernement without reſiſtance: for at the entring of thoſe foure yeares, he had warre againſt Marke Anthony. Then going afterward to Rome with his troopes, he had the Conſulſhip perforce, in the place of Hirtius, he being dead at his comming.

The diffrence of Writers in the ſetting downe their account.

The four firſt yeares Octauius had no command in Rome.

When theſe things were done, hee made an accord & conuention with Mark Anthony and Lepidus, where they became all three (one after another) to gouerne for a certaine time, and made the cruell proſcription, whereby they did put to death diuers of the principall mẽ in Rome. Moreouer, he and Marke Anthony paſſed into Greece, in perſecution of the murderers of Cæſar, where they fought a battaile againſt Brutus and Caſſius: after whoſe death death and discomfiture, he left Mark Anthony in those Eastearne parts, and returned into Italy, where he opposed himselfe against Lucius Antonius, the brother vnto Marke Anthony, and besiedged him in * Perusia, constraining him to yeelde to his mercy. Thus hauing vanquished and expelled all his enemies, hee came (without any contradiction) to Rome, to gouerne Italy, France, Spaine, and Germany: for Lepidus was in Affrica, and Marke Anthony in Asia; therefore his entrance and Seigneury, was foure years after his comming from Greece.

*The Citty Perousæ in Hetruria.

In regard whereof, the account of Here and Monarchy, beginneth (by good reason) there, which is thirty eight yeares before the birth of Christ: so that Eusebius, Orosius, and all the rest, who set downe the birth to bee in the two and fortieth yeare of Octauius his Empire, doe begin their reckoning, from the day that Iulius Cæsar was slaine, he being his Vnkle. And this is prooued apparantly, because it appeareth by all histories, that Iulius Cæsar was slaine in the yeare seuen hundred and ten, from the foundation of Rome: & our Lord was borne in the yeare seuen hundred, fifty two, whereby there is a distance of two and forty yeares, all which are granted to the empire of Octauius. In like manner, according to Eusebius, Iulius Cæsar was slaine in the yeare of the worlds creation, fiue thousand, one hundred, fifty seuen: and our Lord (after the same Eusebius) was borne in the yeare fiue thousand, one hundred, ninety nine, wherein there is a difference each from other, of the same two and forty yeares.

When the account of Here and Monarchy iustly began, according to the proofe of Histories.

The death of Cæsar, according to Eusebius.

If wee come to account by Olympiades, Iulius Cæsar was slaine in the second yeare of the 164 Olympiade; and Christ was borne in the third yeare of the 194. inclusiuely; which is also the same difference of two and forty yeares: in which respect, they set the empire of Octauius, two and forty yeares before the Natiuity. Albeit his true empire began four yeares after the time when his Here had original, and thirty eight yeares before the Natiuity: for during those foure yeares, hee was no Lord nor Commander, as all the Romane Histories do approue. Plutarch, Appian, Dion, Suetonius, and more then all the rest, Titus Liuius, or to speake better, Lucius Florus saith, That Octauius comming to Rome, when his Vnkle was slaine, was but eighteene yeares of age, and was Consull at nineteene. Then the warres being past, and all his enemies vanquished and gone; he returned victoriously to Rome, & Monarchised in the three and twenty of his age. So that by this account, and likewise that of Titus Liuius, the empire of Octauius began foure yeares after the death of his Vnkle Iulius Cæsar, which agreeth with the account of Here, thirty eight yeares before the Natiuity.

Account made according to the Olympiades.

Lucius Florus in Epit. lib. 125

The Empire of Octauius began foure yeares after his Vnkles death.

Some others doe allow of another reason or opinion, concerning this Here, by writing it with a dipthong Æ, without aspiration, and they say it is deriued of the Latine word Aera, for coine or money, ex Aera conflata, and that it had originall, from the beginning of taxes or tribute money, which was payed to Octauius, and called Ære, or the tribute of Cæsar; and not the empire of Cæsar, and that it was tearmed Aera Aeræ. It is further affirmed, that it was the name of a coyne or money, which was reckoned at a certaine value, and that from the time that was ordered and imposed, so they numbred and counted the Ære. Saint Isidore is of this opinion, speaking thus. Aera singulorum annorum constituta est a Cæsare Augusto, quando primo censu excogitato Romanorum orbem descripsit. Dicta autem Aera, quod omnis orbis æs reddere professus est reipublicæ. Therefore it appeareth plainly, that this manner of account, came and receiued name of his money and tribute then payed. So hee auoucheth in the chapter following, in speaking of the Quinquennall yeares, where hee saieth: Ad huc enim Consules, ad huc Aera non erant. In like manner it seemeth, that Ambrose Calepine, in his Dictionary gaue this diction such originall, saying. Astrologi quoque initium, à quo supputationes incipiant, Aeram vocant: dicta Aera ex eo, quod omnis orbis æs reddere professus est reipubli.

The second reason concerning this Here, to come of Cæsars tribute mony.

An account made from fiue yeares to fiue yeares.

Ambrosius Calepinus in Dictio.

Fryer Alphonsus, of the Order of S. Dominick, in his Euchiridion of times, hath these very words. Another beginning came of accounting by the Ære of the same Octauius, who hauing the whole world in his hand, would know what people he had vnder his Empire: and therefore commanded by Edict, that euery one should be registred in the towne of his birth, to the end, they might giue him (in signe of Seigneury or dominion) a kinde of money; and because this money was of mettall, the description thereof was named Aera. So that (according to these Authors) this manner of numbring the years by Heres, came from the tribute which they payed, and it was so written in Latine, Aera.

A question concerning the beginning of Cæsars Edict of taxation.

Notwithstanding, there remaineth yet another difficulty, of no meane importance, to wit, it seemeth that the Edict of Cæsar began not so long time before the Natiuity, as the thirty eight yeares which they count of the Here. Also it appeareth by the second chapter of S. Luke, that it began in the yeare when our Lord was borne, because he saieth Exijt Edictum à Cæsare: There came out a decree from Augustus Cæsar, and therfore the beginning accordeth not with that of Here. Wherevnto (in mine opinion) answer may bee made, that on the hither side of the East parts, to wit, those of Italy, France, and Spaine, this Edict might be begun by the commandement of Octauius, when hee had beene enstalled Lord and Emperor peaceably in Rome, which was thirty eight yeares before Iesus Christ was borne: but in Assyria and Iudea it was not then made knowne, because the Prouinces remained vnder the gouernment of Mark Anthony, vntill they came vnder the Monarchy of Cæsar, nd there is no contradiction to be found, but that eight and thirty yeares (before) he gouerned France and Spaine, and measurably impatronizing himselfe of the Prouinces, hee caused the Edict to be accordingly published. Wherfore it might so come to passe, that the first which was made knowne in those Countries, was that whereof S. Luke speaketh, and yet neuertheless, there were other Countries and Prouinces, where that Here had receiued beginning before.

An answer to the former question.

The Edict could not so soone be knowne in remote parts as neerer home.

Venerable Beda sheweth this clearely, writing vpon the same chapter of S. Luke, expounding the words, Vt describeretur vniuersus orbis, he saith thus. Signant hanc descriptionem, vel primam esse harum, quæ totum orbem concluserint, quia pleraque iam parte terrarum leguntur fuisse descriptæ. It seemeth this description, to bee the first that was vniuersall to the whole world; because before it, many Cities and Townes in particular, had bene described or set downe. S. Ambrose affirmeth as much vpon the saide chapter of Luke, saying: There were found many other Lands and Prouinces, which had beene registred downe. Lucius Florus, in his abreuiation of 133. Bookes of Titus Liuius, writeth: That Cæsar, soone after hee had vanquished Marke Anthony, imposed a tribute vpon al France, which was little lesse then thirty yeares before Christ was borne.

Beda sup. 2. cap. S. Luc.

Ambros. sup. 2. cap. S. Luc.

Lucius Florus in Abre. Tit. Liuius.

But whether the cause arose by the first reason, of tearming it by the name of Here, or by the last; it is sufficient that it began eight and thirty yeares before the Natiuity. This custome of accounting by Heres is very ancient, especially in Spaine, as also among the Arabes and Sarrazines, and I think that the Gothes afterward vsed it, and it was not left so long as the Romanes reigne endured. Isidore, in writing of the Gothes, and of this Here, approueth it to be ancient. And although I cannot directly say, when it began, yet I know well enough, that it hath bene long time vsed in Spaine, as appeareth by the Spanish Chronicles, euen vntil Iohn the first, King of Spaine (who lost the battaile of Aliubarata, in the fist yeare of his reigne) commanded, that from thence forward, the Here de Cæsar should no more be vsed in writings and histories, but the birth of Christ; which was in the yeare 1383. and in the Here de Cæsar, 1421.

A finall conclusion of the two reasons.

The End of the Fourth Booke.

OF NOBILITY POLITICALL AND CIVILL.

THE FIFTH BOOKE.

NObility, which many of the greater ſorts of wits, with great proofe of vncorrupted verity, & much flowing Eloquence, haue gone about to deriue out of diuers foundations, is of three ſorts: and is diuided into Nobility Caleſtiall, which conſiſts in Religion: Nobility Philoſophicall, which is got by Morall vertues: and Nobility Politicall, whereof this preſent Treatiſe is. Out of the two firſt ſorts of Nobility, no man can come Noble, except that he the ſame, be a good man alſo. But out of this third ſort, a man, although he bee neuer ſo wicked and vngracious, may yet excell the reſt of men, euen in the higheſt degree of Nobility: ſo as did Caligula, Nero, and ſuch others like.

Nobilitie { Celeſtial / Philoſophicall. / Political.

This Treatiſe concerneth onely Politicall Nobility.

The matter of Nobility, was in ancient time accounted of two ſorts, viz. Theologicall and Morall: For why, Nobility is a thing honourable, and of it ſelfe laudable: But without vertue, nothing (according to the opinion of Cicero) can be commẽdable, or praiſe-worthy. Of which thing, the ſeate and ſcituation of the Temple of Honour among the Romanes, was a notable example: whereunto there was no entrance or way, but by the Temple of vertue.

The Temple of Honour among the Romanes.

But by the prepoſterous innouation and change of things, that Nobility which was proper onely to the good, gaue place, and in ſtead thereof, that Nobility which is alike common vnto the bad and to the good, ſtept to the helme: yea, euen the word Nobilis (or Noble) it ſelfe, which ſome will haue to haue beene ſo called, as who ſhould ſay, Noſcibilis, or remarkable, or for ſome vertue Notable, began to be indifferently taken into both parts, good & bad: as nobile Scortum, a noble harlot, nobile Scelus, a noble villaine. Neyther in queſtion of Politicall Nobility, are wee any more to haue recourſe vnto the Diuines or Philoſophers, and much leſſe to the ancient Romane Conſtitutions (for the moſt part) diſcerning all thinges by Magiſtracies, Charges, and Offices, but onely vnto the diſpoſitions of the Princes and Monarchs of the world: who hauing the power of the gouernement of the world (as it were in a ſort common together with God) after their maner, gouerne Nobility according to their owne pleaſure and good liking, and ſo haue made the ſame hereditary. And heereof is it, that a ſtranger, made a Nobleman at Rome, or elſe-where, is not at home accounted in the number of the Nobility, his Prince being thereto vnwilling, and ſo contrariwiſe alſo. VVherefore, they which examine Politicall Nobility, according to any other rule, then the cuſtome of euery Nation, are vtterly out of the way. Yet in this ſo great diuerſity of manners and cuſtomes of Nations in all places, the ſame Definition of Ciuill Nobility agreeth vnto them all, viz. Quod ſit qualitas, ſiue Dignitas qua quis legitimé à Plebeia conditione eximitur & per per gradus erigitur. That it is a quality or dignity, wherby a man is lawfully exempt and by degrees promoted out of, and aboue the estate of the vulgar & common sort of people. Of this Nobility, there be two kindes, viz. Nobility Natiue; that is to say, by birth: and Datiue, which is by the Princes guift. For as for violent Nobility, such as was that of Nemrods, I vtterly reiect it.

The definition of nobility. Two kindes of Nobility, viz. Datiue and Natiue.

But that these things may bee made more manifest, we will by certaine of the better Common-weales, euen vnto these our times, deriue the beginning of this dignity, and the manner of obtaining the same, as it were euen from the first infancy thereof, taking both the matter & the examples we therein vse, out of most authēticall and approued Authors, the sentences almost nothing, and much lesse the words, much changed, so that the well affected Reader, cannot of right, lay any thing thereof to our charge.

CHAP. II.

Of the Nobility of the first Age.

I Dare contrary vnto the common receiued opinion affirme, nobility Datiue to haue bin before, & more excellent then Nobility Natiue, exāple being taken frō Adam hmselfe, whom all men know to haue bene made, and not borne: and verily to haue bene a Noble-man (if any other) as formed by God to the Image of himselfe, endowed with all good gifts, and made Lord and Soueraigne Ruler of all creatures; yea, euen of the whole world. But that cœlestiall Nobility he soone (alas, too too soone) lost, by hearkning vnto his wife: and that worldly Nobility which he yet retained, being vnto his children deriued, began first in them to be Natiue, or Nobility by birth. If any man therfore consider Adam his owne race and Progeny, he must needs confesse all the men of that age, to haue bene together Noble. But as in mans body for the preseruation of the whole, diuers functions, and offices of members, are required; euen so, in that first society of men (as in all others) a distinction of persons was necessary: wherefore the first Common-weale, which was of the family of Adam, and of his children, consisted wholly of Noblemen (to wit) of the children of one Father, and he the same, being a King, a Prophet, and a Priest; but yet not all of them to be with like honour reuerenced. For he, that first Housholder as it were by the decree of Nature, gaue the preheminence and cheefe place vnto his first begotten Sonne, so long as hee kept the right of his Birth-right, which order other families. Afterward following, constantly obserued: so that he which was first by Nature, should be accounted also first in honour. Yet neuertheless, was it altogether lawfull for the Father of the family, to make choise of his own children, that so according to euery one of their deserts, he might bestow vpon them honours, or take them from them.

Nobility which in Adā was first Datiue in him began to be Natiue.

A distinction of persons euen in the first society of men.

The prerogatiue of birth-right obserued.

Of the great number of Adams Progeny, & the discord of the Brethren among themselues, at length arose the diuision of Families, and so consequently, the vncertainty and forgetfulnesse of kindreds, and deadly hatreds and fallings out withall. By warre, the change of mens estates and conditions, and seruitudes are brought in. The vanquished, of Noble become base and vnnoble: & contrariwise, the victors, of base persons, became Noble. Men for the preseruation of themselues, haue out of families assembled together into Villages; out of Villages, into Cities; and out of Cities haue growne together into Prouinces, and so into most great kingdomes. In dangers and distresses, according to the rule of reason, wise men are called vpon for their counsel, valiant men for their aide and defence, vnto whom, as vnto men most worthy, the gouernment is committed; whereas the rest are enforced without difference, to obey without any respect of their stocke or kindred.

The diuision of Families.

Families to haue growne into Villages.

Villages into Cities. Cities into Prouinces, & Prouinces into Kingdoms.

These things to haue thus beene in the Iewes State and Common-weale, is vnto all men knowne, which are but easily read in the old Testament. First, that Principality and prerogatiue, was giuen vnto the first begotten, you shall easily vnderstand, if you shall diligently consider, that when Adam by reason of his great yeares, was not able longer to attend to the gouernment of the church, and of the common-weale, weale, Seth was made Gouernor, who thē held the place of the first begotten. Vnto Seth euen for the same cause succeeded Enoch: vnto Enoch, Conan: vnto Conan, Mahaleel: vnto Mahaleel, Iered: vnto Iered, Canoc: vnto Canoc, Methusehel, vnto Methusehel, Lamech: vnto Lamech, Noah: who ruled ouer his Progeny an hundred & ten yeares after the Deluge; at which time, the disperſing of his posterity happened. Which disperſion being made, euery one of them bare himselfe as Prince of his owne family; which preheminence passed still vnto the first borne of that stocke and family: so that the first begotten of the principall family, still held the same. Neither ought any man to doubt euery one of the Patriarkes to haue ruled as cheefe men ouer their owne Tribes and Families vntill that the gouernment of the whole people was deliuered ouer to Moses. But concerning Moses himselfe, we reade in the fourth of Exodus, him and Aaron to haue gathered together all the Elders of the children of Israel, which was the first Assembly. In the 24. of Exodus, the Lord commandeth seuenty of the Elders of the children of Israel, to come vnto him, together with Moses: which seuenty (in the same chapter) are as it were by a knowne name called Nobles or cheefe Persons of the children of Israel. Moses beside, oppressed with the multitude of sutes, following the counsel, of Iethro, chose out of the people certain Captains of thousands which should beare rule ouer a thousand families: others of hundreds, who commanded ouer an hundred: others of fifties who had the command ouer fifty: and others of ten, who bare rule ouer ten, & determined of their lesser sutes and controuersies. Now that there were many Captaines of thousands, euen in one and the selfe-same Tribe, it is out of holy Scripture manifest; and these men, Moses here & there calleth, The Heads of the Fathers, the Heads of the Tribes, Princes, and Heads of the Soldiers; and amongst them were 12 chiefe Princes, especially chosen of the 12 Tribes, who somtimes were alone by thē selues chosen out for some especiall commission. But what manner of men Moses made Rulers ouer the Israelites, and what manner of companions he chose forth as assistants vnto himselfe in the gouernment of the common-weale, he himselfe in the first chapter of Deuteronomy thus plainly witnesseth. And I spake vnto you the same season, saying; I am not able to beare the burden of you my selfe alone. For the Lord your God hath multiplied you: and behold, you are this day as the starres of heauen in number, &c. Bring (from among you) men of wisedome and of vnderstanding, & men knowne in your Tribes, that I may make them Rulers ouer you. And you answered me and said; that which thou hast saide, it is good for vs to do. And so out of the Tribes I tooke the Captains (men of wisedome and experience) & made them Rulers ouer you, Captaines ouer thousands, and ouer hundreds, ouer fifty, & ouer ten, & Officers among your Tribes, &c. But wee enduced both by the weight of the words, and by reason, are enforced to cōiecture, Moses being a wise man, in this election and choise, to haue preferred men for their wisedome & experience famous and well knowne, both for the gaining of the fauour and obedience of the people, and also for the better gouernment of the common-weale: neyther to haue any thing regarded such, as boasted onely of the prerogatiue of their birth; for otherwise, instead of helpers, he should rather haue associated vnto himselfe, the perturbers of the publike peace. Wherefore we set downe those seauenty Iudges by the commandement of God, appointed by Moses to haue bin of the dignity of Senators, vnto whō some men adde two moe, viz. Moses himselfe, and the High-Priest, as if that six had bin appointed out of euery one of the twelue Tribes.

Wherefore, by those things which we haue now already spoken, it is euident, as well Datiue as Natiue Nobility, to haue bin in vse amongst the Israelites, & sometime euen in one and the same family, to haue passed vnto the first begotten alone, or to some other graced with some publike Office in some family, whilst the rest borne of the same stock, in the mean time stucke fast within the bounds of them of the vulgar state and condition. And concerning the kings of the Israelites, it is to be thought also, as it is of the kings of other nations, that they according to their pleasure, ennobled many, eyther by reason, or by affection moued and induced so to do. But let vs now from the Iewes, passe ouer vnto the Gentiles.

NOthing was euer more vnconstant thē the greek Common-weale, with perpetuall changes still floating vp & down. The beginning of their Monarchy, I (as most are wont) will no further fetch, then from Cecrops. He first called the rude Athenians out of the fields, into a ciuill society, built twelue Townes, and diuided the Cittizens of them into Souldiers, Artificers, Husbandmen, and Shepheards. Euery Citty had Magistrates of it owne, neyther did they but in times of great danger resort vnto the King: yea many of them at times tooke vp Armes against their Kings. They which inhabite the Champaine Country, were commanded by some few. The Mountiniers were gouerned by a popular estate, and they which dwelt by the Sea-coast, had a mixt gouernement, in a meane betwixt both. And they which out of the whole body of the people, were called vnto the gouernement of the Common-weale, were honored for Princes, Senators, and Noblemen. Plutarch writeth, such men as were of greatest power in the Cities, to haue bene thrust out by Theseus, that hee himselfe might so alone raigne, yet diuided he the people into Senatours, Husbandmen, and Artificers: of whom hee would haue them of the first ranke, to excell the rest in dignity: them of the second sort, to excell the rest for necessary vse; & them of the third, to exceede the rest in multitude and number. But in the choise of the Senators, he had respect vnto their wealth, their learning, and especially their vertue, which things were required also in the person of the King. For Demosthenes in his Oration against Neæra sheweth, after the Common-weale set in order by Theseus, neuertheless by his hands stretched out, to haue appointed a King out of the number of thē which were thought to excell in vertue. Vpon the Senators he imposed the charge of bearing of Office, to consider and determine of matters of Religion, to interpret and expound the Law and sacred rights: and when he was desirous more to encrease the Citty, hee called all men indifferently vnto an equall part of the Common-weale. VVherefore, in Theseus his Gouernment, Nobility was gotten by riches, knowledge, and vertue. After the Kings, there was in the Citty a double Democratie, one which consisted in the power and gouernment of the richer sort of the Cittizens; and another, which rested in them all in generall which were free-men. Solon (the discord betwixt the common sort, and them of the richer sort of the people being appeased) after the slaughter of the Cylonians, restored vnto his country, the Democraticall or Popular gouernment, the Oligarchy or gouernment of some few, being quite taken away. He deuised foure orders or degrees of Cittizens: Them, which could of their dry & wet commodities, fill fiue hundred of their measures (called Modÿ) hee placed in the first order or degree. Them which could fill foure hundred of those measures, hee placed in the second ranke. Them which could fill three hundred, in the third, and al the rest in the fourth. And called the first of these Modiales, the second Equites, the third Zeugitæ, and the fourth Thetæ. All publike Offices, he appointed to be committed to them, which were placed in the three first degrees, and they so hauing borne Office, were accoũted in the number of the Nobility, but vnto the fourth ranke was no publike Office or Magistracy communicated; & therfore that ranke was altogether base and vnnoble. But after Solon, Aristides, and Pericles participated the Magistracies, euen vnto the baseſt and loweſt sort of the people also, as Xenophon in his Booke concerning the Athenian Commonweal, setteth it down for right and reason, that they, euen of the meaner and poorer sort, should indifferently be called & admitted vnto all preferments in euery part of the Commonweale, for that they more profited for the enriching of the Citty, then did they of the Nobility. Euen plaine Cittizens, hauing well deserued of the Commonweal, were therefore among the Athenians ennobled. So Leo, for that he for the welfare of the commonweal, had solemnly vowed his daughters to death, was accounted & registred amongst the ten Worthies. And Nobility once by the Father obtayned, enno-ennobled his Children also.

But the Athenian commonweale was not so lauish & prodigall in the communicating of Nobility, as was in auncient time the Romaine Common-weale sparing and curious in the bestowing thereof. Wherefore this the Romaine State and Common-weale shall affoord vnto vs greater store and plenty of matter of this kinde and nature.

CHAP. IIII.

¶ Of the first Romaine Nobilitie.

ROmulus to draw strength vnto the city of Rome, but lately before by him built, ordayned an Asylum or Sanctuary, whereunto the poore and base people out of Countries and places thereby by flockes resorting, gaue the first encrease vnto so great a citty. And out of this rabblement of people Romulus chose an hundred Senatours, which by Iuuenall the Satyricall Poet is in these verses noted.

Et tamen vt longè repetas, longèq; reuoluas
Nomen, ab infami gentem deducis Asylo:
Maiorum primus quisquis fuit ille tuorum,
Aut Pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet frō the base Asylum thou canst but deriue the same:

Then Romulus for their honor, would haue to be created, Fathers: and for their age, Senators, and both them and their progeny he appoynted to be of the ranke of them that were of the Senatours discended. But afterward, the Commonweale being communicated also with the Sabines, he chose out another hundred. Tarquinius Priscus (or as some other rather would haue it) Brutus added vnto them another C. called the Senatours of the meaner sort of the People. Valerius Publicola, after the Kings were driuen out, chose threescore and foure more then an hundred, of the order of Gentlemen (in stead of so many Senators slaine by Tarquinius Superbus) which were called Adlecti, or men chosen: for after the kings driuē out, such as he saw to be wise, ancient, and of approued honesty, he alcribed into the Senate, as into the most graue & reuerend Counsell. After those first foundations of the Romaine Common-weale thus layed. Cittizens of Rome discended of the stocke of Senators (who before had borne the chiefe and greatest Honors) were by the Dictators, Censors, or Triumuirs, created Senators, and afterward also of the Order of Gentlemen were called into the Senate.

Fathers, Senatours, Patricii.

Adlecti.

Ordo Equester, or the order of gentlemen.

Wherefore, the Order of Patricij, and of the Senatours, to haue ennobled such as were thereof, there was neuer anie doubt; but concerning the order of Gentlemen, some there be, which make question. Tiraquellus thinketh the Romaine Gentlemen to haue holden the middle place betwixt the Patricij (or them which were discended from Senatours) and the Plebeij or Common People: for that Tacitus calleth them Illustres, or men of marke. Martiall also calleth the Order of Gentlemen, the Lesser Order and the Order of Senators, and of them that were discended of Senatours, the Greatest Order.

Many are also of opinion, Nobilitie to haue beene giuen amongest the Romaines, by the bestowing vpon them Rings of Golde: and most certayne it is, such gift of Rings to transferre the state and condition of a Free-borne man vnto them to whom they were so giuen, without which free estate no Romaine was deemed capable of Nobility. But when the vse of rings of Golde began in Rome, it is not manifest. Pliny writeth it of long to haue beene the Badge or Cognisance of them which were about to goe Ambassadours vnto forraigne Nations, and the rest of the Senators, to haue beene without them: neyther was it the manner and fashion for anie other to vse them, then such as had for that cause publiquely receyued them. And such Golde rings they vsed onely abroad, and iron rings at home in their houses.

The golde ring.

But afterward, the custome of wearing of Gold rings beganne to be vsed of all the Nobility, as it is written in Titus Liuius in his ninth booke, in these words; The Senate to haue burnt with such rage, and disdayne, because Cneius Flauius a late freed man was made Ædilis, that many of the Nobility thereupon, laid aside their gold Rings, and Trappings of their Horses: wherein Plinie witnesseth many to haue beene deceiued, which thinke them of the order of Gentlemen to haue then done the same. For that (sayth hee) is also added: but the Trappings were also layde aside, for which the name of Gentlemen is put too. It is also recorded in the Annales, Rings to haue beene then layde aside by the Nobilitie, but not by the whole Senate in generall. Whereby it is manifest, that the Gentlemen as then had no right to weare a Ring, and that it belonged but vnto the Nobilitie onelie; that is to say, vnto the Patricij, and the Senators, although they were not themselues Patricij; that is to say, discended of Senators, for that the dignity of a Senator gaue beginning to Nobilitie.

The right of wearing of a Ring, to whō it belonged.

The dignitie of a Senator.

But after that Iudiciall causes were translated from the Senate vnto the Gentlemen, the vse of Rings together withall, passed vnto them also; which was not then so much the cognisance of Gentlemen, as it was of Iudges, and yet not of all them, but of them which were of greatest dignitie and honour. Rings (sayth Plin) diuided the other Order from the vulgar People, as soone as they once beganne to be men of marke and fame, and afterward. But, Rings verily put a middle and a third Order or Degree of men, betwixt the Common-people, and the Senators or Fathers: and that name which horses of seruice before gaue vnto men, this name (I say) the Iudges now giue vnto money: neyther was that long agoe done: for Augustus the Emperour, disposing of the Courts, the greater part of the Iudges wore Iron Rings, and they were not called Equites (or Gentlemen) but Iudices (or Iudges.) The name of Equites (or Gentlemen) rested in the troops of publique horsses. But afterward, in the ninth yeare of the reigne of Tiberius, when the Order of Gentlemen was come into an vnion (for so he termeth it) order was taken for the credite of the wearing of Rings, as that they should be vnto all Gentlemen common. And at length (saith hee) when as Caius Sulpitius Galba going about to gaine the credite of a youthfull good name with his Prince, by the fines of Tauernes and Victualling houses) had complained in the Senate, euen Chapmen and Pedlers to be defended from the penalty of such their misdemeanor, by the wearing of Rings; it was for this cause by the Senate decreed, that it should not bee lawfull for any man to wear a Ring, but vnto him who being free born, both by his father and grand-father by the Fathers side, was valued at 40. Sestertices. And by the Law Fuluia concerning the Theater, to such as had place and did sit in one of the foureteene orders or degrees. Heereby it came to passe, that they seemed to be of the Order of Gentlemen, which did weare golde Rings, for that it was not lawfull for any so to doe, but such as had a Gentlemans substance. And therefore Suetonius writeth, Iulius Cæsar when as in exhorting of his Souldiers, he oftentimes shewed the finger of his left hand, and said, that he could willingly, for their sakes, be content to pluck off his owne Ring; to haue been thought in so doing, couertly to haue promised vnto euerie one of them, the right to weare a Golde Ring, and the substance of a Gentleman. But after that it was permitted to all Gentlemen indifferently to weare them; that marke (sayth Plinie) beganne to bee indifferently of all men desired: For before, Gentlemen and Iudges were knowne by their Iron Rings; but at length, whilest the Order of Gentlemen is seperated from the Free-bornemen, the wearing of Rings was communicated with them that were bond-men, and of seruile condition: that is to say, with such as were of bondmen and slaues, become free. Howbeit this right of wearing of gold Rings, was not wont in ancient time to be giuen to any other, but to such as had right manfully and valiantly behaued themselues in the wars; neither was the right of wearing of a gold Ring, euer giuen to such, as were of bond-men made free, except they were also made free-men borne, (which was in auncient time a Priuiledge not to be granted but by the Prince.) And it was alwaies in ancient time, accounted a greater matter to be a freeman borne, then to be rewarded with the right to weare a gold Ring: For that sheweth vs euen from our birth to be freemen born, whereas this right of wearing of a gold Ring, indeed, either blottes out, or as much as it can, washeth away the staines of seruitude; yet so, as that the signe signe thereof for euer remaineth. But the creating or restoring of a man vnto Gentry, commeth nearer vnto Nature, which bringeth with it all the commodities of naturall Gentry, and that belonged onely vnto the Prince, to restore agayne a man banished or cast into exile, vnto his former estate and place: who beeing so restored vnto their bloud or birth-right, were not onely ingrafted into the number of the cittizens of Rome, but also inrolled among the Quirites; that so, they might be partakers of all the honours and offices of the Common-weale. Therfore it is of Pliny called, ius Quiritum; that is to say, The right and Priuilege of the Quirites.

Ingenuitie or freenesse of birth.

The right of Statues or Images.

There was also among the Ancients, a certaine right of hauing of Images or Statues, which was by the Senate giuen vnto such, as had notably borne some great Office, or worthily deserued some great honours, which was not so much for the marke and signe of Nobilitie, as of the stocke and Family whereunto they were giuen. For, they which obtayned Statues for their stocke and family, there was no doubt, but that they thereunto brought Nobilitie also. And I know not what greater or more excellent thing there was, then to haue the right and power to vse Statues and Images.

Plinie in his nine and thirtie Booke thus writeth; Apud Maiores, Imagines in atrijs erant, quæ spectarentur, expressis vultus singulis disponebantur armarijs, vt essent Imagines quæ comitarentur gentilia funera, semperq; defuncto aliquo, totus aderat Familiæ eius qui vnquam fuerat populus. Stemmata verò lineis discurrebant ad Imagines pictas. Tablina verò codicibus implebantur, & monumentis rerum & magistratuum gestorum. In the time of our Auncestours, Images and Statues were in their Courts to be seene, liuely counterfaits and portraictures were in all their Studies and Closets placed, to the end that there might bee still Images, to attend and set forth the Funerals of such as were to be buried of that stocke and Family. And alwayes, when any Gentleman of note and marke dyed, all the whole race of them that were then liuing of that house and Stocke, accompanied the dead corpes; and from their Armes, lines were drawne along vnto the painted Images of them whose Armes they were. As for their Studies and Closets, they were full of Bookes and Records, testifying the Noble acts by them worthily performed, and the honourable Offices by them in the State & Common-weale borne and discharged, whilest they yet liued. Whereby it is declared, Statues and Images to haue bin rather the signes of some great Office well discharged, then of any Nobilitie. Neyther, that all the Images, of all that were of the stocke and race of them, to whom the right of Images belonged, were wont to be carried at the Funerall solemnities of their kinsmen, but onely the Images of them, who with great prayse and glorie, had borne and discharged some honourable Office, and who had of the Senate obtayned that right and priuiledge.

Wherefore Cicero reckoneth vp this right of hauing Images, amongst the ornaments of Magistrates. Such as are, the Gowne, the Senators Robe, the Chaire of Estate, and, to haue the preheminence to deliuer his minde and opinion first: All which things passed not vnto their posteritie, so that they might vse the same in such sort as did the Nobility, of such as had beene Consuls, Prætors, and such like: which the Romain Lawes would haue to discend vnto their Nephewes in these degrees; that as well the women, as the men, vnto the Nephewes sonne, should be accounted of the same dignitie that their Ancestors were of. In briefe, he that had brought the right of hauing of Images into his Family, is to be thought to haue done no more, but that his owne Image might be carried foorth at his owne Funerall, and the Funeralls of them of his owne stocke and Kindred; and not, that the Images of his posterity, should also in such Funerall solemnity be carried; but onelie the Images of them who had gotten the like right. And these Images were kept at home in their houses, and were carried foorth at the Funeralls of them of theyr house and stocke, for an example of their Noble acts by them done. But concerning Images and Statues, many thus doe thinke, That they which had the Images of their Auncestors, were accounted and called Ancient Noblemen, and those which had but onely their owne Images, were reputed and called New Noblemen: but such, as had neither Image of their owne, nor nor of their Aunceſtours, they were reputed as baſe and vnnoble. And yet they of the common ſort of the people, hauing obtained the Offices (called Curules, or of the Inory Chayre of Eſtate) had alſo their Images. And thus much concerning the right of Images and Statues: Now wil I againe returne vnto Romulus.

As Romulus had diuided the people into two degrees or orders (viz.) the order of the Senators, and of the Common perſons, calling their Progeny Patricios and Optimates (or the Progeny of the Fathers, and of the Nobility) and the Progeny of the other Plebeios (or a Progeny diſcended from the vulgar and common ſort of people) ſo deuided he their Offices and vocations alſo. Vnto the Patricii or ſuch as diſcended of the Senators, hee left the liberall profeſſions (viz.) the bearing of Armes and Offices, the making of Sacrifices, the deciding of controuerſies in Lawe, and the adminiſtration of all buſineſſes belonging in publique vnto the cittie and Commonweale: But to the Common people he left the bearing of Armes, alſo the tilling of the ground & the feeding of cattle: other baſe trades and occupations (not beſeeming free-men borne) he aſſigned vnto ſtrangers, Marchandize, and ſeruile miniſteries, he wholly committed vnto them.

The Romaines themſelues, he would not haue to exerciſe any baſe trade, or laborious and painefull buſineſſe; vnto whom hee forbad all vnhoneſt maner of gaine, for all ſuch manner of gaining was thought vnſeemely vnto ſuch as were Fathers in the Common-weale: neyther in ancient time could one be choſen Senator, or one of the Patricii, but by an expreſſe Law, to that end and purpoſe propounded to the people, which was the greateſt office belonging vnto a King, a Conſull, or a Dictator. But in what things the Patricii were diſcerned from them of the common ſort of the People, is by many examples tried: for the Patricii which excelled in Nobility, and which were honeſtly begotten and well brought vp, had a Tablet or Iewell on their breaſts, and little Moones on their feet, for they vſed Iuory Buckles, crooking horned wiſe, like vnto the Moone, which they ſay was ordained by Numa, that Senators and their poſterity, ſhould vnto their black ſhooes tie Moones, as if by the Character of the Moone, the number of an hundred had beene deſigned and figured, in which number the Senators were then contayned. But the Tablet they wore was of Gold, made in forme of an heart, wherewith they of auncient time, are reported to haue alſo ſealed their Letters: which Tablet free-borne boyes, and the ſonnes of ſuch as had ſerued on horſe-backe, vſed to weare, together with the imbroidered Gowne called Prætexta, vntill they were ſeuenteene yeares olde, which time expired, they then in a ſolemne feaſt hanged it vp vnto their houſhold, or harthgods, whom they called Lares. Euerie honourable and noble youth wore this Prætexta or imbrodered Gowne about his coat, but after child-hoode paſt, this Prætexta being left off in the ſeuenteenth yeare, and ſometime in the ſixteenth, and fifteenth alſo, they put on the gowne (called Toga virilis) or Mans Gowne: that which was imbroidered with Purple, was wont to be giuen only to them whoſe fathers had borne the great Offices (called Curules) or ſome other great honors. The order of Gentlemen, and the Common ſort of People, in auncient time did weare no Purple. The garment of the Tribune of the People, and of them of the Comminaltie, was a cloake, ſuch as they called Sagi, Endromides, and Cuculli, Caſſocks, Mantles, and Cloakes with hoodes. But in ſucceeding times, the Commoners indeede did weare Purple, but yet different from that which the Senators wore (viz.) of a darke colour, and died with the iuyce of hearbs, and not with the right Tyrian purple die. Beſide that, the Patricii, by the inſtitution of Romulus had the Auſpicia or offices of Diuination belonging vnto them, and the Senate the offices of Prieſthood. But this ordinance (ſaith Dionyſius) continued not long, for that al things were made common with them of the Comminalty. And leſt any man ſhould thinke the dignitie of the Patricii, and of the Senators to be the ſame; Tacitus reporteth, the Emperour Claudius to haue ſelected out of the Senate, euery one of the moſt auncient ſort of the Senators into the number of the Patricii, there being now but a few left of thoſe families which Romulus called Maiorum, and Lucius Brutus, Maiorum Gentium. But there is another thing wherewhereat thou wilt happily more maruell, which is, that the Comminaltie growing ſtrong (as there was a paſſing ouer from the ſtate of a Commoner vnto the degree of one of the Patricii) ſo diuerſe of the Patricii alſo went ouer vnto the Comminaltie, and ſo became of their numbers. The election of the Senators, according to the alterations and changes of times, belonged ſometimes vnto the Kings, afterward to the Conſuls, and to the Dictators. After the kings driuen out, we reade, the Conſuls to haue choſen ſuch of the Patricii as were deereſt vnto them, and afterward ſome of the Commoners alſo to bee Tribunes of the Souldiers with Conſulary power, vntill that it was by the Law prouided, that the Cenſors ſhould Warde by Warde make choice of them in the Senate. By and by after a ſubſtance was required for the creating of a Senator, and if he that was ſo choſen, did afterward waſte and weaken his ſaid ſubſtance, he loſt alſo his order and degree.

Wherefore it is manifeſt, the Romaine Nobilitie to haue beene eſtabliſhed in the dignitie of the Patricii, and of the Senators, which not to haue beene denied vnto the Order of Gentlemen, we gather of that which followeth, although ſome others be of other opinion. Dionyſius affirmeth, three hundred Gentlemen to haue beene choſen by Romulus, out of the moſt honourable Families, tenne out of euery Warde. Some of the Gentlemen were ſuch as ſerued vpon a publike horſe, altogether in the Cittie; otherſome of them were ſuch as ſerued vpon a priuate horſe in the Armie abroad. The publike horſe the Cenſor appoynted, and publique Horſe-men, or Gentlemen, he created, as well out of them that were diſcended from the Senators, as out of the Comminaltie, who at length were for their ſubſtance created alſo, as were the Senators. But a Gentlemans ſubſtance was foure hundred thouſand Seſtertices, which being conſumed and ſpent, the reputation and dignitie of a Gentleman, therewith took end alſo. Iſidore writeth, That although a man were by birth a Senators ſonne, yet vntill he came to lawfull yeres, he was but a Roman Gentleman, & ſo afterward came into the order of the Senators. Liuy bringeth in Perſeus King of Macedon, thus ſpeaking. Equites Romani principis iuuentutis, Equites Seminarium Senatus, inde lectos in patrum numerum Conſules, inde imperatores creant. The Romaine Gentlemen (ſaith he) are the Princes of the youth, the Gentlemen are the Seminarie of the Senate, out of them being choſen into the number of the Fathers, they create their Conſulls, out of them they create their Generals. The Romaine Gentlemen did weare the Robe of Eſtate, neither could any man be of the order of the Gentlemen of Rome, but that hee muſt be free-borne. Wherefore, to be a Romain Gentleman, was ſomewhat a greater matter, then ſimply to be a free man borne. Yet Pliny hath written, the wearing of Rings, to haue inſerted and put a middle and third Order into the People; and them to haue begunne to be euerie where renowned, and to haue diuided the other Order from the vulgar ſort of People, or the Comminaltie; as if hee ſhould haue ſaide, The Gentlemen at the firſt to haue beene Commoners, but afterward to haue been men of better note & marke: which according to the words of Iſidore before recited, may ſeeme to be compared vnto the Senators children, who were accounted among the Equites or Gentlemen, vntill they came vnto the Senators age.

A publique horſe.

A Senators ſonne, vntil he came to be of lawfull yeares accounted but a Gentleman of Rome.

In the queſtion of Nobilitie, not onely the ignorant, but euen the learned alſo, much erre, whileſt that they agree not vpon the proper ſignification of theſe words, Eugenia, Nobilitas, Generoſus, Nobilis, Ingenuus, Gentilis; that is, Honour of birth, Nobility, a Gentleman, a Noblemaan, a man free born, a Gentleman, For while they interpret Eugenia the Greeke word, Nobilitas in Latine (and with vs Nobility) the more generall word is brought in place and ſteed of the more particular: or as the Logicians vſe to ſay, Genus pro Specie. For why, Eugenia or honour of Birth, is but the one kinde of Nobilitie, called Natiue, (and not all kinde of Nobilitie) requiring a certaine antiquitie of ſtocke, of riches, and of vertues as Ariſtotle would haue it) whoſe words are theſe: Non diuites, neque boni, ſed qui à virtutibus, diuitijs, vel antiquis bonis deſcenderunt Eugenes ſunt habendi: Not the rich men only, neyther the good men alone, but they which haue deſcended from Vertues, Riches, and good Auncеſtors, are to be accounted Noblemen borne.

Eugenia or Nobilitie of birth.

Nobility of birth, which is called Eugenia, is of Osorius defined: Splendor vel dignitas generis in quo maximæ virtutes extiterunt vitæ Communi salutares & commodæ. The luster or dignity of stocke, wherin most great vertues haue flourished, wholesome and commodious for the common vse of mans life. Which Osorius affirmeth, to be as it were subiect to rottennesse, and with olde age to be able to be consumed and ended. But this rule is not in our Court receiued. Symon Symonæus in these words reproueth Osorius, his name beeing concealed, or else some other man of the same opinion with him. Supine loquuntur qui aiunt quemadmodum summa Senectus mentis vini & consilium debilitat, sic etiam Nobilitatis splendorem mediocri vetustate augeri, extrema vero Senecta confici. They speake ydly (saith he) which say, that as great old age doth weaken the force & iudgement of the minde; so also, the glory and luster of Nobilitie to be with moderate antiquitie encreased, but yet to be with extreme olde age extinguished. For as the similitude (saith he) agreeth not, so neyther doth it well conclude: For the more auncient that a Stocke or Family is, by so much the credit and reputation thereof is greater. And yet hee the sayde Simon forgetting himselfe in another place stumbleth at the same stone, by setting bounds and limites vnto the same Eugenia, or Native Nobilitie, and by decreeing that a long and continuate race of Noble Progenitours, in whom great vertues haue oftentimes shined vnto the number of three discents, doth make a true Noble Stocke, or Eugenia. And that the beginning of a Stocke or Familie, is no further to be deriued, then from the fourth Predecessor, lest in searching further, euen Kings themselues (as sayth Plato) should be deriued from Slaues, or Slaues from Kings.

Of this Eugenia or Native Nobilitie, all ages haue best thought, but yet so, as that all the right of Nobilitie should vpon it be ground: for a man may be Noble, although he be no Eugenes, or from Nobiles discended; yea, he may be more honourable then he which is so discended, although not so ancient a Gentleman. As a new made Earle, compared with an Esquire of a most auncient Family. As Agathocles, of a Potter made a King. What was Romulus? What was Tullus Hostilius? And what was Tarquinius Priscus?

But let vs now come to search out the signification of the aforesaid words: The Romaines diuided their People into Free-men and Slaues; of Free-men, some were of Bond-slaues made Free-men (whom they called Libertini) other-some, were Free-men borne, (whom they called Ingenui.) The Libertini were Cittizens of Rome, who were three wayes manumised or made free; that is to say, by Will or Testament, or in the open Congregation or assembly of the people, or before some publique Magistrate which had power so to doe. And hereupon happily in auncient time, when as this our Kingdome was much oppressed with seruile state and condition, the word Francklin, for a man made free, or enfranchised, was in vse, except you had rather it to haue beene vsed, for a Free-borne-man.

Of Free-men, some were freemen made some were Free men borne.

A Franklin.

But they were called Ingenui, or Free-borne-men, who neyther themselues, neither their Auncestors had euer serued as Slaues. And their Ancestors they reckoned vp, euen from their Grand-father, which is euident by these words of Liuie. An vnquam fando audisti is Patricios primos esse factos non è Cælo dimissos, sed qui patrem Cicere Auumque possint? Did you euer heare it spoken, the Fathers to haue beene first made, and not sent downe from Heauen; but such as could reckon vp their Father and Grand-father: that is to say, nothing but Free-borne-men.

Ingenuitie or freedome of Birth.

Freedome of birth, opened a way vnto all degrees of Honours, which (euen as Politicall Nobilitie) was eyther Natiue, or Datiue; that is to say, by birth, or by gift. Datiue Freedome was by certayne Magistrates giuen, and at length onelie by Princes themselues, and that two maner of wayes, the one secretly and not so plainely, by the gift of a Ring, the other more expressely by name and perfectly, by restoring of men to their birth or blood. And whereas men of seruile condition were but by one name called and knowne, Free-borne-men, and Men of free estate and condition, had two or moe names. And the name which they tooke from their Stocke or Familie, is called Gentile,

The name Gentile is teken from the ſtocke or family a man cometh of.

Gentile, or proper to them of that race or kindred. And yet it is to be noted, names giuen by chance, ſomtime to becom proper to a ſtocke or family. As Tullius was a name proper & peculiar to a Family, but Cicero was a name gotten by chance, and faigned of the Pulſe called Cicer, (or the Cichpeaſe) the forme whereof one of that family had vpon the end of his noſe, who thereof was firſt ſo ſirnamed: but that ſame name of Cicero began to be Gentile or proper to that Family, as to Cicero the Orator, to his Brother, and to their poſterity. Tully in his Tropicks defineth, Gentiles eſſe qui eodem inter ſe ſunt nomine, qui ab Ingenuis oriundi ſunt, quorum Maiorum nemo ſeruitutem ſeruierit: qui Capite non ſunt diminuti, them to be Gentiles (or of the ſame ſtocke and family) which are among themſelues of the ſame name diſcended of Free-borne-men, none of whoſe Anceſtors had ſerued as ſlaues, or had beene condemned to looſe their liberty, ſtate, or Country.

Who are to be accounted Gentiles, or of ſtocke and family.

They which were called Gentiles (or of the ſame ſtocke or family) were of neceſſity to bee diſcended from Ingenui or Free-borne-men; for that of Slaues, and of them whom they called Libertini or men of ſlaues made free, there is no ſtock or family. Wherefore, the right of Gentility, or of hauing of a Stocke and Family, although it was different from Nobility, yet is it not to be doubted, but that it was in great eſteeme & reuerence among the Romaines, and to them, to haue aboue all things deſired to bee called Gentiles, as men that had beene diſcended from ſome good ſtocke or kindred. And that deſire hath euen yet vnto this day poſſeſſed all Italy.

For among the Venetians they are called Gentilhuomini, who deriue their ſtock from the firſt Inhabitants of that Iſland; and which are themſelues Patricij, or diſcended from the Senators. And that word Gentilhuomo, as it were by hand deliuered from the Italians to the Frenchmen; from the Frenchmen remoued to vs; and at the length, together with the new place of dwelling, hath begunne to put a new ſignification, differing from that which Gentilis or Gentilitas was of, amongſt the auncient Romaines.

For it is falſe which ſome, & they learned alſo, haue deliuered, Gentilitie to haue beene proper onely vnto the Patricii: for why, it was common vnto the vulgar ſort of the people (as was Ingenuity it ſelfe) which appeareth by this one place of Suetonius. Patricia gens Claudia (fuit etiam & alia plebeia nec potentia minor nec dignitate) orta eſt in Regillis. The Claudian ſtocke and family, of the order of the Patricij, (for there was another houſe of them alſo of the Comminalty, neither in power nor in dignity inferiour to the other) riſe vp at Regilli. But they ſeeme to haue beene deceiued, by that which Liuy writeth, Romulus to haue created an hundred Senators, which he called Maiorum gentium (or of the greater families) and Brutus another hundred alſo, called Minorum gẽtium (or of the leſſer families.) But this proueth not, that we muſt therefore grant, only them of the order of the Patricij, to haue had a ſtocke and family; neither did this ſo calling of them, Maiorum and Minorum gentium, diuide them from the common people, but thẽſelues among themſelues only; for that, whereas they were all choſen of Free-borne-Cittizens (and which had their ſtocke and family) yet ſuch of thẽ as Romulus had created, brought the honour of the order of the Patricii ſooner into their ſtocke and family, then did they whom Brutus had freed vnto them. They are alſo called Gentiles, who in likenes of name agree among themſelues (although there be no kindred amongſt them at all.)

Among the Athenians they were called Genitæ, that is to ſay, Gentiles, not they which were ioyned among themſelues in ſtocke or blood, but were of thoſe ſort of people, who, diuided into Wardes, grew into a certaine ſociety and fellowſhip among themſelues. For among the Athenians there were foure Tribes, and euerie Tribe was diuided into three Wardes, which made twelue VVardes. And euery VVarde was diuided into thirty parts, which they called Gentes or Kinreds. But againe to the purpoſe.

VVhy a ſtock or family among the Romaines is to be deriued from the Grandfather, neyther could conſiſt but in two at the leaſt (viz.) the grandfather and the father: Some thinke the reaſon thereof to be, for that the Latine word Gens ſignifieth a multitude, which requireth mo then one: and yet Gens ſeemeth to be called, as it were Genus (that is to say a stock or kindred) the Letter V. beeing taken away. Howbeit these two words differ, the one of them from the other, for that Genus signifieth a stocke and beginning; but Gens importeth as it were a certain multitude of Stocks, and of beginnings of Families and Houses.

Ingenuity, hath the grace thereof from Nature.

Ingennity, or freedom of birth, had the Ornaments thereof from nature, and had respect vnto liberty, which it still deriued from the Grand-fathers. But Gentility was a matter of the ciuill Law, and was referred vnto the ancientnesse of Agnation (or kindred by the fathers side) differing from the other onely in antiquity of stocke: for it is not needfull to deriue or take Agnation farther then from the Father.

Which if it bee so, then Gentility and Nobility are all one and the same thing. And they confound Gentility (wherof the common people no lesse vant and boast, then doe the Noblemen) with Nobility: which deny him to bee a Noble-man by birth, but he whose Grandfather was Noble; neither agree they with themselues, when they dare to affirme (but by what authority I knowe not) Nobility together with the seed of the Parents to bee passed ouer vnto their posterity, according vnto that saying of Mantuan:

Qui virit in foliis venit à radicibus humor:
Et patrum in natos abeant cũ semine mores.

The beauty of the faireſt branch, doth from the roote proceede:
And so the Fathers manners do in their off-spring abide.

And otherwise out of Horace:

Est in Iuuencis, est in equis, patrum
Virtus: neq; imbellem feroces
Progenerant Aquilæ Columbam.

In Bullockes, and in Horses eke,
the Syres worth we proue:
Nor doth the hardy Eagle hatch, the weake and fearfull Doue.

By which Analogies, the learned Poets verily went about to stirre vp Noble and couragious youths, to the imitating of their Fathers vertues, being otherwise not ignorant Nobility whereof we intreat to be a thing ciuill or Politicall, & not naturall. And indeed of vnreasonable creatures, there be diuers kindes, but of men there is but one sort. VVherefore, as an Eagle bringeth not forth a Doue, so neyther doth a man beget a Hare. But admit that good men are begotten of good Parents, and valiant men, of valiant fathers. But if this be vnto mankinde proper, why are not good and valiant children begotten by good and valiant common persons also? For why, they are men aswell as the other, but nothing is then this rule more deceitfull. For through the corruption of mans nature, we see it oftentimes to happen, an vnthrifty sonne to be born of a thrifty Father: a foole, to be begotten of a wise man; a Coward, of a valiant man. Neither is this now any noueltie or new matter, but such as tooke roote euen in the first corruption of our Nature. For accursed Caine was the first begotten sonne of Adam, a most good father, and of him the same was good Abel begottē. Iacob also and Esau, were the twinnes of a most blessed father: of which two, God loued the one, and hated the other. And if there be any thing of great operation, which is passed ouer together with mans seede, it is altogether vice; so farre off is it from being of any vertue, which is euer with labour and study begotten, but born neuer. An Emperour (as Ferretus writeth) for his bodily substance is no better then other men; and yet for the highnes of his dignity, is most like vnto God. Demosthenes saith also, wicked Sonnes (as it were by a certaine fatall destinie) to bee borne of good Parents. It is also commonly saide in the Greeke Prouerbe, The misfortunes of the Worthies sonnes. VVhat should I produce the Mathematicians and Astrologers, which affirme Nobilitie and Ignobility much more certainly to depend of the force and influence of the starres, then of the constitution of parents.

And yet the vulgar sort, and not without cause, vseth to expect some greater thing in Princes children, then in poore mens; of which their hope and expectation, there are many causes alledged, as the great means Noblemen haue, for the best bringing vp and instructing of their children (for it is a shame vnto the sonne if he shou d degenerate from his Father, being a Nobleman.) In briefe, the plenty of Kinsmen and Friends, giuing thē good Counsell. Neither was the Poets minde any other, if you marke his conclusion.

Adde quod ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes: Emollit mores nec sinit esse feros.

Doctrina sed vim promouet insitam;
Rectique cultus pectora roborant.

Instruction, helpes Dame Natures powres,
And teaching, strengths those mindes of ours.

By Natures ingrafted or hidden power, hee vnderstandeth certayne seedes of vertues, which by the goodnesse of God alone, are yet in mans Nature, which become not otherwise fruitfull then do the seeds of Hearbs, according vnto the maner and fashion that they are manured & ordered with; so that a man well brought vp, may much more easily obtayne Philosophicall Nobilitie, then can a man that hath beene well borne.

Wherefore poore Countrey-mens Children, who know nothing more then their beasts and cattell, seeme rather to be rude Siluans then men. Whereas others, borne in better place, euen in the same Schooles, and in the same Studies, striue with Noble-mens Children, and would to God they did not so do, both with greater profit and praise.

Other reasons yet remaine, which proue Politicall Nobilitie not to bee a thing substantiall, but meere accidentall: for why, it may be both present and absent, without the corruption of the subiect whereof it dependeth; so that the passage thereof may be letted by some heynous offence committed. It is also lost by voluntary departing or relinquishing of the same (when as Nature in the meane while cannot be thrust away with a forcke) which wee reade to haue beene done, of many of the Romaine Patricij, who refusing their Patriciat dignity, took on them the state and condition of the vulgar sort, or Commoners. Now many, through the Lawyers termes, are in this matter deceiued, who call the extinguishing of Nobility for some offence committed, The corruption of blood: which manner of phrase and speech, they vse not, for that Natiue Nobility is naturally and essentially in the humour of blood, more than other hereditarie faculties, but because the right of inheritance, which is by the degrees of the communication of blood directed, is by that meanes determined or ended, & in hatred of the crime, it is called Corruption, with the infection whereof, all their children are polluted and defiled.

Neither can a stronger argument be deuised, to proue Nobility not to be mingled with the blood, then that the Nobility of the Grandfather ennobleth not his nephue by his son, condemned to lose his liberty, state, or country. Of which this ciuill institution, a naturall reason is giuen; to wit, for that an vnable mean letteth & hindereth the extreams to be ioyned together. But yet it was wont to be demanded with vs, no otherwise thē it was long agoe with the ancient Romains, whether the nobility of the father being a Senator, do profit his son, being borne before his father had obtained that dignity? And whether such Nobility in the son, be Natiue or Datiue? Whereunto I answer, The child by our custom, to be immediatly by his fathers nobility ennobled, & their children, like the boughes of a tree, remoued into a richer ground, are green & florish with the same new moysture that the bodie of the tree doth. And such Nobility hath deserued to be called Natiue, for that it extendeth not but to them, which are borne of such a father. As for example: A Baron, being honored with the title of an Earle, his first begotten son forthwith taketh vnto him the title of some Barony, and all his daughters are saluted Ladies and Madames.

Natiue Nobilitie is not necessarily to be deriued farther then frō the father.

Wherfore we conclude Natiue nobility to be drawne from the father, & not to be needfull for vs to seek for it further: for it may be, that somtime it cānot be deriued from the grandfather, as in case that some great offence of the father come betwixt: for a man born of a noble father, is without all doubt by discent noble. But if anie man wil contend him, not properly to be Eugenes or nobly descended; I answere, the common sort of people most of al, do respect the same, but the Iudiciall Court to haue thereof no care at all. For otherwise some new Princes should be of lesse Nobility, then some meane Noblemen, if the priuileges of Nobility should be bestowed, after the ballance of proper and true Eugenia. Adde moreouer, that if true Eugenia should be vrged, it requireth not only our great grandfathers grādfathers, but euen all the rest of our auncestours in continuall order, after them to be Noble, Rich, profitable for the Common-weale, good mē, & without spot or imputation.

An hard speech indeed, but an harder rule, and a consequence, of all most hardest: Such a noble discended person, is a rare Bird, and yet some such there be: but concerning that matter, heare Aristotles opinion. Eugenia, verily (saith he) I haue found but in few, and no where an hundred good Eugenes. Wherefore the Athenians called their Noblemen by more vsuall words, Eupaterios and Eupatrides, as who should say, Men borne of Noble fathers: although I do know these words to be oftentimes confounded with the word Eugenes.

It to be no hard thing to affirme, that Nobility may be deriued from the mother.

I haue frankly affirmed Nobilitie to discend from the father to the children; and what if I should say the same force to be in the Mothers nobilitie also? Surely, both reason and the opinions of Doctours, and ancient customes also, will be present for the defence of this cause. If Nobility draw any thing naturall at all from the Parents, almost the whole constitution of the Childe, is to be giuen vnto the Mother. It hath also such shape (if we may beleeue Philosophers) as the Mother conceiueth, together with the seede. For first, it taketh life from the Mother, it taketh likewise nourishment of and from the Mother, encreasing from the Mother; and in briefe, by the consent of all men, it, together with spirit and vitall humour draweth from the mother, affections, Vertues and vices. And that such power is in the Mother, it is manifest by the precepts of Phisitians, who command Parents to be most carefull to what Nurses they put their children to be nursed. In briefe, if the vertue of the Father be in the children to be reuerenced, why should not the Mothers be so also? The manner of the Sex, doth neither diminish nor encrease Nobilitie, which is for it selfe to be desired. Nay, in tender women it seemeth to haue both more admiration and grace.

It is of a certayne Lawyer well written; That amongst the causes for which the honour and dignitie of persons, is encreased or diminished, that is of others the lightest, which is drawne from the difference of the Sexe: Vlpianus reporteth, the sonnes of the women of the Ilienses, of Delphos, and of Pontus, to haue beene assigned vnto the houses of their Mothers, and not of their Fathers. Plutarch writeth, that amongest the Xanthij, the Sons were ingrafted into the stocke and family of their Mothers, and from them the name of the stocke and kinred to be deriued, and not from their Fathers. The same thing Herodotus reporteth of them of Licia: as that they should take the name and credite of their stocke and kindred from their Mothers, and that he was with them a free-borne-man, and Noble, that was borne of a free-born-woman, and Noble; although his Father were a Slaue or base common person; yea, and by the Lawes of the Romaines, the Sonnes in some cases follow the beginning of their Mothers. Neyther is it a thing vnheard of with vs, nor with other Nations, Sonnes to haue taken vnto themselues, names from their Mother, which were of greater nobility then their Fathers; as Rainatus de Clara. Spartianus and Trebellius Pollio, haue written, Macrianus or Macrinus, to haue beene by his Mother noble, his Father being but onely a valiant and martiall man. You may also with Cornelius Tacitus reade this sentence: Iam depulso Nerone, quisnam eligeretur inquirebant, & omnium ore Rubellius Plancus, cui Nobilitas per matrem ex Iulia familia. Nero being now deposed, great inquiry was made, who should bee chosen, and Rubellius Plancus was in euery mans mouth, who was nobly borne by the mothers side of the Iulian Family. And from these, Virgil, Ouid, and Statius Papinius disagree not, whose verses I haue thought good heere to set downe.

Now the Reason which many Doctors bring, to proue the Sonne to be partaker of his Fathers Nobilitie, is this; Euerie thing compound, partaketh of the forme and matter which agreeth to both the parents. Wherefore, where the Law repugneth not with reason, this rule is to bee holden for true.

And now concerning Nobilitie Natiue (or by birth) I haue thus much spoken: and from hence I will directly proceede vnto Nobility Datiue, or to Nobility which commeth by gift.

CHAP. V.

¶ The diuers beginnings of Nobilitie Datiue.

BEeing about to search out the other kinde of Politicall or Ciuill Nobilitie (viz.) Nobilitie Datiue, and that euen from the first beginning thereof, certayne things before sayde, seeme heere necessarily to be againe to be called vnto remembrance. Their argument is first to be refuted, which say: That seeing Adam was a common Father vnto all men, whereof commeth it, that one man should be better then another? It is thereunto answered out of the same Olde Testament, out of which the question is risen, beeing of the like Authoritie and credite both with the Christians and the Iewes. Noah when he had planted a Vineyard, and had tasted of his planting, hauing drunke of the wine, lay drunken and bare in his Tent. And Cham seeing the priuities of his father, tolde it to his brethren, who vpon a naturall honestie and vertue, with a Cloake cast vpon their shoulders couered their sleeping father with their eyes turned from him, and not seeing their Fathers nakednesse. But Noah awaked, and knowing what his younger sonne had done vnto him, he cursed Cham, commaunding him to be a slaue of all slaues. By this shamefull and vnworthie fact, Cham with all his generation, carryed away his Fathers curse, seruitude, and the Title of obscure and base persons; whereas contrary-wise, Sem and Iaphet found all the Names and Titles of Honestie, Nobilitie, and Vertue, and their Fathers blessing withall.

Necessitie the cause of Nobilitie.

The Datiue Nobilitie, whereof our present speech is, was for many causes raysed and inuented. And first of all, vpon vrgent necessitie. For when as euill and wicked men preuayled, and good and honest men were oppressed: it was necessarie the good to be distinguished from the badde, and for the preseruation of the publique tranquility, to be seperated and diuided from them: wherefore, wise, iust, and vertuous men, and the lights, as it were, of the world, shining before others, were set ouer the rest, that they might bee vnto all men an example of godlie and honest life, that they might decide and determine all things. And at that time such wise men and prouiders for the Common-weale seemed by vertue to procure vnto themselues Nobilitie. For the olde Prouerbe preuailed with them: Vertue, and not blood to ennoble men. Such men were by the People called, chosen, & appointed Counsellers and Iudges, who by their subiects were elected and created Kings and Princes. And they, which for their worthy deeds had obtained such honourable Titles and Offices, ennobled both themselues and their posterity.

The ignorãce of the vulgar and common sort.

Another cause also why Nobility began to be honoured, was the Ignorance & vnskilfulnesse of the vulgar and Common sort af people, who haue their sence, reason and vnderstanding so dispersed and scattered, as that they cannot gather, discerne, or iudge any thing certaine, firme, or sound. VVherefore, for the maintenance of the publike peace and tranquilitie, it was necessarie to make choice of Princes (that is to say, of Gouernours) men, for their vertue and wisedome, famous and Noble, who might compose and set in order the troubled estates, for lacke of knowledge disordered, and with ſingular wiſedome, and action, as it were by a certaine cunning, drawe the rude people vnto a more ciuill kinde of life, and courteſie of behauiour: ſuch as were Iupiter, Pallas, Ceres, Bacchus, Apollo, and many others. And theſe men, by their wiſedome, vertue, and skill, obtayned not onely the Titles of Nobilitie and Dignity, but were of the vnskilfull multitude, accounted for gods alſo, and receiued from them euen diuine honors.

Wealth and riches.

We ſee Nobilitie to haue riſen alſo, of the aboundance of wealth and riches: for many pinched with extreame pouertie, enforced to hang vpon the richer ſort, and giuing themſelues altogether ouer into their power, reputed them for Noblemen, and for ſuch, both eſteemed of them, and honoured them.

Noble actes.

Nobilitie alſo beganne of Noble and worthy acts done; for in auncient time, when as Nations were by their enemies oppreſſed, if any valiant and couragious man had from ſuch oppreſſion deliuered his Country, he therefore was aboue other men worthily honoured. Many alſo in ancient time by Martiall proweſſe obtained Nobility, and therefore of the people accounted Noble: as was Dauid for the death of Goliah the Philiſtine. Some, immediatly from God were elected and called vnto Nobilitie, as Ioſua, Gedeon, Ieptha, and the reſt of the Iudges of Iſrael, who were Generalls ouer great Armies: otherſome, were againe by God choſen euen from the Plough, to be rulers ouer the people, as the Princes of the twelue Tribes of Iſrael. King Saul called out of the field; Dauid from feeding of his flock, who thought themſelues vtterly vnworthy of ſuch a princely calling. But ſuch as God hath ennobled, are of vs aboue all others to be accounted moſt noble.

Men immediately by God called vnto Nobilitie.

Knowledge in martial affairs

Yea, no ſmall part, but euen the greateſt part of Datiue Nobilitie, gained vnto themſelues honor and glory by their skil in martiall affaires, carrying home with them victory and triumph ouer their enemies; ſo as did Horatius Cocles, Titus Manlius, Scipio Affricanus, and his brother L. Scipio Aſiaticus: I ſpeake not of great Emperours, ſuch as were Veſpatian, Domitian, Nerua, Traian, Antonius, Seuerus, Theodoſius, and many others, who were part of them accounted Fathers of their Countrey; part of them Benefactors, but all of them beſt Princes, whoſe Images are vpon their Coines, euen yet carried about; and publique Statues were in the honour of them, with certaine ſolemne Ceremonies erected, to the intent that all others with their valour and vertue, ſhould with their deedes, as it were, in ſtriuing-wiſe, aſpire and grow vnto the like glory.

Magnanimity and wiſedom

Others alſo, borne of moſt baſe and low condition, who by Armes in time of warres, for their wiſedome and courage, haue beene promoted to be great Emperours, Cæſars, Dukes, Princes and Earles: as were Tullius Hoſtilius, Numa Pomphilius, Tarquinius Priſcus, Iulius Cæſar, Octauianus Auguſtus, and ſuch other like, from hence, tooke the beginning of the Titles of their vertues. For certaine it is, at the firſt vnder the Roman Empire, when as they had ſubdued the Germaines, Italians, the Spaniards, the Brittans, the Gauls, and other moſt mighty kingdoms, Dukes, Earles, and Barons, not then to haue bin in ſuch ſort, as now they be, but from thence to haue afterward ſprung vp and riſen. All their Offices were executed by Tribunes and Lieutenants. There was a greater Tribune, who was next vnto the Emperour and his ſucceſſour. There was alſo a great Officer called Tribunus Celerum, Lieutenant of the Armie, of the light armed and moſt readie Souldiers. Thoſe which with a Cohort, or band of men, were the Keepers, and had the guarding of the Emperours perſon, and they among the Romanes, which were of the firſt Order, next after the Emperor, were called Tribuni Celerum, as they were long agoe in the time of Romulus, and of the other ſixe kings ſucceeding him.

The great Officers, called Magiſtri Equitum, or Maiſters of the Horſſemen, had like power with the Dictators, and with the Emperors, as Lucius Feneſtella, Pomponius Lætus de Magiſtratibus Romanorum: and alſo Flauius Vegetius, and Marcus Cicero doe, intreating of Martiall affaires, deſcribe. But Pomponius Lætus writeth Romulus to haue called the Generall of an army, whom the Germans call Hertzogen Tribunũ Celerum. Saluſt in his Treatiſe concerning the Conſpiracie of Cateline, hath called them Dictatores, & Imperatores; that is, Dictators & Emperors.

Beſide that, Great Magiſtrates called

Præfecti

Præfecti Prætorio, were of ſo great credit and authority, as if appeale had bin made from their ſentence, they might againe appeale from the Emperor, vnto the Præfecti Prætorio. For moſt wiſe, good, and iuſt men, by the Emperours choſen out, were created Præfecti Prætorio, vnto whō they were wont to commit almoſt the whole eſtate of the Common-weale. The Emperour Seuerus granted many things vnto the Great Officers called Præfecti vrbis, and Præfecti Prætorio, of all which, heere to ſpeake, were but needleſſe. For heere we ſpeake onely of the authority of the Præfectus Prætorio (or Captain of the Guard) which the Emperour onely gaue vnto him, who is the chiefe, liuely, and very eſſentiall Law it ſelfe: who were of power to thruſt Cittizens into exile, and to reſtore them vnto their eſtate againe. Whereby it is moſt euident, Princes and Gouernours of People to haue had the power and authority of the ſword, to puniſh the offenders, and to adminiſter Iuſtice: wherby they were afterward thoght to procure and get a great name of Nobility, both vnto themſelues, and to their poſterity: and right probable it is, the authority of Princes and Dukes to haue firſt riſen of the Tribuni and Præfecti: which Princes, at ſuch time as the Romane Emperours remoued out of Germany & Italy into Greece, are read to haue taken vnto themſelues the Imperiall power: which authority and regall priuiledges wee ſee (euen at this day) by Kings and Emperors to bee granted vnto Dukes and Princes: ſo that the election of Princes & Dukes dependeth not of their Subiects (as doth the election of Kings) but is Datiuely, as of gift, to be referred vnto the fauour and bounty of the Emperours and Kings, to whom they haue beene ſubiect. And in the former times, the names of Duke and Prince were names of Offices, and not of Honours and Dignities. And ſo in the times of the Romans, the Roman Kings, their Dictators and Conſuls, & alſo their Emperors, were in the adminiſtration of their ciuill affaires, all martiall men, both horſemen and footmen.

But beſide theſe great Offices of the Tribuni and Præfecti, there were other publike offices and charges; ſome called Ordinarij, for that they kept orders in the army, and ſtood in the front of the battaile. Thoſe in the time of Auguſtus, were wont to be called Auguſtales: and of Fl. Veſpatianus, Flauiales: ſome called Aquiliferi, carrying an Eagle in their Enſignes, and otherſome called Imaginarij, bearing the enſigne of the common or generall Army of the people of Rome notable with the Letters, S.P.Q.R. that is to ſay, Senatus Populus Que Romanus: or the Senate and people of Rome, whom wee can more fitly compare vnto none, then to our Standard or Enſigne-Bearers.

But if wee would heere proſecute all things in order, this Treatiſe ſhould without meaſure encreaſe. But now in this place wee onely goe about, ſlightly as it were to ſhew the beginnings of Noble Dignities & Offices, leaſt any man ſhould ſuſpect them to be but altogether things faigned, and vpon no reaſon grounded. Rehearſing theſe things in the mean time by the way, that when we ſhall come vnto our owne age, it may appeare, how much Powers, Dominions, and Nations differ among themſelues. For they who in ancient times were vnder kings and emperours appointed Gouernours ouer Regions and Countries, are now become hæreditary poſſeſſors thereof: & they which before were but Noble Miniſters or Seruants, are now become abſolute Nobles.

Beſide that, in the meane time it moſt plainly appeareth of that which is aforeſaid, that the kindred, ſtocke, and diſcent of the Nobility in former ages flouriſhed and became famous onely for vertue, noble actes, and valour of minde. And that Vertue being ſet apart, wee are all foraſmuch as concerneth mans nature, the ſonnes of Adam. VVherefore, according to the rule of Theologicall or Philoſophicall Nobility (whereunto our Anceſtors eſpecially addicted themſelues) to boaſt of Nobility by birth, without vertue, was but a vaine thing.

Nam genus & Proauos & quæ non fecimus ipſi,
Vix ea noſtra duco.——————

For our proud Stocke and Pedigree, and things we did not make,
VVe ſcarſe reckon them for our owne, or for our owne them take.

VVherefore wee pray and exhort all men, men, that foraſmuch as vertue commeth not by inheritance, euery man would endeuour himſelfe, of himſelfe to become Noble. For they which otherwiſe vaunt and boaſt of Nobility, ſeeme onely honourers of vertue, vpon another mans credite, and liue not by their owne, ſeeing that they be rather baſe perſons, bearing themſelues brag, vpon another mans vertue. But for the moſt part quite out of order, ſo the faſhion and manner of the world now is. For what cannot flattery, the fauour of Princes, and too much indulgency do, and bring to paſſe.

PARERGON.

IT is ſufficiently manifeſt, by that which is aforeſaid, what the iudgment of my Friend and Vncle Robert Glouer was, concerning Politicall Nobility in ancient time, amongſt the Gentiles: which Philoſophers heeretofore, haue ſet forth to vs, as a wauering thing, (and Diuines as a thing vncertaine) whilſt they in ſpeaking thereof omitted the Ciuill Rights of perſons.

It were verily to be wiſhed, that the ornaments of vertue ſhould euery where be conferred and beſtowed vpon none, but vpon ſuch, as in whom vertue it ſelfe reſteth: for that as the encreaſing of honor, ſo the credite and reputation thereof alſo, is propounded to be gotten, not by ambition, but by induſtry. But ſeeing that Politicall Nobility is another thing, whereof there be diuers beginnings, and thoſe of ſuch ſort and condition, as maketh in euery man that hath them, a beginning and excellency proper and peculiar to themſelues; it is from the reſt of the kindes of Nobility (viz. Theologicall and Philoſophicall) by this only difference diſtinguiſhed, that whilſt they reſt onely vpon Religion and Vertue, this Ciuill Nobility reſteth vpon the cuſtome of Nations.

In the proſecuting whereof, for that he finiſhed not the ſame, I verily tooke it moſt greeuouſly: for many things ſeemed to me to be therin wanting, which might much haue concerned the matter: As the peculiar forme of enobling of men, vſed in euery kingdome apart, and eſpecially in this Empire and Iſland, as the very method and order of the worke ſeemed to me to make ſhew of. But foraſmuch, as he in his life time perfected not theſe things: For,

——Abſtulit clarum cita mors Achillem.)

Vntimely death ſoone tooke away
Achilles, and clos'd him in clay.

Leaſt Venuſſes head being onely by Apelles perfected, the body beeing not yet drawne, the whole worke in the meane time altogether imperfect or deformed, ſhould lye neglected and vnregarded, I thought it a thing worth the labour, to ſupply that defect, with ſuch thinges as hereafter follow: to the intent, that at length amongſt others, I might in fewe words, and as it were at a glimpſe, ſhew what orders of Nobility are with vs alſo: what Rites and Ceremonies are vſed in promoting of men vnto the degrees of Nobility, that from hence the forme of creating of thē being before vnderſtood, I might afterward with greater fruite, and fuller pleaſure, come vnto the perſons themſelues, with their families, marriages, changes, and noble actes; and at length in a iuſt volume (if God ſhall ſee it good) more at large, and fully delight the Readers.

But if we ſhall compare theſe old and moſt ancient times of the Romane Empire with ours, wee ſhall finde no ſigne or token of that auncient Nobility in the Courts of Princes. If you ſhall ſeeke for ſuch as they called Patricij or Senators (whom the Romanes reuerenced as men ſent downe from heauen) you ſhall finde them no where but in Citties, exerciſing Vſury and Merchandize (trades vtterly forbidden the Romanes) at whom (although within their owne walles they be much regarded and eſteemed) our noble Courtiers were wont to ſcorfe & ieſt. Or elſe if it pleaſe you, goe vnto the time of Pope Vrban, who (forſooth) made Charles the Sonne of King Lewes the 8. in France, a Senatour of Rome, when as he ſhould rather of his owne right, haue graced him with the Cardinals hat. Indeede, it was a very ridiculous compariſon of the French King his Sonne with a Senator of Rome, as the matter now ſtãdeth.

VVherefore let vs ſee, and as breefely as we can touch, how, & by what degree after the empire of that Citty (which firſt built by Shepheards, at length became Miſtris of the whole world) began to decline from ſo great an Eſtate, together with the change thereof, by little and little, drew with it the change of Noble dignities and titles alſo.

After the tranſlating of the Romane empire by Conſtantine the Great, all that excellency of publike dignities, whereof it is expreſly and ſufficiently enough before ſpoken, ſeemeth to haue bin changed into a certaine other forme, and a new manner of ennobling of men to haue bin deuiſed. And verily, the names of Honours and Dignities in the eaſt-empire, ſeeme to haue bene diuers from the weſt-empire: and the Latines, after the empire rent in ſunder, and ſeated at Conſtantinople, ſeeme to haue beene ſubiect vnto the Greekes. For he that was there next vnto the Emperour, eyther by reaſon of the neereneſſe of blood, or by inſtitution, and was of the Latines called (Primas) was of the Greekes, by a generall name ſaluted Deſpotes; that is to ſay, Lord: as he is at this day cald Monſieur among the French men. The later VVriters, were wont alſo to call him, the ſame man Sebaſton, according as the emperors had deuiſed honourable titles, where-with they might grace their friends, and binde them vnto them. The third in dignity from the emperor, was the Sebaſtocrator; whom hee whom they called Cæſar, followed as fourth.

Deſpotes.

Sebaſtos.

Sebaſtocrator Cæſar.

But whilſt the emperour Baſilius, was wont to be called Sebaſtos, & alſo Cæſar, he the ſame man, at one & the ſame time enioying all theſe titles, theſe dignities were then as offices, and not as titles of honour. But afterward, they as honourable names of dignities, euen without any offices at all belonging vnto them, began to bee according to the emperours pleaſure, beſtowed and diſpoſed of. And for a time, the next in honour vnto the emperour, was called Cæſar: as The king of the Romanes at this day, is in the VVeſt. But afterwards, Sebaſtocrator was the ſecond in honour, & Cæſar the third, at ſuch time as Alexius Comnenus appointed his Brother Iſaacius to be Sebaſtocrator: of whom Zonoras ſpeaketh more at large. And laſt of all Alexius Paleologus beeing Deſpotes, was made next in honour vnto the Emperour, vnto whom he the ſame Emperor Comnenus hauing no Sonnes, betrothed his eldeſt daughter Irene, and graced him with the Title of the Deſpotes, as hee which ſhould haue beene heire of the empire, if he had not before dyed.

Protoſebaſtus had the firſt place & degree of honour from the emperour. And at length Panhyperſebaſtus begã to be the moſt ſtately and maieſticall name of all others, being a new title, of a new dignity, inuented by Alexius Comnenus, to gratifie Michael Taronitus withall. Eparchus was alſo a name of great honor, as who ſhould ſay, the cheefe of all the Prouinciall Preſidents. Contoſtaulus was Generall of the Auxiliary forces, which out of France, Sicily, and Italy, ſerued in the Eaſt. Whereof he was called The Great Contoſtaulus: and otherwiſe Comeſtabilis, which of the Italians is interpreted Contoſtabile. Drungarius was he, which had the command of a Fleet at Sea. But him which commanded the Army at Sea, they called, The great Duke, and in Greek, μεγας δυξ, for difference ſake, imitating therein the Latines. For he which led the Army at Land, was called Egemon; but hee which ruled at Sea, was called Dux. And ouer the Army at land, commanded alwayes, eyther the emperor himſelfe, or the Deſpotes, or the Sebaſtocrator, or the Cæſar, or the Panhyperſebaſtus. And vnto this Great Duke whom they had as cheefe Admirall, they made ſubiect all the Drungars of their Fleete, their Admirals, their Proto-Comites, and him the Great Drungarius himſelfe, before whom they alſo appointed the emperors Statue on horſe-backe (which they called Contus) to bee carried before him in their forces at Sea. They had alſo their Great Logotheta, whom we at this day call the Chancellor. Their Logariaſtes, whom the Frenchmen call Controlleur. And their Protoſtator, or Marſhall of their Army. Their Primicerios alſo and Primauguſtos, and many others of that ſort, I willingly paſſe ouer, leaſt in proſecuting of euery one, my diſcourſe ſhould grow too long and tedious. Theſe were all honorable dignities, and that for the moſt part not ſo ſo much for the neceſſity of their Offices or order, as ſo made by the fauour and good liking of the Emperor.

But whilſt it ſeemed ſo good vnto the Emperors, ſo to appoint the ſeate of the Empire at Conſtantinople (where al things now lye ſwallowed vp of the Turkes) they left the weſt bared of their Legions, and ſtrengthned onely with Fortes, vndefended and ſubiect vnto the inuaſions & fury of the barbarous Nations: vppon the fall and decay whereof, the ruine of the Eaſt Empire (at length) enſued alſo. Italy and Affricke was at that time gouerned by their Exarchi, Toparchi, Comarchi, Carthularij, Spatharij, Guſtaldi, and Capatani. But at length, when Narſes the Eunuch, and one of the Romane Patricij, was by Iuſtinus the Emperour, appointed Gouernour, he brought in them whom they called Conſulares, Præſides, and Correctores. But after, that hee that Narſes, prouoked with the iniuries and deſpightes of Sophia the Empreſſe (and with anger enraged) had called in thither the Longobardes out of Pannonia, they became by little & little to vary, concerning the titles of Honour, and names of Dignity.

For Narſes beeing dead, Longinus (one of the Romaine Patricij alſo) by the ſame Emperour choſen Gouernor or Exarcha in his ſtead in Italy, for the repreſſing of the Longobards, but a little before called forth by Narſes, and euen now about to come, ordained Dukes thoroughout the Prouinces (haply to the imitation of Conſtantine the Emperor, who is reported to haue prouided by Law, that Countreyes and Townes ſhould be aſſigned to Dukes, Earles, and olde Captaines, which hauing lõg ſerued, were to be rewarded for their good ſeruice done and paſt.) And vnto this purpoſe tend the words of Guicchiardine himſelfe, which I haue thoght good hereunto alſo to adioyne.

By the tranſlation of the Empire vnto Conſtantinople (ſaith hee) a way was opened vnto the power of the Roman Byſhops; for the authority of the Emperours, dayly more and more weakned and decreaſing in Italy (both by their continual abſence, as alſo for that they were ſtill buſied with warres in the eaſt) the people alſo by litle and litle reuolting from them, & the City of Rome it ſelfe, being at length oftẽtimes by the Goths and Vandals taken & ſacked; the authority of the Emperors began to decay and vaniſh away in Italy. But the barbarous people, at length again driuen out of Italy by the power of the Emperors, the gouernment began againe to be managed by Greeke Magiſtrats (of whom he which commanded ouer the reſt, was called Hexarchus, and had his ſeate at Rauenna) who appointed Gouernours ouer the reſt of the Citties of Italy, which Gouernors they called Dukes. From hence, came the name of the Hexarchatſhip of Rauenna, wherein al places were comprehended, which had not Dukes of theyr owne, but were vnder the commaund of one Hexarchus. Not long after, a notable change and alteration of matters enſued from the Longobardes: For they, a moſt fierce and cruell people entering into Italy, poſſeſſed the country called Gallia Ciſalpina, of whome it hath alſo taken the name of Lombardie. They added alſo vnto their Gouernment Rauenna, with all the Hexarchatſhip thereof, beſides many other parts of Italy, extending their armes as farre as Picenum, Spoletum, and Beneuentum, ouer which, they appointed Gouernors to rule and commaund, whome they called Dukes, &c. So the Longobards raging and roaming farre abroad in Italy, at length, with thirty of their Dukes, in vaine attempted to haue taken the Cittie of Rome. And ſo it came to paſſe, according to the manner of warres, that the Titles of the dignities of the former empire being neglected, all things began to bee gouerned by the Generals and Commanders of the armies, viz. by ſuch as they called Dukes, Earles, and Princes.

Dukes, Earls, Princes.

Theſe people, Charles the Great, ſon to Pipin King of France, by the Romanes called into Italy, hauing taken Ticinum, the Metropoliticall Cittie of the Inſubres, & there ſlain Deſiderius (of a Conſtable promoted to be King of Italy) ouercame and ſubdued, and was foorthwith by the generall conſent of all men choſen emperor of the VVeſt Empire: who as hee would haue the Empire it ſelfe to be called, The French Romane Empire, ſo euen in the beginning therof he had a purpoſe to make it hæreditary, and made the Great men, & ſuch as were with Honourable Titles graced, to be altogether free: and bound them by oath, as men in Fee, holding only of the King, and of the Emperour; ſo that that if by chance they ſhould fall from their faith and allegiance, or dye without iſſue, hee then ordained thoſe their dignities to be transferred vnto others: & that his ordinance was called Inueſtitura, or an Inueſture. The bounds and townes of his kingdome, he committed to be gouerned by Counties or Earls. The bounds & borders they called Marchias, or Marches: whereupon, the Gouernours of the Marches, began to be called Marchiarum Comites, (or Counties of the Marches) and at length Marchiones, or Marqueſſes. And them whom he ſet and placed in the Prouinces, for the adminiſtration of Iuſtice, and the keeping of the people in their allegiance, were then called Miſsi (or Men ſent) or otherwiſe Legati: that is to ſay, The Emperours Legats or Lieutenants. But ſuch as the people afterward of themſelues created, for the adminiſtration of Iuſtice, and the gouernment of Cities, being two or moe in number, beeing choſen after the manner of the ancient Roman Common-weale, were called Conſuls. The French Romane Empire, with this ſucceſſe made by Charles the Great, was left vnto his poſterity almoſt hæreditary: which in ſhort time after alſo, vnder the Emperour Charles the Groſſe (Nephew in the fourth degree vnto Charles the Great, & before, King of Germany) deuolued from the French-men vnto the Germanes. Vnto whom alſo (within a few yeares after) Otto the Great, king of Germany, and he Emperour, alſo ſucceeded; who following the ſteps of Charles the Great, gaue ſuch perfections vnto his beginnings, in beſtowing and diſpoſing of honours & dignities, as that he is not ſo much for his ſirname and noble actes, to bee compared with the moſt mighty emperours, as for his wholeſome Lawes, and heroicall Ordinances, of all poſterity of right for euer to be commended. For this man, after the ancient manner of the Longobards and French, entertaining euery moſt valiant man into his wars, graced with Royalties ſuch of them, as had done him worthy & faithfull ſeruice (and theſe Royalties were all manner of dignities, lands, & gouernments of Prouinces) which he according as he thought good, beſtowed vpon ſuch as had of him well deſerued. And now men began more plainly to make a difference of titles and dignities. For the titles of Dukes and Counties (being with the ancient Romanes but the bare names of perſonall offices and charges) now receiued other cuſtomes: and a Duke (at firſt choſen for his vertues & noble acts) they now began ſo to call him of his Dukedome: as they did alſo a Marqueſſe, of his Marquiſat, and an Earle of his Earldome. And he which had the command of people, from ſome King, Marqueſſe, or Earle, was called Capitaneus (or a Capitaine.) But they which had ſuch command from Capitaines, were called Valuaſores (or Valuaſours.) And they which had it from theſe Valuaſors, were called Valuaſini (or Valuaſines.) Whereupon this new beginning of Politicall Nobility, beeing far & wide diſperſed through the kingdomes of the Empire, they at length were deemed rightly Noble, according to the māner and cuſtome of euery place & Country, who eyther themſelues, or their anceſtours liued, ſo graced with theſe, or ſuch like priuiledges.

And theſe be the things, which according, vnto the variety and alteration of times, we haue read in the moſt approued Authors, concerning the titles of honors and dignities. In recounting of which, we haue thought this moſt eſpecially worth the noting, that all the ſtreames of Nobility (but eſpecially the greateſt & cheefeſt of them) came and iſſued all out of the Campe. Which degrees of honour and Nobility, before that wee compare them with ours, it ſhall not repent vs in diſtinct rankes, orderly to runne through the beginning of euery one of them.

And firſt to begin withall, They in Campes were called Principes, or Princes, (of whom at this day, wee euery where make ſo great account) which ſerued in the firſt rankes, excelling others in ſtrēgth and age; and which followed the Speare-men, diuided into fifteen bands or troops, ſo placed, as it were for a refuge & releeſe for them: to the end, that if in battaile the Speare-men ſhould be enforced to retire, they might in ſafety flye vnto thoſe Principes, as vnto principall men of more approued and aſſured ſeruice. Whereof Caſtra Principalia, the Principall Tents, and Porta Principalis, the Principall Port, where thoſe Principes or Principall men were wont to lye with their bands; are ſo often read of in Liuie.

Next vnto Augustus the Emperour, they which in the emperors name gouerned the Romane affaires, were called Principes Senatus, or Princes of the Senate. But afterward, the emperour would haue the place or title of a Prince, to bee a dignity next vnto a Kings, who amongst the ancient Saxons were called Ethelings, and with vs Clytones. But now it is as it were a generall name, diuersly giuen and attributed vnto many at once, and orderly comprehending in it all the greater sorts of dignities: yea in some places, according to the manner and custome of the places, the title and dignity of a Prince, is inferiour vnto the title and dignity of a Duke, or an Earle.

Dukes. Duces or Dukes tooke their names from the Latine word Ducendo, as who should say Ductores or Leaders; for that they marching before, led their followers. Whereof we reade the Latine phrase, Ducere bellum, that is to say, to leade Warre; for Gerere bellum, to make warre. And so Hȳ bellum assidue ducunt cum Gente Latina. These men make continuall war with the Latine Nation. And they which as Dukes or Generals were leaders of Armies, were wont to vse such Ensignes as the Consuls did: whereupon, the word Ducatus, sometime signified the Region or Country, ouer which the Duke commanded: and other while, the Military gouernment and commanding authority it selfe. Vnto which manner of men, for things by them honourably and valiantly in the wars atchieued and performed, triumphall Ornaments were sometimes awarded. Amongst the ancient Germanes, vnto a Generall or Leader of an army, were assigned twelue Counties or Earles to attend vpon him.

Marquesses, Marquesses were so called of a certaine iurisd ction bound vnto some certaine place. So he which had the command and gouernment of any frontier Territory or Sea-coast, was called Marchio, or a Marques: and they which receiued of thē Fees, were properly accounted the Valuasars of the king, or of the kingdome, as men standing with the Generals Ad valuas Regni, at the gates and entrances of the kingdome. Other-some there bee, which goe about to deriue the word Marchio from Marca (a word of the Celtes) from whence they deriue the word Marchare in French, to ride: and the Marcomanni as a people so called, for that they excelled in good horse-manship.

Counties or Earles. Now of Counties or Earles, as there were diuers kindes, so of them amongst the ancient VVriters, are read diuers and sundry sorts and orders; such as among the rest wer Comites Sacri Palitij, or counties of the Sacred Pallace: Archiatri (or Principoll Courtiers) and Comites stabuli, or Constables. For Desiderius from a Constable, by the Longobards chosen and appointed to be king of Italy, was slaine by Charles the Great. And it is elsewhere read, hee sent Burchardus the Constable, with his Fleete to Corsica.

There were also Comites Militum, or Counties of the Souldiers, of whom the Romanes would haue always two residing in the East, and were thereof sometimes called Comites Orientis, or Counties of the east. And in breefe, there were Counties of Prouinces: such as were the Counties of Spaine, of Brittaine, and of the Saxon-Coasts in Brittaine.

The Gustaldius in Italy, and a County, seeme in ancient time to haue bene all one: There be some also, which beleeue a County in olde time to haue beene called Comarchus.

Vicounts. The name of a Vicount sheweth a beginning not to be doubted of: For he to whom the County in the Camp committed the authority of his iurisdiction, was called Vice-Comes or Vicount; as were in the ancient time the Proconsul, & the Proconsull his Lieutenant or Deputy.

Barons. But whereof the Barones or Barons were so called, is not yet wel knowne; For vnto the Romans as concerning their dignity, they were vtterly vnknowne: howbeit, that they affirme it to bee a Latine word, by that saying of Cicero to his friend Atticus. Apud Patronem reliquosque Barones te in maxima gratia posuit: Hee brought you into great fauour with your Patron, and the rest of the Barons.

Other some obtrude vnto vs the greek word βαρυς, which signifieth Graue. But howsoeuer it commeth to passe, if credite be to be giuen to our most learned Lawyer Bracton, the Barons were still accounted for most valiant men, for hee would haue them to be called, Robora belli, or the strength of warre. And by the Lawyer Baldus, a Baron is defined to be a man hauing uing from his Prince the power and authority of the greateſt, middle, and loweſt correcting of offendors. But ſufficeth it now concerning theſe matters, to haue ſayde thus much, as purpoſing of the ſame, to ſpeake more at large heereafter.

And let vs now come nearer vnto the matter, by comparing of ancient things, with others of latter time; to the intent, that by applying of thoſe ancient things vnto this our Age and Time, the reaſon as well of the Names as of the Dignities themſelues, may the better and more manifeſtly appeare.

The Empire decaying, the Nobilitie beganne to get both other cuſtomes and Names.

Like as the Empire of the Greekes, was by the Turkes ouerthrowne and brought to nought, euen ſo alſo was the empire of the Weſt, by the cunning and ambition of the Biſhops of Rome, rent in ſunder and weakened. Which, how great it was, the very ruines thereof doe now ſcarcely declare. The maieſtie whereof, is yet by the Seauen Princes Electors (of the Germains called Churfurſten) vnto the Ornament of the Chriſtian world vpholden and maintayned. The Septemuirat of Germany, the Emperour Otho the third, and Pope Gregorie the fift, ordained in the yeare 960. Vnto whom afterwards the Emperour Charles the fourth engaged the reuenues of the Empire (hauing promiſed vnto euerie one of the Electors, an hundred thouſand crownes) that he would appoint Wenceſlaus his ſonne, heire of the Empire. But the Money beeing not payed, it came to paſſe, that the Patrimony of the Romaine Common-weale, which was appointed to the vſes and maintenance of the warres (and for that onely cauſe was ſubiect to alienation) was priuately diſtributed and diuided amongſt them, vnto euery one of them a part, whereby the power of the Empire was afterward almoſt brought to nothing, the Seauen Princes Electors of Germanie, keeping all vnto themſelues, and compelling the Emperors by oath, that they ſhould not reuoke the Lands and Pawnes before ingaged.

The Seauen Electors were firſt inſtituted in Germany about the yeare, 960.

And Kings, to whom it was a pleaſant thing to be deliuered from another mans power and command, erected to themſelues Monarchies.

A Duke.

But they which in moſt great Kingdoms hold the ſecond place, next to the Kings and the Kings ſons, are according to the forme of the Emperors army, called Dukes. The title of an Archduke is but one alone, belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, by the emperor Frederick diuiſed, to grace his nephew Phillip withall, at ſuch time as he was to marry Ioane the heire of Spaine.

An Archduke.

The name of Vayuode, is a title of dignity onely in Tranſiluania, and Valachia. And ſo alſo is the Doge of the Venetians, who is alſo called a Duke.

A Vayuode.

A Doge.

And as in warres Counties or Earles were aſſigned vnto Dukes, ſo our Counties now at this day, are thought next in dignity to follow the Dukes.

An Earle.

For a Marqueſſe at this day, is nothing elſe in his owne proper ſignification, then a Countie vpon the Frontiers & Borders: which in the Germaine tongue is more ſignificantly called a Wartgraue: with whome a Countie is called Graf. And whereof come thoſe honourable names of the Pfaltzgraue, Landſgraue, Wartgraue, Rheingraue, & Burghgraue: that is to ſay, The Countie Palatine, the Countie of the Prouince, The Countie of the Borders, The County of Rhene, The County of the Caſtle or Garriſon. And yet according to the diuers cuſtome of places, Marqueſſes in ſome places are preferred, and goe before Counties or Earles.

A Marqueſſe.

The beginning of a Vicount, the very etymology of the name it ſelf hath taught vs.

A Vicount.

Barons are alſo euery where according to the dignity of their degree, power, & grauity accounted honourable. France hath alſo onely foure peculiar Great and principall Lords, whom they call Vidames (viz.) Chartres, Chalons, Amiens, and Gerbery. So hath it pleaſed men according to the cuſtome of places, vnto new forms of Honours and Dignities, to giue olde names. But nothing is euery where, and in all places ſo ſincerely obſerued and kept, as is that olde and generall diuiſion of People, into Noble and Vnnoble, with a certain difference of the Vnnoble ſort among themſelues, as of the Nobler ſort among themſelues alſo.

A Baron.

Vidames.

Noble and Vnnoble.

For ſuch with eaſie exerciſes get their liuings, ſuch as excell in wit in the knowledge of Martiall affaires, in learning, in wealth, or in vertue: theſe men, in theſe times, are as it were the Seminaries of Nobility (as were in ancient time the Gentlemen whom they called Equites, among the Romans, the nurſery of the Senators.)

The Seminary of nobility.

All the vulgar people are base and vnnoble.

Al gentlemen are alike Noble.

The differences of Nobility.

Nobility, the greater and the lesser.

In some places of Italy there be hereditary Knights.

In many places also there are Esquires by birth.

Many noble & famous Gentlemen, haue also from Lawyers and Merchants discended. And although some of the vulgar & common sort of the people, be among them of better account and reputation, then some others of them, yet in respect of the Nobility, they are altogether base and vnnoble: like as all free-borne men, which are not of the vulgar and common sort of people, are indifferently and alike noble, according to the French Prouerb: Ie suis Gentilhomme comme le Roy, I am a Gentleman as well as the King. Il foy de Gentilhomme: The faith of a Gentleman.

Yet it is to be knowne, antiquity and high functions, to haue their estimation in Politicall Nobility, as they haue in other things. And heereof as seemeth vnto me, are those distinctions of Nobility, named, and vnnamed: or of the greater and lesser Nobility, as some others would haue it. And Named Nobility I call that which is by hereditary succession graced with Titles and Fees. As a king taketh that his denomination of his kingdome: a Duke, of his Dukedome; an Earle, of his Earledome; and a Baron, of his Baronny: who may also be called Maiores Nobiles, or The greater Nobility, although not altogether so properly, for that that distinction of Nobility, indiffrently comprehendeth all sorts of Noblemen, & the higher Magistracies (bestowed vpon men for tearme of life onely, or during the Princes pleasure.) The rest of the Nobility vnder the degree of Barons, may bee called Nobiles Innominati (or vnnamed Noblemen) or Minores Nobiles, that is to say; the lesser Nobility.

And yet there are some of them which seeme to haue Named Nobility, although they bee not in the same ranke and order to be placed: such as are Knights and Esquires. But forasmuch as the Titles of Knighthood and of Esquires, are not hereditary, they are accounted amongst the lesser Nobility.

The Frenchmen in the meane time, and we Englishmen also, doe by more knowne words, better discerne the greater Nobility from the lesser, but not without a certaine iniury and wrong done vnto the latine tongue; from which wee deriue our Nobility. For who is he which knoweth not the Latine word (Nobiles) indifferently to comprehend all such as are aboue the common and vulgar sort of mē? Which word is in French or English expounded (Noble.) By which word, the common sort of Englishmen calleth or noteth no man, vnder the degree of a Baron.

What the latine word Nobilis signifieth with the Frenchmen and Englishmen.

The rest vnder the degree of Barons, are in French called Gentilzhommes, and in english, Gentlemen. Of which, such as are neyther Knights nor Esquires, we call them but onely Gentlemen, without any addition; and in French, Gentilzhommes simples, or plaine Gentlemen. Although it may be that some of these mē can shew moe Armes of their stocke, and deriue their Pedigree further, then can some others of greater dignity, or euen the emperour himselfe.

Wherefore, in Politicall Nobility, being simply vnderstood, these plaine tearmed Gentlemen are not inferiour vnto the Princes themselues, but yet in honor and dignity much. For the titles of Kings, of Dukes, of Marquesses, of Earles, & Barons, are as it were the names of most honourable Offices, and by reason of such additions, one becommeth more famous and nobler then another.

Noblemen how they are to be distinguished.

These things beeing thus somewhat more at large and in general spoken, concerning Nobility, seeme as it were to open the way vnto the particular degrees thereof with vs. But the diuision of the orders & degrees of men, which our english Common-weale and Empire well beareth, at other times, by others sette forth, is exceedingly well set downe: who haue diuided the same into a King, into Nobility of the greater and of the lesser sort, Cittizens, Men liberally brought vp, and Labourers. But forsomuch as I haue purposed to speake onely of the degrees of Nobility, and that the intention and scope of this worke tendeth no farther, I haue determined to entreat onely of the Kings, and of the cheefe named Nobility, whom it pleaseth vs to call, The Peeres of the Kingdome, The Common Fathers of the Common-weale, & in briefe, by one name, Great Estates, or Noblemen.

Yet in so great conuersions of things, and inundations of forraigne Nations, where-with this our Island from the first inhabiting thereof, hath bene oftentimes troden vnder foote, and for a long time most moſt greeuouſly afflicted: to write ſuch a ſerious diſcourſe, as to ſet downe, what were the beginning Titles of our Noble-men, with the orders and degrees of honours, ſeemeth a thing moſt difficult and hard.

Concerning which things (freely to confeſſe the truth) ſeeing that I haue not well ſatisfied my ſelfe, I dare not with too much haſty confidence to affirme much, eſpecially ſeeing that heere, as well as elſewhere, the Victors haue ſtill eſpecially endeuoured them-ſelues, not ſo much to oppreſſe the people by them ſubdued, as they haue done to innouate their cuſtomes, and to change their lawes. Seeing that it is ſo by Nature ordered, that with the ſame fate where-with Monarchies and Kingdomes are ouer-whelmed, euen the Nations themſelues, and Noble Families fall, and come to vtter ruine alſo.

For firſt, the Romanes by ſubduing the Brittaines, the naturall Inhabitants of this Iſland, went about with their Legions to ouerthrow all things.

But the Romanes about fiue hundred yeares more or leſſe after, beeing againe tranſported into France, the Saxons, or rather Engliſh-Saxons, called in by the Brittaines vnto their aide, raiſed warre againſt their Hoaſts, and thruſt them quite out of their auncient Seates, and firſt of all others, gaue vnto the kingdome the name of England. And theſe people the Danes alſo for a ſpace thruſt out of the kingdome.

But at length, when as this kingdome began (as it were) againe to breathe vnder Edward the Confeſſour, a moſt holy King, and laſt of the Engliſh-Saxons race, he being forth-with dead without iſſue, gaue occaſion to the Normanes to paſſe ouer. VVho at length preuailing, (Harold who with-ſtood them beeing ouercome) and the Engliſh-men beeing thruſt out of their ancient inheritance, began foorth-with to aſſigne the Landes and groundes in euery place vnto their companions and fellow-ſouldiors, and alſo to bring in the Normane cuſtomes and faſhions.

Many things for all that, are yet extant in the moſt auncient Records, euen in the Heptarchy of the Engliſh-Saxon Kings, concerning thoſe Noble-Men which were Rulers ouer the Countries of Cheſter, Leiceſter, and Lincolne, whom we reade to haue beene indifferently alſo called Dukes, and Counties of the Mercians. The Danes had alſo their Heretoches, and the Princes of their Heretoches. And Edward, the King and Confeſſour yet reigning, euen in the time next vnto the comming in of the Normans, in the charters and monuments of Churches, are found there to be Ethelings, Clytons, Patricij, Conſuls, Earles, Palatines, Dukes, Senators, Stalhers, Thayni, Theotthani, Miniſters, and Princes. But yet with great inconſtancy, of ſuch their names and callings. For whom thou ſhalt reade to be called Counties, thou ſhalt elſe-where finde euen at one and the ſelfe-ſame time to be called Dukes. But the ſtile of Clyto, at firſt ſignified the Kings eldeſt Sonne, but afterwards, it was a title common to all them that were deſcended of the kings bloud.

The Titles of Countie and Conſull ſignified the ſame thing, differing, but in that Comes (or a County) was ſo called a Comitatu (or of a Shire or County:) and a Conſull of Conſulendo, or of giuing of Councell. A Stalher, and The Gouernor of the Kings houſe, to haue beene all one, it is out of diuers writings manifeſt. The Partricij and Thaini were Noblemen of the better ſort; and I could almoſt affirme them to haue beene equall vnto our Barons at this day. Miniſters and Princes, who in old Charters are ſet as loweſt witneſſes, ſeeme to haue beene names of one and the ſame ſignification, and alike ſignifie Noble-men: but what degree of honour or Nobility they were of, is altogether vnknowne. Neither ſeeme theſe honourable Titles to haue beene foorth-with together with the victory, by William the Normane changed. For theſe men whom King Edward the Confeſſor in his Charter, concerning the Priuiledges by him granted to the Abbey of Waltham, in the yeare 1062: taketh to witneſſe by the name of Counties Palatine (whom he but euen a little before had called Dukes) and by the names of Procurators, Chamberlaines, and Princes of his Court: the Normane himſelfe, in the ſecond yeare after his victory, in his confirmatory Charter granted vnto the ſame Abbey, doth by the ſame Stiles and Titles take to witneſſe alſo.

But, after that he had now confirmed the kingdome vnto himſelfe in ſafety, the Counties whom he by his Royall Charter had rewarded with Counties and Lands, began to be one from another, diſtinguiſhed, by the addition of the Title, of ſuch and ſuch a Countie. As witneſſe Alanus Countie of Richmond; witneſſe Hugh Countie of Cheſter: witnes Roger Countie of Shrewsbury and Arundell.

VVherefore the Engliſh Saxons by little and little, eyther dead without iſſue, or oppreſſed, or thruſt foorth into exile, and ſo liuing in other places, all things were ſo framed vnto the Norman maner, as that of our Nobilitie at this day, there is not any which can ſo much as any little breathe of the Stock and Race of thoſe moſt ancient Saxons.

Theſe foundations of the auncient VVorthies and Nobility beeing layde by William the Conquerour: and oftentimes afterwards by Succeſſours, according to the diuerſe occaſions and occurrents of times, by little and little continued and augmented, beganne at length in the reigne of King Henry the third, and Edward the firſt, to ſhine foorth, who hauing now vanquiſhed the VVelch-men their Neighbours, and contending with the Scottes bordering vpon them, for Principalitie and Soueraignetie; entreating of all things concerning the Common-weale, with the three States of the Kingdome (which conſiſted of the Nobilitie, the Clergie, and the Comminaltie) they themſelues in their Royall Maieſtie ſitting in Parliaments, appoynted vnto euery man a preheminence, according to the place of his dignitie: from whom, eſpecially all the Nobilitie of our age, may ſeeme to deriue the diuerſe and appoynted degrees of Dignities and Honours.

A King. VVherefore a King, who may with vs bee alſo called a Monarch, hauing in himſelfe the ſupreame power, is of ſuch great Maieſtie, as that beſides GOD alone, hee hath none his Superiour. Who from Equitie and Iuſtice ſeeking his chiefeſt praiſe and commendation (when as any matter of greater weight or importance is to bee decreed and ſet downe, concerning the welfare and honour of the Common-weale) doth eyther make new Lawes, before conceiued by the three eſtates of the Kingdom, or elſe abrogateth the old; and free from all homage for his Empire, is with the ſacred ſolemnities of his Countrey, with a royall Crowne, by his ſubiects crowned, whom afterwards we with ſo great reuerence obſerue and honour, both in the time of peace, as alſo in the time of war, as that (forſomuch as hee himſelfe is the fountaine of all Nobilitie) he may for his onely pleaſure and good liking, bleſſe and grace whom hee will, with Offices, Dignities, Honour, Nobilitie, and Riches.

Amongſt the Nobilitie or Peeres of the Kingdome, the Prince is the chiefe, who is alwayes but one and himſelfe alone, for hee is to be deemed the Kings eldeſt ſonne, or heire apparant of the Kingdome, and hath of long beene graced with the Title of the Prince of Wales. The Prince of Wales. The Kings ſonnes in auncient times, before the comming in of the Normans, were wont to be called Ethilings, that is to ſay, Clytons, (as more Noble than the reſt, whom they in Latine called Inclyti, or Noble) as Edgar Clyto, Alured Clyto, and others. Our Princes of Wales are now with vs, the ſame that the deſigned Cæſars were among the ancient Romans, as who ſhould ſay, heires of the Imperiall Maieſtie; and whereupon at this day, the Germans appoint him which ſhall be emperor, King of the Romans, and the French ſtile him that is to ſucceed in the Kingdome, the Dolphin: but the Spaniards, together with vs, call him which is to haue the kingdome after the death of the king his father, The Prince, or Infant.

The firſt that was by this name called after the coming in of the Normans, was Edward, the eldeſt ſon of King Henry the third, who (his Father Henry being dead) and hauing there vanquiſhed Leolin, was the firſt that vnited the Principalitie of Wales vnto the kingdome of England: vnto whom alſo, Iohn the Scot earle of Cheſter, being dead without heyres male (other lands and reuenues being aſſigned vnto the ſiſters of the aforeſaid Earle) the king his Father had giuen the ſame countie. The firſt Prince of Wales.

At length King Edward the third gaue vnto Edward his eldeſt ſonne (a moſt famous and renowned warriour) then then Prince of Wales and Earle of Chester, the Countie of Cornewall also, which hee then had made a Dukedome: and by this meanes it is come to passe, that afterwardes our Kings eldest sonnes or heyres, were by the Kings royall Charter, with great solemnitie in full Parliament, created Princes of Wales, and Earles of Chester, (with the Countie of Flint, which belongeth vnto the Dignitie of the Sword of the Countie of Chester) but are called Dukes of Cornewall, euen from the first houre of their Natiuitie.

They which are accounted of the Nobility after the Princes of Wales, we call Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons. Aboue which, if I shall also place the most famous Fellowshippe of Knights, of our (by farre) the most honorable order, taking name of the Garter, I not shal haply seem to haue done amis: forasmuch as it maketh Knights, and sometime them of the Lesser Nobility, (excelling others in vertue and valour) almost equall, not onely vnto Noble-men at home with vs, but euen with Kings and Emperours abroad. But of them we are else-where to speake.

A Duke. All these Noblemen (I say) in the beginning to haue beene Generalles and Leaders of Armies, or Gouernours of Countries, it is before declared. But afterward, as pleased the Emperours, to haue beene giuen them for terme of life: and at length strengthened with lands and fees, we see them to haue obtained a certayne hereditary perpetuity: wherefore, a Duke, who in ancient time was, as it were, the Constable of the Kingdome, and whose chiefe seruice was, to leade and conduct the Kings Armie in time of warre, now graced with Fees, and once authorised by the King, is become an hereditarie Title. Our Kings discended of the Norman blood, so long as they themselues were Dukes of Normandie, graced no man with this Title of Duke, till Edward the Third; who first of all (as is before sayd) exalted the County of Cornewall into a Dukedome: vnto the example whereof, many hereditarie Dukes were in like manner by our Kings created, howbeit that at this day we haue none.

A Marquesse. Next vnto Dukes in order follow Marquesses, who in ancient time were called Gouernours or Wardens of the borders or Marches: a Title vnto vs, before the time of King Richard the Second, vterly vnknowne, who in the tenth yeare of his reigne, by his Royall Charter first created Robert Vere earle of Oxford (his Minion) Marques of Dublin the Metropoliticall Cittie of Ireland. By which example, many others afterwards obtayned the like Creations by Inheritance.

An Earle. Concerning either the etymologie or the office of an Earle amongst the Auncients, I haue else-where briefly touched some things, and leaue the same to bee more at large by others entreated of. Earles with vs, haue alwayes beene both of greatest authority and dignity, and of much greater antiquitie then either Marquesses or Dukes.

Neyther is it any let at all, but that an Earle may be called Earle of any County or place, from whence he receiueth no profit, neyther therein holdeth any iurisdiction. Indeed it is in antient Charters, declared them in old time to haue beene Feed-men, and to haue beene rewarded with the third penny of the profit of that Prouince wherof they were called Earles; but now the maner is with vs, that the Titles of Earledomes, are according vnto the Kings pleasure conferred and bestowed, without any possession of the places at al: vnto whom, the King, in stead of the third Penny, is wont to appoynt a certaine summe of money, to be yearely receiued out of the Exchequer, or his Customes: as wee will heereafter more at large declare.

A Vicount. Concerning the beginning of a Vicount with vs, there is no cause why I should from farre deriue it; forasmuch as we had none of them before the time of King Henry the sixt. For he in the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, created Iohn de Bellomonte, or Beaumont, a Vicount: Whereupon that which in ancient time was the name of an office, we now at this day do acknowledge it bee a certayne name and Title of Dignitie, as it were in the middest, betweene an Earle and a Baron; as wee doe a Marquesse; betweene a Duke and an Earle. This Degree of Nobilitie hath inuestiture from the Kings themselues, with certain solemne ceremonies, as the other degrees of Nobility haue.

A Baron.

Now the laſt of all, aſwell in order as ſpecially in dignity, come foorth the Barons, whoſe conioyned power, compared with the reſt, hath in the great affaires of the Common-weale alwayes beene the greateſt. Of whoſe beginning, yet truth it ſelfe doubtfully wauereth. Lucas de Penna in L. fi. C. de mancipijs, in his 16. book ſayeth. Quòd Reges cùm plures haberent filios nec omnes Reges poſſe fieri (quòd regnum diuidi nequeat) proſpicerent: ampla cuique donabant Caſtra cum iuriſdictione & Imperio, vnde Barones dicerentur, id eſt, filij alijs excelſiores. For that Kings when they had many ſonnes, which they well ſaw could not all be made Kings (for that a kingdom cannot be diuided) they gaue vnto euery one of them great Caſtles, with iuriſdiction and command, whereof they ſhould be called Barons (that is to ſay) Their ſonnes, higher in degree then others. Otherſome will haue the word Baro, to haue beene deriued from the Greeke word Βαρυς, ſignifying grauity. But if it may be lawfull for vs with coniectures to contend, I deeme it not amiſſe, heereunto to ioyne the curious conceite and iudgment of a certaine moſt learned man, and of great reading, who marking the great power and authority of Barons, ſuppoſeth them in the beginning to haue beene the Generals or Leaders of Nations & people, diſperſedly roaming and ſtragling vp and downe without any certaine reſting places, after the empire was rent in ſunder, who equally diuiding the lands by force or leaue by them gotten, as it were by tutelary law gouerned the people, holding of them in fealty, and ſubiect to euery one of their iuriſdictions, eyther with a meere ſoueraignty apart, as Monarchs, or vnder ſome other common Prince.

Whereof, Baldus happily hath called a man of greateſt, middle, and meaneſt authority and command, Baronem, or a Baron. But they which were ſo in power and authority in a manner like and equal, were before in Latine called Pares homines (or like men) but of the Frenchmen and Italians, (ſpeaking more contractly) parhommes, and parhuomini, and thereof they might, ſaith he, bee called Barom and Barons: for with a more eaſie pronounciation, they in their words eaſily admit b for p. And to giue more credite to this matter, he ioyneth thereunto the force of diuers Languages. For they whom the Frenchmen from the beginning, called Barons, we in the ſame ſence in ancient time, called Thaini, and at this day in engliſh, Lordes, whom the Germanes, as it were by a circumlocution, doe more fitly call Free-heren, which with vs truely ſignifieth Free Lordes; that is to ſay, Lords hauing free iuriſdictions and territories. But from whence this very word Lord is ſprung (which is not ſo much peculiar vnto Barons as to all Noblemen in generall) remaineth yet doubtfull.

Thaini.

A Lord.

Foraſmuch as we after our manner and faſhion, are wont to call all Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, and Vicounts, (and ſome of the greateſt Officers and Magiſtrates of the kingdome alſo, although they bee not Barons) after the manner of Barons, Lordes: ſome ſay it to be a primitiue & originall word of it ſelfe, ſprung out of the Saxon word Hlaford, which is interpreted Lord: Otherſome alſo, ſuſpect it to haue bene a deriuatiue word, and to haue bene firſt brought out of Burgundy: for it is manifeſt, the emperour Probus to haue ſent hither into Brittaine the Burgundians, whom he had ouercome in the yeare 282. Who hauing heere ſeated and ſetled themſelues, did vnto the Romanes right good ſeruice, if at any time rebelliō did ariſe or was ſtirred vp againſt them. And in that place they commonly call it Allodium, which ſignifieth, Free and diſcharged from all homage and ſeruice: which manner of poſſeſſour or owner, is euen at this day called Allodius: whom we, reſting almoſt vpon the ſame reaſon, do in engliſh call, A Lord. Contrary vnto thoſe Allodij or Lords, are the Leudes or Leudi, as ſubiect vnto the Allodij, wher of perhaps the word Layrdes is vſed amongſt the Scots, whom they with vs call alſo Lords.

Hlaford in the Saxon tongue, in Engliſh Lord.

A Layrde.

But as concerning words and etymologies, let euery mā gheſſe as he liſt: howſoeuer the names be deemed of, it is for the moſt part of all men granted, that Free-heren or Lords (call them whether you liſt) to haue in all places liued as Free-borne men, and of great eſteeme, & I verily think them to haue bene the ſame, whom Cæſar calleth Regulos in France: where euen yet vnto this day, certaine of the moſt olde and ancient Barons, are reported ported and reputed by a certaine right of their Baronies, to contend for precedence with the new Earles. But how full of authority and dignity the name of a Baron and of a Baronage is, shall very plainly & easily appeare, if wee shall eyther respect the antiquity thereof, as they which of ancient time had hereditary Iurisdiction annexed vnto their honour and dignity, and whereof wee at this day retaine a shew in our Lords courts, commonly called a court Baron: or looke into the most honourable and reuerend prerogatiue of thē in the cheefest assemblies of the kingdome. For all Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, and Vicounts, haue their seates with the Barons, in the highest assembly of the kingdome, in Parliament, onely by the name of their Baronies; Insomuch, that the greatest Duke sitting in Parliament (although he be placed according to the preheminence of his degree) yet holdeth he his place only by reason of his Barony: neyther is it for any other reason granted vnto our Archbishoppes and Bishoppes (as it was in auncient time vnto some Abbots and other of like sort) to sitte there, but that they haue the possession and dignity of some Baronage or Barony annexed and ioyned vnto theyr Bishopprickes; yea, the eldest Sonne of a Duke whosoeuer, although he be commonly called an Earle, as also the eldest sonne of an earle, although by the flatterie of custome, and in respect of his blood he be called in Latine Dinasta or Dominus in French Signeur, and after our manner, a Lord, yet if wee shall consider the force of the Law, they are not to be numbred either amongst the earles or the Barons, but only to be accounted Esquires; neyther can they challenge any voyce or suffrage in the Parliaments of the Kingdome, so long as their Fathers liue. Howbeit, wee haue it often in experience (I confesse) that as often as the King shal see the eldest sonne or heyre of a Duke, Marquesse, or of an Earle, as well in wisedome and councell, as of yeeres ripe and stayed, and whom he shall deeme worthie to bee present at the greatest assemblies of Parliament, him he promoteth vnto the height of that honour: and by a VVritte of Summons (as they terme it) his Father yet being aliue, according to the name & stile (if he be the sonne of a Duke) of his Barony, or if he bee the sonne of a Marquesse, or of an Earle, by the name wherof he was before called, and whereof hee was heire apparant, and into the inuestiture whereof his father also before came.

This I say, sometime is done, and may be done, by the fauour of the Prince onely, whose prerogatiue is so indeterminate as that he may promote vnto honors, and admit into Parliaments whom hee pleaseth. As for example; it pleased our deceased Queen Elizabeth, in the year 1575. by her Writ of Summons, so to call William Poulet, Baron S. John of Basing, at this day Marquesse of Winchester, (viz:) the eldest sonne of Iohn Poulet, Marquesse of Winchester, and to assigne vnto him a place amongest the Noblemen of the Vpperhouse, due vnto the ancient Barons of S. Iohn, vntill that their heires male fayling, the heire generall of the same family, had married with the stocke of the Poulets. This I say, the Queene might doe by her royall prerogatiue onely, the age and towardlinesse of the young Baron being respected and looked into, which he could no way by right haue challenged, his Father yet liuing.

Henrie Stanley, Earle of Darby, was by Writ of Summons called vnto Parliament, his father yet liuing, by the name of Baron Strange of Knokin, and placed in the same seate wherein the Barons Strange of Knokin were wont of ancient time to sit. The like we now of late haue also seene to haue bene done to Gilbert Lord Talbot (at this day Earle of Shrewsburie) sonne and heire to George earle of Shrewsburie, but of late deceased: which places they could not by prescript forme of law as yet challenge vnto them, for that theyr Fathers then aliue, possessed both the dignities & reuennewes of the aforesaid Baronies. So that I say, they were onely by the fauor of the Prince promoted vnto such honour and degree, whilest that their fathers yet liued.

For wee rightly acknowledge no Barons, but them whom the Kings Royall Maiestie hath first by his Charter created, or else the Parliaments preheminence & dignity designed; who so called and once admitted, and in Parliament placed, are alwaies after to bee held and accounted Barons, and to be reckoned amongst the Nobility of the Baronage of England, neither doeth it any where appeare, anie of them to haue bene afterwards reiected or degraded, except by chance their possessions were so far diminished, as that they were by no meanes able to maintayne so great an honour. For, as in ancient time the Romane Senatours, which had wasted or decayed their Senators substance were out of Senate remooued; euen so (I say) such are either of their own accord to abstain from comming into the vpper house of our Parliament, or else (I may say perhaps) are not thereinto admitted, althogh that they for euer still retaine the stile and name of their Barony.

For that vnto mē infamous the gate of honor, are no wher open, so things which are once granted vnto any man by the Prince, are not to bee again returned vnto his losse or disgrace.

And these be they whom we acknowledge to be Named Noblemen: But how they bee now amongst themselues together, and seuerally apart, both in dignitie and preheminence distinguished, is out of the forme of their Creations or admissions to be better discerned: which things we will declare by the Letters Patents, or of Summons, giuen vnto euery one of them at the time of their Creation, (which Letters, we by two names call, viz: Royall Charters, and Parliament Writs) and by the ceremonies after our manner, ioyned into their Inuestiture, and the custome of their precedency; beginning first with the Baron himselfe.

For why, the name of the Baronage of England is right famous, and more honorable then the rest: resembling the ancient shew of a Reuerend Romane Father, registred to be one of ỹ counsell of estate, & of the Senatory Dignity; and with vs giuing an entrance vnto all the higher degrees of honor, as did that among the ancient Romanes.

In elder time, it was for a certain space giuen vnto none, but vnto men for their martial prowesse renowned, vnto whom the ensigne of a Barony was also giuen; as was the right to weare a Ring of Gold granted vnto the Romane Gentlemen. But afterward, not onely they whom martiall prowesse had commended, but euen they also whom their Nobility of birth, theyr manners, fortune, or wisedome hadde at home ennobled, were wont by the Kings Writ of Summons, to be called forth vnto the high assembly of Parliament. And at length also, King Henrie the 6. brought in the fashion to create some by this very name, by vertue of his Royall Charter: which manner of forme and fashion, together with that other of calling by Writ of Summons vnto the Parliament, we onely at this day haue in vse, in forme following.

Letters of Summons, or Parliament Writs (as they call them) for the promoting of any one, or of whomsoeuer, vnto the Dignity of a Baron, in ful Assembly of Parliament, are in a prescript appointed forme in this sort made: Changing onely such things as are of order to be changed.

ELIZABETH, by the Grace of God, Queene of England, France, and Ireland, Defendresse of the Faith, &c. vnto her faithfull and wel-beloued Henry Norris of Ricot Knight, Greeting. Forasmuch, as Wee by the aduice and consent of our Councell, for certaine high and vrgent causes, concerning the estate & defence of our kingdome of England, and of the English Church, haue appointed a certain Parliament of ours, to be holden at our Citie of VVestmonastery, the eight day of May, next comming, and there to haue speech and conference with you, and with the Prelates, the States, and Nobilty of our sayde Kingdome: Wee firmely enioyne & command you, vpon the Faith and Allegeance wherein you are vnto Vs bound, that the waight of the aforesaide businesses, and the imminent dangers considered, all excuse whatsoeuer set apart, you be there personally present the day and place aforesaide, to conferre with Vs, & with our Prelates and Nobility aforesaide, concerning the aforesaid businesses, & there to shew your aduice. And of this, as you loue Vs, and honour the safegard & defence of Our Kingdome, and the Church aforesaid, and the good dispatch of the affairs aforesaid, in no wise faile you.

Witnesse Our selfe, the day of in the yeare of Our reigne the fourteenth.

Another manner there is of creating of Barons by Charter: whereof this is the forme.

The Letters patents whereby Sir William Cicill Knight, was by Queene Elizabeth made Baron of Burghley.

ELIZABETH by the Grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, *Queen, Defendresse of the Faith, &c. And that he the sayde William and his heires male aforesaid, shall successiuely in all things, be holde for Barons of Burghley: and shall so be vsed and reputed, & that euery one of them shal be vsed, holden, and reputed, as Barons. And that the saide William, and his heires male aforesaid, may haue, hold, and possesse, and their heires male also aforesaid, and euery one of them may as Barons, haue, hold, and possesse a seate, place, and voice in our Parliaments and Councels, amongst other Barons, within our kingdome of England. And also the saide William, and his heires male aforesaid, may haue, enioy, and vse, and euery one of them, shall by the name of the Baron of Burghley, *haue, enioy, & vse, all the Rights, Priuiledges, Preheminences, and Immunities, of right, and lawfully belonging vnto the state of a Baron in all things; which other the Barons of our said Kingdome of England, in former times, in better sort, more honourably and more quietly, vsed and enioyed, or at this present doe enioy and vse: and this without any fine or fee, great or small, to bee therefore to our vse in any wise giuen, paide, or made, into our Hanapery of our Chancery, or elsewhere, for that expresse mention of the certainty of the premisses or of any of them, &c. These being witnesses. The Rites and Ceremonies vſed in Creating Barons by Charter.

William Cicill Knight, attired in a robe and Mantle, and in this forme brought foorth, the xv. day of Februarie, the xiii. yeare of the reigne of Queene Elizabeth, was in the royall Palace at Weſtmonaſtery, in a great aſſembly of Courtiers, made Baron of Burghley. Firſt, the Heralds go before, by two and two together, whom Garter alone followeth, carrying in his handes the Royall Charter; Henry Cary, Baron of Hunſdon, carried the Barons Cloake: after whome followd William Cecill Knight, in the middeſt, betwixt Edward Baron Clinton, on the right hand, and William Brooke Baron Cobham on the left: who entering into the Chamber of Salutation (which wee commonly call the Preſence Chamber) & making there obeyſance thrice, approached vnto her royall Maieſty; where Garter firſt deliuered the Charter to the Earle of Suſſex, then being Chamberlain of the Queenes houſe, who gaue the ſame vnto the Queene, and ſhe againe deliuered the ſame vnto Iohn Wolley Eſquire, to be read: VVhere, at the word (Inueſtiuimus, or we haue inueſted) the Queen put vpon him the Barons Cloake; and the Charter being read, pronounced him the ſayde William Cicill, Baron of Burghley, and his heyres male after him, as is before declared.

VVhich thing being done, the charter was againe deliuered vnto the Queene, who forthwith gaue it to the Baron to be kepte; who at length, after moſt great thankes giuen her, for the honour by him receiued, in his honourable attire, with a great noiſe and ſound of Trumpets, departed to dinner, euen in the ſame maner that he came in.

After mid dinner, Garter with the reſt of the Queenes Heralds, comming neere vnto the Table, and hauing firſt altogether cryed alowd, Largeſſe; forthwith proclaimed the Queens ſtile in Latine, French and Engliſh, and ſo with-drawing themſelues a little farther off, and againe repeating Largeſſe, he repeated the ſtyle of the new Baron in theſe words: Du treſnoble Seigneur Guliaulme Cicil Cheualier, Baron de Burghley: and ſo hauing done their obeyſance, and altogether crying twice Largeſſe, they departed.

The manner and forme of admitting of Barons by Reſcript or Writ.

THis (I ſay) is the manner of creating of the Named Nobility, by royall Charters: now a fewe things remaine, to ſhew how the newe Barons are by VVrits of Summons choſen into the Parliaments: and in what ſort they being thether called, are there placed. The forme of the writ wee haue before ſhewed, and the forme of theyr Admiſſion, is this.

Henry Compton, Henry Cheyney, & Henry Norreis Knights, were by writs, called to be preſent at the Parlement at Weſtmonaſtery, vpon Thurſday the 8. day of May, in the 14. yeare of the reigne of Q. Elizabeth, vpon which day, after that the Nobles were ſet on their ſeats, theſe three attending without, were by turnes in this maner brought in, and admitted into the vpper houſe. Garter K. at Armes, came before bare-headed, hauing on his royall coat, whom two of the laſt made Barons, attyred in their Cloaks, robes, and Mantles followed, bringing in the knight that was to be in his new honour inueſted, in the middle betwixt them. Him at length they bring vnto the Chancellor, vnto whome the Knight hauing made once or twice Obeyſance, deliuereth his Writ of Summons mons to be read, wherein he declareth by what power & authority he is come thether: the Chancellor after the writ read with great courteſie welcomming him, diſm iſſeth the new Baron (in his Barons attire) to take his place, which place (Garter going before them) they ſhewe vnto him: but the writ is by the Chancellour deliuered vnto the Clearke of the Parliament to be laid vp.

In the like manner were the other two Knights afterward brought in and admitted, and in their due order in their ſeates placed. So they which entred into the Parliament but Knights onely, goe out thence and are ſo accounted Barons, and enioy the like honor with the reſt of the Barons of the kingdome.

CHAP. VII.

The Kings Charter for the Creating of a Vicount.

The Copy of the L. Patents of K. Henrie the VI. creating Io. Beaumont, vicount of Beaumont.

HEnry, by the grace of God, King of England, and of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. To all Arch-Byshops, Byshops, Abbots, Pryors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Sheriffes, Gouernors, Bayliffes, Ministers, and other his faithfull Subiects, vnto whome, &c. Greeting. Know you, that we, when as wee see it to beseeme our Maiestie, with principall honors to promote them, who with dutifull seruice dayly attend vs, especially in such things which proceed from our meere Prerogatiue & gracious bounty; and them chiefely, whom the remembrance of their fathers and former Ancestors hath ennobled, and the merites of their owne vertues haue with manifest obedience and loyalty graced: that vertue so rewarded, may in it selfe be strengthened, and withall allure many vnto vertuous actions.

Heereof it is, that wee considering the Noble discent of our most dearely beloued cosine Iohn Lord of Beaumont, & the good seruices which his Ancestors faithfully performed vnto our Progenitours, together with the most acceptable Offices which he euen from his infancy, hath hitherto commendably done vnto vs, and yet dayly performeth; as he desireth hereafter to continue the same, and to doe vs so much the more better honour: VVee of our especiall Grace, in this our present Parliament, giue vnto the aforesaid Iohn Lord of Beaumont our cosine, and the heires male of his bodie, the name of the Vicount of Beaumont; and do really inuest him the saide Iohn, with the Armes of the Vicount of Beaumont, and assigne vnto him in our Parliaments, Councels, and other assemblies, a place aboue all the other Barons in our Kingdome. Vnto whom as it shall be more fit, and as it is shewed in the very State of a Vicount aforesayde, wee of our meere motion and bountie, haue giuen and graunted for vs and our heyres, as much as in vs is, vnto the aforesaide Iohn and his heyres, together with the Name, Armes, and place aforesaide, twentie Markes to be yearly receiued vnto him, and to his heires male yssuing out of his owne body, out of the former issues and profits, of our countie of Lincolne, to bee paid by the hands of the Sheriffe of the sayde county for the time beeing, at the Tearmes of Easter and S. Michaell, by equall portions. To haue & to hold to him and his heires aforesaid, the Name, armes, place, and twenty Marks as aforesaide for euer; for that expresse mention, &c. VVitnesse our selfe at Redding, the twelfth of February, in the eighteenth yeare of our reigne.

By the Writ of our Priuate Seale.

HEre is so great a similitude and likenesse in the Rites and ceremonies in creating of a Vicount, vvith those which are vsed in the creating of a Baron, as that but chaunging such things as are of necessity to be changed, a man would thinke them almost the very same. But this difference there onely is; that a Baron is conducted betwixt two Barons, whereas a Vicount hath an Earle on his right hand, and a Baron on his left (in case there want Vicounts) to conduct him, and is by halfe a gard vpon his shoulder aboue a Baron, as by the Picture following in the next Page appeareth.

The rites and ceremonies of creating a Vicount.

VICE-COMES

CHAP. XIII.

¶ The Royall Charter for the creating of an Earle.

The Copie of the Letters patents of Q. Elizabeth, creating Walter Deuereux earle of Essex.

ELizabeth, by the grace of God, Queene of England, France, and Ireland, Defendresse of the faith, &c. Vnto all and singular Archbishops, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, Bishops, Barons, and all others, vnto whom &c. Greeting. Seeing that they whom the Diuine prouidence hath put and placed in a Monarchy and Royall Seate, that they being as it were the Lieutenants of him that heauenly Monarch, vpon earth, may well, vprightly, religiously, decently, and wholesomly rule, gouerne and maintaine, whatsoeuer is to their custody and gouernment by God himselfe giuen and committed: and that the Monarchs in their Monarchies, represent the same thing that the eyes do in the body, whose office it is to direct all the members of the body: Monarchs and Princes therefore as eies of the Commonweale, ought diligently to intend, to looke about, and to search into all States and degrees of their Empire, without which wee must needes confesse, no ciuill administration, or politicall gouernement, to be possibly made or framed. And so necessary is the preseruation of orders and degrees of men in great Empires, as that after they once see the Nobility of the States and Degrees, broken, rent, impaired, or shaken, or (as many things happen after the maner of men) by death afflicted or weakned, they ought with all speed to amend, repaire, increase, and augment the same: so that others, whom both their owne vertues, and the glory of their Stocke and Ancestors hath ennobled, being called vnto Nobilitie and honour, the glorie of Degrees and States may for euer in the glorie and brightnesse thereof bee preserued and kept. Wherefore wee now seeing one honourable and glorious order of Nobilitie amongest the rest to growe few; and knowing right well our most famous and renowned Cosin Walter Vicount Hereford, Knight of our most Noble order of the Garter, Lord Ferrers of Chartley, worthily and valiantly to haue for vs behaued himselfe in that seditious tumult of wicked Traytors and Rebells, raised of most wicked and vngracious men in the North parts of our kingdom: In which tumult and power of armed Traytors, a most great and horrible danger was, not vnto our Kingdome onely, but euen vnto our person also intended: so that partly by his conduct, not onelie the cruell furie and rage of the Traytours and Rebells, was there in that place represſed, but many of the Rebels also were vnto our obedience reduced, and so the state of our Kingdome before sore troubled, became againe to be well quieted and pacified.

Wee therefore, for these causes and things by him so worthily perfourmed, willing to promote him the sayde Walter vnto the State, Honour and Dignitie, of the Earle of Essex: and for that the aforesaide Walter is descended of the Noble Stocke and Family of the Bourchiers, late Earles of Essex, & is by the common Law of our Kingdome, next heire vnto Henry Bourchier late Earle of Essex. Know you, that wee of our especiall grace, certaine knowledge, & meere motion, haue erected, created & promoted the said Walter to be Earle of Essex; and also to the state, degree, dignity and honour of the Earle of Essex: and by the Tenour of these presents, do erect, create, and promote him to be Earle of Essex. And vnto the same Walter haue imposed, giuen, and bestowed the name, stile, and title of the Earle of Essex; and by these presents, do impose, giue, and bestow the same. And him the said Walter, in such the state, title, honour, and dignity of the Earle of Essex, By the girting vnto him of a Sword, and the putting on of a Cap of Honour, and a Coronet of Gold, do grace, inuest, and really ennoble by these presents. To haue and to hold the state, degree, dignitie, stile, title, name, and honour of the Earle of Essex aforesaid, with all and singuler the præeminences, honours, and other such things whatsoeuer vnto the state of an Earle appertayning or belonging, vnto the aforesayd Walter, and the heires male issuing from his bodie for euer. Willing, and by these presents, graunting for vs, our heires, heires & ſucceſſors, that the ſaid Walter, and his heires male aforeſaid, ſhall the name, ſtate, degree, dignity, ſtile, and honor aforeſaid, ſucceſſiuely haue & beare: and ſhall by the name of the Earle of Eſſex aforeſayd, be called, and ſtiled, and euery one of them ſhall be called & ſtiled. And that the ſaid Walter and his heires aforeſayd, ſhall in all things ſucceſſiuely be holden, vſed, and reputed, and euery one of them ſhall be holden, vſed, and reputed, as Earles of Eſſex. And the ſaid Walter and his heires male, ſhall haue, hold, and poſſeſſe, and euery one of them ſhall haue, holde, and poſſeſſe a place in our Parliaments, and in the Parliaments of our Heires and Succeſſours within our Kingdome of England, among the other earles, as earle of Eſſex; and in ſuch ſort, as the aforeſayde Henrie Bourchier, late earle of eſſex had, held, and poſſeſſed the ſame.

And the ſaid Walter alſo, and his heires aforeſayd, ſhall enioy and vſe, and euerie one of them by the name of the earle of eſſex, ſhall enioy and vſe all & euery the rights, priuileges, præeminences, and immunities in all things orderly and of right vnto the ſtate of an Earle belonging: and which other earles in al things, orderly & of right, haue before theſe times, in better wiſe more honourably and quietly vſed and enioyed, or do at this preſent enioy and vſe.

And for becauſe, that as the height of State and Honour encreaſeth, ſo greater charges and burdens neceſſarily encreaſe alſo: and that hee the ſayd Walter and his heires aforeſayd, and euery one of them may the better, more ſeemely, and honorably maintaine & ſupport the aforeſaide ſtate of the earle of Eſſex, and the burdens lying vppon him the ſaid Walter and his heires: We therfore of our more aboundant grace, haue giuen and granted, and by theſe preſents doe giue and graunt, for vs, our heires and ſucceſſors, vnto the aforeſaid Walter, and his heires aforeſaid, for euer, twenty pound of Fee, or yearely rent, to be yearely receiued, of the iſſues, profits, and reuenues, of our great and litle Cuſtome and Subſidie graunted vnto vs, or heereafter to be granted vnto vs, our heires and ſucceſſours, ariſing, growing, or comming, within the Port of our honorable Citie of London, by the hands of our Cuſtomers and Collectors, or the Cuſtomer and Collectors of our Heyres and Succeſſors there, for the time being, at the Tearmes of S. Michael, and Eaſter, by euen portions, to be euery year payed. By reaſon that expreſſe mention of the true yearely valour, or of any other valour or certainty of the premiſes, or of any of thē, or of any other gifts or grants by vs, or any of our Progenitors, before theſe times made vnto the aforeſaid Walter earle of eſſex, in theſe preſents appeareth not: or any Statute, Ordinance, Act, Prouiſion, Proclamation, or reſtriction to the contrary therof, before had, made, ſet forth, or prouided; or any other thing, cauſe, or matter whatſoeuer, in any thing notwithſtanding.

Theſe being VVitneſſes. Our faithfull Councellor, Nicholas Bacon knight, Keeper of our great Seale of england: and our moſt wel-beloued Coſins, Edward earle of Oxford, Lord Chamberlaine of england, Reinold earle of Kent, William earle of Worceſter, knight of the moſt Noble order of the Garter, Henry earle of Rutland, Thomas earle of Suſſex, of our aforeſaid order of the Garter knight, and Preſident of our Councell in the North parts of our kingdome of england: Henry earle of Huntingdon, of the aforeſaid Order, &c. Ambroſe earle of Warwicke, of the aforeſaide Order, &c. Edward earle of Hertford, Robert earle of Leiceſter, of the Order aforeſaid, &c. Thomas Vicount Bindon. And alſo the reuerend Fathers in Chriſt, Edmund Biſhop of Sarum, & Edmund Biſhop of Rocheſter, our Almner, And alſo our wel-beloued and faithfull, William Lord Howard of Effingham, Lord Chamberlaine of our Houſe, of the Order of the Garter aforeſaide, &c. William Lord of Burghley, our principall Secretary of the Order aforeſaid, &c. Henry Lord Strange, Arthur Lord Gray of Wilton, of the order aforeſaid: William Lord Sandes, Edward Lord Windſor, Thomas Lord Wharton, Robert Lord Rich, Thomas Lord Paget, John Lord Darcey of Chiche, Robert Lord North, Edmund Lord Chandos, of the aforeſaide Order of the Garter, &c. Thomas Lord of Buckhurſt, William Lord Deleware, Barons, Francis Knolles knight, Treaſurer of our Houſe, James Croftes, Knight, Controullor of our Houſe. ¶ The Rites and Ceremonies of creating of an Earle.

THe same Walter Deuereux, Baron Ferrers of Chartley, & Vicount Hereford, hauing on an inner Gowne of purple silke, and couered with a Roab of Estate, & a veluet Mantell of the same colour, and going in the middle betwixt the erle of Sussex on his right hand, and the earle of Huntingdon on his left, both of them in their Roabs was conducted from the Queens Chappell vnto the Queens presence. Next before him went the earle of Leicester, carrying a Cap of Estate, and a Coronet of Gold: & the earle of Bedford on the left hand, bearing before him a Sword, with the Hilts vpward. Before these also went Garter, the chiefe K. of Armes with the Charter alone, and before him al the rest of the Heralds, by two & two together. When they were now come vnto the Chamber of Presence, after they had thrice made their most lowe obeisance, with some little space betwixt, they drew neare vnto the Queene then sitting in her Chaire of Estate, where the aforesaid Walter kneeled downe, the rest standing by. There the Charter was first deliuered vnto the Queene, who gaue it to William Cicill, Baron of Burghley, who deliuered the same vnto William Cordell Knight, Maister of the Rolles, to reade it aloude. Where at these words (in the Charter) Gladio cinctu riauimus, the Queen put about his necke a Sword, hanging ouerthwart towards his left hand: and at the words Cappæ & Circuli aurei, she also put vpon his head a Cap, with a little Coronet. And afterward reading that which was left, pronounced him the said Walter before vicount Hereford, now created erle of Essex, for him and his heires male, as in the Charter it selfe before set down more at large appeareth. These things being done, the same Master of the Rolles (instead of the Secretary, for the helping of whom he had read the charter) deliuered it to the Earle of Oxford, Great Chamberlaine of England: but he deliuered it vnto the Queene, who also gaue the same vnto the Earle of Essex to be kept. But he after great thanks, with greatest humility giuen, withdrew himselfe aside amongst the other Noblemen standing there by, expecting another, comming to be created earle. In like maner, & at the sãe time also, Edward Baron of Clynton and Say, and Admirall of England, was for himselfe and his heyres male, created earle of Lincolne.

These things altogether finished, they departed in the same order that they came in, with the Trumpets aloud sounding, whom the Heralds receiued. Garter went before, whom the new Earles followed in the middle, betwixt the Earles of Sussex and Huntingdon. And being so attired in the Ornaments of their creations, were conducted to dinner into a dining Chamber prepared for the same purpose. Where, after they had sit a space, at the comming in of the second course, Garter with the rest of the Heralds entring into the dyning Chamber, crying aloud, Largesse; he alone proclaimed the Queens stile, first in Latine, after in Frẽch, and thirdly in english: and hauing twice repeated the word Largesse, & withdrawing themselues a little farther from the Table, proclaimed the stile of these last created Earles, in french and english in these words.

Know you, that foraſmuch as our Royall Maieſty, after moſt great victories obtained ouer our enemies, is by the power of Almightie God promoted vnto the Regall Dignitie, and our Hereditary Royall ſeate: and leſt that ſo great glorie of our Name, ſhould euen in the verie riſing thereof, for want of Children, faile, it came moſt happily to paſſe, that we were in lawfull matriage ioyned vnto our beſt beloued wife, Elizabeth, Queene of England, of whom we haue raiſed certaine more ſtrong ſtayes of our future Royall Poſterity, that is to ſay, Edward our eldeſt Sonne, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, and Earle of Cheſter; Richard Duke of Shrewsbury and of Yorke; with a notable encreaſe of other our Children alſo: which thing greatly both perſwadeth and enforceth vs, euen from our heart, to giue the greateſt thankes wee poſſibly can, vnto the moſt glorious and high GOD, Defender of our Royall right, and Reuenger of our wrongs; and with gracious fauours to proſecute, and with greater honour and fauour to grace and beautifie her the ſame our wife, hauing of vs beſt deſerued, and all her Progeny. But to the intent that our firſt begotten Sonne aforeſayd, and the reſt of our beſt beloued Children, compaſſed about with the faithfull, truſty, and ſure ſtrength of their neare and deare friends, as it were with certaine walles, may the more ſtrongly be defended; we will not paſſe ouer vnrewarded, Thomas Grey their Brother by the Mothers ſide; whoſe noble Stocke, exceeding towardlineſſe, worthy valour, but moſt of all, whoſe honourable vertues, we with the ſincere affection of loue embrace: for why it ſeemes a thing moſt certain, them being brought vp in naturall ſociety, and bound together with that ſweete remembrance, them to haue dwelt in the ſame dwelling place before they were borne, to beare a certaine common, and eſpecial loue amongſt themſelues for euer: and that they who in ſo ſtrait a degree of conſanguinity & loue are ioyned together, if any one of them ſhould bee of ſo ſmall dignity and reputation, as that for pouerty hee ſhould not be able honourably to ſerue his greater kinſman when he ought ſo to do: we thinke it not vnbeſeeming vs to prouide therefore, ſo as ſhall beſt ſeeme vs. And therefore we willing that the ſayde Thomas ſhould bee promoted with a greater patrimony, and more notable Titles of honour and dignity, that ſo he may ſtand in better ſtead, and become a greater Ornament vnto vs, our Children, and the Common-weale: of our ſpeciall grace, certaine knowledge, & meer motion, do ordaine, make, and create him the ſaid Thomas, to be Marqueſſe Dorſet: and alſo by theſe preſents vnto the ſaid Thomas, giue and grant, the ſtile, honor, ſtate, title and dignity of Marqueſſe Dorſet: and by the Girding vnto him of a Sword, and by the putting on of a Cap of Honour, do inueſt him of the ſtile, title, name and honour of Marqueſſe of the place aforeſaide; together with all the præeminences vnto the ſame honour and dignity appertaining and belonging. And alſo of our more plentifull grace we haue giuen and graunted, and by theſe preſents do giue and graunt vnto the aforeſaid Marqueſſe towardes the ſupportation of the ſayde name, ſtile, honour, ſtate, title and dignitie, 35. pounds of lawfull money of England. To be had, leuied & receiued yerely vnto the ſayd Marqueſſe, and the ſame his heires aforeſaid, (viz.) twenty pounds there-

After whom, the Noble Lady Mary, daughter to Thomas Duke of Norfolke, vpon hir left arme, carried a robe of eſtate of Crimſon Veluet, furred with Ermines, and in her right hand a Coronet of Gold. Her, the aforeſaide Anne followed, with her hayre looſe, and hanging down vpon hir ſhoulders, attired in her inner garment (which they call a Surcot) of Crimſon Veluet, lined with ermins alſo, with ſtraite ſleeues, going in the middeſt betwixt Elizabeth, Counteſſe of Rutland on her right hand; and Dorothy, Counteſſe of Suſſex on her left; whom many Noble Ladies & Gentlewomen followd. Greeting. Seeing that there is nothing which more becometh a Prince, then to ſhew himſelfe bountifull and liberall, eſpecially vnto ſuch as haue of him well deſerued, & good ſeruices vnto him performed: wee therefore reuoluing in our minde, with how many, how great & worthy ſeruices our moſt deare and well-beloued Vnkle Edward, earle of Hertford hath honoured vs: wee haue therefore thought him worthy, whom wee ſhould promote vnto an higher degree of honour and dignity: neyther can we but for ſuch his great deſerts towards vs, but in ſome part with due deſerts againe requite him. And that the ſame Edward and his heyres aforeſaid, if they ſhal chance to be Dukes of Somerſet, may the more honourably maintaine, and beare the ſtate and honour of the aforeſaide name of the Duke of Somerſet: and for want of ſuch iſſue, that then the heires male of the body of the ſaide Duke hereafter to bee begotten of the body of any wife, which he ſhal hereafter marry, may in like maner more honorably beare the ſtate and honour of the aforeſayd name of the Duke of Somerſet: we haue giuen and graunted, and by this our preſent

The Earles of Shrewsbury and of Oxford, going together, the Earle of Shrewsbury on the right hand, carried a Verge of gold, & the earle of Oxford on the left, carried the Dukes Cap, with a Coronet of gold. Next vnto whom followed the Earle of Arundell, carrying a Sword with the hilts vpward. At length the earle of Hertford himselfe was conducted in the midst, betwixt the Duke of Suffolke, and the Marquesse of Dorchester: When they in this manner, attired in their Robes of honour, were come into the Chamber of Salutation (which they commonly call The Presence Chamber) they after thrice obeysance made, went vnto the king, sitting in his chayre of Estate: where foorth-with the earle kneeled downe, all the rest standing about him, Garter king of Heralds, deliuered the Charter vnto Baron Paget, the Kings Secretary, who gaue the same vnto the King, and he deliuered it vnto him againe to be read aloud. And when hee came vnto the words Inuestiuimus, (or we we haue inuested) the king put a Dukes Mantle vpon the Earle: and at the words (Gladio cinctu rauimus) girt him with a Sword: at the words (cappæ & circuli aurei impositionem) the King himselfe in like manner with his owne hand put vppon his head a Cap with a Coronet of gold vpon it: and at length, at those wordes (virgæ aureæ traditionem) the King himselfe gaue into his hand, A verge of gold: which done, the Secretary read the rest, euen vnto the end of the Charter: wherin he pronounced him the saide earle of Hertford, to bee Duke of Somerset: at which time, the King forthwith gaue the Charter vnto the Duke to bee kept: who after thanks giuen vnto the Kings Maiestie for so great an honour and dignity receiued, in this sort attired, stood by the Chaire of Estate, whilst the Noble-men returned to bring in others, who were also to be created.

The Kings Charter for the creating of the Prince of Wales.

The Copy of the letters patents of king Henry the 6. creating Edward his first begotten Son Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester.

HENRY by the grace of God, King of England, and of France, Lord of Ireland, &c. To all Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Iustices, Vicounts, Gouernors, Ministers, and to all our Baliues, and faithfull Subiects, Greeting. Out of the excellency of Royall preheminence, like as beams from the Sun, so do inferior honours proceed: neyther doth the integrity of the royall luster and brightnesse, by the naturall disposition of the light, affoording light frō light, feele any losse or detriment by such borrowed light: yea, the Royall Scepter is also much the more extolled, and the Regall Throne exalted, by how much the more Nobles, Preheminences, and Honours are vnder the power and command thereof.

And this worthy consideration allureth and induceth vs, which desire the encrease of the Name and Honour of our first begotten and best beloued Sonne, Edward, in whom we behold and see our selues to bee honoured, and our royall house also, and our people subiect vnto vs; hoping by the grace of God (by coniecture taken of his gratious future proceeding to be the more honorably strengthened, that wee may with honour preuent, and with abundant grace prosecute him, who in reputation of vs, is deemed the same person with vs. VVherefore, by the Councell and consent of the Prelats, Dukes, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons of our kingdome, being in our present Parliament, we haue made and created, and by these presents make and create him the said Edward, Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester. And vnto the same Edward we giue and grant, and by this Charter haue confirmed, the Name, Stile, Title, State, Dignity, and the honour of the said Principality and County. And him of the said Principality and County, that hee may therein in gouerning rule, and in ruling, direct and defend, we by a Garland vpon his head, by a ring of gold vpon his finger, and a verge of gold, haue according vnto the manner inuested him. To haue and to hold the same vnto him and his heires, the Kings of England for euer. Wherefore, we will, and straightly command, for vs and our heires, that Edward our Sonne aforesaid, shall haue the Name, Stile, Title, State, Dignity, and Honour of the Principalitie of Wales, and of the County of Chester aforesaide, vnto him and his heyres the Kings of England aforesaide, for euer. These being witnesses. The reuerend Fathers, John, Cardinall and Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, our Chancellor, and William Arch-bishop of Yorke, Primat of England; Thomas Bishop of London, and William Bishop of Norwich: our most wel-beloued Cosins, Richard Duke of Yorke, and Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, our wel-beloued Cosins, Richard Earle of Warwicke, Richard Earle of Sarisbury, Iohn Earle of Wilshire, and our beloued and faithfull Raffe Cromwell, Chamberlain of our house, William Faulconbridge, and Iohn Stourton Knights. Dated at our Pallace of VVestminster, the XV. day of March, and in the yeare of our Reigne, XXXII.

By the King himselfe, and his Councell.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Crowning of the King.

Concerning Charters & Writs of Summons vnto Parliament, whereby the Kinges of England, onely vpon their good liking, & meere motion (as they vse to say) are wont to conferre Named Nobility, wee haue already spoken: and now at length we are come vnto the rites and Ceremonies of the Coronation of the Kinges themselues, as they are after our manner with vs Crowned. Concerning which, a few things are now to be saide.

NOthing assuredly is more excellent then the Royall dignity, if we shall respect the Maiesty of the name of a King, either among the nations or in holie Scriptures. The Romanes in ancient time, appointed three Degrees of their greatest Dignities, of all which, the Regall power was the cheefest and highest. Next after the dignity of a King was the Dictatorship; in the third place, followed the power which the Generall of their Armies had, whom they called Imperator. Hee that great Iulius Cæsar; when after the victory of Pharsalia, had beene oftentimes by his army saluted Imperator, yet for all that, vsed he not the name of Imperator, but Dictator. For why, the name of a King, after the time of Tarquinius, was for a great while growne into hatred, and become odious in the Citie. Howbeit, at such time as he was about to make an expedition against the Parthians, hee affected to bee called a King: affirming it to be contained in the Books of the Sybils, the Parthians not possible to bee conquered and subdued but by a King.

The Dictators most high power, was in all things like vnto the power of a King: and such as a man may say to haue bin equall vnto the power of a King. This was (as Varro witnesseth) chaunged into a great Magistrate, whom they called Magistrum Ciuium (or Master of the Citizens) which manner of Gouernour of a Citie, the Germaines vsed to call, Burgue Meistre.

The name of Imperator or Emperors, was at first but an Office in an Army, and a bare Title; which yet at length became a dignity of greater State and Maiestie, then any of the rest; and yet at length so fell, as that the Maiesty and magnificence of the Christian world, is maintained only by the power of Kings. Vnto foure of whom onely, it is written to haue beene proper in ancient time to bee annointed, viz. vnto the Kings of Ierusalem, of England, of France, and of Sicily.

The French writers report, the French Kings within the bounds of theyr owne kingdom, to be styled Imperatores or Emperors. Chassaneus also affirmeth, the king of England, to bee in England, a Monarke. And if the name of Christianissimi, or the most Christian king, bee glorious vnto the French kings, and the name of Catholici or Catholique vnto the kings of Spaine, the kinges of England haue also a style whereof to reioyce, as (viz:) not in Title, onely to be styled Fidei Christianæ & Catholicæ Defensores, or Defenders of the Christian and Catholique Faith, but euen vvith vndaunted Maiesty, to be of both acknoledged the great Champions and Protectors of the same. But concerning attributes or additions of Stiles and Titles, I list not for to striue. But, seeing that the kings of England for their royall dignity, giue God thankes onely; and that it is onely by the grace of God (as they vse to say) by hereditary succession, by them obtained: they hold it vnto them confirmed by the suffrages of the people, vvith the requisite forme and ceremonies of Coronation, Consecration, and Inunction. Which being of ancient time (the kingdome sore shaken with Danish wars) ofte kept at Kingston vppon Thames, is now vsually holden and made at Westmonastery, a city ioyning vnto the city of London, in forme following.

The

And in the ſaid proceſſion ſhall be ſung ſuch like Hymnes, as are accuſtomed to bee ſung in the reception of Kings and Queenes.

Item. The Croſſe, Sword, Scepter, and Royall Mace (enſignes of honour) ſhall be borne in the proceſſion, by the Abbot, Prior, and Senior Monks of Weſtminſter into the Pallace, and there ſhall they be ſurrendred to diuers of the Lords, to be borne before the King to the Church.

The Arch-biſhop ought to demand the good liking of the people.

After the King hath a little repoſed himſelfe in the Chaire or Throne erected vpon the Scaffold, then the arch-biſhoppe of Canterbury, ſhall goe vnto the foure ſquares of the Scaffold, & with a loud voyce, aske the good liking of the people, concerning the Coronation of the king: Meane while the king ſhal ſtand vp in his Throne, and turne himſelfe vnto the foure ſquares, in like manner, as the Archbiſhoppe ſpeaketh vnto the people. And after the ſaid demand, the Anthem Firmetur manus tua, &c. ſhall be ſung.

The Orffertory of the King.

The anthem being ended, the king ſhal deſcend from the Scaffold, vp to the high Altar, the Biſhops leading him: whereupon he is bound to offer a Mantle, & one pound of gold: therein fulfilling his commandement, who ſaid; Non apparebis vacuùs in conſpectu Dei tui.

The King proſtrateth himſelfe.

The Offering being finiſhed, the king boweth himſelfe vpon the Pauement, before the Altar, being before prepared by the Kings Officers, with cloaths and ſutable cuſhions of velvet, vntill the Arch-Biſhop hath ſaide ouer him the Prayer, Deus fidelium, &c. And then ought a Sermon to be preached vnto the people.

The King taketh his Oath.

The Sermon being ended, the king approcheth vnto the Altar to take his oath, which he ought to performe vpon the ſacrament of our Lords body. Then let the Hymne, Veni creator ſpiritus, be ſolemnly ſung. VVhich being begun, the King ſhal proſtrate himſelfe before the high Altar, vntill the Letany and Preface bee wholly ſung ouer him. Which being finiſhed, let the king ariſe and ſit in his chaire, therein repoſing himſelfe a while.

Then let him be annointed in fiue places, (viz.) in the palmes of his hands, on his breaſt, betweene his ſhoulders, on the blades of his armes, and on his head, with holy-oyle, in forme of a croſſe; and afterwards making the ſigne of the croſſe vpon his head with the Chriſme, the faſtenings and Mantle beeing firſt opened. Item, after the foreſaid Vnction, and wiping with linnen cloaths (which ought afterwards to bee burnt) let the opened places for the annointing, be cloſed again by the Abbot of Weſtminſter, or his Deputy.

The Abbot of Weſtminſter ſhall take off the Kings Cap.

After the annointing of the kings head, let it bee couered with a linnen Cap, becauſe of holy vnction, and ſo let it remain vntill the eight day after the vnction: vpon the which day, the Abbot of Weſtminſter or his Deputy, ſhall come vnto the king, and take off the aforeſaid linnen Cap, and ſhall waſh & mundifie the kings head. After the ſaid waſhing, the Abbot of VVeſtminſter, or his aſſignes, ſhall put vpon the King, royall habiliments, viz. a Sindon faſhioned after the Dalmatian faſhion, with hoſe and ſandals: and then let theſe royall Robes bee ſacred by the arch-Biſhop: as Patet in Libro.

The King ſhall be cloathed with a Mantle by the Abbot.

Theſe Offices being finiſhed, the aforeſaide king ſhall be arrayed by the Abbot of VVeſtminſter, or his aſſignes, with a long Cloake or Mantle, wouen with faire Imagery of gold, before and behind, with his Buskins, Pantofles, and Spurs fitted to his legge.

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ A briefe Description of the pompe and Ceremonies at the Coronation of Edward the sixt, King of England: according to the auncient manner, vsed in the Consecration of the Kings of England.

HEnrie the eight, the most inuincible K. of England, beeing dead, who departed out of this life at Westminster, the 28. day of Ianuary, 1546 and 38. of his reigne. Edward Seymour, erle of Hertford, King Edward his Vncle, accompanyed with most of the Nobilitie of the whole Kingdome, forthwith went to Enfield (in the Countie of Middlesex) vnto Edward, now at length (by right of succession vnto his Father Henry) King of England, France and Ireland. Whom the Munday following (viz.) the last of Ianuary, he with the great applause of the Cittie, and of the people by the way as hee went, was brought from thence vnto the Tower of London.

The same day the Heralds from an high Stage set vp in the middest of Westminster hall (with a great sound of Trumpets) out of a Royall Charter, sealed with the great Seale of the kingdome, proclaimed the death of the aforesaid king Henry the eight, and the Inauguration of K. Edward the sixt to come. Which Charter was dated the 31 day of Ianuarie, and the first yeare of King Edward.

Vpon Friday following (viz.) the 4. of February, it was through the most famous places of the Citty of London, by the Heralds proclamed and notified, that whosoeuer they were which by right of Fee, were bound at the Coronations of Kings, to performe their Offices or Seruices; should vnto the Kings Commissioners therefore appoynted, in the White hall, hall, the vij. of February exhibite their petitions: who according to the ancient custome of the kingdome, should determine vnto euerie man their rights and seruices, against the twentith of the same moneth, the day appointed for the Coronation of the King.

Vpon Thursday (which was the first day of February) the Nobility and States of the Kingdome assembled into the Chamber of Presence (as they call it) euery one of them in order one by one, did their reuerence and duety vnto the King, sitting in his Royall Seate, kissing his hand, and saying; Long liue the Kings Maiesty.

After that the Chancellour declared vnto him the Will of his dead Father, and the Names of his Executors: and that for lacke of yeares, he was not yet himselfe able to gouerne his Kingdome (for now hee was but going vppon the tenth yeare of his age) he told them, that the Earle of Hertford his Vncle, was by common suffrages chosen Tutor of his person, and Protector of his Kingdome. VVhich when the King had approoued, and that the erle refused not that charge, they altogether, and oftentimes doubled and redoubled; Long liue our King Edward: and, God saue our King.

The next day (viz.) vpon Friday, the Noble-men meeting together in the Starre-chamber, there bound themselues by Oath vnto the King: at which time and place also the Maister of the Rolles, and the chiefe Officers of the Chancerie, were sworne truely and sincerely to enrole the VVill and Testament of the aforesaid King Henrie the eight, being dead.

The Sunday following, the King by his Vncle the Protector, was after the accustomed maner made a knight, who by and by after with the same Ceremonies created the Maior of London, and certayne others, knights.

But vpon the Monday, the Commissioners hauing well considered of the matter, and hauing read the Suters Petitions on both sides, gaue sentence concerning Seruices, after the manner to be performed at the time of the Coronation; of which in their place and order more is to be hereafter said.

The VVednesday following, was wholly bestowed in the magnificent performing of the rites and ceremonies of the Funerall of King Henrie the eight. VVhich done, they entred into consultation concerning the Coronation of the new King. And first of all, for the greater solemnitie of the pompe, the Earle of Hertford was graced with the Title of the Duke of Somerset. At which time others also, with other honourable Titles, were with great solemnity honored also.

After dinner, the Knights of the Garter assembled together into the Kings Chamber, where the King attired in the ornaments of that Order sate (as of right he should, highest) and with ioyned voices, chose the Marquesse Dorset, the earle of Darbie, and others, into the fellowship of that Order.

At length, vpon Saturday (viz) the 19 day of February, the king with a most magnificent pompe, went through the middest of the Citty, from the Tower of London, vnto the Pallace at Westminster, the great Ordinance both out of the Tower, and the Shippes, on euerie side thundering.

In this order they came thorough the middeſt of the Citty vnto the Pallace at Weſtminſter: The Pageants in the meane time, with diuerſe ſhewes euery where ſet foorth, and the Orations made, &c. I for breuitie ſake purpoſely omit.
Vpon Sunday, the twentieth day of February, at nine of the clocke, the King was carried downe the Riuer, from the Pallace vnto the Hall at Weſtminſter, where firſt in the Chamber of the Court of Augmentation (which now is called the Court of Wardes) he attired himſelfe in a Roabe of Purple veluet, with a long trayne, furred with Ermins. His inner Gowne was of the ſame kind of veluet, furred with Mineuer, and fringed round about with Gold. Theſe were called Parliament Roabes, but vpon his head hee did weare a Cappe of blacke Veluet. The Noble-men in like manner alſo being attired in their Roabs of honor, attended vppon the Kings Maieſtie, from thence to the Marble Chaire ſet in

A Sword was alſo carried before in the Scabberd vndrawne, vnto which vpon the left hand was ioyned the Earle of Arundell, as Earle Marſhall in ſtead of the Protector.

The Duke of Somerſet Protector of the Kingdome, carried the Crowne, whoſe right ſide the Duke of Suffolke with a Globe and Croſſe of gold encloſed, & his left ſide the Marqueſſe Dorſet, with the Royall Scepter.

At length the Kings Maieſty went vnder a Thole or Canopy, which the Barons of the fiue Ports (by an ancient right) did beare; ſupported on the right hand by the Biſhop of Durham, and on the left by the Earle of Shrewsbury.

The Earle of Warwicke, as great Chamberlaine of England, held vp the Kings traine: whom the Marques of Northampton aſſiſted on the one ſide, and Baron Seymour of Sudley, Admirall of England, both of them of the Kings priuy Chamber.

The Gentlemen of the priuy Chamber.

The Noblemen of the kingdome, attyred in the Robes of honour, euery one of them according to his place and ancientneſſe: whom the Gentlemen Pentioners, the Captaine of the Guard, & the Yeomen of the Guard themſelues did follow.

The King in this order beeing brought to Saint Peters Church, was placed in the Chaire of Saint Edward the King, in the middeſt of a Throne, ſeuen ſteppes high. This Throne was erected neere vnto the Altar vpon a Stage, ariſing with ſteppes on both ſides, couered with Carpets and hangings of Arras. Where, after the King had reſted a little, being by certaine Noble Courtiers carryed in another Chaire vnto the foure ſides of the Stage: he was by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury declared vnto the people (ſtanding round about) both by Gods and Mans Lawes to be the right and lawfull King of England, France, and Ireland; and proclaimed that day to bee crowned, conſecrated, and annointed. Vnto whom he demanded, whether they would obey and ſerue, or not? By whom it was againe with a loud cry anſwered; God ſaue the King: And euer liue his Maieſty.

This being done, he was againe placed in the Chaire of the Throne, the Quier ſinging of an Anthem: The King from thence deſcending vnto the Altar, there offered his Cloake, and certaine Money, (viz.) XX. Shillings, and afterward lay downe flat before the Altar, the Arch-Biſhop ſaying certaine Prayers; as Deus fidelium, &c. And afterward in formall words, ſwore an oath vnto the King before fore the people.

There the king being againe prostrate, the Archbishop againe kneeling downe, beganne the Hymne Veni Creator spiritus &c. and said other Praiers ouer the King: two other Bishops beginning the Letany, which at length ended, the King arose and came againe vnto his throane: and from thence was brought to a retyring place (commonly called a Trauerse) where hauing put off all his former garments, hee was by the Chamberlaine of England apparrelled agayne with other, (viz.) a Crimson Coate, open vppon the backe and the breast, the shoulders and the elbowes, with a linnen Cappe vpon his head, wrought with gold. The Chancellour in the meane time, from the Stage proclaimed vnto the people the Kings generall pardon.

The King brought back againe out of the Trauerse vnto the throane, and from thence vnto the Altar, vnder a cloath of golde (the strings of his Coate and Shirt being opened) was by the Arch-bishop with formall praiers vnto God, vpon the Palmes of his hands, vpon his breast, betwixt his shoulders, in the ioynts of his Armes, and Crowne, with hallowed oile and chrisme annoynted; the Quire in the meane time singing the Antheme: Vnxerunt Salomonem, &c.

After this annoynting (the oyle being lightly wiped off) the openings of his coate and shirt were agayne by the archbishop cloased, who put vpon his hands a payre of Linnen Gloues, and a Linnen Cappe, (brought thither by the great Chamberlayne,) and so brought backe vnto the Trauerse, was with a Royall Roabe againe reuested.

At length returning againe vnto the Altar, hee there offered vp the Svvord wherewith hee was girt, to be afterwards with fiue pound in mony redeemed. The royall Ornaments were after that consecrated. The King sitting before the Altar, the Archbishop and the Protectour brought vnto him three Crownes.

The first was the Crowne of Saint Edward the King.

The second was the ancient Crowne of the Kings of England.

The third was of all the richest, made for that day, and for that purpose (and fit for the Kings head) which being all by turnes, with the great sounding of Trumpets, and the applause of the People, put vppon his head: the Quier also singing Te Deum laudamus, &c. The Archbishop put a Ring vppon the third finger of the Kings right hand, at which time hee was likewise by the Maister of the Iewells bedecked with Bracelets, and other most rich and most precious Iewells.

The Earle of Shrewsbury deliuered the Scepter into the Kings hand.

The Archbishop deliuered vnto him Saint Edward the Kings little Staffe.

The Earle of Rutland offered vnto him a paire of golden Spurres.

The Duke of Suffolke gaue vnto him the golden Globe.

The Earle of Oxford deliuered him the other Royalties.

Hee in this manner attired with all Royall Ornaments (viz.) apparrelled with a royall Roabe, and crowned with a Crowne vpon his head, carrying in his right hand a Scepter, and a golden Globe in his left, beeing brought vnto the Throane, hee sate downe in the Chaire of S. Edward the King. Where first the Duke of Sommerset Protector of England, vpon his knees in formall words did his due homage and fealty vnto the King and his heires, the kings of England: whom the Archbishoppe of Canterburie followed and kissed the Kings knee. The same againe did all the rest of the Nobility, which could so doe. But such as stoode about (and with the shortnesse of the time excluded, could not come nie) the Protectour vpon his knees pronouncing their homage, holding vp their hands, cryed out with loude voyces together; Long liue EDWARD the sixt our King.

Diuine seruice at length being done by the Archbishop and two Bishops, the King at the offering time came downe vnto the Altar, where in the patten of S. Edwards Chalice, he offered an hallowed little Crust or Cruet of Wine, and a pound of gold: and then hauing bowed downe his head, the Archbishop sayde certaine Prayers, and blessed the King, and so returning vnto his Throane, there kissed the Paxe being offered him.

Last of all, hee being brought vnto the Altar, the Archbishop taking the Crowne from off his head, layde it vpon the Altar. From thence the King going into the Trauers, deliuered his royall Ornaments vnto the Deane of Westminster to be layde vpon the Altar: and in his inner purple Gowne (commonly called a Surcoat) furred with Ermins, with a Crowne vpon his head, returning vnto Westminster Hall in the same order wee before saide; staued a while in that chamber (which we call the Court of Wardes) vntill the Tables were royally furnished. The stately furniture of the Hall at that time, the multitude of Tables, the varietie of dishes and sauces, and the delicate magnificence of the feast, I willingly passe ouer.

Crowne

Yet this it is worthy to remember, that the Earles of Oxford & Huntingdon held water vnto the King, which the Earle of Huntingdon before tasted.

The Earle of Rutland held the Towell.

The Marquesse of Northampton was the Caruer, & before tasted the Dishes.

The Earle of Sussex was Sewer of the first course, and placed it vpon the Table.

Before the coming in of the first course, the Marquesse Dorset at that time Constable of England, with a little siluer staffe (the signe of his office) and the Earle of Arundel with the rod of the Marshalship, mounted vpon trapped horses, al in cloth of gold came riding into the Hall.

Foure swords were all the dinner time carried before the King.

The Ambassadors of forraine Princes, the Bishops and Noble-men, the Maior of the Citty of London, the Barons of the fiue Ports, &c. were in their order set at Tables in the same Hall.

After the second course, the kings champion (surnamed Dimock) a knight in compleate Armour, mounted vppon a great Horse, couered with a Caparison of cloth of gold, and attended vpon with an Herald in his Coat of Armes, came into the Hall: who euen at the first, with a proud gate went vnto the King, and with great reuerence made to him his lowe obeysance. Afterward prauncing his carriering Horse, by a trumpet sounding foure times in the Hall, challenged to combate him whosoeuer he were, that should deny Edward the sixt of that name, to be the true, vndoubted, and lawfull King of England, France, and Ireland. And so often he cast downe his Gantlet vnto the ground, as a pledge of his challenge so made: which when no man would take vp, the Herald deliuered it vnto him againe: which done, the King did drinke vnto him in a Cup of gold, which he thankfully accepted, and challenging the Cup due vnto him as his Fee, so departed.

Last of all, Garter king of Armes, with the rest of the heralds, hauing made thrice obeysance before the King, all (aloud, in formall words proclaimed the kings stile, in Latine, French, and English, in this sort; Largesse, of the most Soueraigne, and most inuincible Prince and King, Edward the sixt, by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith: and of the Church of England and Ireland, next vnder Christ, in Earth supreame head: chiefe of the most Noble order and Knight-hood of the Garter. Which same stile, when he had in Latine and French, and so in three other places of the Hall beside repeated, they oftentimes altogether crying out aloud, Largesse, so departed.

A little before the ende of the Feast, the Maior of London (as the manner is) in a Cup of gold, gaue a Cuppe of spiced Wine (which we commonly call Ypocras) vnto the King to drinke; which after hee had tasted of, hee gaue the Cup vnto the Maior, as due vnto him for his fee.

The rest of the time was spent in creating of Knights of the Bath, and of other Knights, and in appointing of Iustings & Tiltings: All which, as not appertaining to my purpose, I omit; as also the variety of musique, the diuers kindes of shewes, & other things in number infinite, which wonderfully graced & set foorth the magnificence of this coronation: of all which things, let them say more at large, which saw eyther the same, or the pompe of the Coronation of the most Soueraigne Queene Elizabeth, with the wonderfull happinesse of her Reigne, and the applause and ioyfulnesse of the people on euery side.

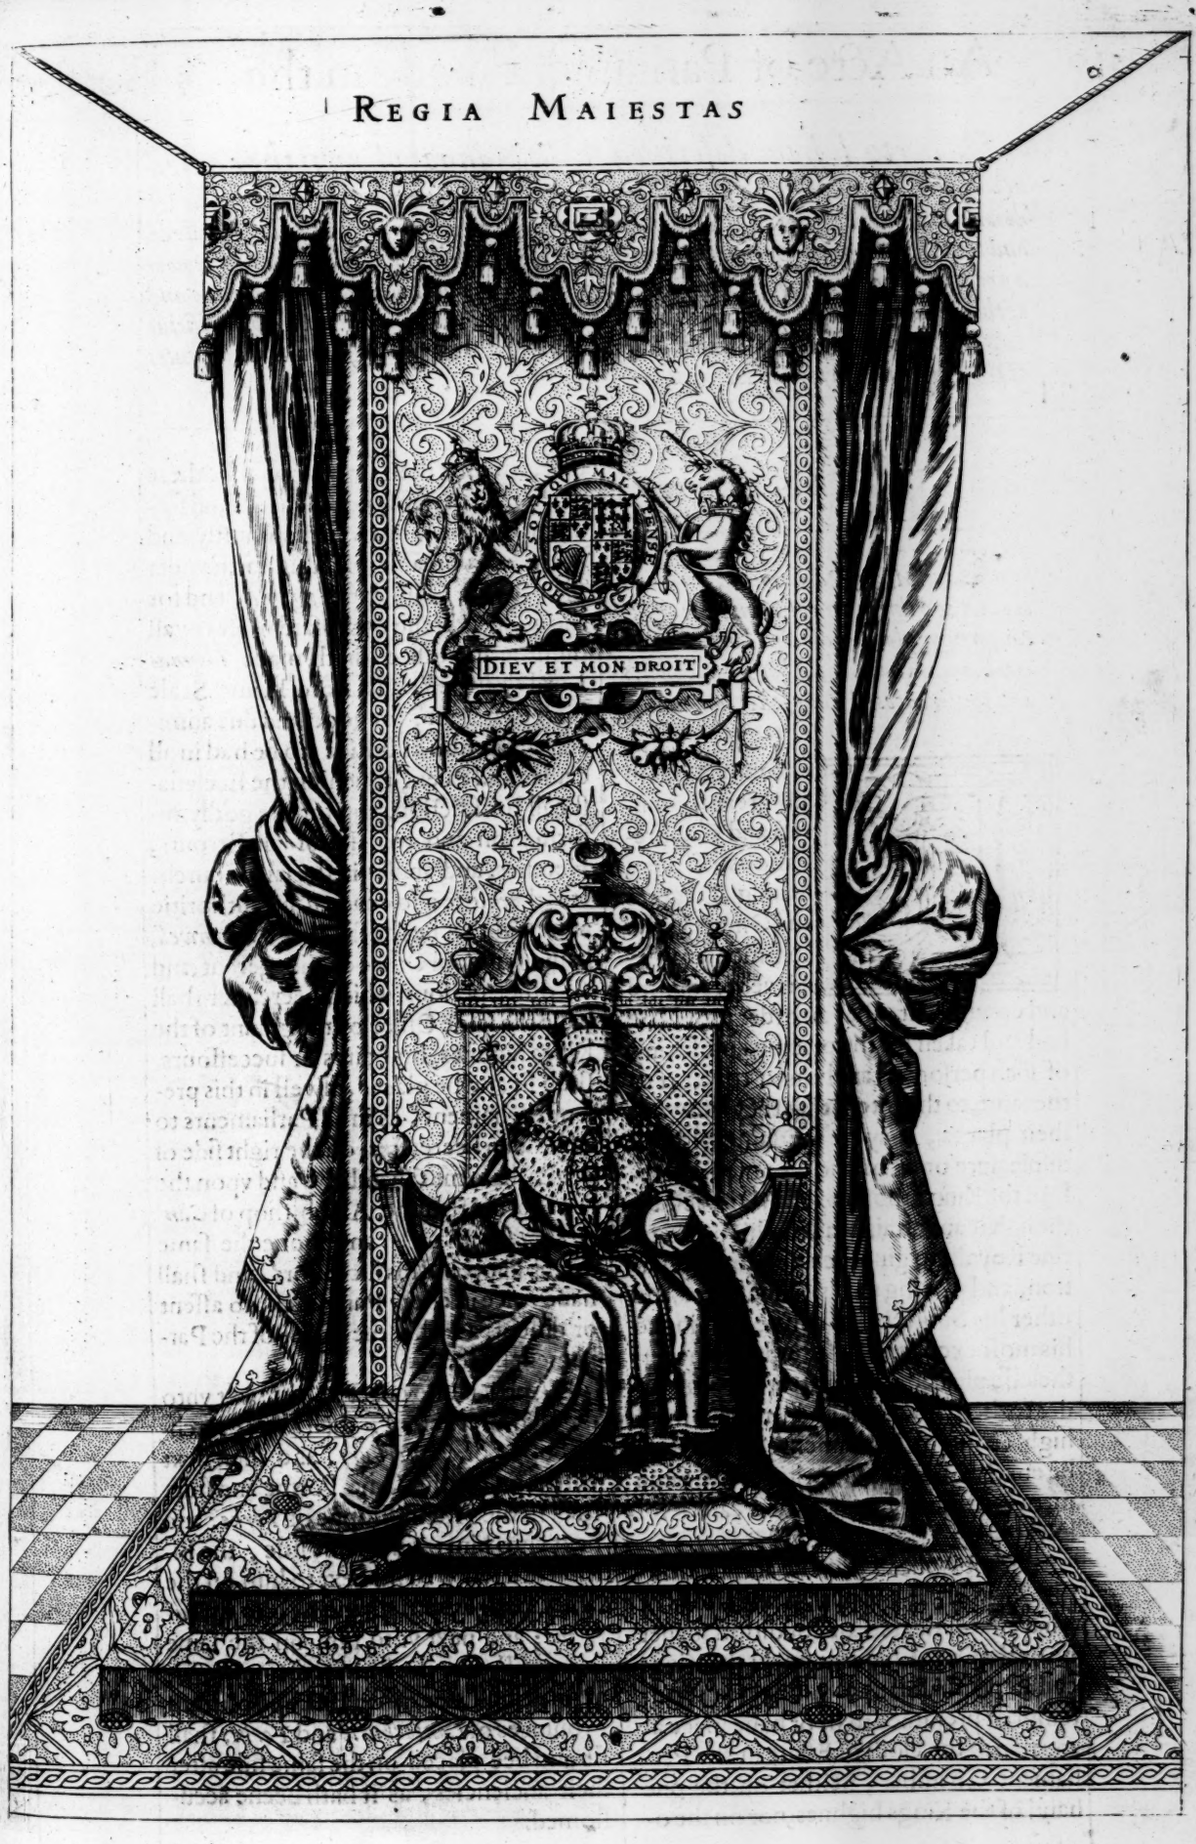
REGIA MAIESTAS



Hitherto I haue described what manner of men the named Noble-men haue beene with vs. The forme of their Charters and Rescripts I haue set downe, with what Rites and Ceremonies they are after our manner and fashion created: and the Maiestie of the Coronation of the Kings themselues, we haue declared. Here now a great field is opened vnto me to speake of the right of the precedence of the Nobilitie, and of their Priuiledges; but forasmuch as they rest rather vpon Custome, then vpon positiue Lawes, I haue of a set purpose omitted many things, proceeding but so farre as the Statutes of the Kingdome may be my warrant and safety.

CHAP. XX.

A Statute and Act of Parliament, made in the one and thirty yere of Henry the eight, concerning placing of the Lords in the Parliament chamber, and other assemblies and conferences of Counsell.

FOrsomuch, as in all great Counsels and Congregations of men, hauing Degrees and Offices in the commonwealth, it is very requisite and conuenient, that an order should be had and taken for the placing and fitting of such persons as are bound to resort to the same, to the intent that they knowing their places, may vse the same without displeasure or let of the Counsell: therefore the Kings most royall Maiestie, although it appertaineth vnto his prerogatiue Royall, to giue such honour, reputation, and placing to his Counsellers, and other his Subiects, as shall be seeming to his most excellent wisedome, is neuertheless pleased and contented for an order to be had and taken in this his most high Court of Parliament, that it shall be enacted by the authoritie of the same in manner and forme as heereafter followeth.

First, it is enacted by the authoritie aforesaide, that no person or persons of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer he or they be of (except onely the Kings children) shall at any time heereafter attempt or presume, to sit or haue place at any side of the cloth of Estate in the Parliament Chamber, neither on the one hand of the Kings highnes, nor on the other, whether the Kings Maiesty be there personally present, or absent. And forasmuch as the Kings Maiesty is iustly and lawfully Supreame Head in earth vnder God, of the Church of England, and for the good exercise of the said most royall dignitie and office, hath made Thomas Lord Cromwell, and Lord Priuie Seale his Vicegerent, for good and due admiadministration of Iustice, to be had in all causes and cases, touching the Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction, and for the godly information and redresse of all Errours, Heresies, and abuses in the said Church. It is therefore also enacted by authoritie aforesaid, that he the said Lord Cromwell, hauing the said Office of Vicegerent, and all other persons which heereafter shall haue the saide Office of the graunt of the Kings highnes, his heires or successours, shall sit and be placed, aswell in this present Parliament, as in all Parliaments to be holden heereafter, on the right side of the Parliament Chamber, and vpon the same forme that the Archbishop of Canterbury sitteth on, and aboue the same Archbishop and his successors, and shall haue voice in euery Parliament to assent or dissent, as other the Lords of the Parliament haue.

And it is also enacted, that next vnto the sayd Vicegerent, shall sit the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and then next vnto him on the same Forme and side, shall sit the Archbishoppe of Yorke: and next vnto him on the same side, the Bishop of London; and next to him on the same side and Forme, the Bishop of Dureme; and next vnto him on the same side and Forme the Bishop of Wyncheſter; and then all the other Bishops of both Prouinces of Canterburie and Yorke, shall sit and bee placed on the same side after their anciencies, as it hath beene accustomed.

And

And forasmuch as such other Personages, which now haue, and heereafter shall happen to haue other great Offices of the Realme; that is to say, the Offices of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Kings most honourable Councell, the Lord priuy Seale, the great Chamberlaine of England, the Marshall of England, the Lord Admirall, the Grand-Master or Lord Steward of the Kings most honourable household, the Kings Chamberlaine and the Kings Secretary, haue not heeretofore beene appointed and ordered for the placing and sitting in the Kings most high Court of Parliament, by reason of their Offices. It is therefore now ordayned and enacted by the Authority aforesaide, that the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President of the Kings Councell, and the Lord Priuy Seale, being of the degree of Barons of the Parliament, or aboue, shall sit and bee placed aswell in this present Parliament, as in all other Parliaments hereafter to be holden, on the left side of the Parliament Chamber, on the hither part of the forme of the same side, aboue all Dukes, except onely such as shal happen to be the Kings Sonne, the Kings Brother, the Kings Vnkle, the Kings Nephew, or the Kings Brothers or Sisters sonnes.

And it is also ordained and enacted by authority aforesaid, that the great Chamberlaine, the Constable, the Marshall, the Lord Admirall, the great Master, or Lord Steward, and the Kings Chamberlaine, shall sit and be placed after the Lord priuie Seale, in manner following: that is to say, euery one of them shall sit and be placed aboue all other Personages beeing of the same estates or degrees, that they shall happen to be of; that is to say, the great Chamberlaine first; the Constable next; the Marshall third; the Lord Admirall the fourth; the Grand-Master or Lord Steward the fift; and the Kings Chamberlaine the sixt.

And it is also enacted by authority aforesaid, that the Kings cheefe Secretary being of the degree of a Baron of the Parliament, shall sit and be placed afore and aboue all Barons, not hauing any of the Offices before mentioned. And if he be a Bishop, that then he shall sit and bee placed aboue all other Bishops, not hauing any of the Offices aboue remembred.

And it is also ordayned and enacted by Authority aforesaid, that all Dukes not afore mentioned, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons, not hauing any of the Offices aforesaid, shall sit and bee placed after their Anciency, as it hath bene accustomed.

And it is further enacted, that if any person or persons, which at any time here after shall happen to haue any of the said Offices of Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Lord President of the Kings Councell, Lord Priuy Seale, or cheefe Secretary, shall be vnder the degree of a Baron of the Parliament, by reason whereof, they can haue no interest to giue any assent or dissent in the saide house, that then in euery such case, such of them as shall happen to be vnder the degree of a Baron, shall sit and be placed at the vppermost part of the sackes, in the midst of the said Parliament, either there to sit vpon one Forme, or vpon the vppermost sacke, the one of them aboue the other, in order as is aboue rehearsed.

Be it also enacted by Authority aforesaide, that in all trials of treasons by Peers of this Realme, if any of the Peeres that shall be called heereafter to bee tryers of such treasons, shall happen to haue any of the Offices aforesaid, that then they hauing such Offices, shall sit and bee placed according to their Offices, aboue all the other Peeres that shall bee called to such trials, in manner and forme as is aboue mentioned and rehearsed.

And it is also enacted by Authority aforesaid, that as well in all Parliaments, as in the Starre-Chamber, and in all other Assemblies and Conferences of Councell, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord President, the Lord priuy Seale, the great Chamberlaine, the Constable, the Marshall, the Lord Admirall, the Grand-master, or Lord Steward, the Kings Chamberlaine, and the Kings Secretary shall sit and bee placed in such order and fashion, as is aboue rehearsed, and not in any other place, by authority of this present Acte.

The Parliamentary Pompe.

CHAP. XXIIII.

¶ (Viz.) The forme and manner of the going of the States vnto the Parliament, ſeriouſly collected out of diuers examples. Wherein I thought good, eſpecially to propound that moſt ſtately going of Queene Elizabeth, in the xxvij. yeare of her reigne.

VPon Sunday (the xxij. day of Nouember) in the Chamber of Preſence (as they doe tearme it) it was proclaimed that the Noble-men and States, and ſo all others which were bound to attend vpon the Queenes Maieſtie, the next day to be holden at Weſtminſter, ſhould bee ready at nine of the clocke before noone, to giue their attendance, the Queene then lying in her royall houſe called Saint Iames, neare vnto Weſtminſter. The next day at the appointed houre, the Noblemen put on their Parliament Robes in the Counſell chamber, and the Biſhops theirs likewiſe, in another chamber next vnto the chappel: from thence they, by the Garden going into the Parke, mounted on horſe-backe, attended the comming foorth of the Queene. About eleuen of the clocke the moſt gracious Queene, attired alſo in a Parliament Roabe, at the going out of the Garden, mounted in a Chaire of Eſtate, like vnto a Chariot or Horſelitter, carried betwixt two white Horſes. This Chaire was on euery ſide open, but that behind a couering hanging forth aboue, ſemicircle-wiſe, was with two litle pillers of Siluer ſupported: vpon the top whereof, ſtoode on high a Crowne of golde: and vpon two other pillers at her feete, ſtoode a Lyon and a Dragon glиſtering with golde, made with wonderful cunning, ſupporting the Queenes Armes. This Chaire (which I might rather call a Throane) being altogether cunningly garniſhed and gilt, was moſt magnificently bedeckt with cloth of Siluer (as they call it) and with Cuſhions of the ſame. An Herald or King of Armes.

William Marqueſſe of Wincheſter: Hee in another place carried the Cap roiall.

Heere were places fit for Dukes: all whoſe parliament roabes (a thing worth the noting) differed nothing from the Barons, but that they wore the guardes vpon their ſhoulders, three or foure fold. For although all Dukes, Marqueſſes, and Earles, in their creations are attired with garments of Silke and Veluet, which are called Roabes or garments of Honour: yet in Parliaments they vſe the ſame that Barons doe, made of Skarlet, with certayne differences of white Furre, ſet as fringes or edgings on their ſhoulders: for that there they al ſit by reaſon of their Baronies, and according to their dignitie take their places.

Thomas Bromley Knight Chancellour of England; with William Cicill Baron of Burghley ridde together. But the great Seale of England, was by one footman carried before the Chancellour: but hee himſelfe was attired in a Gowne of black Veluet lined with Sables.

Iohn Whitgift alſo, Arch-biſhoppe of Canterbury: with Edwin Sands Archbiſhop of Yorke followed next after them.

Clarencieux King of Armes.

Two Sergeants at Armes with ſiluer ſcepters, which we call Maces, gilt.

Garter chiefe King at Armes, in his Heralds coate, hauing the chiefe gentleman Vſher on his right hand.

The Marques of Wincheſter did beare the Cap royall, vpon whoſe left hand the Earle of Worceſter carried the Rod of the Marſhalſhip of England, in ſteed of George Earle of Shrewsbury, then earle Marſhal, who was then in the Parliament Chamber, although he was not heere preſent, for that he was ſicke of the Gout.

The Earle of Kent after them carried the ſword, on whoſe right hand went the earle of Oxford, then great Chamberlaine of England, and on his left hand the Earle of Leiceſter, Seneſchall, or Steward of the queenes houſe.

The queenes Maieſty carried in a chaire as we haue before ſaid. She her ſelfe decked vp in a purple Robe, furred with Ermines. But her inner Garment was of purple veluet alſo, more ſtraighter vnto her body, turned vp at the hand, with the ſame furre.

Foure Quirles of the Stable (whom in French they call Eſquiries) and the Footmen in their rich Coates were attendant about the queene: and without them all along in a ranke, waited the Gentlemen Pentioners with their Partiſans.

After them followed the Earle of Darbie, Maſter of the Horſe (inſtead of the Earle of Leiceſter, who at this time ſupplyed the place of the Steward) leading a ſpare horſe of ſtate: by whom on the left hand rode Charles Howard, Baron of Effingham, Chamberlaine of the queenes houſe, both of them attired in their Parliament Robes.

After theſe followed alſo Chriſtopher Hatton, Knight Vice-Chamberlaine, with many Noble women, Ladies, and other Noble Courtiers.

In this order and Royall pompe, the queene came vnto the South gate of S. Peters Church at Weſtminſter, where the Biſhop of Sarisbury, the Kings Almner, and Doctor Goodman Deane of that Church, with the Prebendaries, and all the quier receiued Her in their Coapes. Without the Porch was ſet a Forme, furniſhed with Carpets and Cuſhions, at which the queene vpon her knees, receiued of the Deane the golden Scepter of S. Edward, which ſhe layde vpon the Cuſhion before her: and hauing receiued a little Booke of the Deane, vnto her ſelfe ſoftly prayed. Afterward ſhee came into the Church, vnder a ſtately Canopy of Cloth of Siluer, which ſixe Knights ſupported.

The Marchioneſſe of Northampton, and the counteſſe of Oxford bare vp the traine: Baron Howard of Effinghom being Chamberlaine ſupporting her: Chriſtopher Hatton Vice-Chamberlaine going on the other ſide, but not ſupporting her. But foraſmuch forasmuch as the Queenes roabes made of rich silke and Ermins, were too weighty and chargeable for her well to beare, the Earle of Arundell on the right hand, and the Earle of Penbrooke on the left, held them vp from her shoulders.

Before the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Treasurer, went the singing men and Quiristers, singing of Psalmes, and when the Queene was now come vnto the royall withdrawing or retyring place (commonly called the Trauerse) prepared for them vpon the right hand of the Quier, neare vnto the Communion Table: the Noble-men tooke their places vpon Formes, beneath the Trauerse, but the Bishops sate themselues downe beneath the Pulpit, on the north side of the Quier.

The Archbishop of Canterburie, after a psalme sung, made a sermon, the sword and cap of Honour beeing in the meane time borne before him.

The sermon with a psalme ended, the Queene on foote vnder a Canopy, went vnto the south gate of the Church, carrying in her hand the Scepter, dedicated to King Edward the Confessor. In which place, shee restored it vnto the Deane of Westminster, of whom shee had before receiued it, to be againe layd vp.

It is worthy note, that whilest the Queenes Maiesty was hearing diuine seruice in the Church, the Earle of Leicester (for that time Steward of the Queenes house) went vnto the Lower Parliament house, to be there present at the answer of the Rescripts, (which our Lawyers call the Returne of the Writtes) before sent foorth for the sommoning of the knights of the shires, and for the Burgesses of the townes thither, and met the Queene coming vnto the vpper Parliament house.

The Queene being come thither, first retired her selfe into her owne priuie Chamber, where resting her selfe a litle, the Noble-men in the meane while, had in due order placed themselues in the vpper house: and at length the Queene her selfe came forth, the Sword, the Cappe, and the Rod of the Marshalship of England being borne before her, and the other Officers going before her, shee went vp into the Royall Throne, the Nobilitie of the Kingdome sitting downe about her.

In the middest of the vpper house lie great Sackes of cloth filled with wooll: vpon the vppermost whereof sitteth the Chancellour; and vpon those which lie towards the sides of the house, sit the Maister of the Rolles, the Queenes Secretary, the Iudges, the Barons of the Exchequer, and certayne Lawyers, aswell Ciuilians as Common Lawyers. Vpon the lowest of all, sitteth the Clarke of the Parliament house, with the Clarke of the Crowne, behinde whom the other Clarks write, resting vpon their knees.

When the Queene was set, and that they of the neather house (videlicet) the Knights of the Shires, and the Burgesses of the Cities were let in, the commaunded the Lord Chancellour, standing on the right hand by her, to make his Oration: who turning himselfe vnto the Nobilitie, and the rest there present, declared vnto them, in her Maiesties name, that this assembly of Parliament to be for three causes called (viz.) For the glorie of Almighty God, and the furthering of true Religion: For the health and preseruation of her royall Maiestie, and the welfare of the Common-weale. Which after that hee had aloude and most eloquently at large declared, turning his speech vnto the Knights and Burgesses, standing on an heape together below: he willed them to make choyse of their Prolocutor, and to giue notice of him so chosen, to the Lords of the Priuy Counsell, from whom they should expect what the Queens pleasure and answer was concerning him so chosen, to be afterward presented.

When the Chancellor had ended his speech, the Clarke of the Parliament rising vp, in French, and with a lowd voice proclaimed the names of them; which as Delegates had the power within certain dayes to vnderstand of the affaires aswell of the Kingdomes of England, Fraunce, Scotland, and Ireland, as of the Dukedoms of Normandie and Aquitaine, and to heare and examine the requests and petitions of them of the Ilands and parties beyond the Seas.

Which things being done, the Chancellour prorogued the Parliament, the Queene discending from her Throane, and retiring into her Priuie Chamber, there put off her parliament robes; which when when the Barons had in like manner alſo done, they in order (with the Sword, the Cappe of Honour, and the Rod of the Marſhalſhip carried before her) attended her vnto her Barge, wherein ſhee from thence was downe the Riuer carried backe vnto her Pallace (called White Hall:) through which ſhe paſſed into the Parke, where ſhe mounting vpon a moſt couragious Horſe; the Nobility, States, and moſt honourable men and women attending her, ſhee happily returned vnto her Pallace of S. Iames, from whence ſhe before came.

Vpon Thurſeday following, the day appointed for the preſenting of the Prolocutour, the Queene about three of the clocke in the after noone, by the Parke came from her royall houſe of S. Iames, vnto her pallace of White Hall; and when ſhe had in her Chamber put on her Parliament roabes, ſhe went to her Throne, the Sword, the Cappe, and the Rodde of the Marſhalſhip, being after the wonted manner carried before her: The Lord Chamberlaine going on the right hand of the Sword, and the Lord Steward on the left, with the Lord Treaſurer, Garter, the vſhers, & the Sergeants at Armes going before them. At length, when the Noble men were ſet downe, the Chancellour on the right hand, and the high Treaſurour of England on the left hand, ſtood beſide the Queene without the barres.

Then at length, the Knights of the Shires, and the Burgeſſes of the Citties being admitted in, brought in their moſt learned Lawyer (viz.) Iohn Puckering, who ſtanding at the barre, and hauing thrice made moſt lowe obeiſance, ſayd what he might, to ſhew himſelfe vnfit to vndertake ſo great a burthen, requeſting moſt earneſtly, that they would make choice of another Prolocutor, vnto whom the Queene by the Chancellour made anſwer; That ſhee liked exceeding well of the choice of him already made, and that ſhe ratified the ſame.

Which done, the Prolocutor framed himſelfe to another manner of ſpeach, wherein hee particularly rehearſed what great benefits were redounded vnto the Commonweale, by the moſt wiſe gouernement of her royall Maieſtie: he declared her ſingular vertues, her very naturall and motherly care ouer her Subiects: But eſpecially in that ſhe had then called together the Eſtates of the Kingdome, there to conſult and conſider of the moſt weightieſt affaires of the Common-weale, earneſtly admoniſhing the Biſhops to prouide for the Eccleſiaſticall and Church matters: the Nobilitie and the reſt to bee carefull of the profite and welfare of the Common-weale. In the concluſion of his ſpeach, he moſt humbly requeſted, that the auncient Rights and Priuiledges of the Lower houſe of the Burgeſſes, (viz.) of freely deliuering of their ſpeach and minds, and of being free from Arreſts, as well themſelues as their Seruants, during the time of the parliament, might be kept whole and vntouched. And if that in any thing not well by them vnderſtoode, they ſhould happen to offend, he requeſted leaue aſwell for himſelfe as for the reſt, to haue acceſſe vnto her royall Maieſtie.

His Oration at length ended, the Chancellor, by the Queene commanded, and in ſome poynts, by her inſtructed, highly commended the Prolocutors Oration, and in the Queenes name graunted the leaue he had requeſted.

Which things being ſo on both ſides diſpatched, the Queene roſe and retired herſelfe into her priuate Chamber, put off her Parliament roabes, and ſo attended vppon with the Nobilitie, came downe: and at the Weſt ſide of the Parliament houſe, mounted into her chaire of Eſtate, a very royall one; and from thence with a great traine of Noblemen and honorable Ladies attending her (the Earle of Kent carrying the Sword before her) ſhee by Torch-light through the Parke, returned vnto her Pallace of Saint Iames, from whence ſhe before came.

CHAP. XXII.

The manner of restoring of renewed Nobilitie before lost.

THE maners and formes of creating of Noblemen, with their Rites and Ceremonies, by Charters and Rescripts, or Writs of summons, wee haue before described. Now heere at length I haue thought it good, to ioyne heereunto the manner of restoring of dignities & honours before lost. Such as haue by their owne or others fault, lost their honorable stiles and titles, are wont to bee vnto the same by petitions, exhibited vnto the Kings in full Parliament restored: which I would say, to be a confirmation of renewed or restored Nobility. Whereof the request of Margret, daughter to George Duke of Clarence, in Parliament, in the first yeare of King Henry the eight, (to omit others) may serue for an example. Whereby she is restored vnto the Stile, State, Name, Title, Honour, and Dignity of the Countesse of Sarisbury, frō which Edward her Brother Earle therof, had by his guilt fallen. The Petition it selfe is longer then is necessary to be heere inserted. It is in English extant in the Records, & is shut vp with these words.

Which petition beeing read, and to the full vnderstood, and consented vnto by our said Lord the King, by the aduice and assent of the Lords spirituall and temporall, and of the Cominalty in the aforesaide Parliament being: and also by the Authority of the same Parliament, it was vnto the same Petition thus answered.

Soit faict come il est desire.
Be it done according as it is requested.

CHAP. XXIII.

Customes.

I Haue said Politicall Nobility, still subiect vnto the dispositions of Princes, and change of time; to rest alwayes vpon the customes of Nations.

For first of all, it is manifest, dignities which were but the bare names of personal Offices, to haue at length become hereditary and successory: and yet with diuers Lawes circumscribed.

For although women in Germany born of Dukes, Earles, or Barons, are according to the manner of the Empire styled and called Dutchesses, Countesses, and Baronesses; yet by the Law of the Imperiall grant, the Principalities themselues, with the Fees thereto belonging, descend vnto the Males onely, who fayling, they reuert vnto the Emperor. Which thing, the most great Dukedome Carinthia, proueth to be so. For Ericus the last Duke beeing dead without heires male, the dukedome by the Lawes returned againe vnto the Empire: which Lewes the Emperour afterward bestowed vppon Albert Duke of Austria.

Sigismund the Emperor also, the right line of the dukes of Saxony being extinct, gaue the dukedome in the yeare 1423. vnto the Marquesses of Misnia; and the Marquisat of Brandenburg, vnto the Burgraues of Noriburge: whose successors euen now at this day enioy the same.

The same we reade to haue been done in Italy: For Wenceslaus the Emperour in the yeare 1490. graced the Vice-county of Millaine with the Title of a Dukedome: but so as that for want of heires male, it should together with that Dignitie, bee made a part of the Imperiall patrimony. And in the remembrance of our Grandfathers, we reade of certayne (aswell at Naples as else-where,) to haue beene by the Emperour Charles the fifth created; but yet alwayes with that common Lawe of Reuersion, that so soone as the last last of the male discent should dye, they should be made Imperiall dignities. Yet heere by the way we must remember, that the Emperors did not at all times doe all things according to the vttermost of the greatnesse of their power; but sometime by a new beneficiary or bountifull couenant, being requested so to doe, suffered those titles of honours to descend vnto the daughters (no heires male remaining) mittigating the extremity of the law, by wise mens interpretations thereof, regard being still had, eyther of the Commonweale, or of some former agreement, or of the time present.

In France, Rennatus Choppinus, disputing of the Royall Demaine, maketh a distinction of dignities. For he affirmeth all Military and masculine dignities, by the Law Salique to be annexed vnto the Fees Royall, neyther by any meanes, by meere Law, to come vnto the Women, although that the heyres male faile; except by speciall and expresse words it bee before otherwise prouided: which hee saith, himselfe to haue seene and read. Yet in the meane time he affirmeth, priuate Principalities not to be denied to women: which hee manifesteth by the example of the County of Arminiack by a womans right deuolued vnto the King of Nauarre, as by many others also.

And to mee, now writing and running ouer some few things concerning our owne affaires, it fortuned a certaine most ancient writing to come vnto my hands, taken out of the ancient Saxon Lawes, and lent me by William Lambert, a great admirer of reuerend antiquity, and a most earnest restorer thereof. Which writing, although that both in tongue and character it meerely sound Saxon like, yet seemeth it in some things, to sauour of the Danish maters, as also of the ancient lawes eyther of the Britons themselues, or of the Saxons, shaken and rent in sunder, vnder the rule and gouernment of the Danes.

But the writing it selfe written in the Saxon tongue, translated into English, word for word, & into Latine, according vnto the true sense and meaning thereof, here following is contained.

Theſe

These ruines or rubbidges of antiquity, make shew of a perpetuity of Nobility, euen from the beginning of this Iland, but times are changed, and we in them also. For King Edward the Confessor, last of the Saxon blood, comming out of Normandy, bringing then in the Title of a Baron, the Thaynes from that time began to grow out of vse; so that at this day men remember not so much as the names of them. And at length, that name of Baronage began to be both in dignity and power so magnificent aboue the rest, as that in the name of the Baronage of England, all the Nobility of the Land seemed to be comprehended. As for Dukes, they were (as it were) fetcht from long exile, and againe renewed by King Edward the third. And Marquesses & Vicounts, were altogether newly brought in by King Richard the second, and King Henry the sixt.

The name of a Baron from whence and when it came into England.

But our Kings descended of the Norman blood, together with the Crowne of the Kingdome, granted an hereditary & successory perpetuity vnto honourable titles, such I meane as are the Titles of Earldomes and Baronies) without any difference of sex at all. Which thing I thoght good to make manifest, by the examples of the more ancient times. In the reckoning vp whereof that I may the better acquit and discharge my selfe; in the very entrance of my speech, there be 3 things, whereof I would haue the Reader by the way, to be especially forewarned. First, concerning the dispositon and inclination of our Kings, in the creating of the nobility. Secondly, of the custome of transferring of honours and dignities by Families. And thirdly, of the force of time, & the change and alteration of things. For why, our Kings (who only and alone, doe in their kingdome beare the absolute rule and sway) are with vs efficient causes of all Politicall Nobility. The Titles of Named Nobility, by our custome, haue this naturall and common together with the Crowne it selfe, that the heyres male fayling, they deuolue vnto the Women, except in the first Charters it be by expresse words otherwise prouided; and yet so, as that regard is alwayes to bee had of the time, which is euery where wont to beare sway in the formality of things.

Menander. Three things ther be which beare rule in all things viz. the Law, Custome, and Necessity.

In this manner William the first, King and Conqueror, Harold being ouercome, hauing obtained the Soueraignty, according to his pleasure bestowed dignities & honors vpon his companions and others, (viz.) some of them so anexed and conioyned vnto the Fees themselues, as that euen yet at this day, the possessors therof, may seeme to be ennobled, euen with the possession of the places onely. As our Bishops at this day, as also certaine ecclesiastic all Abbots and Priors; who by reason of the Baronies ioyned vnto their Bishoppricks, enioy the titles and preheminence of Barons in the higheſt assemblies of the kingdome in Parliament. Other some of the dignities and honors, he gaue and granted also, together with the lands and fees themselues. As he gaue to Hugh Lupus his kinsman and a Norman, the earldome of Chester. Ad Conquirendum & tenendum sibi & haeredibus, adeo liberè per gladium sicut ipse Rex tenuit Angliam per Coronam. To conquer and hold it to him and his heyres, as freely by the Sword, as the King himselfe helde England by the Crowne. With the Earledome of Richmond hee graced Alanus Rufus, his Nephew, and then Earle of Britaine in France and his heyres: Ita liberè & honorificè vt eundem Edwinus Comes antea tenuerat: so freely and honorably as Earle Edwin had before holden the same. And the Earledome of Arundel, which Harold possessed, he granted with a fee vnto Roger of Montgomery. The first two of which honors (the heyres male fayling) by women eftsoones passed into other Families, but the latter Earledome, Robert the Sonne of Roger beeing attainted of treason, returned vnto King Henry the first, who gaue the same in dowry vnto Queene Adeliza his Wife.

The succeeding Kings more sparingly, bestowed such dignities to bee holden of them in Fee, granting only for the better and more honourable maintenance of their stocke and honour, the third part of the Pleas of the County (as they tearme it) which they in their Charters called Tertium Denarium, or the third penny. So that hee which receiued the third penny of any Prouince, he the same man by the same ancient Law of succession, was called Earle of the same Prouince: and so by custome the women, the heyres male fayling.

And if any Earle or Baron dying without Sonnes, had many women his heires, howſoeuer order was, either by couenant, or by way of partition taken, concerning the Lands and poſſeſſions, according to the common Lawes of the kingdome, yet the dignity and honour, a thing of it ſelfe indiuiſable, was ſtill left to be diſpoſed of, according to the Kings pleaſure. Who in beſtowing thereof, for the moſt part reſpected the prerogatiue of birth.

By which right, King Henry the third, after the death of Iohn the Scot, dead without iſſue (other lands and reuennues being by agreement giuen vnto his three Siſters) vnited the Earldome of Cheſter, with the honor thereof vnto the Crown. This is alſo manifeſt in the Earledome of Arundell: which (after Robert of Belliſme, Sonne to the aforeſaid Roger of Montgomery, driuen out by Henry the firſt) King Henry the ſecond beſtowed vpon William of Albinie, Queene Adeliza his Mothers Husband, and by a new Charter, confirmed it in Fee, together with the inheritance to him and his heires, with the third penny of the Pleas of Suſſex, whereof he created him Earle. But Hugh the great, Nephew of this William the firſt, beeing dead without iſſue, all the inheritance of the Earledome was diuided among his foure Siſters. Whoſe dignity and honour for all that, together with the Caſtle of Arundel, was by Edward the firſt, at length giuen to Richard Fitz-Alan (viz.) the Nephewes Sonne to Iohn Fitz-Alan and Iſabell, the ſecond of the aforeſaid Siſters.

Now let vs paſſe from Henry the third, vnto Edward the firſt his Sonne. When as for a time a great diſſention was betwixt him and certaine of his Nobility (viz.) Gilbert of Clare Earle of Hertford and of Gloceſter: Humfrey of Bohun, earle of Hereford and Suſſex, and Conſtable of England, and Roger Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Marſhall of the kingdome, and that all thoſe Noble-men, at length had loſt their Earledomes and Offices, they being reconciled vnto the King, afterward by new Charters receiued the ſame againe in this manner.

The firſt of them, receiued the ſame vnto himſelfe & Ioane the ſame kings daughter his ſecond wife, for tearme of both their liues, and to the Children to bee by them two begotten (his two Daughters by his firſt wife being excluded.) This Ioane (called Ioane ot Acon) bare vnto her husband Gilbert, a Sonne called alſo Gilbert; but ſhee the ſecond time, ſecretly married vnto one Radulph, of Mont Hermeri (without the King her Fathers knowledge) in her owne right, made alſo the ſame Radulph Earle ſo long as ſhee liued. But ſhe at length being dead, Gilbert her ſonne, by the aforeſaid Gilbert, ſucceeded againe into the Earledome, Radulph his Father in Law being yet aliue. In the very ſame manner he reſtored the Earledoms and Office of Conſtableſhip vnto the aforeſaid Humfrey of Bohun, vnto whom alſo he gaue in marriage Elizabeth, another of his Daughters, widdow to Iohn Earle of Holland: and vnto the third, he reſtored the Earledome of Norfolke, and the office of the Mareſcall, with a yearely encreaſe of a thouſand Markes; yet vpon condition, that the heires male of his body to be begotten, fayling, both of them ſhould returne againe vnto the King. At length, this Roger dyed without iſſue, in the xxxv. yeare of him the ſaid Edward the firſt viz. in the laſt yeare of his reigne: and King Edward his Son, the ſecond of that name, both by a new Creation & Charter, gaue the Earledome and the Marſhalſhip vnto Thomas of Brotherton his Brother, and his heyres male.

Theſe things wee haue thus propounded, thereby to ſhew, how according to the diuers diſpoſitions of Princes, & chãges of times, it hath by little and little varried in the firſt beſtowing of dignities and honours. Of which thing (that new Law) and to them of ancient time vnknowne, made by King Edward the firſt himſelfe, ſeemeth afterward to haue beene of no ſmall weight and moment, whereby, hee fauouring certaine priuate men, more carefull of their owne ſurname, then of their poſterity, it was thought vnto him good, & ſo decreed, to make Fees to belong to men only. That law I ſay, which I would in Latine call Gentilitium Municipale, & which the Lawyers commonly call Ius Talliatum, and Talliabile: or the Law of cutting off: for that it cutteth off ſucceſſions before generall, and reſtraineth them vnto the particular heyres of Families: which ſeemeth alſo to haue giuen an occaſion of change in the giuing and beſtowing of dignities and honors.

For

For euer ſince that time, in the creating of any new Earle, it is begunne to be altogether by expreſſe words in all Charters prouided, that it ſhall bee but for terme of life onely, or diſcend vnto the heires males alone, the Women being quite excluded. And this I need not by examples to prooue; for why, the thing it ſelfe prooueth the ſame. But the force and efficacie of this Lawe of Entaile, (or of cutting off) I haue thought good thus in few words to declare.

The Lands and Fees of the earledome of Oxford (Robert Earle of Oxford and Duke of Ireland, being condēned of treaſon) by that Law came to Albericus Vere vncle to Robert, who therefore in Parliament, requeſted of the King, the Title of the Earledome alſo, and obtayned the ſame. This is alſo moſt manifeſt, by the example of the Earledomes of Arundell and of Surrey, ioyned together in the family of Fitz-Alan. For Edmund Fitz-Alan Earle of Arundell, married the onely ſiſter and heire of Earle Richard, and of her begot Richard, happy with his twice marriage. Vnto this Richard, the ſonne of Edmund, and his heires male by Alenor of Lancaſter (his ſecond wife) begotten, and to be begotten, the Caſtle, Honour, and Lordſhip of Arundell were entailed in the one and twentith yeare of Edward the third. And afterward (viz.) the ſame yere, Earle Iohn his brother being dead without iſſue, enriched alſo with the encreaſe of the Earledome of Surrey, he was called Earle of Arundell and Surrey. Of Alenor Richard begot a ſonne, called Richard, at length Earle of Arundell and Surrey alſo: and Iohn Fitz-Alan his ſecond ſonne, in the right of his wife, called Baron Maltreuers. This Richard had Thomas, his onely Sonne, dead without iſſue; and foure Daughters his Coheires (viz.) Elizabeth, Ioane, Margaret, and Alice, who diuided the Earledome of Surrey amongſt them. Howbeit the dignity therof was granted to Iohn Mowbray duke of Suffolke, begotten of Elizabeth the eldeſt ſiſter; who by the ancient cuſtome of Succeſſion challenged vnto himſelfe the Earledome of Arundell alſo. But Iohn Baron of Maltreuers, Nephew to the firſt Iohn Fitz-Alan, and Baron of Maltreuers, by his ſonne Iohn oppoſed himſelfe againſt this man, and withſtood him, challenging vnto himſelfe the poſſeſſion of that caſtle and demaine of Arundell, as fallen vnto him by the good right of the Law of Entaile.

For Thomas the laſt Earle being dead without iſſue (as is afore-ſaid, he alleaged the demaine of the Caſtle not to belong vnto the Siſters, but to diſcend vnto his heires male and kinſmen, of whom hee himſelfe was neareſt of kinne vnto the ſayd Earle Thomas: of which Fee, ſeeing by Law he held the poſſeſſion, he affirmed the Title of honour and dignitie more fitly to agree vnto himſelfe then to lie in vaine, and to no purpoſe hidden in the Duke himſelfe. Which thing, although hee could not obtayne, yet Iohn his ſonne, a moſt famous warriour, after the death of his Father, with the applauſe and good liking of all men, obtained by Acte of parliament, in the eleauenth yeare of King Henry the ſixt. Of whom alſo, for his great deſerts and moſt noble vertues, he was, the yeare after, rewarded with the dukedome of Thurania in Fraunce. And this Iohn, both Earle and Duke, being dead, Humphrey his ſon, in ſhort time after dead without iſſue (notwithſtanding his ſiſter) left the earledome of Arundell entailed vnto William his vncle, in whom afterward it took ſuch root, as that we haue ſeene it in the male line, to haue brought forth moſt famous and renowned Earles, euen vnto this our age.

And what wee haue ſayd concerning Earles, the ſame be it ſaid alſo of Barons created by Charters. But in Barons created by Reſcripts or Writs of Summons yet reſting vpon moſt auncient cuſtome, not ſo.

For in them (one onely excepted, ſent forth to Henry Bromflet, wherein it was prouided him, that ſame Henry and his heires male of his body lawfully begotten, only to be Barons of Veſey) women, the heires male failing, were not in ancient time forbidden or embarred, but that they might be accounted, and by name ſtiled honourable, with the præeminence of the dignity and calling of Barons. And after they had borne a Childe, according to the auncient fauour of our Lawes, and the reuerend cuſtome of the Kingdome, graced their husbands alſo with the ſame honour; & with the ſame by inheritance ennobled ennobled their children; yea, euen without the poſſeſſion of thoſe places, from whence the names of ſuch dignities and honours may ſeeme firſt to haue riſen. For Fees and locall poſſeſſions, circumſcribed by the Lawe, are tranſlated and carried from one family to an other, and vſually enrich their Lords and owners the poſſeſſours thereof: but yet of themſelues, neyther bring nor take away Nobilitie, either Datiue or Natiue. By Examples to manifeſt theſe things were but needeleſſe; for why, all the moſt auncient Baronies, and the more auncient ſort of the Barons at this day, are in this poynt on my ſide, and giue voices with me. Now, if any man ſtudious of theſe things, by chaunce meeting with ſome things of other nature, ſhall more curiouſly diſpute againſt theſe matters, vnto him I would oppoſe, eyther the force of time, or the careleſneſſe and lacke of looking vnto. But, Cuſtomes are ſtill like themſelues, neyther are we to detract from the authoritie of Kings, who although they haue ſuch ſupereminent, and vndeterminate prerogatiue, as that they may ſeeme ſometimes to haue of fauour graunted, ſome things beſide the Lawes; yet ſhall it not appeare them requeſted, to haue done, or yet ſuffered any thing to bee done, contrarie vnto the Cuſtomes of Stockes and Families. So they ſometime not regarding the ſolemnities of Ceremonies and Charters, haue onely by their beckes (that I may ſo ſay) ſuffered dignities and honours to bee transferred, as in Ranulph Blundeuill, Earle of Cheſter, and of Lincolne to bee ſeene. For the Earledome of Cheſter, he permitted after the manner, to diſcend to Iohn the Scot his Nephew, by Maud the eldeſt of his Siſters. But the Earledome of Lincolne, (the King thereunto conſenting) hee yet aliue deliuered vnto Hawiſia another of his Siſters, now married to Robert Quincy, by his deede, in the ſeuenteenth yeare of the reigne of King Henrie the third, in theſe words following.

RAnulphus Earle of Lincolne, vnto all men preſent, and to come, which ſhall ſee this preſent Writing, greeting. I would haue it to come vnto the generall knowledge of you all, mee to haue giuen and graunted, and by this my preſent writing, to haue confirmed to the Lady Hawiſia of Quincy, my moſt deare Siſter, the Earledome of Lincolne, (viz.) as farre forth as it vnto mee belonged, ſo that ſhe may thereof be Counteſſe. To haue and to hold the ſame of my Lord the King of England, and his heires, vnto the ſaide Hawiſia and her heires, freely, quietly, fully, peaceably, and wholly by right of inheritance, with all the appurnances, and liberties vnto the aforeſaide Earledome belonging. And that this preſent Writing may ſtand in force for euer, I haue thought it good to firme and ſtrengthen the ſame, by the ſetting to of my Seale. Theſe being witneſſes.

Hawiſa with this her brothers writing in this manner endowed, was forthwith Counteſſe of Lincolne, who yet liuing, preſently gaue the ſame to Iohn Lacie her ſonne in lawe. So alſo I may not paſſe ouer Hugh Courtney the firſt of that family and name, in the time of King Edward the third: for he, when hee had for many yeares after the death of Iſabell de Fortibus (whoſe ſole heire hee was) quietly poſſeſſed the lands and Fees of the earledome of Deuſhire, without eyther the Title or Inueſtiture of an Earle, and that at length contention aroſe betwixt him and the Kings officers of the Exchequer, for the repayment of the third penny, for that hee as yet vſed not the Stile of an Earle, hee hauing written Letters ſupplicatorie vnto the King, then buſied in the warres in Scotland, receiued anſwer; That taking vnto himſelfe the Name and Dignitie of an Earle, hee ſhould cauſe himſelfe, from that time forward, to bee named and called Earle of Deuſhire, in theſe words.

THe King to his welbeloued and faithfull, Hugh of Courtney the Elder, &c. Greeting, &c. Whereas you, as appeareth by your Petition exhibited before vs and our Councell, haue of long beene ſued for the repayment of eighteene pounds, ſixe ſhillings and eight pence, of the yearely Fee of the Earledome of Deuſhire, which Iſabell de Fortibus, late Counteſſe of Deuſhire, whoſe heire you are, and the heires of her the ſaid Counteſſe, and yours, Earles of Deuſhire, yearely receiued by the hands of the Sheriffes of that Countie that were for the time being, and which you likewise after the death of the aforesaide Countesse, as her heire for a certaine time receiued: And for that they haue beene from you detained, because you haue in no wise named and stiled your selfe an Earle: as by the Certificate of the Treasuror, and of the Barons of our Exchequer, by our commandement made into our Chancerie, more at large doth appeare. Wee, for that the inheritance which was the aforesaid Countesses, and the inheritance of her Predecessours, and yours, the Earles of Denshire; vnto you discended by hereditary right, and that you at this present hold the same inheritance; willing in this part to prouide, as well for our owne Dignitie, and the equitie of our Kingdome, as for your honour: will and commaund you, in requesting you, that in taking vnto you the name and honour of an Earle, you from hencefoorth cause your selfe to be called Earle of Denshire, knowing that wee will make the aforesaide Fee to bee yearely payed vnto you, as it hath beene wont to bee payed vnto the Earles of Denshire your Predecessours. Witnesse the King at New-castle vppon Tine, the two and twentith day of February, & in the ninth yeare of our reigne.

Last of all, we haue seene this same not long since, in Phillip Howard confirmed. For hee, after the most auncient right of the Earledome of Arundell, tooke vnto himselfe the Title of Arundell, the Queene onely consenting thereunto, and approuing the same; no forme of Charter repeated, or of any forme of his Creation being thereunto ioyned.

Hitherto it seemeth also to appertaine, that our most auncient Earles were of auncient time wont (according to the diuersitie of the places) where they for the most part chose to dwell, to to bee called by diuerse Titles of Dignities. For Reynold who was Earle of Cornewall, for his continuall dwelling at Bristow, was oftentimes called Earle of Bristow.

Robert of Ferrars the younger, Earle of Ferrars in Normandie, and of Derbie in England, sometime wrote himselfe Earle of Tutbury, a Castle (videlicet) in the Borders of Stafford-shire built by his Progenitours. Baldwine and Richard of Riuers, were sometime called Earles of Excester, and sometimes Lordes of the Ile of Wight, for their continuall dwelling in the same places; when as yet in the meane time, they were both Earles of Denshire. William also of Albiniac, Earle of Arundell and Sussex, the first of that name, in the Letters of agreement betwixt king Stephen and king Henrie the second, set himselfe thereto a Witnes, by the name of William Earle of Cicester, for that he there oftentimes dwelt. Adde heereunto also if you please, the Earle of Penbrooke to haue beene called the Earle of Strigulia, of the Castle of Strigulia, built by William Fitz-Osborne Earle of Hereford, and the Seate of the Earles of Penbrooke.

These things (I say) were of olde and in auncient time, but now at this day, not so. For such is the force of time, and change in altering of the forms of things, as that it eating out of the olde, bringeth still in new. So vnto Earles, whom we said in ancient time to haue beene rewarded with the third penny of the Prouince whereof they were earles, to maintaine their Honour and Dignitie, a certaine summe of mony is at this day yerely payed them out of the Exchequer, and they enioy the Titles of such places, as wherein they haue not any iurisdiction, administration, or profite at all. Barons also, who as the Fathers and Senators in auncient time among the Romans, were chosen by their Sestertia; were in like manner wont to bee esteemed and valued by Knights Fees (for why, hee which had and possessed thirteene Knights fees, and a little more, was then to bee accounted among the Barons) are now, more sildome times chosen for their vertue, their great wealth, and large possessions.

Neither is there any let, but that a man may hold and still retaine, the name and Title of a Barony, the head of which Barony (as they tearme it) he hath afterward sold or alienated to some other common person.

In briefe, our kings royall maiesty is alwayes like it selfe, constant, and the same; which hauing regard to the vertue, stock, wealth, wealth, and ſubſtance of any man (whereby hee may with his Councellor ſeruice, profit the Common-weale) may in euery place freely giue and beſtow Dignities and Honours, ſometime chuſing moe Barons then one, out of one & the ſame family, the cuſtome of the ſucceſſion of the former and more auncient Baron, beeing ſtill kept whole, and not in anie hurt: as we ſee, Edward the ſixt wiſely to haue done in the familie of the Willoughbies; which family (that for breuitie ſake I ſhould not reckon vp moe) beſide the moſt ancient Barony of the Willoughbies of Eresby, brought foorth another Barony alſo of Parham. Wherefore wee acknowledge our Kings to bee the Fountaines of Politicall Nobilitie, and vnto whom we may with thankes, referre all the degrees of Honours and Dignities; wherefore I may not, without cauſe, ſeeme to reioyce on the behalfe of our Nobilitie of Britaine, which hath alwaies ſo had Kings themſelues, Authours, Patrons, Gouernours, and Defendours thereof, that when Lands, Fees, and Poſſeſſions, ſubiect to Couenants or agreements, are ſtill toſſed and turmoyled with the ſtormes of the Iudiciall Courts, and of the Common Lawe; it is onelie vnto the Kings themſelues beholden, and reſteth vpon heroicall orders and inſtitutions, proper and familiar vnto it ſelfe. So that

For the Noble-men, for deciding of ſutes concerning their Honours, and for the giuing vnto euery man that which of right belongeth vnto his Farme and Dignitie, haue their Tribunall or proper Martiall Court, which they are wont to call, The Court of Chiualry: whereof, when wee ſhall come vnto the Order of Knight-hood, wee ſhall ſay ſomewhat more.

The Court of Chiualrie.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Noblemen of the leſſer ſort.

THe named Noblemen which our Country of England beareth, and in honour excelling, I haue with as much breuitie as I could, declared, and in painting of it foorth, propoſed it vnto the eye: with what Lawes alſo they are created, and with what orders of ſucceſſions they after our manner liue, I haue in few wordes briefely ſhewed. Now if I had vnto theſe alſo ioyned the Fellowes of the Order of the Garter, I might well ſeeme to haue ended this Treatiſe, beeing about to haue written nothing at all, of thoſe whom wee call Noble-men of the leſſer ſort, or Vnnamed: but the earneſt and continual calling vpon of certaine of my friends, ouercame mee. Wherefore, ſeeing that it is neyther altogether ſtrange from our purpoſe, and may be done without ſtraining of the Methode of that I haue taken in hand, both the place, and the requeſts of my friends haue inuited mee by the way to ioyne heereunto theſe few things heereafter following:

Three degrees or rāks of Noblemen or Gentlemen of the leſſer ſort.

The Noblemen therefore of the leſſer ſort, are in three ſorts or rankes diuidedly comprehended.

The firſt ranke or order, is of Knights: The ſecond is of Eſquires: The third, of them we call onely by the name of Gentlemen.

Thoſe whom the Frenchmen ſimplie call Gentilzhommes, and wee in Engliſh Gentlemen, wee thus diſtinguiſh into three ſorts:

Plaine Gentlemen, without anie other addition.

Firſt, hee which deriueth his Stocke with Armes from his Auncestors, is by bloud a Gentleman.

Secondly, hee which beareth Armes onely, although he be not yet by Stocke a Gentleman, is yet called a Gentleman, and giueth Gentry vnto his ſonnes.

Third-

Thirdly, hee which is of reputation onely for his learning, or for ſome Office or function which hee beareth, hee onely for himſelfe, is in common eſtimation accounted a Gentleman; although he had a common perſon to his Father, and leaue his Sonnes common perſons alſo.

Eſquiers. An Eſquire, who ſometime is alſo called Scutifer, or a Shield-bearer, and in ancient time Homo ad Arma (or a Man at Armes) in French Eſcuire, and in Engliſh a Squire, or an Eſquire, is next vnto a Knight: as hee who in ancient time following a Knight, by his ſide bare his Armes, as a moſt faithfull Fellow-ſouldier with him, From whence perhaps, they whom wee at this day in our Kings houſes, account Squires for the bodie, ſeeme to haue taken their beginning. But that which at firſt was by inſtitution a militarie Office, is now become a degree of dignitie: whereof, Antiquitie it ſelfe, and the cuſtome of our Kingdome hath brought forth vnto vs foure kinds.

The firſt doth comprehend all the younger ſonnes of Barons, and of other Noble-men, and their firſt begotten Sonnes alſo; who together with their being firſt borne, make the dignitie of Eſquireſhip ſucceſſorie, ſo long as their iſſue male faileth not.

Another kinde (and that moſt auncient) is of them, which are borne the eldeſt Sonnes of Knights, and their eldeſt Sonnes alſo.

The third is of them, which of auncient time graced with Armes belonging vnto their Stocke and Family, are the firſt begotten and chiefe of their houſe and ſtocke. And theſe by a certayne prerogatiue of being the eldeſt or firſt born, goe before all the reſt of the Gentlemen of the ſame Family aſide diſcended, and are accounted Eſquires.

The fourth kind reſpecteth the common-weale, and the Kings houſe. For they which beare publique Offices in the Common-weale, are of Gentlemen in reputation made Eſquires. Such as are the Iudges, the Kings Atturney, and Prolocutor: the Sergeants at Law, and other Officers of like ſort belonging vnto the Exchequer.

Doctors. Vnto theſe alſo wee may eſpecially ioyne, if not preferre, ſuch as proceede Doctors of Diuinitie, or otherwiſe in other profeſſions in the Vniuerſities. For Doctorſhip is a Title of Dignitie more noble, then they which are Gentlemen but by their ſtocke onely: vnto whom alſo after our manner, in the Kings Commiſſions concerning the publike affaires, ſo much præeminence is giuen, as that they may well ſeeme in dignitie, to bee compared with Knights.

In the Kings houſe alſo, the Apparitors, commonly called Sergeants at Armes, Heralds, and all ſeruing in the Kings Court, whom for the præeminence of their Offices, we alſo call Sergeants, are made Eſquiers with chaines, (viz.) with a Collar made of Siluer and blacke S S put about their neckes by the Kings themſelues.

Knights. Knights (in French called Cheualiers) are with vs called either Knights Bannerets, Knights of the Bath, or Knights Batchellors.

Other there be of the Garter alſo, but of another ſort, then that they are to be comprehended in a kind, to be compared with theſe as in due place is to be ſhewed.

Bannerets. ¶ Banneret is a degree of Honour, eſteemed the laſt amongeſt the greateſt (I meane Nobilium maiorum) or the firſt with thoſe of the ſecond ranke. Three formes of creations I haue obſerued, as ſometimes vnder the Royall Standerd diſplayed: the perſon hauing the lower end of his Pennon cut off into a ſquare (ſuch as Barons vſe) receiueth that Honour: Or as Edward the third enioyned William de la Poole by Patten, Vt ſtatum & honorem teneret & continueret Banneretti, To him and to his heires: Or as Nicholaus de Grey was declared, by Writ of King Edward the ſecond, to be, De familia Regis tanquam Bannerettus; thereby meaning, both Precedencie and Sallary accordingly.

Sir Rob. Cott. Kal. Franc. 13. Ed. 3. Ex comp. Garder. ob. 9. Ed. 2.

The two other Knight-hoods Batchellors, and of the Bath, admit this difference betweene them, that to the one from electiue grace of the Soueraigne (to attend himſelfe or Quene in their inaugurations, or his Childrens creations) there is annexed a Miniſteriall duetie to their knightly dignities; the other, nothing being left but their bare Stile and proper Merite; and therefore they are eyther in the Record, mentioned by none other ther name then Milites ſimplici, yet had in former ages (as well as other degrees of honour) many worthy and religious ceremonies, as alſo peculiar robes at their Creations (as appeareth copiouſly both in ſtory and record.) But they by iniury of times, and promiſcuous admiſſions (which ſomewhat declined their reputation) had beene fully loſt, had not the other preſerued the memory and vſe of ſuch venerable order.

As for right of precedency betweene theſe two; or whether ſuch temporall ſeruice enlarged to the one more then the other, inueſteth a perpetuall priority or no, I leaue it to the diſcuſſion of thoſe, to whom in due of place, and depth of Iudgment, it properly belongeth.

No man is borne a Knight, but men vppon their knees receiue that Dignity (which is not but together with life loſt, or taken away) of the King, or his Lieutenant generall; hauing regard eyther to his ſtocke, his vertue, or his fortune, or his actes done at home or abroad; lightly ſtriking him that is ſo to be created, vpon the ſhoulder with a drawne Sword. The Prince ſpeaking theſe words in French; Soyes bon Cheualier d'oreſenauant au nom de Dieu: (Bee from hence-forth a good Knight, in the name of God.) And they which are ſo made Knights, hauing kiſſed the Sword, and this word (Sir) being added vnto their names, for tearme of their liues, are euery where (after the French manner in calling of their Kings) diſtinguiſhed from other men; Sir Iohn Norris, Sir Francis Drake. A dignity indeede of it ſelfe ſo ſound, apparant, & ful of honor, as that it euery where beſeemeth moſt great Dukes and Earles: and which euen Kings themſelues haue not diſdained kindly to thanke one another for. For ſo we reade our King Henry the ſecond of that name, to haue made Malcolme King of the Scots, Knight at Turwin in France, for his good ſeruice at Tholouſe, in the yeare 1159. And Alexander, the Sonne of William King of the Scots, being not 14. years old, to haue receiued the order of knighthood in England, in the yeare 1212. Hugh Vere reſtored vnto the Earledome of Oxford, was by the King made Knight. Henry of Lacy alſo in the right of his Wife, and by the reſignation of his Mother in law, promoted to be Earle of Lincolne, receiued the third penny of his Earledome from the time he was made knight, about ten yeares more or leſſe before hee was created Earle. Beſide that, the ancient Regiſter of the Church of Abingdon thus reporteth.

Richard Earle of Cheſter, with his mother Ermentrude, lodged in the Towne of Abingdon; Farritius the Abbot, and the Counteſſe his Mother, earneſtly calling vpon him, confirmed for wel done, whatſoeuer was done concerning the Land of Wimondiſleie, and with his writing ſtrengthened the ſame. Which writing, he appointed to bee ſealed with his Mothers Seale, for he being not yet knighted, all the Letters by him any whether directed, were cloſed with his Mothers Seale. And for this cauſe it is, that it is noted, the writing to be ſigned rather with the ſeale of the Counteſſe, then of the Earle himſelf. Of which writing, this is the forme; Richardus Comes Ceſtriæ, & Ermentrudis Comitiſſa Mater eius, Nigillo de Oylly, &c. Richard Earle of Cheſter, and Ermentrudis the Counteſſe, his Mother, to Nigill of Oylly, &c.

This ſame thing doe alſo the ancient formes of the Parliament writs teſtifie. For it is manifeſt, Kings haue beene wont to ſummon the Nobility of the kingdom vnto their Parliaments. Ioanni Marchioni de Monteacuto Cheualier (vnto Iohn Marqueſſe of Montacute Knight: And Henricus vi. Henrico Vicecomiti Bourchier Militi (Henry the vi. vnto Henry Vicount Bourchier Knight.) 1. Edward 4. &c. Which manner of calling, although it hath begun of long to grow out of vſe in others of the Nobility, yet eyther in calling out of new Barons, or in ſummoning of the olde, it is ſtill right ſeriouſly obſerued: as Gulielmo Brooke de Cobham Cheualier (vnto William Brooke of Cobham knight.) And Gulielmo Cecill de Burghley Militi (to William Cecill of Burghley knight) when as they both were commonly knowne and called Barons or Lords of Cobham, & of Burghley: ſo that a man would almoſt ſay, the order of knights to bee the Seminary of the Baronage of England.

I let paſſe in the meane time, with how great ſolemnity of the kingdome, and charges of the Subiects, Kings in ancient time were wont to conferre and beſtow this Military honour and dignity vppon their their eldeſt Sonnes, (viz.) the Princes of Wales, and with what luſter and magnificence, Emperours and Kings ioyned in league together, (by a certaine mutuall and as it were natural power of monarks among themſelues, in beſtowing Nobility according to the Lawe of Nations) haue diſmiſſed one anothers Subiects & Ambaſſadours, graced with this Dignitie. I liſt onely heereunto to ioyne an auncient forme, with the Rites and Ceremonies thereof, out of an old Chronicle of a certayne nameleſſe writer; Anno (ſaith he) 1316. Dominus Richardus de Rodney factus fuit Miles apud Keynſham die tranſlationis Sancti Thomæ Martyris in præſentia domini Almarici Comitis de Penbroke, qui cinxit eum gladio, & Dominus Mauritius de Barkley ſuper pedem dextrum poſuit vnum calcar: & Dominus Bartholomeus de Badeliſmer (Baro vterque) ſuppoſuit aliud ſuper pedem ſiniſtrum in Aula, & hoc facto, receſcit cum honore. In the yeare 1316. Lord Richard of Rodney, was made Knight at Keynſham, vpon the day of the tranſlation of Saint Thomas the Martyr, in the preſence of Almaricus Earle of Penbrooke, who girt him with the Sword: and the Lord Maurice of Barkley put one Spurre on his right foot, and the Lord Bartholomew of Badeliſmer (both of them Barons) put the other Spurre vpon his left foot in the Hall; and this done, he with honour departed. But now according to the maner of the time, we liue after another faſhion; and in this, as in other things, the change and alteration of things hath taught vs, what an alteration of things the long continuance of time is able to make. So in thinking of the beginning of Knights, and as well of the antiquitie of the Order of Knighthood, as of the preheminence thereof aboue other dignities and honours, I can ſcarſe reſolue my ſelfe, but that this name of olde ſhould ſeeme to make ſhew vnto me of ſome (I wot not what) magnificent and maieſticall things contayned in the ſame, and more excellent then Nobility it ſelfe: and mounting (as it were) into the royall Throanes, ſitteth as it were a Iudge in the Iudgement ſeate, and the Protectour of all ciuill Nobility. For the deſciding of ſutes concerning honours, and for the preſeruation vnto euery man the right of his fame or dignity, the naturall tribunall Seate or Court for the Nobilitie, is euery where called Militaris, that is to ſay, the Martiall or Militarie Court, and commonly, the Court of Chiualrie: the forme whereof with vs is this. The appoynted place for the holding thereof, is the Kings Hall: wherein the Conſtable of the Kingdome, and the Marſhall of England ſit as Iudges, where any Plaintife, either in caſe of dignities or of Armes, or of any other ſute or controuerſie concerning Nobility and Honour, may ſue the Defendant. But the forme wherein the Conſtable of England was wont to call the Nobility and Gentry vnto his Court or Iudgement ſeate, was on this ſort:

Curia Militaris. The court of Cheualrie.

Iehan filz du Roy Conſtable d'Angleterre, &c.

IOhn the Kings Sonne, Conſtable of England, and Warden of the Eaſt-marches toward Scotland, to our welbeloued Cozin, Sir Raſe Neuile, Earle of Weſtmerland, and Marſhall of England, greeting. We command and charge you, that you cauſe to come and appeare before vs at Weſtminſter, the ninth day of May next comming, before Mounſieur Edward Haſtings, to anſwere to Mounſieur Reynold Lord of Grey, and of Rutheyn, concerning that which he ſhall then charge him with in our court of Cheualry, concerning the full vſing and bearing of his Armes, and to that the Lord Grey ſaith, and as it ſhall be more fully declared at the ſame day; and further to doe and receiue that which the Lawe and the cuſtome of our ſaid Court ſhall in this part require. Returning before vs at the aforeſaid day with this our Precept, al that you ſhall therein haue done. Giuen at Weſtminſter vnder the Seale of our Office, the firſt day of May, in the reigne of my moſt dread Lord and Father King Henry the fourth, after the Conqueſt, the eight.

Iehan filz, frere, e Vncle an Roys, Duc de Bedford, &c.

IOhn, Sonne, Brother, and Vncle to Kings, Duke of Bedford and Anion, Earl of Richmond, and of Kendall, and Conſtable of England, vnto our welbeloued Cozin, Iohn duke of Northfolke, Marſhall of England, greeting. We command and charge you, that you cauſe to be arreſted, and to come before vs or our Lieutenant at Weſtminſter, vpon the 15. of S. Hillarie next comming, William Clopton of the Countie of Suffolke Eſquire, then to anſweare before vs or our Lieutenant in the Court of Chiualrie, to Robert Eland of the County of Lincolne eſquire, to that which he the ſaid Robert ſhal then charge him with by the way of Arms, as hauing ſet and put to the Seale of his Armes to a falſe and forged writing, done to the hurt and danger of him the ſaid Robert an hundred pounds, and more then that, as he ſaith. Returning before vs at the ſayd day, with this our Mandate, all that which you ſhall haue therein done. Giuen vnder the Seale of our Office, the 23. day of Nouember, in the ſixetеenth yeare of the reigne of our Lord the King, & ſince the Conqueſt of England, the hundred.

The forme of the proſecuting of the action, is on both ſides tryed, by the looking into of Letters Patents, auncient Charters, and of Euidences (as they tearme them) and by Witneſſes. All things are (for the moſt part) acted by their Aduocates, in Writings, in Latine or in French. At length the definitiue Sentence, according vnto equitie and right, and our owne heroycall cuſtome, and not after any ſtrange maner, ſealed with the publike Seale of the Office is openly read, and afterward is deliuered to the Earle Marſhall, to be put into execution. If any thing chance to be vnprouidedly done, or vnaduiſedly in the ſute ouer-ſlipped on eyther part, it is lawful for them to appeale vnto the king, who is wont to referre the whole matter vnto the Biſhops, and other Eccleſiaſticall perſons, vnto the learned Lawyers, and others of moſt vpright life, to be diligently againe examined & expounded. And euen in this very manner it was argued, adiudged, and appealed, betwixt Reynold Baron Gray of Ruthen, and Edward Haſtings Knight, concerning the Armes of the Haſtings, in the reigne of King Henry the third. Likewiſe, betwixt the Barons of Louell and Morley, for the Armes of the familie of Burnell. And Richard Scroope Plaintife, againſt Robert Groſuenour Defendant, in an Action of Armes in the ninth yeare of the reigne of King Richard the ſecond.

But this I leaue to the iudicious labor of that noble perſon and excellent iudgement, who now can onely repaire the lamented ruines of that Iuriſdiction, hauing bequeathed vnto him the Genius of thoſe his renowned Auncеſtours, that ſo many yeares filled vp with famous memory, the Iudgement Seate of this Royall Court, referring the eye of further ſearch, eyther to the Kings Records, or to thoſe Regiſters of Armes and Honor whome it concerneth moſt to ſeeke out ſuch Monuments with the Genealogies of Families, and the Armes of Stockes and Kindreds to diſtinguiſh the ſame, to write things done, and to regiſter them vp in Bookes, for the perpetuall remembrance thereof. And who themſelues acknowledging the high Conſtable, and the Earle Marſhall of England for their Patrons, receiue yearely penſions from the Kings, and are by them with notable priuiledges rewarded.

Heere at length I might haue a large occaſion to ſpeake of the ſolemne Ceremonies of the Heralds; of their inſtitution, imminuities (both in time of peace and warre) and of the auncient reputation had of them amongſt all Nations: if it were lawfull for mee to roame at large beyond the breuitie I haue vnto my ſelfe propounded, and whom therefore I had purpoſed in ſilence to haue paſſed ouer. But, leſt I writing of ſo many degrees of out Noblemen, and ſo great things concerning Politicall Nobility, (in leauing to be ſpokeſmen for themſelues) I might ſeeme to haue ſpoken vnaduiſedly, and not indifferently, I thought it good briefly, and by the way, to touch theſe things concerning Heralds. They were in auncient time Feriales, or as Meſſengers of the publique faith and credit. But ſince the time Princes and Monarks, for diſpatch of their affaires, firſt began to haue their Ambaſſadors ſtil reſident one of them with another, the reputation of Heralds is ſo impaired, as that they euerie where liue as men neglected, & quite ouerthrowne. Yet what our Heraldes be, and in what houſes, and vnder what Lawes they (by the fauour of our Kings) together with vs in ſafety dwell, I will heere, as it were, in a ſhort Inuentorie, propound vnto the eye of the Reader. Heraldes.

The

The Collegiate ſociety of Heraldes, conſiſteth of xiij. perſons, (viz:) of

- Three Kinges, which of their offices are called
  - Garter, who goeth firſt, as cheefe Ringleader of thē all: not ſo much for the antiquity of his creation (for he was firſt created by King Henry the fift) as for the ſuper-eminence of the Order of the Garter.
  - Clarentius. } Both of thē ordained by K. Edward the 3. and are called Prouinciall kings of Armes.
  - Norroy. }
- Sixe Heraldes, which by the names of their additions are called,
  - Somerſet.
  - Cheſter.
  - Windeſor.
  - Richemond.
  - Lancaſter.
  - Yorke.
- Foure Purſuiuantes, which in Heraldrie you may call learners and followers, vnto whom other Names are giuen alſo, (viz)
  - Rougedragon.
  - Portcullis.
  - Blew-mantell
  - Rouge croix.

ALl thoſe by the names of Kings, Heralds, and Purſuiuants, are by the Kings themſelues immediatelie, or by the Conſtable of the kingdome, or the Marſhall with the Kings Authority, crowned with Crownes, graced with Collars, attired with their rich Coates, named by their names of addition, and with certaine appointed Ceremonies created, receiue their yearely ſtipends out of the Kings Exchequer, to conſult and meete together, about Armes and Authenticall Monuments, and helping and profiting vnto the Art of Heraldry. And they by the Kings Charter Incorporate, are endowed with a publike houſe in London, the cheefe Citty of the Kingdome: where (beſides the Immunities and Priuiledges whereby they liue) they are with the preheminences of their degrees and functions, one from another diſtinguiſhed.

Are set to preserue the dignity and reputation of their society, and gouerne the rest, as for example.

For some of them.

Garter, King of Armes, for the supereminent Dignity of the Garter, is of thē the cheefe; whose peculiar Office it is, with all dutifull seruice to attend vppon the Knights of that order. To aduertise them which are chosen of their new election, to call them to bee enstalled at Windsor, and to cause their Armes to be hanged vp vpon their seates. At their burials, to haue a care of their Funerall Rites & Ceremonies. Wherfore, (beside the yearely wages giuen him by the Knights) he is by the King himselfe rewarded with a Salary double to the rest. In euery new Emperour, King, Prince, Duke, Marquesse, Earle, Vicount, Baron, or Knight, to be into this order enstauled, hee challengeth of him the vppermost Garment, which he on that day weareth. He also sheweth vnto euery new Baron, called vnto the Parliament, the place wherein he is to sit among his Peeres, and ordereth other things concerning their order.

Clarentius, who is King of Armes of al the East, West, & South Prouinces of England, on this side of the Riuer of Trent.

Norroy, who is also acknowledged for king of Armes throgh the north part of the kingdom, beyond the Riuer of Trent.

These two haue by charter power to visit the Noblemens Families, to set downe their Pedegrees, to distinguish their armes, & in the open Market-place, to reproue such as falsely take vpon thē Nobility or Gentry. And to order euery Mans Exequies & Funerals, according to their Dignity, & to appoint vnto them their Armes or Ensignes, &c. And in all things gouern the Heralds as well as Garter.

Other some are pointed to obey (viz.)

Heralds and Pursuiuants

Who in all things endeuor themselues for the defence of their society, or to their own lawfull profite in priuate, and willingly depend of the commandements of the kings

---

And these onely are the Kings Heralds, with vs so called, for that they receiue wages of the kings, and with publike seruice, serue all the Nobility of the kingdome.

Howbeit, Noble-men and Peeres of this Land, in ancient time had their Heralds peculiar vnto themselues. For Chester the Herald, and Falco the Pursuiuant, liued at the commaund of the Prince of Wales, and serued him. Humfrey, Duke of Glocester, and Earle of Penbroke, had the Herald Penbroke his houshold Seruant.

Richard also, Duke of Glocester, hauing now obtayned the kingdome, wold needs haue his Herald Glocester, to bee called King of Armes for all Wales. Charles Brandon Brandon Duke of Suffolke, retained Suffolke Herald, and Marleon the Purſuiuant, his Seruants. The Marqueſſe of Dorceſter, kept Groby the Herald. The Earle of Northumberland kept Northumberland the Herald, and Eſperance the Purſuiuant. Arthur Plantaginet, Vicount L'iſle, took vnto himſelfe L'iſle the Purſuiuant: and Baron Haſtaings, Haſting the Purſuiuant. Theſe it pleaſed me to haue out of many others rehearſed, who ſerued Noblemen in their peculiar and domeſticall ſeruices. But the condition of the Seruant is made better, by the dignity of his Lord and Maſter, ſo theſe forenamed Heralds liued not with like authority or priuiledges as with the Kings.

So I breefely touch all things, for the beautifying and ſetting forth of Politicall Nobility: Now at length (by the Heralds leaue) let it bee lawfull for mee to ioyne heereunto and inſert ſome few things cõcerning Armes, whereby Noblemen are wont to be knowne from the vulgar ſort, and to be among themſelues by families diuided, being wont in ancient time to be more ſparingly beſtowed, then in this our age, and onely vpon ſuch, as had with their good ſeruice deſerued them.

But ſuch kinde of Armes ſeeme not to haue taken beginning, but of ſuch military rewards, as were wont to be giuen vnto well deſeruing men, in the Roman Common-weale. For the Romanes, alwayes moſt ſtriued for the obtayning of honor and glory, for the nouriſhing whereof, they with ornaments and rewards, laboured to ſtirre vp mens mindes, for the performance of noble actions, both at home and abroad. In warres flouriſhed Military guifts, Tropheis, Triumphall Arches, Letters Laureat, &c. In time of peace, at home were ſhewed honourable Titles, Images, Statues, and ſuch like. Things indeed wiſely at firſt deuiſed, and afterward ſo together with the Empire encreaſed, that how many, and what manner of Crowns, Bracelets, Chaines, and Creſts, euery mã had deſerued; what manner of trappings, Speares, Darts, or Belts, they had gotten: theſe they were wont in their expeditions in the wars, to beare in their Targets and Bucklers, or ſet vpon their Helmets; and againe, returning home, in time of peace, euery good Seruitor did hang them vp in their houſes; and thoſe Ornaments they by the name of Armes, were wont by long order of ſucceſſion, to deliuer ouer vnto their poſterity: and heereof thoſe armes of Families, heere and there diſpiercedly by the Nobility, vſed in diuers kingdomes, were (if it pleaſe you ſo to thinke) of the Germanes called Weapen, in our language Armes, and in Latine Arma, for that with them the enemies were repulſed.

Theſe things the ancient Roman Coynes declare, and the credible ancient Romaine Writers; the vſe wherof ſo at length preuailed in kingdomes, that as names diſtinguiſhed men from men, euen ſo Armes diuided Nations from Nations, and Families from Families: firſt granted by Kings themſelues, but afterward by the Heralds (Kings of Armes) by a Royall tranſmiſſiue power granted vnto them, they euery where eſpecially ſeruing the Politicall Nobility, vnto whom I willingly leaue theſe things. And therefore the name and office of the Heralds was euery where notable, and well beſeeming an honeſt man; whom they of ancient time wer wont to call the Foſterers of Politicall Nobility, the Arbiters of Equity, the Protectors of Verity, the Ambaſſadors of Princes, and the Writers of mens noble actes.

But woe is me, that I, carried with a certaine winde of this Method, haue thus euen againſt my will landed vpon our Heralds, whom (I know not by what deſtiny) euery man ſigheth and mourneth to ſee them working their owne deſtruction. Although indeed it be not ſo much to be maruailed at, ſeeing that the cauſe is right manifeſt (for lawfull bee it for mee to ſay the truth, which the thing it ſelfe ſpeketh) (viz.) the want of the Martiall Court, or Court of Chiualry, wherof I but now ſpake. For why, Nobility it ſelfe beeing oftentimes hurt or impared, the Heralds themſelues therewith languiſh alſo.

And yet for all that, heroycall truth wãteth not her Patrones, euen amongſt the moſt Noble and reuerend Antiquity, although as it were baniſhed, and almoſt a ſtranger in her owne houſe, hath together with the Muſes, her moſt louing, kinde and earneſt Patrones, and who were not euen vnto my ſelfe alſo wanting in the perfecting of theſe my endeuors & purpoſes.

These are the Orders and Degrees, of both our sorts of Nobility, Named and Vnnamed. Now into what ranks they are among themselues diuided, and what honour they owe one of them vnto another (by a certaine right of precedence) receiue heere in briefe.

1 THE Kings Maiesty.
2 The Prince of Wales.
3 Dukes descended of the Royall blood.
4 Dukes not descended of Royall blood.
5 Dukes eldest Sonnes descended of the Royall blood.
6 Marquesses.
7 Dukes eldest Sonnes.
8 Earles.
9 Marquesses eldest Sonnes.
10 Dukes younger Sonnes of the blood Royall.
11 Dukes second Sonnes.
12 Vicounts.
13 Earles eldest Sonnes.
14 Marquesses second Sonnes.
15 Barons.
16 Vicounts eldest Sonnes.
17 Earles second Sonnes.
18 Barons eldest Sonnes.
19 Knights Bannarets.
20 Vicounts second Sonnes.
21 Barons second Sonnes.
22 Knights Batchellors.
23 Esquires for the body.
24 Knights Bannarets eldest Sonnes.
25 Knights Batchellors eldest Sonnes.
26 Esquires.
27 Gentlemen.

The Sonnes of Knights, which are of the Kings priuy Councell, for the time, hold the places which their Fathers being knighted, were knowne to hold, beneathe Barons Sonnes. But the antiquity of the creation of euery Knight is to bee regarded: by which reasons, the Sonnes of the elder Knights, goe before the Sonnes of them that were more later created. Amongst Esquires, the antiquity of their Families, their wealth, and publike offices are considered; whereby it commeth to passe, that the wiues of them of the cheefer Families, or of such as beare great Offices take their places before others.

Howbeit, wee see no certainty to bee heere set downe concerning the places of Esquires or their Wiues, neyther concerning the places of yonger Brothers wiues forasmuch as many such things oftētimes chance, as cannot in any certaine rules be comprehended: like as it vseth to happen in Named Nobility (viz.) in Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Vicounts, and Barons.

Now at last let vs passe vnto Knights of the Order of the Garter.

WE said in the beginning, in the diuiding and reckoning vp of our Nobility, it not to be beside our purpose, if I should vnto them also ioyn the fellowship of the order of the Garter, of others (by farre) the most honourable. For that it maketh Knights, and somtime them of the lesser Nobility also, being mē for their vertue and valour, both in peace and warre aboue others famous, not only equall vnto Noblemen at home, but almost euen vnto Kings themselues & Emperors. An order verily of all the orders of the Christian world (if it be to be compared with any other) most ancient and most famous, wherein the most true Nobility it selfe, together with Religion and vertue, attended vpon with fiue and twenty most famous Knights, is seene that (I may so say) with vndefiled Maiesty to sit in the Royall Throne. Wherefore, seeing that it is an order of so great dignity, and more famous then any other Nobility; & greater, then that it can in ranke with the other orders be included, as which includeth all the other degrees of Nobility, I haue purposed as briefely as I could, here to set it downe alone, and there-withall to conclude this Treatise.

CHAP. XXV.

¶ The Order of the Knights of the Garter, when, and by whom it was ordayned.

EDward the third, the moſt inuincible King of England and of France, a Prince principally endowed with al maner of piety, magnanimitie, and wiſedome, in the xxiij. yeare of his reigne, after he had oftentimes ouer the Frenchmen and Scots triumphed, vnto the honour of Almightie God, whereunto he (as beſeemed a deuout King referred al things) in his Caſtle at Windſor, ordained the Military Ornaments and Ceremonies of the Knights of the Garter: whereunto he gaue the name of the Blew Garter (but commonly called the Garter) and wherein hee appoynted the Kings of England as chiefe, and fiue and twentie Knights or Fellowes and Companions together. Who being men both for their martial proweſſe and birth, moſt famous, and moſt choſen Chieftaines ſolemnely ſworne, and binding themſelues together with a bond of mutuall and perpetuall friendſhip, for the defence of the honour and dignity of their Colledge and Fellowſhip, refuſe not to vndergoe any danger, no not death it ſelfe. And therefore they are called Fellowes of the Garter, for that they haue the Calfe of their Leg bound about with a little Girdle, ſet with precious ſtones, which we call a Garter: the ſpeciall Cogniſance of the order, whereon it is in French, in golden Letters thus writtē: Hony. Soit. Qui. Mal. Y-Penſe. All theſe Knights once yearely attired in the Robes and Ornaments of their Order, meete together vpon the 23. day of Aprill, a day dedicated to Saint George. The Rites and ceremonies, where-with they for the moſt great preheminence of their Order, are with moſt great ſolemnity choſen and enſtauled at Windſor, and the Statutes vnder which theſe Fellowes and Companions liue, ſeeing they can in iuſt Volumes be ſcarſe contained, cannot heere in few words be expreſſed. Wherefore I liſt onely to rehearſe the names of them, which from the beginning, or together with king Edward himſelfe, were the Founders thereof, or elſe haue by our Kings from time to time, for ſome their vertue aboue others, bene ſtill choſen to be Fellowes of that moſt honorable Order, in ſtead of them that were dead, euen vnto this our age.

Commilitonum Garteriani Ordinis habitus, à fronte & à tergo.

ratum; quamvis Ordinis sit Symbolum peculiare, veſtibus coopertum, ob oculos demonſtrari nequivit.

THE PERORATION, OR EPILOGVE OF THE WHOLE VVORKE.

THus haue I at laſt concluded this Treatiſe of Nobilitie Politicke, Datiue, and Natiue, as breefely as I could, and the greatneſſe & dignity of the ſubiect would permit. Firſt, generally; as applyed to the Cuſtomes of Countries, whereto the ſame is tide; then particularly exemplified, by the Rites and Ceremonies in vſe among our ſelues. Wherein, if ſeeking to adorne the magnificence of ſo ſtately a Theame, with eloquence of words, and beauty of ſtyle, as it ſelfe doth deſerue, I ſeeme to haue failed, I muſt plead for my ſelfe, as a plaine meaning man, that ſometimes through zeale and deuotion to the Church, vndertooke to carue an Image, repreſenting the Deity and greatneſſe of his God, out of trembling and feare, was forced to craue ayde of skilfuller workmen, hauing nothing to excuſe the weakneſſe of his wit, and expiate withall, the horror of his worke, but pious ſimplicity. Euen ſuch is my caſe; For I willingly confeſſe, that being doubtfull of my ſelfe when I tooke this Taske in hand, yet my hope and comfort was, that howſoeuer I might erre, and heerein bewray my skill, my faults prouing veniall, I might giue occaſion, to ſtir vp riper wits, to further the perfection of this rude and rough-hewd-worke, and Whetſton-like at leaſt, to ſet and ſharpen others.

If now by the ſight and view heereof, (ſuch as it is) any like to take the paines from the ſheathe, to the blade; from the ſhape, to the ſubſtance; & from the ſhaddow, to the body, to wade any further; the Volume now ſucceeding, aſwell of all the Perſons, as their atchieuements of honour, marriages, alliances, and deſcents, that euer this Monarchy hath inueſted & ennobled with the titles and degrees of Political Nobility, from the Earles vpward. (Vice-Contes and Barons make a Volume of themſelues) digeſted into Catalogues, will further declare.

A worke, though not ſo perfect as the time may make it proue, for at the beginning, what thing was euer ſo? (Without pride be it ſpoken) of extraordinary ſtudy, care, and induſtry. Wherein, if onely for the publike, I haue thus emploied my ſelfe, and done my beſt endeauour, To acribès ouc hegegxthefetai. Let no mã take occaſion to taxe me of double diligence, much leſſe of affectation, ſelfe-loue, or flattery, that propounding thus a Pilgrimage pretended to bee generall, I haue ſpent my whole deuotion on the Saints of Great Brittaine. I was to fit my mould to the matter already framed, and therto wholly bending and deuiſing with my ſelfe, I aymed withall, in ſecret to redeeme ſo faire a ſubiect (ſubſiſting euery where on ſpeciall Lawes and Rites) from the wandring Ideas of diſcourſing Philoſophers, and contemplatiue Diuines to her owne proper Station, and peculiar Cuſtomes, that others elſe-where deſirous of the like, I might ſeeme rather to giue, then to ſtay their good example.

It remaines then now, to make good my firſt diuiſion into Celeſtiall, Morall, and Politicall Nobility, that I lay downe the dignity of each by themſelues, that by plaine demonſtration and comparing of their Eſſences mutually together, the world may ſee, how euen this of Great Brittaine (which heere I call Ours) is of it ſelfe abſolutely, the moſt aſſured Patterne, and beſt ordered of all others.

Hæret profectiò ſemen introrſum veri, Quod exitatur ventillante Doctrina. Nam, eurrogati ſponte recta cenſemus. Nimerſus alio vi uere et ſomes corde? Boet. lib. 1. 3.

By Gods eternall prouidence, it is ſo fore-ordayned, that for ornament and ſafety of humane life and Nature, we ſee and feele daily, ſome ſteppes as it were of diuine intelligence, and ſeeds of Morall vertue, ſtill foſtered vp within vs, euen in this lower world.

Eſt Deus in Nobis agitante caleſcimus Illo.

Piety. That (diuine intelligence) by heauenly inſpiration, doth teach vs to know God, and moues vs to ſerue him with all holineſſe of ſoule, and religious obſeruation.

Probity. This (vertuous diſpoſition) by an inbred ingenuity, becomes the Mother of this our Poſitiue Nobility. For, as theſe two ſtill ioyned together, firſt open the way by ſteps and degrees (though by diuers paſſages) to come to Kingly Grace, and Soueraigne Eudochyſt, Datiuely; ſo Ex Ingenuis fiunt Eugeneia Eugenes, from inbred Ingenuity, men firſt become Generous, which alſo leades them on in the ſelfe-ſame Nobility Natiuely. For as godlineſſe or piety, by diuine inſpiration, and in-bred Ingenuity, by vertues infuſion, makes vulgar men exempted, and ſo honeſtly reſpected aboue their fellowes, that nothing may diſgrace them, but iniquity and hereſie, yeelding matter and occaſion to this kinde of Nobility that ſubiects obtaine from Soueraine grace & fauour, Datiuely: Euen ſo, where grace becomes ſo fixed in the perſon of any, that nothing can remoue it but Death or high-treaſon; it begets generoſity by deſcending to poſterity, Natiuely. So that, as to be gloriouſly happy in the world to come, by diuine inſpiration from God to man, by the name of piety, proceeds from Chriſtianity imputatiuely. And as to be honourably eſteemed before God and man, for inbred ingenuity, by the name of probity, proceeds from ciuility infuſiuely; ſo to be lawfully exempted from the vulgar ſort, by the name of Generoſity, proceeds from grace, Mediate or Immediate reſpectiuely al worthily ennobled in their ſeuerall kindes and places: whereby the meaneſt Subiect being thus made happy, becomes aſwell Nobilis (which wee call a gentleman, and the French ſound Gentilhomme) as the Emperor himſelfe, ſaying; *Foy * de Gentilhomme.* And, Me voicy Gentilhomme auſſy bien que le Roy. Though in Engliſh and in French, the word it ſelfe ſeeme ſtraightened. For we call no man Noble, but from the Baron vpward, wher Nobilis in Latine, includes the meaneſt Gentleman, aſwell as Lords and others. The names of Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earles, Vice-Counts & Barons, &c. beeing titles of preheminence, to diſtinguiſh the celebrity of each mans place & function, for orderly precedence.

Nobility, or Gentility.

* The reaſon perhaps why in England our Noblemen, from the Baron vpward, in points of honour, are put to no other oathes, then by laying their hands on their breaſts, proteſt vpon their honours

Thus then, though none become Chriſtians by the rules of piety, carnally; and our inbred-ingenuity, proceed not from our Parents by the rules of probity, naturally; yet a Gentleman, one may be both reputed, and ſo called by the lawes of celerity, alias Cheualry, alias Heraldry, euen for humanity, and honeſt conuerſation ciuilly, and ſo become ennobled in himſelfe and his poſterity Politically. For,

"Eſt aliquid clarus Magnorũ ſplendor Auorũ
"Illud poſteritas æmula calcar habet.

Glory. Honour. And as to be a Chriſtian, is the glory of all Nobility, and to be an honeſt man, is of it ſelfe moſt honourable: ſo to bee aduanced by the eye of Soueraigne Maieſty, with ſuch Enſignes of Nobility, as demonſtrate his celebrity in himſelfe and his poſterity, is properly moſt Noble; Noble. Armes. Armes being in this reſpect ordayned to limit Families, as proper names do men. Whereby (this) ſtands diſtinguiſhed frõ the other (two.)

Glorious. For the firſt, from religious imputation, being hid frõ the world, makes Chriſtians only gloriousby faith, with God in heauẽ.

Honorable. The ſecond, from vertuous infuſion, makes honeſty moſt honorable, & vertue ſtill admired by good works among men.

And this third, from abſolute affection in Soueraigne loue and grace, makes ſubiects riſe ennobled reſpectiuely abroad, but properly at home, for ſeruices performed in the Church and Common-weale.

Ennobled. Now, all that haue the happineſſe to be glorified in heauen, or honoured vppon earth, or ennobled at the leaſt, receiue it firſt or laſt from God, & his Lieutenants, whoſe infuſiue grace and greatneſſe, are the grounds of all our credits.

The firſt, by Diuines, beeing religiouſly taught (taught, and the second by Philosophers, being morally disputed, like Twins of one birth, or cousin-germans at least, by piety and probity in a heauenly kinde of kindred, makes mortall men immortall, and by fame to liue for euer. But the third, which this Treatise hath begot, or gladly would restore; being meere positiue with Kings, within their kingdomes, and Orphant-like committed to their care and speciall trust, depends vpon their wils, their Rites and Country Customes. From whence it is, we see such Rankes of Nobility, such seuerall names of dignities, and titles of honor, bestowed vpon Subiects for Piety and Probity, conspicuous in the world by Soueraigne grace and fauour. Who at first, being but meane, and of slender beginnings, become at last extolled to places of renowne, from the foot-stoole, aduanced to the type and top of honour, & the same like ebbes and floods, with time againe decline.

Fame.

These kindes of Nobility thus seuerally laide open, and by a three-fold disposition made apt to be diuided, are not (notwithstanding) so at oddes within themselues, that their Natures and their Essences admit no reconcilement, or may not be vnited in one Person altogether.

For the first, being celestiall, and meerly diuine, admits no worldly vanity, whose Soueraigne is God, and whose Robes of perfection wee shall then put on vpon vs, when wee come to bee presented before Christ our King in Heauen. This is our cheefest glory, our summum bonum, and highest blisse, whereto who striues to rise, and hopes to attaine, must worke it out by faith, and lay his foundation on the true Christian-Catholique and Apostolique-Religion; without which, euen Vertue her selfe, with all her Morall Lessons, auailes vs nothing, as pointing onely to this end, aymes at this happinesse, but obtaines it neuer.

Nobility Theologicall

And they that being heere conuersant with me on earth, haue their mindes so cleare and enlightened from aboue, that fore-seeing this end, they bend themselues thereto, and by a prudent care and constancy, still ayming at Iustice, seeke onely the good of the Church and Commonwealth. These (I say) by their vertues once conspicuous, become for euer famous, and worthily honoured with that kinde of Nobility, which Philosophers so magnifie and extoll vnto the world.

Nobility Philosophicall.

Now, these also at length being noted by their names, and made knowne to Soueraigne Kings (that as Gods with God-Almighty rule heere the earth in common) are by them ennobled; first Datiuely, with that Nobility, which descending to posterity, by right of inheritance, is Natiue of it selfe, and in all places subiect to peculiar Customes. From whence it comes to passe, that seeing Honesty, the height and type of honour, and vertue the way that leads vs thereunto; wee admire more Nobility Datiue, being truely deriued and raised for it selfe, then that which is Natiue, and descended from other, as whose person first for vertues sake, being for it selfe beloued, becomes withall illustrious, and layes the foundation of happinesse in others. Nam Genus & Proauos, & Quæ non fecimus Ipsi: vix ea nostra voco. For though in Nobility Politike and Ciuill, Generosity by antiquity, seeme to be respected: and to be borne a Lord, be more Noble, then so to be created; yet is it not so honourable, though farre more generous. For Vertue of her selfe being euery way magnificent, first honours the Father, then dignifies the Sonne, & magnifies posterity, which by the Greeians is more significantly spoken, and better vnderstood, by their Eugeneia and genaion applying this to Ingenuity, which belongs vnto the minde, and that vnto Celebrity more proper to the kinde.

Nobili'ty Politicall.

Honorable. Generous.

Eugeneia. Genaion.

This then at the last, is that Celestiall, Morall, and Politick Nobility, that at first I propounded: whereof, when Diuines in their Sermons seeme to speake, and Philosophers by discourses goe about to dispute, they demonstrate nothing but Allegoricall Ideas, and immaginary shaddowes, the substance whereof, wee must hope to finde in Heauen; when as heere euen on earth, for the good & furtherance both of Church and Common-wealth, it is cherished and dignified at the hands of Soueraigne Kings, and as fittest for graue Councellors placed next vnto thēselues, whereof this rude Treatise containes the truest patterne that the world affoords; namely, The Nobility of this Monarchy of Great-Brittaine. And therein as Instar Omnium and Modell of the rest, the most Honourably-Noble Order of knights of the Garter: there there being nothing found recorded, for Religion, in shew more beseeming a christian; for Vertue more Heroicall; nor for Pollicy, more assured, then this Religiously most Honourable and most Noble Society. For whereas all other of like institution, by growing ouer-vulgar, are become the lesse esteemed; or prouing else but idle, are at all hands neglected: onely This is still so well supplyed with the Flower of true Nobility, that euer fresh and springing, by yearely showes and lusters, it dismisseth the beholders with greater admiration, then the best words of my Pen are able to vtter.

The Epitomy or Modell of al three kinds of Nobility, in one Order of the knights of the Garter.

For heere, all behold Maiesty her selfe, betweene Greatnesse and Decorum, descend from her Throne, to walke & talke kindely with her owne Nobility: and Nobility it selfe betweene Honour and Reuerence, ascending on the Seate of her own Soueraigne Maiesty.

Heere the Religion of our Church, the Wisedome of our State, and the Nobility of our Court, admiring Kingly Maiesty, meete all in one together.

And heere our King with his Prince, our Prince with his Peeres, and our Peeres with their Worthies, meete and march together in one Bond of Loue, in one Order of Chiualry, for mutuall defence both of Church and Common-wealth, amazing the beholders with the stately sight and view of one personall Maiesty, in one fellowship of Honour, and one body of vnstained and true Nobility.

Heere therefore to conclude, as the fittest place to end this weake and slender Treatise. If that which hath beene saide, deserues to be regarded (as Truth sayes it should) why do the Soueraignes and Monarchs of the world, then wrong themselues in their Greatnesse and Authority, giuing way to proud violence, and prophane intrusion, wherby Popes haue put downe Emperors, & Cardinals presume to compare themselues with Kings? For whereas they alone by speciall Commission and Preheminence of place, and Vncommunicable power, and Prerogatiue of Grace, are made the Moderators of the vertuous endeuours, and onely Creators of all Titles of Honour, belonging to their Subiects, they suffer Nobility to be tied, as it were against her owne Nature, to Fees, Houses, Castles, Cities, and Lands, senceless and transitory, that neyther infuse Religion, nor administer Iustice, nor encrease eyther in their prophane Possessors, nor make vulgar Tenants more honest, or more noble. For Ornanda potius est Dignitate Domus quam ex Domo Dignitas vtcunq; querenda, neq; a Domo Dominus sed a Domino Domus est vbiuis honestanda.

And thus hauing ended in the best sort I could, if I were to yeeld a reason of all that I haue done, in a word, it should bee thus: The glory of God, and my Countries honour, to whom all stand indebted in all that we are, or can bee of our selues. Allegiance & Seruice to my Soueraigne, and his Nobility, and affection by Alliance, to the memory of mine Vnckle and deceassed Friend, were the Motiues only moued mee to take this worke in hand.

Hauing therefore now both offered vp, and thus paide all my vowes: mine Enthousiasme compels mee to salute his blessed Genius, that by louing of Nobility, so hartily & so well, thus happily made happy, liues ennobled now in Heauen.

THE SIXT BOOKE.

OF THE GOVERNEMENT and Administration of Iustice, obserued in the Common-wealth of Gennes or Geneway.

CHAP. I.

THe people of Liguria are contained betwixt the Riuers of Varus* & Macra*, along the Sea-coast, & the downefall of the Apënines. Of all which country, the city Gennes or Geneway (most noble for antiqnity and power) hath (for the larger part of time) held the rule and Soueraignty, becauſe both for buildings, as alſo in nobilitie of actions, and in reſpect of valiant men, it hath euermore beene very notable among all the reſt of former times. This Cittie gracing the South with hearbs, beauteous lookes, is moſt prowdly built vpon the Sea-coaſt, and hath her backe vpon the North, at the foote of a mountaine: euen as if ſhe were deſcended downe the mount, and come to repoſe her ſelfe vppon a Plaine, the mountaine remaining on her backe part to defend the citie from the furious North. It is not altogether plaine nor mountainous, but participateth both of the one and other giring about the compaſſe of ſixe miles, ſo faire and goodly as can be deſired.

* A Riuer which diuides Narbone frō Liguria.
*A riuer running out of Apennin us, & parting Liguria from Hetruria.

The ſituation of the cittie of Geneway.

And becauſe concerning her Antiquitie, we can not deliuer any thing certaine (in regarde ſome doe maintaine, that it was built by Genoua or Iuno, the daughter of Saturne; others, by Genuinus, the companion of Phaeton; and ſome by Ianus, who was ſaid to be Noah) it ſhall be ſufficient therefore to ſay, that it was accounted a citty two hundred and ninetie yeares before the comming of Chriſt on the earth, as manifeſtly appeareth (ſetting aſide Titus Liuius in the Decade of his eight Booke) by a Table of Braſſe, found (no long time ſince) in the Valley of Pozzeuera, and placed in the Church of Saint Laurence: whereon is engrauen in auncient Letters, That in the Conſulſhip of Lucius Cecilius, and of Quintus Manilius, Iudges were ſent from the Senate of Rome, to diſcide the variance betweene the Vitturi, and the people of Geneway, concerning the neare neighbouring valley. And becauſe as well the ſententiall execution, as the gaole deliuerie of priſoners, which were in reſpect of that ſtriſe maintained, was to ſucceede and follow in Geneway: therefore we may heereby comprehend, that the City (vntill that time) conſiſted vpon ſome other conſiderations.

Concerning the antiquitie of Geneway. and by whom it was firſt founded.

A braſſe table found in the vale of Pozzeuena.

Now,

Geneway possessed diuers countries in the East part in former times.

Now, this so noble Cittie, in former times held a great estate, and was possessed of many Countries in the East parts: and now it is very powerfull by Sea in all respects, sometimes seruing the the Duke of Millaine, sometimes the king of France, euer being traueled with much busines, either in regard of being an illustrous and famous Cittie, or because it is the passage, and (euen as it were) the gate for going from the mountaines into Italy. Whereupon some conceiue and are perswaded, that it was called Ianua, as a Gate for Italie, and not Ianua of Ianus, who was old father Noah. But let it be in maner howsoeuer, the men of this nation are industrious, euermore attentiue to merchandize, whereby they attaine vnto great wealth, and as with other people it fareth, euen so amongest them, there is alwayes great plenty of money, because no one priuate man, but very many more beside, haue made passage of fiue hundred thousand ducats, euen after the best valuation.

The people of this nation addicted to merchandize greatly.

And yet these men so great and wealthie, beeing molested by some parcialities, which diuers times haue endangered Italie, are now, and so haue beene for no small time, ready with their weapons in hand, expulsing now one familie, and soone after another, from the State; and now the Nobles gaining superioritie, afterward the popular sort; one side fauoring the Adorni, another the Fregosi, and at legth reduced (by the benefit of prince Andrea Doria) to the present libertie which they now enioy. For Geneway being in the power of the French, and Doria departing from seruice to the King of France, to whom hee was Admirall: at one and the selfe same time, deliuered both himselfe and Countrey from seruilitie to the King of Fraunce, and questionlesse with vnconquerable corage. For he might haue impatronised and possessed himselfe of the whole State, beeing entreated and euen (as it were) constrained by his friends, that he would vouchsafe to take the commaund of them: but he rather affected (setting aside all ambition) to restore them to their former freedome, with so much glory to him in future ages, as so rare an example in him did iustly merit: whereto (perhaps) hee might be the rather incited, by the enuie he bare to Christopher Columbus, because, if he opened to modern people the other part of the world, which had for so many yeares beene shut vp from all other: so this other (with wel gouerned thoughts) spurning at all appetite of dominion, might open to his owne Citizens (with their libertie) the State so long lockt vp, by the discord of their owne opinions. Wherefore, deseruedly the Genewayes erected a Statue to his perpetuall glorie, and the memorable renowne of his immortall actions: as for his immense gift by his worthy industrie, was done to Columbus, by the Princes of Spaine.

The readines of the Geneways for all dangerous occurrents.

Andrea Doria Admirall to the King of Fraunce, and deliuerer of Geneway frō French thraldome.

Andrea Doria enuious of the honour of Christopher Columbus, in the restoring of his Countries libertie.

A Statue erected in honor of Andrea Doria.

Geneway thus receiuing in anno 1528. her nouell reformation; entred vpon the same forme of gouernement which it now maintaineth. A description was then made, and therein set downe all the Families of account, as well noble as popular, appearing as descended of sixe houses in Geneway: and the reckoning grew so, that in Geneway there were found 28. Families. All the rest remaining out of this account, and yet were of some consideration, but not deriued from those sixe houses: were aggregated and written downe in the aforesaide number of twentie eight families, by the title of Nobilitie, excluding the remainder of the people and Plebeians. And notwithstanding this entrance thus made, there was an addition to the number of these Nobles, of tenne persons in like sort ennobled, either for their riches or vertue, and these were made choice of euerie yeare, applying their paines still frō hand to hand.

An obseruation made concerning the best Families in Geneway, deriued of six and amounting to eight and twentie.

The noblemen more added to the former number of eight and twentie.

With all this prouidence, they could not yet so well preuaile, but in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred seauenty and foure, a new tumult arose in the Common-wealth, and as in the wonted ciuile dissentions: so a diuision happened that yeare, betweene two factions, termed olde and new. The principall occasion which moued this contention, was, that the olde side, being not contented to haue the greater part of authoritie in the Common-wealth; did mortally hate the new side, abhorring & disdaining (albeit that the new side, both for auncient Nobility, and true vertuous merit, were equall to them in al respects) to ioyne in kindred with them. This was infinitely infinitely displeasing to Mattheo Senarega, a Citizen of most eminent authority, and who (at that time) was great Chancellour, and chiefe Secretarie of the Common-wealth; also had beene principall of the new side more then once, and both of the publike & priuate Councell; with very singular Eloquence hee intreated them, affirming, that it was not well, that such diuersitie of interests and priuate respects, should haue life in one and the same City: shewing also by liuely reasons, how auaileable it was to euery man, and likewise profitable for the State, that all should conuerse and like mutually together.

A new tumult between two factions, olde & new in the Common-wealth.

Matheo Senarega a man of great account among the Geneweyes, striuing to asswage this perturbation.

But the words and euident reasons of Senarego, failing of sufficient efficacie, puffed vp the olde side with greater obstinacie, yet drew a farre better opinion of the new, prouoking so farre to defend them, that oftentimes hewas in danger of his life among them. For the old side did greatly enuie, that the authoritie of Senarega should pearch to such a height, that in him onely should be reposed, the efficacie of the publike and priuate gouernement. Neuertheless, Senarega opposing their pernicious demonstrations with wonderfull wisedome, mooued especially (as the fame went) by a generous disdaine, wrought in such sort, that the new side assumed the chiefe place in gouernement, excluding (well-neare) all the olde, constrayning them to forsake their Countrey, if they attempted any Armes or violence against the new side.

There are none so violēt as wilfull aged men, when they are grounded on an obstinate opiniō.

The new faction preuailed by generall voice against the olde, by the meanes of Senarega.

These words would much haue stirred the Common-wealth, if Senarega, fore-seeing the weighty perill, and preferring the publique good of all (beeing most iustly to be affected) before any priuate respect whatsoeuer, had not brideled the head-strong course of intended hostilitie. Wherefore hee wrought so painfully with the Geneweyes themselues, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, and especially with Pope Gregorie the thirteenth, all fauoring him with their helpfull assistance, as the tumults in the Citty were quieted, and after some few desperate accidents, the furie of Armes was quite blasted, wherein both the faithfulnesse of Senarega, and his admirable wisedome euidently appeared. Hee being appointed (by vniuersall consent) Ambassadour to Rome, with infinite prouidence and care (to the honour of the Common-wealth, and his owne great reputation) discreetely qualified both factions, already growne to such a head on either side, both by power and maleuolence; as not onely threatned danger to the Countrey it selfe, but likewise to haue filled all Italy with innumerable calamities and confusions; whereof the Pope (by his Breues) deliuered most honourable testimonie, writing the actions of Senarega to the * Doye, as also to the Procurators of the Commonwealth of Geneway.

All stirres and tempestuous tumults calmly ouer-blowing, by the diligent endenours of Senarega.

* A Title belonging onely to the Dukes of Venice and Geneway.

The great Councell.

FRom the whole bodie of the before-recited Families, is congregated a Councel of foure hundred persons yerely, who together with the Duke and the Gouernours, haue the charge of the Common-wealth in their power. This Councell maketh election of the Duke, and of the eight Gouernours, (because the Gouernours are the iust number of eight) and haue care of the State for two yeares continuance. They mannage matters of importance, and concerning generall good, as also for the conseruation of the Seigniorie: and these Gouernours (with the Duke) are properly called the Signoria. But and if they are at any time to handle some occasions, which are not so important and weightie, but of meaner consideration: The Signoria haue a lesser Councell in readie seruice, consisting of an hundred men of the Nobilitie, elected by the Signoria by lotterie, and out of the maine bodie of the foresayd foure hundred.

A Councell consisting of 400. persons, and what authoritie they haue.

The Signoria or dominion of Geneway,

A lesser councell of a hundred Noblemen.

The Duke.

THe head or chiefe of the Common-wealth is the Duke, because he hath the Title and Honour which appertaine vnto him: and it is an auncient degree in the City, whereto by varietie of times, diuers persons haue attained, but not by any course of Lawe. He continueth for two yeares, and in all that time of his authoritie, thority, he dwelleth in the publique Pallace; hauing fiue hundred high Germaines as his Guard, representing heerein the forme of an absolute Soueraignetie. At the beginning of the assumption of his magistracie, for two dayes hee is clothed in his Ducall ornaments; but afterward, and the whole consistence of his regiment, hee weareth other habites, but yet of Veluet or crimson Sattin, and sometime purple. His authoritie is very important, because hee onely, and not any other, may propound what cause he wil in Councel and in the Senate, which is forbidden vnto any other Senatour. Whereupon, whosoeuer would record any Lawe to the Common-wealth, or else propound a motion of some important matter, he must break it to the duke, and passe it by his meanes.

The most eminent Officer in the Common-wealth, and his authoritie endureth but 2 yeares.

Wherein the Dukes authoritie consists aboue all other.

The manner of the Dukes elections is thus: The third day of the moneth of Ianuary, the Senate doth assemble with the lesser Councell, without the person of the passed Duke; because hee hauing ended his Office of two yeares, returneth the first day of Ianuary home to his own house as a priuate person, and remaineth a Procurator all his life time. The lesser Councell with the Senate, doe elect among them (by ballot) eight and twenty Noblemen, one for each Familie, who so soone as they are chosen, are called into the Pallace, and there shut vppe in a place by themselues, and there, together with those Senatours, who eyther in regard of age, or by contumacie of the Families are not capable of the dukedome: they elect eighteene men amongst themselues, one for a Familie; and those eighteene, together with the same Senatours, do elect another eight and twentie, which eight and twentie are called, and beeing lockt vp with the aforesayde Senatours, they proceede by ballotting them that are to bee propounded to the Councell to be Duke. But heere you must know, that they may propound no more to the great Councell, but foure persons onelie, and in the election of that number, it is necessarie, that the eight and twentie doe agree in two third parts among themselues, with the part of the aforesaide Senatours. This being agreed between them, before they come forth of the Consistorie, they elect another eight and twenty, one for each Family, who returne together with them, from ballotting the aforesaid foure. And they rise from their Election with the two thirds, and put in place of him or them (not formerly approoued) one, or more, but of the number of the Senate: which being done, the Councell meete together, and they propound the names of the foure men concluded on and elected by the Electors: whereupon, hee of the foure that hath the most ballots, is named for Duke. And at the time when I wrote this discourse in that honourable degree of Duke, was chosen the most curteous and famous Lord, Paulo Baptista Caluo, sometime a Iudge, a most worthy man, for goodnesse of life, and practise in the worlds occasions.

In what manner the Duke is elected on Ian the 3. day

Ballotting is a kind of choise by Bullets, or small balles, which eache man puts in on his behalf, who he would haue in nomination.

Paulo Baptista Caluo, elected duke of Geneway.

Of the eight Gouernours.

THere sit vpon the Bench (with the Duke) eight Gouernors, as his councellers, and their Office doth endure for two yeares: and they, with the duke are named the Signoria, and gouerne the Common-wealth. All these together cannot deliberate on any thing, wherein the interest of the people is concerned, or of any chiefe important busines; but they call for the ayde of the Great Councell. These Gouernors are elected by two at a time, at sixe and sixe months; and their elections made in this manner.

Councellers sitting on the Bench with the Duke.

The lesser Councell and the Duke being assembled together, they elect eight and twenty men, one for euery Familie, who beeing chosen by the Senate and Duke, doe propound sometimes twelue, sometimes foureteene men to the great Councell; who (by ballotting) do make election of one of them at a time. The next day following, they obserue the same order in electing the second, to wit, the lesser Councell do elect another eight and twenty, and that eight and twenty performe the rest as hath beene said. Euery one of the eight Gouernors ending his office, remayneth Procurator or Atturney for two yeares space: so that in the Colledge of the Proctors, there are alwayes eight, that stand for the gouernement of the Common-wealth; and all these come into the Senate with the duke, and with the eight Gouernors, deliberatedeliberating together on important matters; and thus with theſe Gouernours & the Duke conſiſteth the whole ſumme of the State. Two of them haue abiding in the Pallace, the other keepe at their owne houſes; and they change by turnes two at a time, at three months, and three months.

Of the Procorators or Proctors.

The Proctors come to the higheſt dignitie of al.

COncerning theſe Proctors, ſome of them liuing, doe come to be in the Office of Duke, and ſome doe remaine in charge but two yeares, and they are ſuch as haue beene Gouernours. They haue care for procuring all publike occaſions, collecting the rents and reuenues, and other ſuch like buſineſſe; being men of chiefe reputation, and of no meane importance.

Of the Poteſtate or Proctor.

The Poteſtate is an Officer choſen abroad and not of the citty.

AL the forenamed Magiſtrats, do onlie attend vpon the gouernement of the Common-wealth. Next now, concerning matters of Iuſtice and Iudgement (ſpeakiug firſt of criminall cauſes) they are guided and ordered in common by a forraine Poteſtate, who is a doctor, and they graunt him an honourable ſtipend. He hath his reſidence in a Pallace, which is neare to the Dukes, and he heareth and iudgeth all offences happening; but can aſſigne no capitall puniſhment, without conſent of the Senate. Two other Doctors, being ſtrangers alſo, doe aſſiſt him, whereof the one is called the Iudge of Malefactours, and the other Fiſcall or Atturney generall: and by the ayde of theſe two Iudges, all proceſſe and ſuites are formed againſt guilty perſons, dealing alſo in caſes of like nature. Beſide theſe afore-named, the Poteſtate hath his Vicar, who attendeth vpon Ciuile cauſes, onely executiue.

Two Iudges more as his aſſiſtants.

Of the extraordinarie Office.

Seauen men termed Extraordinarie Officers, & what their charge is.

THere is an Office of ſeauen men, called Extraordinarie, and theſe do repreſent (as it were) the Princes perſon, becauſe he is buſied in adminiſtration of the Common-wealth. Their care conſiſteth, in reforming and prorouging of variances, and granting tutors to Schollers. And becauſe contention is forbidden betweene Parents and Parents, and betweene poore and rich by ordination: theſe men doe appoynt what magiſtrate they meete, to heare offending parent and kindred, as alſo the ſtrifes betweene poore and rich. Their Office continueth the ſpace of ſixe months, and is of much dignitie.

Of the fiue ſupreme Sindicators.

Such as trie and arraigne the Officers of higheſt eminencie for their offences

THere is alſo a Magiſtracie, wherein are fiue men, called ſupreame Sindicators; They haue authority to arraigne, not onely the Duke, but the Gouernors alſo, after the expiration of their charge: and they haue the like power ouer all other magiſtrates of the Commonwealth, to puniſh both the Duke and Gouernours, finding them to bee delinquent.

The Duke and Gouernours haue eight dayes for their triall.

And when the Duke is out of his Office, and that the Gouernours haue fulfilled their magiſtracie; a Proclamation is publiſhed by theſe Supreame Sindicators, That if any man haue ought to charge the Duke withall, or the Gouernors, let them appeare in their preſence, and Iuſtice ſhall be done them. In which reſpect, the Duke and Gouernonrs haue eight dayes aſſigned them for this ſcindication; which beeing paſt, and they found in errour, they are puniſhed: but being innocent, they haue a Pattent aſſigned them of their innocencie, whereby they are after called to be Proctours; becauſe they cannot enter as Proctours, except they haue the Pattent from thoſe Supreame men, to allow their expedition. Finally, the greatneſſe of this Office is ſuch, that the Common-wealth elected for one of theſe Supreame Scindicators, the Prince Andrea Doria, the deliuerer of his Countrey. They are elected by the leſſer Councell, with the Senate, and ſit in the Pallace next to the Senate, for their reſpect.

Of the Rota.

Other Doctors, being ſtrangers, appointed to cēture in ciuile cauſes.

BEcauſe wee haue formerly ſpoken of criminall occaſions, now let vs ſay ſomewhat concerning ciuile cauſes. Wherein ye are to know, that the Common-wealth doe make choice of fiue doctours, tors, forraignes or ſtrangers, at euery 2. yeares, which bodie of authoritie is called Rota. Theſe men attend vpon Ciuile cauſes onely, and dwell in the Dukes pallace: Al ſuch matters as they cenſure on, are guided by ordinarie courſe of the Imperiall Lawes, forming their Proceſſe and ſuite, according to the iudiciarie order appointed for the Cittie, which is after the auncient maner.

Of the Cenſors.

Care for tradeſmen & ſuch as deale in all profeſſions.

NOw, as concerning Arts, Trades and Myſteries, Cenſors are appoynted to that charge. Theſe men do prouide, that buyers, ſellers, and all ſuch as trafficke in handi-crafts, ſhall haue meaſures, weights, and all things elſe to them belonging, iuſt, and according to the auncient Lawes. And here we are to obſerue, that euery Art hath chiefe or head men, who are called Conſulles, which make election of Artiſts amongſt them. Theſe Conſulles haue authoritie in the matters of their Artes, and amongſt theſe Conſulls, ſuch as deale in ſilks, may command much ouer their men: ſo that their power extendeth, to put them to the halter, to baniſh them, and perforce ſend them to the Gallies, or to giue other caſtigations to delinquents.

Conſulls the chiefe men of euery trade.

Of forty Captaines.

The militarie guarde & defence of the Cittie, and their ready preparation at all times and occaſions.

IN the Cittie of Geneway there are forty Captaines, of the number and bodie of the Nobilitie, and they are changed euery yeare. Theſe men haue vnder them an hundred men (for one) of the people, ſo that they make (in all) foure thouſand perſons, and the Common-wealth is ſerued by them at all occaſions. For they make a guarde in time of the leaſt ſuſpition; and when the Signoria is abroad, theſe fortie Captaines (bearing them company) are all clothed in Veluet, goodly and honourable ornaments, meete to attend on ſo great Lords. Moreouer, all men in the Citty, and the whole Burrough, that are apt to carrie Armes, are regiſtred downe, from the age of twentie, to threeſcore, and are reduced vnder the gouernment of thoſe Captains, who (with them) ſtand alwayes obliged to be readily armed with weapons in hand, according to the auncient cuſtome ordained.

Of the Generall.

Auguſtino Spinola Generall of the Geneway forces.

THe Common-wealth hath continually a Generall, who is appoynted for Armes, to ſerue in all occurrences, and in times of warre. At this inſtant it enioyeth (well deſerning ſuch a degree, and to the ſatisfaction of all the Nobilitie, much pleaſing to the whole hoaſt of Souldiers, and vniuerſall liking of the people) the Lord Auguſtino Spinola, a moſt honourable and valiant Gentleman of that Citty, full of incomparable bountie and knowledge, not onely in the occaſions of Armes, but for all mannagements of the world beſide.

Of the Office of Saint George.

At what time the Office of Saint George beganne.

THe Office and Magiſtracie of Saint George, moſt noble among all the reſt in the Cittie, was ordained in the yeare, 1407. It is now (by length of time) the conſeruation of that Common-wealth, which, in thoſe yonger dayes had not any naturall riches or wealth, fitting the qualitie of ſuch a Country: yet notwithſtanding, it wanted not men of quicke and apprehenſiue iudgement, to find out the way, and forme ſome means for procuring of moneys, that might ariſe to common vſe: whereupon, they that liued in thoſe auncienter yeares, and gouerned the publique occaſions, tooke vp moneys of particular perſons, ſome by conſtraint, others with much willingnes. And true it is, that in this money matter, ſuch priuate perſons as diſburſed any ſummes, the publique vſe payed them, tenne, nine, eight and ſeauen in the hundred, according to the varietie of times, to the end, that they might not ſuffer any endammaging, by ſuch ſeruice as they did for publique benefit.

Prouiſion for money alwayes in bank for the cities vſe.

Proceeding in this courſe, it made men willing, ready and cautelous, in ſeeking ſecurity for their moneys, dayly put into the publique Banque, by ſelling to ſome (as for example) the power and iuriſdiction of toll for meates; to others, the impoſts of wines, and to others the taxations layd on corne. And theſe contracts made both in publique and particular, was tearmed among them Bargaining and Buying, as when particular men bought any thing of the common ſort, or in generall.

Great ſtockes of coine ariſing out of meane and poore beginning.

The beginning of trading and Societies in Geneway, onely by the Banquers that lent out moneis to vse

And it was ordained, that whosoeuer disbursed an hundred pounds, hee was said to hold one place among the buyers: he that disbursed two hundred, had two places; and hee for three hundred, three, and so it passed from hand to hand. So that this kinde of commerce and vsance multiplied greatly, and had names of diuers ordinations; as of the Capitoll, of Saint Paule, and others of their profession, by dealing in Salt, and diuers other beside, whose Titles and Names grew by their trading, and helde correspondencie particularly among the best Citizens, hauing care for iust payments, and the dues of the profites, with consideration of the Banquer, who alwayes ordered the contracts made publiquely or priuately. Hereupon, the number of dealers dayly encreasing, both by forraigne Nations and home-bred friends, which required diuersitie of Gouernours and Ouer-seers, and which else would grow to great confusion: it was therefore ordered by the Signoria, that all the Banquers should bee reduced and vnited into one absolute Societie, and named the Company of Saint George.

Eight gouernors or Ouerseers of the Banquers, both for lending and allowances.

Beeing thus ordained, they were also appoynted to bee gouerned by eight Citizens from yeare to yeare, who prouided and gaue order, how the Banquers should let out their summes, and receiue in their interests and allowances, whereby they held the eminencie in the Office of Saint George. And in regard they perceyued, that this Office gouerned these matters with wisedome and iustice, businesse dayly encreasing, and the number of places supplyed by new persons: alienation of profits grew among the Commons, and the charge of the Office euery way to be greater, by reason of lands and communities interessed with them, so that the Office attained to many priuiledges: first, by the Signoria of Geneway, and afterward of many Popes, Emperors and great Lordes, which came to dominion in the Citty: So that the Office of Saint George, although it depended on the common people, as also the Signoria of Geneway: yet all that came to the gouernement or Seigneurie of the Cittie, were sworne to conserue the Priuiledges of the Magistracie of Saint George, and to maintaine it. And because (naturally) things take original of weake beginnings, and so in processe of time attayne to perfection: euen so did this magisteriall Office, being much better ruled now, then it could be at the beginning.

The daily increasing of the Office of Saint George.

First, in answering the profites to all Banquers, they are not so determinate nor certayne, as at the originall: but yet according to the proportion of former allowances, lesse or more, and according vnto expences for the conseruation of things of especiall care, and according to the fruitfulnesse of tolles and taxations, beside diuers other benefites, assigned by the Commons to the Banquers: they are farre more secure, and more neately qualified, concerning mens consciences.

The beginning of any affaires must helpe it selfe by the succes of times, and so attaine to true integrity.

Moreouer, this place hath obtayned Seigneury and dominion by many good and sufficient allowances, which it could not haue at the beginning. Beside, euerie way are made new rules and orders, whereby there is farre better expedition of Causes, for the punishing of delinquents, and submission of the people to gouernement.

Two Communities in Geneway, and how they are gouerned.

And whosoeuer doeth consider the high account of this Magistracie, shall finde the body of the Cittie; thereby to containe in it selfe two communities, the one great, the other lesse. The great is gouerned by the Pallace, and comprehendeth all the Citty; the lesser is gouerned by Saint George onely, as concerning the occasions before remembred, and comprehendeth all the Banquers and changers.

A note well worth the obseruation.

The first Communitie, or the greater, is subiect to variation, and is many times vnder regiment, rather to bee tearmed Tyrannicall then otherwise: but the lesser is alwayes free, firme, and vnder the Cittizens. And certainely, which is a matter admirable, and rarely found, eyther by Philosophers or others, that haue discourssed on causes concerning Common-weales, to obserue: that within the circuite of one and the same wall, and all at a time, there should be tyrannie and liberty, life ciuile and corrupt, iustice and licence.

Of

Of eight Protectors of the Office of Saint George.

The manner of electing the new Protectors of Saint George.

CONcerning this Office of S. George, there are eight men appoynted to gouerne it, who are called Protectours. They continue for a yeare, and are elected euery six months foure times, by the whole number of the Banquers, or Creditors for lands, & Creditors for letting forth certain sums, after this manner. Among the whole number of Citty Creditors, by lot are chosen 80. men, who meeting together soone after their election, they make a suruey among al those foure score, and select out of them foure and twenty by balotting, who being shut vp in a roome by themselues: they may not sunder or depart, till they haue ballotted for the eight Protectors, and in this ballotterie, sixeteene ballots doe confirme the election.

An other Office called of foure and fortie, being chosen out of a thousand.

In the yeare 1444. an other Office was made of Saint George, consisting of men, which was then called the Office of foure and fortie, in regard of a thousand, out of which number they were created. The occasion of creating these eight men, was, that being the space of thirty seuen yeres, the Office so encreased and augmented, that the eight Protectors could not (in a whole yeare) terminate nor restrain the busie occasions happening, whereby the emoluments and interests of some creditors arose so great, and other moneys in diuerse manners: it was thought fit (for setting downe good order to such Remaines, which were (in effect) the riches and substance of the office) that a necessary participation of the gaines should be digested, for the creation of such as should helpe in this prouident care, for generall vtilitie of the Office of Saint George, and yet to be carried in secret manner, for taking away all occasion of tyranny. And so eight Cittizens were chosen; of which two are changed yearely: and they take charge of collecting and gouerning such ouer-plusses as do arise yearely, by the managements of the eight Protectors.

An addition of eight Cittizens more to the Office.

This Office hath vnder protection the Isle of Corsica, and many other Cities and important places: and thence ensueth the expences layd out for their conseruation.

* An Isle in the Sea Liguisticum.

CHAP. II.

An excellent Relation, concerning the estate of Religion and Common-wealth, which was obserued among the Iewes.

IT is not to bee doubted, but by the singular councell of our eternall God, the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, who created mankinde, whereby a Church might bee assembled and congregated: a perpetuall historie concerning the creation of things, was giuen to men.

Democritus dreaming of a former world, & of innumerable worlds

And although that the Philosopher Democritus, and others like to him, dreamed of an eternitie of a former world, or else of innumerable worlds, and made a mockerie at the beginning of things, and thought such a recitall to be but fabulous: yet notwithstanding wee holde them to be most true, considering, that Almightie GOD approoued the Writings of Moses by apparant testimonies, as by the raysing vp of the dead and others.

The auncient historie of the Church.

Now, albeit wee receiue the auncient Historie of the Church, and singularly allow it for the Diuine authorities: yet there are many more Euidences of trueth besides; for, the auncient names of people, doe agree with the succession of the Fathers that related them, and the order of Empires hath bene such, as they were foretold to be, and so should be in their succeeding times.

The prophetical Historie the trueth and most ancient.

The Propheticall Historie then is the trueſt, and the most auncient of all other; and the reason of that continued Historie, was, not onelie to let vs know the beginning of mankinde: but much more to notifie vnto vs, the Promises of the Sonne of God, and to giue vs certainety of the first, and no way to be corrupted doctrine of God, and of the testifications so oftentimes rendred to other by that doctrine, what the gouernement of the Church hath beene; for it was preserued in the diuersitie of tumults amongst Empires, like to a Shippe floating vppon raging and tempestuous billowes, what the battailes of the Church haue beene, and the exercises of Faith.

The great blessings of God vpon his Church.

Now, it was a great blessing of God, that hee gaue a certayne seating vnto his Church, euen as an Academie, for more then sixeteene hundred yeares in a commodious place, betweene two most potent Kingdomes of Egypt and Babylon, to the end, that throughout them both the voyce of his doctrine might be heard. There the Promises were repeated, and the Miracles adiusted, which are witnesses of the presence of God: whose will was to haue those things set downe in writing, to the end that Posteritie might be informed by true doctrine, in the conflicts of the Church, and her manifold recoueries.

Concerning the historie of latter times.

And although nothing is found in writing by publike authority, touching the last times; yet notwithstanding, our Lord was carefull to haue the latter Historie knowne, which hath beene declared partly by Iosephus, and partly by Philo, whereof I haue made a collection, because the more studious might enioy a continuall Historie of the Iewish people, euen to the destruction of Ierusalem. And it pleased God, that a continued succesſe of histories should remaine to men: for seeing that Prophetical histories reached so farre as the reigne of the Persians, or to King Cyrus; the Greeke and Latine histories afterward, reported the great mutations of the following Empires, which also was seconded after by the Apostles writings, concerning the Sonne of God, borne of the Virgine Marie, crucified and raised againe; and after the Apostles, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Nicephorus pursued in the Ecclesiasticall Historie.

Prophetical historie reached to the time of Cyrus King of Persia

Wherein I make no doubt, but all such as are well aduised, will confesse, that the knowledge of the order of Times is necessarie, to vnderstand when the Doctrine was reuealed, the Sonne of God manifested, the Church congregated in diuers kinds, sometimes agitated by tempestuous stormes; and yet (after all) graciously deliuered. Wherefore, let vs giue thankes to God, for bestowing on men the continued Historie of his Sonne; and let vs keepe such Writings religiously: wherein hauing taken some paines, I hope it will proue pleasing to all Christian Readers.

The Church after many stormes happily deliuered

The beginning of the Catalogue is the continuation of soueraigne Sacrificers, or high-Priests that gouerned the Iewish people, after their returne from Babylon, with the princes issued of the race Royall.

The first Familie being the Posteritie of Iesus.

CHAP. III.

A Catalogue of the High-Priests; or soueraigne Sacrificers, beginning with Seraia and his sonne Iosedech.

Seraia and Iosedech.

BOth these were led captiue into Babylon, by Nabuchodonosor King of the Chaldeans, and dyed in exile.

Iesuah sonne to Iosedech.

Iosuah or Iesus, the sonne of Iosedech, came backe into Iudea with the Prince Zorobabell, fiue hundred and thirtie yeares before the Natiuitie of Christ. He liued vnder the Kings of Persia, Cyrus, Cambyses, Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, Xerxes, euen to the twentieth yeare of Artaxerxes, Long-hand, and presided (as chiefe Priest) first sixe and thirty yeares. Afterward, in regarde that the building of the Temple was hindered, he went into Babylon to Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, whom the Holy Historie nameth Asuerus, and was absent the space of eight yeares. After his returne hee was twenty yeares more in the high-Priesthood. Philo is of opinion, that he wrote the Historie of Iudith, which others (neuertheless) holde to be more ancient.

Darius sonne of Hystaspes, or Ahasuerus

The

The sonne of Iesus was Ioachim.

Ioachim the sonne of Iesus or Iosuah.

Ioachim helde the Priest-hoode eight yeeres, in the absence of his brother, and eight and fortie yeres after his death. Hee liued vnder Longhand, and Darius the Bastard, vntill the twelfth yeare of Artaxerxes Ahashuerus, who was also named Mnemon; hee did set downe in writing the Historie of Hester, and the memorie of Phurim was by him instituted, as Philo writeth.

Eliasib the son of Ioachim.

Eliasib was his sonne, who was in Office of the Soueraigne Priest-hoode one and twentie yeares, vntill the foure and thirtieth yeere of the reigne of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Iudas or Ioiada sonne to Eliasib.

Iudas or Ioiada sonne to him, was hie-Priest foure and twenty yeares; vntill the third yeare of the reigne of Darius, who succeeded next to Mnemon.

Iohn and Iesus sonne of Iudas.

Iohn and Iesus were his sonnes, the latter whereof beeing fiered with ambition, insinuated himselfe (by the power of giftes) into the fauour of Vogeses, Satrape of Persia, to take (by his helpe) the chiefe Priest-hood from his Brother: But immediately hee payed the penaltie due vnto his wicked presumption; for in a debate and blowes being moued in the temple, he was slaine by his brother. Heere was the beginning of the euills in Iudea, about an hundred, sixtie and seauen yeares, after the returne from Babylon.

Vogeses entred with an Armie into Ierusalem, & profaned the Temple.

Iohn hauing murdered his brother Iesus in the Temple, was the cause of bringing the people into a miserable seruitude. For, the Satrape Vogeses being aduertised of the death of his friend Iesus, entred with a mightie Armie into Ierusalem, prophaned and pilled the Temple, saying, That he might aswell doe so, as the high-Priest to soyle it with the blood of his owne Brother: he collected the tribute money rigorously for the space of seauen yeares together, proceeding therein so farre, as forcing the Iewes to pay an hundred crownes of the Sunne, for euery beast that they sacrificed. Iohn held the high-Priest-hood foure and twenty yeares, euen vnto the death of Ochus, and the beginning of the reigne of Arsanes.

His Sonnes were Iaddus and Manasses.

Iaddus and Manasses sons to Iohn.

Manasses following the example of Iesus, to strengthen himselfe against his brother, made alliance with Sannabalat the Chuttean, sent Satrape by the last Darius into Samaria, and tooke to wife his daughter Nicossa. But in regard of this vnlawfull marriage, hee was repulsed from the Sacerdotall Office, with diuerse others for the same cause. Beeing bereft of the Priesthoode, hee made his recourse to his Father in lawe in Samaria, who after he had obtayned leaue of Alexander the Great; builded a new Temple vppon an high mountayne in Samaria called Garizim, shaping it after the forme and magnificence of that at Ierusalem, and there hee caused his sonne Manasses to preside.

A new Temple built on mount Gerazim in Samaria.

This diuision of High-Priests, was afterwards the cause of great tumults in Iudea; for, as all they which were expelled from Ierusalem, for transgressing the Ceremonies of Moses Lawe, as also for some other offences, betooke themselues to this new Temple: in a short time after, they grewe to such an head and strength, that inciting those Sacrificers, Apostates and Samaritans against the Iewes: it likewise gaue occasion to many riotous courses and theeueries on either side.

Great strifes and contentions betweene the two Temples.

Nothing was found by posteritie of this Manasses: but two hundred yeares after, the Temple on this Mount of Garizim was destroyed from the toppe to the bottome, by Iohn Hircanus, sonne vnto Simon the Asmonean, and Successor to him.

Iaddus administred the hie-Priesthood for seauen and twentie yeares, vnder Arsanes, and the latter Darius, euen to the time of Alexander the Great. He depriued his brother Manasses (and the rest) of the right of Priesthood; because (contrary to the Law of Almighrie God) they had married with strange women. While Alexander the Great besieged the Cittie of Tyre, hee demaunded aide and tribute of this Iaddus, such as the Iewes had formerly payed to the Persians. Whereto he returned answer, That in the life time of Darius (to whom hee tooke his oath)

Iaddus depriued his brother Manasses of the Priesthood.

The answer of Iaddus to Alexander the great, concerning aide and tribute.

he neuer acknowledged any other Lord, becauſe that the Iewiſh Nation had been tributarie to the Kings of Perſia, almoſt euer ſince their returne from Babylon. Alexander growing angrie at ſuch an anſwere; after the taking in of Tyre and Gaza, mounted vp to Ieruſalem with his Armies, intending to ſubiugate the Iewes by ſtrength of Armes.

But Iaddus beeing thereof admoniſhed in a dreame, tooke his Prieſtlie garments, and went to meete him in great humilitie, accompanied with all the Sacrificers and Citizens. Alexander beholding the Soueraigne high Prieſt, alighted on his feete, and gaue vnto him reuerend adoration. Being demaunded what ſhould mooue him to reuerence an enemie, that came with ſubmiſſiue entreatie vnto him: hee replyed: At the time of my abiding in Macedon, and thinking on the Empire of Aſia, a man was preſented to mee in my ſleepe, in the ſame or like habite as the High Prieſt weares, who perſwaded mee to vndertake the expedition of Aſia, and gaue mee good hope of proſperous ſucceſſe.

When hee was entred the Cittie, he was ſo farre from offering the leaſt taſte of an enemy, that, after hee had ſacrificed, he adorned the Temple with magnificent gifts, and at his departing hee gaue them libertie to vſe the Lawe of their Fore-fathers, and the immunities of the ſeauenth yeare, wherein the fields were not ſowne.

Iaddus meetes Alexander with all ſubmiſsion.

Alexanders repetition of his dreame.

The ſonnes of Iaddus were Onias and Manaſſes.

COncerning Manaſſes, wee reade not any thing, but that hee ſucceeded next to his Nephew Eleazar, and was a friend to Seleucus Gallinicus, and that vnder his gouernement, the Samaritanes being diſpleaſed at the Iewes in deſpight of the Temple, and ſeruices there performed, they put to fire and ſword the whole territory of Ieruſalem. Some are of opinion, that this man was not the brother to Onias, but rather the brother vnto his wife, and make thereabout ſome controuerſie.

Manaſſes Nephew to Eleazar.

A Catalogue of the High Prieſts Onias called the Auncient.

IN this mans time, Ptolomie, the ſonne of Lagus, deſiring to make the people of the Iewes become tributarie; as hee entred vpon a Sabaoth day into the Cittie of Ieruſalem, to offer Sacrifice (the Iewes not daring to take Arms, for feare of doing contrary to the Law) vſed great cruelty againſt the Inhabitants, of whom he led away into Egypt ſome thouſands, as captiues and hoſtages.

The crueltie of Ptolomie againſt the Iewes.

The Sonnes of Onias were Simon and Eleazar.

SImon was named Iuſtus, for pietie and benignitie towards his Nation. The Iewes enioyed peace vnder him, all the while as the Succeſſours of Alexander the great, Antigonus, Demetrius, Seleucus and the reſt, fought in Aſia and Greece for the Monarchie.

Simon ſirnamed Iuſtus was gracious to his nation.

Eleazar ſucceeded after his brother Simon, as Tutor to Onias the ſecond, being as yet a childe. In his time, Ptolomie Philadelphus enfranchiſed aboue an hundred thouſand Iewiſh ſlaues, led into Egypt, partly by the Kings of Perſia, partly by his father Ptolomie the ſonne of Lagus.

An hundred thouſand Iews kept in ſlauery ſet at libertie by Ptolomie Philadelphus.

Moreouer, he ſent Ambaſſadors with magnificent Preſents to Eleazar the high Prieſt, requeſting to haue threeſcore and twelue Iewes, that could tranſlate the Writings of Moſes and the Prophets, out of the Hebrew language into the Greeke. Which being done, hee ſent them backe agayne with great giftes, and a Table of golde dedicated to the Temple, and other Preſents of eſpeciall value. His vnckle Manaſſes ſucceeded after his death; vnckle by the mother only, according to ſome: for the Greeke word ſignifieth vncle both by father and mother.

Simon had three ſonnes; Tobias, whom Philo and Saint Luke in his third chapter calleth Mattathias; Ioſeph, that pacified Ptolomie. And Annas Hyrcanus, the laſt Prince of the Iewiſh people, of the Linage of Iuda, and houſe of Dauid: who ſlew himſelfe, for feare of Antiochus the Noble.

The 3 ſonnes of Simon, and a daughter alſo.

After this man, the high Prieſts drew vnto themſelues the gouerning in all affaires.

The daughter of Simon the high Prieſt

Priest, was married to Tobias, of the houle of Dauid.

Onias being left a childe by his Father, at last, in his age succeeded to Manasses in the High-Priest-hood. By his auarice he offended Ptolomy, King of Egipt, and raised him in rage against the Iewes, because hee refused to pay the ordinary tribute. For the high-Priests were wont to pay their reuennues yearely to the Kings of Egipt, for their Cittizens, amounting to twenty Talents, that is, twelue thousand crownes of the Sunne. But Ioseph afterward appeased Ptolomy, who was Nephew to Onias by the Sisters side, a Prince of the posterity of Dauid.

King Ptolomy enraged against the Iewes about the tribute-money.

Onias succeeded his sonne Simon.

Philo saith, that he was sirnamed Iustus. Vnder him, Iesus the Sonne of Syrach wrote his Book called Ecclesiasticus. And that Simon had three sonnes also, who (each after other) obtayned the Priest-hood, which Iosephus testifieth apparantly. The Sonnes of Simon, were,

Ioseph. in Antiq. lib. 12. cap. 16.

Onias. Iesus, otherwise called Iason. Onias, also called Menelaus.

The great Onias is commended in the second Booke of the Machabees, for his piety and iustice, and is saide, that hee was a friend to Seleuchus, Brother to Antiochus the Noble; who sometimes furnished all necessary affaires in the Temple, with the reuennues of the Realme of Syria. But afterward, another man, called Simon, who had the charge of keeping the Temple, hauing conceyued malice against Onias the high-Priest; reported to King Seleuchus, that there was an infinite masse of gold hidden in the Temple, which the Priests applyed to their own priuate vses. And this was the cause, that the king wold no longer furnish the Temple with the wonted monyes; but also sent Heliodorus, to make seizure on the wealth, and commit it to the Kings Treasury. But as hee would haue audaciously haue entered (with his followers) into the secret place of the Temple, he was smitten downe, & very neere dead, yet recouered againe by diuine mercy, and by the prayers of Onias.

Onias commended for piety and iustice.

Heliodorus sent to seize on the wealth and treasure of the temple.

Afterward, the discord so encreased betweene the Prince of the high-Priests, and the Traitor Simon; that many murders were committed by the friends of Simon: which made Onias to retire himselfe towards the King Seleucus, and gaue way to the fury of his enemies. But before Onias could get thether, Seleuchus was dead, and Iason, Brother to Onias, had obtayned by bribes and gifts to Antiochus the Noble (succeeding the deceassed King) the administration of the high-Priests office. Whereupon, Onias doubting King Antiochus as much as his Brother; durst not go to him, but went to a free place, neere to Daphne, a city of Syria, & being drawne thether by deceitfull meanes, was also slaine by Andronicus, Lieutenant to the King, and at the request of Menelaus, who Iason hauing expulsed, possessed himselfe of the high-Priests Office, as heereafter shall be declared.

Iason getteth the High-Priests Office from his Brother Onias.

The murder of great Onias.

The Sonne of this Onias the Great, was Onias.

Onias beeing left young at his Fathers death, and afterward growing to more ripenesse of yeares; standing in feare of Alcinus the high-Priest, he fled into Egipt to Ptolomy Philometor, accompanied with some of his fellow cittizens. There Ptolomy gaue him permission, to builde a Towne and a Temple, in the Territory of Heliopolis, in resemblance of that at Ierusalem; which was called Onion, fiue great miles from Memphis, now called the great Cayro. For in regard that Ptolomy waged warre with Antiochus the Noble, & stood in need of his neighbours succors, he was perswaded by Onias to build a Temple, as if by that meanes, all the people of the Iewes would league with the Kings of Egipt, & take their part. About 230. yeares after this Temple was built, at the same time as the Citty and Temple of Ierusalem were ruined; it was also despoyled of all her Iewels, and shut vp by Edict from Vespasian the Emperor.

Onias flyeth into Egypt, to Ptolomy Philometor.

The building of a new temple in Egipt.

The Sonnes of this Onias, dwelling in Egipt, were Helchias and Ananias.

These two Brethren, beeing Colonels of the Egiptians Army, ayded valiantly Cleopatra; so that her Sonne Lathurus being excluded, she obtayned the kingdom. But

The two brethren Commanders of the Egyptians Army.

But after that Ptolomy had recollected his forces, and paſſing into Egipt through Iudea; Helchias putting him to flight with his Army, died in Syria of a ſharpe diſeaſe. For the reſt, wee reade nothing of the poſterity of the high-Prieſts of Egipt.

The High-Prieſts Office bought for 500. Talents.

Ieſus, named Iaſon alſo, ſecond Sonne to Simon, after the death of Seleuchus, bought of Antiochus, brother and ſucceſſor to Seleuchus, the high-prieſthood, for fiue hundred Talents, that is to ſay, three Tunnes of gold, as wee ſpeake vulgarly; promiſing him beſide as an ouer-plus, forty eight thouſand crownes of the Sun, as an annuall tribute. And to gaine himſelfe more grace with this wicked King, he builded places in Ieruſalem, for the exerciſing of young people, in ſuch paſtimes as he had inſtituted, and theſe were to bee performed, at ſuch times as the people vſed to meete in the Temple. He receiued and magnificently entertained Antiochus Epiphanes with his Army, with Lamps and flaming fires, & ſongs compoſed in praiſe of the King: and this was at ſuch time as the King departing thence, planted Garriſons of ſtrength in the Fortreſſes of Ieruſalem, and this was but a beginning to the intollerable ſeruitude which afterward followed.

The entertainment of king Antiochus into Ieruſalem.

Iaſon hauing enioyed the high-Prieſthood three yeares, ſent his Brother Menelaus with gold and great charge to Antiochus: but now hee prooued to be payed with coyne of the ſame ſtampe, as before he had done to his brother Onias; for by the ſame crafty contriuing, Menelaus ſet him quite beſide the Prieſthood. And Iaſon ſtanding now in feare of Menelaus, with-drew into the land of the Ammonits, where he cloſely concealed himſelfe, vntil a falſe rumour ran abroad, that Antiochus entring Egipt, dyed. Theſe newes ſo cheered vp his drooping ſpirits, that being accompanied with a thouſand men in arms, he intruded vpon the Citty, where being fauoured by the inhabitants, for the rapines and cruelties committed by Menelaus; he ſlew many of Antiochus his faction, and compelled Menelaus to ſaue himſelfe in the Syrians Garriſons kept in the Forts.

Iaſon is iuſtly requited for treachery to his brother Onias.

Iaſon ſoone encouraged, and as quickly daunted againe.

But hearing the returne of Antiochus from the Land of Egipt, and loſing all hope of the Prieſthood, againe he retired among the Ammonites, of whom he could not now be receiued, ſtanding in feare of Antiochus, who was neere at hand with his army. Expulſed alſo (for the ſame reaſon) by Aretas, King of Arabia, out of his marches, and hauing no acceſſe into Egipt, & laſtly, forſaken of all; he paſſed by Sea to the Lacedemonians, among whom hee was concerned in kindred: and yet, as a iuſt puniſhment for his ambition, he dyed very poorely in baniſhment.

The miſeries and wretched end of Iaſon.

Onias, named Menelaus alſo, the third Sonne of Simon, according to Ioſephus (albeit in the ſecond Booke of the Macchabees, he is not ſaid to be the Sonne of Simon the High-Prieſt, but brother to one Simon, of the Tribe of Beniamin, who had charge of the Temple, as we ſaide before in ſpeaking of Onias) beeing ſent to King Antiochus the Noble, by Iaſon, Prince of the ſacrificing Prieſts, with money and commiſſion about important affayres; did ſo cunningly inſinuate himſelfe, into the good grace of the King and his Courtiers; that by promiſing three hundred Talents (which is an hundred and fourſcore thouſand crownes of the Sun) more then all that which Iaſon payed, and accuſing him of diuers crimes beſide: he preuailed ſo farre, that the Soueraigne Prieſthood was taken from Iaſon, and conferred on him in his ſtead.

2 Macchab. cap. 2. 3.

Menelaus his cunning inſinuating with the King and Courtiers.

This dignity thus obtayned, he purſued the ſame impieties as Iaſon did, in the cuſtomes and manners of the Pagans, & farre exceeding him in rapines and cruelties. For at the entring into his gouernment, to make himſelfe the ſurer of ſo ill-gotten honour; he ſlew Onias, eldeſt Son to Simon his brother, as Ioſephus affirmes, who being exiled, kept cloſe in a franchiſed place neere Daphné, a Towne in Syria; there hee cauſed him to bee murdered by Andronicus (Gouernour of Cæloſyria) by fraud and treaſon, and for which offence, Andronicus was ſentenced with death by the King.

Menelaus more wicked then his Brother Iaſon.

Afterward, being vnable to furniſh the great payment of money hee had promiſed to the King; he ſolde many veſſels of gold, which he had couertly ſtolne out of the Temple: which ſacriledge comming to be knowne, great mutinies were moued among the people. At length, Menelaus was accuſed and conuinced by three Ambaſſadors, ſent from Ieruſalem to Tyre. But by the meanes of a Courtier, named Ptolomy

Menelaus ſacriledgiouſly robbeth the Temple, and yet carieth it away by corruption.

Ptolomy (ſoundly corrupted with money) hee was abſolued and the King pacified, preuailing withall ſo farre, that his accuſers were executed for calumniators: and he returning backe to Ieruſalem, began againe to tyrannize ouer the Cittizens.

Prodigious ſignes ſeene in the ayre, foretelling lamentable euents that followed.

Much about this time, for the ſpace of forty dayes, there appeared in the Heauens, hoaſts or bands of men, fighting both on horſebacke and foote: which prodigious ſignes, prognoſticated the horrible calamities which ſoone after were to follow. For as Antiochus was leading his Army (the ſecond time) into Egipt, purpoſing to vſurpe the Country by open warre, ſeeing he could not do it vnder colour of Guardianſhip, becauſe Ptolomy Philometor (his Nephew) was yet but young: Iaſon ruſhed into the Citty with his Army, againe to repulſe his brother from the Prieſthood, ouer-comming a great number of the Inhabitants, that tooke part with Antiochus and Menelaus. Who finding his ſtrength too feeble, fled to the Fortreſſes and Garriſons of the Syrians, diſpatching meſſengers vnto Antiochus for better ayde.

Antiochus enforced to depart from Egipt, cometh before Ieruſalem.

And now Antiochus being vrged thereto by the rigorous command of the Romanes, and deliuered by Popilius; left Egipt, comming thence in a raging madnes, fearing a further reuolt of the Iewiſh Nation. Hauing brought his Army before the Citty, hee found the Gates faſt ſhut, and the inhabitants ready to defend themſelues. Whereat being vexed, he forced into the Citty without any great difficulty: becauſe Menelaus with his faction, and the Syrian Garriſons ran vp and downe in the Citty, and put to the Sword many Cittizens, and giuing entrance to the enemy at the Gates. Being entred, Antiochus charged his people to kill all that they met with in Armes, and not to ſpare eyther age or ſexe: ſo that within three dayes ſpace, foureſcore thouſand men (or thereabout) were ſlaine in Ieruſalem, beſide diuers thouſands ledde away captiues, and ſold for ſlaues.

A pittifull maſſacre of men in the Citty, & many ſolde into ſlauery.

The King, conducted by Menelaus, entred into the moſt holy part of the Temple, touching with his polluted hands the ſacred Veſſels, which he cauſed to be carried thence into Syria, with a thouſand, eight hundred talents of treaſure, as much to ſay, as eleuen Tuns of gold of our monie: which treaſure had bin partly giuen to the Temple, and partly was put there in truſt for the benefite of widdowes and orphanes, as into the onely ſureſt place both for reuerence and ſanctity. So, after Antiochus had reſtored Menelaus to the high-Prieſthood againe, and had planted ſtrong Garriſons in the Citty (wherof Philip of Phrygia was Captaine, a man very bloody and cruell) hee returned backe to Antioche again with his great booty. Two yeares after, fearing a reuolt of the Iewes, he ſent the Colonell Appolonius to Ieruſalem, with two and twenty thouſand men, who expreſſed no countenance of an enemy, but encamped without the Citty, attending for the Sabboth day, and then giuing the determined ſignall, hee ſlew & maſſacred the vnarmed multitude, that came foorth to behold the Campe of the Syrians. Then entring violently into the Citty, hee put all to the edge of the ſword that withſtood him, robbing, ſpoyling, & burning it in many places, throwing downe the walles and fortifications: yet rampairing the Walles and Bulwarks, in that part called, The Citty of Dauid, and planting there a potent Garriſon.

Menelaus reſtored to the High Prieſthood againe, by Antiochus and Garriſons planted in the Citty.

The Citty of Dauid in Ieruſalem.

This was a preparatiue, to attaine (in time) to the Kings full ayme, who purpoſing to turne (perforce) the Iewes from the Law of their fore-fathers (a thing which he knew they would withſtand to their vttermoſt power) firſt of all he gaue order, to diſpoſſeſſe them of Armes and Weapons, leauing them naked of all munitions, ſuccour and reſiſtance. This diſcomfiture made by Appolonius in Ieruſalem; ſoone after the King ſent thether Atheneus, another of his Colonels, with an eſpeciall Edict, whereby he commanded all Nations that were in ſubiection to him, to vſe (in euery kingdome) the ſame Religion which the Greekes did: prohibiting expreſſely to the Iewes, the vſe of circumciſion, & other ordinances commanded them by God. He likewiſe planted Garriſons aſwell in Ieruſalem, as in other Cities and Townes of Iudea, to inflict cruell puniſhment on al them, that did not obtemperate the Kings Edict. Beſide, the Temple was prophaned by the Kings Command, and the Image of Iupiter Olympus worſhipped in the Sanctuary, euen in the Sanctum Sanctorum, and many paillardizes and whoredomes committed with-within the circuite of the Temple. Moreouer, by the same Edict Royall, the holy Bookes were forbidden ingenerall, and that man iudged worthy of death, with whom the Booke of the Law should bee found; yea, and seuere inquisition made for it euery Moneth.

The Citizens of Ierusalem durst make no opposition in their owne defence.

As thus the Cittizens of Ierusalem were disarmed, oppressed, & very strong Garisons planted ouer them: euen so were they destitute of any Captain, not daring to vse force or opposition, against the wicked commands and excessiue tyrannies of Antiochus: considering also, that Menelaus the soueraigne High-Priest, had formerly instituted the behauiorss vsed among Pagans in Ierusalem, to keepe himselfe in his dignity, & in the Kings fauour, approuing and assisting all his enterprizes; in which respect, many that made vertuous profession of the Law giuen by God, were most inhumanely murdered by the Soldiors of Antiochus, and their goods confiscated. Others (in great numbers) forsaking the City, and leauing all their goods behinde them, went to hide themselues in Caues and desert places, as Mattathias the Asmonea withdrew (accõpanied with his children) into the little Village of Modin.

The horrible punishment inflicted vpon two women.

In the second Booke of the Macchabees is described the horrible punishing of two women, who were accused to the Lieutenant of Antiochus, that they had circumcised their children, contrary to the Kings Edict. Whereupon, they were condemned, and (for a terror to other) they were led naked through the streetes of the City, their infants strangled, hanging at their breasts, and afterward throwne downe from the top of the City wall. There is also set downe, the seuen Brethren & their Mother, tormented with most exquisite tortures; and yet they helde fast the profession of the Law. By which horrible cruelties, iudgement may be made, aswell of the extreme rigour of Antiochus, as also the miserable estate of Gods people: of whom, some reliques were yet reserued, by meanes of the Asmoneans, raised vp by God, to represse the rage of Antiochus, & to maintaine the Law of God by Armes, as hereafter shall be declared.

The Asmoneans raised by God to represse Antiochus.

In the meane time Menelaus, Author, beholder and promoter of these inflictions vpon the people; retayned still the title of Soueraigne high Sacrificer, euen then when Iudas Macchabeus tooke (by power) the Citty and the Temple: he being then hid in the Fortresse, vnder the protection of the Syrians, vntill that after the death of Antiochus the Noble, his Son Antiochus Eupator, hauing seized on Ierusalem, concluded peace with Iudas Macchabeus, and by the perswasion of Lysias, brought him captiue into Syria, as the firebrand of all the warre, and of the ouerthrowing of the Syrian Armies by the Asmoneans, and there he was also slaine, after he had held the high-Priesthood twelue yeares. This was the last Sacrificer of the posterity of Aaron, to whom the diuine right appertained, for administration of the Soueraigne Priesthood. For Antiochus Eupator appointed in the place of Menelaus, a certaine man named Alcimus, who might bee of Aarons posterity; but not of the Family of that Iesus, who with Zorobabell had returned from Babilon into Iudea. This Alcimus presided foure years, and then dyed of a sudden sickenesse, two yeares after the death of Iudas Macchabeus.

Menelaus taken and led Captiue into Syria.

The last high-Priest of Aarons posterity

Alcimus succeeded in the high priesthood.

Alcimus being dead, the Temple and the people was seauen yeares without a Soueraigne high-Priest, vntill such time as the power of Ionathas encreased, who was the Brother of Iudas: when the dignity of the Priesthood was transferred (by consent of the people) into the Family of the Asmoneans; where it remained so long, as to the beginning of the Reigne of Herod, about 116. yeares.

of Modin, did first oppose himselfe against Antiochus the Noble; who, by horrible torments constrained the Iewes to transgresse their Law, and to deale in those behauiours vsed among the Pagans; in the hundred, forty and fiue yeare of the kingdome of Syria, an hundred fifty and nine yeares after the death of Alexander, and an hundred sixty and fiue yeares before the birth of Christ. For Mattathias seeing a certaine Iew, who (to please the King) sacrificed a forbidden beast vpon a Pagan Altar, it being prohibited by the diuine Law: enflamed with a iust and holy zeale (in the presence of the Cittizens of his owne Nation, suffering such a wicked acte to be done, as also of the Kings Lieutenant) slew the offender, and then beating downe the Altar, deliuered arms to all them, who (making more account of the word giuen by God, thē the threatenings of a Pagan King) had forsaken their goods and liued in the Deserts, frō whence many returning daily; hee leuied a great Army, by whose helpe he deliuered worthily the neighbouring Townes, from the Idolatries of Antiochus, and replanted the seruice and ordinances commanded by the Law diuine.

Mattathias slew a Iew for sacrificing a forbidden Beast on a Pagan Altar.

Mattathias freeth the people from the Idolatries of Antiochus.

But this valiant man, deepely stept in age, after hee had (for a yeares space) led this banished wandring troope, and after he had exhorted his Sonnes to the study of piety, as also the valiant defending of the Law giuen by God, against the wicked Edicts and torments of Antiochus, reconciling them all to concord and mutuall reuerence, dyed peaceably, in the yeare 146. of the Kingdome of Syria; 160. after the death of Alexander; and 164. before Christ was borne.

Eleazar sirnamed Amran or Anaram.

Eleazar, otherwise called Amran or Anaran, a very hardy young man, after he had performed many valiant deeds; in the fift yeare after his Fathers death, going to finde out Antiochus Eupator, Sonne to Antiochus the Noble, with his brother Iudas; he saw (among other) a goodly Elephant, exceeding in greatnesse & rich furniture. Whereby, hee imagining that the King should be vpon him, ran towards him ouer-boldly, and slaying many Soldiours euery where about him, got vnder the Elephant, and giuing a deadly stabbe in his belly, the Elephant fell downe vpon him, and thereby was the death of Eleazar.

Eleazar slain by an Elephant falling vpon him.

Iohn, sirnamed Gaddis, after the death of his brother Iudas, was sent by Ionathas and Simon his other brethren into Arabia, with the Iewels & precious things which they had conquered in warre, to place them in the custody and guard of the Nabatheans: but the Ammorites layed ambushes by the way for him, and hauing slaine him, tooke also the spoyles away from him and his traine.

Iohn slaine by the Ammorites.

Iudas, was sirnamed also Macchabeus, which diction in Hebrew is written Maccabai, wherof each letter signifieth a word, taken from the Song of Moses in Exodus, in these expresse words: MECAMOCHA BAILEM IEHOVA? That is to say: Who is like vnto thee (O Lord) among the Gods? Iudas vsing this sentence for his Motto or deuice, and making one phrase of the first Letters of the foure words, caused himselfe to bee sirnamed Macchabeus. His father being neere his death, appointed him the cheefe guide & Leader of the poore and miserable multitude: who had rather endure all afflictions whatsoeuer, then renounce the doctrine giuen them by God. Soone after the death of his Father, he ouercame the Army of Apolonius, and made vse of his Sword in all the battailes he fought afterward with a smal band of men; he vanquished the Army of Saron, Gouernour of Syria, who was slaine in the field, and with him 8000. men. These victories obtained the first yeare, made Iudas Macchabeus highly renowned. The yeare following, which was the 147. of the Greekes reigne, Antiochus went into Persia with his Army, and left in the kingdome of Syria, Lysias, as Regent and Gouernor to his Son Antiochus Eupator, giuing him expresse charge to destroy the Iewes. For the execution of which command, Lysias sent into Palestine, forty thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, vnder the conduct of Ptolomy, Nicanor and Gorgias his Colonels, who entred hostilly with their Armies into Iudea, and encamped before the Village of Emaus. Iudas perceiuing perill, led his Army into Maspha, a place (long agoe) built before the Temple of Ierusalem, and very famous for Religion.

There

The small Army of men that Iudas had with him.

There he publikely commanded a fast, giuing charge, that by earnest and hearty prayer they should craue of God, that so small a handfull of men (for hee had but three thousand apt for warre with him) might valiantly defend themselues against so great a power of enemies. Which being done, he remoued his Campe, and went directly to confront the hoast of his aduersaries, and setting vpon them in the night season, droue them to flight, & slew three thousand with the Sword. Vpon the successe of this exploite, hee went to seeke the other part of the Army, which was guided by Gorgias, who intended to steale vpon the Iewes in the dead time of night. But Gorgias hearing the former defeature, and perceiuing the smoake of lighted fires in the Campe of the Iewes; fled away in haste with his forces. So Iudas, with so silly a power of people, enforced the huge hoasts of his enemies vnto flight, and got very great booties from them.

The wonderfull successe of of Iudas against Gods enemies.

Lysias hauing intelligence of his mens ill successe, being mad with anger, leuied a farre greater power, to make fresh warre vpon the Macchabees. And the yeare following, which was the 148. of the Greekes reigne, himselfe in person (for hee grew distrustfull of his Captaines) accompanied with threescore thousand foote, all of them pickt and chosen men, & fiue thousand horse, inuaded Iudea, by passing thorow Idumea. And as he was encamped in Bethsura, on the Frontiers of Iudea, Iudas Macchabeus came to meete him with ten thousand men (so much was the number encreased, of them that detested Ethnick Idolatry) and after hee had inuoked publikely the ayde of God, hee fought with the enemy.

Lysias commeth with a mighty Army against the Macchabees.

Lysias perceiuing how couragiously the Iewes fought, as men that meerely despised death, breaking furiously through his rankes, his men beginning to turne their backes, and fiue thousand of them hewen in peeces; ralliered together his scattered troopes, and led them backe to Antioche, hoping to speede better at another time with a new expedition. Wherein he was preuented, by the death of Antiochus the Noble, who being repulsed frō besiedging Persepolis, as hee led backe his Army in ill order by Babylon, and beeing informed (by the way) what bad successe his Armies had sustained in Iudea: he fell first into a greeuous vexation of spirit, & afterward of body, so that his intestines were smitten with horrible diseases. Yet being nothing the milder by this visitation, but rather more vehemently prouoked against the Iewes: after his returne, he purposed a speedy iourney to Iudea; there to race their Cities, especially Ierusalem, and vtterly to extirpate the Iewish Nation. But as he proceeded on in this violent resolution, and making too much haste on the way; the Chariot (wherein he lay sicke) was ouerturned, and his body so bruised against the ground, also the extremity of his impatience so violent; that his blood ſouer-boyled, his entrailes putrified, and his flesh outwardly rotted, yeelding forth a most loathsome and intollerable stinke, so that in wonderfull torments, he gaue vp the ghost, acknowledging the diuine vengeance of Heauen. Thus died this most cruell Tyrant, in the 148. yeare of the Greekes reigne; of his owne the 12. and the fourth, after those many robberies, as well of the Temple, as the Citty of Ierusalem.

The great & horrible iudgment of God declared in the death of Antiochus the Noble.

Iudas Macchabeus, much encouraged by this so notable a victory, conducted his Army to Ierusalem; where he cleansed the Temple, formerly defiled and prophaned by the seruice of Idols, and offered sacrifices according to the Law, in the yeare of the Greekes, 148. before Christs Natiuity, 162. the 25. day of the Moneth of Chisleu, that is to say, Nouember; the very same day, that (three yeares before) it had beene robbed & prohaned by Antiochus, placing therein Images and Idols. He builded also Sion, and strongly munited Bethsura, that it might serue as a Fortresse against the Idumeans.

The returne of Iudas to Ierusalem, & his purifying the Temple.

Iudas encounteth the great Army of Lysias.

Hauing done this, he kept his Armour daily on his backe, because he was still assayled by the Idumeans, Ammonites, and other, who laboured to ouerthrow the power of the Iewish Nation, which began to exalt it selfe in some good measure. But the brethren of the Macchabees, repelled those insulting Nations worthily, diuiding their Armies, & fighting fortunately in many places at a time, yet vsing their victories rudely enough. In the 150. yeare of the Greekes, Iudas laide siedge before the Forts of Ierusalem, which from the Garrisons made many courses; killing such such as would sacrifice in the Temple, & very much molested the Cittizens. But Antiochus Eupator, being vrged by Menelaus, to send him aide, for relieſe of them that were beſieged in the forts; ſent an army into Iudea by Lyſias, conſiſting of 10000. foote, and 20000. horſe; and beſieged Bethſura a long time. In the meane while, Iudas beeing aduertiſed of the Kings comming in perſon thither, raiſed his ſiege from before the forts, and went to meet the enemy with his Souldiers, of whom he made ſome ſlaughters in diuers skirmiſhes. Yet finding himſelfe to be oppreſſed by ſo ouer-great a multitude, retired into Ieruſalem, where being encloſed within the munitions of the Temple; he endured a long and difficult ſiege, enforced (vpon the coming thither of Antiochus, who folowed after Lyſias) to play vpon aduantages.

Antiochus Eupator giueth aide to Menelaus.

Antiochus layeth a very dangerous fiedge to Ieruſalem.

So long laſted this ſharpe beſieging, vntill the King, being certified of Philips coming, who, vnder colour of reducing the Perſians vnder the awe of Epiphanes, ſought to poſſeſſe himſelfe (as the fame went) of the Kingdomes both of Aſia and Syria: offred peace to them that were beſieged in the Temple, with libertie of liuing according to the laws of their forefathers. But after that Iudas had brought his garriſon out of the Temple, the King being amazed at the fortifications, beat downe their walls, contrary to the accord made at the Temple, and led Menelaus the Soueraigne Sacrificer captiue away with him (according as we haue ſaide already) inſti'tuting Alcimus in his ſtead, who alſo was named Ioachim, and ſo took his way home againe to Syria.

Menelaus led away captiue by king Antiochus into Syria.

CHAP. V.

Antiochus and Lyſias are put to death by Demetrius; the wicked behauiour of Alcimus the high-Prieſt; the death of Iudas, and the ſucceſſion of his brother Ionathas.

IN the 151. yeare of the Greekes, Demetrius flying from Rome, where hee had bin detained in hoſtage, made ſeizure on the kingdome of Syria: putting to death the ſonne of Epiphanes, named Antiochus Eupator, and his Gouernour Lyſias. Now Alcimus, coueting to retaine ſtill the dignitie of the High-prieſthood, conferred vpon him by Eupator and Lyſias: went to Demetrius, and there accuſed all his nation (eſpecially the Aſmoneans) as Authors of the tumults; and perturbers of the peace of Iudea, & that they had throwne him out in baniſhment. Heereupon, the King ſent Bacchides with a maine army, to reſeate Alcimus in his office. Being entred Ieruſalem with his power, by fraude hee ſlew many innocent Citizens, & leauing ſtrong forces with Alcimus to ſafe protect him, returnd back into Syria. While thus Alcimus abuſed the power and fauor of the King, for putting many to death that were contrary to him: Iudas finding theſe courſes to be intollerable, & taking to heart ſo great cruelty in the ſoueraigne Sacrificer; vndertooke the defence of innocents, putting all them to death that tooke part with Alcimus. Whereuppon, Alcimus fearing the vertue and power of Iudas, fled the ſecond time to Demetrius at Antioche, and there formed a criminall accuſation againſt Iudas.

The greedie deſire of Alcimus for ſtil enioying the Prieſthood.

Bacchides entreth Ieruſalem with his Armie.

Nicanor then was ſent with a puiſſant Army, who thought craftily to ſurprize Iudas, vnder a colour of kind conference, and ſo leade him along to the King. But this compact being diſcouered, he entred into open armes; and being fought withall by Iudas in plaine battell, was conſtrained to retire to the fort of Sion. Afterward, iſſuing forth of Ieruſalem in great anger, all his forces aſſembled together; hee threatned all the ſacrificing Prieſts with death and vtter deſtruction of their Temple, if they did not deliuer Iudas aliue to his hands. But Iudas hauing reinforced his Armie, encountred againe with Nicanor at Bethſura; in which battaile he ſlew the captaine Nicanor, & diſcomfited the whole army, being aboue 9000. men. This hapned the 13. day of the moneth Adar, which is February; and that day was afterward ſolemnely obſerued, in regard of ſuch a notable victorie.

Iudas vndertaketh to reuenge the outrages of Alcimus.

Iudas fights with Nicanor in plaine battaile.

After theſe ſucceſſefull aduentures, Iudas perſwading himſelfe, that Demetrius would ſeek reuenge on the Iewes for this his great ouerthrow; deuiſed to ſtrengthē his power by the aſſiſtance of ſtrangers. Heereupon, hee ſent Ambaſſadors to the Romanes, to capitulate vpon confederacy with them, requesting (among other particulars) that the Senate would forbid Demetrius, heereafter to molest and afflict the Iewes. But (as humane succors are deceitfull) so the alliance of the Romanes was more discommodious to the Iewes, then if they had giuen them no ayde at all: because it made them the more sleepy and negligent, and also was more offensiue to the enemy. Whereupon it hapned, that the yeare following, being the 152. of the Greekes, Demetrius sent Bacchides and Alcimus with a potent army into Iudea. There Iudas met them with two thousand men onely, and although the most part of the slipt away, and forsooke his company, eyther thorow wearinesse of so long a war, or fearing the enemies power, or by the practises of Alcimus: yet notwithstanding, he ventred on the Army of Bacchides, with eight hundred braue Soldiors, and fighting valiantly, there he dyed with the al, in the sixt yeare after his fathers death, good old Mattathias, and before the Natiuity of Christ, 158. yeares.

Bacchides & Alcimus sent with an Army into Iudea.

The valiant death of Iudas Macchabeus.

The yeare following, which was the 153. of the Grecians Reigne, Alcimus caused the walles of the inner house of the Temple to be destroyed, which the ancient sacrificing Priests had builded: to the ende, that not any munition should remaine, which might serue to retreate the aduersaries to the Kings of Syria. And hardly had they begun to beate it downe, but he was smitten suddenly with a Palsy, and therein surrendred vp his soule: but he had continued dumbe some long time before; and this was in the fourth yeare of his Priesthood.

Alcimus striken with a sudden palsie dyed.

Ionathas the second Sonne of Mattathias.

Ionathas followed next in degree to his brother Iudas

Ionathas, or Ionathan, succeeded in the principality to his brother Iudas, and by this occasion. After the death of Macchabeus, while the Iewes (which had embraced the manners and religion of the Pagans) grew to be more emboldened, and sought for all those well disposed people, that had followed Iudas & his Brethren, sending them to Bacchides to bee cruelly murdered; adding also the famine, which greatly encreased, because, during these continuall warres, the fields had bene left without any tillage, so that the best persons, and which had most vnderstanding in religion, were extremely anguished: they made their recourse to Ionathas, entreating him to vndertake the defence of the poore afflicted, and to imitate therein the vertue and piety of his brother. Ionathas consenting to the, soone after made head mainly against Bacchides, and hardly escaping, retired his Soldiors into the desert, where Bacchides made no account to pursue them; but fortefied some Townes, and planted strong Garisons in them, daily to torment the Iewes by sallies & courses. Which being done, he retreated back his Army into Syria, after the death of Alcimus. By which meanes, the Iewes had some relaxation from warre, for about the space of two yeares, to wit, the 154. and 155. of the Grecians reigne.

Ionathas vndertaketh the cause against Bacchides.

In the yeare, 156. Bacchides was againe incited by the apostate Iewes, to surprize (by some sudden aduantage) the two brethren of Iudas: but the ambushes being reuealed, hee came and openly assaulted them in the Towne of Bethessen. Neuertheless, perceiuing the Towne to be well munited, and the Iewes furnished with all fitting matters, as fully resolued to defend themselues valiantly: he made peace with Ionathas, and the captiues beeing surrendred on eyther side, tooke his way backe to Syria, which was the cause that Iudea had some time of repose and quietnesse.

Bacchides made a peace with Ionathas

The yeare 160. Alexander the Noble, who sought to possesse himselfe of the kingdome of Syria, which was then vsurped by Demetrius, Brother to Antiochus the Noble, and vnderstanding the power of Ionathas; sent Ambassadours to him with worthy presents, to practise with him for to ioyne in his intention, offering him (moreouer) the Soueraigne Priesthood, on condition, that he would ayde him against Demetrius. Beside, he solemnly inuited him to the mariage, which hee had purposed in the Citty of Ptolomais, with Cleopatra, daughter to Ptolomy Philometor. Ionathas being allured by these offers, vnder hope of enioying (by this meanes) two neighbouring Kings to bee his friends; went to be present at the royall wedding, and carryed gifts of great value with him. He was entertained by the two kings, so honorably as possible might be, and afterward sent backe againe, with confirmatiō in the high-Priesthood, as also the principality of Iudea, for the people (after the deceasse of Alcimus) had remained 7. yeares without a Soueraigne Sacrificer.

Ambassadors sent to Ionathas by Alexander the Noble.

Ionathas obtayned the High-Priests Office, and the Principality of Iudea.

By

By this meanes, came the dignity first of High-Priesthood to the Asmoneans, the ninth yeare of the principality of Ionathas; of the Greekes 160. as hath bene saide; and before the birth of Christ, 140. But 5. yeares after, as Ptolomy had caught the kingdome of Syria, with his daughter Cleopatra; so he gaue them both to Demetrius Nicanor, Sonne to Demetrius, & then Ionathas had work enough to do, to enter into the good grace & fauour of the new King. Neuertheless, by gifts and offrings he preuailed so well at last, as vpon the auouching of his grace towards him, hee recouered a great part of Iudea, & wonne among his own people, no meane power and credite. In the latter dayes of his principality, he fortefied the Temple of Ierusalem, and renewed alliance with the Romaines, contracting kinde friendship also with the Lacedemonians. Soone after, he was surprized in Ptolomais, by the fraud & treason of Triphon, who, although he had promised to release him, if he might haue his two Sonnes sent him as hostages, and an hundred Talents (whereof his brother Simon made satisfaction, sending both the money & the children) neuertheless, the most cruell Tyrant murdred both the Father and his sonnes. Hauing done this abhominable deed, and thinking no way to be resisted in his wicked courses; by treachery he slew Antiochus, sirnamed Sedetes, Sonne to Alexander the Noble, to whom he was Tutor, & for the restoring of him to his Fathers kingdome, hee had euicted Demetrius Nicanor out of Syria, but got it into his owne possession. In this manner Ionathas held the principality of the Iewish people eighteene yeares, and was the first administratour of the Soueraigne Priesthood of the Asmoneans, which hee held ten yeares.

Ionathas accepted into the fauour of Demetrius Nicanor.

Ionathas take prisoner and afterward slaine with his two Sons.

Triphon maketh himselfe King of Syria.

Simon the third Sonne of Mattathias.

Simon succeeded his Brother Ionathas, in the yeare of the Greeks, 170. & before the Natiuity of Christ, 140. being elected (by common consent of the people) Duke & Soueraigne Sacrificer: because he had valiantly assisted his Brethren Iudas and Ionathas, for maintaining the doctrine giuē by God, & the repressing of persecutions. At the beginning of his gouernement, he surprized some Forts from the Grecians, among which was that of Ierusalem, which till that time had beene held by the Syrian Garisons, & had wonderfully tormented the Citizens. He famished them in such sort, that they were constrained to yeelde themselues, and afterward purified prophaned places, the 23. day of the second Moneth, in the yeare, 171. Vnder him, Iudea began to respire and breathe a while, which for the space of 25. yeares after Antiochus the Noble, had bin terribly shaken and wasted with continuall warres. The fields began again to recouer their former nature; places burnt and destroyed, to be re-builded; and those prophaned with Idols, to be neately cleansed: In briefe, the voyce of heauenly doctrine began againe to bee heard and deliuered in the Temple and Synagogues. In the third yeare of his Priesthood, Simon renewed alliance with the Romanes, and by a Decree from their Senate, was confirmed Soueraigne Sacrificer, & to be styled Prince of the people.

Simon elected Duke and High Priest by the people

The gouernment of Simon.

Iudea began to recouer breathing & quietnesse.

Simon renewed alliance with the Romanes.

Afterward, Antiochus Soter, brother to Demetrius Nicanor, preparing war against Triphon, who vsurped the Kingdome of Syria: labored Simon with great promises for alliance, as doubting least hee would giue hinderance to his enterprize. But hauing conquered the Kingdome of Syria, and Triphon chased thence, in the yeare, 174. he falsified the former alliance, & redemanded diuers Townes and Cities in Iudea of Simon, as also the Fort of Ierusalem, and a great summe of money beside; or else he would denounce warre against him, if he did not yeeld to what he demāded. Now in regard that Simon refused to grant so vniust a demand, Cendebeus was sent into Iudea with an Army, whom Iohn Hyrcanus and Iudas, Sonne to Simon, discomfited, as he was wasting the champain Country: and hauing destroyed the Forts built in the Marches of Iudea by the enemy, they returned backe with great glory.

Antiochus Soter leuieth warre against Triphon.

Antiochus breaketh his amity pligh ted to Simon, and vrgeth vniust demands.

Three yeares after, to wit, the 177. of the Greekes, and 133. before the birth of Christ, as Simon (growing now auncient) returned, visiting & ordayning the Churches, and the dissipated pollicies in Iudea; he arriued (with his Wife and two of his Sonnes, Iudas and Mattathias) neere to his kinesman Ptolomy, the Sonne of Abobus, whom he had constituted Gouernour of the whole Region about Iericho. But he wickedly murdered him, sitting at the Table of a Banquet, whereto (most traiterously) he had inuited him, onely for that bloody purpose.

Simon groweth ancient in yeares.

Simon murdred at a banquet by his Sonne in law.

Foure Asmoneans, the Father and his three sonnes.

Thus foure Asmoneans, namely, the Father Mattathias, and three of his Sonnes (each after other) fighting valiantly three and thirty yeares, in defence of the Law giuen by God, against the persecuters of his people, ended their liues. And although they could not so compasse the matter, as to cleanse Iudea wholly of Pagan Idolatries, because many among the people were (openly) Epicures, and many mightily deiected, by seeing the woful calamities of the people, and others inueigled by the Gentiles prosperities; did willingly renounce the first receiued doctrine of their Fathers, and embraced the impieties of the Paganes: yet notwithstanding, they preuailed so well by their power, that the writings of the Prophets were preserued, the seruice ordained by God, not abolished, nor the Iewish pollicy any way dissipated. All which ensued by the singular goodnesse of God, to the end, that the pollicy and ministry appointed by him (in some good measure still maintained) should continue to the time of Christ, that men might know, when & how the Messias was to be sent. The principality and high-Priesthood continued (sometime) in the Family of the Asmoneans, to the successors of Simon, because Iudas and Ionathas had not left any issue of theirs.

Iudea not wholly recouered from Paganisme, & the reason why.

The writings of the Prophets safely preserued among so many persecutions.

Iudas and Ionathas left not any issue

Concerning the imprisonment of Simons two Sonnes and their Mother, by their cruell Vnckle Ptolomie; and lastly, their lamentable death. The valiant actes of Iohn Hyrcanus, Sonne to Simon. The destruction of Samaria, &c.

The Sonnes of Simon, were Iudas and Mattathias.

The gouernment of Iericho giuen to Ptolomy by Simon.

HAuing accompanied their Father, going with his Wife to see Ptolomy their Sonne in law, to whom he had formerly spoken, to giue him the gouernement of Iericho: they were imprisoned with their Mother, by their Vnckle Ptolomy, who before had slaine their Father at a Banquet. Now, while Hyrcanus, seeking to reuenge so horrible a deed, had besiedged a small Towne, whereto Ptolomy had withdrawne himselfe: the Tyrant caused them there to bee pittifully dismembred, as also their Mother; vntill such time as Hyrcanus, moued with compassion, & not able to endure the torturing of his brethren and Mother, raised the siedge, albeit his captiued Mother, still vrged him earnestly, to maintaine the assault.

The two sons of Simon and their Mother cruelly tormented.

Iohn Hyrcanus.

In the life time of his Father, hee discomfited the Army of Antiochus Soter, which was conducted by Cendebeus. Next after the death of his Father, and the taking of his two Brethren, himselfe hardly escaping from the ambushes of the murderer Ptolomy: hee came to reuenge his Fathers death, and besiedging the Towne whereto Ptolomy was returned, being ouercome with pitty, by seeing the torments which his Mother & Brethren suffered, at euery time when hee gaue the assault, considering also, that the seuenth yeare of rest was neere at hand; he retreated his Army. Afterward, Antiochus Soter made warre vpon him, so that he was shut vp within the Citty of Ierusalem, which Antiochus besiedged in seuen places all at one time: being pressed with famine, hee yeelded vp the City, vpon condition, that he would beate down the Fortefications of the Citty, deliuer hostages, & fiue hundred Talents, that is to say, three Tunnes of Gold.

The Army of Antiochus Soter vanquished by Iohn Hyrcanus.

Iohn Hyrcanus besiedged in Ierusalem, and the City yeelded vpon agreement.

But as he was in want of money, or accidentally seeking for some by vrgent necessity, or admonished so to doe by a dreame: he opened the Sepulcher of Dauid, wherein he found three thousand Talents of Gold, which amounteth to 18. Tuns of Gold. Being thus readuanced, he not only made peace with Antiochus, but also entred into amity with him, so that he entertained him into the Citty with his Army, and being well prouided of mony, he was the first (of the Iewes) that had strange Soldiours vnder his pay. With whom he accompanied King Antiochus, he going in warre against the Parthians; and yet his company was but slenderly beneficiall to the King. For although by the valiancy valiancy of Hyrcanus, he ouerthrew a part of the Parthians Army, yet soone after, when Arsaces, King of the Parthians, came with a new Army, & he should then haue met and ioyned with him: Religion hindered Hyrcanus and the Iewes from going to the fight, because it was then the Feast of Pentecost. By which meanes, Antiochus being destitute of the Iewes helpe, was slaine, with a great number of his people.

The Feast of Pentecost hindred Hyrcanus from the battaile.

After the death of Antiochus Soter, Hyrcanus began to make small account of the Kings of Syria; as being men, that (by ciuill warres) had broken the forces of their kingdomes. Wherefore, bringing back his hoast from Asia, he tooke many Cities and Townes in the kingdome of Syria, which had in former times appertained to Iudea. He razed also the Temple of Garizim in Samaria, builded by Sannabalat the Cutthean, (as hath before bin remembred) two hundred yeares after it had bin builded in fauour of Manasses, Brother to Iaddus, in the time of Alexander the great.

The Temple of Garizim in Samaria razed.

The Idumeans receiue circumcision.

He compelled also the Idumeans (after he had giuen them many chastenings) to receiue circumcision, and other ceremonies of the Iewes. And to strengthen himselfe the more against the Kings of Syria, who he thought not fit to make any more surprizing of Cities; hee renewed alliance (by Ambassadours) with the Romanes, in the fourteenth yeare of his principality, and the 191. of the kingdome of Syria: Cneus Domitius Barbarossa, and Caius Flaminius being Consuls, an hundred and 13. yeares before the Natiuity of Christ.

Aliance made with the Romanes.

Afterward, as Demetrius Nicanor had bene restored to his Kingdome by Arsaces, and as quickly againe repulsed from it by Alexander Zebena, when he prepared himselfe to make warre on the Iewes: so Hyrcanus, allying himselfe with Alexander the victorious, had sustained as little ioy thereof, if an admirable accident had not corrected their error. For Antiochus Gryphus, Sonne to Demetrius, seeking to recouer his Fathers kingdome, slew Alexander in battaile, and (after that victory) purposed to inuade Hyrcanus, the leagued friend to his enemy. But hearing of another preparation of warre against himselfe, by his brother Antiochus Cyzicenus; he was glad to keepe at home still in Syria. So, while the two bretheren did wel-fauouredly contend with one another (a long time) for the kingdome of Syria; Hyrcanus and Iudea remained in quietnes, during which time, Hyrcanus well fortefied himselfe by strong Castles newly builded, re-enforcing al his most commodious munitions, collecting vp great summes of money, & prouiding other necessary matters, to exploit his warre affaires.

Hyrcanus maketh alliance with Alexander the victorious.

Antiochus Gryphus and Antiochus Cyzicenus fight for the kingdome of Syria.

Finally, hee laide siedge to the most strong Citty of Samaria, and left there his two Sonnes Antigonus and Aristobulus to continue it, while himselfe attended to the administration of more important Oeconomical affaires. Hereupon, the Samaritaines called to succour them Antiochus Cyzicenus; who repulsed the sonnes to Hyrcanus, and chased them so farre as to * Scythopolis. Againe, the two brethren brought their Army before Samaria, and againe Antiochus Cyzicenus (being requested) entred into Iudea, pilling and spoyling whereseoeuer he came. But being repulsed, hee gaue the charge of his Army to two of his Captaines; one of them being slaine by the Iewes, and the other corrupted with money, surrendred (by treason) Scythopolis, and the other neighboring Citties. So the Citty of Samaria, hauing endured (in great misery) a whole yeares siedge, was at the last forced and quite destroyed. Such was the ending of this most mighty Citty, which (for a long time) had paragond it selfe equall with Ierusalem; but about an hundred yeares after, it was builded againe by Herod, who named it Sebasta, in the honour of Augustus Caesar.

Samaria besiedged by Hyrcanus and his forces.

* A Citty of Syria, neere to Iudea, called also Decapolis.

The Citty of Samaria razed and destroyed to the ground.

CHAP. VII.

How the rest and prosperity of Iudea, begat sundry Sects among the people, especially of the Pharisies, Sadduces, &c. The diuersity of their opinions: and a breefe narration of the Doctrine, in vse among the first Fathers.

THE Country of Iudea, being thus reduced to repose & quietnes, & by the paines of Hyrcanus; her prosperity procured enuy & distaste, aswel toward her own people, as (more especially) to the Pharisies. For factions grew thē in great esteem among the meaner people, by simulation sanctity, and great swarmes of deuised traditions, concerning some kindes of bodily exercises: so that (whensoeuer they pleased) they could cause the common people to mutiny against the Princes and the High-Priest. Hyrcanus had sometime beene a curious fauourer of this Sect; in which regard, the Pharisies did beare him great affection: but at the last, he estranged his kindnesse towards them, finding himselfe offended at the punishment of Eleazar the Pharisie, by some outrage offered him. And this was the reason, that hee tooke part with the Sadduces, who sharply reproued the traditions of the Pharisies, and in hate and spight to the Pharisies sect, hee abolished (by publike Edicts) many of their traditions, which made him and his Sonnes to be mortally hated, aswell of the Pharisies, as of the people. Whereupon ensued great mutinies among the people: which his Sonne Alexander very hardly appeased, but not without great effusion of blood.

Hyrcanus a fauourer of the Pharisies, leaneth afterward to the Sadduces.

Hyrcanus & his Sonnes hated of the Pharisies and vulgar people

Now, because mention is here made of these two Sects, both of the Pharisies and Sadduces, whereof more will be spoken in the following Histories, as likewise is in sacred Writ: I thinke it not amisse to make some addition, of matters found in authenticall writings, concerning the variance and difference betweene them. For in speaking of their originall, we can but follow coniectures onely: except this infallible certainty, that both the one and other Sect were newly forged, by leauing the ancient and pure doctrine of the Prophets. This firme rule ought euermore to be held in the Church, that there is one sole true doctrine, of the diuine essence & will, made manifest of God by certaine and vndoubted testimonies, and was giuen to the first Fathers and Prophets: but much more enlightened afterward, by the voyce of the Sonne of God, our Lord Iesus Christ, dead, and raysed vp againe for vs, as also by the voice of the Apostles. And no opinions ought to be embraced, contrary to that first Prophetical doctrine and voyce of Gods owne Sonne: because many sayings of the Prophets do witnesse this rule to be true. As Esay condemneth those Doctors, which propose (as the doctrine of God) opinions forged in their owne braines, and such as neuer were giuen of God. Being armed then, and well warned by this rule, wee may the better iudge of these Sects.

The difference betweene the Sects of the Pharisies and Sadduces.

Testimonies of Gods will giuen to our first Fathers.

Esay 25, 24.

But in making this recitall, I may not forget that most lamentable complaint, which the so mighty infirmity of mankind ought much to bemoane, because euen then, when the Church consisted of so small a number, to wit, in few Tribes of Israel, poorely impayred, and shut vp in that narrow country neighbouring to the Phœnitians, and that then (with so small pollicy) discipline could scarsely maintaine it selfe peaceably, or doctrine bee kept in good concord: such horrible furies being prepared against it, yea, & they embraced by the greater part of the Gouernours, publishing them wholly, without dissembling any thing, although they were plainly repugnant vnto the Law of God. The Sadduces acquitted themselues of sacrifices, and neuertheless affirmed publikely, that after this present life, there remained no other, nor any iudgement; and that the soule (being separated from the body) should haue no more life, and that men should not rise againe. But the Pharisies were a little more modest, and yet notwithstanding, they had as well corrupted the doctrine giuen by God, as we shall haue better occasion to speake of heereafter.

The poore & small beginning of the Church in the few Tribes of Israel, and continuance thereof in many troubles.

Concerning the opinions of the Sadduces.

The Pharisies more modest then the Sadduces.

Neuertheless, God had a true Church all this while, which stil retayned the light of his doctrine: and yet, was it not greatly to be lamented, that in one & the same company, which bare the name of the Church, among a troope that called vpon God in truth; such errours should not onely bee dispersed, but also allowed by the authority of Princes and Doctours? Beside this, the assured and prophaned arrogancy of many (euen in our times) ought greatly to be reprehended, who dreaming of no dispersion of errors in the Church, eyther for satisfaction of their owne ambition, vnder colour of religion seeking after kingdomes, or by heaping superstitions one vpon another, thereby to fit and furnish their owne auarice; doe neuer thinke on (in this case) the ancient and old examples of the Pharisies & Sadduces, who declared sufficiently, the very like euils crept into the Church, euen as apparantly then, as those of other times. It is therefore very necessary, to haue one certaine rule, in listening to the voyce Euangelicall,

God alwayes had his true Church, retaining still the light of his Doctrine.

The errors of elder times very apparant to be discerned.

uangelicall, according as Saint Paul said: If any man preach any other Gospell to you, let him be accursed. (Galath 1.9.)

Furthermore, consideration is to bee had, of the time of that first Doctrine, agreeing with the voyce of the Prophets, the Sonne of GOD, and the Apostles: and next, of such perswasions as haue crept into the Church, some whereof haue beene confirmed by the superstition of men vnlearned, others haue beene voluntarily receiued, as seruing the ambition of the mightie, and for benefite to the kitchin. Acknowledging then, and bewayling the harmes of the Church; let vs seeke after the springs or fountaines of true doctrine, to the end wee may truely call vpon God, who hath alwayes preserued some part of mankinde, where his true knowledge might shine, to bee the Temple of God, and afterwards partaker of his glorious company, because mankinde was not created in vaine. But before I discourse on the originall of Sects, and Diuisions of the Church, it is needfull first to say somewhat, concerning the first true Church or Schoole, which from the beginning of mankinde, hath beene gardian and keeper of the true doctrine: from whence hath issued many, who (as seditious) haue scattered diuers corruptions among the truth of doctrine.

The time of the first doctrine, and superstitions since encreasing.

The harmes and euills of the Church ought much to be moaned

Of the first true Church or Schoole.

Mankind was not borne by accidentall chance, neither created without cause: but it pleased God, that he should haue a reasonable nature, embelished with a bodie, wherein the knowledge of him might shine, and to whom he might communicate his wisedome and goodnes, & that hee should enioy his company once and for euer. Now, although God expressed his wisedome and goodnesse, by creating the great workemanship of the world: yet notwithstanding, his goodnes made it selte much more apparant, in that (after the fall of Adam and Eue) he sent from his secret seate, that infinite mercie for their recouery, by giuing them the promised Seede to come. And to make it the better knowne and vnderstood, hee would haue men to heare the sound of that sweete voice: The Seede of the woman shall breake the Serpents head. (Genes 3.15.) Such as receiued graciously this consolation, were receiued of God, and made members of the eternall Church of God. Thus first of all, the Church was created, and the Schoole instituted, wherein our first Parents taught the doctrine of God to their children: concerning the creation of all things; concerning their owne fall; the paines and punishments to ensue; the trecheries of the diuell; the causes of death and all humaine miseries; the promise of the Seede to come, whereby the great and iust anger of God was to bee appeased. Also, how sinne was to be defaced, eternall life restored, the difference of good and euill works, and that such a difference being imprinted in the soules of men, was truely the Lawe diuine, agreeing with the intelligence and diuine will; so to shine in the spirites of men, that it might bee a testimonie of God to men, that he was one God, and how to bee adored: admonishing likewise, that hee would iudge the actions of men, because conscience would else exercise a burdenous iudgement in vs.

The reason why God created mankind

The great grace and mercie of god to man after his fall.

The first creation of the Church by God, enstructed to our first Parents, and so to their posteritie.

There they were taught the diffrence betweene this naturall knowledge, and the other of higher qualitie; the pronounced promise of the secret bosome of the eternall Father, touching the Seede; the future iudgement of all mankinde: and that such as (by faith in that Seede) attayned to beleeue therein, were acceptable to God, and in that faith had recourse to him, striuing to order their manners by the rule of the diuine Lawe, should liue eternally in the most sweete company of God. Others, who arrogantly contemned God, & the promised Seed to come, running furiously on the bridle of their wicked desires; were like vnto diuells, enemies to God, and after death should liue in horrible torments, whereof they discerned some resemblance in this life, by the terrours of such, whose bodies were adiudged to terrible punishments.

Those first Fathers declared, how God had clothed them with the skins of beasts, to signifie, that (after death) they should bee denested of their corrupted bodies, and put vppon them (as the garment or roabe of the Lambe) that is to say, the promised Seede, which was to be sacrificed, that all mankind might be saued by him. They taught the will of God to bee such, that by this meanes it should bee sought, knowne and called on, as it was made manifest: and that our mindes leaning ning vpon his promise, gaue vs to vnderstand, that then wee are in the grace of God, when (by fayth) wee relie vpon his promises, and that hee would haue no other gods to be receiued, or Sacrifices offered by them that forgot or reiected this doctrine giuen by God. They also manifested, that God would haue one sole and certaine assemblie, which should be consenting in doctrine, gathered together by inuocation and sacrifices: in which sole assembly, should be the future heires of eternall life with God.

One sole and certaine assembly instituted by God to bee his Church.

As an Interpreter to their Sacrifices, this predication was often repeated; This maner of behauiour, and these publique assemblies are instituted, to the end, that this doctrine should be sent to Posteritie. In them the voyce of the diuine Promise, and the doctrine declared by vs, was to be heard: for god would haue his voice to be heard of all men. In which respect, it was and is requisite, that there should bee honest assemblies; and although the Church will be alwayes tormented with great calamities: yet shall she be exalted as a Castle on a high mountaine. These our Sacrifices which you see, are the chaines and linckes of such assemblies, and no other paintings haue we to admonish vs, then the diuine Promise so graciously giuen vnto vs.

The reason why ancient ceremonies were instituted.

What the Sacrifices did represent.

Hauing enstructed their children in these great matters, they added, concerning the Seede to come, That that Lord, who should breake the head of the Serpent; was already (and euen then) assisting to his Church, although he was not (as yet) reuested with humaine flesh. That he was the Image of the Eternall and only Father, begotten of him, who prayed to his Father for the Church, and defended it, and (with the Father) comforteth the hearts of Beleeuers, euen in their greatest feares, by his Promises, and kindleth in them the light of the blessed Spirit, for the beginning of eternall life. Which Spirit proceeded from the Father, and from this promised Lord. By this meanes they taught to know the only true God, wise, good, iust, true, chaste and pure, Creator of heauen and earth, of Angels, and of mankinde; to the end, that all might vnderstand, there was one only eternall Father, who had created all with this promised Lord, who is his Image, and with the blessed Spirit, so that no other Diuinitie was to be imagined.

Christ was assisting to his Church long before his Incarnation.

The first meanes of knowing the blessed Trinitie according to the instruction of the first Fathers.

Moreouer, in this holy Schoole, the first fathers taught the doctrine concerning the nature of things, giuing to vnderstand; that there were certayne lawes of Celestiall motions, to deliuer testimony, that this world was not made by aduenture, but created by the intelligence of a super-excellent workeman. They taught beside, the course of the yeare to be ordained, because God would haue men to know the order of times; thereby also to vnderstand the order of diuine promises, and how they were to be reuealed, as to know what the first giuen doctrine was, thereby to iudge of the newer afterward. And because men might cõprehend, that all things were created by the Diuine Councell and Prouidence: they shewed diuerse vses of Plants, to what end they were created, and for the vse of man. Heereupon they expressed, how God assisted the nature of man by those remedies; thereby also enstructing, that oftentimes Innocents are holpen of God by admirable meanes, and yet without the ayde of creatures.

Other doctrines instructed by the fathers concerning policie.

The course of the yeare, and the knowlege of Plants.

That this was the doctrine of the first or Primitiue Church, the narration of Moses sufficiently declares, in Genes. And it is not to be doubted, that the wisedom of the golden Age, before the Floud, was much greater then that after the Floud, whē nature became more weak & feeble. And though that many, both before and after the Floud, might forget or mispriſe true doctrine; yet notwithstanding, God would not suffer his true Inuocation to be quenched among men: but euermore reserued som company that kept this doctrine, (from one time to another) renued & dispersed it further off by nouell testimonies. Againe, when after the Floud, the multitude of men began once more to encrease, though the light of true doctrine might be extincted in Babylon: yet notwithstanding the studie of Astrology remayned, touching the motions and effects of the Starres, with the knowledge of things growing in the earth.

The wisedom of the golden Age before the Floud.

God euermore conserued the inuocating vpon his name.

And in this meane while, the promise of God was still preserued and kept, renewed and illumined in the posteritie of Noah. Afterward, when this pollicie became to be so well ordayned among the people people of Israel: all the Colledge of the Leuites was as an Academie and place of exercise. There, some Sacrificers and Prophets taught againe the auncient and vncorrupted doctrine.

The ten tribes cut off by the kings of Iuda, and yet the truth of Doctrine still encreasing.

But afterward, when the tenne Tribes were cut off by the Kings of Iuda: then great confusions (both in Religion and Doctrine) followed. And yet neuertheless, God raised in the dismembred part of Iudaes Kingdomes, Elias, Eliseus, and other Prophets, to draw diuers there to the truth of knowledge: which was the reason that the Prophets had great troupes of Auditours, in regarde that Elias, Eliseus, and the rest had deliuered (from hand to hand) their sacred preachings and interpretations. Some did leaue theirs written, as Esay, and they that followed after. This custome did alwayes continue in this people, and especially in the Temple, where the sacrificing Priests gaue the interpretations, or else-where among the Doctours, and such as were interpreters of the Writings of Moses and the Prophets.

Causes, how the truth of doctrine grew to contempt and bastardizing.

But in the latter times, after the returne from Babilon, and after the Prophet Zacharie, when the High-Priests beganne to affect familiarity with the kings of Iuda, and sought to make themselues great and powerfull, the study of true doctrine became contemned, and after that Iudea was spoiled by Antiochus; many places were lost, the companies of Students, and their Maisters scattered, and and discipline being thus neglected, it is very likely that the studies became to bee wonderfully changed. Howbeit, that alwayes some of the Colledge of the high-Priests, and of the people, kept some sparks of the true doctrine liuing among them: as Simeon, Zacharie, Anne, and other, whose youth neighboured to the warres of Antiochus. Notwithstanding, many audacious Expositions of the Propheticall Bookes, wandred farre off from the auncient doctrine.

Some remnants of Gods truth at all times remaining.

Concerning the name of Interpreters.

It is very likely, that at the beginning, the name of Interpreters was common to some men of the best iudgement, and likewise to other, that transfigured the doctrine of the Church into Philosophie. By succession of times, as this new Philosophie was most pleasing, and many earnestly fauouring it: the Schooles began to be so much the more frequented, and a kinde of doctrine was then concluded on. In this manner a profession or Sect (which then was in admiration) was ordained; without changing the name of Pharisie, asmuch to say as an Expounder, as nowadayes the title of Doctour, is the name of a most honest Office and Profession: for many learned men doe conceiue the Pharisie to be named, rather for Interpretation or Exposition, then by separation or diuision.

The name of Pharisie is an Expositour.

Iosephus reporteth some of their opinions, but they are better to bee vnderstoode in the Euanglicall Historie, and what their principall errours were. For, although they carried themselues as interpreters of the Prophets: they auouched the Bookes not onely of Moses, but also of the other Prophets, adioyned to the holy Histories by publique authoritie of the Ancients, to remaine in their credite and integritie. Neuertheless, they helde false opinions concerning the vse of the Lawe, and transferred the promises of the Messias Kingdome, to politicall vse. They helde exteriour Discipline, for Iustice satisfying to the Lawe, and denyed that wicked affections were sinne, or doubting of God, or courage enkindled by hatefull or lustfull desires: prouided that they proceeded not to outward offence. These corruptions are expressely reprooued in Saint Matthew, where it is said; whosoeuer looketh on a woman, to lust after her, hath already committed adultery with her in his heart. And although that many vnlearned men in the Church, read these Sentences as Paradoxes of the Stoickes, who painted the Ideaes of the vertues, to the end that men should striue to come nere to them (which is impossible for any man in this world to do) yet are they propounded to the Church to other ends.

The errours of the Scribes and Pharisies, and in what manner they held them.

Math. 5. 28.

The Sonne of God knew, that in the imbecillitie of this nature, no man can be without bad desires; therefore hee would haue the preaching of repentance to be dayly sounded among men, that acknowledging our corruptions in due manner, wee should confesse our owne guiltinesse, and make our recourse to the Sonne of God. The Philosophie of the Pharisies, obscured this aucient Propheticall

No man in this life time can be free from corrupt and vnlawfull affections.

The Phariſies celebrated the promiſes made to Abraham.

ticall doctrine, as it had beene in all times after Caine and his Poſteritie.

In like manner, the other part of heauenly doctrine, to wit, the promiſed Meſſias was alſo obſcured. The Phariſies knew and celebrated the magnificēt Promiſes made to Abraham, recited by Iaacob, and often repeated by the Prophets: but they maintained, that they ſpake only of a politicall kingdome. They dreamed alſo, that the Meſſias ſhould come like vnto an other Cyrus or Alexander the great, to vſe the whole Empire of the world, the people beeing ſubiected vnto him: and yet notwithſtanding, that this Empire ſhould be more iuſt, milde and peacefull, then any of them before. They affirmed, that the Meſſias ſhould reigne a thouſand yeares; that the Iſraelites ſhould liue three or foure hundred yeres without feare of warres, ſeruitude, or famine, or any other great calamities: And that there ſhould bee no other nature in the Meſſias, but humane.

The carnall opinions of the Phariſies, concerning the Meſſias and his Kingdome.

In theſe idle imaginations, all the doctrine of the Sonne of God, of anger againſt ſinners; of the ſacrifice and death of the Meſſias was buried. And yet neuertheleſſe, truth was not wholly quenched in the Church, but (as I haue ſaid) ſome ſparkes remayned with Simeon, Zacharie, and many ſuch like, who read the Prophets without corruption.

Sinnes to be pardoned by ceremonies and killing of beaſts ordained in the Lawe.

After that the Phariſie had corrupted the words of the Lawe, and the promiſes thereto appertaining: they dreamed that ſinnes were to be pardoned by ceremonies and ſlaughter of beaſts, ordained in the Lawe. This perſwaſion brought in great gaine, for the people (being thus perſwaded) multiplied the more their ſacrifices. Theſe ſo thicke miſtes of darkeneſſe had ſome apparance of wiſedome and pietie; which neuertheleſſe are oftentimes reprehended of the Prophets.

Queſtions cōcerning the acting & performing of deuiſed ceremonies.

Ceremonies growing to great augmentation and encreaſe, many queſtions (as in the like caſes happeneth) were moued, touching the manner of perfourming them, & other circumſtances, which (indeede) required many declarations. And as Monks heaped vp together great ſummes of money, by the buying and ſelling of humane traditions, with their annexed circumſtances: euen ſo the Phariſies would locke vp and let looſe the ceremonies of Moſes, at their pleaſure; and adde to them their owne nouell deuices, as well for the confirmation of ſuperſtition, as their owne gaine. Saint Matthew telleth vs, that the lucratiue tradition is reproued: that it was much better to giue ſomewhat to the Temple, then to noriſh and relieue their owne poore parents: euen as now adayes it is maintained, that a number of ſlouthfull idle Monkes, ſhould rather enioy great reuenewes, then any thing ſpared for the reliefe of poore Schollers. Matth. 15. 6, 7

Tradition for a Sabbaoth daies iourney 2 halfe miles, appoynted by the Phariſes.

The tradition of the Sabbaoth was alſo in great vſe, as Hierome alledgeth: for Alziba and Hillelus, both Rabines, do ſay, a Sabaoth dayes iourney is but two halfe miles. Beſide, in this Sect remained ſome ſtudies of doctrine, and ſome care of gouerning the diſcipline. They could well conclude, that there was an eternall and intelligent God, true, good, iuſt, chaſte, well-doing, and a reuenger of offences: whereby they confeſſed all things to bee created, the heauens, the earth, Angels, men and other creatures. They affirmed alſo (by opinion of philoſophy) that there was but one perſon in the diuinitie, boldly reiecting the Primitiue and Prophetticall doctrine concerning the Sonne of GOD and the bleſſed Spirit: although they had apparent teſtimonies of the Son of God in Dauid, Eſay, Micheas and Daniel; and of the Holie-ghoſt, in many Sermons of the Prophets.

The Phariſies allowed but one Perſon onely in the Godhead.

Of the Lawe of Moſes, and what they gathered thereby

Moreouer, they confeſſed, that God the Creator of all things, was manifeſted by his Promiſes, and by publiſhing his Lawe: ſurpaſſing all other in goodneſſe, with a moſt goodly pollicie, ordayned and warranted by many teſtimonies of his preſence. Wherefore they would not haue any one to call in doubtfull queſtion the prouidence of God, nor to doubt that the poſteritie of Abraham (to whom God had giuen this ordayned pollicie) ſhould bee any other then the people of God, or the Church whereof God had a peculiar care. They taught them that God gouerned the principall mutations which happened in this life, as the encreaſings and diminiſhings of Empires, the ruine and building againe of great Citties; becauſe they knew their euents to agree with the prophecies of empires, which are in Moſes, Eſay and Daniell; adding ding withall, that they knew that their Citie Ierusalem had beene diuinely builded.

The Pharises maintained the freedome of mans wil.

And yet (for all this) they affirmed, that the affaires and liues of all men, were gouerned by humane councelles; and they magnified the libertie of mans will, as also the faculty of Free-will: yea, and in such sort, that they held a man might satisfie the diuine Lawe, and be iust by his diligence, meriting all goodnesse both present and heauenly. And contrariwise, that such as offended the diuine Lawe by exteriour transgressions, should be punished both in this life and the other. For their opinion was (that the soule separated from the bodie) should liue, and that there should bee a resurrection of the dead, wherein God would reward the iust, and send into euerlasting punishments, such as had soiled themselues with execrable vices. And yet they held withall, that he would punish many crimes by present calamities, adding also; that some might be defaced by sacrifices, and the penalties due to them, made more milde or lessened.

They allowed also the resurrection of the dead.

The true vse of the Lawe vtterly abolished by them.

Now, although this doctrine was very passable in appearance; yet notwithstanding, they abolished the true vse of the Law, and with the benefites of the Messias, the doctrine of free pardon. Wherefore, eyther they confirmed trust in mens owne iustice, or left their consciences in pittifull doubts: in regarde that mens minds being thus ouerthrowne, fled from God, and trembling against him; neyther durst approach neare him, nor call vppon him truly.

Institution of many disciplines for ostentation.

For the more sure maintaining these their disciplines, they had instituted many exercises; the most part whereof serued rather for ostentation, then any restraint to their owne bad desires. The maner or forme of their garments was notable; for they wore great long cloakes, with fringes about them, inter-wouen with the words of the Lawe. Oftentimes they vsed to wash themselues, hauing at the entring into their houses holy-water, wherewith they sprinckled themselues. They obserued choice of meates in their fasts, muttering long prayers to themselues, which Saint Matthew calleth Battologie, much babbling.

Ceremonies vsed by the Pharisies.

Matth.6.7.

Their sacrifices and apparance of piety, attracted greatly the familiarity of women, which was the cause that adulteries and diuorces grew to be very frequent among them; and to enioy therein the more liberty, they enlarged the law of diuorces. For the auncient custome of diuorces implied, that they were not to be done, but vpon knowledge of the cause, and the instruments to effect them, was, with the knowledge and consent of the magistrate, and seperation might not be graunted for light causes and disturbances; but by good reasons induced to the Iudges, who were knowne to bee graue men, and of great integritie.

Women familiarly allured to their Sacrifices.

The auncient manner for graunting the bil of diuorce.

But the Pharises (vtterly disannulling this auncient custome) made diuorces vpon their priuate authority, either without cause, or for causes of no moment: so that the lawe of diuorce serued onely as a baited hooke, to allure and betray other mens wiues; as among the Pagans, and as at this instant with the Turkes, it is in vse.

The law of diuorce serued for the betraying of mens wiues.

By this kind of proceeding, men might reiect their wiues when they thought fittest, without any reasonable cause, and contrary to the nature of mariage, which God himselfe instituted at the beginning, to the end, that it might be the aliance of an inseparable company when hee saide: They shall be both one flesh; that is to say, a male and female shal be ioyned together inseparably. In like manner, the Lawe of Moses did not permit diuorce without cause; but rendred a reason whereby separation might be allowed, to wit, If any vilenesse were found in her. And the ancient Atticke custome intended, that no diuorce should be granted, without knowledge of the cause. Since when, by succession of times, the bands of discipline haue been let loose, by the encrease of lewdnes and incontinencie: so that the auncient Atticke custome became quite changed. And so in the latter times of the Iewes, all grauity for the maintenance of aliance in mariage, grew greatly extenuated. For shee could not be saide to be a true wife, whom the husband might cast off at all times, and whensoeuer such giddines intoxicated his braine, and without anie wighty cause. This vniust custome of the Pharises was the cause of that question in S. Mathew, where mention is made concerning the alliance of marriage, and the first institution therof repeated: also by a seuere

Vices frequẽt and common to ſuperſtitious natures in al ages and nations.

It hath beene common to all ſuperſtitious natures, in all ages and nations, to peruert the order of precedent actions; yea, & in ſuch ſort, that they grow to be very difficult and rigorous exacters, of multitudes of their owne deuiſed ceremonies: being (in the interim time) very careleſſe for the neceſſary ſeruices of life, whereof the Decalogue giueth cõmands, and letting looſe the bridle to infinit lewd affections. And many of them appeare meerely as Iugglers, ſuch as are deſcribed in our Satyres, who (by counterfeited grauitie) diſguiſe great vices, whereof is ſaid; That they ſhew themſelues to be wiſe men, and yet liue in diſſolution.

Iugling tricks of the Phariſes.

And although among the Phariſies, ſome were more modeſt then others, as Gamaliel; ſome alſo vnderſtanding the doctrine more purely, renouncing errors, as Nichodemus; yet notwithſtanding, the moſt part of them were of this coyne or ſtampe. They had execrable errors (concerning the Diuinitie) engrauen in their ſpirits, and touching the political Empire of the Meſſias. They vnderſtood nothing of the promiſe for remiſſion of ſins, nor of the true Inuocation. They had a falſe opinion of the Moiſaical ceremonies, and of their owne. Moreouer, they added other enorme vices to theſe; as to eſteeme wel of themſelues, for they reputed themſelues to be wiſe, iuſt, princes and pillers of Gods Church; preferring themſelues before al modeſt and religious people indeed, becauſe they affected to haue their carriage more ſeene and obſerued, themſelues to bee more honoured and feared, then any other. Neuertheleſſe, they were in continuall debates and variances, aſwell among themſelues, as the Citizens, feaſting together for pride, ambition, enuy, contempt, hatred, cuill ſpeaking and venimous iniuries. So that through their priuate couetouſnes, they moued not only many domeſticall tumults, but aymed at the youke of ſtrangers; for they were skilfull in thoſe artes (wel knowne among themſelues) in ſeeking to compaſſe a tyrannicall power.

Moſt of the Phariſes were of one molde. Execrable errours held by the Phariſes.

Their pride in opinion of themſelues, and their actions, excelling all, and none good enough to be equall with them.

First of all, they ſtrengthened themſelues by the fauors of neighboring kings, of high Courts, mighty men, and planting factions among the people; forgetting to imitate the ancient ſaying; If the Serpent doe not eate a Serpent, hee will neuer become a Dragon. And either by calumnies, or other like means, they oppreſſed all ſuch, as (in emulation) were hinderers to their power. Aboue all, they were very ſpleenatiue againſt the profeſſors of true doctrine, carefully ſeeking all occaſions whereby to ſpoile them: as it is ſaid, they ſlew Zachary the Father to Iohn Baptiſt.

What maners and practiſes were in obſeruation amongſt the Phariſes.

Now although (as I haue formerly ſaid) that among the Phariſes, ſome were more modeſt then other, & ſome (being thereto admoniſhed) forſooke their errours, and embraced the true doctrine: yet notwithſtanding, the following Hiſtories of the Iewiſh people, and the Euangelicall narrations doe teſtifie, that the opinions and behauiour of this troupe, and all ſuch as made profeſſion of this Sect, partaking with them in their rites and ceremonies, were none other then as I haue heere ſet downe.

The folowing hiſtories will make more apparant proofe of theſe people.

CHAP. VIII.

¶ Concerning the originall of the other Sect, tearmed Sadduces, contrary in nature to the Phariſies, and what cuſtomes were obſerued among them.

I Haue beene the larger in diſcourſing on the Phariſes, in regarde that this Sect dazled or deceiued mens ſight, by an apparance of farre greater ſuperſtition, then that of the Sadduces, and going beyond them in authoritie. Now I ſhall (in briefe) ſay ſomwhat of the Sadduces, in ſo much, as this Sect receiued no originall from ſuperſtition; but rather from contempt of God, ſauouring to be Epicurian.

From whence the Sadduces had their originall.

Foraſmuch as the Phariſies charged men with numberleſſe ceremonies, that neither their bodies or conſcienees could bear any more; like to ſome other in theſe later times, whoſe lawes and impoſitions haue growne beyond all meaſure, that many stred (with teares) to be disburdned: so started vp other prophane people, who, without any true iudgement, loosing the bands of all restriction (by an Epicurian audaciousnes) instituted another Sect contrary to that of the Pharises, naming themselues Sadduces. For, to cary some esteem before the people, they tooke this honorable title, deliuered from Iustice: For Zaddikim signifies Iustnes, & this name was opposite to that of the Pharises, who were tearmed Interpreters, and disputed on many things. Now it was a matter more notable and glorious, for men to be stiled Iust, and doers of the Law, then Interpreters and Disputers. Others deduce the name from Sedak, a Chaldean word, which signifies to part or diuide. Bicause they vnderstood the Sadduces to be termed (according as we speake) Schismatickes, diuided from sentence with the rest of the church; but I guesse that their aduersaries forged that Etymologie.

In what manner the Sadduces began to insinuate themselues.

The Sadduces name held to bee more glorious then that of the Pharises.

It is no great matter, whence the appellation came, let vs rather consider the deed it selfe, & be terrified withall, in thinking on so horrible an example. Wherein plainly appeared the power of the diuell, forraging in this company, which bare the name of the church of God; considering, that (euen then) in people very well conditioned, among whom discipline was easily entertaind, because their extendure was so smal, & where there were no strangers to intermeddle; many durst (by publike authority) propound most execrable errors, and erect, euen in the midst of the Church, a Schoole like that of Epicurus. Let vs consider on this also, that after these Churches were spread abroad farre & wide, many mighty errors were sowne in & by them; as namely the confusion of the Empire, and the conuersation of Pagans, among whom they liued. Wherefore, let vs not flatter our selues, by a vain assurance of the name of the Church, as if that all had bin, or were without sinne.

The diuells mightie power in those vnsetled times.

Errours arising frō these dissenting churches, by meanes of the Sects.

And although it is not possible to report all the mad prankes of the Sadduces, without great griefe and anguish; yet notwithstanding, it is necessary the Historie should be written. For, it plainly appeareth, that some profane Iewes brought a monstrous audaciousnes into Iudea, and such wicked opinions as they had learned of Pagans, meerely Epicurians, by haunting to them familiarly; for they carried no meane resemblance with them. The Sect of the Sadduces retained the name of God, for feare lest it should appeare, that they would dissipate the pollicie, which was singularly maintained by the bands of Religion. But they endeuoured to efface out of mens vnderstanding, the true inuocation vpon God, and the true feare of him.

Monstrous opinions brought into Iudea by diuers prophane Iewes.

They maintained, that mens soules being sundred from their bodies, should neuer rest, and that men should reuiue no more after death: neyther that any other iudgement was to be expected, wherein the iust were to be discerned from the vniust. The names of eternall life, & of hell, were to this Sect as meere fables, and terrours to affright young children. And because they would make their intention knowne, that it was to ease the mindes of men, from the burden of Pharisaicall traditions, and to teach liberty: they feigned, to recall men back to the writings of Moses, and therefore alleadged his saying, where it is forbidden to adde to the Law. By this meanes they frustrated all the writings of the Pharises, with all their interpretations and traditions: the release and discharge whereof was pleasing, and affected by many, because that the number of them was well-neare infinite.

Furious and most mōstrous blasphemies held & maintained by the Sadduces.

All the Pharises writings made voyde and of none account.

From thence, and there framing their beginning, they went on further vnder the same colour, & reiected all the Bookes of the Prophets (the bookes of Moses onely excepted) auouching, that he neuer meant or spake, but of this present life onely. To maintaine the forme and order of their Commonwealth, they sayd; That the law ought to be obeyd, & sacrifices to be performed, because God punished great offences in this life. Contrariwise, for good actions and obedience, he gaue peace & abundance of goods: confirming al their fancies by the words of Moses, where hee speakes both of blessings and cursings.

All the books of all the prophets reiected by the Sadduces, only the books of Moses excepted.

The breuitie of this Doctrine, agreed and contented light headed spirits highly; and prophane persons were not a litle delighted with these opinions: which were confirmed by the iudgement of sense only, because euery man thought that an intollerable burthen, and hardly gaue credite to those Articles, which were out of his present sight & comprehension. And therefore this Sect (how wicked soeuer it were) wanted not store of folowers.

Now although it be true, that God is the gardian of politicall societie, and that he punisheth vniust murders in this life, lest the companies of men should be consumed, as also to the end, that they may be manifest signes of his diuine Iustice to euery eye: yet notwithstanding, God in meane while (by an admirable councell best knowne vnto himselfe) suffereth many iust persons to be slaine by the wicked; as Abell, the children of Israell in Egypt, Ionathas, Esay, Ieremy, and innumerable other. These examples doe testifie, that there remayneth another Iudgement, wherein God will declare his iustice, by bringing the iust and vniust into iudgement: and the wicked, being sent into torments, shall shew the iust to be victorious, although it continue some time after death. For, seeing that God declared, that he had a care of Abell, Ionathas, Esay, and Ieremy during their liues: if after death he should haue made no account of them, it had much dissented from his præscience; yea, and from his iustice also. It is then most euident, that the Sadduces, who denyed any other iudgement to remaine after death; did cut off the diuine and iust prouidence, from a great part of mankind, and especially from such as haue excelled in righteousnesse.

The Sadduces denyed any other iudgement to ensue after death.

The reason why the people of Israel were condemned by the Sadduces.

The sacrificing Priest of the Sadduces; beeing at the Altare, conceiued, that the Israelitish Nation was not chosen of God (who onely had the true knowledge of God on earth;) because they had been so often oppressed by Kings of the Egyptians, Chaldeans & Syrians; and, euen when their neighbors (being dispersed throghout Iudea) spoiled many thousands of iust persons, compelling them that suruiued, to feed on the slaughtered bodies of their fellow-Cittizens: in this case, shall there bee no attribution of iustice and prouidence to God, if instantly hee shewe not himselfe to haue a care of his, and that (therefore) there remayneth no immortality? Thus vnder the shadow of ceremonies, were mens soules abused, by outward and apparant Legier-dumaines, the diuine Prouidence being exactly taken away, euen as the Epicurians did.

Now, considering there were these debates between the Pharises and Sadduces, in such great matters, let such as reade, conceiue, not onely how great and frequent the tumults and perturbations of this people haue beene; but also, how rudely both the Pharises and Sadduces, and diuers other with them (being manifestly Atheists) vsed the true Church, as Simeon, Zachary and their poore flocke. But as then (among so many wolues and lions) some faithfull guardians of the true doctrine were reserued; so (no doubt) but God will stil continue it to all succeeding times; and as hee did to Simeon and the rest, so he will euermore stand in the iust defence of his Spouse the Church; supporting her, against all miseries whatsoeuer.

CHAP. IX.

Of a third Sect, contrary to the Pharises and Sadduces, who termed themselues by the name of Essæans: their originall, Religion and maner of life.

IT ordinarily happeneth, that when seditions haue once gotten themselues into actiue motion: many partialities and diuisions will thrust in after them. As Homer feigned, that the Storehouse or Armory (wherein Aeolus had locked vp the winds) being broken open: the Sea became troubled euery where, the windes flew abroad with such extraordinary violence; euen so in kingdoms & Empires, after that politicall order commeth to bee once troubled and dis-ioynted; many diuisions must needes follow after. Many Sects exalted themselues, during these debates betweene the Pharises and Sadduces. For some, detesting the profane doctrine, and Ethnicke licence of the Sadduces, and seeing Religion and piety masked by the Pharises, and that, to disguise great and grosse vices, such as were whoredome, ambition, malice, enuy, cruelty, lying, rapine, and the like, they set before mens eies (as a cloude of dissimulation) dreadfull seueritie, and and some seuere ceremonies; beganne to diuide themselues from both one and other.

Essæans, workers, or reprouers of other mē, in regard of their owne excellencie.

And these Seperatists & diuided people, formed a name for themselues, called Essæans, Workers; by which title, they gaue me to vnderstand, that which they reproued in others, & wherin they would seem more excellent then they: namely, that they fled from the profane libertie of the Sadduces, & allowed not the hypocrisie of the Pharises, disguised in so many kindes: but that they would doe deeds or workes profitable to other, and commaunded by God, hauing alwayes this vsuall sentence in their mouths; Euery word without work, is meerely vaine and vnprofitable.

No mention made of the Essæans in the Ecclesiasticall historie.

There is no mention made of them in the Eccleſiasticall history, either becauſe they had not inuēted any new kind of doctrine, but retained the doctrine of Moses & the Sacrificers: or in regard they dwelt at th'end of Iudea, toward the lake Asphaltida, as in a retiremēt, & neuer intermedled with the gouernment of affairs, shunning the contentions of the Pharises and Sadduces. Their maner of life was like to that of the Monkes; for, either they were not maried, or if they were, they abstaind from their wiues; hauing their goods in cōmon, doing such businesses as were inioyned thē. They sought not after riches, voluptuous pleasures, or honors; but digd and delued in gardens, as in a life of solitude, seeking carefully for knowledge in the natute of Plants, and their iuyces, stones and animalls, learning their remedies, and exercising Phisicke faithfully, which serued more then all other Artes for the life of man.

The maner how they liued far from the fashion of other men.

Vertuous and charitable qualities exercised by the Essæans.

Moreouer, they practised many vertues, as beneficence, patience in visiting sicke persons; such as were not able to helpe themselues, they would feed them, carry them, wash and bathe them, neuer shrinking at grosse sauors, coming either frō wounds, sweats, or other annoyances. Their cunning, faith & diligence was very commendable, in knowing wel how to prepare medicaments; to know the kindes of diseases; what remedies were apt for them; to know also times & seasons, when phisicke ought to be ministred. In briefe, the vertues & welldoing of a learned, industrious and faithful Phisition appeared in the most of them.

The Art of Physicke is meet and profitable to be learned by yong people.

And as it is a good thing, that youth should be enstructed in learning, the doctrine of good maners, the Art of phisick, and to accustome their tender spirites to discipline, & the vnderstanding of virtue: euen so in the assembly of the Essæans, the very skilfullest were chosen by a certaine number, who instructed many throghout Iudea. For al modest men, & such as shunned the managing of affaires in ciuile dissentiōs, affected rather to haue their children taught by the doctours of this Sect, then any other, which they held in horror, & would haue no acquaintance with them, seeing them so tempestuous in the Common-wealth, by their owne particular couetous desires, and continually mouing vnnecessary contentions.

The doctrine and life of the Essæans aimd onely at two especial ends

The Essæans addicted their life and religion principally to two heads or points, to wit: In calling vpon God in a priuate kind of life, and in honest bodily labours, which were the expulsion of vices, and profitable to other men. And for satisfaction both to the one and other, they had partition of times, so that they might attend on busines till the fift houre of the day, that is to say, to eleuen houres before midday. Their labor ending at that houre, certain numbers of people (round about) met there together, according to the places distributed to euery one. In this assembly, some passage in Moses and the Prophets was read, the Auncients that sate as Presidents, gaue addition of the exposition: which they would not haue to be written, but retained in the minde, and so transferred to the gouernment of manners, admonishing (according to the exigence of time) what they thoght profitable for peace and tranquilitie, for they would haue none of their followers to meddle in the Common-wealth.

Concerning their meetings and assemblies.

What times they reputed most conuenient for meditation and prayer.

After this reading & exposition, they inuoked Gods assistance both in publike & particular. They held those times to be most meet for meditation & praier, when the body was not charged with meats & fumes, & that inuention is most sprightly in them, whose mindes were fasting from worldly cogitations. Two or 3. houres being employed in reading and prayer, euery one went to supper, or walked in company, or alone by himselfe, according as it stoode with his good liking, or as his heart required. The rest of the day, vntill the Euening came, was spent in learned discourse and talking of God, of Plants, of medicaments, and their experience in euery thing: or else of the historie of their owne nation, and what miseries had beene common to them. Before the darke houres of night, they met together againe, and went to prayer.

The exercises after receiuing sustenance.

Now, although the order of their behauiour and actions were wisely gouerned, and many (in their Colledges) liued modestly; yet notwithstanding it came to passe, that some of them (wonne by their owne couetous desires) forgot the Lawes diuine, and (in the neighbouring towns) fell to voluptuous pleasures. But the rigour of each Colledge was such, as if any one had defrauded another, if hee had lied, or had infected himselfe with whoredome: immediately (by common sentence) hee was excommunicated out of the company. For (among them) was kept the most ancient custome of the Synagogue, whereof is spoken in Saint Mathew, Because there might no question be vrged, for instituting any new forme of Iudicature; but the playne auncient fashion, recited as it was giuen by the Fathers, the traces whereof are remaining in the Church.

Discipline ecclesiastical ordayned for such as offended against the Lawes of their colleges.

Matth. 18.17.

This pollicie of the Essæans, comprehended the principall parts of their doctrine, to wit; the study of learning, the exercises of Inuocation, reuerence to their Gouernors, bodily labors, temperance, and modest maners according to the Decalogue, the nourishing of youth; who were instructed in learning, and the Art of Physicke; paines and punishments also appointed for delinquents. Iosephus commended the College of the Essæans, comparing them to the Schoole of Pythagoras. Pliny also makes mention of them in very honorable maner, terming them Essæneans, as (since then) diuers other did; for there he speaketh of no other people, but onely the Essæans. Hee placeth their dwelling towards the Lake Asphaltida, on the west side, not farre from the Citty of Iericho, where were the gardens of Balme. It may be, that this place was chosen to study the Art of Physick, as not being the like in all the world, for abounding in all the principall medicines. By this passage of Pliny, and by Iosephus, it appeareth, that the colledge of the Essæans continued to the time of Vespasian: besides, Iosephus reporteth, that they carried themselues very valiantly in warre.

Hee was accounted singularly happy in 3. things; to wit, that he had bin so long a time a peaceable prince of the people, and the soueraigne Sacrificer: adding thereto, that he was beleeued to haue the spirit of Prophecie, & knowlege in things to come, by the gift of god.

CHAP. X.

Hauing briefly discourſed on the 3. ſeuerall Sects, of the Phariſes, Sadduces, and Eſſæans: we go backe againe where we formerly left, toſpeake of Hyrcanus and his Sonnes.

IOhn Hyrcanus had fiue sonnes, Aristobulus the first, Antigonus the second; a graue yong man, who in his life time, accompanyed with his brother Aristobulus: expulsed Antiochus Cyzicenus out of Iudea, and tooke Samaria. The father being dead, his brother also was crowned King. But soone after, when hee had exploited the affaires in Galilee, he went vp to Ierusalem, accompanied with braue Souldiers, to be present at the Feast of Tabernacles. His brother growing suspitious of him, and causing him to be entrapped by his warlike troups; he was slaine by them neare to the Temple.

The valiant actes of Antigonus.

Antigonus slaine by his brothers meanes.

Alexander the third called Iamnes also, had two sons, namely, Hyrcanus the first, Aristobulus the second, Absolon the fourth; being of a most milde and peaceable spirit, liued by himselfe priuately. A daughter of his was married to his cosin Aristobulus. The fift sonne of Hyrcanus is not named at all, and yet was slayne by his brother Alexander: because that (after the death of Aristobulus) he affected the kingdome.

The fift sonne of Hyrcanus slaine.

Aristobulus, after the death of his father Hyrcanus, being the first that changed the Principalitie into a dignitie Royall; imposed on himselfe the diademe, and sent also for his brother Antigonus, whom he loued. He put his other three brethren in prison, and that which is much more, he starued his owne mother to death in prison; because she demaunded ded the succession and gouernement of the principalitie, which Hyrcanus had left vnto her on his death-bed.

Antigonus the second son of Hyrcanus slaine.

Afterward, he caused his brother Antigonus to be slaine, he being a braue man, and a bolde warriour, laying diuerse ambushes for him, as hee returned victoriously from Galilee; only because he suspected that he affected the kingdome.

A strange iudgement of God iustly shewed vpon Aristobulus, & his despaire.

Immediately, beeing highly distasted by this murdering of his brethren, he became seized with a grieuous paine in his entrails, and hauing cast vp a great quantitie of bloud by vomiting, the Page that carried the Bason from him, fell (accidentally) in the same place, where the ground remained as yet infected with the blood of murdred Antigonus, and there he spilt the cast blood of Aristobulus: which hee vnderstanding, and falling into acknowledgement of the diuine iust vengeance; in excessiue torments both of soule and body, yeelded vp the ghost. After he had reigned one whole yeare onely, and during which time, hee had augmented the kingdome of Iudea, and constrained the Itureans to vndergoe Circumcision, hauing formerly vanquished them. He was called Philellin, because hee vsed greatly the familiarity of Pagans.

Alexander, called also Iannes.

HIs father Hyrcanus neuer saw him, for as he was in great care about the succession of his children: it was foretolde him in his sleepe, that his riches and principalitie, should fall into the power of that new borne babe, whereat hee growing greatly offended, commaunded, that hee should be nursed in Galilee, like to a simple priuate person.

A prediction giuen to Hyrcanus in his sleepe.

After the death of his father Hyrcanus, he was clapt vp in prison (with his two other brethren) by Aristobulus. But Aristobulus dying at his yeares expiration, hee came to the Crowne, by the means of Alexandra, wife to Aristobulus, to whom he had promised marriage.

Alexander attaineth to the Crowne.

Soone after he was crowned King, he slew one of his brethren, who practised nouelties; and entertained the other (named Absolon) honorably, because he was of a peaceful spirit. Then taking order for publike affaires, hee besieged the cittie of Ptolomais round about. The cittizens seeing all hope of succour voyde from Syria, in regard of the ciuile warre, which made mighty hauocke there; called from Cyprus Ptolomie Lathurus, expulsed by his mother Cleopatra. He coming to them with 3000 men, Alexander retired his army into his countrey, and dispatched a messenger secretly into Egypt, desiring ayde of Cleopatra against her son Lathurus. Publikely he capitulated aliance with Lathurus, promising him 24 tuns of gold, if, expelling the tyrant Zoilus, who vsurped Doris and Cæsarea, he would render those Seigneuries to the Iewes.

Alexander killed his brother.

But Ptolomie being aduertised of Alexanders secret machinations, breaking all alliances, inuaded Iudea with his Army, where Alexander mette him with his forces well appointed, and after a rude encounter, Alexander was put to flight, and lost 30000. of his men. Lathurus not a litle glorying in this victory, made mightie waste in Iudea, sacking & spoyling all places where he came, killing both women and children in euery village; and after he had sliced them in peeces, he caused their limbes to be boyled and eaten by his souldiers, to make them the more terrible to the Iews. Very soone after, Cleopatra chased this Tyrant out of Iudea, as doubting lest if he should grow any greater, thē he would further insult vpon Egypt. Alexander went to visite her at the siege which she maintained before Ptolomais*, where he gaue her great gifts: and after he had bin royally welcomed by her, and combined alliance with her, he tooke his way homeward againe.

The great cruelties of Lathurus against the vanquished Iewes in Iudea.

Much about this time, while Lathurus returned to Cyprus, and Cleopatra into Egypt, Alexander tooke Gadera, Amathunta and Anthedon, and hauing held a long siege before Gaza, with losse of a great number of his men: finally, by the treason of Lysimachus, he entred it, & slaying the Citizens most inhumanely, he raced it to the ground. Nor would he pardon 500. of the principall persons, who labored to yield the city to him: but drew them from foorth the Temple of Apollo (whereunto they had fled for freedom) to put them to death. But these iocund prosperities were ouertaken with a domesticall sedition: for, in the Feast of Tabernacles, hee was iniuried by the people, as vnworthy of the Priesthoode, because hee was borne of a slaue: And hardely it happened, that (in his sacrificing) he was not slayne

The barbarous butcheries of Alexander the High priest.

Alexander hardly escaped killing, & bloodily reuenged it on the people.

by the multitude then about him, who smote him with the boughes and branches, which the Iewes vsed to carry at that Feast. Not a little enraged at this wrong, he called his souldiers together, and entring vpon the vnarmed people, slew about sixe thousand of them: calling diuers strangers from Persia and Cilicia, to serue as a Guard about his body. Afterward, marching forth with his Army, he vanquished the Moabites and Galaadites, compelling them to pay him tribute.

The Moabites & Galaadites conquered.

Shortly after, to his great misfortune, hee encountred with Oboda, King of the Arabians, fell into his ambushes, and his Army being hewen in pieces, he escaped with much difficulty. Vpon this bad successe, the Pharisies (enraged with hatred against him) tooke occasion to raise the most part of the Iewish people likewise in mislike of him, with whom he warred (very hardly) sixe whole yeares. For the Iewes that were his aduersaries, drew Demetrius, the Sonne of Gryphus, to oppose his forces with such troopes as hee had called from Damas, where hee reigned: against whom Alexander fought to his great losse, for all his strange Soldiors lay slaine in the field, & he had no means to saue himselfe, but by flight. Yet, notwithstanding his instant calamity, some of the Iewes were hartened to take his part, in turning requitall vpon Demetrius: and beeing assisted with some sixe thousand men, he made a smal recouery of his former losse.

The Iewes entred into ciuill warre gainst Alexander.

Alexander findeth helpe in his heauy extremity.

Now, albeit vpon this victory, Demetrius (perceiuing the reuolt of the Iewes) retired his hoast home into his kingdome: yet notwithstanding, the most part of the Iewes (who were coniured against Alexander) continued in Armes still, whose power Alexander brake by little and little, aswell through industry, as by vertue. And after he had sped well in some skirmishes, hee shutte vp his very mightiest enemies, in the Fort belonging to the Towne of Bethom, which he enforced with great difficulty, & vsed extreme cruelty vpon his captiues. For he tooke eight hundred of the principal Iewes, causing them all to be crucified, while he sate banquetting at a Table with his Concubines, and in the presence of al his inuited guests, hauing formerly commaunded their wiues and children to be miserably murdred. The rest (affrighted by this cruell example) fled out of Ierusalem in the night time, being about eight thousand of his enemies.

The most part of the Iewes in Armes still against Alexander.

Eight hūdred cheefe Iewes crucified by Alexander, while he banqueted with his Concubines.

By this meanes, that dreadfull ciuill warre was appeased, which had continued more then sixe yeares; and wherein, aboue fifty thousand Iewes were slaine. After these domesticke troubles, by continuall courses hee reuenged himselfe on strange aduersaries, who had giuen succour and retreate to the seditious Iewes, winning from them many Townes and Cities. Returning home againe, through his intemperance, hee fell into a Feauer quartane, which held him for the space of three yeares. And yet, hating to abstaine (all this while) from trauaile and war, dyed in besiedging a Castle on the Mount of the Gergesenians, in the nine and fortieth yeare of his age; of his reigne and Priesthood, the seuen and twenty. Before his death, he left his kingdomes gouernment to his wife Alexandra, and gaue her charge to pacifie the Pharisies, whom he and his Father had offended, vnto their great detriment.

Sixe yeares ciuill war cost the liues of more then fifty thousand Iewes.

Alexander died in war, besiedging a Castle.

He left two Sons: Hyrcanus & Aristobulus.

Of whom we shall haue leysure to speak heereafter; because first of all, we are to say some-what concerning Alexandra, the wife of Alexander Iamnes.

Alexandra, wife to Alexander Iamnes.

After shee had instituted in the High-Priesthood her eldest sonne Hyrcanus, who desired nothing more, then to leade a priuate life: she succeeded in the kingdome after her husband Alexander, being especially aided by the power of the Pharisies, to whom she gaue authority, to reuocate and erect their ancient traditions, which Hyrcanus (her father in law) had abolished, & granted to them many other fauours beside. So that the Pharisies administred the whole Regiment of the Kingdome at their owne pleasure; onely the bare name of Queene remained to Alexandra. Finally, as they vndertooke the boldnesse, to execute (vnder colour of iustice) the cheefest Councellors to the deceassed King Alexander, whō they suspected to haue incited him against the Pharisies Sect: so they proceeded on in many inhumanities. The friends of Alexander going to Rome with his sonne Aristobulus, obtained (by fauor of the Cōurt) to Hyrcanus, eldest sonne to Alexander created high-Priest.

Tygranes king of Parthia vsurpeth ouer Syria.

At this time, Tygranes King of the Parthians, made seizure on the kingdome of Syria; because the Syrian Kings had consumed all their strength and power by domesticke warres. And being entred also into Iudea, planted his Campe before the Citty of Ptolomais: whereof (neuertheless) Queen Alexandra bought the peace by liberall bounty of gifts. After the taking of Ptolomais, Tygranes returning with his Army to his Countrey: heard newes concerning the victory of Lucullus, and the flight of Mithridates.

Aristobulus a great enemy to the Sect of the Pharisies.

Within a while after, Alexandra being fallen into an extreme sickneſſe, her Son Aristobulus, taking in ill part the dominion of the Pharisies: fled to the friends of his Father, who had the guarding of the castles, by whose assistance, he got possession of the principall Cities in Iudea. In this feare of the Pharisies, and no great assurance of Aristobulus, who (neuertheless) approched neere with his Army; Alexandra was called out of this life, in the ninth yeare of her Reigne, and the Lxxv. of her age, which brought peace to the Land of Iudea. But because she had encreased the power of the Pharisies; it was the reason of many troubles which followed.

The death of Alexandra.

The sonnes of Alexander Iamnes, and of Alexandra, were (as hath bene said)

Hyrcanus the second.

Aristobulus the second.

War between the two Brethren, Aristobulus conquereth both kingdom and Priesthood.

Hyrcanus the second, naturally peacefull, and a louer of quietneſſe, was enstalled by his Mother Alexandra Soueraigne Sacrificer, in the place of his deceassed Father. And moreouer, after the death of his Mother, by hereditary right he obtayned the kingdome. But being vanquished by his Brother Aristobulus in battel, he was glad to saue himselfe in the Fortresse of the Temple; commanded there to leade a priuate life, the kingdome and High-Priesthood beeing quitted to his Brother. For some time he endured these conditions, but beeing afterward moued by some accusations, which Antipater the Idumean (father to Herod) put into his head, as also the frauds and fetches of his brother Aristobulus; hee was induced to flye thence into Arabia, to king Aretas, whom Antipater had won by liberall promises, to attempt the restitution of Hyrcanus to the kingdome of Iudea.

Hyrcanus his flight into Arabia.

Aretas inuadeth Iudea to restore Hyrcanus.

Aretas inuading Iudea with a potent Army, and hauing Aristobulus at the encounter; ouercame him, and taking the Citty of Ierusalem, held him so long besiedged in the Temple, vntill by the command of Scaurus, Lieutenant to Pompey, he was forced to retire with his Army into Arabia, and so the enterprize for Hyrcanus proued to none effect. After that Pompey had vanquished Tygranes, & was come into Syria, the two brethren, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, accused each other before him, touching their right to the Kingdom and High-Priesthood. But Pompey, more enclining to the part of Hyrcanus, by the prouidence and seruices of Antipater; released Aristobulus vnder certaine conditions. Neuertheleſſe, Aristobulus meaning nothing but meere mockery to all commands, and trusting to the munitions in the City of Ierusalem: Pompey (in reuenge) entred it violently, and won the Temple so strongly defenced, where were slaine of the Iewes, about the number of two and twenty thousand, and the City (with the most part of Iudea) rendred tributary to the Romaines. Which tribute they payed for a certaine time, as Iosephus confesseth, amounting to the sum of 10000. Talents, which is 60. Tuns of gold. Pompey hauing walked in the Temple, and entred into the holiest part of all, called Sanctum Sanctorum: at his departing, restored Hyrcanus to the Soueraigne Priesthood, but not the kingdome. Also, he led along with him to Rome, Aristobulus as prisoner, with his two sonnes. Alexander (who neuertheles escaped by the way) and Antigonus, and his two daughters likewise.

The two brethren pleade their cause before Pompey.

Thus Hyrcanus, being possessed of the soueraigne Priesthood, about foure yeares after the death of his Mother Alexandra, succored Scaurus (left in Iudea with two legions) when he besiedged Petra, a City of Arabia. Afterward, he fel into the fauor of other Romain Lieutenants, sent into Iudea only by the perswasion and friendship of Antipater; as with Gabinius, Crassus, Cassius and Iulius Cæsar himselfe, to whō he sent aid, vnder the conduct of Antipater, when he was much hindred in the war of Egipt. And because Antipater had caried himself valiantly, Cæsar confirmd the high-Priesthood to Hyrcanus: & appointed Antipater to be be Tutor, Curator, or (as we vse now adayes to speake) Protector of all Iudea. At the same time also, Cæsar permitted to Hyrcanus, to re-establish the fortifications of the Citty of Ierusalem, which had beene beaten downe by Pompey.

Antipater poisoned by Malachus a Iew.

After that Iulius Cæsar was slaine by the conspirators, a powerfull Iew, named Malachus, being offended at the encreasing greatnesse of Antipater the Idumean, and that the whole administration of affaires should be in his hand; surprized his life by poisons. But thereupon, Iudea, beeing destitute of so wise and valiant a Gouernour, fell to very miserable condition. For Malachus, tempesting his thoughts with mounting hopes, to become sole maister and commander; was slaine euen in the entrance to his enterprises, by Herode sonne to Antipater, to whom (though he was as yet very yong) his father had giuen the charge of Galilee. On the other side, the brother of Malachus, desirous to reuenge the death of his brother, thecued in the manner of an enemy. Also, Antigonus the captiued son to Aristobulus, escaping from the prisons of Rome: leuying men of arms, made him selfe maister of a great part of Iudea.

Malachus slaine by Herode Antipaters sonne.

Antigonus escaped the Roman prisons.

After that Herode had imbarred his proceedings, Antigonus vnder promise of a thousand talents, which value sixe tuns of golde, and of fiue hundred most noble women; procured Pacorus and Barzaphernes, Satrapes in the Kingdome of Persia, to enter with a maine army into Iudea, to ouerthrow Herode and his brother Phaselus, whom Anthonie (one of the three Monarches) had before made Tetrarchs of Iudea. Which beeing done, they should perforce render the kingdom of the Iewes, to the sonnes of Aristobulus. Pacorus thinking it best, that Herode should bee surprized rather by subtiltie, then by violence; sent Antigonus on before with some bands of men, to get possession of Ierusalem; and he (in the meane while) would follow with his Armie by Sea, so farre as to Ptolomais, where he had ordered, that Barzaphernes should meete him with a passable Army. Many gaue kind welcomes to Antigonus, running affectionately to him, and promising their ayde against Herode. Nettertheless, Herode and his brother found themselues the stronger in many encounters, not only within the Citty, but also without the walles.

Herode and Phaselus Tetrarches in Iudea.

Determination for the armies meeting

Finally, Antigonus distrusting his forces, called Pacorus into the Citty, vnder pretence, that (as an Arbitratour) hee should compound the difference for the Principalitie, which was betweene him and Herode, vnder conditions more tollerable: but his purpose was indeede, to surprize Herode vnprouided. Moreouer, hee laboured with his vnckle Hyrcanus and Phaselus, worming it so into their heads, to go in embassie to Barzaphernes (remaining in Galilee with his army) and to preuaile so farre with him by rich presents, that he should retreite his power into Syria. To which councell Hyrcanus the High-priest, and Phaselus (brother to Herode) yeelding, without suspect of ill; were taken by the Parthians, (euen as the matter was in monopolizing) contrary to the right of Nations, and deliuered as captiues to Antigonus.

Antigonus practiseth by cunning to compas that which he aimed at.

Hyrcanus and Phaselus taken prisoners

Herode being formerly aduertised of these plots and compacts of Antigonus & Pacorus; went foorth of the Citty in the night season, with all his family, some friends, and 800. women, rich and excellent in beautie, and left the persons and their goods in custody of Massada, a well defenced Citty of Idumea: which being done, he went thorow Egypt to Rome, euen in the worst time of all the world.

Herode escapeth, and goeth secretly to Rome.

Phaselus, brother to Herode, doubting the cruelty of Antigonus, because he was without armes, and bound; ranne his head (with great violence) diuers times against the wall, and by that meanes slew himselfe.

Phaselus desperately kills himselfe.

Antigonus, not contented with the dispoyling Hyrcanus of the High-priesthoode, caused him beside to become deformed, by cutting off his eares, fearing lest he should afterward attain to the Priesthood againe. For it was not lawfull, that any gelded man, or defectiue in any limbe or member of body, should administer in sacrificing. Moreouer, distrusting that he had not sufficiently enough prouided for his owne security; hee deliuered Hyrcanus captiue to the Parthians, to carry him out of Iudea, as farre as possibly they could.

men: which Antigonus formerly had promised to them; pilled and spoyled the citty and the pallace royall. And yet not satisfied with this booty, robbed many places about Ierusalem, without leauing any thing behinde them. And after they had ordained Antigonus King of Ierusalem: they withdrew their armed troups home into their owne countrey, leading Hyrcanus (the soueraigne Sacrificer) along with them captiue.

Hyrcanus deliuered by K. Phraates, and sent into Babylon.

It was not long after, that Phraates king of the Parthians, beeing informed of the nobilitie whereof he was descended; did set him at libertie, and sent him into Babylon, to be President ouer the Iewes inhabiting there, where, for about fiue yeares he was in great honor. But hauing heard, that not onely Herode obtained the kingdome of Iudea, by Augustus Cæsar; but also, that he was conioined to him in affinitie, because hee had taken in marriage his Niece Mariana, the daughter of Alexander: he thought on returning him backe againe, promising him mountaines and meruailes, for the goodwill of Herode.

Herode worketh with the King of Parthia, for the return of Hyrcanus into Iudea.

About this time it fortuned, that Herode, desirous to beget vnto him the courage of the Iewes, whom hee knew to beare great affection to Hyrcanus: repealed him backe by Letters and Ambassadors, and foorthwith sent great Presents to the king of the Parthians, to pay the ransome for his captiuity. Whereupon, Hyrcanus thinking there would not be any further question of deferring; contrary to the councell of al the Iews which were in Babylon (who entreated him earnestly to stay there, as fearing that which followed after) returned into Iudea.

Hyrcanus honourably entertained by Herode.

Herode wellcomed him very magnificently, and (for some time) vsed him honourably; euen to the appealing of his father, and often conferring with him on the very principall affaires. Notwithstanding, he would not surrender to him the principality of the high-Priesthood, for the defect of his eares: but, instead of Antigonus (slaine before) substituted a certaine man, named Ananelus, come from Babylon, to enioy the Priesthood. Soone after, he gaue manifest signes of his deadly hatred, against all the posterity of the Asmoneans. As, when (by a close ambush) he slew Aristobulus, nephew to Hyrcanus, and his most dearely affected wife Mariana, Niece also to the said Hyrcanus.

The cruel and bloody murdering of the Asmoneans by Herode.

Finally, after the ouerthrow of Marke Antony, one of the 3 chief rulers, to whom Herode had beene companion, and sent him succors diuers times in war; as some sad thoughts ouertooke him, for feare of Augustus being Conquerours and of his aduersaries thorow the country of Iudea, but especially fearing the people (who loued him not) should mutiny by this occasion, & transferre the kingdom of their Ancestors to Hyrcanus (who only remained of the roiall family of the Asmoneans) began to lay snares and close contriuings against the life of the miserable old man. For, he imposed a false crime vpon him; that hee would haue vsurped the Kingdome: and to make it probable, he composed counterfeited Letters; whereupon he being condemned by sentence of the great Consistory, was executed, albeit he was aboue 80. yeares olde. All his life time was troublesome vnto him, being agitated with infinit accidents of fortune, yet he (naturally) affecting quietnes, and a meane estate. Only heerein reprehensible, that he was too facile, in listening to such as prouoked him on to the attempting of fond nouelties.

Herod caused Hyrcanus to be most wrōgfully put to death.

Aristobulus the second.

Aristobulus had a gallant, youthfull and hote disposed nature.

BRother to the aboue named Hyrcanus the second, and sonne of Alexander: As young a man as he was, and of hote and liuely spirit, yet notwithstanding, for nine yeares space, he left to his Mother the administration of the Kingdome, which Alexander (dying) gaue to hir; contenting himselfe with a priuate life. But at the length, his mother being detayned by a long sickenesse, and very dangerous, and he (not a little offended) that all matters were guided according to the fancie of the Pharises; by stealth made his recourse into the citty, and conferred with the friends to his deceassed father, who had the keeping of the Castles. Being ayded by them in bountifull maner, he gathered an army; by whose assistance, hee possessed himselfe of diuers neighboring places about Ierusalem.

His strengthning himselfe by his fathers friends.

His mother Alexandra dying, vpon this his preparatiue for warre; Hyrcanus, who all the life time of his mother as Queene, had held the High-priest-hood: being being the eldest son, made himselfe King by right of inheritance. And to defend his right by Armes, hee went to affront his brother neare to Iericho, with an army ordred in good equipage. But being left of his people, who reuolted to Aristobulus, vnder hope and perswasion of better recompence; he had no other helpe, but to shield himselfe in the munition of the Temple, where he was for some time besieged by his brother, and finally deliuered, vpon condition, that he should leaue the Kingdome and High-priesthoode to his brother, and leade a priuate life by himselfe.

Hyrcanus is ouercome by Aristobulus in battell.

Some while after, hee conueyed himselfe couertly into Arabia, by the perswasion of Antipater; as hoping to regaine the Kingdome from his brother, by the meanes of king Aretas. Aristobulus knowing the comming of Aretas, King of the Arabians, with Hyrcanus and Antipater, went foorth to meete them: and beeing vanquished in a day of warre triall, hardly fled backe againe to Ierusalem, where hee was (for a time) besieged by the enemies, that closely followed his footing, vntill such time, as hauing promised 300. talents to Scaurus, Lieutenant to Pompey, he preuailed thereby so well; that Scaurus sending in the name of the Roman people to Aretas, commanded him to auoyd out of Iudea, except hee would be enemy to the Romans. By this meanes the siege was raised; and Aristobulus, desirous to be reuenged, assembled men, and made warre vpon the Arrabes, of whom he slew sixe thousand in one fight.

Seaurus raiseth the siege which was laid to Ierusalem.

While these things were thus in working, Pompey, hauing pacified the East parts, came to Damas, where Aristobulus sent him a magnificent Present, accusing his brother Hyrcanus very strongly to be a perturber of the common peace. Pompey hereupon appointed, that at the Spring time, both the brethren should be personally present, before him at Damas. Where Pompey vnderstanding the difference betweene them, was more inclined to the case of Hyrcanus; as well for the equitie of his cause, as for his loue vnto Antipater. Neuertheless, he suffered Aristobulus to depart vnder conditions, which he cared not to keep, but (by machinations) made a mockerie at the matters commanded him; and (indeed) did nothing at all. Heereat Pompey beeing highly offended, entred into Iudea, with the Army, which he had brought against the Arabian * Nabathæans. And because Aristobulus had againe mocked Gabenius, one of the Lieutenants to Pompey, not furnishing him (according to promise) concerning the deliuering of certaine summes of money: Pompey beeing much incensed by the disloyalty of Aristobulus, brought his Army and Engins before Ierusalem, and because the Iews would not yeeld themselues, he tooke the Cittie by force, ayded by the councell of Hyrcanus, on the fasting day of the third month before Pentecost; and in the yeare when Marcus Tullius Cicero confounded the Conspiracie of Cataline in Rome.

Ierusalem surprised by Pompey and his power.

In the surprizall of the Citty two and twenty thousand Iewes were slaine by the Souldiers, and Pompey (with his friends) entred into the place called Sanctum Sanctorum, and intruded to see such things as were not lawfull, but onely for the Soueraign Sacrificer. And vndetstanding that there were great summes of Golde and gold money in the Treasury, and twelue tuns of siluer coyne; without taking anie thing, he departed thence, and commanded the place to be purified againe. Hee restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, and caused the authors of the warre to be beheaded, who had bene motiues to the rebellion of Aristobulus. Afterward, he demolished the walles of Ierusalem, and made all Iudea tributarie to the Romaine people. Also he adiudged to the Empire of Rome, the Citties and Townes of the Asmoneans, which were take before from the Kings of Syria: restoring also such to libertie, as in times past had liued in freedome. By this meanes hee locked vp the nation of the Iews within narrow limits, that before had extended their dominion very farre.

The Sanctuarie polluted and profaned by the Romanines.

The Cities and Townes of the Asmoneans adiudged to the empire of the Romane people.

At his departure, hee left two legions in Iudea, vnder the conduction of Scaurus, taking Aristobulus captiue, with Alexander and Antigonus his two sonnes, to leade them home in triumph: but Alexander (hauing deceiued his keepers) escaped by the way. Here was the beginning of the seruitude of the Iewish nation, who were thus enthralled to the power of the Romaines. The discord of two brethren gaue the first occasion of this calamitie:

Iudea brought into slauery by the discord of 2. brethren.

three-

three score yeares before the natiuitie of Christ; foure yeares before that Aristobulus (his Mother dead, and his Brother Hyrcanus deiected from the seate Royall) had taken the Kingdome of Iudea. Saint Ierome writeth, that Iakin, father to the euer-blessed Virgin Marie, was borne the same yeare that Ierusalem was surprized.

The iust iugement of heauen inflicted vpon Pompey

I thought it fit also, to insert heere the sad issue and successe of Pompey, considering, that it seemed to be done diuinely, that hee should be murdered face to face the place which hee had profaned, aswell by effusion of bloud, as by foolish audaciousnesse. For, foureteene yeares after the taking of Ierusalem, being vanquished by Cæsar in the battaile of Pharsalia, and thinking to saue himselfe by flying to the Sonne of Ptolomie the Fleutster, whom he had recommended to the Romaine Senate, when he was chased and banished out of his Kingdome neare to * Pelusium, coming foorth of a small Barke, and aged about three score yeares; he was slaine by the command of King Ptolomy, in the presence of his wife Cornelia. And, as it is thought, Virgill wrote these verses on his death:

A towne on the edge of Egypt.

The death of Pompey.

A bodie without head; a head lying Farre from the shoulders.

Pelusium is distant from Ierusalem, a litle more then thirtie Germaine miles, but iust confronting it, according to the calculation of Ptolomie. Seauen yeares after the surprizing of Ierusalem, Aristobulus, being escaped from imprisonment at Rome; came into Iudea with his other Sonne Antigonus, where againe he fortified the Fort of Alexandrion, which Gabinius had destroyed. Many Iewes (affecting nouelties) ranne to him, so that being accompanied with eight thousand chosen men; hee dared to encounter with the Romaines, which Gabinius (then Proconsull for Syria) conducted, who, but a litle before, constrained Alexander, the other sonne of Aristobulus (thinking to possesse himselfe of the kingdome) to deliuer him vp those Fortresses, and to craue peace. But Aristobulus, sustaining the worst in a sharpe fight, retired with two bands of men, into the most strong towne of Macheron, scituated on the Lake Asphaltida, somewhat a little lower then the place where Iordaine entreth into it. In which towne Saint Iohn Baptist, beeing a long while imprisoned, was finally beheaded. In two dayes the Romaines conquered the towne perforce, and Aristobulus taken, was led to Gabinius, wounded as he was; and so the second time sent bound to Rome, with his two children.

Ptolomie the Fleutster restored to his Kingdome by Gabinius.

Matters thus pacified in Iudea, Gabinius, attended by his Gendarmery, reseated Ptolomie the Fleutster in his Kingdome, he being expulsed thence by them of Alexandria; in which exploite he was assisted by Hyrcanus the soueraigne Sacrificer, and Antipater the Idumean. At his returne, he found all in Iudea and Syria full of troubles and tempests, for Alexander rauaged againe throughout Iudea: but Gabinius ouercame him in a day of battell (where he had worke enough to doe) and chased him quite out of Iudea; hauing massacred ten thousand Iewes.

Ioſin Ant. Iud. lib. 9. c. 15

Afterwards hee continued two yeares in the Prouince, gouerning all matters quietly, according to the testimony of Iosephus. And hauing repayred many Townes, which had beene much spoyled in the precedent warre; he left the Army in the power of Marcus Crassus, a verie greedy and couetous man, who attempting warre against the Parthians, arriued there in Syria, in the yeare after his second Consulship, one and fiftie yeares before the birth of Christ.

Marc. Crassus receiueth charge of the Armie.

This man hauing intelligence, that there was a great masse of money locked vp in the Temple of the Iewes, went to Ierusalem, and was admitted to the most secret place of the Temple; from whence (contrary to his former faithfull promise) he carryed away more then ten thousand talents, that is to say, three score tunnes of golde; beside a beame of gold, which weighed three hundred Minaes, or (as Iosephus expoundeth it) seuen hundred and fifty Romaine pounds weight, amounting to fiue Quintalles and more then an halfe of our weight. Eleazar, Guardian of the Temple, deliuered that beame to Crassus very willingly, becausse he had promised and protested by oathe, that hee would not touch any treasure of the Temple, no more then Pompey had done tenne yeares before.

Pitholaus a Iew raiseth tumults on the behalfe of Aristobulus.

In the meane while, one Pitholaus, a very powerfull Iew, and friend to Aristobulus the captiue; after his second surprizall, beganne to raise tumults in Iudea, and weakened the side of Hyrcanus and Antipater. But after the ouerthrow of the Romaines by the Parthians, when Cassius, Questor to Crassus, re-assembled the rest of the Romaine Armie, who had fled away, and brought them backe into Syria, and as he ransacked the Cities of Iudea for want of mony: he was perswaded by Antipater and Hyrcanus the High-priest, to make triall of his forces against Pitholaus, whom he vanquished in the field of battell, and brought him captiue with the Romaine army into Syria, so that thereon ensued peace in Iudea for some time.

Cassius takes Pitholaus prisoner.

Fiue yeares after, the warre was kindled betweene Cæsar and Pompey; and Cæsar comming to Rome (forsaken of Pompey) tooke Aristobulus out of prison, and sent him into the East with two Legions, to subdue Syria & Iudea. But being poisoned by the way, by them that tooke part with Pompey: hee remayned long time in the Ile of Malta vnburied, vntill Marke Anthony, one of the three Monarchs, sent his body into Iudea, and commanded that he should be interred in the Sepulchre of Kings.

Aristobulus poysoned and buried in the Sepulchre of kings.

Such was the end of Aristobulus, after many mutations of fortune, hauing been twise taken and sent to Rome, where hee was almost foureteene yeares prisoner. He was of a factious and seditious spirit, for, being moued with ambition, he quarrelled for the kingdome of Iudea with his brother Hyrcanus: vntill such time as hee caused his death, and brought his Countrey into miserable seruitude, which proued the ruine of all his nation.

The seditious spirit of Aristobulus.

He had two sons, and as many daughters; Hyrcanus the second his first sonne, soueraigne Sacrificer, who had a daughter named Alexandra, married to his cosin Alexander: a woman wise, but very vehement, whom Herode afterward put to death. Aristobulus the second had Alexander, Antigonus the second, Alexandra. First married to Philippion, sonne to Ptolomy, king of Chalcis, which is a Region on the coast of Libanus. Afterward, Ptolomie (inflamed with the loue of his daughter in lawe) slew his sonne Phillippion, and tooke her in marriage. And after succoured and defended his brother Antigonus, against Herode and the Romaines.

Alexander the second.

Surprized with his father Aristobulus by Pompey; before he arriued at Rome, deceiued his guardes, and escaped. Fiue yeares after, assisted by an Armie, hee inuaded Iudea, expulsed his vncle Hyrcanus from Ierusalem, repayred the destroyed munitions, and planted there a Garrison. But Gabinius, Proconsull of Syria, being called thereto by Hyrcanus and Antipater, hauing fought with him in battell; held him a long time besieged in the Citty of Alexandrion, vntill such time as he was constrained to yeeld himselfe, and put downe the chiefest fortifications. Being pacified by the entreaties of Alexanders mother (who always condemned the foolish enterprises of her sonne against the Romaines) shee obtayned pardon for Alexander. Neuertheless, Gabinius sent him to Rome with his father Aristobulus, and Antigonus his brother captiues: yet writing to the Senate, that it might stand with their good liking, to send backe the children of Aristobulus to their mother, because he had made such a promise in name of the Senate; in regarde that that valiant woman, had euermore take good part with the Romaines.

The exploits of Gabinius Syria.

The kindnes of Gabinius for the sonnes of Aristobulus

The Senate was willing heerein to gratifie Gabinius, but Alexander, being returned into Iudea; returned bad recompence to Gabinius, and the Senate, for the great grace which they had granted him. For, seeing Gabinius to be hindred in Egypt, by much trouble (as hath already beene said) being fauored with thirty thousand men: againe he stroue to subiugate Iudea, and cruelly murdered all the Romaine Souldiers, that he could finde in the garrisons of the surprized Cities. For which cruelty, hee payed the iust punishment about fiue yeares after.

The ill requitall of Alexander to Gabinius and the Romaine Senate.

Gabinius being returned into Iudea, laboured first to appease these matters with Antipater: but no way preuayling, he vnited the forces of the Romaine Armie; giuing uing a violent and dangerous encounter to Alexander, wherein ten thousand Iewes lost their liues, and the rest driuen all in route. Alexander striuing to saue himselfe, and seeing his attempts so often times frustrated, and his forces broken; lay close hidden for a while, vntill he vnderstoode, that ciuile warre was kindled betweene Pompey and Cæsar, and his father Aristobulus (deliuered out of prison) came thither with two legions. Then he bestirred himselfe to leuy Souldiers also; but was taken in Syria, euen vpon the very beginning of his enterprise, and led to Antioche to Scipio. Before him the Romanes accused him of cruelty, which he had vsed against the Romaine Souldiers in the Garrisons: whereuppon, by Commaund receiued from Pompey, hee was beheaded before Scipio, who then helde Syria, some few moneths after the death of his father Aristobulus; forty six yeares before the Natiuity of Christ; and the selfe same yeare as Pompey was slaine in Egypt, as hath bin sayd.

Treacherie and disloyalty lies in wait for fit opportunity.

Aristobulus the third,
And
Mariana, whom Herod after espoused

But we shall speake hereafter of Alexanders children, because I am desirous first to relate somwhat, concerning the actions & fortuns of his brother Antigonus.

Antigonus, the last sonne to Aristobulus the 2. was twice taken with his father, and sent to Rome: once by Pompey, and another time by Gabinius. But then (by the fauour of the Senate) he was returned into Iudea with his brother Alexander; & spent some time with his Mother in the City of Ascalon. Then hee went to Ptolomy, (Lord of Chalcis) his kinseman, who refused to assist the fool-hardy and vnhappy attempts of his brother Alexander, for feare of the Romanes. But after the death of his father and brother, when as Iulius Cæsar had finished the war of Alexandria, & was come into Spaine: he presented himselfe before him in al humility, and made a great complaint, aswell of the pittifull ouerthrow of his father Aristobulus, as also of his brother ther Alexander, both being cruelly slaine by the partakers with Pompey.

Antigonus was twise sent prisoner to Rome.

Antigonus complayneth to Iulius Cæsar against the gouernement of Antipater.

He further proceeded, and taxed Antipater with vniust gouerning, who beeing but of a meane descent, and a stranger: had (neuertheless) vsurped the kingdome of the Iewes, and had left nothing to Hyrcanus, but the silly name of Soueraigne Sacrificer, doing all at his owne pleasure, to establish the power of his children, and pretending to take away the principalitie from the Iewish: the people (of the royall family of the Asmoneans) thereby to transferre it to his Sonnes. He said, that himselfe was the onely man left, to whom the lawfull succession of the kingdome appertained; who notwithstanding, being spoiled of his hereditarie dignity, was forced to wander as a vagabond, a banished man and left to all distresse. Concluding finally with humble intercessions, hee requested, that the administration of the Iewish principality might be restored to him, and Antipater dismissed.

The allegations inferred against Antipater by Antigonus.

Whereunto Antipater answering, began to accuse Aristobulus and his sonnes before Cæsar, because (contrary to all right and equity) he had violently rent the kingdome from Hyrcanus his eldest brother, and alwayes beene disloyall and an enemy to the Romaines: wherein, his sons had well followed his example, filling Iudea and Syria with tumults and blood: that being the maine reason, why Aristobulus was so long detained prisoner, and Alexander had his head smitten from his shoulders, for the cruelties he vsed to the Romaines. Afterward, hee procured faithfull witnesses, how modestly he had carried himselfe in gouerning, and what fauors he had euer extended to the Romane Captaines. Cæsar beeing thereto mooued by these iust causes, licenced Antigonus to depart, and confirmed the High-priesthoode to Hyrcanus; and ennobling Antipater with new titles of Dignity, he constituted him Tutor of all Iudea.

Antipater accuseth Aristobulus and his sons before Cæsar.

Antigonus dismissed from Cæsar without any successe.

Antigonus much displeased with this refusall, returned to his kinseman the king of Chalcis, where he contayned himselfe almost foure yeares space, vntill Iulius Cæsar was murdered by the Conspiratours. For then, when all the world was vp in mutinie, and that Cassius (who was forraging in Syria, impeaching the warre against Marke Anthony) had retired the Romaine Armies out of Syria: Antigonus, assisted by his kinsman Ptolomy, and other neighbouring kings, inuaded Iudea with his Army againe; where Herode (his father Antipater being dead) being very powerfull and ſtrong, repelled and gaue him ſharpe repulſe, after the fighting of a battell with him.

An office for gouerning the fourth part of the Realme.

Some yeares after, when Anthony one of the three Monarchs, had encreaſed the power of Herode, hauing ordayned him (with his brother Phaſelus) Tetrarches of all Iudea: Antigonus enraged with anger, thought it not tollerable, that the kingdome of Iudea ſhould bee deuolued vnto ſtrangers in this manner. Wherefore, to leuy a new Armie, hee had found out a yong man of a fiery temper, named Lyſanias, his kinſman and hoſte; into whoſe hand the kingdome of Chalcis was fallen, by the death of his father Ptolomy, vnto whom (as hath afore beene ſayd) Alexandra, the Siſter of Antigonus, was giuen in marriage. As they were working vpon theſe concluſions, another occaſion (very apt and opportune) offered it ſelfe, becauſe (as then) the Parthians inſulted ouer the Prouince of Syria, vnder the conduct of Pacorus and Barzaphernes. Lyſanias hauing ſent great preſents to them, and a thouſand Talents promiſed by Antigonus, as alſo fiue hundred women, excelling in nobility and beauty; they were heereby incited, to reſeate Antigonus in poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdome.

New deuiſes and machinations of Antigonus to compaſſe his intent.

What cannot gold and women procure?

Before, in the life of Hyrcanus, we haue expreſſed the ſtratagem of the barbarous people, to ſurprize Hyrcanus and Phaſelus (being Ambaſſadours) captiues, and how wickedly Antigonus did cut off his vnckles eares, ſending him alſo captiue into Parthia, to the end, that hee might the more ſafely enioy the High-prieſthood and the Kingdome. But this authoritie, gotten by ſuch wicked cunning and practiſes, could not keepe firme, or laſt any long while. For ſoone after, Herode going to Rome, declared there to Marke Anthony, his flight and calamitie, complaining on the outrages and diſloyaltie of Antigonus. In briefe, hee ſped ſo well in his purpoſe, that inſtead of Tetrarch, he was proclaimed King of all Iudea, by conſent of Auguſtus, Anthony and the Senate, and Antigonus adiudged enemy to the people of Rome. And although ſome Romane Captaines, being ſent with Legions into Syria, had charge to expulſe Antigonus, and put Herod in poſſeſſion of the Iewiſh kingdome: yet notwithſtanding, by bribes and gifts, Antigonus kept them off from coming into Iudea.

Authoritie gotten by vniuſt meanes muſt needes inioy the leſſe continuance.

Antigonus bribes the Romaine Captaines.

At length, Anthony vndertaking warre againſt the Parthians, Soſius was ſent into Iudea with a potent Army, to replant Herode; wherefore he and Herode, their forces being ioyned together, beſieged ſome few moneths the Cittie of Ieruſalem. Finally, they tooke it by force, the ſeuenth yeare after the death of Caſar, or of the Empire of Octauius Auguſtus, and the ſelfe ſame day that Pompey (ſeauen yeares before) had taken it.

Soſius ſent with an armie to reſeate Herode as King of Iudea.

At that time, as the Souldiers (indifferently on either ſide) ſlew and murdered one another, without ſparing eyther age or ſexe: Antigonus, not able to endure the ſight of ſuch a ſlaughter among the Cittizens, came willingly forth of the munitions of the Temple, and fell before the feete of Soſius the Romane Captaine, crauing pardon for his offences, and deſiring (aboue all elſe) that hee would remit the common people, who were no warriours, and to ſpare the Temple. But the prowd Conquerour, making a mockerie of the ſuppliant King, called him oftentimes (in deriſion) Antigonas, and after ſent him captiue into Syria to Anthony, who was returned from the warre of the Parthians.

Antigonus yeeldeth himſelfe to Soſius who ſent him captiue into Syria.

Herode being poſſeſſed of the whole Kingdome, was aduertiſed, that Anthony purpoſed to leade Antigonus with him in triumph to Rome. And fearing withall, that in due conſideration of his nobilitie, or in compaſſion of his miſerie, Auguſtus and the Senate would free him from impriſonment, and ſend him backe agayne into Iudea: with much ado, he obtaind of Anthony, by many reaſons alleadged, and great gifts beſtowed, that Antigonus was ſlaine.

Herode ſuſpicious of the re-aduancement of Antigonus, worketh his death

The principal argument that made Anthony yeelde thereto, beyond all other, was, that Iudea would neuer be peaceable, ſo long as Antigonus liued. Conſidering, that many Iewes were ſo diſpleaſed by being ſubiects to him; as it was not poſſible, by horrible and extreameſt torments, to force them acknowledge him the name of King. And therefore hee conceiued, that there would neuer want companions in ſeditions and mutinies, where ſuch a Commaunder as Antigonus ſhould beare rule, rule, againſt the liking of the people.

And thus Antigonus the laſt King of the Aſmoneans, was ſlaine by the Romains in Antioche, after that Herode had expulſed him, and led away his vnckle Hyrcanus hauing obtayned about fiue yeares the kingdome of Iudea, by helpe of the Parthians: twelue yeares after the death of his father Ariſtobulus, and of his brother Alexander; thirty foure yeares alſo before the Natiuitie of Ieſus Chriſt our Sauior.

Antigonus was the laſt king of the Aſmondans.

Afterward, the Principalitie of the Iewiſh people, taken from the Sacerdotall Familie of the Aſmoneans, and eſpecially, from the nation of the Iewes: fell into the hand of Herode the ſoune of Antipater the Idumean, and of his ſonnes, and ſonnes ſonnes. So that from the firſt yeare of Iudas Macchabeus, whom his Father Mattathias (dying) appoynted Duke of the warlike troupes, vntill this yeare that Herode beganne to reigne, after the taking in of Ieruſalem, and death of Antigonus, was an hundred and thirty yeares. Antigonus left not any heire maſle, but only one daughter, who afterward was wife to Antipater, the ſonne of Herode. But his brother Alexander, by Alexandra, the daughter to Hyrcanus, had theſe children.

The Sacerdotall Familie of the Aſmoneans ended.

Obſerue the computation of the yeares.

This Ariſtobulus, was but foure yeares olde, when his father Alexander was beheaded at Antioche by the Romaines. Afterward, coming to the age of 17. yeares: hee obtained at the beginning of Neroes reigne, the hie-prieſthood by this occaſiō.

Ariſtobulus attaineth to enioy the hie-prieſthood.

Herode beeing fully confirmed in the kingdome, would not eſtabliſh in the hie-prieſthood, his brother in law Hyrcanus, reuoked from his baniſhment in Babylon: as fearing to contrary the Lawe of God, that denyed imperfect or diſmembered people, to miniſter in the holy Temple, and ſuch a one was the eare-leſſe Hyrcanus; but exalted to the dignitie of Soueraigne Sacrificer, another Iew of meane condition, named Ananelus, who was lately come from Babylon. Alexandra daughter to Hyrcanus, taking it to heart, that Herode made none account of her father, nor of her ſonne Ariſtobulus, but had conferred the high-prieſthood vpon a ſtrange man; laboured by letters and gifts, to incite Cleopatra, that by the means of Marke Anthony, the High-prieſthood might be conferred vpon her ſonne Ariſtobulus.

Ananelus a Iew made Soueraigne Sacrificer.

Herode hauing intelligence heereof, & receiuing letters from Anthony, whereby he was charged to ſend him Ariſtobulus; fearing leſt Anthony (although a wicked minded man) wold be inueigled with the beautie of the youth, and iudge him, not onely worthy of the Prieſthoode, but likewiſe of ſome portion in the kingdom; made a modeſt denyall to Anthony, vnder colour, that if Ariſtobulus ſhould be ſent out of Iudea, it would be the occaſion of many mutinies to ariſe in the kingdome, as in hope to enioy a new King: Neuertheleſſe, to pacifie Alexandra and Mariana, who he ſawe trauelled ſo earneſtly on the behalfe of Ariſtobulus, and to the end, they ſhould compaſſe no more contriuings, with working new caſes to Anthony and Cleopatra: of his owne goodwill, hee depoſed Ananelus from the High-prieſthood, and inueſted therein Ariſtobulus: Notwithſtanding, being highly offended againſt his mother Alexandra, for working ſuch cloſe and vnder-hand practiſes: he gaue order, that ſhee ſhould be arreſted, and more warily attended within the Pallace, becauſe (hereafter) ſhe ſhould not attempt any thing in the like maner.

The practiſes of Alexandra to exalt her ſonne.

Herodes cunning denyall to Marke Antonay, for not ſending Ariſtobulus to him.

Shee beeing a Lady of great reſolue, ſcorned this ſuſpition and diſtruſt in the King, holding it moſt diſhonourable in him, to be ſo watchfully kept and obſerued: by a faythfull and ſecret Meſſenger, ſignified all her misfortunes to Cleopatra; who againe commaunded, that Alexandra, accompanied with her ſonne Ariſtobulus, ſhould be ſent to her in Egypt.

Alexandra kept with watch and warde.

To compaſſe her intent the more cunningly, Alexandra had cauſed two Coffins and Beeres to bee prepared, ſuch as the dead are vſed to bee carried vpon into buriall: wherein ſhee and her ſonne ſhould bee carried to the Sea ſide; and there a Shippe attended ready for them, for tranſporting them thence to Cleopatra.

The ſubtile deuice of Alexandra, to eſcape from the cuſtodie of Herode.

Alexandra imparted this deuice of her owne wit, to a certayne Courtier, named Sabbion, whome ſhee knew to bee farre out of fauour with Herode: becauſe hee ſtoode ſuſpected as one conſenting to the death of Antipater, father to Herode, who formerly had beene poyſoned; and therefore ſhee made no doubt, but Sabbion would bee the more sure and secret, in furthering of her escape from thence.

Sabbion proued false, and betrayed Alexandra to Herode.

But hee considering, that now hee had an apt occasion thrust euen into his hand, whereby to treade downe the conceiued suspition of poysoning, and make good proofe of his loyaltie to the King; declared the whole intent and purpose vnto him; and how it was to be perfourmed.

Especiall Spies and Guardes were appoynted, to take knowledge of anie appearing accident, but most of all, when the Coffins and Beeres, should be transported away, and in such artificiall order euery thing was carried: that Alexandra and her Sonne were both surprized, euen in the very bearing thence in the Beeres. Sharpe and seuere threatnings were vttered by the King, to the no small affliction of Alexandra and Aristobulus, to be so treacherously preuented in the verie height of all their hopes: yet pretending pittie and commiseration, hee promised his free and gracious pardon for this offence, prouided, that (afterward) they should not practise any such attempt againe.

No miserie more, then to finde treason where trust is faithfully reposed.

This clemencie hee then vsed, fearing lest if he should haue inflicted any other execution on them: hee might thereby runne into the displeasure of Cleopatra, who was consenting to the manner of their escape. And yet hee would gladly haue punished this feminine boldnesse in her, but (aboue all) faine he would haue Aristobulus dispatched out of the way: because hee was the High-priest, and highly affected of the people, in regard of his Royall discent, and many singuler graces in him.

Aristobulus highly pleaseth the people in the feast of Tabernacls by euerything that he did or said.

In the proiecting of these his wicked deuices, it chaunced to be the Feast of Tabernacles, when Aristobulus, beeing richly adorned in his Priestly garments, performed the office of soueraigne Sacrificer, with such extraordinarie grauitie and decencie: that both in respect of his age, stature, and beautie of body, he appeared wonderfully pleasing in euery eie, so that the people standing about him, showted out aloude with ioy, applauding euery gesture; and any thing that hee did or said, with clapping their hands, expressing the fauour and inclination of all the people to Aristobulus, and what desire they had, to enioy a King of their owne Nation, in regard that their hatred to the present estate of the Kingdome, therein plainely appeared.

Herode conspireth the death of Aristobulus.

Herode ill digesting this loue to his enemy, which he imagined would increase daily more and more; began to seeke into all contriuings, whereby he might (forthwith) compasse the death of Aristobulus. And it came to passe, that the Feast being ended, Alexandra feasted him in the citie of Iericho, as hoping to qualifie all displeasure in the King. Herod there shewed him selfe so chearefull and gracious to the women, as possibly might be, and (aboue all) to the youthfull Lord,) so that the whole day was spent in sports and delights of diuers kindes. At euening, Aristobulus walked with his company in the Kings Garden, where (after he had somewhat extraordinarily heated himselfe with running and leaping) the Guard of Herode, thereto appoynted by the King; prouoked Aristobulus, to coole his sweating by swimming in a fish-pond neare adioyning.

Outward shews are not at all times to be trusted for honest meaning.

Such was his gentle & flexible nature, and no way suspitious of anie intended treacherie, as hee was thereto soone perswaded. And as he came swimming neere to the banckes side: they threw water on him in iesting manner, holding his head diuers times vnder water, vntill at last he was quite stifled thereby, while Herode (walking by himselfe alone) seemed not to thinke on any such matter. But when one of the guard came, and informed him thereof, and in what maner it happened, without any mallice intended towardes him: one while he grieued, another while raged, threatning the guard with death, for being so ouer-bold with him. Before the Mother and Sister of Aristobulus, he presented himselfe in most wofull maner, wringing his hands, and tearing the haire from his head, as if he had truly mourned for the Princes death; preparing a most magnificent funerall for him, and whereat there wanted no cost and pompe. By this hellish fraude in Herode, was Aristobulus the third innocently murdered, aged 18. yeares; and after hee had one yeare enioyed the High-priesthood, which Herod restored Ananelus againe vnto, Hyrcanus the second, yet liuing, who remayned the onely masle of the Asmonean race, and was Mariana.

Mariana wife to King Herode, and his other wife Doris put away.

Sister to this Aristobulus, daughter to the second Alexander, the youngest sonne of the second Hyrcanus, was most excellent both for beauty and chastity. Herode espoused her, after he was declared King by the Romanes, a little before the surprizing of Ierusalem, and the death of Antigonus: hee having repudiated his wife Doris of Idumea, by whome hee had a sonne named Antipater. This diuorce was the cause, that Mariana was continually in the dislike of Cipris, mother to the King, of his sister Salome, and of some other women beside. Herselfe also (afterward) encreased this hatred, because she, standing vpon the Nobilitie of her race, being issued and descended from Kings: despised the Mother and Sister to the King, they being strangers, and deriued but from meane condition.

Reasons alledged why Mariana did not affect king Herode, nor his mother and sister

It may be, that shee grew the lesse familiar with the King, acquainting herselfe but seldome in his company; because hee had taken the Kingdome of Iudea from her father Alexander, and put to death her vnckle Antigonus, and had also (by treason) murthered her brother Aristobulus the third, a worthy innocent yoong Prince: Adding withall, that he had executed her grandfather Hyrcanus, a good olde man, imposing vppon him, that hee affected the Kingdome. It was no great matter of maruell then, if this noble and high spirited woman, disdained amiable conuersation with him, who had giuen her so many occasions of extreame affliction; considering also, that the eares of this yoong Lady were daily pestered, with shamefull iniuries and complaints, which her Mother Alexandra continually made against the house of Antipater.

Mariana molested with many complaints.

Finally, she grew to be suspected by the King, for matter of adultery (as I shall heereafter more at large relate in the life of Herod.) And Salome the Kings sister, confederated with other Ladies of the Court (abounding in hatred more and more against her) maintayned strongly the suspition; adding moreouer, an intent of impoysoning him. Wherein she taking no care to cleare herselfe, relying vpon Herodes intimate loue vnto her, and her owne innocencie: shee was accused by Herode before his friends, and slayne by the sentence of them. Shee left fiue children liuing, which shee had by Herode, three sonnes, and two daughters, of whom afterward came the two Agrippaes, to whom the Royall power in Iudea remayned, vntill the destruction of Ierusalem.

The death of Mariana.

All the other race of Herode, which he had by nine other wiues, and in great number, fayled, as shall be declared in their due places.

Herodes issue by nine wiues vtterly failed.

Almost all the whole family of the Asmoneans, beeing thus expressed, there remaineth now for me, that I should write of the posteritie of Antipater: but Alexandra yet resteth of the Asmoneans, who was daughter to the second Hyrcanus, and wife to the second Alexander. And although we haue already sayd somewhat of her, and are yet to speake of the actions of Herode: yet notwithstanding, I haue thought good to descipher heere summarily, the wofull misaduentures of this Ladie: for, amongst all other miserable women that we reade of, she seemeth to me the most vnfortunate, as well by accident, as thorow her owne defects. And that they may be the better vnderstood, I haue in order here inserted her parentage.

Alexandra remained of the race of the Asmoneans, and most vnfortunate.

Aristobulus 3. Mariana.

The kingdom and High-priesthood taken from her father.

FIrst of all, this Alexandra beeing but a young maid, saw, after the death of Alexandra her grandmother (who reigned but nine yeares after the deceasse of her husband) the hereditarie Kingdome and High-priesthood, taken perforce from her father Hyrcanus, by his brother Aristobulus, who had long time besieged him in the munition of the Temple.

Afterward, being very young, she was married to his cosin Alexander; and the Cittie of Ierusalem beeing surprized by Pompey: she saw the pitifull fortune of her father, most vnhappily performed, to the great harme of the country and her selfe, being accomplished with horrible massacres, foule prophanation of the Temple, slaughter of infinite Citizens, beside robberies of their goods. Moreouer, the destruction of the Cittie walles, insupportable exactions, with a perpetuall yoake of most seuere dominion of the Romaines: beside the captiuity and transport of her vnckle Aristobulus, her husband Alexander, and her cosin Antigonus, to be led villainously (in derision) through the Citie of Rome, to grace Pompeys triumph. No doubt but these mighty misfortunes, were causes of no meane griefe to Alexandra.

A second subiection of Alexander to the slauerie of the Romaines

Shee likewise beheld the escape of her husband Alexander by the way, who came to make new tumults in Iudea: but being ouerthrowne in many encounters, and beside despoyled of all enabling forces: she sawe him againe sent captiue to Rome by Gabinius, with his father Aristobulus, and his brother Antigonus.

His expulsion out of Iudea like a poore exile, and shamefull execution.

Againe, shee sawe him sent into Iudea, where growing as tempestuous and troublesome as before: he was agayne chased out of the Countries limits, wandering from thence as a poore vagabond and banished man. At length, she heard that (by the commaund of Pompey) he was shamefully executed at Antioche, and that (but a little before) his father Aristobulus, after a long detention of his person, being (with great difficulty) deliuered from imprisonment, was poysoned.

Hard and wofull extremities for a Ladie to suffer and endure.

Next, shee saw the Cittie of Ierusalem taken by the Parthians treacherie, and her father Hyrcanus (by fraude and deceite in Aristobulus) apprehended, his ears cut off, and led away into the enemies land. She, in this perillous surprisall of Ierusalem, got forth by night with her Mother, the wife, the sister of Herode, and many other Ladies, hauing her son with her, aged a dosen yeares, and her daughter little more then he: but both exposed to infinite iniuries, as well of Souldiers violence, as of great wrongs to their tender yeares, the barbarous people spoyling and rauishing all whereseoeuer they came.

Her imprisonment with other Ladies in Indumea.

From thence she was sent (with the other Ladies) to a strong fortresse in the Citty of Massada in Idumea, in great feare and danger of Antigonus, then reigning: where shee remayned about two yeares, vntill such time as Herode (hauing obtained the title of King by the Romaines) returned into Iudea; and finding there his power to be strongest, deliuered her and the rest from imprisonment.

Ierusalem surprized a third time.

A third time also she saw the Citty of Ierusalem taken, ransacked, and filled with murders, by the Souldiors of Herode and Sosius: her cosin Antigonus led prisoner to Marke Anthony, and afterward put to execution.

Alexandra sawe and felt all these extremities, before the Kingdome of Herode could be confirmed: which beeing once effected, she likewise beganne to breathe, seeming fully acquitted from all calamities. Nay, which is more, she might haue setled hir estate in the height of happines, if shee could haue made vse of Fortunes fauours, as they showred themselues in plentifull manner vpon her.

The gifts of fortune shold haue some vse made of them

For Herode being King, had diuorced his first wife Doris, and defeated his sonne Antipater, from all hope of succeeding after him; hauing married Mariana, the daughter of Alexandra, whom hee most singularly affected, as wel for her beautie, as many other graces of spirit wherewith she was plentifully endowed. Hereupon ensued, that her Mother Alexandra, being called to the Court, was worthily respected, and had great credite with the King and all other. Her Father Hyrcanus also (already returned from exile) was reuoked home into his countrey: to him Herode, and the rest (by the Kings example) yeelded great honour, as vnto their Father.

The great fauours and honour done to Alexandra in the Court.

But Alexandra ouerthrew all this happines, by her vehement ambition, fiercenesse and impatience; so that (at length) she became to be enueloped with mighty calamities, and was the cause of her owne death. For, taking in high displeasure, that Ananelus was authorized with the High-priesthood, without any regard of her sonne Aristobulus, to whom it appertained by hereditarie right: she grew to machinate many dangerous matters, to exalt her sonne to that dignitie of the Priesthood, procuring (by the meanes of Cleopatra) to incense Marke Anthonie against Herode. Which being discouered, she yet attayned the felicitie, that her son was made soueraigne Sacrificer: but her selfe was not in so noble estate as before, becaus she was heedefully guarded, as one one dangerouſly enclined, and much ſuſpected by the king.

Her ſecret practiſe of flight to Cleopatra, and diſcouerie.

She, not able to endure this intollerable rigor of the King, being ſhut vp from the vſe of her libertie; practiſed ſecretly to eſcape to Cleopatra, as hath already bin ſaid, and being taken with her ſonne in the very act, wel vnderſtood, that ſhe was then runne into the vnrecouerable hatred of Herode. Shortly after, the extreame ſorrow ſhe ſuffered, to ſee her ſonne Ariſtobulus ſo treacherouſly murthered, might well haue admoniſhed her: that it much better auayled, to conquer Iniurie by Patience, then roughly to wraſtle with a Kings courage, naturally addicted to wickednesſe.

She accuſed Herod before Marke Anthonie for hir ſons murder.

Then againe, bringing Herode into danger, by accuſing him before Anthony, for the murdering of her ſonne: ſhe won nothing thereby, but much more contempt and hatred in the King. Inſomuch, that her daughter (otherwiſe choicely cheriſhed by the King) found his affection to wexe coole; but not without cauſe and ſuſpition, in regarde of her Mothers cunning contriuings. Adding withall, that her father Hyrcanus was not ſo much honoured, neither reſpected by the king, as he was wont to be. Whereby Alexandra tooke occaſion, to incite her father againſt Herode, aduiſing him to flie to Malichus, King of the Arabians, euen then, when (after the battaile of Actium) the King was in great danger, ſtanding then in no meane feare, becauſe Auguſtus was Conquerour. For the wily woman did thinke, that if ſhe could procure diſpleaſure in Auguſtus againſt Herode, for his friendſhip to Marke Anthonie; the Scepter would be taken from the Idumean, and reſtored to the true heires of the houſe of the Aſmoneans.

She councelled her father to flight from Herode.

Auguſtus conqueror in the day at Actium

Hyrcanus put to death, being aged. 80 yeares.

This vnhappy councell being diſcouered, by the meanes of intercepted letters; was the cauſe of putting to death the good olde Hyrcanus, aged foure ſcore yeares, and bringing Alexandra into the very depth of ſorrowes. Neuertheleſſe, her ſtomak ſtroken with ſo many wounds; and, euen hardned (as it were) againſt all grieuances whatſoeuer, was ſcarcely ſenſible of any of theſe oppreſſions; after the loſſe of ſo many neare kinred, diſpatched by diuers kindes of ſtrange and vnworthy deaths. Among whom, her husband Alexander, and Antigonus his brother were beheaded. Her vnckle Ariſtobulus, who was likewiſe her father in law, was poiſoned: her onely ſonne Ariſtobulus trayterouſly drowned, by the procurement of Herode. Her father Hyrcanus (ſo neare to his graue) diſpatched by an ignominious infliction.

The kinred of Alexandra put to death in diuers manners.

Her onely daughter Mariana remayned, who beeing married to the King, might ſomewhat comfort her in theſe extremities. But this violent woman, ſwelling in hatred againſt the King, declared herſelfe moſt ſtrangely troubleſome vnto her husband, by continuall reproaching the Idumean houſe, and complayning of the Kings horrible cruelties: So that, after ſhe became to be ſuſpected of adulterie; and a falſe crime impoſed on her, that ſhe practiſed to poiſon her husband: Herode was the eaſier wonne to her death, albeit he loued her intirely, and ſhe had borne him fiue children.

Mariana moſt iniurious againſt the king her huſband.

Now, notwithſtanding ſo great calamitie, in the miſerable & vnworthie death of her daughter; Alexandra could not yet be conquered, neyther vnderſtand, how many incumbrances her attempts turned by misfortunes to her and hers; yea, to many other that truely pittied her indiſcretion. Nor could ſhe be admoniſhed, moderately to beare precedent and preſent miſhaps (whereof continually ſhee gaue the occaſion) but rather prouoked nouell extreamities, by her impatience and peeuiſh folly: for, after the execution of Mariana, Doris, mother to Antipater, and formerly diuorced: ſix yeares after was recalled to the Court, and her wonted lodging in the Kings Chamber, and it appeared, that her ſonne Antipater was now become accepted, and entertained by the King, in hope of ſucceeding after him, and the ſonnes of Mariana excluded quite.

A woman of an vndaunted and vnconquerable courage.

Herode recalled home to Court his former diuorced wife Doris.

Alexandra perceiuing, that ſhe onely remayned of the Aſmonean royall family, and that ſhe was to take care of hir daughters children: affected rather to runne into extreamity, then after ſuch frequent cauſes of griefe, to liue in the deſpite and contempt of Doris, Salome and Antipater, who was to reigne after his father, and to ſee the ſame Antipater, borne of Doris the Idumean, and not noble (euen when Herode liued but in priuate condition) to be preferred

Such yrkeſom and offenſiue ſights as Alexandra was not able to indure preferred the sons of Mariana, who was a Queene, and they borne in the time of Herodes reigning. Hereupon, she began to consider on some apt opportunitie, to exploit a certaine desseigne, which shee imagined to be diuinely instructed to hir soule; in regard that the King (being very greatly perplexed in mind, grieued extraordinarily for his wifes execution) was sicke; euen to death, in the citty of Samaria: which made her (by faire promises) sollicite the Kings Garrisons to reuolt from him, whereof there were two, one in the Cittie, the other in the Temple, and these beeing reduced to partake with her, it would be a very easie way for her to enioy the Kingdome.

She laboured the kings garrisons to reuolt from him

Alexandra exhorted those warrelike bands by faithful messengers (considering the incertitude of the Kings life, or rather the assurance of his death:) to possesse themselues of the Pallace, before that Antipater, or any other should inuade the kingdome, and to preserue the succession thereof, for the sonnes of Herode by his Queene Mariana, till they came to lawfull age, because they were the legittimate heires, and the Kingdome (by right) belonged to them. But the Souldiors, hauing duely considered on the matter among themselues: concluded, not to follow the perillous and ill-aduised councell of this audacious woman, whom they knew to be most maliciously enclined to the King. For (indeede) they greatly feared the Kings dangerous nature, most couetous of reigning and commanding, and accustomed to reuenge (very seuerely) any attempts, in such as hee held the least suspition of, beeing any way affected to the kingdome: as he witnessed most euidently, in the punishments inflicted vpon his owne children.

Her endeuors for aduancing her daughters children to the kingdome.

Herode verie iealous of any that affected his kingdome

One of the Souldiers thinking, that by reuealing the aduice of this woman, hee should winne great grace and fauour of the King: poasted to Samaria, and there disclosed to the sicke King, all the machination of his mother in law: which grew the more tedious to Herode, in regarde of very impatiently enduring the anguish of his disease: and therefore (wholly ouercome with rage and choller) hee sent instant commaund to Ierusalem, forthwith to put his mother in law Alexandra to death, as a trayterous conspitator against his life; and it was accordingly perfourmed.

Th'enterprise of Alexandra was disclosed to the King, and she put to death.

Thus after infinite calamities, Alexandra ended her dayes in this tragicall maner; for, being neuer contented with any present fortune, she daily begate nouell miseries, one still in the necke of another, only through distasting any instant condition. Otherwise, she was a woman graue, discreet and ingenious, but ouer violently giuen vp to ambition, hatred and anger (very vile and bad councellers) more then needed. She had out-gone the compasse of three score yeares, when she was thus put to death; and so became the family of the Asmoneans quite extinct: but onely what remained in the heires of Mariana, deriued from an Idumean father.

The follies & errours too much ruling in Alexandra, which shortned her daies

Let this Discourse suffice, concerning the noble house of the Asmoneans, which from a small beginning (in the defence of a most honest and good cause) became exalted to soueraigne glory and dignity, by their owne industry, but (more especially) the helpe of heauen. Afterward, hauing left the principall cause, they began to seeke after power and riches, according to the fashion of Pagan Kings, and to stirre in many vnnecessarie matters: partly trusting to their owne might, and partly relying on the assistance of strangers. Whereon ensued, that, being first distracted by domesticke discordes, and next, admitting entrance to strange enemies: they beganne (by little and little) to diminish; and finally, to leaue the whole possession of the Iewish kingdome, to the dominion of strangers. Euen after they had held the principality of the people, from Iudas Macchabeus, vnto the beginning of Herodes kingdome, for an hundred and thirty yeares, and had kept the High-priesthoode an hundred and seuenteene yeares.

A briefe entrance into the description of the posteritie of Antipater, holding the principalitie of Iudea, but not the High-priesthoode.

NOw wee should come to describe the third Family, that cõtained the posterity of Antipater the Idumean, who (indifferent-differently) held the principalitie of Iudea, but not the soueraigne Sacrificers Office (for it was not lawfull, that so sacred a charge should bee administred by strangers) vntill the destruction of the Cittie, and the Temple of Ierusalem.

The High-priesthoode graunted by fauour or rewards.

For the High-priesthoode was in the hands of others, who indeed were Iewes; but yet of diuers and obscure Families, enstalled by Herode and the Romaines, eyther by fauour or rewards.

It is no easie matter to describe their succession, neither doe I hold it any way necessary for this discourse: considering that afterward, the soueraigne Sacrificers were neuer potent or powerfull; and beside, the soueraigne gouernement remained in the hands of Romaine Captaynes and Princes.

A taxation laid vpon Iosephus the historiã, for not iustly nũbring the soueraign Sacrificers.

Iosephus also was not very carefull, curiously to number the soueraigne Sacrificers; but rather satisfieth himselfe, with declaring, that in the kingdom of Herode, accounting from his reigne, vntill the destruction of the Iewish nation; there had beene nine and twentie High-priests, which space of time continued litle more then an hundred yeares. For, from the beginning of Herodes reigne, vnto the second yeare of the Empire of Vespasian, I finde by computation, an hundred and sixe yeares.

The first family of Iesus the sonne of Iosedech, and how lõg they held the High-priesthood.

But in the first Familie of Iesus, which held the High-priesthoode, after their returne from Babylon, vntill the time of Antiochus the Noble; there are accounted fifteene soueraigne Sacrificers onely, although the time was thrice as long as the latter. For, as we haue already elsewhere related, that from the first yeare of Cyrus, vntill that of Alcimus; are found three hundred eightie and sixe yeares, or thereabout. The cause of this multiplicitie of High-priests, grew by so often and frequent changes, one still defeating and ouerthrowing another: one while by the power of money, fauour, or both; another while by might, and assistance of enemies.

The reason for such a multitude of High-priests.

The third Family.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Posteritie of Antipater the Idumean of Ascalon, transferring the High-priesthoode (at their pleasure) to strangers: hauing violently got it from the Asmoneans, and held the principalitie of the Iewish people, vntill the destruction of Ierusalem, vnder the reigne of Vespasian.

A description of the scituation of Idumea.

IDumea is the vtmost part of the Land of Canaan, confining Egypt and Arabia, and closing vp the coast of Iudea towardes the South, holding on that part, which the Tribe of Iuda had by lot in their inheritance. In elder times, it was inhabited by the posteritie of Esau, (brother to Iaacob) who was also named Edom, that is to say, Red-hayred. Of him they came to be called Idumeans, and hauing lost the true doctrine, and holy seruices commaunded them by God: they fell to the worshipping of Idolles, with their neighbouring nations.

The Idumeans descended of Esau brother to Iaacob.

King Dauid first of all brought them into subiection, and made them tributarie to the Kings of Iuda.

Dauid first made the Idumeans tributarie.

About an hundred and fiftie yeares after, they reuolted agayne vnder Ioram King of Iuda, sonne to Iehosaphat, and rebelled against the Iewes, diuided into two kingdomes. And although the succeeding Kings compelled them diuers times, to vnder-goe againe their former seruilitie: yet notwithstanding, they defended their libertie by armes, vntill such time as Iudas was led captiue into Babylon. And then, they tooke many Citties from the Iewes; which afterward (by the Edict of King Darius) they were enforced to restore vnto them agayne, when they were returned from Babylon.

Diuers reuolts and rebellions of the Idumeans.

Not long after, Iohn Hyrcanus, sonne to Simon the Asmonean, hauing ouercome them in a very difficult warre: constrayned them, to make profession of the same doctrine and religion with him, causing them them to vndergoe Circumcision. Heerehence it ensued, that they trafficked the more freely with the Iewes; so that they were called to their warres, and to the Courts of the Iewish kings.

Antipater father to King Herode.

Antipater came of this Idumean nation, whose sonne, named Herode, hauing afterward obtained the Iewish kingdome, and fearing to vse himselfe with them as a stranger: would be esteemed a Iew, because (as hath bene said) the Idumeans had receiued Circumcision vnder Iohn Hyrcanus. Iosephus thus recordeth this family.

Antipas the Father

The issue of Antipater the father.

Cephalion slaine in warre by Aristobulus 2.	Antipater the familiar of Hyrcanus Tutour of all Iudea.	Cypris an Idumean woman.

These children came of Antipater.

Antipaters issue.

Phaselus gouernour of Ierusalem.	Herode King of Iudea.	Sosippus gouernor of Idumea.	Pheroras Tetrarch.	Salome a daughter.

Antipater gouernour of Idumea.

Antipas the Ascalonite, father to Antipater, was appointed Gouernour of his Countrey of Idumea, by Alexander Iannes, and beside afterward enioying it still (sometime) vnder the Queene Alexandra; he gathered great store of wealth, and obtained the principall authority in that Region.

Anaipater.

Succeeded in the gouernment of Idumea, after his deceassed father, during which time, he not only wonne the hearts of his owne nation, augmenting and confirming his wealth, by aliance with neighboring Kings, and Cities; but also strongly insinuated himselfe into good grace with Hyrcanus the second, by many acceptable seruices. For he being instituted Soueraigne Sacrificer by his mother, who then ruled the kingdome. Antipater had great hope, that the fauour of Hyrcanus would (in time) aduaunce him to higher degree. Now, he perswaded himselfe, that the mother being dead, hee should come to inioy the kingdom by hereditary right. Wherefore, Antipaoer was very diligent towards him in all kindes of courtesies, making no account at all of the yoonger brother: which made him wonderfully

The reason why Antipater laboured to keepe himselfe in fauour with Hyrcanus hated by Aristobulus, as it fell out after in open apparance. For, their mother being dead, Aristobulus hauing fought with his brother Hyrcanus in a field of battell, & afterward held besieged in the temple: he was at length constrained, to dismisse himselfe, both of the kingdome and high-Priesthood. And then (by slowe and politike degrees) he deposed Antipater from the gouernement of Idumea, for his so many good seruices to Hyrcanus in war.

Antipater deposed from the gouernement of Iudea

This iniurie more and more enflamed the hatred of Antipater against Aristobulus, and because hee could not reuenge himselfe by power: hee incited the greatest Lords of the Iewes against King Aristobulus by secret accusations. Aboue all, he handled Hyrcanus in diuers kindes (hee beeing of his owne nature, modest and temperate) one while terrifying him with strange feares, another while chearing his hopes, with vndoubted comming to his Crowne againe. He told him that his brother Aristobulus, (a man meerely vile by complexion) sought all occasions, either by close contriuings, or open violence, to preuaile against his life: for his more secure enioying of the kingdome, whereto hee had aspired by such wickednesse. Hee auouched, to haue certayne knowledge, of diuers enterprises in Aristobulus by euident signes: either because they were truely so indeede, or for the more prouoking Hyrcanus against his brother. Moreouer, he shewed the meanes and wayes, whereby Hyrcanus might regayne the Kingdome belonging to him, to wit, if they both fled thence to Aretas, king of Arabia, with whom he had ancient amitie and alliance, and who (he doubted not) could satisfie their desires.

The cunning dealing of Antipater with deiected Hyrcanus.

Incitation for flight to Aretas king of Arabia.

Hyrcanus was at last wonne by these speeches, being formerly wounded with the wrongs which his brother had offred him; so that accompanied with Antipater, and some other, who not a little despised the dominion of Aristobulus; he secretly went to Aretas in the city of Petra. There humbling himselfe before the King, hee desired assistance of him against his wicked and cruell brother, who not only had depriued him of the High-priesthoode, (contrary to all right and equitie) which hee had peaceably enioyed nine yeares in his mothers life time; and not onely also bereft him of the kingdome, which by the lawe law of Nations belonged to him, as being the eldest sonne: but (beside) layed daily trappes and traines for his life. Whereupon he promised, that if hee should be restored to his Kingdome; he would surrender to him ten Cities, which his father Alexander Iamnes had taken from the Realme of Arabia, and other honourable recompences beside.

King Aretas inuaded Iudea with fiftie thousand men

Aretas, more moued by the perswasions of Antipater, then all the praiers and promises of Hyrcanus, inuaded Iudea with fiftie thousand men. Aristobulus encountring with him, was vanquished, chiefly by the valiancie of Antipater: and beeing abandoned of his souldiers, the most part yeelded themselues to Hyrcanus. Aristobulus got closely into the Citie, and there (with some of the Sacrificers and Cittizens) kept within the fortresse of the temple, being prouided of all things necessarie to endure besieging. But yet before this extremitie, he had sent an ambassage (in great haste) to Scaurus, Lieutenant, abiding then in Syria, intreating succour of him against the Arabes: promising him foure hundred Talents, that is, two hundred and fortie thousand crownes of the Sunne.

Aristobulus required succour of Scaurus against the Arabes.

Aretas pursuing Aristobulus with his Armie, entred into the Cittie, to lay his siege before the Temple; the Cittizens yeelding themselues to Hyrcanus, and the Cittie also. But some Iewes foreseeing, that this debate betweene the brethren, about possession of the kingdome, would cause the ruine of the whole country; left there their goods, and fledde into Egypt.

Diuers Iewes forsooke their goods, & fled into Egypt.

Other of the Cittizens ioyned with the Arabes, besieging the munition, and pressed the inclosed Sacrificers very narrowly; yea, much more nearely then the enemie, vsing deceits and subtilties with their crueltie. For they drew out of the secret Sanctuarie (where this ciuile warre was most vnciuilly maintained) a holy man, named Onias, who in an extreme drought and dread of sterilitie, made his prayers to God, desiring raine in that needefull season: and would haue compelled him, to curse and damne the besieged to the diuell, because they would not yeelde themselues. But hee (on the contrary) made his prayers aloude to God, that he would neyther heare the Sacrificers, or Priests besieged against the people, nor the people besieging against the Priests, for which cause the Iewes stoned him.

Onias a holie man, extremely wronged by the Iewes and stoned.

And when the feast of Easter was come, when there was neede of many beasts for Sacrifices; the Priests required, that such store might be deliuered them, as was necessarily to be vsed in such solemne Sacrifices, agreeing to paya thousand drachmes for each beast; that is to say, an hundred crownes of the Sunne. But after that the Iewes had receiued so great a summe from the Priests: they descended from the walles, and would not performe a iote of that which they had promised, but mocked the sacrificing Priests, who were ouer credulous in beleeuing them.

False and fraudfull dealing in the Iews with the sacrificing Priests.

But the Lord God being offended with this wickednes, and taking vengeance for their foule transgressions; sent a sharpe winde on the Corne then almost ripe, which being vtterly spoyled, the famine was so great, that a bushell of wheate was solde eleuen times more deare, then vsually it was wont to be; to wit, at eleauen drachmaes, whereas before (in euerie yeare) it was sold for a drachma, and lesse.

The iustice of heauen on the Iews for their wickednes.

The besieged beginning to feele the want of foode, and that nothing hindred them from yeelding, but onely to heare an answer from Scaurus (vnder the hope whereof, Aristobulus encouraged the Priests, to endure all difficulties of the siege:) it fortuned (very successefully for them) that Scaurus sent Ambassadours to King Aretas, that he should withdraw his Army out of Iudea, except hee meant to proone the displeasure of the Romaine people. Aretas obeyed this commaund, and so much the rather, because his army was in great distresse for foode. By which meanes, (without doing any thing else) Hyrcanus and Antipater returned backe to Arabia with the King.

Ambassadors sent frō Scaurus to King Aretas.

Soone after, Pompey came out of Armenia into Syria, whereupon, Antipater procured many of the most potent Iewes, to accuse Aristobulus before him. Himselfe likewise, as an Ambassador sent from Hyrcanus, went to Pompey, and pleaded the cause of Hyrcanus against Aristobulus, and entred into such respect with Pompey, that after the surprizing of the Cittie, Hyrcanus was restored to the High-priesthood, but not to the Kingdome. And from thence forward, Antipater beganne to grow great, gouerning (well neare) all occasioccasions whatsoeuer, because Hyrcanus, (being a louer of quietnesse) left all to his rule. And so gracious was he with the Romaine Captaines, in all such seruices as possibly he could do for them: that he insinuated farre into their friendship, causing Hyrcanus daily to bestow magnificēt gifts, and himselfe receiued all the thanks and profite for them.

The cunning insinuations of Antipater with the Roman captains.

First, he was very diligent, to furnish Scaurus with all kinde of munition, when he was left in Iudea with two legions, and made warre vpon the Arabes. Next, being sent in embassage by the same Scaurus to the king Aretas: hee procured peace, in regarde of his auncient amitie with the King, and perswaded Scaurus to bring his Army out of Arabia, after he had receiued of the King three hundred Talents, as much to say, as an hundred and foure-score thousand crowns of the Sunne. Afterward, he assisted Gabinius against Alexander, sonne to Aristobulus, but especially in the restitution of King Ptolomey the Fleutster: where he made passage for Gabinius, to goe from Iudea into Egipt by Idumea.

Antipater procured peace betwixt Scaurus and Aretas, king of the Arabians.

By the like subtile and cunning means, he qualified rich Crassus, and his General Cassius, being remoued from the Parthian warre; fearing lest any thing should bee attempted, that might be hurtfull to Hyrcanus, who (from time to time) was accused to the Romaine Captaines, as well by the sonnes of Aristobulus, as by diuerse powerfull Iewes, that were of the same faction.

Rich Crassus, and his generall Cassius.

But, for the more sure establishing of his power, hee ayded Iulius Cæsar more then all the rest, to whom he performed faithfull seruice in the Alexandrian warre, in bringing him three thousand Iewes, & procuring the Arabes, Idumeans, and Iews dwelling in Egipt, to be his companions in that warre. And when Mithridates of Pergamum (who went with a great Armie of Cilicia and Syria against Cæsar) was repulsed in Egipt: Antipater (Damieta being subdued) brought helpe to Cæsar, and saued him by the way; when he was compelled (in an encounter) to giue place to the enemy, his men being ready prepared for flight.

The actions of Antipater in Egypt, and his faithfull seruice to Iulius Cæsar.

For these deserts (the Alexandrian war being ended) Iulius Cæsar confirmed the High-priesthood vnto Hyrcanus, permitting him to builde vp the Citty walles agayne: Moreouer, he appoynted Antipater to be Tutour of all Iudea, and sent him into Iudea, honoured with the title of a Romaine Bourgesse, and perpetuall immunities beside.

Antipater made a Romaine Bourgesse by Iulius Cæsar.

Antipater seeing himselfe exalted to such dignitie, deuised also how to aduāce his sonnes. Whereupon, Phaselus (being the eldest) he appointed him to be gouernour of Ierusalem, and the neighbouring places about it: in regarde of the negligence and careleſnesse of Hyrcanus in the gouernement. Next to him was Herode, and he as yet but yoong: yet he gaue the charge of Galilee to him. Both of them very commendably performd their seuerall offices, which caused their father to bee much more esteemed generally, and wun the fauour of many powerfull persons, by both his owne, and his sonnes liberalitie.

Antipater exalteth his sons to seuerall dignities.

Hereupon it hapned, that some Iews grew iealous and suspitious of Antipater, seeing him (purposly) to maintaine the remisseneſse of Hyrcanus, onely for the exaltation of his owne sonnes: abusing also his riches and reuenues, to bestow great fauors and gifts vpon the Romains. In this respect, some of the best aduised Iewes, and of the better sort, feared not to reprehend Hyrcanus publiquely, for his neglect and slouthfulneſse, in referring the totall administration of all things, onely to Antipater and his sonnes, who were scarcely started out of childhood. Hauing already gathered such heaps of wealth and cheuisance, onely to curry fauour with the Romaines, that they were become dreadfull to the whole nation. They bad him to be well aduised, whereto tended this power in the Idumeans, shewing him withall, that he dealt vniustly and indiscreetly, hauing so many Iewes, excelling in valour and expertneſse of armes: to reiect them from managing publike affaires, reposing his whole trust in the defence of a stranger, who intended no profit to the Iewish nation, but only how to leaue the kingdome of Iudea to his owne sonnes.

Diuers Iewes began to be suspitious of Antipater.

Hyrcanus reprehended by some of the best Iewes for his great negligence.

Now, albeit these speeches did a little moue Hyrcanus, himselfe also fearing the power of Antipater: yet notwithstanding, he could not forget, what benefits he had receiued by him, and what loyalty he had declared towards him, hauing alwayes kept him in extreame dangers. Beside, he feared feared Aristobulus, and his sonnes, against whom he thought he stood in need of a powerfull defender, which made him answere; that he could not dismisse Antipater from gouerning the generall affaires, in regard he had receiued his authoritie from the Romaines; who he might by no meanes offend, without both hazarding himselfe, and the whole Country to vnauoidable dangers.

Hyrcanus fearefull of Aristobulus and his sons.

When the accusers of Antipater perceiued, they could worke nothing on the slow and neglect nature of Hyrcanus, they began to cõsider on some subtile means, whereby they might put Antipater to death. And one of them being named Malichus, excelling all the rest in wealth, wisedome, and corage, sought how to intrap Antipater, by secret plots and ambushes prepared. But Antipater getting intelligence thereof, withdrew himselfe beyond Iordane, where he leuied an Army, by aide from King Aretas his deare frend, with full deliberation to reuenge this iniury. Neuertheless, he was appeased by Hyrcanus, because Malichus purged himselfe by oath, that he neuer intended any treason against him.

Conspiracie how to compasse the death of Antipater, by Malichus a rich Iew.

This hapned immediatly after that the Conspirators had slayne Iulius Cæsar in the Senate house, when Cassius (Author and chiefe in the coniuration) was come into Syria, and from thence into Iudea: where he villainously ransacked the Cities and Townes, onely to get money, so that he sold the Magistrates of some places, with their whole families, and pillaged foure great cities in Iudea, selling all the Citizens for slaues: becausse they had made refusall, to giue such a large summe as this insatiable beast demanded. As he asked of the Iews seuen hundred talents, (which summe amounted to foure tunnes of gold of our coyne, and twenty thousand Crownes of the Sunne:) Antipater gaue charge to leuy this money, partly of his Sons, and partly of the most powerfull Iewes; so that the whole summe being suddenly payd in: Antipaters sonnes were the better welcomed among the Romans. And so farre it proceeded, that Cassius (euen then) made promise of the kingdom of Iudea to Herode, who ouer & aboue the summe whereto the taxation mounted, carryed store of gold to the campe in Syria) when he had ended the war against The readines of Antipater to please the Romaines.

Marke Anthony and Octauius. But for the present he commanded the Prouince of Syria to Herode, and the Army by Sea.

Malichus well obseruing, that the power of Antipater so mightily encreasing, was not (by any patient meanes) to be indured; practised & dealt with the Taster or Cup-bearer to Hyrcanus the High-priest, by great gifts and summes of mony: so that one night, as Antipater was at Supper with Hyrcanus, the Taster poysoned him; albeit the sayd Taster had twise bin deliuered from death by Antipater, & held his life of him. Thus was Antipater murdred, in the yere following the death of Iulius Cæsar, he being (vndoubtedly) a man very excellent, wise, and prouident. Some imagined, that Hyrcanus was not ignorant of the deed doing, or (at least) it was not doone in any despight of him: although Antipater by the means of Pompey, got him restored to the Soueraigne Priesthood, and afterward (for the space of 22. yeares) alwayes kept and defended him against the violence of his enemies.

Antipater being at supper with Hyrcanus the High-priest, was poysoned by his Taster.

Perhaps one way he had offended Hyrcanus, that (to satisfie the couetous desires of Cassius, and to forestall perills incident to himselfe) he was somewhat ouer-rude in vrging money from him, he being an old man, sparing by nature, and the more gripple in holding, in regarde of his age. For which fault, Hyrcanus declared no great distaste in the murdering of his Benefactor. Becausse many times it comes to passe, that some men, hauing receiued good benefites for a large length of time, and yet growing (at length) to be displeased: they forget all good deseruings past, and resting not so contented, proceed to diuers dangerous practises against them. Of such ingrateful men, Philip Melanct on, my worthy master, & good father, wrote certaine Verses to this effect:

Some reasons wherby Hyrcanus might be offended with Antipater.

> Some men there are, if thou transport their states
> With pompe to Rome, and plant'st them in the gates;
> Such fauour they require not with due grace,
> But (like ingratefull wretches) all deface.

Philip Melancthons verses on ingratitude.

Not long after, Hyrcanus payd dearly for this his foolish ingratitude, becausse (the yeare following) Antigonus compassed the meanes to bring the Parthians into Iudea; when Hyrcanus being taken, & led into a strange land by the enemy: well found (but ouer-late) what defence he had lost by the death of Antipater, and then in

Of the Sonnes of Antipater.

Phaselus the eldest.

The worthie performance of Phaselus in his charge.

HEe being constituted by his Father, to be Gouernor of Ieruſalem, and the round neighbouring places, to assist Hyrcanus (careleſſe, and very vnapt for administration) in regard of his age; discharged his Commission most commendably for fixe yeares space, during the life time of his father. He being dead, hee appeased (by his vertue) a great trouble arising in Ieruſalem, in regard that a certayne man, named Fœlix, driuen by Cassius into Ieruſalem with Soldiours, being corrupted with mony from diuerse Iewes; laboured to ouerthrow it. But this Fœlix was vanquished by Phaselus, and for a while kept in prison; but afterward released vpon certayne conditions.

Fœlix laboured to confound Ieruſalem.

Next, it was no little ioy to him, to see Malichus (the murderer of his father Antipater) punished for his wickednesse: who labouring to inuade the Principality of Iudea, was slayne by the Souldiours of Cassius, and by the industrious meanes of Herode.

The death of seditious Malichus.

Cassius being conquerd, Marke Anthony came into Syria, and made Phaselus & Herode Tetrarches of Iudea: notwithstanding all the criminall accusations, alleadged by the Iewes against them. But Phaselus enioyed not that dignity any long while; for the yeare following the death of his father, the Citty beeing surprised by the Parthians and Antigonus: he was (by subtilty) taken with Hyrcanus, and slew himselfe remayning prisoner, as I haue already related in the life of the second Hyrcanus.

Phaselus and Herod made Tetrarchs of Iudea by Marke Anthony.

Phaselus, to whom Salome, daughter to Herode and Mariana was married, by whom he had these children.

Antipater, of whom we reade nothing. — Herode and Alexander, both dying young children. — Alexandra, married to a Iew of Cyprus, beeing barren. — Cypris, afterward marryed to king Agryppa.

Iosippus the third Sonne of Antipater.

Concerning the brethren of Phaselus.

Herode commeth next after Phaselus, in respect of his age. But I holde it more conuenient to speak first of his brethren, whose actions were of lesse fame and esteeme.

Iosippus (called by some Gisippus) the third sonne of Antipater, was appoynted Gouernour of Idumea by his father, who had obtained the Principalitie of Iudea. After his fathers death, he valiantly defended the family and affaires of his brother Herode, they being driuen into exile by Antigonus and the Parthians: withdrawing them into the City of Massada, against the sayd King Antigonus, enduring there a very difficult siege, vntill that his brother brother Herode (being returned out of Italie) deliuered him and them, and was afterward proclaymed King by Octauius Augustus, and by Marke Anthony.

Iosippus defended his brothers cause and all his friends.

Iosippus take & beheaded through his owne wilful negligence.

Within a while after, when his brother Herode went to Marke Anthony, who besieged the Citty of Samosata, neare vnto Euphrates; the charge of the Army was giuen to him. But going inconsiderately forraging for Corne, with sixe silly bands of Souldiers: he was taken in the Straits of the mountaines neare to Iericho, and there slain with all his men by Antigonus, about foure yeares after the death of his father.

Pheroras bought his brothers head of Antigonus.

His head being smitten off, was carried vp and downe in a mockery, and finally bought of Antigonus, by his brother Pheroras, for fifty Talents, that is, 30000 Crownes of the Sunne. He had a sonne named Iosippus also, to whom his vnckle Herode gaue in marriage, Olimpia, the Sister of Archelaus, of whom he begat Mariana, afterwards marryed to Herode the lesse, King of Chalcis.

Antipater

Iosippus President of Idumea.	Herode King of Iudea.	Marthaca a Samaritane his wife.

Iosippus, his wife Olympia.

Of them was borne Mariana, wife to Herode, son to Aristobulus, King of Chalcis.

Pheroras assisted his brother in warre against Antigonus.

Pheroras, the yongest sonne to Antipater, when his brother Iosippus was slain; being as yet but young, he continued alone, yet ayded his brother Herode valiantly, managing dangerous warres (on his behalfe) against Antigonus. At the request of Herode, Augustus Cæsar made him Tetrarche, and vsed him very honorably; yet returning but bad recompence therefore to his brother. For, hauing procured him, to put his wife Mariana to death, and his two sonnes Alexander and Aristobulus: he at the length compacted with Antipater, to compasse the death of his brother also. But being preuented by sudden death, hee escaped punishment. He dyed some few yeares before his brother Herod, and left two sonnes, to whom Augustus marryed two daughters of deceassed Herode, Roxana and Salome, endowing each with fiue and twentie thousand Crownes of the Sunne. Hee had a daughter also, marryed to the sonne of Antipater, yongest sonne of King Herode.

He sought the death of his brother Herode.

Salome, daughter of Antipater, Sister to Herode King of Iudea.

Her first husband slaine by Herodes commaund.

IN her first marriage, shee was giuen to one named Iosippus, who being constituted guardian of Mariana, wife to Herod; was slaine by the Kings commaund, because hee would not reueale some matters of secrecie. Afterward she was married to Costabarus, Gouernor of Idumea, from whom she seperated her selfe by diuorce, contrary to the Lawe of Moses: which permiited Husbands to leaue their Wiues for some cause of importance; but not Wiues to leaue their Husbands. Neuertheless, Salome vsed this licence, confiding in the power of her brother: and afterward was the cause, that the sayd Costabarus dyed miserably. Finally, in despight of her selfe-will, Herode made her marry one Alexas: although she was almost madde in loue with a potent Arabe, named Syleus, an vtter enemy to Herode, and one that would not be circumcised.

Salome seperated hirselfe from her husband.

Salome wedded the third mariage

This Salome was a meere Fury in the Court of her brother, and a flaming firebrand of domesticke discordes, whereon many murders ensued. For, being wholly ouercome with hatred against Mariana the Asmonean (who despised her, because she was not nobly borne) she ceassed not to enflame the spleene of her brother: contriuing false crimes of adultery and poysoning against her, vntill Herode had put his dearely affected wife to death. Which being done, and Salome fearing some reuenge to be inflicted on her: beganne to prouoke the father against Alexander and Aristobulus, the sonne of Mariana, seruing her turne heerein with Antipater, the sonne of Herode, who stood in feare, that these two yong men should be aduanced and preferred before him to the kingdome.

Salome a firebrand of confusion in the Court of king Herode her brother.

Alexander & Aristobulus both executed.

She preuayled so well by her cunning plots and practises, that they both standing accused, for affecting the Kingdome, and preparing of poysons, they were condemned; and, notwithstanding all their excellent partes and perfections, they were strangled by their fathers commaund.

Antipater disgraced by her meanes, and brought to his death

Moreouer, by her secret and subtile reports, she wrung Antipater into his fathers ill opinion and disgrace, although hee had beene her companion in all her wickednesse; plotting and preparing all the treasons against his father, whereof he had falsly accused his most innocent brethren, the sonnes of Mariana, vntill himselfe was caught in the same snare, and (by his fathers commaund) dispatched also.

The bountie of Herode to his sister at his death.

Shee, the minister of so many monstrous cruelties, did suruiue her brother Herode; who left her (by his last will and testament) three most opulent Citties, to wit, Iamnia, Azot and Phaselis; beside two millions and an halfe of siluer coine, which amounts to fifty thousand crowns of the Sunne.

Moreouer, she being familiar (by Letters) with Liuia, wife to Augustus (whom Iosephus continually calleth Iulia) the said Augustus gaue her the Castle royall in the Citty of Ascalon. And she receiued annually out of the fore-named Citties, three score Talents, which arise to thirtie sixe thousand crownes of the Sunne.

The royall castle of Ascalon giuen to Salome.

Hauing liued twelue yeares after the death of her brother Herode; shee dyed a yeare before the departure of Augustus out of this life, and left (by her testament) to Liuia, wife to Augustus, those Citties which she formerly held. She left a sonne named Antipater, and a daughter singularly beautifull, called Berenice, of whom came these children following.

The death of Salome, and what issue she left.

Cypris daughter to king Herode by Mariana the Asmonean. — Antipater espoused her, albeit she was his cousine. — Berinice married to her cousine Aristobulus. — Aristobulus Son to king Herod by the Asmonean.

Cypris. — Alexas sonin law to Salome, sister to Herod, by the 3. husband. — Agrippa King of Iudea. — Herode King of Chalcis. — Aristobulus. — Herodias mentiond in the gospell. — Mariana.

Cypris. — Agrippa
The second, succeeded in the Kingdome of Chalcis, after his Vnckle Herode.

Herode, the second sonne of Antipater, whom some doe call the Great, was the first King of Iudea, being of a contrary Nation.

Ezechias the Iew and his complices vanquished & slayne by Herode in his yong dayes.

Herode being as yet but young, was ordayned President of Galilee, by his father Antipater, soone after Iulius Cæsar had finished the warres in Egypt. He gaue immediate probation of his industry and valour, hauing destroyed and slaine Ezechias the Iew, and a troop of theeues that wasted Syria: for the which being highly commended by the Syrians, hee found great grace and fauor with Sextus Cæsar, who then gouerned the Prouince of Syria. It fortuned, that by the instigation of them that enuyed Antipater, Hyrcanus the Soueraigne Sacrificer (contrary to his will) gaue personall summons to Herode, in regarde of the Iewes by him taken and slayne in Syria: without listening to the sentence of soueraign Iudgement, which then was tearmed Sanhedrin, of the Greek word Synedrion, as I conceiue, and consisted of seauenty and two Iudges, who were called the seuentie Ancients. Philo writeth, that before the kingdome of Herode, the Iudges of that Councell were chosen out of the posteritie of Dauid only. Herode hauing aduertisement (by Letters)

Herode sommoned to personall appearance by Hyrcanus.

ters from his father, appeared at Ierusalem on the day of Assignation, accompanied with a reasonable guard, and recommended by Sextus Cæsar.

The kindnes of Hyrcanus, in shielding him from the Iudges sentence.

Hyrcanus perceiuing, that the Iudges were heauily incensed by the aduersaries of Antipater, and that they would not faile to giue sentence in sharpe manner: desiring to gratifie his friend Antipater, he secretly admonished Herode, to withdraw himselfe out of the citty, before he were condemned by the Iewes sentence; and thereupon conuaied to punishment. The yong man returned backe into Syria, very impatiently bearing the iniurie, which he conceiued to be doone him by the Iudges, declaring to Sextus Cæsar the treacherie of the Cittizens, and hauing receiued from him part of the Romaine Army, and the regiment of the lower Syria: hee resolued to reuenge the wrong which the Councell had offred him: So, going vp to Ierusalem with a maine Army, hee could hardly be with-held by his father, and his brother Phaselus; who met him by the way, and made him to retreate his army into Syria. But yet he could not remooue his mallice, which still he continued against the Consistorie: and which he vtterly quailed and ouerthrew, after his coming to the Crowne.

Herod goeth with an army against Ierusalem, but is reuersed by his father & brother.

Not long after the death of Iulius Cæsar, by a close ambush, and ayde of Cassius his Souldiours; he procured Malichus to be slaine, beeing the murtherer of his father Antipater. Which beeing done, once more hee expelled out of Iudea Antigonus, the sonne of Aristobulus, whom he ouercame in warre, albeit he had recouered part of Iudea.

Herod reuenged the death of his father.

After that Cassius and Brutus were vanquished neare to Philippi, when Marke Anthony was come into Syria; Ambassadours went from the Iewes to meete him at Bithynia, accusing there Phaselus and Herode to him, because the lawfull heires of the kingdome were expulsed, and they (by force) holde the whole gouernement of Iudea. Herod also met them there, wel furnished with rich and sumptuous gifts, to bestow on Marke Anthony: of whom he was entertained most benignely, for the loue he had borne to his father Antipater, when being Lieutenant to Gabinius, hee was still in warre, during the peace of Syria and Iudea. Wherefore, Brutus and Cassius foiled at Philippi. Herode bribeth Anthony against the Ambassadors.

howsoeuer he listened to the Iewes accusations; yet he ordained Phaselus and his brother Herode Tetrarchs of Iudea. And because the Iews ceassed not to send Embassie vpon Embassie, and continually in great number, amounting to a thousand men in the end. Marke Anthony punished them with imprisonment. And because they neuer would giue ouer, but daily intreated, that (by no meanes) they might be subiected to Herode; hee caused some of them to be put to death.

Anthony imprisoned and put to death the Iews Ambassadours.

Hyrcanus descended to Anthony in Syria (already conioyned with Herode in affinitie, to whom hee had giuen his younger sister Mariana, daughter of Alexander and Alexandra:) who was honourably entertained by Anthony, and confirmed in the possession of the High-priesthood: and obtained those cities and persons (reduced by Cassius into seruitude) to be deliuered and enfranchised; and that the rapined goodes should be restored to their first owners.

Hyrcanus goeth to Anthony in Syria, & is kindly welcomed of him.

The yeare following, Pacorus hauing subdued Syria (attracted by great promises) brought Antigonus backe againe to Ierusalem, as hath formerly beene sayde. Where Herode (hearing that his brother Phaselus and Hyrcanus the soueraigne Sacrificer were detained prisoners, contrary to the lawes of Nations, knowing also, that the Iewes were affected to Antigonus, fearing both his enemies and the Cittizens) he departed foorth secretly in the dead time of the night, with his Mother Cypris, his wife Doris, his sister Salome, his affianced Mariana, his mother in lawe Alexandra, and eight hundred other women, beside a great company of friends, and (with much adoe) got not safelie into Idumea. For his mother was sore wounded by the way, by reason of the Waggons ouerthrow vpon her: so that Herode (as halfe desperate) thought to haue slaine himselfe, because he was ouer-closely pursued by the barbarous people, whom (neuertheless) hee valiantly droue backe, and quite ouercame.

Herod saueth himselfe by flight in the night, and a great company with him.

There he left al his company, and such goodes as they carried with them; in a strong Cittie named Massada, vnder the charge and protection of his brother Iosippus: and went very secretly (attended but with a few Souldiours) to king Aretas, relying vpon the loue and friendship which was betweene him and his father Antipater. But being hindered from entring into Arabia, hee passed (with great difficultie) into Egypt to Cleopatra, who furnishing him with needfull things: hee tooke shipping in the worst season of all the yeare, and shaped his course directly for Rome; where being arriued, he acquainted Mark Anthony with the fraud of Antigonus, his owne flight, and perill of the people hee had in charge; humbly entreating him, that hee would not suffer him to be thus trampled on by his enemies, to whom he had expressed kindnesse, and oftentimes exalted them.

The arriuall of Herode at Rome with Marke Anthony.

Anthony reported the complaint and request of Herode, to his companion Augustus in the Empire, and both they together commended their suppliant friend to the Senate: remembring the perpetual deuotion & loyaltie of his father Antipater, towards the Captaines and Souldiours of Rome, and especially to Iulius Cæsar. In briefe, they preuailed so farre, that (by common voice) Antigonus was iudged enemy to the people of Rome: and the kingdome of Iudea conferred on Herode, the seauenth day after his coming to Rome. He was conducted to the Senate house, going in the middle betweene Augustus and Anthony; Domitius Caluinius, and Asinius Pollio, Consulles, going before him, accompanied with other Magistrates and Senatours, euen all the way thence to the Capitole, where the Sacrifices were perfourmed. And this beeing the first day of his reigne, hee was magnificently feasted by Marke Anthonie: foure yeares after the death of Iulius Cæsar; two yeares after them of Cicero, and thirty seuen before the birth of our Sauiour Christ.

The grace & fauour that Herod found with the Romane Senate.

Antigonus declared enimy to Rome, and Herod proclaimed King of Iudea.

Herode being returned into Indea, had a very difficult warre against King Antigonus, which continued the space of foure yeares: becausse that the Romaine Captaines (as Ventidius, Silo and some other, who had the charge of placing Herode in ful possession of the kingdome) were corrupted by gold sent from Antigonus, desiring nothing more then deferring, and neuer earnestly assisted Herode. Besides, many Iewes (ill affected to the house of Antipater) moued many troubles against him.

The Romain captains corrupted by golde from Antigonus, still hindered Herode.

The beginning then of Herodes reigne was wonderfully difficile, and yet (notwithstanding) by his industrie, diligence and vertue, and softly, steppe by steppe; he ouercame all hinderances, and possessed himselfe of Galilee, Samaria, and the very greatest part of Iudea.

Herod ouercame all his hinderances whatsoeuer.

Afterward, Ventidius sent some bands to succour him, conducted by one named Macheras; but Herode perceiuing him to be dull and slowe, and that hee went but coldly about the businesse, as expecting, that Antigonus should still furnish him with fresh handfulls; without expecting any further ayde from such Captains, he vndertook great iournies, to encounter with Antigonus, who besieged Samosata. And (by the way) sped very successefully, against diuers theeues that hindered his passages.

Herode goeth against Antigonus besieging Samosata.

As thus he drew nearer to his enemie, Marke Anthony came to meete him, and did him such honour as became a King, with the greater part of his Armie. After hee had heard his complaints, concerning the disloyaltie of some Captaines, who (corrupted by the gifts of Antigonus) had executed no part of the commaund from Augustus and the Senate: hee sent two legions of olde Souldiours into Iudea, and commaunded Sosius (one of his faithfull Captaines) to follow them with an other Armie, so soone as the Citty of Samosata was surrendred.

Marke Anthony meets with Herode, and vsed him very honorably.

In the absence of Herode, his brother Iosippus, fighting to his owne disaduantage; was slaine with his Armie, by the Souldiers of Antigonus, neare to Iericho. Also, the Galileans reuolted, and many rebelled in Iudea: wherefore Herode returned with those olde bands, and hardly appeased them of Galilee. Afterwards, by many encounters, wherein hee had one while the best, and another while the worst, he so weakened the forces of Antigonus: as (at length) hee withdrew into the fortresse of Ierusalem.

Herodes brother Iosippus slaine, and Galilee reuolted from him.

Herode brought his Armie against the Cittie, and after he had raised his munitions, and builded diuerse engines needfull for batterie: hee left the Armie vnder certaine Captaines and iournied into Samaria, to espouse Mariana the Asmonean, who (as I haue formerly tolde you) was daughter to Alexander, the yongest sonne of Hyrcanus the second, who (foure yeares before) was affianced to Herode, that that is to say, before that the Parthians had inuaded the Countrey.

Sosius ioynes his forces with Herods army.

In the meane while, Sosius being sent from Anthony with his Souldiers, marched on diligently, and ioyned his armie with the other belonging to Herod; whose nuptialls being ended, and he returned to Ierusalem: the two Captaines beganne to assaile the Cittie manfully in diuers places. The besieged Iewes had great want of principall munitions, and yet notwithstanding, hauing embraced an imaginary hope, they thought, that they should be diuinely deliuered. For they continually vsed to say, that they fought for freedome of the people for their lawfull king against strangers, for the Temple and Religion against Pagans; sustaining (for some length of time) a very sharpe besieging, and much molesting the enemy by their sallies. But finally, the City was surprized in the moneth of Maie, the very same day as (seuen and twenty yeares before) Pompey had conquered it, as hath beene said, M. Agrippa and Canidius Gallus being then Consulls.

A fooliſh hope and perſwaſion in the Iews for their deliuerance.

Ieruſalem conquered by Herode and Sosius.

The Romaine Souldiers being much displeased at so long a siege, and losse of many of their people; made pittilesse slaughter, not onely of the armed Iewes, but also of such as had no defence at all. King Antigonus, throwing himselfe at the feete of Sosius, humbly desired pardon: but he was iniuriously reiected, and being strongly bound, sent to Marke Anthonie at Antioche, where, at the request of Herod, he was slaine.

Antigonus ſent to Antioche, & there ſlaine by Herodes inſtigation.

In this Militarie furie and combustion, Herod had worke enough to do, to hinder the Romaines, from entring into the most secret place of the Temple, to robbe and carry thence the sacred treasures. Moreouer, hee was glad to promise an infinite summe of mony, to obtaine such fauour, that the goods of the Citizens might not bee imbezeled, and borne away by the Souldiours. And in this troublesome tempest, we will giue conclusion to this Chapter; because we enter now into the reigne of Herode, and are to speake of matters concerning those times.

The furie of Souldiers is very eaſily induced to robberie and ſacrilege.

CHAP. XIIII.

How Herode, after all these tumultuous troubles and molestations, attained to the sole Gouernement of the Kingdome of Iudea.

At what time the reigne of King Herode beganne.

AFter that the Cittie was taken in this manner, and Antigonus (the last King of the Asmoneans) slaine: Herode enioyed the Kingdome of Iudea, three and thirtie yeares before the Natiuity of Christ. Hauing taken order for the Realmes affaires, hee cruelly murdered all those great Lords, that had ioyned themselues with Antigonus against him. And seeing that hee had consumed and wasted all his goods, as also those of his kinred and friends, in gifts and charges of the warre; by an especiall Edict, he compelled the Citizens, to bring all their Iewells of gold and siluer to the kings castell, and all such money as they had beside. He appoynted likewise Guardes at the gates, to search all such as passed in or out: yea, such as carried the dead to buriall, fearing lest (in any manner) they should conuey thence coine, or any precious thing whatsoeuer.

Herods cruell exaction for money vpon the people.

At this time happened a famine, in regarde of the seuenth yeare of rest, wherein it was not lawfull to sowe the grounds. And in the former yeares past, the fields remayned (in many places) vntilled, by reason of the continuall ciuile warres. So that the estate of the Cittie was very miserable, being fallen into woful seruitude; whereof the better sort of people, as Simeon, Zachary, Ioseph and some such other tooke part: who neuertheless, in these sad spectacles and miserable calamities, cheared vp their drouping spirites, by hope of the Messias his comming, who should saue them. And they perceiued it to draw neare, because they obserued, that the Scepter was now wholly taken from the house of Iuda.

A great famine among the people.

Hope of the comming of the Meſſias, a great conſolation to the faithfull.

Herode standing in feare of the displeased people, by his horrible rapines and cruelties: to appease and quiet them, repealed repealed (by his letters) from baniſhment Hyrcanus the ſecond, who liued then in Babylon, becauſe he had maried the daughter of his daughter, and ſent preſents to the king of Parthia, for the ranſome of his captiuitie. When he was come to Ieruſalem; hee did not make him ſoueraigne Sacrificer, becauſe hee was mutilate or imperfect: but in recompence thereof, beſtowed great honours vpon him, ſo that in publique aſſemblies, he cauſed him to ſit in the higheſt roome. At the ſame time he ſubſtituted (in ſtead of Antigonus in the High-prieſthood) another Iew come from Babylon, named Ananelus, a matter greatly offenſiue to him and the people. Which Herode perceiuing, hee depoſed Ananelus, and placed in his ſtead Ariſtobulus, brother to his wife Mariana: whom hee cauſed to die by deteſtable fraude a yeare after, rendering the High-prieſt-hoode to the ſayd Ananelus againe. Whereupon, Alexandra accuſed him of this crime to Cleopatra, and he being appealed by Anthony to Laodicea, to render an account for this imputation; rather pacified him by golden gifts, then any vaine and vnaudible excuſes.

Hyrcanus recalled from baniſhment by Herode, & highly honored.

Ananelus depoſed, and Ariſtobulus made high-prieſt.

The warre at * Actium being now on foote, as Auguſtus and Anthony prepared themſelues, to contend who ſhould remaine the maſter: Herode conueyed himſelfe to Anthony, and voluntarily made him offer, of whatſoeuer he could doe againſt Auguſtus, hauing forces in readines for him. But Anthony made him anſwere, that he had not any neede of ſuch ſuccour; giuing him charge (by the perſwaſion of Cleopatra) to make warre on the Arabes, who would not pay the annuall penſion of two hundred Talents, whereof, he had made promiſe to Cleopatra. At the very entrance into this war, he ouerthrew the Arabes in one day: but Fortune afterward changing her fauour, hee loſt (well-neare) all his armie, and was taken likewiſe in the field.

* Towne and Promontorie of Epire, where Auguſtus, after hee had conquered Anthony and Cleopatra built the citie Nicopolis.

Fortune both fauourable and aduerſe to Herode.

Beſide this calamity of the Iewes, a ſudden Earthquake happened, which ſlew aboue ten thouſand perſons in Iudea: euen when the Armies by Sea of Auguſtus and Anthony, encountred together at Actium, in the ſeuenth yeare of Herods reigne. Hee hauing (ſo well as he could) vnited his forces together againe; repulſed the Arabes, and compelled them to returne home into their countrey: which otherwiſe had conuerted to the Iewes heauier calamitie, becauſe they (encouraged by their wofull miſeries) put all to fire and ſword throughout Iudea. And this earthquake, as alſo the inrodes of the enemie were followed by a dreadfull peſtilence: which made lamentable ſpoyle and hauocke, both in the fields and cities, and likewiſe in the Kings campe.

An earthquake, which killed many people in Iudea.

One miſerie following in the necke of another.

After theſe apparent and publique calamities, meeting together in ſuch grieuous manner; Herode fell into a great perſonall danger. For, after the day at Actium, wherein Anthony (the chiefeſt friend to Herode) was foyled, and dying thereupon: Herode was in no meane diſmay, for feare of Auguſtus the Conquerour; and the people well perceiued his feare, becauſe hee knew not how to determine of himſelfe. Whereupon, ſome of the people (vnable to endure this dominion of a ſtranger) beganne to exalt their ſpirits, vnder hope of ſome ſudden nouelty, and ioyed at the danger wherein Herode was. Aboue all the reſt, his mother in law Alexandra (imagining the time to be now come, wherein ſhee might reuenge the death of her ſonne, and retreate the kingdome againe to her own family) ſolicited very ſtrong and firmely her father Hyrcanus (now very aged and decrepite, and one that alwayes affected quietneſſe) in regarde of his many iniuries; to flie into Arabia, to the end, that if Herode were ill entreated by Auguſtus; he might the eaſier inuade the kingdome, beeing aſſiſted by the Arabes.

Herode loſt Mark Anthony his beſt friend.

Herode in great feare of Auguſtus.

The proceeding of Alexandra againſt her ſonne in law Herode.

Doſitheus, a moſt diſloyall ſeruant, deliuered the Letters (intended for this purpoſe, and ſent by him to the King of Arabia) to King Herode: who deſiring to bee more fully informed in the fact, ſent Doſitheus into Arabia with the Letters, and after hee had receyued anſwere from the King, concerning the Letters ſent vnto him: he cauſed Hyrcanus to be condemned, by the ſentence of Iuſtice as a traytour, and ſo put to death. Some others write, that Herod, fearing the peril wherein hee ſawe himſelfe to be fallen, and the multitude of the Iewes (of whom he was deadly hated) might eaſily be moued by ſuch an occaſion, to transferre the Kingdome to Hyrcanus, who onely remayned of the Aſmoneans race: impoſed a falſe crime crime vpon him, and preuayled ſo well by counterfeited letters, that the good olde man was condemned to death.

All her hope fruſtrated by Doſitheus an vnfaithfull ſeruant.

Hyrcanus condemned and executed as a traytour, by the cunning treacherie of Herod.

This being done, hee ſent his mother, his ſiſter, their other kinred, and all their attendants, as alſo his brother Pheroras, to a ſtrong munited Cittie in Idumea, called Maſſada. But withdrew his mother in lawe Alexandra, and his wife Mariana (who hee thought could not well agree with the other women) to another Fort, named Alexandrion; giuing the charge of them to Ioſippus, Generall for the finances of the kingdome, and to Soemus his moſt certaine and ſingular friends. And this truſt alſo he impoſed on them, that if Auguſtus offered any ill to him: they ſhould kill the two women inſtantly, and conſerue (ſo much as in them poſſibly lay) the kingdome for his ſonnes, vntill they were come to age, by the aſſiſtance of his brother Pheroras.

Alexandra and Mariana ſent to the fort Alexandrion, and his intent for the

These matters being thus ordered and appoynted, he trauelled on to Auguſtus, who then heard all Ambaſſadours in the Iſle of Rhodes, where, leauing off his diademe and kingly roabes, keeping all the reſt of royall liberty, as truſting in his cauſe and the Emperours clemencie; he confeſſed, that hee had beene a friend to Marke Anthony, and would haue ſent him ſuccour, if he had required it; but that he was diuinely withdrawne from his company (in how miſerable condition ſoeuer) by the warre which hee then made vpon the Arabes. Wherein he had ſuſtained ſo many loſſes and misfortunes, that he was ſufficiently puniſhed for his friendſhip to Anthony, and for the ſeruices he had done vnto him. But if now it pleaſed Auguſtus to experiment his faithfulneſſe; hee would make it apparent vnto him, by as true ſeruices.

The coming of Herode to Auguſtus, and the voluntary confeſſion he made before him.

Auguſtus tooke ſuch delight in the magnanimous confeſſion of Herode, that hee embraced him amiably, reſtoring him to his Crowne, and aſſuring him, to expect as many kinde beneuolences from him, as euer hee had receiued by Marke Anthony.

In what gracious and honorable manner Auguſtus vſed Herode.

Herode finding Auguſtus ſo gracious, tooke courage from the former deſpayre wherein hee was, aſſuring now the poſſeſſion of his Kingdome the more firmely to him. Wherefore hee exceeded his abilitie in gifts to Auguſtus, as alſo to his friends and the Army. Hee bare the Emperour company beſide, at his ſayling into Egypt; and when he came into Syria: hee receyued him with entertainement more then royall, hauing borrowed all neceſſarie prouiſion, throughout all the parts of Iudea.

Herods bountie to Auguſtus, farre beyond his power & ability.

Auguſtus finding ſo many great reſpects, meerely flowing from Herode; reſtored that part of Iudea to him, which Anthonie had giuen to Cleopatra: adding thereto likewiſe Samaria, and other Cities on the Sea-coaſtes, whereby the wealth of his kingdome was greatly augmented.

Auguſtus enlarged the power and authoritie of Herode.

Herode hauing mette with all this happineſſe and felicitie abroad, at his returne home into Iudea, found all things there very bitter and troubleſome, by priuate and domeſticke hatreds. For, his wife Mariana had already gotten intelligence (two ſeuerall times) by the Guardes, that they had charge to kill her and her mother; if eyther Anthony before hand, or Auguſtus now in this doubtfull time, diſpoſed otherwiſe then well of him. Wherupon, at their meeting, Mariana by no meanes would come neare him, notwithſtanding all the flatteries or ſignes of ardent loue hee ſhewed to her: reproouing him for ſuch cruell commaunds, and plainely telling him, that they were no teſtimonies of a true husband. Herode entred into ſuſpition, that it was not poſſible for him to be diſcloſed, or his ſecrets knowne to the Guardes: but eyther it muſt be by Ioſippus, or laſtly, by Soemus, wherefore he grew very chollericke, and ſtudied how to taxe and puniſh her for adultery. And yet ſuch was the power of his loue, that he could not credite all that he ſuſpected, neyther exerciſe any crueltie againſt ſo faire a woman, of great Nobilitie, endowed with all graces belonging to a body of ſuch ſingularitie.

Mariana informed of Herodes intention by the Guardes.

Herodes ſuſpition of his ſecrets diſcloſing, and practiſing againſt his wife.

At length, his ſiſter Salome remooued all theſe hinderances in him, and prouoked him on to an execrable execution; for, finding apt occaſion to reuenge her owne contempt, ſhe kindled a fierce fire in him of ſuſpition, namely, in the matter of adulterie, adding withall, an intent of poyſon prepared for him, which ſhee approoued to the King, by teſtimonie of his owne Taſter or Cup-bearer, whome ſhe had wonne thereto by liberall gifts of money.

money. Hereupon, the King grew outragiously incensed against her; and hauing caused her to be condemned by the sentence of his friends; commaunded her to be immediatly executed, although she had beene the mother to him of fiue children. But soone after hee repented his vnaduised rashnesse, and so extreamely desired his wifes company agayne; that he fell into an extraordinary languishing, shunning all societie whatsoeuer. And, vnder colour of riding on hunting, hee would secretly steale into Caues and Dennes in the forrest, as hoping there to finde some asswaging of his sorrow; and being vnable to withstand the extremitie of melancholie, hee fell into a deadly disease.

A grieuous pestilence in Iudea, King Herode himselfe lying deadly sicke in Samaria.

At the same time, there was a great plague or pestilence in Iudea, whereby multitudes of people were consumed: so that many men were perswaded verily, that God had sent this punishment for the Kings cruelties. And as the King himselfe lay extreamly sick in Samaria, where euery one was in mightie despaire of his life: Alexandra (his mother in law) stroue by large promises, to winne the Guardes of the Temple and Cittie to partake with her. But the conspiracie being reuealed, Herode gaue order for her suidden execution. The King then seemed outwardly to be somewhat recouered, but yet carryed himselfe most cruelly against those friends, that were of greatest familiaritie with him; because his sickenesse (howeuer shaddowed) encreased daily impatience, which made him the more inclined to all vilenesse and tyrannie.

The death of Alexandra.

Herode cruel to his familiar friends.

When he perceiued, that there remained not any one of the Asmoneans Family, or of any other side, to interrupt him in his power, onely the multitude excepted; hee grew to such assurance of himselfe, that he did many things repugnant to the lawes of God, and the customes receiued by the Iewes. For, in the Citie of Ierusalem it selfe, he builded a Theater and an Amphitheater, wherein were perfourmed foule and dissolute playes, huntings, and combates of Fencers, according to the maner of the Pagans. He instituted also (at euery fiue yeares end) a Ioust and Tournament, in the honour of Augustus, proposing there publiquely the Cæsars Images, and the Victories obtayned by them. But vnderstanding, that the people were greatly offended with these vn-vsuall things, prohibited by the Lawes of God, and prouoking many to practise his killing, as also conspiring meanes whereby to effect it: he fortified diuers places very respectiuely, against all ambushes and seditions; as Alexandrion, Herodion, Hyrcanion, and others, and planted strong garrisons in the most commodious places.

Theaters erected in Ierusalem for lewd and dissolute sportes.

Fortifications of Herode, standing in feare of his life.

He builded also newly (or else magnificently repayred) diuerse Citties and Townes, which he stiled by the names of Emperours, or of his friends: the principall whereof was the Tower of Straton on the Sea side, which hee called Cæsarea: and Samaria, distant a dayes iorney from Ierusalem, which he called Sebasta, that is to say, Augustus, according to the Emperours name. Also, he repayred Athedon, which he called Agrippion, of Agrippa, the kinseman to Cæsar. Hee builded Antipatrida, by the name of his father, in the field of Capharsalania. Also Phaselida, by the name of his brother, neare to Iericho: and Herodion, by his owne name, on the Marches of Arabia.

In the thirteenth yeare of his reigne, there happened a great dearth throughout the Land, by reason of an extraordinary drought; which was the cause, that a great famine did accompany the preceeding mortalitie of men and beasts: during which time, Herod caused diligent search for corne, & brought great quantities out of Egypt, and other neighbouring Regions beside, which he distributed (by the poule) to the people. But, because money grew short for such a distribution, in regarde that the royall treasure had bene wasted, about those sumptuous and excessiue buildings; hee employed all his vessells of golde and siluer, and all his Iewells besides, in the buying of corne. By which bounteous liberality, hee not onely redeemed the losse of his credite, by the offences done to his people, but also drew great fauour and affection from them.

A wonderfull famine, together with the pestilence of men & beasts

Herode spent all his Plate and Iewells for buying corne to feed the people.

In the seuenteenth yeare of his reigne, Augustus comming into Syria, gaue the Kingdome of Chalcis to Herode; adding also thereto Drachonitis*, and Batanea*. Moreouer, he gaue him power, in this his long sickenesse, to appoynr and leaue which which of his ſonnes he pleaſed, to be his heire and ſucceſſour. In recompence of which large bountie, Herode dedicated a goodly Temple to Auguſtus, which hee builded in Paneada, neare to the ſourſes that feede the riuer Iordane. Which Pagan flattery of his, eſtranged agayne the multitude of the Iewes from him; and therefore to pleaſe them, hee quitted the third part of their taxations. Notwithſtanding, as he could not containe ſome of them, crying out inceſſantly, that it was intolerable, to erect temples to mortall men in Iudea, and there to reuerence them as Gods: ſo hee ſought to reſtraine other by violent torments, ſending Spies and Picke-thankes into publique and priuate Aſſemblies, who reported vnto the King whatſoeuer was ſpoken of him. It is further reported of him, that himſelfe (ſickely as hee was) in a common habite or diſguiſe, would often walke abroade in the night time, liſtening in ſuch companies as conferred together, to know what they ſaid, concerning the preſent eſtate of the kingdome.

A Temple dedicated to Auguſtus.

Spies and Intelligencers appoynted to ſift the people what ſpeeches were vſed of him.

At length, finding neither loue nor fidelitie in the people, hee ſtroue to binde them faſt to him by oath; wherein hee preuayled, attracting ſome by large and goodly promiſes, to giue him their oath of Allegeance and Loyaltie: others hee conſtrained by feare of torments, putting ſome to death in diuers kindes, that peremptorily refuſed to ſweare. Onelie the Phariſes ſtoode excepted, whom hee pardoned, in loue to a few aged men, that hee reuerenced for their ſanctitie of life, and which made them deare to the people. Neuertheleſſe, he condemned them in great fines and amercements, which were payed by the wife of Pheroras, to binde that Sect in loue to her. He quitted alſo the Eſſeans from taking the Oath, holding them in no meane admiration: as following a manner of liuing moſt holily, and farre exceeding humane nature; beeing ſingular in fore-telling things to come.

The Eſſeans alſo diſcharged of the oathe.

In the eighteenth yeare of his reigne, beeing deſirous to vnite his ſubiects to him by farre greater benefites, and to aboliſh the remembrance of his precedent exceſſes: hee vndertooke to builde the Temple of Ieruſalem moſt magnificently, the former building (if heerein wee may beleeue Ioſephus) beeing vtterly beaten downe, which building had continued fiue hundred yeares, after the returne from Babylon. This worke, admirable in greatneſſe, ſumptuouſneſſe and cunning, was finiſhed in eight yeares, and dedicated with great ſolemnitie: wherein hee gaue three hundred Oxen for the Sacrifices, ſeauen yeares before the Natiuitie of Chriſt.

The Temple of Ieruſalem newly builded by King Herode.

Afterward, the Diſciples declared the magnificence of the building. And, as Chriſt fore-tolde, after that the Temple had continued about foure-ſcore yeares; it was vtterly ruined by the Romanes, from the top to the bottome.

Matth. 24. 1. Marke 13. 1 Luke 21. 5.

The building of the Temple being ended, he would needs be carried to Rome, to ſalute the Emperour Auguſtus: From thence hee brought with him his ſonnes Alexander and Ariſtobulus, whom he had by his murdered Mariana, and had ſent them tenne yeares before to Rome, to be brought vp in the houſe of Aſinius Pollio. And the reaſon of his bringing them thence into Iudea, was, to quicken and cheare their hopes; that they were to ſucceede him in the kingdome. And firſt of all, he beſtowed wiues on them; giuing to Alexander, Glaphira, daughter to Archalaus, King of Cappadocia; and to Ariſtobulus, Berenice, daughter to his ſiſter Salome.

Theſe yoong Lords and Ladies, were very gracefull both in minde and bodie, which made them the more choicely affected of the people. But Salome, and ſome other (who had induced Herode to murder his wife, fearing if they ſhould come to the Crowne, they would reuenge the death of their mother) laboured, by little and little, to kindle hatred in Herode againſt them, deliuering aſperſions abroade; that they diſdayned their fathers company, becauſe he had put their mother to death.

They that haue once dealt in blod, are alwayes ſuſpitious of themſelues.

Herode growing into health, by weake degrees, and theſe wicked deuices proceeding on; newes came, that Agrippa (neare kinſeman to Auguſtus) was arriued in Aſia, and Herode iourneying to meete him, quickely perſwaded him to viſite Iudea. Hauing giuen him there moſt honourable entertainement, and ſhewne him the munitions and other buildings; he returned to his Campe, making king great haſte in going thither. The winter being ouer-paſt, Herode followed him, when he croſſed to Pontus his armie by ſea, and kept him company during the time of that expedition. Returning ſoon after to his owne home, hee found all in diſorder, by domeſticke hatreds purpoſely prepared. For his ſiſter Salome, and his brother Pheroras, immediately accuſed Alexander and Ariſtobulus (beeing the ſonnes of Mariana) affirming, that they had openly complayned on the vniuſt death of their mother, and threatened to be reuenged for it. Heereto they added, that winning the Vulgars fauour without any diſſimulation; they had prepared a traine for their auncient father: truſting to the power of Archelaus, father in lawe to one of them, and to the friendſhip of the Romaines on the other ſide, which they had long both wrought to this intent, with the very mightieſt in the Court of Auguſtus.

False accuſations impoſed on Alexander and Ariſtobulus, by Salome and Pheroras.

Herod enduring continually any thing, much rather then the leaſt ſuſpition of vndermining his kingdome; became amazed mightily at theſe allegations, appoynted ſome of his intimate friends, to be preſent at banquets, and other familiar conferences with his ſonnes, to be the better aſſured of their words & attempts: When (perchaunce) the yoong Lords (neither proiecting or ſuſpecting any ill) might vtter ſome one word more liberally then other (being thereto prouoked by croſſe language in the vrgers) purpoſly deliuered forth, to draw ſomewhat from them, in extolling the nobilitie and vertue of their Mother, which is the bounden duty of any childe to doe. But this ſerued the turne ſufficiently, for Herode to credite, that whatſoeuer his ſiſter had reported, was true. Firſt of all therefore, he reprehended them very ſeuerely; next, to induce their better modeſty and reuerence to their father, by feare and iealouſie; he beganne to countenance, and carefully reſpect his ſonne Antipater, (who was borne of Doris, when ſhe liued a perſon of priuate condition) that they might thereby gather his intention, for making him to bee his ſucceſſour in the kingdome.

Herode layes traines to entrap his innocent ſonnes vpon the treacherous ſpeeches of his brother and ſiſter.

This did more vehemently diſtaſte the yoong Lords, and made them now to complaine more bitterly of their father, as alſo of their owne vnhappineſſe and ill vſage; all which behauiour in them, was imparted to their father by the afore-ſayd intelligencing ſpies. Beſide, Salome compelled her daughter Berenice (by frequent iniuries incited betweene her and her huſband) to diſcloſe what ſecrets paſſed betweene the two brothers, and what priuate conferences they had together. All which ſhe made in much greater manner to the King, then they were indeed, onely by hir vile additions, and falſifications, incenſing him ſtill ſo extreamely againſt them, that he tooke them both with him to Rome, and accuſed them of treaſon before Auguſtus.

A mother worketh a daughter againſt the life of her owne husband.

There, after the infortunate Gentlemen had made ſatisfaction to Auguſtus and ſome other Iudges, by euident purgations, teares and intreaties, they were reconciled again into their fathers grace, and returned home with him to Iudea: where the Multitude beeing met together, he declared before them the cauſe of his iourney, and to what happie ſucceſſe it had ſorted. Adding withall, that (by the liking of Auguſtus) Antipater was next to ſucceede after his death, as being his eldeſt ſonne; and then afterward, Alexander and Ariſtobulus ſhould enioy their right, in reigning each after other; all which hee reported to the people in a long diſcourſe, which we haue formerly related in our Militarie Orations.

Auguſtus reconciled the ſons to their father.

From this time forward, Antipater inſiſted the more audaciouſly, in whetting the fathers ſpleene againſt his brethren, by falſe, forged and crafty calumniations; beſide diuers other reports of nouelties, meerely deuiſed for the purpoſe. He being highly diſpleaſed, that they ſhould haue any title or claime at all to the kingdome: as fretting extreamely, that their credite held more ſpecially with the people then theirs did, for the mothers ſake of whome they came. In briefe, he neuer ceaſſed, till (by the helpe of Pheroras and Salome) till he had perſwaded his father, that his two ſonnes Alexander and Ariſtobulus, were growne prowde vpon their reconciliation, and practiſed (inſtantly) to poſſeſſe themſelues of the Kingdome. Herode beeing further informed of thoſe accuſations, by ſuch as were employed for the purpoſe; by racking, torturing and other cruelties, put to death many of his his owne friends, and of his Sonnes. And yet no other harme could bee approoued againſt them, but onely youthfull and vnaduiſed complaints, of exceſſiue cruelty in their father; and his oureaſie facilitie, in lending eare to falſe reports, only through the deteſtable impietie of their brother Antipater, and them of his linage.

The two brethren accuſed againe by letters to Auguſtus.

Herode impatient at ſo many ſuſpitions, and fiered hourely with the diuells of his houſe, Salome, Antipater and their complices: once more, by his letters ſent to Auguſtus, he flatly accuſed Alexander and Ariſtobulus of treaſon. Now, becauſe Auguſtus had giuen him permiſſion, to puniſh his ſonnes according to the exigence of their crimes: hee accuſed them before Saturninus and Volumnius, Gouernours of Syria, and other Romaine Cittizens his friends there preſent, whom he had cauſed to come from Iudea to Beritha, a Cittie of Syria. After that they were condemned by pluralitie of voyces, he ſent them to be ſtrangled in Sebaſta: where likewiſe were executed three hundred perſons more, who were ſaid to giue conſent, to an imaginarie flight impoſed vpon the two innocent Princes. Ariſtobulus at his death left three ſonnes and twoo daughters, which hee had by his wife Berenice; and Alexander two ſonnes by Glaphyra, beſides ſome daughters, whereof we will ſpeake in their due place and time.

Herode murdered his two ſonnes & 300 perſons beſide.

The iſſue of Alexander and Ariſtobulus.

From this time forward, Herode beganne to be very vnfortunate, becauſe all his Court was troubled with bitter hatreds, diſdaines, ſuſpitions and treaſons: ſo that Antipater (compacting with Pheroras and ſome other Courtiers) determined to kill the King his father. And as hee was plotting priuily, how he might be called to Rome by Auguſtus, for better ſtrengthening himſelfe with the Emperours power, and winning friends in his Court by gifts: it came to paſſe that Pheroras dyed, whoſe wife was accuſed before Herode by ſome of her owne friends, to haue poyſoned her husband. Herode making inquiſition after this offence by tortures, chaunced (by little and little) to come to the knowledge of farre greater crimes, and the treaſons of his ſonne Antipater plainely appeared.

Antipater conſpired the death of his father.

Pheroras poiſoned by his wife.

Heereupon, the King being extreamly enraged, ſpared not any of his Court from torturing cruelly; no not ſo much as the women and their daughters, very neare in loue and kinred to him, if hee could ſuſpect them in the very leaſt manner. And as hee ſtroue to informe himſelfe, by all his beſt and diligent meanes, ſo much the more hee grew to be hated of all his followers, ſo that (conſequently) he became worſe then miſerable.

Herod torturerh his courtiers cruelly.

Onely his Siſter Salome, was faithfull to him, who compaſſed the meanes by craftie Spies, to finde out the plots of all the Conſpiratours, which ſhee ſtill reuealing to her brother, enflamed his fury extraordinarily: making him to diſtruſt them that were moſt familiar with him, by forged tales and faithleſſe ſuſpitions. So that Herode accuſed Antipater (who was taken with the poyſon readily prepared for his father) before Quintilius Varus (who was ſlayne by Arminius Cheruſchus in Germanie, twelue yeres after with Legions) and beeing conuicted of the ſinne of parricide, and condemned; hee commaunded him to bee kept priſoner, vntill by Letters and Ambaſſadours, hee vnderſtoode the will and pleaſure of Auguſtus, concerning his puniſhment.

Salome only conſtant to her brother Herode.

Antipater taken with poyſon prepared for his father.

In the meane while, hee executed many, both men and women, as beeing conſenting to Antipaters attempts: amongſt whome were diuerſe innocents, wrongfully accuſed by malicious enemies, and meerely ſwallowed vp in Herodes furie, as in the roaring billowes of the Sea.

Mallice will hardly want matter to worke on.

Soone after, beeing about the age of ſeauentie yeares, quaſht and confounded with domeſticke calamities: his former ſickneſſe grew now to farre greater violence vpon him, which made him ten times more cruell towards his ſubiects. For now hee was verily perſwaded, that the Iewes reioyced as much at his homebred miſeries, as they did at the extreamitie of his diſeaſe. Wherefore hee deuiſed very cruell puniſhments, for matters of ſilly or ſmall offence: for hee burned aliue fortie yoong Schollers, of the very chiefeſt houſes in Iudea, with two Maiſters that were excellent men: becauſe (being mooued with iuſt griefe, to ſee the Temple of God prophaned) they had ouerthrowne (ſomewhat violently) an Eagle of golde, placed in the Portall of the Temple, and in the honor of Cæsar; a thing very costly and magnificent, but contrary to the customes of the Iewish nation. The monstrous crueltie inflicted vpon these yoong men, was the cause of great troubles in the Cittie, after Herodes death.

Forty schollers and their maisters burned aliue.

Hee exercised also other great cruelties, amongst which, Philo the Iew recordeth, that in the thirtieth yeare of his tyrannicall reigne, he slew the Sanhedrin: to wit, the ordinary Iudges of the house of Dauid, and substituted other (newly conuerted to Iudaisme, or skilfull in the Lawe) in their stead. Moreouer, he slew the husband of his sister Salome, who was of the Tribe or Linage of Iuda, and a Sonne, which hee himselfe begate of a woman of the same Tribe; becausse hee had sayd, that Christ our Sauiour was already borne, who was promised in the Lawe, and by the Prophets, to be of the house of Dauid.

Sanhedrin the auncient Iudges of Iudea slayne.

The husband of Salome slaine.

Also Saint Matthew the Euangelist, in the second chapter and sixeteenth verse, maketh mention of an other notable example of his crueltie, where he writeth, that being aduertised by the wise men of Persia, that the Messias was borne; hee gaue strict commaund, that all the masle Children should bee murdered, in the Towne of Bethlehem, and all the villages round about.

The murdering of the yoong infants in Bethlehem and other places.

Macrobius is a witnesse of this most inhumane act, who recounteth (among the witty conceits of Augustus) that hearing report of the Infants slaughter, from two yeares olde and vnder, caussed by Herode to be done in Syria, and his owne sonne, being also slayne among them, hee sayd: That he had much rather be Herodes Hogge, then his Sonne.

A witty saying of Augustus.

Moreouer, feeling his entrailes to rot and putrifie, his bloud and flesh boyling, and vermine creeping all ouer his bodie, despayring of liuing any longer: by Edict, he assembled the chiefest of the Iews, such as excelled the rest in wisedome, wealth and authoritie; causing them to come from all parts of the Kingdome to Iericho.

A most horrible intention in King Herode.

Beeing there arriued vpon his commaund, they were shut vppe in the place appointed for Triumphs, as if hee purposed to conferre with them before his death, of some important matter concerning the State of the Kingdome. But hee gaue charge to his sister Salome, and to her husband Alexas, that so soone as hee had giuen vp the Ghost: they should dispatch the liues of the mightiest Iewes by the Archers of his Guarde, coueting by this meanes, to make a wofull lamentation amongest the Iewes, who else would reioyce at theyr Kings miserable end.

A commaund more then barbarous, & ill beseeming the houre of death.

Besides, that they should thus keepe (without any manner of impeachment) the possession of the Kingdome for his sonnes, when they of greatest power were dead and gone.

Now, albeit Salome, and her husband made promise to the King, for the execution of his bloudy will: yet after his death, and before they made any declaration thereof, they let loose all the Iewes, without offering them the least iniury, accounting it to be neyther safe for them, nor the children of Herod, to obey such a barbarous and inhumane iniunction.

The Iewes released without any harm done to them

A little before his death, the Ambassadours which returned from Italy, did bring him Letters from Augustus, whereby hee gaue him power ouer his Sonne Antipater, eyther for life or death. But the rage of the Father was now somewhat cooler, wherefore hee commaunded, that his Sonne should be brought to Iericho; but yet to keepe him still in bands.

Herode receiued letters from Augustus before his death.

It fortuned, that Herod (liuing in such horrible and extreame torments, with stincking putrifaction of his body:) sodainely caught a knife, and sought for the fittest place to ridde himselfe out of those paines.

Herod intended desperatly to kill himselfe.

But Archelaus, one of his kinsemen, and other seruants (beeing by) hindered his violent intent of murdering himselfe: whereuppon, a great tumult and out-cry ranne throughout the whole Pallace; euen as if the King had beene dead. Antipater being prisoner, and vnderstanding, why these cries came thus from euery place: beganne to be very iocund and mirthfull, euen as if his father were dead indeede, and would haue induced the Guardes to let him haue liberty, vpon very liberall promises he made to them.

Antipater seeketh to corrupt his keepers.

But he that had the especiall charge of him, fearing the crueltie of the King, went to to see whether he was dead or no: reporting to him his sonnes merry disposition, and the matter which he had so earnestly mooued him vnto.

Antipater secretly slaine in prison.

Herode mightily offended at these tydings, commaunded, that (without any delay) his son Antipater should be slayne in prison. Which beeing done, himselfe liued but fiue dayes after his sonne. So that, what with the violence of his sickenesse, encreasing the torments of his soule, he died: hauing reigned foure and thirtie yeares after the surprizall of Ierusalem; and seauen and thirtie yeares after the Romaines had proclaimed him King. A man equally cuell to all men: from base and lowe degree, exalted to eminent place of honour, by industrie, bountie and friendship: very happy abroade, vnfortunate amongst his owne, and hated (both of his subiects and domesticks) for his crueltie.

The shamefull and ignominious death of Herode.

Three special aduersaries with whom hee had to deale principally.

All the time of his gouernement, hee had contention and quarrell principally with three aduersaries. First of all, against the Family of the Asmoneans, which hee stroue vtterly to extirpate by all his policies. Secondly, against the Iewish people, who could not endure the dominion of a stranger: and although they kicked continually against him, yet finally they were charged with a hard yoake of seruitude. The third aduersarie; more troublesome and difficult then both the rest, was his owne household people. For, as hee slew one part of them (beeing no way guilty or offensiue towardes him) by listening to false reportes of the enuious, and according to his owne suspitions, still to support his greedie desire of rule: so did he punish others taken in the fact, who indeede conspired against him, vntill such time, as beeing more broken and battered by his domesticke encumbrances, then by extreamitie of age; he payed the tribute due to Nature. Philo the Iew writeth, that hee reigned sixe yeares lawfully, and one and thirty yeares tyrannically.

A Tyrant is alwayes suspitious, & hardly trusteth any man but himselfe.

The natiuitie of our Lord and Sauiour Iesus Christ in Bethlehem

In the three and thirtie yeare of his reigne (as it is auouched by Epiphanius) vnder the first description of the World: Iesus Christ, our blessed Sauiour and Redeemer, was borne in Bethlehem of the Virgine Mary. At the age of two yeares, by the Angelles admonition, hee was with-drawne from the crueltie of this wretch, by his father and mother, who fled with him into Egypt. Afterwardes, hee was brought backe againe into Iudea, at the beginning of the Primacie of Archelaus.

The testament of Herode changed by himself three seueral times.

Herode altered his Will three seuerall times: The first chaunge was, after hee had put to death his two sonnes by Mariana the Asmonean, and then hee sent it by the hands of Antipater (hee going to Rome) to Augustus. That Will confirmed as his heire in the Kingdome, Antipater, his eldest sonne by Doris: but yet with this condition, that if he dyed before the time, his sonne Herode, whome hee had by the daughter of Simon the high-priest, should succeede him. To whom (vpon this occasion) according to the opinion of Iosephus, hee had giuen in marriage Herodias, the daughter to Aristobulus, sonne of Mariana the Asmonean.

Ioseph in Ant. Iudai. 4. ca. 10

After the death of Pheroras, brother to Herode, the treasons began to be discouered, and the King beeing informed, that the Mother of Herode, his destinated successour (and daughter to the Soueraigne Sacrificer) had consented in wicked councell with Antipater: hee razed the names both of Antipater and Herode out of his Will, frustrating them from all hope of euer comming to the Crowne.

Antipater & Herod razed out of their fathers testament, & their mothers excluded the Court.

Beside, he expulsed the two mothers, Doris and Mariana, out of the Pallace, despoyling also his father in lawe Simon, of the High-priesthoode.

The second alteration of his Wil.

In his second Testament, hee left the Kingdome to his last sonne, named Herode Antipas, and hee to succeede after his death, beeing borne of Marthaca a Samaritane. Therein hee made no mention at all of Archelaus, nor of Phillip, who were elder in yeares then hee: because, by the suggestion of Antipater, some of of his friends had falsely accused them by Letters, in the time of their studying at Rome.

A thousand talents giuen by Herode to Augustus.

By the same Testament, he left a thousand Talents to Augustus, which amounteth to three score tunnes of Golde. To Liuia the wife of Augustus, and to the children and enfranchised friends of Augustus, hee gaue fiue hundred Talents, that is to say, thirtie tunnes of golde.

Last of all, after that (a little before his death) hee had caused Antipater to bee slayne, for diuerse conspiracies against his father and brethren: he grew into good liking of his two elder sonnes, which was the reason of altering his will the third time, leauing the Kingdome of Iudea to Archelaus; prouided also, that it might bee as pleasing to Augustus.

The third and last alteration of his testament.

In stead of King, hee made Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, that is to say, of the Region scituate beyond Iordane.

Herode Antipas and Phillip made both Tetrarches.

In like manner, hee appoynted Phillip Tetrarch of Gallonitida, Traconitis, Batanea and Paneada. To his Sister Salome (who amongst all his kinred) he had onely found faithfull to him, and helpefull in all his aduersities, hee left three wealthy Citties, Iamnia, Azot and Phaselida, with fiftie thousand Crownes besides.

Herods bountie in his legacies to Augustus and other.

Hee assigned great reuenews to his other sonnes, and to their children, whom hee left in priuate condition, and augmented the Legacies which he had sent to Augustus and other at Rome. But Augustus (afterwards) distributed all the money to him appoynted to Herodes kinred; retayning nothing to himselfe, but onely certayne costly vessells, as a token of remembrance for the dead.

CHAP. XV.

A briefe Collection, concerning the children of Herode the Great, which hee had by his tenne wiues, as also the order of their seuerall successions.

Iosephus varieth from the Euangelicall historie.

I Thought it verie necessarie, heere to set downe the order and succession of Herodes children; because it doth giue great light to the Euangelicall Historie, in regarde that the Description made by Iosephus, is somewhat dissenting. Especially in Herodias, whom Iosephus sayth, to be sometime married, not to Phillip the Tetrarch, as the Euangelist Saint Mark, in the sixteenth chapter and seauenteenth verse of his Gospell auoucheth, but to Herod, sonne to the daughter of Simon the High-priest, who soone after was aduaunced, and ioyned with Herode Antipas Tetrarch of Galilee, that slew Saint Iohn Baptist.

The genealogie of Herod very great

He sayth besides, that the dauncing daughter of Herodias, was married to Phillip: But the authoritie of the Euangelists ought to be of greater weight with vs, then to that of Iosephus, who in this Genealogie of Herode, speaketh things very contrary, which is not much to bee maruelled at, in a Familie of so great extendure. For King Herode, according to the auncient manner of the Kings of Iudea, had many wiues together, in all being tenne, two whereof were barren.

Doris his first wife.

Antipater the sonne of Doris the first wife of Herod

Her he married in priuate condition, taking her from a place of slender repute, her father beeing as then liuing. Of her hee begate Antipater, whom hee dis-inherited, his mother Doris beeing diuorced, after he was married to Mariana the Asmonean: nor would hee permit her to be present in Ierusalem, but onely at three famous solemnities.

Doris receiued into grace againe and her sonne repealed.

But after that Mariana was put to death, hee receiued Doris agayne into his Court, and gaue her admittance to his bedde, re-calling home the sonne also: beeing fully resolued, to haue left him heyre to the Kingdome, if hee had not beene the cause of his owne ruine and death, by wicked machinations, contriued against his father and brethren; beside, hee brought his owne mother into the dislike of his father.

Antipater had a sonne named Antipater also.

Antipater tooke to wife the daughter of Antigonus, the last King of the Asmoneans, by whom hee had also Antipater, to whom was married the daughter of Pheroras his great vnckle. Afterward hee married Mariana, daughter vnto his brother Aristobulus, whom he caused to be murdered.

By

By his second wife Mariana the Asmonean, he had many heires, thus following in order.

Mariana,

The issue to Herode by Mariana, and their matches in marriage.

Glaphyra, daughter to Archelaus king of Cappadocia; Alexander, slaine by his father.

Herode,

The third dyed immediately.

Salome was married to Phaselus, sonne of Phaselus, brother to Herode, of whose children we haue spoken before.

Cypris was married to Antipater, the sonne of Salome, sister to the King.

Alexander,

Tygranes, who was sent by Nero King into Armenia.

Tygranes was King of Armenia, and afterward accused at Rome, dyed without issue.

The names of Aristobulus his children, by Berenice.

Aristobulus, strangled by the command of his father Herode.

Berenice his wife, daughter of Salome, sister to King Herode.

The issue of Aristobulus, and his wife Berenice.

Agrippa the first King of Iudea.

Herode the fourth King of Chalcis.

Aristobulus, to whom was espoused Iotapata, daughter to the king of the Emesians, by whom hee had Iotapata, a deafe daughter.

Herodias, who left her husband, and had a daughter Salome; who for the reward of her goodly dauncing, required, and had the head of Saint Iohn Baptist.

Mariana, affianced first to Antipater the sonne of Antipater: but afterward Antipater, sonne of great Herode, tooke her to wife.

Mariana daughter to Simeon the soueraigne Sacrificer, the third wife to Herode, of whom came.

The issue by the third wife to king Herode.

Herode the second, who had a daughter named Salome, married sometime to his vnckle Phillip the Tetrarch; and afterward to Aristobulus, sonne to Herode king of Chalcis.

Herodias his wife, yoongest daughter of Great Herode, and also the daughter of Aristobulus, slaine by his father.

HErode affecting this Mariana for her rare beauty, who was the daughter to a silly sacrificing Priest, he perceiuing that he could no otherwise enioy her, but by lawfull marriage; made her father Simeon (sonne to Boethus) High-priest, by deposing Iesus, the successour to Ananelus.

Mariana the daughter to Simeon, aduanced to the High priesthoode.

Of her hee begate Herode the second, whom he had instituted (in his first Will) second heire after Antipater his eldest sonne. But growing offended (afterward) for some fault in his mother: hee altered his Will, and depriued him of all hope of succeeding.

Herod the second depriued from succeeding in the kingdom.

Iosephus writeth, that this Herode the second (who alwayes afterward liued priuately) tooke to wife Herodias, the daughter of Aristobulus, slaine by his father; who afterward was exalted by his brother Herod Antipas, contrary to all right and reason. But (as I haue already said) this Genealogie of Iosephus agreeth not with Saint Marke, who ruleth it in this maner.

Iosephus reproued in his Genealogie.

Herode the second, borne of the High-priests daughter, liued without publique charge.

The Genealogie according to the description of Saint Marke.

His wife Herodias that left him, married with the brother to her husband.

Herode Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee.

Phillip the Tetrarch, who died without children.

The daughter Salome was married to both, each after other, and engendred by the last;

Herode, Agrippa, Aristobulus; of whom I finde nothing at all recorded.

The fourth wife of Herode was Marthaca, or Malthaca, a Samaritane; of whom were borne, Archelaus, who by the last Testament of his father, was ordayned to be his successour. But by Augustus he was instituted to be * Ethnarche.

The issue of Herode by his fourth wife.

Herode the third, called also Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee; the rauisher of Herodias, and murderer of Saint Iohn Baptist: he was called also, the Fox for Christ.

Olympia, married to Ioſippus, ſonne of Ioſippus the brother to King Herode: Of whom came this Poſteritie following:

Mariana, eſpouſed to Herod the fourth, King of Chalcis, and had a ſonne named Ariſtobulus, who (by Nero) was inſtituted Gouernor of Armenia the leſſer. He had to wife Salome, the daughter of Herodias, as formerly hath bene declared.

The iſſue of Herod by his fift wife.

The fift wife of Herode was Cleopatra of Ieruſalem, whoſe children were Phillip, who (by the laſt Teſtament of his father) was appoynted Tetrarch of Trachonitis.

Herode, of whom I finde nothing recorded in any Hiſtorie.

Ioſeph. in Antiquit. Iud. libr. 17 cap. 10.

But, conſidering that Ioſephus ſaith, that this Phillip was brother to the father and mother of Archelaus; I make ſome doubt of diuers other places before mentioned by him, where (perhaps by want of memory) he wrongeth himſelfe in the numbring of Herodes children; as in the ſecond Chapter of the ſame Booke. And that of the ſame mother Marthaca, were borne Archelaus, Phillip and Olympia: And that of this Cleopatra, iſſued only Herode, called Antipas. From whence it proceeded (as I thinke) that Ioſephus attributeth two ſonnes vnto this Cleopatra, Phillip and Herode: of whom (neuertheleſſe) he maketh not any mention in his Hiſtorie.

Ioſephus foūd contradictory to himſelfe.

I thinke then, that Antipas ſhould bee placed for Phillip vnder Cleopatra; for, becauſe he nameth Herode alſo: ſome (not very skilfull) haue attributed two ſonnes to Cleopatra: euen as if I ſhould ſay, that Iulius and Cæſar had beene two Conſulls. Aſſuredly, this coniecture ſeemeth to be confirmed, becauſe Archelaus (being vpon his departure to Rome, after the death of his father) left all the care and managing of the kingdomes affaires to Phillip, as to his neareſt and deareſt brother; and not to Antipas, whom he ought to haue preferred before Phillip, if hee had beene his germaine brother by the ſame mother. But this ſhewes it ſelfe much more euidently, in regard that Ioſephus, in the thirteenth and foureteenth Chapters of the ſame ſeuenteenth Booke, ſaith: That Archelaus iourneying to Rome, tooke along with him his mother Marthaca, who dyed there, before the ſuite (concerning the ſucceſſion) was deſcided; and that (ſoone after) Antipas followed him, who likewiſe was accompanied with his mother. It muſt needes follow then neceſſarily, that they had diuerſitie of mothers. Wherefore it ſomewhat amazeth mee, that Ioſephus repeateth in the Hiſtorie of the Iewes warres, to haue ſpoken ill in his Antiquities: to wit, that Archelaus and Antipas were brethren by one mother.

The iourney of Archelaus to Rome, after the King his fathers death, and his mother with him.

Antipas and his mother went alſo to Rome.

The ſixt wife of Herode, was Pallas, who had a ſonne named Phaſelus, of whom Ioſephus writeth nothing.

The ſeauenth wife was Phædra, who had by Herod (being then ancient) a daughter named Roxana.

The eight wife of Herode, was Elpis, by whom hee had a daughter named Salome.

Pallas, Phædra and Elpis with their iſſue by Herod

Afterward, Auguſtus married the two ſonnes of Pheroras, to theſe two ſiſters, Roxana and Salome, beeing but yoong when their father died. To whome (beſide the Legacies of their father) hee added (of his owne) in their dowrie, two hundred thouſand peeces of ſiluer mony: which ſumme, if Ioſephus doe vnderſtand Drachmaes thereby, as I imagine, it amounteth to fiue and twentie thouſand crownes of the Sunne.

The bountie of Auguſtus to the marriages of Roxana and Salome.

The ninth wife, was the daughter of his brother, whom Ioſephus nameth not.

The tenth, was his Couſine germane, vnnamed alſo.

By theſe two wiues Herode had not any children.

All this ſo great linage of Herode, failed (well-neare vtterly) within the ſpace of ſeuenty yeares, the moſt part of them liuing in priuate manner. Such as attained to gouernement of affaires, and ſucceeded in ſome ſmall portions of their fathers dignitie; were only three ſonnes of Herode, to wit, Archelaus the Ethnarch, Phillip and Antipas, Tetrarches, and two yonger ſonnes; the firſt Agrippa, King of Iudea, and Herod the fourth King of Chalcis; Agrippa the laſt, in whoſe reigne was the Iewiſh warre, and the deſtruction of Ieruſalem. I will ſpeake briefly of them all in order.

A great race vtterly expiring in a ſmal compaſſe of yeares.

Of them that ſucceeded in gouernment.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Ethnarchie of Archelaus; and the plea of him and his Brother Antipas before Augustus, for the right of Gouernment.

A commotion or mutiny, rising in the citie.

BY the last Testament of the Father (as I haue already sayd) Archelaus was appointed successor with royall power; prouided, that Augustus would be so pleased. But scarsly was the fathers body interred, when a great mutiny arose in the Citty, and he lost his peoples affection by cruelty. For some of the kindred & parents of the yong schollers that wer burned aliue, about beating down the golden Eagle, returning to the Feast at Easter, mooving the people by their teares and complaints to challenge reuenge of certaine slanderous persons, and deposition of the Soueraigne Sacrificer, whom Herode had establisshed in the ending of his dayes: Archelaus sent his Light horsemen against the people, and made a bloody slaughter, to the number of three thousand, beside diuers put to flight. After that, the tumult was for a time appeased, hee left the charge of his kingdomes affayres to his brother Phillip, and tooke his iourney to Rome, accompanied with his mother Marthaca, and some other friends, to require of Augustus the full establishment of his Fathers VVill.

A bloodie slaughter of the people made by Archelaus.

Herode Antipas goeth after his brother Archelaus to Rome, to pleade his Title to the crowne.

By the suggestion of their Aunt Salome, Herode Antipas followed after his Brother, to contend with him for succession in the kingdome before Augustus. There hee accused him of cruelty, approouing, that the Crowne should rather bee his, then any due to Archelaus; because by the second testament, he was onely ordained heyre to the Royall dignity; when his father Herode was sound both in bodie and memory. And such a VVill so made, ought to bee of farre greater respect and weight, then the last so neere his death; when both body and mind were vncapeable of sense and reason.

Soone after, fifty Ambassadours were sent from the people of Iudea to Rome, to entreate, that they might no longer bee gouerned by a King: but rather that Iudea (being reduced to the form of a Prouince) might be vnder command of the Romane Captaines (as afterward it was, but to the Iewes no great aduantage.) But if needes they must haue a King, and of Herodes posterity: they openly confessed, that they much rather affected Herode Antipas, then Archelaus, who (at his very entrance) gaue them sufficient vnderstanding, what mildnesse and moderation they should afterwardes expect in him.

A request made by the Iewes, to bee no longer gouerned by a King.

While this sute was thus in hearing, and Augustus consulted thereon, vvith some of his most intimate friends; greeuous tumults chanced to be moued; first, by Sabinus, Procurator for Cæsar in Ierusalem, and afterward in diuers other places of Iudea. For some people (of no worth) emboldned by the Kings absence; hauing gathered together certaine companies of Theeues; durst attribute vnto themselues, both the Royall dignity and Ornaments, During which time, Iudea was wonderfully wasted in manie places with fire and sword; vntill (by the vertue of Quintillius Varus, who scattered the armies of the Theeues, and hanged vppe aboue two thousand, such as were cheefe Leaders in the sedition) the danger was well ouer-blowne.

Seditions and tumults happening in Ierusalem, and other places of Iudea.

Herodes sons sent backe to Iudea againe, and the kingdome diuided into partitions.

These troubles being certified by Letters to Rome by Varus, caused Augustus (hauing ended the sute concerning the succession) to send backe the Sonnes of Herode to Iudea againe. But he had diuided the whole kingdome of Herode into two partitions: one whereof hee gaue to Archelaus, whom he named Ethnarche, which dignity he affoorded to be greater then that of Tetrarche, & yet much lesse then Royall power. Promising (neuertheless) that he would make him King, after he had made triall of his industry & moderation in this gouernment. Moreouer, hee diuided the other part into two Tetrarchies, which he gaue to the two Brethren to Herode Antipas, Galilee and Perea; the reuennewes whereof amounted to two hundred Talents, that is sixe score thousand Crownes of the Sun. But the Ethnarchie of Archelaus, which containd Idumæa, Iudea, and Samaria, valewed sixe hundred Talents in reuennewes.

The diuision of the two Tetrarchies.

Arche-

The cruel behauior of Archelaus to his subiects after his returne among them.

Archelaus being come backe into Iudea, enflamed with hatred against his subiects (by whose accusation, hee had not only lost his Kingly authority, but almost the halfe part of his gouernment) began to carry himselfe cruelly towardes them, and (for small or no causes at all) did put to death such persons, as hee imagined had desired the alteration of the State. Moreouer, he highly soyled his reputation, with marriage prohibited by the laws of God. For, at his returne from Rome, as he passed thorow Cappadocia, to visite his kinsman king Archelaus; hee found there Glaphyra (widdowed the second time) who had bene first married to Alexander that was put to death by his Father Herod with his brother Aristobulus. After his death, her Father in law Herode, sent her (with her dowry) vnto her owne father, where she was remarried to Iuba King of the Numidians; who being likewise dead, she came and liued with hir father again. Archelaus (inueigled with her beautie) tooke her to wife, notwithstanding shee had bene married to his brother Alexander, diuorcing his owne wife, named Mariana. This Glaphyra died a little before Archelaus was sent into exile, beeing affrighted with a dreame; wherein she seemed to see the ghost of her first husband, reprouing her for this wicked marriage with his brother.

Archelaus fell in loue with his brothers wife Glaphyra, & married her, contrarie to the Lawe of God.

The death of Glephyra, affrighted by a fearful dream

Finally, as he ceased not from committing extraordinary cruelties, so he chanced to be accused at Rome, by some of the principall Iewes: after he had nine yeares held the principality, from the death of his Father Herode. Whereupon, Augustus summoned him to his appearance; & after he had bene conuinced by sufficient Witnesses, hee was sent into Daulphine, where he died, without leauing any children that were knowne. His goods were confiscated to the Romaine Emperour, and the Countries of his Ethnarchie were (for a time) ruled by the Romaine Gouernors: as by Coponius, Marcus, and Annius Rufus, who gouerned the Countreyes (each of them) two years, euen vntill the death of Augustus, whose successor Tiberias, sent Valerius Gratus into Iudea. Eleuen yeares after, he sent Pontius Pilate also, who behaued himselfe cruelly in Iudea: and (amongst other notorious matters) he condemned our Lord & Saiour Iesus Christ to be hanged vpon a Crosse, in the seauenth yeare of his Gouernment, and the eighteenth of the Emperor Tyberius.

Archelaus sent for to Rome, his cõuiction and death.

Pontius Pilat sent gouernor into Iudea.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Phillip, sonne to Herod the Great, & how he gouerned in his Tetrarchie.

KIng Herod, by his last Wil and Testament, lefte his sonne Phillip Tetrarche of Traconitis, & of the neighbouring Regions beyond Iordane; euen from the Sea of Tyberias or Genezareth, to the springs of Iordane, and the foot of Mount Libanus. He gouerned this his Tetrarchy the space of seuen and thirty yeeres (with great commendation for iustice and modesty) which hee also beautified with many goodly Buildinges: For in Paneada, neere to the sourses of Iordane (where sometime his Father Herod had erected and dedicated a Temple to Augustus) he builded a Cittie, which he called Cesarea of Philippi: and another vpon the lake of Genezareth, named Bethsaida, which encreasing and growing into great wealth, he called it Iuliada, after the name of the wife to Augustus.

The large extendure of Philips Tetrarchie.

The building of Cæsarea of Philippi and Bethsaida by Philip Iuliada.

Iosephus writeth, that this Phillip tooke in marriage Salome, the daughter of Herodias, whereas Saint Marke the Euangelist, in his sixt chapter and the seauenteenth verse writeth, That the Mother Herodias was espoused vnto Phillip: and afterward being carried away, was conioyned with his Brother.

He dyed without any heyre, in the 20. yeare of Tyberius the Emperor, that is to say, two yeeres after Christ was crucified, rose from the dead againe, and the Gospell was spread abroad by the Apostles, from forth Iudea to Neighbouring Nations. His Tetrarchie was annexed (by Tyberius) to the Prouince of Syria.

At what time Philip the Tetrarch died.

CHAP.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the life and death of Herod Antipas, brother to Phillip, and Tetrarche of Samaria and Perea, &c.

THis Herode Antipas, by the ſecond Will was inſtituted ſucceſſor to his Father. But the Teſtament being altred, he was ordained Tetrarche, and had (for his partage) Samaria and Perea, which is a moſt fertile Region beyond Iordane, betweene the Lakes of Tyberias and Aſphaltida. Neuertheleſſe, being not contented with his Fathers gift, and truſting to the precedent Will; hee contended at Rome with his Brother before Auguſtus, touching the poſſeſſion of the kingdome. All which notwithſtanding, hee obtained nothing elſe but the Tetrarchie left him by his father, & then againe confirmed to him. He took firſt to wife the daughter of Aretas, King of Arabia, liuing with him more then fifteene yeares. But afterward, being called to Rome, paſſing along by Phillip the Tetrarche, or (as Ioſephus writeth) by Herode the ſecond, borne of the daughter to the high Prieſt: beeing enamoured on Herodias, daughter to his brother Ariſtobulus, hee contracted marriage with her, promiſing to repudiate his Arabian wife.

Being returned from Italy, he tooke away from his Brother, Herodias and her daughter Salome; whereat the daughter of Aretas finding her ſelfe offended (ſecretly diſguiſed) fled to her father in Arabia; whereupon enſued a lamentable war. For Aretas, purpoſing toreuenge this vniuſt diuorce of his daughter, ſent a potent Army againſt Herode; which did vtterly ouerthrow all his Forces, notwithſtanding their ſtrength and multitude in number.

This Herode Antipas, detained S. Iohn Baptiſt ſometime priſoner in the ſtrong-defenced City of Macheron (ſituated on the Marches of Perea and Arabia, neere to the lake Aſphaltida:) becauſe he hadde boldly reproued him for this inceſtuous marriage; where the Adultereſſe found the meanes (afterward) to haue his head ſmitten off. The ſame Herode laboured ſubtilty to entrap Chriſt, as he was teaching in Galilee; and afterward, when Pilate ſent him priſoner to him, hee ſent him backe againe opprobriouſly, becauſe (at his requeſt) Chriſt would not worke any miracle before him.

He likewiſe embelliſhed his Tetrarchy with faire buildinges; for (to his great charges) he builded Sephorim, a Cittie of Galilee, which he cauſed to bee called Antocratorida. He called another Iuliada, by the name of Auguſtus wife, which before was named Betharanta. After the death of Auguſtus, becauſe he had beene a kinde friend to Tyberius; he builded a new City in honour of him, neere to the Lake of Genazereeh, which he commanded to be called Tyberias. But becauſe the place was prophaned by great heapes of dead bodies there buried, ſo that (by Moyſes Lawe) it was not lawfull to dwell there, he allured ſome (by diuers commodities and immunities) to builde there, making habitations for poore people; compelling the rich and mighty, to inhabit (with their families) in this new City.

In the ſecond yeare of the Empire of Caius Caligula, when Agrippa the Brother of Herodias returned from Rome into Iudea, adorned (againſt all attempters) with the royall dignity: Herode, by the continuall iniuries of his wife, was enforced to vndertake a iourny to Rome, to entreate the royall dignity of the Emperour. For this woman (burning with ambition) ſaid it was vnſufferable, that her Brother Agrippa (being but a while before poore & beggerly, and ſo farre indebted, that hee was made ſeruile to his Creditors) ſhold now triumph with a Kingly Crowne; ſurmounting his Vnckle in power and dignity, he hauing beene to him as a nurſing Father, and adiudged (by the ſecond teſtament) worthy of the kingdome.

Antipas, prouoked by the inceſſant inſtigations of this arrogant woman, went vnto Rome with her; deſiring of the Emperor Caius, to enioy the name and dignity Royall: beſide, by manie greeuous accuſations, he practiſed to make Agrippa hatefull to the Emperor. But Agrippa (aduertiſed of his Vnckles voyage and intent) preuented him, and ſent letters before him by an intimate friend: wherein he he informed Caius, that Herode Antipas was consenting in the conspiracie of Seianus, against Tiberius, and that now (hauing close intelligence with the King of the Parthians) there was some noueltie intended against Caius. A matter easily to be coniectured, by the great preparation for Armes which Antipas made: whereby, in an instant, he could be suddenly furnished with an Army of threescore and tenne thousand able fighting men.

Herod intrapped in his own answere, and sent into perpetuall banishment at Lions in Fraunce.

Caligula, incensed by this report from his friends, demaunded of Herode, what prouision hee had in a readinesse for his Tetrarchie; Whereto hee aunswered: That he had all things fitting for a King. Whereupon Caius instantly commaunded, that hee should be carried prisoner to Lions in France, and there kept in perpetuall exile. Moreouer, by his Letters, hee gaue all his goods, with the Tetrarchie of Galilee and Perea, to Agrippa: except what apperrained in propertie to his sister Herodias, whom he reputed innocent, and for her hee would haue all to be intirely reserued, if she would returne into Iudea againe. But Herodias, thanking Caius for his liberalitie, replied: That presently she could not make any vse of this great fauour, because she held it vnreasonable, to leaue her husband in this calamitie, whom she had alwayes accompanied in his flowring prosperity, and tasted thereof very royally.

The subtile answer of Herodias to the Emperour.

Thus spake this subtile woman, as hoping thereby, that the Emperour would alter his rigorous sentence, concerning the condemnation of Herode, and that shee should not vndergoe the selfe-same censure, considering his supposall of her innocencie. But Caius (being highly displeased at her haughtie stomacke) commaunded; that being dispoyled of all her goods, shee should walke with her husband in the same nature of exile. Thus Herode was the instrument of his owne harme, by listening (ouer-lightly) to the perswasions of this ambitious woman: for, if he could haue contented himselfe with his estate, hee had longer time enioyed peaceably his dignitie of Tetrarch. But they both deserued iustly this heauie penaltie; because, beeing ioyned together by incestuous marriage, and charitably admonished in the greatnesse of their sinne: they did put to death the most innocent man Saint Iohn Baptist, vnder colour of a rash oath, pretending conscience.

CHAP. XIX.

He is alſo called Herod, in Acts 12.1.

ALitle before the death of his grand-father Herode, being as then but eight yeares olde, this Agrippa was ſent to Rome, and there nouriſhed with Druſus, the ſonne of Tyberius. Hee was greatly affected by Anthonia mother of Germanicus and Claudius the Emperour, in regarde of his mother Berenice; whom ſhe loued as if ſhe had beene her ſiſter.

Agrippa was educated at Rome with the emperors ſonne.

Being come to age, he retired into Iudea, after the death of Druſus: becauſe Tyberius expelled from his court, al them that had beene friends to his deceaſſed ſonne; as fearing leſt the ſight of them, ſhould bee the renewing of his ſorrow. But Agrippa became charged with great doubts, whereinto he had entred at Rome, after the expence of all his owne meanes. Wherfore he wandred abroad for (ſome times) with his wife Cypris, beggerly, poore, and vtterly abandoned of his friends; ſo that at length, ſhame and pinching pouertie would haue prouoked him to ſhorten his life. But his wife Cypris making humble ſupplications to Herodias, the ſiſter of her husband: ſhe preuailed ſo farre, that Herode Antipas the Tetrarche, builded a houſe for him in the citty of Tiberias, and aſsigned him there a yearely reuenew. Not long had Agrippa enioyed this benefite by his brother in law, but Herode growing offended at his table, for ſome wordes ſpoken by Agrippa, ouer-boldely reproued him angerly, terming him a begger, and a vagabond, and that he liued by his bounty.

The great pouertie and diſtreſſe of Agrippa & his wife Cypris.

Herodias is a meanes to relieue their miſery.

Agrippa grieuing at this reproach, forſooke this fauour afforded by Herode: and borrowing ſome ſmall ſtore of money, of one that reſpected him, but at extreame intereſt; once more hee intended to viſite Rome, and there againe to make triall of his fortune. Hee went to ſalute Tyberius in the Iſle of Capreæ, where he found gracious entertainement for a few dayes: vntill ſome Agent for the Emperour, wrote backe from Iudea, that Agrippa did owe thirtie thouſand Crownes of the Sunne, to the Receiuers of the Emperor. Beſide, that he had formerly made many eſcapes, euen when the dayes for repayment came, vſing nothing but ſubtile and coſening ſhifts.

Miſerie ſooner meeteth with enemies then friends.

Tyberius much offended at theſe tydings, commaunded Agrippa to auoyde his Court, vntill hee had made full ſatiſfaction: which hee did (with great difficulty) by the means of Madame Antonia. Wherewith Tyberius was ſo well pleaſed, that hee appoynted him the guardian of his twinne ſonne Tyberius. But a little before the death of Tyberius, once againe he fell into his diſfauour. For, beeing at ſupper one night, with Caius, the yoong adopted ſonne of Tyberius, among other ſpeeches paſſing at the Table; Agrippa wiſhed, that olde Tyberius might quickly die, to the end that Caius ſhould enioy the Empire.

The ſtrange and variable condition of Agrippaes fortune.

This wiſh comming to the eares of Tyberius, Agrippa (by the Emperours commaund) was clapt vp in cloſe priſon, and there ſo kept, vntill ſuch time as Tyberius deceaſſed. Caius, well aſſiſted by his warlike troupes, and by his father Germanicus, came to enioy the Empire, and hauing releaſed Agrippa out of priſon; adorned him with the habits beſeeming a King, ſubiecting alſo thoſe countries to him, which Philip the Tetrarch, and Lyſanias formerly had commaunded. Moreouer, he gaue him a chaine of gold, of equalitie in weight to the yron chaine, wherewith he was bound lying in priſon. Hee remained a yeare with the Emperor Caius at Rome; and then tooke leaue of him for his returne to Iudea, to take poſſeſſion of his kingdome.

The coming of Caius to the Empire, and readuancement of Agrippa.

The returne of Agrippa to poſſeſſe his kingdome.

Agrippa forſakes Herod, to take his fortune elſewhere.

Thus you ſee, that hee who (before) was not onely deſpiſed, in regard of his neceſſitie and great debts, but alſo durſt not abide in any place, for the importunitie of his creditors; was (to the admiration of all ſuch as ſawe him in that wofull miſerie) raiſed to the magnificence royall; which which caused some to tremble, that denied and refused to aide him, or had iniuriously repulsed him, while he liued in priuate estate and extreame pouerty. Soone after, Caius Caligula gaue him Galilee and Berea; with all the cheuisance of Herode Antipas his emulatour, and of his sister Herodias, as in our last Chapter we haue related: wherfore, after he dad taken order for his kingdomes affaires, hee tooke his iourney towards Rome, with gifts and presents, to declare (on his owne behalfe) what seruices and acknowledgement hee made, for so many gracious fauors done to him by Caius.

Honors heaped more and more vppon Agrippa by the Emperor.

Agrippa maketh a iourny to Rome.

During the time that Agrippa was at Rome, there happened a strife betweene the Cittizens of Alexandria, and the Iews dwelling in the same Cittie: so that (by lottes) Ambassadours were sent on eyther part to the Emperour. Amongest whom was Philo the Iew, whose testimony we haue diuers times made vse of, in the course of this present Historie. There the Iewes were sharpely accused by a Greeke named Appian, for many faults, and especially, for obstinate contempt of the Imperiall dignitie: becaus in all parts of those Cities where the Iewes dwelt, they would not suffer any Statues or Images of the Emperour Caius to be erected; but if any were set vppe, immediately they would throw them downe very opprobriously.

Philo the Iew sent Ambassadour for the Iewes.

A great complaint made to Caius against the Iewes.

Caligula being very furiously mooued with this complaint, repulsed the Iewish Ambassadours, somewhat rudely, and wrote to Petronius, (who from the beginning of his Empire, he had sent Gouernour into Iudea) that with all the haste he could possibly vse, hee should erect the Emperors Statue, in the most holy place of the Temple of Ierusalem, if not by consent of the Iewes, yet in despight of them, and (by force of Armes) whether they would or no.

A commaund to erect the Emperors statue in the holiest place of the Temple.

Petronius, willing to obey this cõmand, yet knowing the execution would not be easie; called the Legions from all parts, & being prouided of sufficient succor, went from Syria to Ptolomais, carrying a braue army along with him. But first he made knowne to the Iewes (by Ambassadours and Letters,) wherefore he came in such dreadfull manner, as grounded vpon the Emperors commaund; desiring the people, that he might rather perfourme it by their good liking, then by the course of force & violence. The Iews, not a litle affrighted at these news, came from a great number of Townes and Cities, into the fields before Ptolomais, bringing no arms or weapons with them: but entreating Petronius, not to fulfill so wicked a commaund, protesting, that they would rather endure a thousand deaths, then suffer the Temple to be prophaned with the Statue of a man.

Petronius goeth with a powerfull army to Ptolomais, to execut the Emperours command.

What imparlance passed betweene the Iewes and Petronius.

Contrariwise, Petronus admonished them to take heede, lest this their stiffenecked opiniõ, should procure the countries deuastation by fire and sword; alledging stil vnto them, the sterne commands of the Emperour, how gracious hee had beene towards him, and (being angerly mooued) would admit no mercy, to such as disobeyed him in the least manner, approouing his speeches by examples, of diuers tormented in strange kinds. He further desired them to pardon him, in not denying to execute the Emperors charge imposed on him: becaus they knew well enough themselues, that neuer any refused to fulfill his command, but was extreamely punished for it. Wherefore, hee rather intended to aduenture his life, in fighting against their whole Nation: then to bee held remisse or negligent, in what the Emperour had enioyned him.

Petronius perswaded the people to stand in feare of the Emperours strict commands.

Heereupon the multitude resolued to insist, entreating him to pardon their religion and iust constancie, if (more fearing God, the Creatour of heauen and earth, and hauing often experimented his heauy wrath, by their transgressing his commandements) they did now oppose themselues against the Emperours will, beeing full of impietie. Considering also, that Petronius himselfe confessed that he stoode in such feare of a mortall man (whose life was vncertaine) that he held it no safetie for his person, to transgresse the least of his commaunds.

Arguments alleaged to Petronius by the Iewish multitude.

Petronius, amased at this obstinacie in the people, and (after that the assembly was dispersed) finding himselfe in great perplexitie, what hee should doe in this dangerous case; pausd a while vpon it. For, hee had beene particularly admonished by Aristobulus, brother to King Agrippa, and some other Princes of Iudea, with earnest imprecatious, not to soyle himselfe himselfe, with the innocent bloud of so great a multitude, by the wicked commaund of the Emperours; becauſe in ſo doing, hee ſhould brand the Romaine Empire, with ſo infamous a note of cruelty, as the like was neuer heard of before, deſtroying a whole Nation, for refuſing to ſuffer the Image of a ſinfull man, to be aduaunced in their moſt holie Temple. Which diuine honour, no man (of vnderſtanding or good iudgement) did euer couet before: but contrariewiſe, many, to whom ſuch an offer had beene made, did holde it in no meane deteſtation.

The Iewes held in high eſteeme their auncient ceremonies and traditions.

They further aduiſed him, that hee would write to the Emperour, and let him vnderſtand the peremptorie reſolution of the people, in defence of the doctrine and ceremonies giuen them by Almighty God, calming his diſpleaſure ſo well as hee could, from proceeding in ſo cruell a ſentence. But if it ſhould ſo come to paſſe, that the humour of the Gouernour might not bee altered: yet then hee had enough to goe on in, and (when hee did pleaſe) to proceede in Armes.

The conference betweene Petronius and the Iewes at Tyberias.

Petronius deſiring to conſider in theſe matters more maturely, and to trie the peoples inclination yet a little further: went with his Army to Tyberias, where an infinite number of Iewes met him, inceſſantly entreating him, that their ſacred Temple might not bee prophaned. Why? anſwered Petronius, Dare you warre with the Emperour? Feare you not the power of the Romaine Empire, knowing how weake your ſtrength is, to contend againſt ſo mighty a Monarch? Wee reſiſt not by Armes ſo great a power (cryed out the Iewes) but humbly lay downe our liues at Caſars foote: rather then, againſt the Lawe of our God, we will ſee the Statue of the Emperour, to bee erected in the holieſt place of our Temple. Which words were no ſooner ſpoken, but they all fell flat vpon their faces, proſtrating their neckes to any that would ſmite them.

The conſtancy of the Iewes againſt Petronius.

Petronius perceiuing them ſo reſolued and inuincible, that they rather would die, then ſuffer their Temple to be violated; conſidering alſo, that already (for the ſpace of fortie dayes) they had not toucht the earth with any labor, although it was the onely apt time to ſowe their ſeede: after he had conſulted with ſome of his friends, hee coucluded, that hee would write to the Emperour. Yet, before he would make any publication therof, he meant to preſſe thoſe people ſomwhat further. So, cauſing a mighty multitude of the vnarmed Iewes to meete at Tiberias, and to ſeare them in moſt dreadfull manner; he engirt them on all ſides with warrelike troupes, and his horſſemen ready prepared to ouer-runne them. Once more hee declared to them, the rigorous commaund of the Romaine Emperour, the obedience of all the people in the like caſe; the daunger wherein he and al his were, if they did not effect what hee had commaunded. Wherefore hee exhorted them, that the Emperours anger might be endured: becauſe ſuch fayled not to renenge cruelly, the breach of any thing commaunded by him.

A further trial vrged by Petronius vpon the people in warlike manner.

But when the Iewes cryed out all with one voyce, that hee ought to make more account of Gods commaund, then of any mortall mans whatſoeuer, to trample them vnder his horſes feete, or ſlice them in peeces with their Swords, that ſo all the Iewes being extirpated, he might vſe the Temple at his owne pleaſure: Petronius, entirely mooued to mercy, his heart throbbing, and his eyes ouer-flowing with teares, commaunding ſilence by a Trumpet, thus he ſpake.

The anſwer of the people to Petronius.

SEeing you are ſo reſolute, that you deſire rather to die, then violate the Law giuen you by God, I am not the man, that (by a wicked kinde of obedience) will ſoyle your Temple; for which I ſee you endeuour ſo much. Nor will I doe ſeruice to the Emperour my Maiſter, in a matter ſo monſtrous and inhumane: but rather will be a partaker in your perill, then purchaſe my life, by the innocent bloud of ſo great a multitude. Be comforted then in this your Religion, and returne to your labour, which (for ſo many dayes) you haue omitted. For mine owne part, I will labour by my friends and mine owne Letters, to alter this opinion in the Emperour. If hee commaund me to Rome, and condemne mee to death, I will gladly endure it: knowing, that by my death, a people liuing in great daunger, may yet preſerue their Religion to themſelues. For your part, pray to God, that what I enterpriſe for your ſafetie, may haue a good iſſue for vs all.

The Iewes interpretation concerning a ſhowre of raine.

When the Iewes had heard this Oration; as people extraordinarily ioyfull, they beganne (with loude voyces) to extoll the pietie of Petronius, wiſhing to him all felicitie. And ſodainely, vpon the Aſſemblies ſeperation, there fell a mightie ſhowre of raine (all the day before, and the whole moneth fore-going, the Heauens were ſo cleare and bright, that the earth was burnt by extremity of heat) and this the Iewes interpreted to bee a ſigne of their happineſſe.

King Agrippa feaſteth the Emperor, and maketh interceſsion for the Iewes.

While matters proceeded thus In Iudea, King Agrippa being at Rome, vnderſtoode the troubles in his kingdome, and the occaſion from whence they proceeded. Whereupon, he made a magnificent feaſt for the Emperour, conſiſting of all the delicates that poſſibly could be deuiſed. Caius wel knew, that Agrippa would not launch out in ſuch liberall expences, but that hee intended ſome eſpeciall ſuite to him: wherefore, with a gracious countenance and franke ſpirit, hee bade him boldly ask what he would, proteſting, that he ſhould not be denied. In a long & well prepared Oration, Agrippa reſolued the Emperour, that he deſired not any enriching of his kingdome; but humbly craued pardon for the Iewiſh people, if, in feare to be puniſhed by God; they had not receiued his Statue into their Temple of Ieruſalem.

Agrippa winneth pardon for the people of the Iewes.

Caius accounting it a ſhame and diſgrace to him, if heerein he ſhould refuſe his friends requeſt: wrote to Petronius, commending his care for the execution of his commaund. Adding withall, that if (with the peoples liking) the Image was already placed in the Temple, ſo to let it reſt: but if the people would not voluntarily ſuffer it to bee doone, by no means to offer them any violence. Soone after came the Letters ſent from Petronius, concerning the ſtowte reſolution of the Iewiſh Nation: which quite altered him from his former minde, and made him highly diſpleaſed with his Captaine, for not performing what hee had enioyned him.

The Emperor ſoone changed from his promiſe made to Agrippa, & wrathfully incenſed againſt Petronius.

Wherefore hee wrote againe to him, that if he would not be brought to Rome, and there be maſſacred with moſt horrible torments: hee ſhould make choice of what kinde of death himſelfe pleaſed, as a puniſhment for the contempt of his commaund.

It came to paſſe, and (no doubt) diuinely, that the ſhip which carried theſe cruell Letters, was greatly tardied by boyſterous tempeſts: ſo that an other ſhippe (bringing the newes of Caligulaes death) arriued there in Iudea before it. Fearefull indeede was his death, but well worthy ſuch a monſter, who ſhortly after hee had written theſe terrible menaces to Petronius, was maſſacred, with his wife and daughter, by Chereas and his confederated conſpiratours. Whereuppon Petronius, beeing infourmed of the Emperours death, and thereby exempted from all feare; receiued the other Letters of his death. Thereby he plainely perceyued, that almighty GOD had miraculouſly preſerued his life, for the good hee had doone to the Iewiſh Nation.

Caius Caligula, his wife & daughter murdred al. together, and his cruelty intended to Petronius, miraculouſly preuented.

About the ſame time, Claudius was ſaluted Emperour by the Souldiours: who, becauſe hee had beene both councelled and aſſiſted by Agrippa, at ſuch time as hee remayned in Rome: he confirmed vnto him (by publique Edict) the Kingdome of Iudea giuen him by Caligula, adding alſo Samaria, and all the other parts and portions, which his grandfather Herode the Great formerly poſſeſſed.

Claudius made Emperor, & Agrippa confirmed by him in his kingdome, with other additions beſide Moreouer, hee gaue hiſn the Tetrarchie of Lyſanias, called Abella, with a part of Cilicia, and Comagena, which hee had taken from Antiochus. He conferred alſo on Herode, brother to Agrippa, the Kingdome of Chalcis.

*A Towne Campania in Italy, now called Bella.

Agrippa beeing in this manner richly recompenced, returned to Iudea, in the firſt yeare of the Empire of Claudius, and aſcending vp to Ieruſalem, gaue thanks to the Lord for his good ſucceſſe. There hee made a ſollemne great feaſt, hanging vp in the Temple, the Chaine of golde which Caligula had giuen him in memory of his miſeries, and diuine deliuerance.

The Chaine of gold hangd vp in the temple.

Afterward, he beganne to fortifie the Cittie

Cittie of Ieruſalem, and with ſuch ſufficient furniture, that Claudius (fearing a reuolt in the Iewes, vnder truſt in ſuch a well ordered fortification) forbade Agrippa by his Letters, to finiſh the work hee had begunne. Hee was alſo moſt liberall towards his ſubiects, and (aboue all) a ſuperſtitious obſeruer of the traditions, receiued in the forefathers lawe. So that, hearing the Apoſtles to valew them of no reckoning, to winne the good liking of the ſacrificing Prieſts, and fauour of the vulgare people: Hee executed ſome of the Diſciples of our Sauiour Chriſt, and namely Iames the brother to Iohn, they beeing the ſonnes of Zebedee. Hee alſo cauſed Saint Peter to bee put in priſon, during the dayes of vnleauened Bread, to bring him foorth to the people after the Feaſt. But the Euangeliſt Saint Luke amply declareth, that Saint Peter was deliuered by the continuall prayers of the Church: where hee alſo declareth, the miſerable end of this Herod Agrippa.

Now, concerning the deſcription of Ioſephus, ſpeaking of his death: it agrees with the Hiſtorie of Saint Luke in this manner. After hee had reigned ouer all Iudea for the ſpace of three yeares; in the fourth, hee came to Cæſarea, where hee celebrated the Feaſt with a great company of the Iewes; cauſing Playes to be acted, in honour of the Emperour Claudius, and for his health.

The deſcription of Ioſephus concerning the miſerable death of Herod Agrippa.

The ſecond day of the Feaſt, he entred the Theater in the morning, attired in a Roabe of cloth of ſiluer, tiſſued, and made moſt ſumptuous and artificiall: whereon when the bright beames of the Sunne did caſt their radiance, it cauſed ſuch a luſtre by their reuerberation; that all eies were dazeled with the ſplendour of the garment. Whereupon it happened, that ſome of his Flatterers, interrupting him in his Oration; tolde him, that he ſpake like a god; nay, and (with a loude voice) called him God, crauing mercy of him, becauſe (vntill then) they had feared him but as a man onely; but now they plainly perceiued, that he farre excelled all humane nature.

His pompous entrance into the theater to ſpeake to the people.

As the King gloried in theſe flattering clamours, no way reproouing them for ſuch impious behauiour: hee was ſodainely ſmitten with a moſt grieuous paine in his entrailes, ſo that very hardly hee could bee carryed to his Pallace. Where, after many horrible torments, his life expired the fift day: beeing iuſtly puniſhed for the cruelties, which hee had exerciſed againſt the members of the true Church of Chriſt, whereas otherwiſe, he was very benigne and gracious towardes all men, eſpecially to ſtrangers and Gentiles. Hee reigned (in all) about ſeauen yeares; for hee helde the Tetrarchie of Philip (vnder Caius Caligula) three yeares, and foure other yeares, the whole Kingdome of Iudea. He dyed in the foure and fiftieth yeare of his age; the third of the Empire of Claudius; and the twelfth yeare after the reſurrection of our Lord and Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus.

CHAP. XX.

¶ Of Herode, the fourth King of Chalcis, youngeſt ſonne to Herode the Great, brother to the firſt Agrippa.

THaue heretofore named this man, Herode the fourth, for his better diſcerning from other; who led a priuate kind of life, vntill Claudius (mooued by the interceſſion of his brother Agrippa) beſtowed vpon him the Kingdome of Chalcis, in the firſt yeare of his Empire, which he enioyed the ſpace of eight yeares, ſuruiuing onely fiue yeares his brother Agrippa.

Claudius made Herod king of Chalcis, in the firſt yeare of his Empire.

After the death of his brother, Cuſpius Fadus beeing ſent into Iudea, ſtroue to haue the cuſtodie of the Roabes and other ornaments, which belonged to the Soueraigne Sacrificers, and to transferre the Sacrificers to Romaine Gouernours: whereupon, Herode tranſported himſelfe to Rome, at requeſt made to him by the Iewes, whoſe cauſe he maintained there ſo well; that he obtained, that the garments belonging vnto the High-prieſt, ſhould be kept in the cuſtody of the Hie-prieſt. Moreouer, hee obtained of Claudius, that he ſhould haue the charge and care of the money, conſecrated to the Temple of Ieruſalem. Hauing power alſo, to depoſe the High-prieſt, for ſome cauſes of importance, and to ſubſtitute an other more ſufficient. A Graunt which brought great gaine and profite to the Kings; becauſe the Prieſts ſought by power of mony, who ſhould haue that ſoueraigne dignitie.

A debate or contention for keeping the ornaméts of the high-Prieſts.

The liberall graunt of Claudius to Herode.

Cuſpius Fadus gouerned the Countrie of Iudea, when a certaine man, named Theudas, abuſed in ſuch ſort the vulgare people by his enchauntments: that hee brought them to Iordane, promiſing to make them paſſe (dry-footed) ouer the diuided riuer. But Fadus following, took him by his horſe-men, and hauing put him to death, ſcattered all the heapes of his followers. Gamaliell maketh mention of this Theudas, in the fift chapter of the Actes of the Apoſtles.

Theudas the Sorcerer his abuſing the people, and put to death by Cuſpius Fadus.

Act. 5.36.

Tyberius Alexander was ſent by Claudius, to ſucceede Fadus in the gouernment; vnder whom happened that terrible famine in Iudea, which Agabus had foretold in the eleauenth chapter of the Actes of the Apoſtles; and which was about the ſixt or ſeuenth yeare of Claudius: which extreamitie was ſomewhat aſſwaged, by the liberalitie of Helena, Queene of the * Adiabænes, who cauſed great plenty of corne to bee brought out of Egypt, and figges from Cyprus. Alſo the Churches of Greece and Aſia, gathered much mony, which they ſent to ſuccour the brethren, that endured the famine in Iudea.

Actes 11.29.

Herode, King of Chalcis dyed in the eight yeare of the Emperour Claudius. Hee had two wiues, each after other; the firſt was Mariana, daughter to Olympia, the yoongeſt daughter to Great Herode, by whom he had Ariſtobulus. Afterward, he married Berenice, daughter to his brother Agrippa, who brought vnto him two ſonnes. And this was his iſſue or poſteritie, which was reputed quite conſumed, by the calamities hapning in the warres of the Iewes.

CHAP. XXI.

¶ Of Agrippa the laſt, Sonne to the yongeſt ſonne of Herod the Great, the laſt King in any part of Iudea.

THis Agrippa, being aged ſeuenteen years, was at Rome with Claudius when his father dyed; and ſucceeded not immediately after his father, becauſe of ſome enemies about Claudius therein were his hinderance: who alleaged; That his youthfull yeares were not apt to gouerne ſo great a kingdome, neither to bridle a people ſo rebellious. But indeede, their pretence was, to enrich themſelues by gouerning the Countrey.

Agrippa hindred from immediate ſucceeding after his father.

Fiue

Agrippa made King of Chalcis, and enabled with his vnkles power.

Fiue yeares after his fathers death, his vnckle Herode beeing dead also: Claudius conferred on him the Kingdome of Chalcis, at the age of 22. yeares. He gaue him also the same power his vnckle had, to keepe the treasure of the Temple of Ierusalem, and to create the High-priests. Of which authoritie Agrippa made verie good vse: for (in a short time) he deposed diuers, and substituted other at his pleasure.

Cumanus next gouernor in Iudea to Tyberius Alexander.

At such time as Agrippa beganne his reigne, Cumanus was sent into Iudea, to succeed Tiberius Alexander in the gouernment, who greatly tormented the country, which already sauored of the succeeding ruine. For, at Easter, the fourth day of vnleauened bread, a Romain Souldier of the band, which (according to custom) kept a garrison about the Temple; vnreuerently shewed his base backe-part to the people, they being dutifully busied in the seruice of God.

The vnreuerend behauiour of an insolent Souldiour to the people.

The Iewes not a little mooued at this iniurie, gaue very bitter speeches against the Gouernour Cumanus, because hee did not punish this wicked act of the Souldiour.

Cumanus taking in disdayne their bold words, and fearing some violence by the mutinous multitude: sodainely (but very secretly) sommoned his armed Legiens and horsemen together, who discouering themselues before they could be suspected; made such an affright among the vnarmed popularity, that they fled away so confusedly crowding, that more then twenty thousand men and women, were trodden and crushed to death in the Streetes and other places, to the great and grieuous lamentation of all the people.

A most cruell and bloodie act of Cumanus, whereby 20000. lost their liues.

Another tumult also followed soone after, the issue whereof was not yet so pittifull. For some theeuing Iewes, had (vpon the highway) shrewdly beaten and wounded one Stephen, a seruant to the Emperour Claudius, stripping him out of all that he had about him.

A Booke of Moses & the Prophets writing abused by a wicked Souldier.

Cumanus heereat highly offended, and not finding them that had done the deed; tooke all the neighbouring parts, where the fault was committed. Which being done, a Souldiour finding a Booke in his booty, which containd the writings of Moses and the Prophets; made a publike shew thereof in derision; & after tore it to peeces, in presence of the chiefest Iewes. Sodainly a great multitude of the Iews ranne (by troups) to Cæsarea (where then was the ordinary abiding of the Romaine Gouernors) and required, that iustice might be inflicted vpon him for this wicked act: whom if Cumanus (by the perswasion of some) had not beheaded, to satisfie the enraged peoples anger; this tumult could not haue beene appeased, without very great effusion of blood.

Diuers Galileans slain by the Samaritas

Afterward, some of the Galileans ascending vppe to Ierusalem to the Feast, were slaine by the Samaritanes; which was the cause of many murthers committed on both sides. For, eyther part beeing encouraged to reuenge, ranne into fresh iniuries, by way of robberies, putting to fire and sword all they met withall. But, because Cumanus (corrupted with money) did not represse those theeueries done by neighbour on neighbour. Quarreus, President of Syria, was called thither by the contrary side, who (hauing receiued information of the fact, and executed the authours of the mutinies) sent Cumanus to Rome, to render a reason for the Prouince committed to his charge. He being conuicted of auarice and crueltie, was sent into exile by Claudius, & in his place, was appointed gouernor of Iudea and Samaria, Claudius Fœlix, brother to Pallas, who (long time before) was sent into Palestine, to gouerne the Tetrarchy of Philip, as is affirmed by Cornelius Tacitus.

Cumanus sent to Rome by Quarreus, after whom succeeded Felix.

Almost at the same time, that is to say, in the twelfth yeare of his Empire, Claudius gaue to King Agrippa the Tetrarchy of Phillip (being destitute of a Gouernor) which contained Trachonitis and Batanea; giuing him also Abella, the Tetrarchy of Lysanias. Then he gaue to his vnckle paternall Aristobulus (brother to the first Agrippa, and Herode of Chalcis) the kingdome of Chalcis.

The liberall bountie of the Emperor Claudius to K Agrippa.

After these affayres thus passed ouer, the condition and estate of the Iews grew worse and worse; and now beganne the gouernement of Fœlix, who beeing reprooued by Ionathas the High-priest, for his rapines and other wicked actions by him perfourmed, and yet not daring to depose him from the Sacerdotall dignitie, because hee stoode in feare of the people: subborned diuerse Ruffians, who Ionathas the high-Priest reproued the rapines of Felix, and was secretly murdered.

(entring into Ierusalem at the feast with the multitude) slew so secretly the High-Priest Ionathas, and others marked for the same purpose with him; as very easily they were concealed in the troupes.

Mens liues bought and sold as ruffiās pleased, without any punishment.

This attempt speeding so well as the Ruffians could desire, fell out to bee the occasion, that (at euery feast) they made a market or merchandise, of killing the honestest of the people: sometimes being hired there-to by other, sometimes out of their owne spleene and mallice. So that euery man stoode in feare, because no one knew how to secure himselfe; audacious boldenesse dreading no punishment, in regard of the Gouernors careless negligence.

The miserable afflictiōs of the Iewes, no way to be redressed.

Troups of theeues ranne euery where making spoile, though many were apprehended by Fœlix, and executed: yet wickednesse had taken such deep roote, onely through neglect in the precedent Gouernours, as it could no way be holpen; no, not by the greatest seuerity of iustice. And the worst of all was, that these theeueries were maintayned by the High-priests authoritie: amongst whom, such as were best stored with money, kept bands of desperate villaines about them, by whose meanes they oppressed such as they pleased, laying close ambushes to kill and murder them.

Paul imprisoned, pleadeth before Fœlix and Drusilla. Actes 24.24.

In the thirteenth yeare of Claudius his Empire, Paul the Apostle was taken in Ierusalem, and being led thence to Cæsarea: pleaded his cause before Fœlix and Drusilla, as S. Luke declareth in the foure and twentieth of the Actes. Afterward, Fœlix called for him diuers times, and heard him answere for himselfe, hoping that Paul would redeeme himselfe by money. But after hee had kept him two whole yeares in prison; at his departing from Iudea, hee left him there, to please the Iewes.

The death of Claudius and reigne of Nero.

Claudius died in the foureteenth yeare of his Empire, and Nero (at the beginning of his gouernment) encreased the authoritie of Agrippa, adding thereto part of Galilee, with the Cities of Tyberias, Tarichea and Iuliada. Forthwith he sent Portius Festus into Iudea, calling home Fælix, whom they of Cæsarea followed, and accused him of cruelty, rapines and other vniust dealing; but he escaped by the cunning of his brother Pallas. So soone as

Portius Festus sent to gouern Iudea

Portius Festus was arriued in Iudea, hee gaue audience (at Cæsarea) to Paul and the Iewes his accusers: and as he intended to send Paul to Ierusalem, he (fearing the ambushes of the Iewes) appealed to the Emperour Nero.

Actes 25. 11. Paul appeald to answere before Cæsar

Some few dayes after, Agrippa went to Cæsarea with his sister Berenice, onely to salute the new gouernor: which sister (after the death of her husband Herode of Chalcis) liued so familiarly with her brother, that there was great suspition of incestuous acquaintance. Paul was brought before them to pleade his cause, and (in a wel couched oration) so approued his innocencie; that, according to the Kings owne opinion, he might haue gone at liberty, if hee had not appealed to Cæsar. Not long it was, but Paul was sent (with other prisoners) to Rome, in the first yeare of Neroes Empire, as is auouched.

Paul pleades before Festus Agrippa and Berenice.

Agrippa returning to Ierusalem, offended the Priests very grieuously, by a building erected in the Pallace royall, and somewhat neare to the Temple: for hee could thence discerne, whatsoeuer the Priests did in the inward parts, and when they loytered in the sacrifices and diuine Seruice. The Priests holding this action vnlawfull, erected a wall (on the Temple side) of the like height; whereby Agrippa was not onely hindered from seeing the Temple, but also a great part of the City. The King insisted, that the wall should be beaten downe; but the Priests so preuailed (by means made to Poppea the Emperours wife) that Nero allowed the wall to remaine as it did.

A contention betweene Agrippa & the sacrificing Priests about a building.

Heereat Agrippa being exceedingly offended, deposed Ioseph the soueraigne Sacrificer, placing Ananias in his roome, who was of the Saduces Sect, a man very bolde and cruell. He (Festus dying in Iudea, and Albinus his successour staying somewhat long ere he came) tooke occasion to exercise crueltie against many worthy persons; especially against Iames the sonne of Ioseph, brother to our Lord Iesus Christ by an other mother, a man (in the iudgement of all them dwelling in Ierusalem) excelling in innocencie of life and piety, who was throwne down headlong from the highest wall of the temple; and (by command of the said Ananias) ouerwhelmd with stones, about threescore yeares after the birth of Christ.

Ioseph the high-Priest deposed, and Ananias enstalled.

Ananias caused Iames to be murdered.

For

Ananias diſmiſſed from his Office by Agrippa.

For this wicked deed, he was accuſed before Agrippa, who feared the Romane Gouernour, named Albinus, now neere approaching; and alſo ſtoode in feare of the peoples fury: wherefore Ananias was diſmiſſed from his Office, exerciſed by him but three moneths onely. And yet he ceaſed not to commit great cruelties, againſt them that were of his owne condition. For, in regard of his great power, hee had many Theeues (kept at his charges) of whom he made vſe to murther his enemies priuily. Beſide, hee made them breake into the Garners of corne, to ſteal the Tythes therein encloſed: which beeing often done without any puniſhment, was the cauſe of ſtaruing to death manie of the poore Prieſts.

The greedy & inſatiable couetouſneſſe of Albinus the Gouernour.

Albinus being ouercome with inſatiable couetouſneſſe, cared for nothing elſe but onely to get wealth together, by any vile meanes whatſoeuer: wherefore, ſuch of the Prieſts as gaue him Gold, hee winked at all their wickedneſſe, and permitted Theeues to doe what they liſted, if their kindred or friendes would redeeme them with money. By which meanes, in ſhort time, all Iudea was full of Theeues, all things turned topſie turuy, no Iuſtice exerciſed in any place: and there was no acte ſo horrid or execrable, but it might quickly be pardoned for money.

Florus a more wicked gouernor then Albinus, ſent as a iuſt plague and vtter ruin of the Iewes.

Geſſius Florus was ſent as ſucceſſor to this Horſe-leech, who farre exceeded the rapines of Albinus, by infinit other wicked courſes; ſo that the Iews reputed Albinus a Saint vnto this other. For Florus proceeded not couertly; nor after the cunning manner of his predeceſſour: but by open violence, ſcorning, ſtealing, rudely taking, and doing whatſoeuer hee pleaſed; for will onely was a Law to him. And ſurely it ſeemed that he was meerly ſent by deſtiny to the Iewes, ſo to irritate them by open iniuries, and blinde them from all deſire of reuenge, as finally to be their vtter ruine. For, the whole country being ouer-runne with Theeues, and the people growne deſperately deſirous of warre; had a hope of ſome other Dominion, groaning vnder the tyrannical Romaine rule, and (inſottiſh zeale) were perſwaded to recouer their liberty.

The time fore propheſied for the deſtructiō of Ieruſalem, was now fully come to paſſe

In breefe, the time was come, which Chriſt and the Prophets had foretolde, concerning the deſtruction of the whole Prieſthood, and policy ordained by Moſes and diuine authority: conſidering, that the Meſſias had already beene ſent, for the loue of whome, both the Prieſthood and policy had bin (till that time) diuinely preſerued. Wherefore, vnder Geſſius Florus, threeſcore yeeres after the Natiuity of Chriſt, fiue and thirty yeeres after hee was crucified and riſen againe, the twelfth of Neroes Empire, the ſeuenteenth of this Agrippa now in queſtion; and three yeares before Paul was put to death by Nero: the warre began to waxe tempeſtuous, becauſe the Iewes reuolted from the Romane Empire, and entred into mutiny againſt Cæſar.

Florus a bloody deſirer of the vtter ruin of the Iewiſh Nation.

Florus could eaſily haue quenched this warre in the beginning; but that hee rather affected, to nouriſh and feede the flame newly kindled, by prouoking the Iewes dayly more and more, ſtill adding iniury vppon iniury: vntill the fire flewe foorth both farre and neere, that finally, it wrought the deſtruction of all Iudea.

Agrippa labored to reconcile the Iewes to the Romās.

At the beginning of this reuolt, Agrippa labored very ſeriouſly, to ſtay the Iews from this furious deſire of warre, and to regaine peace and tranquility, by requiring pardon of the Romanes for their offence, which they might haue obtayned on meane conditions, in regard it was very euident, that they had ſome iuſt cauſes of rebelling, by the outrages done vnto them by Florus. But he came ſo ſhort of their expectation, they hating nothing more, then to heare of peace or equity; as (very hardly) he eſcaped their violence. Perceiuing then the Nation ſo enraged for fight, & (like men blindfolded) throwing themſelues impetuouſly into perdition; he retired from their furious enterprize, and ſent ayde to Veſpaſian in Iudea, to tame the head-ſtrong courſe of thoſe Rebelles, foreſeeing already in his ſoule, the ſad ruine of all the Iewiſh people.

The lamentable horror of the warre betweene the Iewes and the Romaines.

Heere I could weaue vp the fagge-end of this Hiſtory, with report of the Iewiſh warre, which Ioſephus and other authors haue deſcribed; but that my heart will not ſerue me, to diſcourſe thoſe ſtraunge & miſerable ouerthrows, which (in their pitileſſe euents) did exceede humane beleefe. For no Hiſtory is found of any nation whatſoeuer, that was ſo long time ſhut

The Iewes reuolted in the 12. yeare of Nero the emperor.

ſhut vp from all ſuccour, wofully tormented, and finally (wholy confounded, with numberleſſe calamities) almoſt altogether quite raced out, and deſtroyed. For after that the Iewes were reuolted in the twelfth yeare (as is affirmed) of Nero, the army of the Romanes neuer ceaſed for ſix whole yeeres together, cruelly to rauage the countrey of Iudea, becauſe from time to time, the Iewes (by their inuincible obſtinacy) prouoked the victorious ſoldiers to ſuch tyrannies, as the like were neuer heard of.

The miſerable eſtate of Ieruſalem, ſix whole yeares together.

But though I ſpare to relate the deuaſtation of the whole countrey: who can conceiue (with true iudgement) but the miſeries of the Citty Ieruſalem it ſelfe? Which, before it beheld the Romane enemy, for the ſpace of ſixe whole yeers, felt (within it ſelfe) farre more cruell domeſticke aduerſaries: as being diuided and torne in peeces, by Sects, Factions, and Seditions of Theeues, fighting amongſt themſelues (when they had none elſe to quarrell withall) for rapines, murthers, and other miſcheefs, euery Faction thinking to ſupport it ſelfe, by doing iniurie vnto it ſelfe, and ſurmounting one another in number, and manner of nouel villanies and extremity.

Bands of partiality and factions in Ieruſalem.

Furie grew on to ſuch horrid perfection, that if any Man or woman were eſteemed holy, religious, and modeſt: theſe were arguments ſufficient, to yeild a pregnant reaſon for their death; and the goodes of the richeſt Cittizens, muſt bee brought foorth, and layde before their doores, while the Factious fought who ſhould enioy them. To kill people of meane or ſimple condition, was but to ridde them out of the turbulent crowdes, for they were eſteemed but as a charge to the Citty, and hindered the way when the ſiedge ſhould beginne: for this they accounted their wiſeſt courſe, and beſt meanes, to abide a long lingering ſiedge.

The richeſt Citizens in moſt wofull perplexity.

If any man durſt but ſpeake a word, or expreſſe by any apparant ſigne, that hee diſliked the preſent License vnto all Villanies, it was preſently termed Treaſon, and flatte conſpiracy with the Romaines; yea, it was a ſinne deſeruing terrible puniſhment. And as great an offence it was, to mourne or lament for Parents or Friends, being ſlaine or murthered in theſe vprores.

Such matters as they accounted in their madnes to be Treaſon & conſpiring with the Romanes.

To prophane the verie holyeſt part of the Temple, with Rapes, Murthers, and Maſſacres; they ſayde, it was fighting in defence of the Temple, and for the Religion of the countrey. To beare away violently the riches out of the Temples Treaſurie, and to waſte them in all Villanie and abhominable exceſſe: this was tearmed, borrowing money, wherewith to defend the ſeruice ordayned by GOD. And vpon paine of death, no man durſt flye, or get him gone, from theſe horrible, diuelliſh, and dangerous courſes.

Calamities of the Iews ſuch, as ſildom any nation was euer ſubiect to.

Moreouer, ſuch as dwelt in the Citie, beheld (beſide theſe publike miſeries) their owne bodies, their wiues, children, and goods, expoſed to the violent & vnbridled attempts of thoſe mercileſſe Villaines. In breefe, there could not be thought or deuiſed any iniury or opprobrious behauiour, which the miſerable Iewes might feare or expect from the Enemy, but they firſt made triall thereof vpon themſelues, vſing no reſiſtance at all againſt it. Wherefore, the coming of the enemies army was no way dreadful vnto them, but rather gladly deſired; and euen but as a tolleration, or rather a recreation (when the City was ſharply aſſayled) the ſeditious factions were enforced to ioyne their forces, for repulſing the enemy, and to breath awhile, from their owne domeſticke theeueries and warres.

Men forward to vſe any violence vppon themſelues.

The laſt ſix moneths of this warre, after that the Citty was round engirt with enemies, and themſelues had pilled, polled, and miſerably ſpoyled all that they could by their inteſtine robberies: they began to feele a famine in the heighth of extremity, which was accompanied likewiſe with ſo greeuous a Peſtilence, that in the time of the ſiedge, aboue eleauen hundred thouſand mē died by the plague and famine. During this war alſo, great multitudes wer daily murdred within the wals, by the mutinous and rebellious factioniſts: & in the aſſaults, ſurprizals, and ſacking of the city, many millions of people loſt their liues. Alſo in the war time, there were taken 97000. perſons, who were partly ſold as ſlaues, and partly diſtributed to rounde neighbouring great Citties, there to bee giuen and deuoured by wilde beaſts, in publique Playes, and Peſtilence & famine in all extremitie, whereof there died, 110000.

Ninety ſeuen thouſand ſold as ſlaues, and deuoured by bruite beaſts.

and fantaſticke ſpectacles. Some other were compelled to fight as Fencers in the Theaters, with the like fury as hoſtile enemies: and ſome were ſent into Morea (by huge troopes) to cut out a Channell betweene the Ægæum and Ionian ſeas.

The vtter extermination of the Iewiſh people, for their contemning Ieſus Chriſt.

By theſe pittifull examples of Gods heauy wrath, againſt the contemners of his Sonne Chriſt, and the doctrine Euangelicall; almoſt all this nation was vtterly exterminated. Hapning by the Diuine permiſſion, that at the Feaſt of vnleauened bread, when the Iewes were wont to meete at Ieruſalem, from the fartheſt parts of all Iudea; the Citty ſhould be thus beſiedged, and all the deſperate Robbers, Theeues, & Ruffians, diſperſed throughout the whole Regions, ſhould (euen then) be retyred to Ieruſalem) to ſhelter themſelues in her fortifications.

After that Veſpaſian (for about the ſpace of fiue yeares) had firſt of all ſubdued well-neere all Iudea, conquering many ſtrongly munited Citties, yea, deſtroying and burning them, onely through the wilfull obſtinacie of the inhabitants; in the laſt halfe yeare, Titus brought his Army to the Citty of Ieruſalem, and there planted his ſiedge, in the ſecond yeare of the Emperor his Father; and the ſiedge continued for the ſpace of ſixe moneths, which Ioſephus tearmeth by Macedonian names.

CHAP. XXII.

A breefe Collection, of the principall Accidents which happened in the time of the ſiedge.

The begining of the ſiedge.

THe fourth day of the firſt moneth, Xantiqua (which is Aprill with vs) the Citie of Ieruſalem was beſiedged, neere to the feaſt of Easter.

The two and twentith day after, Titus eſſaying (in vaine) to haue it yeilded, raiſed his Bulwarkes, and prepared his Engines to batter the City.

Preparation for battery.

The ſeuenth day of Artemiſion, which is May, Bazetha (that is to ſay, the new city, the firſt wall being taken) which was a part of the Citty beyond the Temple towards Biſa, newly annexed, and enuironed with walles by the firſt Agrippa) was ſeized on by the Romanes.

The taking of the firſt wall by the Romãs

The twelfth day of the ſaid month, the ſecond wall was taken, and yet the ſame day it was recouered againe.

The ſixteenth day, the Romanes hauing taken the other wal again the ſecond time, enioyed the baſe or lower part of the City, which the Iewes called Acra, & was ſeated beneath on a little hill.

The 2. wall, & nether part of the city taken

The one and twenty day, two parts of the Citty were loſt, when the Iewes (being graciouſly entreated by Titus) diſdained to embrace peace. Then the Souldiers began to mount their ſcaladoes, neere to the Towre called Antonia, ioyning to the third wall, where their Enſignes and Bulwarkes being raiſed in twelue dayes, they were againe as quickely burned by the Iewes.

Two parts of the City loſt.

All the whole moneth of Dention, the which anſwereth to that of Iune, the Romanes were ſeriouſly buſied, in engirting the whole Citty with a Wall, to hinder the bringing of victualles to the Iewes, and alſo to bereaue them from all meanes of flight.

A wall built round about the City.

The firſt day of Panemon, which refereth it ſelfe to our Iuly, Titus taking compaſſion on the people, whom he knew to dye by the extremity of the Famine and Peſtilence, onely through the obſtinacie of ſome among them; being deſirous to deliuer them without long delay, he erected new Terraſſes vp aloft, and began to batter the third wall, called Antonia, verie difficult to be ſurprized. This Antonia, was a moſt magnificent building, and very ſtrongly munited nere to the Temple, foure ſquare in forme, and carrying the greatneſſe of a very large Caſtle. Herod the Great had builded it, in fauour of the Soueraigne Sacrificers, and gaue it the name of Marke Anthony the Triumuire. Within that goodly Monument, the Ornaments belonging to the High-Prieſtes were continually kept.

Battery playing on Antonia the thirde wall.

Herode the Great builded this Antonia.

The

The Antonia wonne.

The ſixt day, the Antonia was wonne, becauſe the walls fell downe of thēſelues, on that ſide where the Iewes hadde vndermined, to get foorth of the Cittie, with intent to burne the enemies rampiers.

The ſurprizing and burning of the Temple.

The eight day of Loion, which is the moneth of Auguſt, after that the Iewes had beene many times exhorted, to deſire peace of ſo gracious a Conquerour; after they had repulſed his often Ambaſſages by baſe iniuries, and wicked abuſes: the Temple was forcibly taken, beeing a worke well worthy of admiration. And (contrary to the Edict of Titus) it was ſet on fire by the offended Souldiers. So that it burned the very ſame day, when as (ſix hundred, threeſcore, and nineteen yeares before paſt) it was burned by Nabuchodonoſor, Collonell of the Chaldeans.

The batterie of the City of Dauid.

The twentith day, was the batterie of the high Towne (called the City of Dauid) begunne: after that the Iewes (once more admoniſhed to lay downe Armes) refuſed peace, being gently offered vnto them.

The hie town taken.

The ſeuenth day of Gorpiaion, which is our September, the high part of the City was taken: the Fortreſſe whereof was the Temple, as the Antonia was Bulwarke to the Temple.

All the Cittie burnt.

The eight day, all the City of Ieruſalem, (pilled & ranſacked before) was conuerted all into aſhes.

The Natiuity of Domitian celebrated by Titus, with the death of 3000. Iewes.

The foure and twentith day of October, Titus celebrating the birth-day of his brother Domitian in Cæſarea (a Cittie on the Sea-coaſt) had Playes there of ſundry kindes: wherin were brought forth three thouſand Iewes captiues; ſome of them being deuoured by beaſts, the reſt killing one another, fencing and fighting each againſt another.

Titus honoured his fathers birth day.

The ſeuenth day of Nouember, Titus went to Berytha, a City in Syria, where he celebrated the Natiuity of his Father Veſpaſian; & where (in ſports & paſtimes preſented before the Romans and Grecians) a great nūber of captiue Iewes, were ſome trodden to death, others hackt, hewed, and torne in peeces.

The cheefe reaſon why the Author made the collection of theſe hiſtories

I haue collected this ſmall diſcourſe, concerning the wofull conſummation of this Citty, which ſometime was the principall ſeate of Gods people, and of his diuine Doctrine: from the eight yeare of King Dauids reigne, vntill the finall deſtruction, being eleuen hundred, thirtie and ſeuen yeares. The due Obſeruation whereof, may ſerue to teſtify the mighty anger of God, againſt the deſpiſers of his Sonne, and of his word in him reuealed; exampling vs, from falling into the like calamities, either by a violent appetite of oppreſſing the true Doctrine, or to darken & obſcure it by falſe interpretations, or (vtterly contemning it) by wandering into euery wickedneſſe.

His returne backe to the former hiſtory of King Agrippa.

Now I returne againe to Agrippa, who (according as hath beene ſayde) deteſting the furious madneſſe of his Nation, and euidently fore-ſeeing their wofull ruine) ſent ayde to Veſpaſian, making Warre againſt the Iewes, and by that means partly ſaued his owne Countries, from the lamentable ſpoile happening in this warre.

The death of Nero, and ſucceſſion of Galba.

Nero being dead, and Galba choſen Emperour, he proiected a iourney to Rome, with Titus the ſonne of Veſpaſian, to entreate the confirmation in his kingdome by the new made Emperor. But contrary winds intercepting them, they could not compaſſe what was intended: but receyued tydings neere vnto Achaia, of Galbaes death: which was the reaſon, that Titus returned towards Syria, Agrippa holding on his courſe for Rome.

Agrippaes intended iourney to Rome.

But Italy beeing embraced with ciuill warre, becauſe Otho (ſucceſſor to Galba) being ſlaine, and Vitellius preſuming to the Empire, Agrippa was very haſtily called backe to Iudea by Letters, where he aſſiſted Veſpaſian to bee ſaluted Emperor by his ſoldiers, and ſafely to conduct a well prouided Armie towardes Italy, with purpoſe to encounter the Captaines of Vitellius.

Vitellius contending, Veſpaſian is ſaluted Emperor.

So he left his ſonne Titus (with ſome legions) to beate down the Iewes, eſpecially them of Ieruſalem, as hath bin ſaid before.

How long Agrippa reigned and when hee dyed.

I finde no other matter of Agrippa, or any other of the poſterity of Herode the Great: but onely Philo, writing of Agrippa, ſaith; That he reigned ſeuen and twenty yeares. He dyed then (by Philoes account) in the threeſcore and eighteenth yeare of Chriſt, the ſeauenth of Veſpaſian, and the fift yeare after the deſtruction of Ieruſalem.

Agripine, ſonne and ſucceſſor to K. Agrippa.

Philo further ſaith, that this Agrippa had a ſonne, named Agripine, who reigned thirty yeares after the death of his father: wherefore he attained to the yeare an hundred dred and eight after the death of Christ, and to the eight of Traiane the Emperor, which yeare Philo, being ouer-spent with yeares, foretold would be the last of his reigne.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of three great and notable Doubtes, which the ancient Philosophers knew not how to resolue, and for what cause.

The naturall illumination of ancient Philosophers.

THE ancient Philosophers, illumined by the gifte of God, made curious search into all things belonging to nature: and verified al their propositions (without contradiction or repugnancie) by other propositions meerly naturall. Notwithstanding, they neuer knew how to resolue three things, verie doubtfull and of importance, neyther could yeelde a reason for the causes of their originall.

The first doubt a naturall desire in man neuer to dye.

The first was, that they well knewe a desire giuen to man by nature, that hee would neuer dye, neither feele any paine or greeuance whatsoeuer: but to liue happily in the pleasures of this world, without the want or neede of any thing; and yet hee could neuer attaine to the end thereof. On the other side, hauing made this proposition, that God and Nature neuer did any thing in vaine, & that this appetite in man ensued thence, whereof they coueted to finde the cause; considering beside, that in all other naturall effects the proposition alwayes did verifie it selfe: they were vtterly confounded in infinite perplexities, being neuer able to compasse the end.

The second doubt, a libidinous and sensuall desire in man to the flesh.

The second was, they said & affirmed naturally in like manner, that euery man felt in himselfe a peruerse carnall inclination, or sensuality, quite contrarie to the former appetite of vnwillingnesse to dye: and yet this carnall lusting desire, causeth a man fall into diuers diseases, which are the abridging of life, yea hasteneth on death, wherto his other appetite is an vtter enemy.

Moreouer, many couet after riches and pompe, seeking to winne them couragiously in the field; where soonest of all they meete with death, or else bear away wounds, maimes, afflictions of mind, & other misfortunes, quite contrary to their desire indeed.

The 3. doubt, the peruersion of Natures order in the body of man.

The third doubt proceeded from the order of nature, all inferiour things beeing gouerned by their superiour: as wee see the elements obedient to the celestial bodies; the Orbes and Spheres to the mouing intelligence, and all the intelligences to the cheefest of al, which is God loued and desired. Onely in man is this order peruerted; for he being composed of a soule and a body, the flesh which is the vilest part of all other, stands repugnant to reason, yea and to the soul, which is the very noblest part of all: and (which is farre worse) draweth it to the bent of his owne wicked will. And therefore the Apostle saide; That hee felt a Lawe in his members, repugnāt to the law of his thoghts, and attracted him to sin.

The soule is the most noble part of all other in man.

The Philosophers that were before the comming of Christ, neuer knew how to find out the occasion of this disorder: yet making curious search for it, fell into many and sundry errors. Wherefore Anagoras saide: This exorbitant irregularity, happened at the beginning of the world, and when all things were confused in the ancient Chaos. For the intellect being separated by discord, and reioyned by concord, all things were created good, and well ordered in their kinde: onely man excepted, whose flesh hee saw to be ill disposed, and disagreeing with the reasonable soule. And therefore, euen as in that Chaos these two things were discordant: so in like manner afterward, they still continued repugnant, contrary to the rule & order of all other things in the world. In this manner, this poore Philosopher imputed the blame of all, to the Diuine intellect, which is God himselfe.

The opinion and saying of Anaxagoras, concerning the discordāce of things in the Chaos.

The iudgement of some other Philophers, and Aristotle himselfe.

Others saide: That this proceeded from the celestiall constellations, vnder the which man is engendred, and receiueth birth. For Aristotle durst neuer bee so bolde, as (openly) to yeeld a resolution of this doubtfull difficulty; but seemed (as it were) to contradict himselfe sometimes, saying; Sensuality is naturally enclined to euil, howbeit (with great difficulty) it may sometime be ruled or tamed by the moral vertues. And in another place he saith, That the felicitie licity which is atcheeued by the vertues morall, is the gift of God. By consequence then those morall vertues, in whose operation the happinesse of man doth consist; must be the gift of GOD, and no way naturall.

The Manichees maintained a man to haue two soules.

Contrarywise, the Manichees, desirous to render a reason for this peruerse disorder, saide: That there were two soules in man, the one good, made of the substance of the Prince of Light; and the other badde, made of the substance of the Prince of darkenesse, and these do cause this continuall combate in man.

Origens conceit of this irregularitie in man.

Origen afterward saide; That before the creation of the world, all things were conserued in Heauen which sinned against God: & therefore (as a punishment) they were disposed into ill complexioned bodies, and from thence ensued this controuersie in man.

Aug. in Lib. 1. De duab. enim. Et in lib. 2. de Nat. boni.

All these detestable opinions wer confuted by Saint Augustine, writing against the Manichees; where, by long & pregnant reasons, hee prooueth the occasion of the subuersion of this order; and that because they had no vnderstanding in the sacred Scriptures, they vtterly lost that light. For in them is declared to vs, the full resolution of these doubts, and there may plainly be discerned, that these two propositions are good and true, and both of them in the order of Nature. To wit, that God and nature neuer did any thing voide of purpose, and that it is very conuenable, that a man (by nature) should not desire to dye, but to leade a happie kinde of life, and yet without power of attaining thereto; not because he hath this desire giuen him in vaine, for it is truely naturall: but to obtaine the end and effect therof, is a matter accidental to man, and not naturall.

Both the propositions approoued to be good and true

God created man immortall, and not to dye.

For it is plain and apparant, that God created man immortall, in such sort, as effectually (according to the very soundest opinion of all Diuines) he could not haue dyed, nor be subiected to any miserie, if hee had obserued his commaundement. But hauing transgressed, hee ought iustly to suffer death, and the miseries of the world; therefore, because he obeyed not his command, he incurred death and all afflictions. So that by the sinne of disobedience (as the Apostle said) death came into the world. Hereby it appeareth thē, that death was not (at the first) natural to our prime father, neither successiuely ensuing to vs, but accidentall; beecause it was not the intention of God.

Death not natural to our first father, nor successiue to vs.

The 1. doubt resolued.

Thus come wee then to resolue this doubt, that desire not to dye, nor endure any paines; is giuen to vs by nature, and not in vaine: because the power was giuen vs to obtaine the effect, but in regard of our disobedience, the desire stil remaineth, and cannot be taken from vs. By the selfesame reason is the second doubt answered: for of our selues, by carnall obscœnity, and gluttinous gourmandize, we purchase death, and make way to this disorder.

Answer to the second.

Resolution to the third.

In like manner, the third is resolued by Adams sinne committed, whereby he lost the originall righteousnesse vvhich God had giuen him; which serued him as a bridle to moderate himselfe by iust order, and so this harmony fell into confusion. For the soule, which ought to gouern the body, as beeing the thing most noble and excellent; came afterward to bee gouerned by the sense, and by the bodye. And so wee see euidently, that this subuersion is no way naturall, but accidentall.

The confusiō on of the first concording hermony.

By this meanes then, the proposition remaineth firme & true, that those things most worthy and most noble, ought to gouerne them of lesse noble and inferior quality: which fayleth not, neyther can, as well wee may obserue in the celestiall bodies. And if in man it falleth out otherwise, it is by accident of the faulte, deseruing this and worse, but not by Nature.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of such Ceremonies as were vsed by the Romaines, before they mooued any warre.

Ceremonies for times both of peace and warre.

SVch as haue reade the sacred Ceremonies, and Religious obseruations which were vsed by the auncient Romaines, as well in matters concerning peace, as attemptes and enterprizes of warre: doe not make any wonderment at all of the great Victories by by them obtained, againſt ſo many furious people, and moſt potent nations. On the contrary alſo, they maruell not at the decadence of that Empire; which began, when they began to contemne thoſe Ceremonies and religion. For we may obſerue by infinit hiſtories, full of examples, that ſo long as they were beſt obedient to religion; their Common-weales proſpered ſo much the more happily, & the enterprizes of their Captaines fell out then ſucceſſiuely. As was well noted in Pompey, Brennus, and infinite other, who albeit they were idolaters, and neuer knew the true God: yet it ſeemed (neuertheles) that by certaine meanes of terreſtriall retribution, God fauoured them that were religious. And it might be perhaps to this end, that like as the people were then zelous in a religion, whereof they had neither foundation, or any perfect beleefe; they would (by far ſtronger reaſon) bee good obſeruers of the true faith, if it had bin reuealed to them, as now it is vnto vs. The effects then make it euident, that heauen neuer left them, without ſome apparance of good proſperity, & fortunate ſucceſſe in their temporall affaires.

Contempt of religious Ceremonies, ouerthrew the Roman Empire.

The Ceremonies which the auncient Romaines obſerued in times of warre or peace, were many and diuers: wherein I muſt needs be ſilent, becauſe the relating of them all, would require more time thē I am alowed; and it might offend to ſpeak of ſome, and not of other. My intent therfore is, to make relation of fiue only, and eſpecially by them obſerued, before war was mooued againſt any Prouince. To the end, that moderne Princes may perceiue, how farre out of the way they wander, in attempting war inconſiderately, & making no conſultation firſt to GOD: wherein (if they iudge rightly) they may conceiue, that ill ſucceſſe happeneth to them by no other occaſion, they liuing in Religion ſo farre inferiour to Ethnickes and Idolaters.

Many & ſundry ceremonies among the olde Romanes.

Inſtruction for our modern Princes in attempting warre.

When newes came to Rome, concerning the rebellion of ſome Prouince, or of any trouble giuen by ſome barbarous Prince to their countries, or to anie of their confederates: they ſent ambaſſadors to him, by whom the Senate gaue to vnderſtand, that they would know, in what maner the wrong receiued ſhould be repaired, with refraining from offering the like afterward; wherein finding obſtinacy then war was intimated. The Senate hauing created a Captain for this expedition, called the Sacrificers, who were commanded to inuocate the Gods with their prayers: for the Romans neuer went forth to ſhed the blood of their enemies, vntill the Prieſts had firſt wept, and made their ſolemne prayers in the Temples. Afterward, the Senate beeing aſſembled, went to the temple of Iupiter, wher they ſwore a moſt ſolemn oath. That at all times when the enemy (againſt whom the inſtant warre was publiſhed) would require a new confederation with them, or deſire pardon for the offence paſt; clemency ſhould neuer be denied him. This being don, the Conſul elected for the enterprize, went to the Capitole, and there made a ſolemne vow, to ſuch a one of the Gods in whom he repoſed cōfidence, to offer ſome ſingular thing vnto him, if he returned home victorious from the war. And were the offering of neuer ſo great value, yet the people ſtoode obliged to pay it. Then the banner of the Eagle, being the ancient enſigne of the Romans, was broght forth into Campus Martius; which they did, to let the people vnderſtand, that in Rome ther might no feaſts be celebrated, ſo long as their fellow Citizens and kindred were in war: & ſo bringing out the enſignes, deliuered them to their ſeueral Captains. But firſt, a Prætor mounted on the gate ealled Salaria, cauſing a Trumpet there to ſound, while the ſoldiers receiued their pay. Wherby may be gathered, that they ſtird not their armies at any time, till they had firſt appeaſed and honored their Gods, and likewiſe made their oriſons for the proſperitie of their Captains, and vertuous carriage to their enemies in conquering them. For, if their Conſuls (appointed for war) in cōquering any Prouince or city, made not euident teſtimony, aſwell of their vertue as valor, they were greeuouſly puniſhed by the Senat. Hereof we haue many examples, but two only ſhall ſerue my turn: the one for vſing vertue in his campe; the other, for due puniſhment inflicted vpon him, who (being victorious) ſoiled his reputation in baſe manner. Fabritius, beeing encamped with his army of Romanes before Fidena, a ſchoolmaſter of the Cittie came forth with the Sonnes of diuers principall Cittizens, as intending to gratifie tifie the Conſull with them, and ſo preſented them vnto him. The Conſull (albeit hee might haue detayned them, and and thereby haue made himſelfe Lord of the Cittie) not onely refuſed to accept them: but ſtripping the Schoolemaiſter naked, and binding his hands, hee gaue a Rod to euery Scholler, and ſo ſent them (whipping him) backe to their fathers. This benignitie tooke ſuch preuayling power in the ſoules of the Cittizens; that they yeelded themſelues inſtantly to the Romaines.

The other was thus. In the yeare of Romes foundation, 318. warre was deliberated by the Senate and Conſulles, againſt the Sarmates, and other people inhabiting by the Mountaine Caucaſus, which (according to Coſmographers) deuiding Aſia in the middeſt, terminateth Syria on the one ſide, and finiſheth India on the other; where, by extremitie of cold, the Vine hath no ability to grow. Lucius Pius was created Conſull, and appointed for this expedition; where, waging cruell warre againſt them: Fortune was one while fauourable to him, & then againe frowning. But in the time of a truce concluded betweene them, Lucius very friendly entertained the Sarmates Captaines, and hauing diuers times banketted them, perceiuing that they were lickerouſly affected to wine, becauſe it was a rarity among them; at laſt he made them a bountifull feaſt, wherein he fitted them with great plenty of wine; that they (in drunken loue to him) yeelded the whole Prouince tributary to the Roman people. The warres ſo concluding, & the Conſull being returned to Rome, hee demanded Triumphes; which not only was denied him by the Senate, but alſo his forme of victory ſo abhorred by thē, that publikely they did put him to death, and for his greater defamation, engraued an Epitaph on his Tombe, ſpeaking in this manner.

The Conſuls of Rome make warre againſt the Sarmates and Lucius Pius was appointed for the expeditiō.

Wine brought that to paſſe, which warre had not the power to doe.

The Epitaph appointed by the Romaines, to be engrauen on the Tombe of Lucius Pius.

Here lyeth the Conſull Lucius Pius; who, not by Armes in the fielde, but by carrowſing at his Table; not by the Lance, but plenty of wine, conquered the Sarmates.

An Epitaph fit for a quaffing Conqueror.

And yet the Senate, not ſatisfied with this his diſgrace, cauſed publikely to bee proclaimed thoroughout Rome, that all (whatſoeuer) had bene wonne in the Romaine peoples name, by Lucius Pius, ſhold be accounted as nothing. And wrote (moreouer) to the Sarmates, that they denyed any Conqueſt of them; but referred them vnto their former priuiledge and liberty.

THE SEVENTH BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

¶ Of the Gouernement and Administration of Iustice obſerued in the Commonwealth of Luca.

LVca is a noble Cittie (ſeated in the Country of Tuſcany) ſo called of Lucomenus, King of the Tuſcanes. Strabo ſaith, that Luca is a Citie neare to the mountaines of Luna (and nowadayes the Country is called Lunigiana) and that the Region yeeldeth very woorthy men, apt and able in valour for Armes: there being a multitude of knights, from whom the Senate receiued the Military order.

Strabo lib. 5.

Concerning the Country Lunigiana.

But becauſe we are to diſcourſe of our times, I ſay, that Luca is now found to be about two miles in circuite, ſeated ſingularly, and in a good place. It containeth about foure and thirty thouſand perſons within the walles; and there are rich families, becauſe the men of this Citty do trafficke greatly in merchandiſe, and eſpecially in matters of Silkes: for which (amongeſt all Chriſtians) they haue no meane name. In the time of Caſtrucio Caſtracani (who was of the Interminelli) he became Lord thereof, there beeing a diuiſion of many families, that would not obey a Tyrant; they vſed the Arte of making ſilke together, deriuing great wealth from diuers parts of Italie. They brought alſo into Florence, the Artes of making cloth of golde and ſiluer, whereby they attained to ineſtimable riches. The men are (naturally) very curteous and modeſt, not niggardly, but bountifull, and therefore proſperity commeth the more freely vpon them. The Lucan tongue in Tuſcany, is held to be very ſweete and pure, becauſe they haue no medling with noyous accents, which are common to all other cities of the Prouince. This ſo ſmall a cittie, hath a long time maintained it ſelfe in freedome, and ſo ſtill doth, with good and ſubſtantiall orders.

The ſituation, compaſſe, and number of the people, & their chiefeſt trading in Silkes.

The working of Cloth of gold & ſiluer.

The Language ſweete and delicate.

The Councell.

HEr maine foundation (as it is in all other Common-wealths) conſiſtes of the Councell; becauſe on them depend, and from them are deriued all the other Magiſtrates, that are members of a bodie ſo well ordered. Theſe Councellors do diſcourſe on the State occaſions, and are (indeede) Fathers of that Common-wealth, It is compounded of three kindes of perſons, becauſe ſome are ordinarily of the Councel, and they continue a whole yeare. Some others are inuited ad bene placitum, and are not ordinary. Some others are ſubrogated in the place of ſuch as die, and ſo endure for a full yeare. This Councell conſiſteth of an hundred and three ſcore Cittizens, but ordinarily are in number an hundred and twentie.

The power for creating all other Magiſtrates.

Three ſeuerall degrees of Councellors.

The Signoria.

The City of Luca is diuided into three parts, which (there) they vſe to tearme Terzieri: The one is of S. Saluadore, the ſecond of S. Pauline, and the third of S. Martine, The Councell doe elect the Signorie from the three forenamed Terzieri, that is, for euery Terziero they create three men, which are nine in ful number. Beſide theſe, they elect the Gonfaloniere, who is the head, or chiefe of the Common-wealth, & (for examples ſake) he is firſt elected from the Terziero of S. Sauiour; next from that of Saint Pauline; and the third time from that of Saint Martine: and the Terzieri being once ſo gone ouer, the Gonfaloniere returneth for election to S. Sauiour, and ſo ſucceſſiuely (each after other) according to the foreſaid order.

Elders, Conſorts, or Companions.

By theſe men, and by the Gonfaloniere liuing abroad, other are to be elected, called Antiani, and the election is made in this manner. Three men are choſen, whō they tearme Aſſortitori, one for each Terziero. Theſe, haue the charge of counting the Ballots of them that are elected, culling out ſuch as they think fitteſt, after that the Councell haue made choyſe of many men, and then they elect the Gonfaloniere. And in making this election, the Aſſortitori ſit in Councell ſeparately in a place, and account the Ballots vntill they come to the number: which beeing not compleate, they reballot them ouer againe, vntill they be an hundred & eighty in number. And neither ſuch as are ſubrogated, nor the other ballotted, are publiſhed to the Councel; but onely are made knowne to the Aſſortitori. And becauſe no fraud or deceit may enſu by the Aſſortitori, two principall choſen Fryars are as their aſſiſtants; one of the order of S. Dominicke, and the other of S. Frances.

Acount made of the Ballots to their full number, or els rebalotted ouer againe.

The authority of the Aſſortitori in bringing the elected perſons to the Magiſtrates.

Theſe Aſſortitori haue Authoritie, to bring the men elected to the Magiſtrates, at ſuch time as they think fitting in ſeueral months: and this deputation done by the Aſſortitori (who are the prime men of Luca:) it is kept by them in ſecret, & they are ſworne not to reueale it. The Aſſortitori created, then they create the Seignory, who cannot bee vanquiſhed, if they haue two third partes of the Ballots, althogh the foreſaid Ballots are to be ſeen by none but onely by the Aſſortitori. The charge of the Seignory is to hear (freely) matters of iuſtice and puniſhment, being alwaies preſent in the Palace, & may not depart thence vnder capitall penalty: the publike purſe payeth their expences.

Their abiding in the Palace.

By this forenamed body of ten, one other officer is choſen, whom they call Comandatore, and this new man they make neere vnto them, his gouernment laſting no longer then three daies: in which time he hath liberty and authority to commād all the other; yea, and the Gonfaloniere, & is Patron in euery buſines. And although the ſupplications which com to the Signory, are preſented to the Comandatore, & if he wil not preſent them to the colledge of the Lordes or Signiors, they remaine with him: yet notwithſtanding he cānot diſpoſe of them without the authoritie of the Signiory. And if the Comandatore propone the ſupplications to the Signorie, & there they paſſe two thirds; the Gonfaloniere propones them afterwardes in the Councell. The authority of the Signorie extendeth vnto ſtraungers, but not ouer the Citizens: and they propone al things, but conclude nothing.

The power of the Comandatore.

Of Supplications preſented to the Comendatore.

The extent of the Signories power.

The Secretaries Office.

The Office of the Secretaries (who are three in number) is very important. Theſe men haue authority, onely in matters offenſiue to the maieſty of the Commonwealth, being abſolute in that caſe, & are aboue the Gonfaloniere. But true it is, that they can do nothing without the Gonfaloniere; and before they conclude any action, they muſt tender the cauſe vnto the Councell. Sometime it falleth out, that ſeeking iudiciouſly into the matter, they accompliſh it, & afterward render a reaſon for it to the Councel, when they haue done it: either, becauſe they coulde not congregate the Councell in the inſtant, or in regarde the cauſe neceſſarily required, to haue ſuch ſodaine expedition.

Three Secretaries, and the import of their authoritie.

The Councell of Conference.

The Colloquie, or Councell of Conference, is compoſed of 18. Citizens, and they are elected by the Councell. Theſe men, if the Lordes are doubtfull in any matter, and that the caſe cannot be eaſily deliberated: they meet together, and diſcourſe on the cauſe propounded to the Councell; and after they haue diſcuſſed it pregnantly, then they determine together, whether it is to bee granted by the Councell, or no.

18. Citizens in this Office of Colloquie, & their charg.

The Councell of ſixe.

Theſe ſix men (being of ſound reputation) haue charge of the expences & profits for common imployment. They prouide and command all things, which paſſe in mony accounts, and are as Gouernors of the rents and reuennewes. They haue alſo a Chamberlaine, who is the executer of their deliberations. And all theſe are likewiſe choſen by the greater Councell.

As Cuſtomers or Receyuers of rents & reuennues for generall vſe.

The Rota.

In many Cities of Italy, this office is ordinary, conſiſting of three forraine Doctors, within the compaſſe of fiftie miles. One of them hath the Title of Poteſtata; the

They change their places & offices by turnes.

the second is Iudge of malefactors; & the third is Iudge in ciuill causes. By turnes they haue their seuerall changes, and euery sixe moneths, one of the Centers as Potestate, beeing first iudge of malefactors; and his Office of Potestate beeing past, hee becommeth Iudge in causes ciuill. So that each one of them is Potestate, Iudge for Malefactours, and Iudge in ciuil occasions, as it comes to his turn. If the Potestate haue (perhaps) a Citizen in his power; he doth no more but form the Processe, and sets downe (in writing) his owne opinion, what is the merite of the delinquent, and so it passeth vnto the Councell, who either commend, teare, or temper the opinion and sentence of the Potestate; and then in such a case, the Potestate entreth into the Councell. On strangers, the Potestate may absolutely determine, without any other: And in breefe, these three men do also discourse on ciuill matters.

Matter of the Potestates power.

The Marchants Court.

Nine Officers and a forrain Iudge.

These Officers are nine in number, being elected (by threes) out of the Terzieroes. They haue a forraine Doctour for their Iudge, being their Assistant. They iudge in causes appertaining to merchandise, their authority stretching (in the said matters) to blood.

The Office for Store.

Officers for the Cities plenty of corn

In like manner there are nine Officers, & so chosen out of the Terzieroes. These men are the prouiders of Corne, that the Citty may continually be furnished therwith, and they hear all causes concerning the matter. Prouision still beeing made for euery three yeares, and the Garners diligently respected where the Corne is kept, being still supplied, that there may be no want.

Six Commissioners.

Commissaries for occasions of warre and their prouisiõ

And becaus thoroughout the whole Countie, certain assemblies are ordained of such persons as are meete to manage armes: for this especiall businesses, and such occasions as may happen in times of warre; these sixe Commissaries haue authoritie to muster and make ready bãds of Souldiers, and all such things as are requisite for them. Whatsoeuer belongeth to this businesse, passeth thorough theyr power, and their sentence in them carieth allowance.

For Health.

Presidents appointed for wholsome dyet, and cleane keeping the Citie.

There are likewise three especiall Presidents, for matters concerning the countries health. These Officers do regard, that all the food may be sound and good; that all filth and vncleanesse may be sent out of the Citty, and men imploying all diligence, to conserue the people from being offended by any pestifferous accident, or whatsoeuer annoyance may be preiudiciall to health.

The Councell for disobedience.

Slothfull Rogues and idle vagabonds.

And becaus in euery Citty, there are found too many persons, not enclineable to any goodnesse, but practising to liue viciously, addicting themselues to lewde courses, and are meerely opposite to all well instituted rules, for liuing ciuilly, & in good order; therefore the men of Luca haue a Councel, which they entitle, for disobedience, and inflicting punishment on such (as by their vile example) may be the ruine of a well-policied Commonwealth. And the forme of their discipline (in this case) carieth some correspondencie with the Ostracisme vsed amongst the Athenians; only herein is this difference, that the Athenians banished such, whose greatnesse and power grew suspitious to the people, and so sentenced them for ten years, whereas here it extended but to rascality onely, and the sentence lasting but three yeares.

Banishment giuen for 3. yeares.

The Office for Lodgings.

A good and prouident care and meete to be vsed in euery well gouerned Citie.

Eight Gentlemen are appointed to this Office, who haue charge for vnderstanding the affaires of all strangers comming into the Citty, and what businesses they haue there. All hosts stand bound to giue in writing the names of such Guestes, as come from any part abroad, and are not of the Citty, and those names they must deliuer to these officers. And if perchãce some one tell a lye, reporting one thing for another; he is then examined by the strappado, becaus the truth of his businesse there, ought to be knowne. Such as approue themselues good and honest, being no spies or treachers to the Citie, are kindely entertained, their Lodginges orderly appointed, and their expences well respected.

The Guard.

The Signorie electeth an hundred Soldiours, liuing within fifty miles compasse, to bee as a Guarde for the Pallace, for election to S. Saviour, and ſo ſucceſſiuely (each after other) according to the foreſaid order.

Elders, Conſorts, or Companions.

By theſe men, and by the Gonfaloniere liuing abroad, other are to be elected, called Antiani, and the election is made in this manner. Three men are choſen, whō they tearme Aſſortitori, one for each Terziero. Theſe, haue the charge of counting the Ballots of them that are elected, culling out ſuch as they think fitteſt, after that the Councell haue made choyſe of many men, and then they elect the Gonfaloniere. And in making this election, the Aſſortitori ſit in Councell ſeparately in a place, and account the Ballots vntill they come to the number: which beeing not compleate, they reballot them ouer againe, vntill they be an hundred & eighty in number. And neither ſuch as are ſubrogated, nor the other ballotted, are publiſhed to the Councel; but onely are made knowne to the Aſſortitori. And becauſe no fraud or deceit may enſu by the Aſſortitori, two principall choſen Fryars are as their aſſiſtants; one of the order of S. Dominicke, and the other of S. Frances.

Acount made of the Ballots to their full number, or els rebalotted ouer againe.

The authority of the Aſſortitori in bringing the elected perſons to the Magiſtrates.

Theſe Aſſortitori haue Authoritie, to bring the men elected to the Magiſtrates, at ſuch time as they think fitting in ſeueral months: and this deputation done by the Aſſortitori (who are the prime men of Luca:) it is kept by them in ſecret, & they are ſworne not to reueale it. The Aſſortitori created, then they create the Seignory, who cannot bee vanquiſhed, if they haue two third partes of the Ballots, althogh the foreſaid Ballots are to be ſeen by none but onely by the Aſſortitori. The charge of the Seignory is to hear (freely) matters of iuſtice and puniſhment, being alwaies preſent in the Palace, & may not depart thence vnder capitall penalty: the publike purſe payeth their expences.

Their abiding in the Palace.

By this forenamed body of ten, one other officer is choſen, whom they call Comandatore, and this new man they make neere vnto them, his gouernment laſting no longer then three daies: in which time he hath liberty and authority to commād all the other; yea, and the Gonfaloniere, & is Patron in euery buſines. And although the ſupplications which com to the Signory, are preſented to the Comandatore, & if he wil not preſent them to the colledge of the Lordes or Signiors, they remaine with him: yet notwithſtanding he cānot diſpoſe of them without the authoritie of the Signiory. And if the Comandatore propone the ſupplications to the Signorie, & there they paſſe two thirds; the Gonfaloniere propones them afterwardes in the Councell. The authority of the Signorie extendeth vnto ſtraungers, but not ouer the Citizens: and they propone al things, but conclude nothing.

The power of the Comandatore.

The extent of the Signories power.

The Secretaries Office.

Of Supplications preſented to the Comendatore.

The Office of the Secretaries (who are three in number) is very important. Theſe men haue authority, onely in matters offenſiue to the maieſty of the Commonwealth, being abſolute in that caſe, & are aboue the Gonfaloniere. But true it is, that they can do nothing without the Gonfaloniere; and before they conclude any action, they muſt tender the cauſe vnto the Councell. Sometime it falleth out, that ſeeking iudiciouſly into the matter, they accompliſh it, & afterward render a reaſon for it to the Councel, when they haue done it: either, becauſe they coulde not congregate the Councell in the inſtant, or in regarde the cauſe neceſſarily required, to haue ſuch ſodaine expedition.

Three Secretaries, and the import of their authoritie.

The Councell of Conference.

The Colloquie, or Councell of Conference, is compoſed of 18. Citizens, and they are elected by the Councell. Theſe men, if the Lordes are doubtfull in any matter, and that the caſe cannot be eaſily deliberated: they meet together, and diſcourſe on the cauſe propounded to the Councell; and after they haue diſcuſſed it pregnantly, then they determine together, whether it is to bee granted by the Councell, or no.

18. Citizens in this Office of Colloquie, & their charg.

The Councell of ſixe.

Theſe ſix men (being of ſound reputation) haue charge of the expences & profits for common imployment. They prouide and command all things, which paſſe in mony accounts, and are as Gouernors of the rents and reuennewes. They haue alſo a Chamberlaine, who is the executer of their deliberations. And all theſe are likewiſe choſen by the greater Councell.

As Cuſtomers or Receyuers of rents & reuennues for generall vſe.

The Rota.

In many Cities of Italy, this office is ordinary, conſiſting of three forraine Doctors, within the compaſſe of fiftie miles. One of them hath the Title of Poteſtata; the

The Doctors liuing out of the Cities Iuriſdiction.

They change their places & offices by turnes.

the ſecond is Iudge of malefactors; & the third is Iudge in ciuill cauſes. By turnes they haue their ſeuerall changes, and euery ſixe moneths, one of the Centers as Poteſtate, beeing firſt iudge of malefactors; and his Office of Poteſtate beeing paſt, hee becommeth Iudge in cauſes ciuill. So that each one of them is Poteſtate, Iudge for Malefactours, and Iudge in ciuil occaſions, as it comes to his turn.

Matter of the Poteſtates power.

If the Poteſtate haue (perhaps) a Citizen in his power; he doth no more but form the Proceſſe, and ſets downe (in writing) his owne opinion, what is the merite of the delinquent, and ſo it paſſeth vnto the Councell, who either commend, teare, or temper the opinion and ſentence of the Poteſtate; and then in ſuch a caſe, the Poteſtate entreth into the Councell. On ſtrangers, the Poteſtate may abſolutely determine, without any other: And in breefe, theſe three men do alſo diſcourſe on ciuill matters.

The Marchants Court.

Nine Officers and a forrain Iudge.

Theſe Officers are nine in number, being elected (by threes) out of the Terzieroes. They haue a forraine Doctour for their Iudge, being their Aſſiſtant. They iudge in cauſes appertaining to merchandiſe, their authority ſtretching (in the ſaid matters) to blood.

The Office for Store.

Officers for the Cities plenty of corn

In like manner there are nine Officers, & ſo choſen out of the Terzieroes. Theſe men are the prouiders of Corne, that the Citty may continually be furniſhed therwith, and they hear all cauſes concerning the matter. Prouiſion ſtill beeing made for euery three yeares, and the Garners diligently reſpected where the Corne is kept, being ſtill ſupplied, that there may be no want.

Six Commiſſioners.

Commiſſaries for occaſions of warre and their prouiſiõ

And becauſe thoroughout the whole Countie, certain aſſemblies are ordained of ſuch perſons as are meete to manage armes: for this eſpeciall buſineſſes, and ſuch occaſions as may happen in times of warre; theſe ſixe Commiſſaries haue authoritie to muſter and make ready bãds of Souldiers, and all ſuch things as are requiſite for them. Whatſoeuer belongeth to this buſineſſe, paſſeth thorough theyr power, and their ſentence in them carieth allowance.

For Health.

Preſidents appointed for wholſome dyet, and cleane keeping the Citie.

There are likewiſe three eſpeciall Preſidents, for matters concerning the countries health. Theſe Officers do regard, that all the food may be ſound and good; that all filth and vncleanneſſe may be ſent out of the Citty, and men imploying all diligence, to conſerue the people from being offended by any peſtifferous accident, or whatſoeuer annoyance may be preiudiciall to health.

The Councell for diſobedience.

Slothfull Rogues and idle vagabonds.

And becauſe in euery Citty, there are found too many perſons, not enclineable to any goodneſſe, but practiſing to liue viciouſly, addicting themſelues to lewde courſes, and are meerely oppoſite to all well inſtituted rules, for liuing ciuilly, & in good order; therefore the men of Luca haue a Councel, which they entitle, for diſobedience, and inflicting puniſhment on ſuch (as by their vile example) may be the ruine of a well-policied Commonwealth. Baniſhment giuen for 3. yeares.

The Office for Lodgings.

A good and prouident care and meete to be vſed in euery well gouerned Citie.

Eight Gentlemen are appointed to this Office, who haue charge for vnderſtanding the affaires of all ſtrangers comming into the Citty, and what buſineſſes they haue there. All hoſts ſtand bound to giue in writing the names of ſuch Gueſtes, as come from any part abroad, and are not of the Citty, and thoſe names they muſt deliuer to theſe officers. And if perchãce ſome one tell a lye, reporting one thing for another; he is then examined by the ſtrappado, becauſe the truth of his buſineſſe there, ought to be knowne. Such as approue themſelues good and honeſt, being no ſpies or treachers to the Citie, are kindely entertained, their Lodginges orderly appointed, and their expences well reſpected.

The Guard.

The Signorie electeth an hundred Soldiours, liuing within fifty miles compaſſe, to bee as a Guarde for the Pallace, and out of this hundred are choſen Captaines and Collonels. Theſe men haue good Wages, if they be called to guard the Walles in the night time: wheras otherwiſe, the guard for the wals conſiſteth of Cittizens artificers, ſuch as haue wiues and children, and are waged with three Crownes each man euery month. At the gates ſtand men of the country, and each gate alſo hath two Cittizens Commiſſaries: one of them being there early in the morning at the gates opening, & ſo continuing til dinner time; and at his parting commeth the other, who ſtayeth there til Euening, when the gates are ſhutte in againe.

Citizens are the watch and guard for the walles.

CHAP. II.

What benefite and honor it is to a Prince, to haue a comely bodye, a gracious countenance, and venerable aſpect.

Beauty of body is no mean bleſsing in a Prince.

ONE of the parts (in mine opinion) which maketh the Maieſtie of a Prince to bee moſt venerable (ſpeaking of exteriour graces) is beautie of body: which we ſee to be accompanied with ſingular grauity, and which yeeldeth argument of wiſedome and knowledge.

The ſaying of Pythagoras, concerning a crookcd body

And although the rule of Pythagoras hath often bene noted to faile, affirming, That in a crooked body, there can neuer dwell a right ſoule (becauſe we haue ſeene in an ill ſhaped body, to reigne diuers choyce vertues) yet that which is moſt frequent and ordinary, is to ſee the contrary. And if an honourable aſpect and repreſentation, ſerued to no other end in a Prince, but to encreaſe his authority and reuerence, yet are they much more dignified, if ſome ſignes of vertue and bountie doe beare them company. As on the contrary, they are diminiſhed by ill ſhape and deformity. For Cicero ſayeth; The habitude of vertue is of ſuch efficacie, that it maketh vs to loue him that is poſſeſſed therewith. Euen ſo, Maieſtie in the perſon of a Prince, hath a veneration meerely in it ſelfe, which attracteth the heartes of his ſubiects vnto loue: vrged thereunto (perhappes) by no expreſſe fantaſie, that a Prince ought to bee vertuous, and conforme his actions to the beauty of his body.

Cicer. in Tuſcul. Lib. 3. cap. 7.

Dioniſ. Areopag. in vit. Princ. ca. 17.

This reaſon (it may be) hath induced many barbarous people to iudge, that there was no man capeable of a good ſpirit, to bring any great attempt to ſucceſſfull end; but onely ſuch a one, as was endued (by nature) with a goodly proportion of body, and an honorable preſence. Macrobius declareth, that in the Iſle of Meroe on Nilus, the inhabitants (who are ſaid to liue halfe againe as long as we do) vſe to elect as their Prince, him whome they know to be the ſtrongeſt, and of far goodlier preſence then any other. There is no man, but will repute a deformed Prince, yet vertuous; ought to be preferred before him of goodly perſon, and vicious: but when wee come to make equality of them, our affection will rather leane to the comely body, then vnto the counterfeit.

The opinion of diuers barbarous nations.

Macrob. in Saturn. lib. 3. cap. 9

Affection rather fauoreth comelineſſe, then deformity.

Demetrius, the ſonne of Antigonus, was of ſuch a goodly and honourable repreſentation, that there was neither Painter or Caruer that durſt attempt to portraire him: for there was in him both a ſweete complexion, and terror mixed together, yet ioyned with ſuch manſuetude & grauity, as it plainly appeared, that hee was meerely borne, to be affected, feared, and reuerenced altogether. VVee reade of Marius (who had ſo many Triumphs) that he was of ſuch a venerable aſpect, as beeing priſoner to his enemy Silla: a French man was ſent by him to murther him. Who entering into the priſon, with his weapon ready drawne, and noting in him a verie graue and dreadfull aſpect; he became ſo diſmayed and terrified, that hee returned backe, leauing the priſon open, and (by that means) was the cauſe of preſeruing his life. Alexander the Macedonian (being but of meane ſtature, and not ouercomely countenanced) walking with his deerely affected Friend Epheſtion: the Mother of King Darius (being verie deſirous to ſalute Alexander) offered her courteſies to Epheſtion, making him many humble reuerences. For, ſeeing him to bee ſo goodly a man of perſon; ſhe verily thought, that (of neceſſity) hee muſt be Alexander.

The countenance of Marius ſaued his life in great perill.

Hiſto-

The benefit of manly apparance to Countries & Common-weales.

Historics make report, that Alcibiades, Scipio, and many other, did highly honor and make great the dignitie of their authoritie, onely by their sightly appearance: wherewith also their innated vertues being combind, did inestimable benefite to their seuerall Countries and Common-weales. On the contrary, we finde that many Princes and Captaines, as well auncient as moderne, haue bene despised for their lowe stature, and other defects of honourable presence, euen to the peril of their liues, whereof I purpose to produce two examples onely.

Example of deformity in Philopoemen Gouernor of the Achayans

Philopœmenes, Duke of the Achaians, and much renowned, was of so lowe stature, mis-shapen presence, and deformed countenance, that when he attyred himselfe in mechanicke habite (as oftentimes he vsed to doe) he seemed rather to bee of vile and vulgare place, then woorthy to haue gouernement of the people. He was greatly addicted to hunting, and therefore resorted very often to Megara. It so chaunced on a certaine day, that this desire of hunting carried him further off, then hee had any willing intent to goe: so that hee arriued at the house of a Cittizen neare adioyning, who was a singular friend of his, and had lately before beene marryed. He had but one seruant in his company; becausse the rest hee had sent to other places, and being come to his friends house, he knockt at the doore: and the women looking foorth at their window, demaunded what they would haue; when the seruant replyed, That Philopœmenes, Duke of the Achaians came to haue entertainment there.

A Citty of Achaia on the borders of Attica.

A pleasant history of Philopomens hunting.

The woman being much amazed, that a man of such worth, and so much vnexpected, should come on such a sodaine thither, and (hauing neuer seene the Duke) reputing these to be but two of his seruants, which came before to giue knowledge of his coming, becausse they were thus alone; without returning any other answer, came and opened the dore to them. When they were entred into the house, she sent one of her seruants to aduertise her husband speedily (who was then abroad at the next village:) requiring Philopœmenes & the other with him, to sit downe in the meane time, while she bestirred her selfe to prepare supper. About the house trots she and her maid, her thoughts much busied and molested, beginning one thing, and then another, but neuer going thorow or finishing any, though she had but little time of allowance. At last, looking on Philopœmenes, who sate muffled in his cloake, and might be more cold then hee would make shew of (whereat (happily) she more smiled, then at his deformitie) she, somewhat roundly (like a nimble stirring huswife) prayed him to lay by his Cloake, and help her to make a good fire, becausse her other seruants were else-where imploied, and that supper might be made readie in due time, against the coming of his Lord and maister.

The Citizens wife supposed Philopomen to be some more sightly person, then he appeared in her eye.

This doubtlesse she wold not haue done, but that she tooke him for some meane seruant.

Heereupon, he tooke a hatchet which she gaue him, and fell to cleauing wood for the kitchin: hauing formerly giuen order to his man, to take no other knowledge of him, lest the woman should discerne any scruple of the deceit. While hee stoode stoutly to this employment; home came the master of the house, who knowing Philopœmenes, and wondering to see him so homely busied; did him humble reuerence, saying; My Lord, this is no office for you to vndergoe. Whereto (smiling) hee replyed: Worthy friend, let mee alone, I doe but pay the penaltie due to my deformitie.

Philopomen cleueth wood for the Kitchen, to make ready supper.

A free confession of his own deformitie.

In our time, Ferdinand King of Spaine, who had the title of Catholike, a verywise and discreet Prince; but of stature, rather too lowe, then of any mediocritie, and although hee had a royall face, and was a man of great gouernement; yet it appeared plainely in him, that it was not correspondent to his other members. Besides, hee vsually wore his garments of cloth, whereby he was rather thought to be a Cittizen, then any way taken to be a King.

Another History of king Ferdinand, called the little King of Spaine.

The King trauailing (on a time) to Naples, accompanied with Queene Isabell, and beeing there louingly expected; by occasion of weather, hee arriued at a hauen towne on the Sea coast (called * Puteoli) with his onely Gally, the rest beeing much better prepared, remaining behinde. Landing there, he was honourably receiued by the Inhabitants, according to the extent of their power in such a place. While the Pallace was furnishing, and prouision for his diet preparing; hee walked alone by himselfe in a Hall, where where (very ſoone after) a poore blunt fiſherman came to him, who (by chance) had taken a goodly fiſh, wherewith he intended to preſent the King. The Fiſherman, not knowing him, deſired to vnderſtand where the King was: he preſently anſwered him; I am he. The Fiſherman brake foorth into loude laughter, imagining that hee had meerely mocked him; wherefore hee prayed him agayne, to tell him where the King was: and he againe affirmed himſelfe to be hee. But the Fiſherman, diſcerning in him no maieſticall reſemblance, either for his perſon or habite, and no attendants about him fitting for a King; returned backe, and carryed away the fiſh with him. Hereat the King could not choſe but ſmile, and ſome of his eſpeciall Lords and Fauourites immediately entring (after they had ſaluted him with their wonted reuerence) laughing outright, thus hee ſpake vnto them. Lordes, did yee not meete a Fiſherman going foorth? If you doe not goe and giue him aſſurance, that I am your King, wee ſhall looſe the beſt Fiſh that euer I ſaw. Inſtantly the Fiſherman returned backe againe, and beholding him (whom he ſo much neglected) to bee ſo duetifully reuerenced by ſuch worthy perſons; he beganne to conceiue in his ſoule, that (vndoubtedly) he was the King, and falling vpon his knees before him, he humbly preſented the fiſh vnto him.

* A Towne in Campania, eight miles from Naples

The conference betweene a blunt Fiſherman and the King.

The Fiſherman would not credite outward apparance.

The Kings pleaſant words to his Lords.

Wee may account this for a merry accident, in regarde of another which happned to him, and by the ſame occaſion of miſ-cenſuring his perſon. For, at another time, the ſame King being at Barcellona, going in Proceſſion with his courtly attendants, as wayting on the Sacrament, on the day dedicated to that ſollemnity: hee was ſodainely ſet vpon by a Spaniard, who gaue him ſo mightie a ſtroke with a great Dagger on his necke, as had beene ſufficient to ſmite off his head; but that the blow was rebated by a great chaine of golde, being then (accidentally) about his necke. This Spaniard being taken, and ſuſpected that hee had ſome other complices in the action; was put to the tortures, where he would confeſſe nothing elſe, but onely that he was moued out of his owne mind to do it, in meere hatred he bare to the King. Hereupon he was demaunded, what occaſion ſhould ſo prouoke him to hate the King? He anſwered; Truely nothing elſe, but becauſe his countenance did not pleaſe him, for, it appeared ſo vngracious vnto him, that if they did ſet him at libertie, yet he would kil him, whatſoeuer came of it. Queſtionleſſe, it was a ſtrange caſe, that a man ſhould ſo deſperately endanger his owne life, becauſe a King was not formed to his liking.

Another Hiſtory concerning the ſame king, but in a more diſtaſtefull manner.

The King in danger of life by his deformity.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of the inhumane actions, and monſtrous cruelties of Ariſtotimus the tyrant; a ſubiect well beſeeming a Tragedy.

Ariſtotimus, vnder the fauors, and forces of King Antigonus, tyrannically vſurped ouer the * Eleuſians, exerciſing his power ſo intemperately, that he omitted not any kinde of iniury or crueltie, whereby he might afflict the miſerable Cittizens; for he was (by nature) more inhumane and cruell, then any man liuing in his time. Hee added to this his cruel diſpoſition, the councell of barbarous men, to whom hee not only gaue the rule of the kingdome, but alſo the gardance of his owne perſon. Among all the extraordinary cruelties, that which he inflicted on Philodamus, a very honourable Cittizen, deſerueth to be recorded for a moſt eſpeciall example.

* Eleuſis a Citty in Attica neere Athens, where Ceres had a Temple.

Tyrants are commonly gouerned by barbarous perſons.

This Philodamus had a daughter of admirable beauty & ſingular graces, named Mica, on whom a ſoldier called Lucius (an eſpeciall fauourite to the Tyrant) became ſo extremely enamored; that (in a bold & imperious manner) he ſent to her father, commãding him to ſend him his daughter. Philodamus, much afflicted at ſo fawcie a commaund, & knowing what power Lucius had with the Tyrant, fearing alſo what might happen to him and her mother; laboured by perſwaſions, that his daughter ſhould go to him. But the yong Virgin, who more prized honor then life, by meere inſtinct of her noble education; fell on her knees before her father, & embracing his knee very ſtrictly, humbly entreated, that hee would not expoſe her to ſuch monſtrous diſhonour, but rather to ſee her dead before his face, then deliuer her to ſuch ſhame and indignitie.

The lamentable Hiſtory of Philodamus and his faire daughter Mica.

The vertuous entreaties of Mica to her Father.

The

The father being moued by her teares to compassion, sate downe by his wofull wife, and sorrow now sung griefe in three sad parts, which admitted no leisure for a finall resolution. Whereat Lucius growing impatient, through the violence of his hote and fiery lust, seeing the mayd not brought, according to his wicked expectation: he ran himselfe to the house, where finding her on hir knees before hir parents, fast holding her fathers legge in her armes; with heauy threatnings, hee commanded her to arise, and goe thence along with him immediately. Shee continuing her wofull complaints, refusing to rise, or listen to his menaces; the cruell man, tearing off her garments to her naked skinne, did strike and beate her in most vnmanly manner; all which she endured with a most constant courage, not breathing foorth so much as a sigh, but as one prepared to suffer his vttermost cruelty.

Lucius goeth himselfe to the house of Philodamus, where (in most inhuman manner) he beateth Mica.

On their knees fell the mournefull father and mother, before the wretched man, not able to abide so rufull a spectacle, entreating him, to take pitty on the Virgine, and their age. But seeing they could not preuayle with this mercilesse barbarian; they called for helpe to the gods, and men, whereat hee wexing extreamely displeased, drew out his sword, and slew the Virgine, as thus she embraced the knee of her father. Although this horrible cruelty mooued not the Tyrant a iote, yet the Cittizens so distasted the deede; that some of them hee punished with present death, and banished some other, so that eight hundred fearefully fledde into Aeolia: who afterward writing backe to the Tirant, desired so much fauour of him, that their wiues and children (with some part of their goodes) might bee sent thither to them, to liue with their husbands.

Lucius desperately killeth faire Mica, which procured death to some, and banishment to other.

The women, not a little glad at this good motion, beganne to make vp their fardells, some prouiding wagons, others horses, for conueying thence their goods and children.

Vpon the day appoynted for their departure, all the Gates were set open for them to passe out at; their waggons and horses loaden with their children and goods; and as they offered to issue forth, diuers Sergeants and Catch-poles (standing ready for the purpose) cryed out to them with dreadfull threatnings, to stay and passe no further, ouerthrowing the waggons and horses, laden with their goods and children, so that they were not able to escape out of the crowds: but beheld their yoong children bruised in peeces vnder their heels, they not being any way vnable to helpe them. Afterward, such women and children as were left aliue, the Souldiers assembled them together, driuing them on before them, (like heards of cattell) beating them with staues towards the Tyrants Pallace, who (causing all their goods to be taken from them) imprisond them and their children together.

The monstrous and cruell acte of Aristotimus, vpon poore women and children.

This horrible cruelty did highly displease the Cittizens, who not knowing how they might best incite the Tyrant to pitty their wiues: tooke sixeteene vestall Virgins, consecrated to Dionisius, and, attyring them in their religious habites: they tooke sacred things out of the Temple in their hands; and (in sollemne manner of a Procession) went towards the tyrant, to craue mercie of him for the women and children. The Souldiers, who stoode as a guarde about the Tyrant, being mooued with reuerence to those holy Virgins; made way for them, that they might the easier come into his presence. Aristotimus affoording audience, to vnderstand what these women desired, and gathering by the very entrance into their Oration, to what end the full scope aymed; hee gaue very disdainefull lookes vpon his Guard, reprouing them roughly and rigorously, because they suffered them to come so neare him. Whereupon, the rude Souldiers, without any regarde of their Sexe or religious condition; smote them with the staues of their halberds, giuing them many cruell blows and bastinadoes, vntill such time as they went away from him, being each of them condemned in two Talents fine beside, because they had presumed so boldely to enter into his presence.

A Procession of sixteene vestall virgins to pacifie the cruell Tyrant.

The vestall virgins cruelly vsed by the Soldiours about Aristotimus.

There was a noble Cittizen in the Cittie, named Hellanicus, two of whose children the tyrant had put to death, and yet (in regarde of his age) did not account him any way to be suspected. This worthy Gentleman, being no longer able to dure, the outrage and crueltie inflicted on on his Countrey: determined to finde out some apt occasion, and to reuenge all wrongs by the death of Aristotimus. In the meane while, the other Cittizens, that were fled before into Aetolia, hauing mustred so many men togither as they could possibly procure; entred into open armes, and came into the Eleusians confines, where they fortified themselues, and daily drew more and more to their faction, determining present warre vpon the Tyrant, many neighbouring friends assisting them with supplying forces, so that they encreased to an indifferent armie.

* A Region in Greece, betweene Acarnan and Phocis.

Vpon these proceedings, the Tyrant became afflicted with very great feare, so that he went to the women whom he detained prisoners, and being a man of a diuellish spirit, coueting to compasse whatsoeuer he would haue, rather by rigorous menaces, then any faire or gentle means) commanded them very roughly, to write to their husbands by Ambassadours, that they should desist from their present enterprise: otherwise, hee would instantly massacre al their children, and cause them to be beaten starke naked throughout the Cittie. To these threatnings the women returned not any answer, which incensed him with the greater rage against them; and hee sternely commaunded them, to giue him resolution what they would do. Some, not hauing the boldnesse of spirit to reply, stoode stedfastly looking vppon the rest, as questioning in their soules, which of them should returne the answer, yet making no account of all his threatnings.

Aristotimus being in feare goeth to his women prisoners, and cruelly threatneth them.

Among this company of worthy women, was one, named Megestena, wife to Thimoleon, who, as well in regarde of her husbands Nobilitie, as her owne innated singular vertues, was held to be the very chiefest of them, & (with the like esteeme) they honoured her. This Lady, when the Tyrant came in among them, would not rise to giue him any reuerence, neyther suffer any of the rest to do otherwise then as she did. She hauing heard the Tyrants menaces, sitting stil vpon the ground, and returning no signe at all of reuerence, she spake thus.

Megestena, wife to the Noble Lord Thimoleon, chiefe among all the women

¶ The answer of Megestena to the Tyrant Aristotimus.

Aristotimus, if there remained in thee any wisedome, then wouldest thou not make thy recourse to women, to haue them write a direction to their husbands, what they should doe; but rather thou wouldst send their wiues to them, with better speeches and more woorthy consideration, then thou hast vsed toward them, making a mockerie of vs, by a most base and dishonourable deceit. And now, when thou seest thy selfe able to doe nothing else; thou presumest (by our meanes) to beguile our husbands by faire wordes, as formerly thou hast abused our credulitie. Thou deceiuest thine owne iudgement, for, wee will not suffer them to be agayne ouerreached by thee; neyther doe thou imagine them to bee so foolish, as to shield their children from death, or preuent the losse of their poore wiues liues, they will forbeare to execute that whereto they stand obliged: I meane the freedome of their Countrey. For, the losse of vs & their children is not so yrkesome to them, as the gladsome satisfaction will be, to deliuer their people and Countrey from outrage and cruelty.

The proud folly of the Tyrant wisely reproued by a discreete woman.

Longer would Megestena haue continued her discourse, but that the Tyrant (beeing vnable to bridle his rage) commanded the Ladies sonne to be brought thither, that there hee might be slaine in her sight. But whileſt the Officers were seeking among the rest of the imprisoned children for her sonne; the mother (with an vndaunted courage) calling him by his name, sayd. Come hither to me, sweete Boy, and rather die by thy mothers hand, then endure the bloudy cruelsie of a Tyrant. These wordes so amazed Aristotimus, and kindled such outragious choller in him, that (drawing foorth his Sword) hee purposed to haue slaine the Lady. But one of his chiefest familiar friends, named Chilon, standing by, caught her in his armes, and preuented his fury.

An admirable & worthy resolution in a woman, to the amazement of the Tyrant.

This Chilon was one of them, who practised with Hellanicus the Tyrants death, as vnable also to suffer his cruelties. Hee hauing somewhat calmed the extreamity of his rage, caused him to put vp his Sword agayne; plainely telling him, that it was a matter monstrous, and ill beseeming the dignitie of a Prince, to soile his hand with the bloud of a woman.

Chilon one of the Confederates with Hellanicus, to deliuer his Country from tyrannie.

Within a while after, there hapned a strange strange prodigie, as foretelling the death of the Tyrant. For, being in bedde with his wife, whileſt the Cooks were making ready his diet, an Eagle was ſeene to houer ouer the Lant-horne of the Pallace, and letting fall a great ſtone directly into it (it being ouer the Chamber where hee lay) it made a great noyſe in the fall; and giuing a fearefull loud ſhoute, the Eagle vaniſhed from the ſight of all that beheld it. The Tyrant awaking, with the confuſed murmure of ſuch as had ſeene it, and not a little diſmaied when it was reported to him; ſent for a cunning Soothſayer, in whome hee repoſed no meane confidence, to vnderſtand what the meaning heereof might bee. The Wizard bade him be of good courage, for it figured nothing elſe, but that Iupiter had an eſpeciall care of him, and ſent his Eagle ſo to expreſſe it. But he told the Cittizens quite contrary, in whom he durſt repoſe his truſt, becauſe he knew their hatred to Ariſtotimus: and bade them be bolde, that ſome ſodayne and ſtrange kinde of death, ſhould (in a ſhort while) happen to the Tyrant.

A Wizzard relateth the intent of the Prodigy.

Heereupon Hellanicus and his Confederates, thought fit to delay the time no longer, but concluded to kill him on the morrow following; becauſe the verie ſame night, Hellanicus ſleeping in his bed, ſeemed to ſee one of his ſonnes, that before had beene ſlaine by the Tyrant, who cryed out aloude to him, ſaying; Deare father, Why doe you ſleepe thus? Wherefore doe you trifle away the time? Stand you in doubt, that you ſhall not be made Prince of the Cittie? Hellanicus confirmed by this Viſion, went earely the next morning to finde his vowed friends, haſtening them to execute the deed determined. At the ſelfe ſame time, Ariſtotimus had receiued tydings, that Craterus was comming to aſſiſt him with a great power of Souldiers, and that hee was already ſet foorth from Olympia*. Which news were not a little welcome to him, ſo that ſeeming now free from all feare; he walked abroad to take the aire, ſome ſmall diſtance from the Pallace, accompanied onely with Chilon, not attending for any more, although they came dropping after one by one. Which Hellanicus well obſeruing, thought it now a fit time to execute the enterpriſe, and without giuing any ſignall to the reſt of the confederacie, he lifted vp his hands to Heauen, ſpeaking aloude; What ſtay yee for, valiant Gentlemen? Why make yee not now the goodlieſt ſpectacle that euer yet was ſeene?

A vision seene by Hellanicus in his sleepe, to hasten the death of Aristotimus.

Chilon was the firſt that drew his weapon, and killing one that came laſt from the Pallace, who offered to ſteppe in the tyrants defence; Areſtotimus eſpied Thraſibulus and Lampidius (two whom he moſt truſted) drawing their weapons likewiſe vpon him. Whereupon, hoping to eſcape their violence, hee ranne into the Temple of Iupiter, where he was ſlaine by his owne followers. Afterward, his bodie being throwne forth into the open ſtreet, the people cryed out, Libertie, Libertie. The women were the firſt, that (making way through the throngs) came thither, who ioyfully embraced them, that by the tyrants death) were the happy deliuerers of their Countrey. In the meane while, multitudes flocked to the Pallace, where the wife of Ariſtotimus (hauing heard of the murder of her husband; and doubting how the people would deale with hir) ſhutting her Chamber doores about her; there with her Chaine ſhee ſtrangled her ſelfe.

The Tyrants wife strangleth herselfe with her chaine of gold

The Tyrant had two very goodly and beautifull daughters, of yeares apt and able for marriage, who hauing heard of their fathers death, had lockt themſelues vp cloſe in a Chamber; from whence they were drawne by the peoples violence, and in their furie they would haue ſlaine them. But Megeſtena, with diuers other of the Ladies, ſtoode in their defence, ſaying: That it were an euill deed, and iuſtly deſeruing blame, to kill them: conſidering, they had not learnd ſo much courage of the Tyrant their father, to exerciſe cruelty vpon themſelues. By theſe ſpeeches the people were appeaſed, and a decree was ſet downe, that they ſhould make election of their death, and performe it on themſelues with their owne hands, if they had the heart to doe it.

Aſpaſia and Hillaria, the daughters of Ariſtotimus.

So beeing ſent into their Chamber, Aſpaſia the eldeſt ſiſter expreſſing no appearance, eyther by countenance, or any ſigne elſe, that ſhe ſtood in feare of death; looſed her girdle, and faſtening it about a timber-beame, reſolued ſo there to hang her ſelfe, exhorting her ſiſter (with manly courage) to perfourme the like Whereto ſhee replyed in this manner: As during the time, that Nature permitted vs to liue like Sifters, I neuer did willingly deny thee any thing; ſo farre be it from mee now to refuſe thee in thy lateſt requeſt: howbeit, nothing can afflict mee more, then to ſee thee die. No ſooner were theſe words ſpoken, but Hillaria taking the Girdle, ſtrangled her ſelfe therewith immediately. When ſhee was dead, Aſpaſia kneeling by her body; and looſing her girdle from about her necke, turning herſelfe to Megeſtena, & intreating, that their bodies might receiue no ſhame after death; with the ſelfe-ſame conſtancie of corage, ſhe ended her life likewiſe.

CHAP. IIII.

¶The reaſon why men cannot know and vnderſtand the truth of many things, while they remaine in this life.

FIue principall cauſes there are, why a man can not know the truth of diuerſe things, during his abiding in this world: which if hee could attaine vnto, he might repute himſelfe to be wiſe indeede.

Fiue impediments to a mans knowe ledge.

The firſt is ignorance of his end, that is, he knows not to what end he was created, for it is a matter moſt certayne, that if he did know that; he would labor no leſſe to obtaine it, then he doth to get dignities & riches: wherein (becauſe they beſt agree with his appetite) they make him to imagine, that all his happines conſiſts in them. But in this caſe it fareth with him, as with a kings ſon in his child-hood. For, if it be demãded of him, whether he doth more affect the ſucceſſion in his Fathers kingdom, then Apples, Cheries, or ſome other fruites, preſented inſtantly to him: queſtionleſſe, hee will rather accept the Apples or Cherries, then the kingdome, becauſe he finds them ſutable to his yong deſires, as hauing both ſight and knowledge of them in taſte and apprehenſion.

1. Ignorance in the cauſe why he was created.

A Kings Son cares more for an Apple or a Cherry in his childehood, then his Fathers kingdome.

Euen ſo it happeneth to a man; for if it were demaunded of him, whether he beſt liked to make choice of, Riches or Wiſedom: his election would ſtand on wealth and power, being meerely ignorant, that Wiſedome onely is the chiefeſt wealth, and that the Wiſe man only ought to ordaine and gouerne. For, without Wiſedome and Knowledge, power is not power, but weakenes, and vtter deprivation of power indeede: And riches without knowledge, is but a beſtiall poſſeſſion, an abundance of preſumption, and a kind of ſottiſh ſubſtance. Whereas on the contrary, a wiſe man hath alwayes ſufficient for himſelfe, & others beſide; hauing in him that truly abounding treaſure, that can neuer faile or deceiue him. And all this enſueth to a man, becauſe he is ignorant in his true end.

There can be no greater treaſure or wealth in the world then wiſedome.

The ſecond cauſe, is the vſe of corporall delectations, voluntary and ſenſible, which ouerwhelme and drowne, not only the ſenſes of the body, but alſo thoſe of the ſpirit and intellect. So that a man, being thus wrapped vppe in the mire of this world, is like the beautifull daughter of a King, to whom appertaineth the inheritance of her fathers Kingdome; but hauing committed adultery with ſome blacke deformed ſlaue, looſeth the right of her ſucceſſion thereby.

2. The vſe of bodily delights & pleaſures, which are the ouerthrowers both of body and ſoule.

The third cauſe enſueth by the indiſpoſition of ſuch matter, as many times maketh a man vncapable of learning and knowledge: which commeth often ſo to paſſe, in regarde that the region or place of his birth, is vtterly diſagreeable, and cauſeth him to receiue a bad complexiõ. As in ſome of the Eaſterne parts, and of Affrica, where men are borne ſo beaſtly, by reaſon of the heates extreamity; that they are not capable of any reaſon. And contrariwiſe, ſome places in the northern parts are ſo colde, that verie furious men are there borne & bred; ſuch as the Gothes and Oſtrogothes: ſome whereof feede on humane fleſh. And theſe people may aptly be compared to an Eagle, that hath a ſtone faſtened to her foote, to keepe her from ouer-violent flight, which commonly is naturall vnto this Bird, cauſing her to ſoare aboue the cloudes.

3. The indiſpoſition or vnaptneſſe of the Country where a man is borne, by two extremities of heate or colde.

The fourth is, difficulty in the Sciences. For, although a man doe plainely diſcerne, that the deſire of his ſoule is to ſeeke attentiuely, as coueting to know the truth of high and deepe cauſes: yet notwithſtanding, he findes them ſo hard

4. Difficulty in truely vnderſtanding the Sciences.

to

to be vnderstoode that he retreates, and quite giueth ouer his enterprise. Wherein he resembleth his owne eye, which fixing respectiuely to beholde the Sunne: the splendour thereof prooueth so piercing, that it ecclipseth and troubleth so his sight, as he is not able to endure it.

5. An affection to some especial things conceiued in the time of a mans youth, and so continuing.

The last and strangest of all, is an affection taken by a man in his youth, vnto things wherein he hath beene instructed, and especially when his desire hath lasted of some long continuance thereto. For then, Custome conuerteth it selfe into Nature, and therefore worketh a setled feare in the mans soule, and a singular loue to those things embraced, hating all other contrary to them, and the whole world (almost) is swallowed vp in this errour. Do we not obserue that children among the Turkes, before they can reach to the yeares of reason: doe vtterly abhorre our Faith and Religion; and so the Iewes in like manner? Wee see also, that countrey people, by being inured and accustomed to field-dwelling, do liue grosely, disdayning conuersation with Courtiers, or such as inhabite ciuile Cities. From whence insued the Prouerbe; Vnluckie is the Bird, that is bred in a bad valley. For, by vse and conuersation receiued there, he cannot part thence, though he beholdes a much better place for him. And not onely heerein is knowne the power of this habitude: for we our selues do despise them of another countrey (except sight or frequentation haue begot more familiaritie) and only through some bad and abusiue relations of them. This errour hath also preuayled with women, with whom, matters of long vse beare so high a priuiledge, that bee they neuer so bad; yet they despise the contrary, be they neuer so good.

Country education contemneth Courtly or Citty qualities.

Custom both in men and women breedeth another nature.

Finally, this affection to continued vse, and detestation of such things as we know not; extendeth it selfe to all matters in our election. Wherefore, it were good to expell those hinderances out of our hearts, to the end we may (if possibly wee can) know the veritie and trueth of things indeed. For, in the knowledge of them, consisteth all contentment in this world, and the way to all felicitie in that heereafter: imitating the good husbandman, that intending to prepare his grounds for the best aduantage, doth first roote vp the thornes and weeds, because his graine will bee the better borne. So, when the Physitian would giue a sicke man health, he first purgeth his stomacke from all corrupt humors; because in matter ill disposed, the former cannot induct it selfe. Let vs then contend against all these impediments; for the reasonable man, that will not yeelde to reason, but onely leane to his owne appetite: is like to him that will sayle ouer Mountaynes, or builde his dwelling in the Sea: for the effect both of the one and the other, are depriued of their proper ends.

The true felicity in this world and the other to come

Comparisons aptly answering to the purpose.

CHAP. V.

¶ Of diuers Accidents (monstrous in nature) which serued as diuining Auguries, or coniectures of things to come, in olde and auncient times.

IN precedent times, whē by permission of the true GOD, sundry Oracles, which were spirits of illusion & falshoode, hidden in Idolles and Images, gaue answere to Idolaters: many prodigious sights were seene in the Ayre and on the earth.

Oracles of lyes & grosse illusions.

And because that in these latter dayes of ours (we liuing in the light and trueth of faith) none such are now to be seene: it is a matter of some difficultie, to credite what learned Authors haue written, concerning those which hapned in their times.

Yet (mee thinketh) there needeth no distrust at all; for they hauing written Histories of warres, and other occasions happening in those dayes: by inserting the memorie of prodigious Accidents, we ought not to make any scrupulous doubt of them; but rather to rest perswaded; that as they dealt faithfully in the one, they vsed the like iustice in the other; especially, when they are likewise confirmed by many and sundry other Authours.

Graue Authors of great and venerable credite, deserue not to be distrusted in their writings.

Amongſt other Prodigies in the Romaines dayes, the moſt notable was, that of Modena, vnder the Conſulſhip of Lucius Martius, and Iulius Sextius, Conſulls: where two mountaines aroſe out of their proper places, and mette together ſo impetuouſly, that hurling a great flame and ſmoake vp into the ayre, by the violence of their encounter; they returned backe agayne, not onelie deſtroying villages which were betweene them, but alſo killing an infinite number of cattell, in the open ſight of many trauellers, and likewiſe of a great company of Romane Knights.

Plin. in l. 9. c. 14

Two great Mountaines met together, and did much harme to Townes, Men and Cattell.

Pliny, in his ninth booke, and in the fifteenth chapter, likewiſe relateth in the ſame place, ſaying, that in his time, and vnder the ſame Empire of Nero, Veſſus Marcellus, a Romaine Knight, whome the Emperour had ſent (on his behalfe) into the kingdome of Naples: had (there in the maritine territorie) two fieldes, each diſtant from the other, the one beeing a fayre meadow, and the other verie thickely planted with Oliue trees.

Plin. in l. 9. c. 15

By an admirable accident, but how, I know not, theſe two fieldes chaunged into each others place: for the Oliues field was tranſported where the meadow ſtoode, and the meadow into the Oliue plottes place; and this was conceyued to be doone by an Earthquake. This is not onely reported by Plinie, but alſo is auouched in the Chronicles of manie learned men, as alſo in the Booke of the Mountaines warre.

Two diſtant Fields remoued ſtrangely into each others place, by reaſon of an Earthquake.

And although hee cannot be induced to credite, that men may be metamorphoſed into Woolues; yet neuertheleſſe hee declareth, that Enanthes, an Authour of no meane authoritie among the Grecians, recordeth the Arabians to haue written, that in Arcadia there is a great ſtanding Poole, whereto men are brought at certayne times to paſſe thorow it: and as they ſincke into the ſand, they are inſtantly transfourmed into the ſhape of Woolues; and hauing continued ſo for the ſpace and tearme of nine yeares: they doe recouer their former formes agayne, according as Fabius Pictor in his ſecond booke and in the ninth chapter; who addeth alſo, that Scopas, who wrote the Olympiades, ſpeaketh of one, named Demarchus, had eaten the bowelles of a young Boy, which they of Arabia had ſacrificed to Iupiter Lyceus, and preſently hee was transfourmed into a Woolfe, in which forme he continued the ſpace of tenne yeares, and afterwardes recouering the ſhape of man agayne, he wonne the victorie for Lute-playing at the Mount of Olympus. Saint Auguſtine in his fourteenth booke De Ciuitate Dei, and the third chapter ſaith, that Varro alſo recordeth the ſame. In mine opinion theſe transformations could not thus happen, but rather were performed by diabolicall Artes.

Men metamorphoſed into Wolues Enanthes in lib. 2. cap. 5.

Fabius Pictor in lib. 2. cap. 9. Scopas in Olymp. 7.

Aug. in Ciuit. Dei. l. 14. cap. 3.

Now, concerning theſe things of wonder written by Pliny, they are not to be wondred at, becauſe he ſetteth downe many matters, reputed vtterly impoſſible, as the transformation of a woman into man, and yet himſelfe will not credite the like things, or ofleſſe impoſſibilitie, and which haue beene apparant to his owne iudgement. Notwithſtanding, ſuch as conſider well the Scriptures, need not meruaile at transformations, happening really, and not feigned. For we know what is written in the ſeuenth chapter of Exodus and twelfth verſe, That the Rods of the Nations were (not in apparance, but in effect, by ſecret charmes) turned into Serpents. Now, which thing is more eaſie, to change a Rodde into a Serpent, or the true body of a man (I doe not ſay his ſpirit) transformed into a beaſt. The opinion of Saint Auguſtine is heerein auaileable, where hee ſayth; A certayne man conceiued in his minde, that his daughter was turned into a young Mare. And bringing her to an holy man, named Hellarion, the graue olde man looking on her, ſaid: I ſee a young Maid, but no Mare: for it appeared that by his deuoute prayers, ſhe had recouered her former ſhape againe. Wherefore we may iudge, that ſome things are ſhewne to men, which are not indeede; and ſuch a thing may be apparant, and yet not exiſtent.

Auguſt. in ciuit. Dei. lib. 14. ca. 3

But returne wee now againe to our Auguries. It hath beene obſerued diuers times, that in the opening of a beaſt, that no heart hath beene found in him: as it happened at the firſt time, when Cæſar the Dictatour ſate in his golden Chaire, and then it was diſputed among the Auruſpices, if a beaſt were to be found without a heart.

No hart found in a Beaſt being imbowelled before Cæſar.

Plinie

Plinie in his foureteenth booke and the ſeauenth chapter reporteth; ſo doth Cicero in his Diuinations, that Caius Marius, offering Sacrifice at Vtica: euen in the ſame manner, there was not any heart found in the beaſt. But it might be then well obſerued, that it chaunced not thus by nature: but rather was rightly to bee preſumed, that falſe ſpirits did thus delude and abuſe the people, taking away the beaſtes heart in the Sacrifice time, knowing well thereby what was to happen after.

Plinie lib. 14. c. 7. Cicero in lib. de Diuinat. cap. 9

Oftentimes likewiſe hath beene obſerued, that two hearts haue beene found in one beaſt. For, wee reade that in the Sacrifices, which Marcus Marcellus made before hee dyed in the battaile againſt Hanniball: the firſt day he found no heart in the beaſt he ſacrificed; and the next day following, hee found two. Pliny writeth in the place before alleaged, that in Paphlagonia, the Partrige hath two hearts: ſo likewiſe ſaith Theophraſtus, the moſt expert (among Philoſophers) in naturall things, as Aulus Gellius declareth. Theophraſtus ſayth, that in * Biſaltia, each Hare hath two Liuers. And in ſome places (as in Euboa) the beaſtes haue no gaules.

Two harts haue bene found in one beaſt.

* A Country in the North part of the leſſer Aſia, by the ſea ſide, aboue Galatia Aul. Gellius in lib. 16. cap 15.

* A free country of Macedonia by the River Strymon.

In Naſſa it is quite contrary, for there they are very great, and double in diuers. And Frogges, which are there called Rubettes, haue two liuers, the one venemous, the other medicinable: ſo that when they are dead, the Antes make ſearch for them, and feede on that which is Phyſicall.

Aul. Gellius in lib. vbi ſupra.

Wee reade, that on the day when Pyrrhus dyed, they ſacrificed the heads of dead beaſtes, that licked their owne bloud vpon the ground.

The ſame yeare, when Hanniball was vanquiſhed by the Romaines, vnder Publius Aelius, and Cneus Cornelius, Conſulls, Wheate was ſeene to growe vppon trees.

Ariſtander in lib. Prodig. c. 3. Cneus Epidius in Comment. cap. 19.

Ariſtander (a learned Greeke Author) declareth in his Booke of Prodigies, and in the third chapter (and it is alſo confirmed by Cneus Epidius, the Romaine, in his Commentaries) that ſome Trees haue beene changed into another kinde of Trees.

We reade alſo, that in the warre of the Cimbrians, a great noyſe was heard in the Ayre, like vnto the ſounding of Trumpets, and claſhing of weapons. And in the third yeare of the Conſulſhip of Marius, two Armies were ſeene in the heauens, that went from the Eaſt, to meete in the Weſt: beſides many other the like Prodigies, whereof Saint Auguſtine maketh mention in his Booke of the Cittie of God.

CHAP. VI.

¶ Of a very ſtrange and admirable Accident, which happened on an Armie in the night ſeaſon.

WHoſoeuer ſhall reade auncient Hiſtories, needeth not wonder at ſome things, happening in thoſe times, or elſe related by ſuch as haue ſeene them: for ſometimes it hath beene obſerued, that either the ſame accident, or elſe but little differing, hath chaunced in one place as well as another. Among the admirable Accidents, which I haue read in auncient or moderne Hiſtories: I finde that to be very ſinguler, and well deſeruing memorie, which happened to Agathocles (the Tyrant of Sicilie) in Affrica.

Accidents happning in diuers places of little difference each from other.

This Agathocles was a man very expert in Armes, whereby (beeing but of baſe condition, to wit, the ſonne of a poore Potter) hee made himſelfe Lord of the whole Iſle of Sicilie. Hauing had long warre againſt the Carthagenians, and ſeeing himſelfe beſieged (both by Land and Sea) in Syracuſa, by Amilcar, with a powerfull Armie of Lybians: hee was of ſuch an vndaunted courage, that, leauing the Cittie to the guarde of his brother Antander, and hauing certain ſhippes readily prepared; by the helpe of a cunning ſtratageme, hee gote foorth at a narrow port, with about ſeauen thouſand footemen, and a ſmall number of horſe, and went to land on the ſhoares of Affrica. Hauing gote there in pay fixe thouſand Greekes, he went and beſieged Carthage, bringing the Citie into ſuch diſtreſſe, that the Senators knew not which part to take.

Agathocles the ſonne of a poore Potter, came to be a ſingular Soldiour and a King.

Carthage beſiedged by Agathocles.

Many battailes were fought betweene them, them, wherein Agathocles proued alwaies victorious; becauſe the time ſo fauored him, that he had drawn no meane troups of horſe to take part with him. The Carthaginians (beſide their Citizens, and many mercenary Souldiers (in great number) which they had for defence of the Citty, being vnable to equall the cauallerie of Agathocles) called one of their chiefe Captaines from Lybia, bringing with him a powerfull army into the field, to haue a day of tryall againſt Agathocles. After diuers skirmiſhes paſſing betweene them, vppon a day, Agathocles would needs aſſault the enemies Campe (for his men wanting victualles, deſired nothing more then preſent fight) but the enemy being very ſtrõgly planted, would not iſſue foorth, though they were very hotely ſet vpon in their Fort; knowing the neceſſitie of Agathocles, and the deſperate condition of his men.

A freſh ſupply from Lybia, came to the Carthagenians.

Continuing the aſſault ſtill, to his owne diſaduantage, he payed the penaltie due to his boldeneſſe: for the enemy repulſed him with great loſſe of his Souldiers; one part of them beeing ſloyne, and the other within compaſſe of the enemies power. The night preuenting the battailes concluſion; I am to tell yee an example of wonder, which ſtrangely followed thereupon, in this manner. The Carthaginians, after their victorie, ſacrificing vnto their Gods, in ſigne of their thankefulneſſe (with a cruell ſuperſtition) a great number of their priſoners, both Greeks and Italians; brought ſuch a quantitie of wood to burne the bodies, that the fire grew ſo impetuous: as it not only conſumed the ſacrificing Tent, but alſo the Pauillion of their Captayne and Generall, beſides infinite other, being a lamentable ſpectacle to all that beheld it. For, through the extreamity of this accident, a mighty tumult grew among them, prooving to occaſion the death of many; for ſome, labouring to quench the fire, fell into it, and ſo periſhed; others ſtriuing to eſcape from it, crowded one another to death in the throngs.

Agathocles maintained the aſſault ſtill to his owne loſſe.

A bloody and cruel manner of ſacrificing obſerued among the Carthagenians.

In this night of horrour and confuſion, one nouell accident drew on an other: for, in the Campe of Agathocles, there was found about fiue thouſand Lybians newly arriued, in whom hee durſt repoſe no truſt; for they intending to paſſe on, and to ioyne with the Carthaginians forces, were miſſ-led, onely thorow the darkeneſſe of the night. On ſtill they went from Agathocles Campe, till they came within hearing of the Guards and Centinells of the Carthaginians; who imagining them to be the Armie of Agathocles, re-aſſembled againe for a freſh aſſault; and hoping to finde them in diſorder (as indeede they were, through the foes violence) rayſed ſodainely ſuch a ſtrange noyſe themſelues, that the whole Camp fell to flight, and was vtterly broken, ſo that few or none remained, but all were diſperſed, ſome running thwart the fieldes, others backe to the Citty, to ſaue themſelues.

The coming of a freſh company of Lybians, cauſed a ſtrange accident in this confuſion

The Cittizens hearing this noyſe of the people (conceiuing verily, that it was the enemy, who had foiled their Campe, and came now to aſſault the Cittie:) were ſo confounded with feare and amazment, that they left the Citty without any defence, ſeeking how they might beſt ſecure their owne liues. So that if Agathocles had receiued but the leaſt intelligence thereof, and had gone immediately to giue the aſſault: this night had made him Lord of Carthage, and the whole Kingdome thereto belonging. Fortune, not yet ſatisfied with blinde-folde confuſion, cauſed the fiue thouſand Lybians (perceiuing what had happened) to turne backe vpon the diſordred Campe of Agathocles, who fearing a freſh onſet of the enemie; fled, ſome one way, ſome another, and fel into ſuch a madding fury among themſelues, that thinking their owne people (ſtill as they mette) to be Carthaginians; they ſlew one another very cruelly, the obſcurity of the night not permitting them to ſee their owne errour. So that, through this inaduertence or inconſideration, fiue thouſand were ſlaine among the Grecians, and as many of the Carthaginians, flying and fighting in this confuſed maner. By which meanes, fiue thouſand men (erroniouſly miſ-ledde) againſt their willes, brake three hoaſts or Armies, with no meane example, of Fortunes power in actions of Armes.

A ſtrange confuſion happening likewiſe among the Cittizens at Carthage.

Another accident in the Campe of Agathocles, among themſelues.

CHAP. VII.

¶ How indiſcreete a thing it is, and greatly to be blamed in Chriſtian Princes, to permit the Duello, or ſingle Combat between man and man.

LIke as abuſe is growne among all things (well-neare) in the world, by the coldneſſe of charitie in men, and their mallice augmented one towards an other; Euen ſo falleth it out in Duells or ſingle fights. For, amongeſt great Princes, when they lawfully exerciſed themſelues in Armes, it was honourably admitted in certayne caſes, and differences of moſt high importance, which could not otherwiſe bee termined or diſcided. But now it is grown to ſuch corruption, as euery ſilly and priuate Souldiour, for very ſmall or ſimple occaſion, preſumeth, that it is lawfull for him to vndertake it. But that which moſt of all diſtaſteth me, is to ſee, that Chriſtian Princes onely doe permit it, conſidering, that in them (more then in any other) the Lawe doth expreſly forbidde it: and it is encreaſed to ſuch an abuſe, that, except God amend it, it is to bee feared, that Prelates of the Church will alſo ſuffer it.

In elder times the combate was honourably granted.

The Law expreſly forbiddeth combate to Chriſtian Princes.

The Duell or Combate, is denied to a Chriſtian man, to doe it, to graunt it, and to ſee it, by reaſon both diuine and humane, as well Canonicall as Ciuile. It is prohibited by diuine reaſon, according to this argument. Euery acte whereby God may be tempted, is prohibited to a Chriſtian by the commaundement of God: For, it is written; Thou ſhalt not tempt the Lord thy God. That GOD is tempted by the Duell or Combate, I prooue it in this manner: To make triall of things, which cannot be reduced to an end by naturall meanes, but onely by the Hand of Heauen: ſuch attempting is to tempt God. As it happeneth in caſes of purgation, where it is moſt notorious and euident, that (by naturall courſe or diſpoſition) the ſtrongeſt, actiue, and moſt powerfull perſon euer vanquiſheth the weaker, and of leſſe abilitie. Contrariwiſe, that the ſtronger bodie ſhall be ouercome by the weaker, can not happen but miraculouſly.

The combate is denied to a Chriſtian in action ſuffetance, & fight

Things not affe'ed by naturall meanes is tempting God.

Bringing then two ſuch vnequall perſons into the field, victorie is deſired for him which hath right and reaſon on his ſide, to the end, that the trueth may be made apparent. But then God is tempted, in ſeeking, that he ſhould performe a myracle; which muſt needes bee ſo, when the weaker man conquereth the ſtronger, beeing (as it were) directly againſt nature.

Miracles only appertaine to the power of God.

I prooue it further forbidden by Diuine reaſon, after this argument: when a Law prohibiteth a thing, it forbiddeth alſo the dooing of it; and a man performeth an eſpeciall inhibited thing, when hee knoweth (by the Diuine Lawe) that hee is not to kill a man: The Combate then is flatly forbidden, becauſe thereby murder may happen.

Murder may happen by combate.

I yet proue it otherwiſe thus. The Diuine Lawe forbiddeth euery action, that differeth from the fountaine of charitie, which is the ſcope and end, of al vertues, and vtterly expelleth vice: The acte of Combate is farre off from charitie, leaning vnto vice; becauſe charitie is nothing elſe, but to loue God and thy neighbour, and he that enters the Combate to kil his neighbor, is out of all obedience to God.

The acte of combate killeth Charity.

It is likewiſe prohibited by the Canonicall Lawe, becauſe it euermore followeth the diuine Law: and in plaine reaſon, what the one inhibiteth, the other neuer aloweth. Combat is alſo forbidden by the Lawe of men, and the proofe is, that euery thing which repugneth and contradicteth naturall equitie, is likewiſe prohibited by the reaſon of man; becauſe reaſon is grounded vpon naturall equitie. The reaſon of equity among men willeth, that he which committeth a crime, ſhould be puniſhed, and the innocent cleared: notwithſtanding, by Combate it falleth out many times quite contrary.

Combate contrary to the common law, and law of men, and naturall equity.

It is further proued by this argument. Naturall equitie, whereon (as we haue already ſayde) all reaſon in men is grounded; is entirely for the conſeruation and encreaſe of them. That acte then, which turneth vnto the diminution and deſtruction of men, is quite forbidden: ſo ought Combate to be, becauſe thereby men kill one another, and men are of greateſt price in the world. Moreouer, euery acte which repugneth the precepts of naturall equitie, is forbidden by mans reaſon, becauſe it is grounded thereupon. One of the precepts is, that no man ſhall deſire profit or honour, by the preiudice and hinderance of another. The ſecond is, that no man ſhall wiſh that to another, which he would not haue done to himſelfe. The acte of Combate contradicteth them both, becauſe hee which commeth ſo prepared into the field, coueteth his owne glorie, by the ſhame and harme of him againſt whom he fighteth, which is his neighbour; and wiſheth that to him, which he would not haue executed on himſelfe; for, he would vanquiſh and kill him.

Naturall equity is for the conſeruation of mankinde, and combate is for his deſtruction.

The two main precepts of naturall equity, are broken by the acte combate.

It is alſo forbidden by Ciuile reaſon, and this is the rule. Ciuile right prohibiteth euery acte, whereby Iuſtice may bee denyed to men, or iniurie doone them. Now, in the caſe of Combate, oft times it falleth out quite contrary; for the innocent man dyeth, and the guilty offender remayneth aliue, ſo that by this meanes, Iuſtice can not take her due place.

Combate forbidden by the ciuill Law.

CHAP. VIII.

¶ Of ſtrange and admirable properties in the Aſſe.

AMongſt all the properties in beaſts, thoſe of the Aſſe are moſt to be admired; for hee is ſo meeke and domeſticke, as that Iſidore doth ſay, He taketh his name of ſeating; for, in elder times, men mo ũted on ſuch beaſts backs, to ſaue themſelues ſecurely. Or elſe it cometh of the Greeke diction Aſinos, compoſed of A, which is a Greek diction priuatiue, ſignifying Sine, Without, and Cinos, which ſignifieth Senſus, Wit or Senſe: ſo that coupling theſe two vocables together, ſignifieth, without Wit or Senſes. Heereupon it is ſaid, that hee is fearefull to goe ouer a Bridge, where water runneth vnderneath it: becauſe hauing a weake brayne, hee is (by inſtinct of nature) fearefull to fall therein. He is timorous alſo to enter water, how ſhallow ſoeuer it be; fearing by the current thereof, his braine may be troubled, and he drowned; which proceedeth from a kinde of knowledge that hee hath of his owne imperfection.

Iſidor. in lib. Anim. 3. cap. 8.

A definition of the Aſſes name.

Fearefulneſſe in the Aſſe to paſſe ouer a Bridge.

This creature is ſlouthfull and melancholy, becauſe he is colde, drie, without memory, laborious, and apt to carry burdens. By reaſon of his great frugalitie, he cannot liue in colde Countries, and if by aduenture he doe liue there: hee affecteth not the generatiue act[illegible] neyther can he there ingender. Hee beareth beſt vpon his reines, rather then on his backe or ſhoulders: for, being melancholie, his bones behinde are the more ſtrong and dry, for there is the ſigne of melancholy, and there is his skinne ſo thicke and hard, that though he be beaten with great ſtaues, he cannot be killed without much paines. Alſo, becauſe he conſiſteth of an earthie nature, hee is hardly diſciplinable, and fatneth very little. Albertus Magnus ſayth, That by the ſelfe-ſame reaſon, hee endureth much paine in his head, and dieth, tumbling his head aſide, and in regarde of his heads weightineſſe, a thicke and viſcuous humour falleth on his lights or lungs, which maketh him to breathe with difficulty, and fall downe ſwowning. He eateth little, and the more he watcheth, ſo much the more he drinketh beyond other beaſts.

The Aſſe ſlothfull and melancholly.

The ability of his bearing burdens.

Albert. Magnus in lib. 4. cap. 7.

In regarde of his great coldeneſſe and drieneſſe, hee can not ſtirre to ingender, at ſuch times as other beaſts doe, to wit, before the Winter Equinoctiall, or elſe vnder the Equinoctiall; but in the month of May, when the Sunne mounteth, almoſt to the right angle of the Equinoctiall, and then his groſſe humiditie beeing depreſſed and diminiſhed; he is prouoked to the acte with ſuch fury, as if hee were a wilde foale, and eſpecially when he is yong. The thickneſſe of his skinne, is cauſed (as we haue ſayd) by his groſſe humours; and he that mendeth his ſhoes with leather, of that part of the skinne, where the Aſſe hath longeſt borne his burdens, can not weare it out at all, but it will long time endure, paſſing ouer ſtony or craggy wayes, and will at the laſt growe to ſuch hardneſſe, as the feete can not ſuffer it: Albertus Magnus ſpeaketh thereof by proofe.

The Aſſe engendreth not when other beaſts do.

The benefit of the Aſſes skin in wearing it in ſhooes.

From

The milke of the shee-Asse Physical for a consumption.

From this drinesse it ensueth, that the milke of the Female Asse is subtile, that it cannot curdle: and therefore it is Physicall for such as are in a consumptiõ. Moreouer, the purity of this milkes whitenesse maketh the skin of men or women wonderously faire, and very cleare. Hereupon Pliny reporteth, that Pappæa, Cnocubine to Nero, often vsed to bathe her bodie in the Milke of a shee-Asse. This beast hath a custome to Vrine in the place, where he smelleth that another Asse hath staled before.

Plin. in l. 6. c. 12

Small birdes are enemies to the Asse: but the rauen most of all.

He is very much hated by small Birds, because he bites of the bushes & thornes, where they builde their nests: and vvith his crying noise, makes them fall vnto the ground, or frights them away when they sit in the bushes. The Rauen is his naturall enemie, so that when hee hath taken any harme on his skinne; hee mounteth thereon, and pittifully plagues it with his bill. So do the small Birds likewise, onely to be reuenged of him: but the Rauen aboue all the rest, labours to picke out his eyes with his beake; against which cruelty, the hollow concauity of them, doeth serue him as an especial defence, the hard nesse of his hide, and continuall agitation of his eares; for, by closing his eies, he chaseth them away with his ears stirring. The Bear also is his enemy, wearying him (oftentimes) to kill him, desiring to feede on his raw flesh.

What defence the Asse hath, to saue his eies from the Rauen.

The curiosity of the Asse in drinking.

He will not drinke but at such Springs or Welles where he is inured, & where hee may passe without wetting: but that deseruing meruaile, is, that if the water be troubled, though hee be neuer so thirsty, he cannot be procured to drinke, vntill such be giuen him as is pure and clear. Pliny saith beside, that he will hardly bee constrained to drinke, vntill his backe bee disburthened of his loade. The shee-Asse so intirely affecteth her young Foale, and is so fearefull of it by Nature: as shee dreadeth not to passe through fire to find it.

Plin. in l. 8. c. 43

Arist. in Gener. Anim. lib. 2 c. 6

Aristotle saith, that the shee-Asse will remaine so long time from conceyuing, vntill the graines of Barley, steepte in the blood of a Mulet, bee giuen her to feede on. For the generation of Mules, the Mare must be of no lesse age then foure yeares, and not aboue tenne. Now, in regard that (naturally) no beast will habite with any other then of his owne kinde, such Heardsmen as would haue a Mule engendred by an Asse and a Mare, do vse this kinde of cunning. The young Asse-foale is nourished with Mares milk all his tender time, but in some obscure place, for better taking it. By this meanes, comming to age (as adulterated) he groweth to loue Mares. And in like manner, norishing the Foales of Mares with milke of a shee-Asse; they habite afterwardes willingly with shee-Asses. And if it happen that the Mare be taken, and the Asse hath yet vse of her immediately, her greatnesse will corrupt, through the extreme coldnesse of the Asse. And so it fareth vvith the shee-Asse, if the horse haue ioyned with her, and by the same reason.

An obseruation for the engendering of a Mule between an Asse and a Mare.

Aristot. in Lib. vbi supra.

The Mule that is bred of an Asse and a Mare, cannot engender, the cause (according to Aristotle) is, that the seede of the Asse (as we haue already said) being cold, & that ioyning with the seed of the Mare which (hauing respect to the sexe Feminine) is also of cold complexion; & therefore, that engendred is so cold, as it cãnot be proper for generation. And albeit Pliny saith, that diuers times they haue yong ones: yet (for all that) it is not naturallie, but rather as a thing prodigious.

Pli. in l. 8. c. 44

Arist de Gener. Anim. l. 2. cap. 3

Aristotle granteth that they do engender, but the fruite cannot bee reared or brought vp. Theophrastus saith, That in Cappadocia they engender and haue yong. Aristotle further saith, that the Asse fatneth more by drinking troubled Water, then that which is cleare, and best agreeeth with Kine. The Foale of the shee-Asse, is of so short memory, that following the damme, if it be but fiue paces behind hir, it hath forgot, and followes no further, but stayes and standeth stone still. It is said, that the shee-Asse hath a natural custome, when she is ready to Foale, shee withdraweth into some obscure place: but the opinion of Albertus Magnus is, ỳ she doth so in regard of the weakenes of the Foales sight.

The short memory of the Asse foale

Albert. Mag. in lib. 4. cap. 7.

It is a thing well approued, according to the iudgement of the same author, that the Liuer of an Asse being boyled, and afterward roasted the same day, is verie soueraigne for the falling sickenesse, prouided, that it be often vsed: the like power hath his hooues, being burnt, beaten into powder, and drinking the weight of three

Ducates

Ducates, and euery day an ounce. An emplaister made of the same powder, dissolueth the Kings euill, & heals the chaps, which trouble the handes in Winter by cold.

For an Impostume.

Moreouer, the hooues so beaten into powder, and applyed vnto an Impostume, quickely breaketh it. The Vrine of an Asse, is very auaileable for the Disease of the Reines, caused by grosse humidities; and his dung, either burnt, or not, made in an emplaister, restraineth the Flux of blood, and smoking any house with the Lunges of an Asse, it killeth all wormes and mothes.

A present remedy for bleeding at the nose.

Againe, his dung steeped in Vinegar, and applied to the nose in a cloth, ceaseth the extreme bleeding: making also an emplaister thereof, and binding it to the forhead, it hath the same vertue. Pliny also saith, that both the Milke and bloud of an Asse, are very effectuall against the biting of a Scorpion.

Plin. in l. 8. c. 44

His Vrine, applyed with Spickenard, encreaseth and conserueth haire: and his bones being broken, and the powder of them drunke in white Wine, is very soueraigne against poyson. Aristotle, Albertus Magnus, and Pliny, reporteth infinite other Vertues, abiding in this much despised creature, which would require too long a time to relate.

CHAP. IX.

Of the singular vertue and constancie, of the Noble Lady Aretaphila, the enforced Wife to the Tyrant Nicoreon: And her honest policy, for the deliuerance of her Countrey.

An honorable Gentleman of Cyprus, and a worthy Souldiour.

THE vertue and constancie of the Noble Lady Aretaphila the Cyrenean, deserueth to be remembred in all Ages. She was the Daughter of Aglator, and wife to Fedimo, who for Nobility and riches, was one of the worthiest men in the whole countrey: and in those times she was no lesse endued with singular beauty, then admired wisedome and eloquence in her speaking. It came to passe, that Nicoreon vsurping the gouernment by tiranies, condemned many worthy Cittizens to death. And among other cruelties by him committed, hee caused Melnapius (the Priest of Apollo) to bee slaine, to make vsurpation of his Priestly Office.

Nicoreon a tirannical vsurper of the supreme authority.

Afterward, hauing treacherously put to death Fedimo, the husband of Aretaphila; constrainedly, and whether she would or no, he married Aretaphila. Continuing on his pride against his people, & day by day encreasing his cruelty, hee furiously put a great number to death. And becausse they were to be buried without the Citty, he was enstructed by some of his picke-thankes, that many counterfeyted themselues to be dead, for their safer escaping out of the City, onely thereby to auoid his cruelty. Hereupon, guards of souldiers kept the gates, vvith long Iron Pikes and Bodkins, made red hotte in the fire; wherewith they pierced the bodyes carried by, to try whether they were dead or no.

A hard extremity that many were put to, for escaping from tyranny.

These cruelties, were greatly displeasing to his wife Aretaphila, who greeued to see her Countrey thus oppressed; and to such a height grewe her compassion, that hating Nicoreon for her former Husbands death, she resolued to make aduenture of her owne life, to free her country from so bloody a Tyrant. And although Nicoreon affected her extraordinarily, & bestowed infinite fauours on her, onely to please her: yet could shee not quit her thoughts from this magnanimous determination. And, when (through the tyrants power) all hope in the people was vtterly lost, for euer freeing themselues from his tiranny: she only grew the stronger in her confidence, that shee should compasse the meanes of his death.

Aretaphila pittying the oppression of her Countrie, hazardeth hir owne life to deliuer it.

Heerein she was still the more encouraged, by remembring the vndaunted resolue of the Thebane * Pheræa, so much renowned thorough the world, coueting to imitate her example. But becausse shee had not the benefite of assisting Friends, as Pheræa had; she concluded her enterprize alone by her selfe, purposing to kill the Tyrant by poyson. By which meanes she ranne into great dangers (as you shall reade heereafter) in regard she failed many times of her attempting; and beeing surprized at the last; all dissimulations were were not sufficient, but shee was conuinced by most euident arguments.

The Tyrants mother hasteneth the death of Aretaphila

At this time, Caluia, Mother to the tyrant (beeing a Woman of fierie temper, and one that heauily hated Arctaphila) laboured him by earnest perswasions, to put her to death with grieuous torments: but the feruent loue of Nicoreon towards hir, and her owne couragious spirit, in answering the accusations of her enemies; occasioned the delaying of her death. Neuertheless, after much clamor and constraint, she being conuinced by apparant testimonies, and no longer able to denie, but that she had prepared a breuage for him: In the presence of the Iudges, with an vndanted and cheerefull countenance, thus she spake.

The Speech of Aretaphila, in the presence of the Tyrant, and all her hatefull enemies.

Her witty insinuation to couer what she had closely intended.

My Lord and Husband, I freely confesse, that a drinke was prepared by mee to giue thee; yet farre from so much as thought, that poyson, or any harmefull thing should therein be compounded: but onely as a drinke, whereby to incite feruent loue and affection. For, seeing my selfe to bee enuied by so many Ladies, in regarde of the kinde loue by thee extended to me, and exalting me to wealth and honor, farre beyonde any capacity in them of compassing the like; fearing withall (most worthy Lord) that they would not spare their vttermost endeuour, to kil that louing kindnesse in thee towards me, and quench the intire affection so long continued: I made that Breuage purposely, to preserue the heate of Loue in full power, and rather vrge it to a higher reach, then suffer it to quaile in the least degree. If therefore heerein I haue offended, Reason (me thinkes) should free mee from punishment; in regard that spotlesse loue (to confound that foul fiend hatred) thereto procured me. Neuertheless, if I shall bee saide to merite chastisement; it cannot vrge death, as to an hatefull impoysoner: but rather such an amiable and fauouring affliction, as such a wife may be thought worthy of, who will not spare to practise any enchanting Potions on her Husband, to continue his Loue in correspondencie, equall vnto hers.

Such was her constant carriage in this answer, and appearing of so sound truth in the Tyrants opinion; that by no means he would permit shee should bee put to death. Onely, through their diuellish & violent vrging, he suffered her to be further tryed by Racks and Tortures, as hoping (that way) to extort confession. Caluia causing the extreamest tortures to be prepared, stoode by, while they were inflicted on her, euen according to the measure of her monstrous cruelty; and so many violences was done to the poor Lady, that Caluia her selfe, grewe wearie with the very sight of them. So that Aretaphila, not confessing any thing more then she had done, was deliuered from further tormenting, and adiudged innocent by Nicoreon; repenting that hee had permitted her to bee so cruelly misused, and his loue now growing to farre greater extremity towards her, made him labour by al amorous blandishments, and gifts of extraordinary valew, to reconcile fauour, & qualifie all conceiued vnkindnesse in her. And she, being a wise and sprightly minded Lady, had her owne discretion so much at command, that she could seeme as earnest in loue to him as euer: yet carrying an inward vnconquerable remembrance of her Countreyes Oppressions, and her owne extreame wrongs, waiting but time and meanes for iust reuendge, which offered it selfe to her in this manner.

Nicoreon admitteth further tryall by tortures, but wil not let her dye.

Cruelty conquered by mild, patient, and constant sufferance.

An incomparable discretion in Aretaphila.

She had (by Fedimo her husband) a yong daughter, of admirable beauty and vertuous qualities, named Miraguarda; and Nicoreon had a Brother, named Leander; youthfull, gallant, and somewhat dissolute in affection to women, which made her the more diligent, to procure liking in him towards her daughter, and easily she preuailed therein, by the help of amorous enticing drinkes, and other deuices, wherin she wanted no furtherance of her cunning Physitian. Beside, the witty enstructions shee had giuen her daughter, for her carriage in the company of Leander; caught fire on the Tinder of his affection, in such violent manner; that (in all hast) he entreated his Brother to graunt his Miraguarda, daughter to Aretaphila, & Leander brother to Nicoreon.

his marriage with Miraguarda, wherto he as quickely gaue consent, prouided, that he could induce the good liking of Aretaphila therto, which was not long in obtaining (though excused with some fewe faint and modest doubts) because it was the onely mark she aimed at, to compasse that which she further intended.

The marriage the onely meanes to be reuenged on the Tyrant.

Leander, being married to his beloued Miraguarda, their mutuall affections so sweetly simpathized together, as he could neuer be satisfied with her louely embracings, nor shee contented without his company. During the heate of this reciprocall fierie temper on both sides, Miraguarda, ingeniously instructed thereto by her mother (knowing she could craue nothing of her Leander, that eyther hee durst or would deny her) aduised him to the killing of her brother. And so sutable were her witty remonstrances to his yeilding soule (alledging the acte to be generous, the freeing of his country from tyranny, and a certaine assurance to himself, that in requitall of so blessed a benefit, the people could not choose but elect him their King, by whom they enioyed theyr long desired deliuerance) that he liked the motion extraordinarily. Nor left shee off so, but plyed him still vnto the same purpose, that if hee did make deniall of the deede, the Cittizens (in their violent hatred to the Tyrant) would acte this Tragedy themselues, as therto they were all solemnly sworn; and then there could be no security of his own life.

The perswasions of Miraguarda to Leander for killing his Brother.

Leander is won to murther his Brother, assisted therein by his faithful friend Dannilles.

So preuailing were these perswasions with Leander, that instantly he conspired against Nicoreon, perceiuing that Aretaphila did not disallowe it; and imparting his intent to Dannilles, his familiar & very faithful friend: by his assistance he slew him, sleeping in an Arbor of his Garden, and thereby became Lorde of the Kingdome. The possession whereof made him so proud and powerfull, that, despising Aretaphila and her worthy counsels; the world might plainely perceiue, that hee was rather a murtherer of his Brother, then a conspirator for his countries freedome, because he gouerned by iniustice and improuidence; albeit (afterward) he began to reuerence his mother in Lawe somewhat more respectiuely, though the people were still oppressed, by many extreme violences.

Aretaphila perceiuing, that shee had not yet deliuered her country from tyranny; concluded to compasse it by his death likewise. Heereupon, by secret intelligence, she wrought with Anabius, a warlike Prince, and a Natiue of Lybia, to rise in Armes against Leander, wherto he was very easily induced. Hee being at hand with a potent Army, Aretaphila conuersing with Leander, told him, that his Captaines were not equall in courage and strength, to those braue Wartiours that came with Anabius, and therefore it wold proue disaduantageous for him, to make hazard of his weake forces against him, being not certaine of his owne subiectes, whom he had too much prouoked by his harsh vsage; and therefore farre vnfit to be trusted in trial of warre. Wherfore she aduised him, to labour by honest & plausible meanes, that a pacification might passe betweene them, promising, to practise such meanes her selfe, that hee should haue a friendly imparlance vvith Anabius.

Another attempt of Aretaphila for the deliuerance of her countrey.

Leander liked well the Counsell of his mother in law, and praied her to proceed therein; whereuppon, shee dealt for the day of their meeting. Preuailing so well (in the meane time) by faithfull Messengers to Anabius, that when Leander shold come forth to confer with him: he either should kil him, or take him prisoner, promising a great sum of money for the performance therof. Leander being fearful by nature (as commonly all Tyrants are) daily deferred the enterparlance: but his mothers pressing him with shame of base cowardise, and faint-harted effiminacy, (shee promising to goe along with him in company) procured him to issue forth vnarmed. Anabius comming on to meete him with his traine, Leander made a timorous stay, saying; hee would not passe any further, vntil he had his guard about him. But Aretaphila, one while by faire speeches, another while by foule reproaches, calling him nothing but coward at euery word; stil made him to walke on alõg with her, and taking him by the arme, as to inspire him with courage, brought him forcily to Anabius, and deliuered him vp as his prisoner, who safely there kept him, vntill the promised summe of mony was sent him.

Aretaphila contriueth a meeting betweene Leander & Anabius.

Tyrants are fearfull vnto themselues.

Aretaphila deliuered Leander prisoner to Anabius.

Afterward, she returned backe to the Cittie,

City, there manifesting the manner of her succesſe, and how ſhee had deliuered her Countrey from the Tyrants power: Whereupon, the ſumme of money was collected and forthwith ſent vnto Anabius. Then was Leander deliuered to Aretaphila, who inſtantly gaue him into the Magiſtrates power: ſo that by generall ſentence, he was ſowed vp in a ſacke, and drowned in the Sea, after he had ſeen his Mother Caluia burned. All the Citizens flocking before Aretaphila, humbled them ſelues on their knees, confeſſing the iuſt merit of her praiſe: becauſe (with ſo great perill of her life) ſhe had ſaued her Countrey; enforcing her to vndergoe the Gouernment, which ſhee did, and ruled graciouſly vntill ſhe had reduced the eſtate to perfect peace. Then, reſigning vp her Office into the Senates hands: ſhee entred a Monaſterie of Sacred Virgines, where ſhee liued priuately, and peaceably paſſed the remainder and reſt of her dayes.

The death of Leander and Caluia his Mother.

Aretaphila made Princeſſe of the Countrey.

CHAP. X.

Of the Famous Philoſopher Euxinus: And of a Letter ſent by the Senate of the Athenians, to the Lacedemonians.

BEtweene the Athenians and Lacedemonians, a verie cruell warre was waged, about the difference of certaine Confines, and in the field of battaile, the Lacedemonians being foyled and diſcomfited by the Athenians: the vanquiſhed deſired truce with the Victors, and for their eaſier attaining therto, they ſent (as Ambaſſador) the renowned Philoſopher Euxinus, who ſpake in ſo eloquent a ſtyle to the Senate, and onely in the praiſe of peace, deliuering ſuch learned and pleaſing allegations, as not only truce was granted to them, but alſo they freely gaue them thoſe Confines, which they pretended was appertaining to thē, and (by the chance of warre) hadde loſt. Such power had the Oration deliuered by Euxinus; and the Senat of Athens back to thē, acquainted them with their minds in this maner.

Read Cælius Rhodeginus in his military Diſcourſes. Lib. 3. cap. 9.

More obtayned then they deſired or expected.

The Senate and People of Athens, ſend health and peace to the Lacedemonians.

WEE call the Goddes to Witneſſe, that in the late paſſed battell betweene vs, Wee more greeued to ſee you ſo bloodily vanquiſhed, then we ioyed in our owne fortune of victory: becauſe the effects of Warre are ſuch, that damage is certaine to the Conqueror, and benefit to the Conquered is doubtfull. Wee could heartily haue wiſhed, that the demaund by you now propounded, had bene before in like manner required: but ſuch is the lot falne both on you and vs, that you haue loſt very much in this warre, and yet wee can boaſt of no benefit thereby. For the rule is moſt certaine, that whatſoeuer is appointed by the Gods, cannot be comprehended by humane iudgement, nor impeached by the power of man.

The euents of warre are vncertaine to either ſide.

What heauen hath ordaind, is not to bee diſappointed.

You require truce for three moneths, to the end, that in that time, an agreemēt may be concluded betweene vs. Wee returne you anſwer, that the Senate of Athens neuer vſed to make truce, after they had begun a War: obſeruing (as a moſt ancient Lawe) that either they accept of cruell warre, or elſe freely condiſcend to perpetuall peace.

Wee labour and practiſe in the times of peace, to allure Wiſe-men into our Schooles, to helpe vs with their counſell in the times of Warre; and now they aduiſe vs, not to make a truce on ſuſpected conditions: whetein wee thinke they counſell vs well, becauſe a counterfeyte peace is more dangerous then an open waged warre.

The Philoſopher Euxinus your Ambaſſadour, hath ſpoken ſo eloquently in the Senate, that we hold it vnreaſonable, to deny any thing by him named: and therefore it is a matter more honeſt, to grant him peace that requires it by kinde words, then him that rudely askes it with the Weapon. Wherefore we tel you, and now giue you to vnderſtand, that our Senate (with a franke and free hart) granteth to you Lacedemonians, loyall peace, deli-deliuering you from all suspition of war: And this wee doe, that the world may know, the Athenians are of so great spirite against the audacious, and so woorthie friends to such as are wise, that they both know how to chastise fooliſh Captaines, and how to be commanded by discreete Philosophers.

Good wordes do oftē more then weapons can doe.

The occasion of the war between the two States.

Well wot yee, that all our difference hath growne about possession of Townes seated on the bankes of the Riuer Milina. By this letter we tell ye, and sweare thereto also by the immortall Gods, that wee freely renounce all right wee can pretend vnto them, on this condition: that (at our meeting) you shal giue vs your Ambassador Euxinus: for the happy Athenians do more affect a Philosopher in their schoole, then a whole Prouince for their Commonwealth. Yet Lacedemonians account it no acte of leuity in vs, to change towns and territories, to bee gouerned by one onely man: becausе the Philosopher can teach vs how to liue well, whereas such Countreyes may giue vs occasion of dying ill. And in regard, that (of auncient enemies) we now declare our selues your true louing Friends: We not onely deliuer you from Warre, and send you Peace; but likewise will giue you Counsell how to conserue it; for the Physicke that preserueth health, is farre more excellent then that which expelleth diseases. And this is the remedy which wee giue you.

A worthy estimation of Learning and learned men.

Honourable counsel giuen by the Athenians to the Lacedemonians.

As ye desire, that your yong men shal exercise themselues to Armes, in like manner bee as diligent, that your Children may haue Learning in due time: For, as Warre is made with cruell weapons, so with sweete words is peace soonest obtained. And thinke not (Lacedemonians) that wee heereto aduise yee without cause; for, in leauing the counsell of the Wise, and suffering ydlenesse to encrease among the people: it engendreth seditions and ciuill Warres, onely to make men murther one another. Nor would we haue ye thinke vs friends to busie pratlers; for our ancient Father Socrates appointed; that the first Lesson read to a Scholler in our Academy; was, that for the space of two yeares, hee should not dare to speake a word; becausе it is a matter impossible, that any man can be wise in speaking, except he be admirably patient in silence, and knoweth howe to hold his peace.

A busy talker can neuer bee a Wiseman.

May it please you then, to permitte Euxinus to remaine with vs, and immagine, that if wee hope for benefite by his presence; you may rest assured, that from such counsell as he giues vs, you cannot receiue any damage. For, it is a very ancient law in Athens, that the Senate may neuer attempt any Warre, vntil our Philosophers haue first made examination, whether the cause bee iust or no. So wee ceasse, praying both your and our immortall Goddes, to preserue you and vs in perpetuall peace: for that onely is perpetuall, that stands confirmed by the will of the Gods.

A conuenient law for euerie Christian kingdome.

CHAP. XI.

The true Module and Patterne of Gouernement, to be obserued in any Commonwealth; deriued from the communitie among Bees, and how many wayes they may be examples to men.

THE forme of a Cõmonwealth obserued amongst Bees, meethinkes is so proper and answerable vnto that of men: as it may bee verily presumed, that GOD gaue them it by a Naturall instinct, and for an instruction vnto our manner of Gouernement. This little Creature, is named by the Latines Apis, a deriuation from the Greeke, which signifieth to bee without feet: not in regard that it hath no feete, but becausе they do ioyne so closely and aptly with the body, as if indeede it had none at all.

The deriuation of the Latine word Apis from the Greeke.

Many haue written of their properties and qualities; as Aristotle, Pliny, and many more: beside, I find in elder times, that Hiliscus Tatius was verie inquisitiue, to vnderstande the properties of these Creatures, and that he might render the sounder reasons of his knowledge; hee liued in Forests and solitarie places, where best he might attaine to his owne intent.

Hiliscus Tatius a diligent searcher into the properties of Bees.

And

Aristomachus wrote diuerse bookes of the Bees qualities

And Aristomachus likewise, for the space of forty yeeres (without attending to any other exercise) gaue himselfe wholly to the same labour: and both of them wrote diuers Bookes very apt and worthy for all posterity.

A kinde of religious reuerence obserued in Bees, before comming forth of their hiues.

The first and most notable thing, obserued in the writings of moderne men, is, that they haue noted an admirable kinde of Religion in these little Creatures: For, before they wil yssue forth of their Hiues, they bow downe their heads forwarde in such humble manner, as if they were deuoutly at meditation on their knees. Declaring therein (euen by Naturall instinct as it were) to vs, that we should not vndertake, or beginne any thing, before wee haue first honoured God, and recommended our endeuours to his gracious goodnesse, that they be begunne and ended in his name. Very respectiue are they, that by the foode they gather from sweet Flowers, they may produce hony, beneficiall both for others and themselues; demonstrating thereby, that men should labour (by vertuous meanes) to performe good actions in their life time, auaileable both for themselues and others; considering, it is a duty required in men, and for vvhich they are born, not to labor for themselues, but also for their Countrey, and their Friends.

Men are not born for themselues, but for their countrie also.

They are content to liue in their owne habitation, without intruding for dwelling in anothers house. As a notable example to vs, that (for the peace of the Common-wealth) euery man should rest contented with his owne, without coueting or vsurping ought from any other.

No more but one king in euery hiue for order of Gouernment.

Euery Hiue hath his King, and both he and his attendants, doe shun noyses, clamours, and windes. Which teacheth vs, that we ought to haue one cheefe Commander in one Common-wealth, by whō all the rest may be well gouerned: & that we should shunne the smoake of Ambition, in being greater one then another in the Common-wealth, to the end, that there may be good discipline. Also, we should flie from all windes of vanities, tumults, partialities, and enmities. Flight, labour, foode, and fruite is common alike to euery one; to let vs vnderstand, the mutuall loue and charity which ought to be among Cittizens, in being helpful one to another: and partaking likewise in others distresses. for by this meanes, mens mindes become linked together in such amity, that the Commonwealth flourisheth in peace and quietnesse, and is a goodly president to other estates.

A worthy president of continēcy in life.

These creatures liue without lubricitie, although they engender more then any other. Which instructeth vs, that for the peace and repose of the people, men should haue care of childrens generation, to perpetuate their owne kind and the Common-wealth, without lusting after adulteries: but to liue chaste and temperate in pleasures carnall, the libertie wherof doth procure contentions, quarrels, and death.

Ambros. in Lib. de Cœna Dom. cap 9.

They doe respect their King with such loue and obseruance, that they account it an honourable deede to die for him. And Sain^t Ambrose saieth thus: They will not flye abroad, vntill they first see, vvhether he will flye foorth, or no: that they may keepe him company, in finding foode, and other effects for common benefite. Which may minister example vnto men, for honouring their Prince, to whom GOD hath giuen such Authoritie, to bee assisted and imitated in those paines, which he taketh for the good of his people, hee being the principall of the Commonwealth.

In what manner the Bees elect & make choise of their king.

They endeuour continually, to elect such a one for their King, as (in apparance) is most Noble, as also the mildest; not vsing his sting against anie other, which onely is as a punishment for offenders. Aduising vs heereby, to elect such for our Gouernors and Magistrates, as are of generous Nature, discreete, wise, and debonnaire. And these small creatures, are of such nature, that they who are of greatest bodie amongst them, are also (commonly) the most humaine and gracious. Signifying nothing else to vs, but that he ought to be most milde and courteous, that is exalted vnto the highest dignity, as well in Nobilitie of bloode, as in wealth and vertue: which things naturally beget enuy in others, and yet destroy themselues by humanitie, and conuerteth into loue. Most obedient are they to their King; and if any one haue declared disdaine, or disobedience, & the same bee discerned: hee neuer attendeth for other correction, but instantly slayeth himselfe with his sting. Whereby we are admoniſhed, to be faithfull and louing to our Prince or Magiſtrate, and fearefull to offend, euen to death it ſelfe.

No idlenes amongſt the Bees, but all imployed in ſeuerall offices, & all for general benefit.

No Bee is ſlothful or idle in the Hiue; for ſome flye forth to combate againſt other in open field: others watch to ſeeke for foode; others contemplate times, to foreſee when ſtormes and raines will enſue; others compoſe the hony Combes; others lay aſide the waxe by it ſelfe, and thereof others make little Lodgets, caries and rounds, in very ſtraunge and wonderfull order. Neuertheleſſe, in ſo many and ſundry offices, no one intrudes into anothers buſineſſe, or dare make any ſtealth or robbery from his companions: but by his owne labor and vertue, hee feedeth abroad on hearbes and flowers, and yet brings a part of his pains home, for generall good of the Commonwealth. Herein we haue a notable inſtruction, to abhor & baniſh out of our Cities, ſlothfull rogues and idle vagabonds, that will not liue by their owne labour as they ought to doe. Wherefore through ſuch deboſhment & negligence in men, all ſuch vices ariſe in Citties, as doe corrupt good manners, and ouerthrow order: for euery one ſhold liue vpon his owne endeuour, without vſurping ought of others; and what he hath ſuperfluous, is for generall aide of the Common-wealth, and to be miniſtred to others neceſſities.

A good admonition for Cities & incorporate townes to auoyd ydl; liuers.

Nature hath giuen them ſtings to defend themſelues, and offend ſuch as dare aſſaile them, or preſume into their citty or hiue: and although they are not of any great corpulence, yet notwithſtāding they haue vnconquerable corage & prudence. For with the gum of trees, they annoynt the ſuperficies of their hiues, to the end, ỳ no beaſt or other enemy may enter in at any rift or chinke; and if the paſſage or iſſue be ouer large, they labor diligently to reſtrain and make it leſſe. By which example men are admoniſhed, to bee ſtout and couragious for defence of their countrie, and wiſely to foreſee, that no Vices enter into their Common-wealth, that may infect, corrupt, or poyſon it.

The weapons of defence for themſelues, & offending enemies to their State.

By naturall inſtinct, they are enclined, that each one ſtaies on the firſt flower hee finds, and parts not thence away, vntill he haue taken his refection and noriſhment: whereof he wil diſcharge himſelfe, before he ſeekes out any other. And much they frequent the leaues and flowers of the Oliue tree, making there ſom long abiding: ſeruing vs as an example, what ſobriety wee ſhould vſe in the courſe of our Life. When they feed on the flowers of the Almond tree, their hony is the more ſauoury and temperate; whereas contrary-wiſe, when they feed on bitter herbs or flowers it is far leſſe ſweet: notwithſtanding, it is thinner, very mundificatiue, profitable for the opilations of the Liuer, and good for the dropſie, as alſo to heale the biting of a mad dogge.

How they are naturally addicted in their diet and feeding, and what leaues and flowers doe moſt delight them.

Remedies for diuers diſeaſes.

Such as haue made triall by experience of theſe creatures, doe iuſtifie, that when their king cannot fly, he is carried abroad by troops of them; and during the time ỳ he liueth ſo ſickly, the females are ſeparated from the males. But when he is dead, then they conuerſe together again: which declareth, what pitty and piety wee owe to our Prince and countrey, and that men ſhold gladly ſupport and ſuffer for one another. The ſting of the female is ſharper then the males, & there are many males, that haue no ſtings at all. Hereby we may vnderſtand, that the tongues of women are more piercing then mens, & oftimes cauſe very great inconueniences: in which reſpect, they ſhould be kept ſhort & temperated, that their lauiſh liberty breed no blame and contention among neighbors. The beſt Bee is litle, round, cloſely plump bending in the midſt, and leaſt hairy. Som feed on flowers of the mountaines, others on them of Gardens and husbanded places: the firſt whereof, are much leſſe then the other, as alſo more ſtrong and robuſt, to endure labor. Beſide, according to Pliny they are of far dreadfuller aſpect, abiding in the rifts of trees, or in ſome ſmal vaults. And what fairer example can nature afford vs, then of their ſtrength and abilitie? For, ſuch people as are not educated in delicacies, but in continuall exerciſes of mind and body; are moſt profitable members for the Common-wealth. Cloſely they ply their worke in their hiues, & feed on the ſuperabundance of their Combes, knowing by meere inſtinct of nature, that if they ſhold not do ſo, & giue vigilant attendance: Spiders wold get into the hiue, & there kil thē. When they haue but ſmal ſtore of hony, the moſt of them keepes the entrance, ỳ it may not be taken from them vntill they are better prouided. A worthy prefident to men, to baniſh all ſuperfluous things out of their Common-wealth, leaſt by the meanes of them, the venome of hatred may be bred among thē, which may procure the death of one another. And when dearth or ſcarſitie happens in their Cities, vigilancy is needfully required, to preſerue ſuch ſtore as they haue; that it may not bee elſwhere tranſported, & ſo publike calamity enſue thereon.

The idle Drones that make no hony

There are a kind of Bees which labour not to produce hony, but eate that already made, and they are longer then the other: the good Bees haue continuall war with them, to expell them out of their Commonwealth. Signifying to vs, that ſlothful perſons ſhould be excluded from other mens company: and ſuch as ſeeke to feed by others ſweat. Their King neuer flies abroad, but he is attēded round with a great company of Bees, and if it ſo happen, that they meet with another flight of Bees, that likewiſe haue their King vvith them, they leaue their owne, to accompany the new King. And if their owne King contend, to reduce them againe vnder his obedience; they kill him, and follow the other newly made choiſe of, and him they elect as their king. This exceſſe hapneth very ſildom, & is one of the two imperfections which theſe creatures haue in their gouernment: beſide, it is neceſſarie, that in euery kind there ſhould be ſome vice. If they chance to ſting hard, they put foorth the whole length of their ſting; whereon themſelues die withall, becauſe their bowels iſſue out thereby.

A notable imperfection in the gouernement of Bees, worthy obſeruation.

Their Kings and Gouernors ſting but ſildome, although they are thereto prouoked; for ſome ſay, that they haue no ſting at all. And Pliny is not certaine, whether they haue any or no: but notwithſtāding, he is well aſſured that they ſting not: Neither care they that the king ſhould be ſo armed, prouided, that he bee of good gouernment, valiant, & maieſticall: which proueth, that Princes ought to be benign, milde, and patient: neuer to take any delight in cruelty, but rather to be gentle & mercifull. Such is the cleanlines of theſe creatures, that they cannot endure any foule or noiſom ſauour; & therfore when they returne to their Cittie or Caſtle (for ſuch they account their Hiue to be) they diſcharge their bellies in the aire, & many times (through bad ſmelles) they become ſickly, and ſo ſoone as any one of them dyeth, the reſt hurle him out of the Hiue. They grow ſicke alſo thorow idlenes, and therefore they will not ſuffer any to bee ſlothfull amongſt them: and the ſmell of boiled fiſh, ſuch as Creuiſes, Lobſters, and Crab-fiſh is deadly to them. An excellent example for men to liue cleane & neatly, free from a vicious life, carefully reſpecting both their ſoules and bodies.

Plin. l. 10. c. 18

Vertues well ſuting with the maieſty of a Prince.

The neate cleanlineſſe of Bees, exampling men to purity of life.

The winde is very contrary and hurtfull for them; and therefore when it is great, ſtiffe and boyſterous, the hiues ought to be carefully couered. Warme places they affect in winter, as other creatures do, and in Summer, freſh aires are moſt fitting for them. It is very neceſſary to vſe diligence, when the hony is taken from thē: becauſe, if ouermuch be taken away, they will labour little; and if more likewiſe be left then is conuenient, they will bee the leſſe diligent in making more, & therefore a moderate and reaſonable quantity muſt remain, according to the number wherof they conſiſt. What worthier example to men can there be then this? declaring that in the commonwealth, euery thing ought to be moderately meaſured; becauſe ouer-great, pompous, and luxurious dyet, do but deſtroy famous families, abounding in al ſuperfluous things. And yet not to be too niggardly and ſparing in prouiſion needfully required. For as by the firſt children and ſeruants may become careleſſe and negligent; ſo by the latter, they may grow wretched and deſperate.

Their delight in winter and ſummer.

A caueate for taking the hony from them

As lauiſh prodigality is not to bee vſed, ſo penurious niggardiſe deſerueth reproofe

Another diligent care is required in thē that make vſe of Bees, to witte, that when they heare their great ſwarming noiſe in the hiue, it is a ſignificatiō that they wold be gone and leaue the hiue: but then if the hiue be gently ſprinkled ouer with ſweete wine, they will not ſtir abroad. Such as keepe them may eaſily take note hereof, becauſe (ordinarily) they make no other noiſe then when they are flying: Wherein we are inſtructed, that by ſweet language and kind behauiour, we may qualify ſterne anger in diſcontented brethren.

A note foretelling when Bees would forſake their hiue.

Ariſtotle further ſaith, he did wel obſerue it by experience, that their feet before are ſhorter then them behind; which is ſo giuen them by nature, for their eaſier riſing from the ground. He ſaith moreouer, that when the hony corrupteth in the hiue, it engendreth certaine wormes, which make webbes like vnto Spiders; whereby they wexe ſicke, and dye. A very apt example for men, to bee vigilant and reſpectiue of themſelues, that the ſweet daies and proſperity in the world, doe not ſo corrupt their ſoules, as to beget the baneful worm of ambition, which is deadly. In moyſte times of raines, they multiply greatly, by reaſon of the humidity: and contrariwiſe they decreaſe in the times of drought, thorow want of moiſture. Alſo in Winter, their ſtrength much faileth them, in regard of cold weather, ſnowes, and windes out of the North; which hindereth theyr fruitefulneſſe, and therefore they keepe cloſely hidden. But when the Flowers of Beans begin to ſprout, they come abroad to labour: and the firſt worke they doe at home, is to builde their dwelling houſes, next to engender, & then to yeeld hony.

Ariſtot. in Lib. Anim. 4. Cap. 14

Wormes that weaue ſpiders webbes in the hiue.

Reaſons of their multiplying & decreaſing.

Three rampiers of defence to guard their hony combes

They make three ſeuerall rampiers before their Combes, as their guarde and ſtrength; the firſt cruſt (being vtmoſt) they make bitter; the ſecond (within) ſomewhat ſweeter; and the third, thickeſt of al, becauſe it ioyneth next to the Combes; & thus is the foundation of their defence. A good inſtruction for men, how to ſhape their building in this worlde, to vſe diligence in their prouiſion, ſo ſoone as they can, eſpecially of things neceſſary; then to marry, for encreaſe of children, and ſtill to keepe employment in naturall exerciſes.

Their flight abroad, & hinderance from returning home at night

When they flye foorth vpon ſome vrgent occaſions, and are preuented by night, ſo that they cannot returne home vnto their owne habitation; they ſleepe topſie turuy, the vpſide downe, becauſe cold miſts, fogs and raines ſhould not offend their wings, to hinder their flight home to their owne houſes, or execution of their other enterprizes and affaires.

The Sentinell to awake thē in the mornings.

Sentinels they haue of their owne appointment, who make a noiſe at break of day, by which ſound they all awake; and turning themſelues on their feete, they make a noiſe againe to their Sentinels, as a thankfull ſigne of ioy: but then, vppon another ſound from the ſame Sentinelles, they are all ſilent, as attending what inſtāt charge is to be giuen them. Informing our iudgements, in times of warre to bee very vigilant; well prouided, and no way negligent. Excellent experience haue they, when raines and vnſeaſonable times will enſue, which they foreſee by flying abroad in the Euenings, about their owne needfull occaſions; and finding it to follow as they feared, they will not by anie meanes boudge from home,

A wonderfull order naturally obſerued among them, the young laboring for the elder.

They haue (beſide) a maruellous order among them; namely, that the youngeſt Bees flye abroad, and bring home the foode; the elder ſort biding at home, to dreſſe and prepare it. But that which is yet far more admirable is, that when the yong ones arriue, laden with hearbes and flowers laboriouſly; ſome of the aged ſort do meet them at the entrance, and help to eaſe them of their burthen. Moreouer, ſuch as come ſo home ouer-charged, ſeeke the ſweeteſt aires to paſſe thorow, and where they are calmeſt: as fearing, leaſt rude winds ſhould make them let fal what they haue carefully gathered, or dry vppe their honey, and therefore they flye lower towards the ground: and ſuch as can bring home no lading, are woont to carrie little ſtones or grauell, that by the weight of them, they may the better reſiſt impetuous windes.

A notable admonition for the better ſupporting of the Commonwealth.

By this precedent example, yong men are admoniſhed, that they ought to ſtirre and labour in the Commonwealth; & the more aged, to preſerue the fruits of their paines. Yong men alſo, that do buſy their braines in the bluſterings of ambition; ſhould take a lower flight, and neerer to the ground, eſteeming themſelues to bee no more then men: conſidering vprightly in their ſoules, that whatſoeuer benefit enſueth by their paines to the Commonwealth, they ſtand bound thereto by obligation. Let no man therefore ouer-ween, or ſtriue to outgo or be aboue other, except his contention be honorable, & that his trauell may moſt aduance the good of the Commonwealth.

While thus theſe poore creatures are laboring abroad, their Ki. abides at home, hauing a ſtrong court of guard about him wel armed with their ſtings, for the defēce of his perſon. He goeth abroad but very ſildom, and when it is his pleaſure to goe forth, he is (in like manner) royally attended. But whē he wil haue his army abroad to any expedition; three daies before, loud ſummons is giuen for orderly preparatiō. If any troop of them ſwerue from following him, they find their error, by ſmelling to the ground where the King hath paſt, & ſo purſue in that tract, vntill they ouertake him.

him. It is to be admired, how highly they are comforted in his presence: for if he be lost by their negligence, the army looseth it selfe, and then they go to ioyne with another King. Pliny also reporteth, that whē their king dieth, they are so full of anguish and sorrow, that they will neither feed nor flye abroad for any prouision: so that if he be not taken away dead from before thē, they will also dye with greese and hunger. Tutoring vs heerein, that if strifes & variances happen among vs, they should not last of any continnance: also howe the death of our Prince should be irkesom to vs, becausse little benefit cometh by changing Gouernors. Thus we perceiue, how many good examples may bee deriued from the Bees Common-wealth, not vterly vnnecessary for our imitation.

Plin. in lib. 11. cap. 17.

Kingdoms sildome gain by chaunge of Princes.

CHAP. XII.

How sinfull and dangerous a thing it is, to desire reuelations from the dead, or knowledge of things belonging to future life.

LIke as God, who hath created vs without our selues, wil not saue vs without our selues: euen so hath he giuen the ground-worke of all meanes for our saluation, which is Faith, with hope of all those blessings, which (in the ancient Law) he hath promised, concerning the life to come, which also hee hath reuealed by his owne sonne, and are not to bee obtained without beleese and hope in him. But humane frailty, or to speake more properly, Faith in man is so weake, that when the glorie which God hath ordained for that life is preached to him, he answeres, he beleeues it: But yet notwithstanding (saith he) it is a matter of no meane meruaile, that of so many men as haue dyed; not so much as one man is returned back, to tell vs the secrets of that other life.

The absolute foundation of eternall life in the worlde to come.

The very greatest signe of incredulity, that can be in the heart of man (in mine opinion) is this earnest desire, to wish from God a reuelation of the life to come. For seeing that faith consisteth in beleese, and to hope in such things as are not apparant if they were reuealed to vs: why then faith remaineth no more, and so the singulare meanes of saluation should be taken from vs I say moreouer, that by such manner of reuelation, not onely should faith bee destroyed, but also it would bee an occasion in vs, whereby to runne into great error against God, as wee may easily prooue by this argument.

The cheefest note of incredulity in man.

Admit the case, that our father, mother, or brother were raised, and returned again into this world, euen in the same flesh as they parted from vs: and to the end, wee might the more confidently credit them, to be the very same persons, they did eate, drinke, & conuerse with vs (as our blessed Sauior of the world did with his Apostles, to auoide all scruple of doubt, that they were not shadowes or phantasmaes) they reuealing to vs, matters belonging to that concealed life: no doubt need to be made but wee would listen, and verily beleeue whatsoeuer they said to bee true. If this were so, all were but man, hauing a bodie and a soul, and we beleeue him, whom we credit to be but a man, who is a liar by nature. Hereon then it followeth, that in giuing faith to him, we shal shew our selues rather to beleeue a man, naturally a Lyar; then God, who is the soueraigne truth indeed, and cannot lie, but hath oftentimes repeated to vs, what rewarde is prepared for the good, and what punishment for the wicked.

An argument to approue the infallibility of the matter alledged of reuelations by the deade.

God onely is true, & al men lyars.

I thinke then, there is no man, but he wil confesse it a greeuous sinne, if hee should lend faith to a reuelation, desired by a retched man, to beleeue the creature, rather then the Creator. Let no man then couet that which may redound to his own damnation; considering, what God hath bestowed vpon him, and also what is denied for his saluation, when hee may helpe to worke it with feare and trembling. If all are tyed to this conclusion, so much the more it belongeth to a Christian, whom our Sauior hath taught to beleeue, whatsoeuer hee hath reuealed in the Scripture, And saith in the Parable of the Glutton, that to know heauenly things, wee haue the Lawe and the Prophets to instruct vs sufficiently.

The creature ought not to beleeued, but the Creator onely.

CHAP. XIII.

Of a Diſputation made in Antioche, in the preſence of King Ptolomy, by ſeuen ſeuerall Ambaſſadors; to know, which of their kingdomes had the beſt Lawes and Cuſtomes.

KIng Ptolomy being at Antioche, Ambaſſadors from the Romaines, Carthagenians, Sicilians, Rhodians, Athenians, Lacedemonians, & Sicyonians, came thither vpon ſeuerall occaſions to him. And ſitting at ſupper with the King, a diſputation chaunced to bee moued, cõcerning the condition of their Countries and Common-weales, which of them was beſt policied, and prouided of good Lawes and commendable Cuſtomes. The diſpute was long debated & maintained among them, being defended with good and ſufficient reaſons. Whereuppon, King Ptolomy, being deſirous to be reſolued in the truth, commãded each man to ſpeake the cuſtomes in their kingdomes: whereby might beſt be diſcerned, which of the Prouinces merited moſt to be commended.

The argumẽt moued to the Ambaſſadors by the King, for a reſolution therein.

The Ambaſſador for the Romanes firſt began, and anſwered in this maner. We hold our Temples in great and reuerend reſpect; wee are obedient to our Gouernours; and greeuouſly we puniſh wicked and lewd liuers.

For the Romaines.

He for Carthage next ſpake, ſaying. In the Common-wealth of Carthage, our Noblemen fight for vs; our Plebeians & Mechanickes labour for vs; and our Philoſophers enſtruct vs.

Carthage.

He for the Sicilians, ſaid. In our Common-wealth, Iuſtice is intirely kept; our Negotiations are truly managed, and all liue equally together.

Sicily.

Hee for the Rhodians, ſaide. In our Common-wealth, our olde men are honeſt; our young men baſhfully modeſt; and our women liue ſolitarily, vſing but few words.

Rhodes.

The Athenian Ambaſſador ſaide. In our Common-wealth, we neuer conſent, that rich men ſhall be partiall, poore men idle, nor our Gouernors ignorant.

Athens.

He for the Lacedemonians, ſaid. In our Common-wealth, enuy cannot reigne, becauſe we are all equall; nor auarice, becauſe all our goods are in common; nor idleneſſe, becauſe all labour.

Sparta or Lacedemon.

In our common-wealth (ſaid the Ambaſſadour for the Sicyonians) wee permit none to voyage foorth abroad, becauſe at his returning home, hee ſhal not teach & inſtruct vs in matters of noueltie; neither do we ſuffer Phyſitians, who may kil our healthfull men; nor do we allow Orators, becauſe we couet not quarrelling cauſes.

Sicyonia.

When King Ptolomy had heard all the ſeuen Ambaſſadors, he highly commended all their kingdomes; affirming, that they were all well and iuſtly gouerned. That each of them had good Cuſtoms, worthily deſeruing commendation: and that it was hard for him to iudge, which of them was beſt ruled and ordered. So the Ambaſſadors taking their leaue of the King, returned home vnto their ſeuerall countries, very ioyful and contented, that the king had dealt with them ſo graciouſly in iudgement.

The anſwere of King Ptolomy to the Ambaſſadors.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of a very proud and ſumptuous Temple (dedicated to Venus) in the City of Corinth, in the ſeruice whereof, were fiue hundred Ladies: And of the anſwer of an Abbeſſe to a great Lord.

IN Corinth, the principall City of Achaia, liued a tyrant, famous for wealth & vicious life, ſirnamed Herion; who cauſed a ſumptuous Temple to be built in the middeſt of the City, in the maner of a Monaſtery, & dedicated it to the Goddeſſe Venus. In this abhominable Temple, were more then 500. yong Ladies & Gentlewomen of Aſia, whom their fathers there offred to the Goddeſſe Venus, and to her ſeruice: ſo that ſuch of them as were moſt wanton and lasciuious, were held in greatest estimation, and reputed to be most holie and religious. It was not lawfull for any of them to go out of the Temple; but each one might there sinne, and please her selfe with such as shee best liked, and as often as shee would: so that all their Religion consisted not in being honest and vertuous maydens, but they had power to doe what they pleased.

A wicked custome obserued in this detestable Temple.

Among them was an other Lawe also, that if any of them had a mind to marrie, shee must gaine or winne her dowrie, by the infamy of her body, which was permitted that she might so doe. Moreouer, that beside her husband, she might haue an amorous friend: for, in being dedicated to the goddesse of Loue, they intended, not to loose the name of Wanton and Amorous. And no married wife or widdow, might offer in this Temple, but onely virgines. And such as were so vnhappy, or wretched in fortune, to come and offer their Oblations there: before a yeare was expired, became a she diuell in this hellish sanctuarie; and, of a chaste virgin, a shameless and lasciuious strumpet.

No married wiues or widdowes might offer in this Temple, but Virgins onely

All such as had admittance there, were expert in reading, writing, singing, playing on instrumenrs, and dancing. Wherby men were allured thither extraordinarily, and it was no shame for them to bee seene there.

Exercises too good for so lewd a kinde of life.

The like Temples are (at this day to be seene) in the Portugall Indies, in the Prouinces of Iappan, where there are aboue eight hundred Monasteries, the least of which hath more then thirtie Nunnes in it, called there Bonzes; whereof there are two sorts: one clothed in blacke, the other in lighter colours.

Monasteries of lewd Nuns in Iappan, and their abhominable qualities

It is a common fame in those Countries, that these Bonzes doe feede on a certayne hearbe, to auoyde conceiuing with childe: but if conception can not be preuented, then they eate another hearbe, to destroy the infant conceiued. They enstruct yong maydens in reading, and such is the sottishnesse of the people, to credit verily, that they can deliuer the soules of their deceassed parents from Hell; and therefore (in that respect) they are greatly honoured and reuerenced.

We our selues in these dayes (almost monstrous and miserable) neede not trauaile so farre off, to find out Monasteries, where Religious women or Nunnes (if wee may tearme them Religious) leade their liues as lewdly and dissolutely, wherof themselues make no other concealement, but that all commers and goers, finde there exceeding kinde wellcome. Which ensueth by ouer-much libertie & ydlenesse, or else, by being placed there by their parents, contrary to their owne liking. But the good and vertuously disposed (whereof there are many) are not comprehended amongest these deboshed women: And as for the voluptuous and immodest; they regarde not who knowes their loosenesse, and may well say of themselues, as an Abbesse did, of whom Nicholas Boyerus maketh mention in his Decisions. She had fortie Nunnes vnder her charge, and there belonged to that Monastery twenty Priests.

Monasteries of Nuns neerer home, liuing as lewdly

Nicholas Boyerus in li. de Decis. Dist. 17.

It came to passe, that a Prince, whose predecessours had founded that Monasterie, passing rhat way, and visiting the Religious companies: found all (else-where) in good order, except the number of Priests, and these Nunnes, whose number he thought not well ordayned; whereupon hee sayde to the Abbesse: Truely Madame, me thinkes, that in stead of fourty Nunnes, fortie Priests had beene better appoynted, and twenty Nunnes onelie had beene sufficient. My Lord (quoth she) perhaps the order is not so ill contriued, as you imagine it to be, neither is it to be condemned: for, of the fortie Nuns heere appointed, twenty are for the twentie Priests; and the other twenty serue for all comers and goers.

The conference betweene a Prince & the Lady Abbesse

¶ Of the Oracle of Apollo in the Isle of Delphos, the Originall thereof, and vpon what occasion it came.

THe most renowned Oracle long since in Asia, was that of Apollo in the Isle of Delphos, whither resorted infinite persons, and from all parts of the world: offering there great gifts, and consulting on especiall matters, because becauſe more aunſweres were returned thence, then from all other Oracles. At the firſt, there was a deepe, crooked, winding caue or ditch, out of which iſſued a winde, that blew extremely at the mouth or entrance; thereon was ſeated a yoong Virgine, dedicated to Apollo, that gaue aunſwere to all things demaunded of her. This winde was the diuell, who blew into her eares; and before the Temple was builded in Delphos, a ſhe-Goat deſcending downe into that caue or ditch, became ſuddenly filled with a diuine Spirit, daunſing, skipping and leaping for ioy, as the like had neuer bin ſeene before. Whereat the Goate-heard wondering, followed her downe into the caue, and beganne to fore-tell of things to come. Many more beſide made proofe in the ſame maner; ſo that whoſoeuer would know what was to enſue, moſt put his head into the entrance of the caue.

The reaſon for building the Temple.

But in the end, this could not be doone without daunger, and loſſe of many perſons: whereupon a Temple was erected to Apollo the Diuiner, and the Prieſt named Pythia, who made choice of a Virgine, to be placed on the Tripos: whereof Lactantius the Grammarian ſpeaketh thus, interpreting this Verſe of Achilles Statius, in his firſt Booke of his Thebays.

Many other Oracles there were in diuers other places. Liber was the Oracle of the Sicilians; Ceres, that of the Rhodians; Diana, of the Epheſians; Berecinthia, of the Romaines; Belus, of the Paleſtines; Iuno, of the Numidians; Venus, of the Thebans and Cyprians; and many others; in whom poore abuſed Idolaters repoſed all their confidence, rendring to them their Vowes and Sacrifices, albeit vtterly in vaine. For, the aunſwers of theſe Oracles, were nothing elſe but ydle imaginations, and meere fables proceeding from the diuell, the father of lies. And by good right were ſuch abuſes and ſuperſtitions condemned; by them that had knowledge of our true eternall God; as Dauid, Baruch, and other holy men, who deteſted ſuch Idolls and Images of the Gentiles, made of golde, ſiluer, ſtone, wood, and other matter, and by the hand of man.

AN auncient cuſtome (good and commendable) hath euermore beene, not onelie on the behalfe of Chriſtians, but alſo amongſt the Ethnickes: in acknowledging the benefite they receiued from God; not by wordes alone, but alſo by effects and exterior Sacrifices. So that there is no Nation ſo barbarous, but hath confeſſed his God, by ſome outward ſigne. And the Roman Senate did alwayes holde Religion in veneration, that ſo often as they met together (as Varro reporteth.) Although they had affaires of great importance, and which required haſtie diligence: yet the firſt thing that they propounded to themſelues (before deciſion of any doubts) was religious humiliation to their gods.

Pagans and Chriſtians haue bin carefull of Religion in all times.

Marcus Varro in lib. 1. de Relig cap. 8.

At all times, and whenſoeuer the Romaine Conſulls or Emperours ſhould go forth to warre, they neuer would prepare for the field, till they had firſt ſacrificed to their gods, ſaying; All felicitie and proſperitie proceeded from them. And Marcus Aurelius ſaith; They helde it for an infallible rule, that there can be nothing perfect among mortall men, except it bee perfected by God. Lycurgus, the auncient Law-maker of the Lacedemonians, among other Lawes, ordayned: That no man ſhould be ſo bolde to ſeeke for fauor from a Prince, except he were knowne to ſerue the Gods diligently. Nor do I alledge theſe examples, as intending to confirme my ſaying by Pagans and Idolaters: but onely to make vs bluſh with ſhame, by ſeeing, how farre they exceeded vs in pietie and religion.

The admirable piety of the Ladies & Matrones of Rome.

In the time of Quintus Fabius and Publius Decius, they warring againſt the Samnites and Hetrurians, the Roman Matrons performed wonderfull things, neuer ceaſing day and night, in offering great Sacrifices to the gods, ſaying: If they were once appeaſed, they needed not to ſtand in feare of their enemies.

Examples of the children of God.

But leaue we Idolaters, and let vs ſeeke what the auncient children of God did, who at all times, and whenſoeuer they were afflicted, had their recourſe to Sacrifices, when they would expreſſe their thankefulneſſe to Almighty God, for benefites receiued. Noah, after hee came foorth of the Arke, erected an Altare, ſacrificed thereon, and the ſacrifice was ſo acceptable to God, that he promiſed him, neuer more to drowne the world agayne. Genes. 8,18, 20,21.

Good Iaacob, being gone from the houſe of Laban, to giue thankes to God, built an Altare, which hee conſecrated to God. Gen. 31,54.

The children of Iſrael, beeing afflicted in the wilderneſſe, ſayd: Let vs go on for three dayes, and afterward wee will ſacrifice vnto our God. Exod. 15,12.

We reade in Eſdras, that after the children of Iſrael were returned, to re-edifie their Temple, that they might ſacrifice to God; they were ſo carefull, that building with one hand, they helde their weapons in the other, to defend them from their enemies. 1 Eſdras 4,3

In Leuiticus, mention is made of innumerable Sacrifices, whereby God pardoned offences committed. Hereupon Daniel being in the captiuitie of Babylon, and ſeeing the Sacrifices to be forſaken, ſayd: In theſe times, there is heere neyther Prince, Gouernour, nor Prophet, nor Holocauſt, nor Sacrifice, nor Oblation, nor Incenſe, nor place to offer our Firſt-fruites on before thee: Receiue therefore vs, with our ſoules broken, and our ſpirites caſt downe. Elias alſo, lamented grieuouſly, becauſe the Altares were ouerthrowne, and in his earneſt zeale to God, vnable to ſuffer ſuch ruine, deſired to die. For without all doubt, nothing is more miſerable, then when the ſeruice of Almightie God is deſpiſed, and where it faileth, a puniſhment from God ſurely followeth. Leuit. 5,6,7. Dan. 3,9. 3 Reg. 19,14.

Aarons ſonnes, Nadab and Abihu, were conſumed with fire from heauen, before all the people; becauſe they obſerued not the Lawe ordayned for the Sacrifices. Leuit. 10,2.

King Balthaſar, prophaning the veſſels of gold and ſiluer, dedicated to the Temples ſeruice, to ſerue his wiues & concubines for drinking therein at his Table: diuinely ſawe a Hand writing on the wall, foretelling his neere approching ruine; ſo that he was taken by his enemies, and ſlayne the ſame inſtant. Dan. 5,2.

Achab, hauing prophaned the holy place, erected a Temple to the Idoll Baal: but afterwardes, going againſt the Syrians, he was ſlayne with an Arrow ſhot from a bowe. 3 Reg. 22,35

Pompey made a Stable of Gods Temple and the puniſhment therefore inflicted on him afterward.

The Records of Hiſtories doe alſo tell vs, that Pompey, hauing made a Stable of Gods Temple, after hee had robbed, ranſackt, & ſpoyled Ieruſalem, became thereby ſo abominable to GOD, that thence forward he was moſt vnfortunate. And although hee had before vanquiſhed two and twentie Kings, yet at the laſt, himſelfe was miſerably ouercome. The ſonne of Darius was ſo prowde and preſumptuous, that hee would not onely abuſe men, but euen the gods alſo, and ſent foure thouſand men to beate downe the Temple of Apollo: but ſo great a hayle and tempeſt fell from Heauen, that deſtroyed them euery man. For this cauſe, the good Emperour Marcus Aurelius, writing a Letter to the King of * Trinacria; reproued him greatly, becauſe he had beaten downe a moity of the temple, to enlarge his houſe. Thou thinkeſt (quoth he) that the ſtones and morter, wherewith the Temple was built, to be of ſmall value: it is very true; but the Gods to whom they are dedicated, are moſt mightie. I wiſh therefore, if thou would haue peace with the Romaines, (hauing ſcandalized Rome, and grieued the Senate) that thou ſhouldeſt take as much of thy houſe to enlarge the Temple, as thou haſt taken from it, and build it a great deale higher, and wider then it was; and then thou ſhalt be happie, in taking nothing from the houſe of the Gods, but rather that they poſſeſſe part of thine.

¶ Of diuers and sundry opinions of the Philosophers, concerning the seate of the soule in the body of Man; And a contrarie coniecture of the Platonists.

Variety of coniectures diuersly deliuered.

PLato and Democritus say, That the seate of the Soule is in the head. Straton the Philosopher limitteth it; Betweene the eyebrowes. Eraſtratus within the skinne or filme of the Braine. Heraclitus placeth it, in the outward agitation. Moschion giues it place, throughout all the bodie. Xenocrates, in the crowne of the head. Parmenides, Epicurus, the Stoickes and Aegyptians, lodge it wholly in the heart: as the like doth Orpheus. Xerxes, King of Persia, thought it to be in the eares. Empedocles, in the heape or pile of the bloud. Philo the Iew, in his Booke of Allegories of the Lawe, saith thus. The reasonable facultie or part of the soule, is in the head; the irrascible, in the heart, and the concupiscible, in the groine, or lower part of the belly.

Philo Iudaic. in lib. Allegor. leg. cap. 9.

Opinion of Christians.

But we Christians, hold it to be in the heart, whence proceedeth good and euill cogitations. Saint Augustine in his booke concerning the knowledge of true Life, writeth thus; The Soule is dispersed throughout all the body, and keepeth wholly in euery part thereof. Very true it is (sayth he also) that it yeeldeth far greater effects and actions, in some one place, then other: either by the will, which in that place sendeth out his strength; or else by those instruments, proper and commodious for action.

Aug. in lib. ver. vit. cap. 33.

The opinion of the Platonists concerning the signs Cancer and Capricorne.

The Platonists say, That the Soule descendeth by Cancer, and mounteth agayne by Capricorne; and I thinke, that from hence they ground this coniecture; Because Cancer is the house of the Moone, the vertue whereof gouerneth ouer the vegetable parts, it viuifieth the body; And Capricorne is the house of Saturne, which presideth for contemplation, whereto the Soule being freed from the body it may walke at libertie.

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ How men ought to shunne and auoyde Curiositie; And what penalties and punishments were appoynted by our Auncients, for curious people.

The Athenians Law against curious Questionists.

THE Athenians had a Lawe, which was well obserued among them, whereby euery man was forbidden (of what degree or qualitie soeuer he were) that hee should not dare, to enquire of any stranger, newly arriued in their Cittie: from whence he came, what hee was, nor what he sought for; vnder penaltie for him that demaunded such questions, to be well whipt with roddes, and banished his Countrey. The end, for which our graue Auncients made such Lawes, was, to keepe men from the vice of curiositie; which is alwayes ouer-ready, to prie into other mens affaires, and be regardlesse of their owne.

The great wisedome of Marcus Portius the Romaine.

Plutarch, Aulus Gellius and Pliny doe thinke, that they can neuer sufficiently commend Marcus Portius the Romaine, becausse no man did euer heare him, to enquire what newes were at Rome; nor how the people liued in their houses. His talke alwayes was, of such things as hee knew was profitable for the Commonwealth, or else fitted such demaunds as required necessary answere. Plato, writing of Dionysius the Syracusan, speaketh thus: The curious man, that would know the life and actions of another man; is more friend to his enemies, then to himselfe. For, hee will quickely bestirre his tongue, in talking of his enemy, and what harme hee knoweth by him; but neuer cares what foule offences himselfe hath committed.

Plato in lib. de Legib. 3. cap. 5.

The answer of the Poet Pindarus.

A King of Sparta requested Pindarus to tell him, what was the most difficult thing for a man to doe? Whereunto Pindarus thus replyed; Nothing is more easie for a man, then to reproue an other; nor more difficult ficult, then to endure reprehension in himselfe.

Penethes a famous Philosopher of Thebes, his saying.

Penethes, who among the Thebanes was a Philosopher much renowned, could neuer be numbred among the curious, nor condemned with the malicious. He hauing liued as a Philosopher, for the space of thirtie yeares, in the Academies of Thebes; being blamed by some, becausse hee did not reprehend the sinnes which hee sawe committed, answered: When I know that I haue no sinne in my selfe, then will I beginne to reproue sinne in other.

The answer of Plato to Dyonisius the Tyrant.

Plato departing from Sicilie, for his returne to Greece, and taking his leaue of Dionysius, the King spake thus vnto him. After thou commest among the Philosophers of Greece: O how ill wilt thou speak of me, and of my tyranny? Plato answered; Doubt not (Dionysius) what I shall speake of thee in the hearing of Philosophers: for their manners are so vertuous, and themselues so imployed in their studies; that they haue no time to heare idle talke. Moreouer he sayd; Know, O Dionysius, if thou beest ignorant, that such is the height of our Philosophie, as to perswade and councell men, Then euery one should iudge himselfe, and not to busie his brains, to defame or reproue the liues of other.

A good aduice if it were well obserued

King Lysimachus conferring with the Poet Philippides.

Philippides, who was the first inuenter of Comedies, being a great friend to king Lysimachus; the King conuersing with him vpon a day, sayd; What dost thou desire of me (O Philippides) and I will freely graunt it thee, whatsoeuer thou requirest? The greatest grace (quoth Philippides, that thou canst giue me, is, neuer to acquaint mee with any of thy secrets. O wise and worthy answere! read by many, and vnderstoode of few: For, if this Philosopher would not know the secrets of a King, much lesse would hee vnderstand them of his neighbours.

CHAP. XIX.

¶ Of the three Conquests of England, by the Saxons, Danes and Normans; occasioned by the sinnes, either of the Princes, or of the People, or of both.

IF wee consider the three diuerse Conquests of England, since it receyued the Christian faith, and the state thereof at the same time, together with the iudgement and testimony of the graueſt Authors that haue written thereof; we shall easily see, that the same haue proceeded of no other cause, but by the sinnes of the Princes, or of the People, or of both. For, although the infirmitie of man is such, as there neuer wanteth matter for Gods Iustice to punish in Common-wealths (by reason whereof, we see, that in all Countries, the people are scourged more or lesse from time to time, not onely particularly euery one in his owne person, with misaduentures, sickenesse, losse of goods, death of children, and such like, but also generally, with plagues, famine, inundations and warres) yet the subuersion of Common-wealths neuer chaunceth, but for some great excesse of sinne, eyther in the Prince, or in the People, or in both: And commonly, after many warnings & admonitions giuen by gentle and sweete corrections. Such being the longanimitie and patience of Almighty God, that he layeth the Axe at the foote of the tree, long before he cutteth it downe, and trieth all means to cure the soares of his seruants, by lenetiues and fomentations, rather then by cauterisings and incisions, or by cutting off the infected member, which hee neuer doth, but when there is no other remedy.

The causes of the three conquests of England by the Saxons, Danes and Normans.

Great excesse of sinne in Prince, people, or both.

This course (we see) hee helde with his owne people, for, though hee often chastised them with famine, pestilence, inuasions of enemies, and ciuile wars: yet (after a while) he euer restored them to tranquilitie, plentie and peace, vntill they prooued so incorrigible, that the Prophet Ieremi in the second chapter, and the thirtieth verse, lamented, in the person of God, that all his Fatherly corrections were lost vppon them, saying: Frustra percussi filios vestros: I haue beaten and chastised your children in vaine. And againe, the aforesayd Prophet in the fifth chapter and in the third verse, saith to Almightie God; Percussisti eos, &c. Thou hast beaten them (O Lord) and they haue not beene sorie; thou hast consumed them, and they haue refused to receiue correction. As who would say, there is no other remedy left, but reprobation, subuersion, and vtter extirpation of them. And therefore Almightie God gaue them ouer into the hands of their enemies; firſt, the tenne Tribes in Samaria, as in the fourth booke of the Kings the ſeuenteenth chapter and eighteene verſe, which were all taken with their King Hoſea, and tranſlated into Syria. And afterward alſo, the other two Tribes in Iuda, were carried into captiuitie by Nabuchadonoſor king of Babylon, where they remayned three ſcore and ten yeares. And though they were afterwards reſtored to their Countrey, and their Temple reedified; yet at length they were (for their extreame ingratitude, and peruerſe obſtinacie) vtterly ruinated.

The patience which God vſed towards the Britaines before their Conqueſt.

The like proceeding Almighty God vſed with England, in the time of the Brittaines, after they receyued the Chriſtian Faith; for he chaſtiſed them, ſometimes with dearth and famine, ſometimes with peſtilence, and other-whiles with incurſions of their enemies, and with ciuill warres amongeſt themſelues: ſo long as the ſame ſufficed to reduce them vnto repentance, and amendment of their ſinfull liues, as ſometimes it did; which their famous Countrey-man Beda, and auncient Guildas called, the Sage, doe teſtifie: Declaring, that the Brittaines, being partly driuen by famine, and partly by inuaſion of Scottes, and Pictes, eyther to abandon the Country, or to hide themſelues in the Mountaines, Woods, and Caues; craued helpe and ſuccour of the Romaines; writing vnto them that lamentable Epiſtle, whereof Guildas maketh mention; in the which they ſayd: Our barbarous enemies doe driue vs to the Sea, and the Sea doth driue vs backe to them agayne: ſo that of two kindes of death we haue our choice; that is to ſay, Whether we will haue our throates cut, or elſe be drowned. Thus wrote they to the Romaines.

The miſerable ſtate of the Britains inuaded by the Picts and Scots. Guildas de excidio Britan.

But being not ſuccoured by them, by reaſon of their great warres at the ſame time with Attila, they beganne to haue recourſe to the mercie of God, and to relie wholly vppon his helpe (as the foreſayd Authors haue reported) and ſo (with his aſſiſtance) affayled their enemies out of the Caues and Woods where they lay hidden, and not onely gaue vnto them great ouerthrowes, but alſo droue them out of the Countrey; and ſhortly after had ſuch plenty of corne, fruite, and all kinde of victualles, that the like had neuer beene ſeene, nor heard of before in many ages. Whereuppon followed the effect, which Moſes noted and lamented in the children of Iſrael, Deuteronomie the one and thirtie chapter and the three and twentieth verſe; Incraſſatus eſt dilectus (ſayeth hee) & recalcitrauit: The beloued people of God was made fatte, and then they beganne to kicke: that is to ſay, (as hee expoundeth it euen preſently after) Incraſſatus, impinguatus, dilatatus dereliquit Deum factorem ſuum. Being become faire and fatte, they forſooke their God and Creator; ſo fell it out with the Brittaines.

The Britains deſtitute of humane helpe, had recourſe to the diuine, and obtained it.

Ibid. The Britaines by proſperity became inſolent and vngratefull to God.

For, they prooued ſo vngratefull for Gods great mercy towards them, that (as the aforeſaid Authors doe affirme) they fell into the extreamitie of all miſchiefe and wickedneſſe. Non ſolum ſeculares viri, &c. Not onely Secular men, but alſo the Eccleſiaſticall; giuing themſelues wholly to drunkenneſſe, to animoſitie and contention, enuy, cruelty, hatred of trueth, loue of lies, and all vice. Whereupon our Lord ſcourged them with ſuch a peſtilent mortalitie, that (within but a while) there were not men enow aliue (as theſe Authors teſtifie) to burie the dead.

And when that ſufficed not to reuoke them from their vicious liues; Non multo poſt (ſaith Beda) acrior gentem peccatricem vltio diri ſceleris ſecuta eſt. Shortly after, a ſharper puniſhment of ſuch deteſtable wickedneſſe followed vpon that ſinnefull people. For the Pictes and Scots beganne againe to make ſuch irruptions vppon them, that (not being able to withſtand them) they were forced to call in the Saxons to aſſiſt them. Quod Domini nutu (ſaith Beda) diſpoſitum eſſe conſtat, &c. Which it is manifeſt was done by Gods diſpoſition, to the end that their wickednes might receiue due puniſhment. For, within a while, the Saxons did confederate themſelues with their enemies, and picking quarrells againſt them, deſtroyed all the Countrey with fire and ſword, burning vp houſes, villages, and townes, and killing all ſortes of people: inſomuch, that many fledde into forraine Countries, and others hid themſelues amongſt the hilles, mountaines and wooddes, vntill acknowledging the iuſt iudgement of Almightie God vpon them, they called to him

And eſpecially at Blackamore in Yorkeſhire (for ſo was called Mons Badonicus, as ſaith Polydore Virgil in his third booke) where they made ſuch great ſlaughter of them: as that (for ſome certayne yeares) they did not further moleſt them.

The relapſe of the Britaines into their former vices.

For, beeing (as Guildas in his booke De Excid. Britann. reporteth) mindefull of their former calamities, and of afflictions laid on them for their ſinnes: all ſorts of men ſpirituall and temporall, as well the Princes as their ſubiects, did euerie one their duetie in his vocation. At illis (ſaith Guildas) decedentibus, &c. But they being dead, and another Age ſucceeding, ignorant of the miſeries paſt, and corrupted with preſent eaſe and pleaſure; All trueth and iuſtice was ſo ſubuerted: that there appeared not ſo much as anie ſight thereof, in all the aforeſaid ſtates of men; Exceptis paucis, & valdè paucis, Excepting a few, and thoſe very few. For, the kings (ſaith he) were Tyrants, the Iudges moſt wicked and corrupt; the Prieſts negligent of their duetie. Rarò ſacrificantes, & nunquam puro corde inter altaria ſtantes; Seldome ſacrificing, and neuer comming to the Altar with a pure heart. Ignorant, impudent, ſimoniacall, laſciuious; and all ſortes of Lay men loaden with wickedneſſe, with murder, parricides, pride, adulteries, ſwearing, periuries, blaſphemies, and all kindes of iniquitie.

The vices of the Cleargie and Laytie in Britaine.

And now to ſhew ſome particularities of this, and how iuſtly the vengeance of Almightie GOD was powred out vppon the whole Kingdome: The ſame Authour, in the place before cited, toucheth briefly the liues of ſome of the Kings and Princes, which liued in his time: as of Conſtantius, Aurelius, Conanus, Vortiporius, Cuneglaſus and Maglocunus, taxing them with tyrannie, periurie, ſacrilegious murthers, and parricides (committed euen before holy Altars) adulteries, horrible inceſts, breach of vowes, of religion and chaſtitie; yea, and two of them with beaſtly Sodomie.

The horrible ſinnes of the Princes of Britaine, before the conqueſt thereof by the Saxons.

For the which enormities, and the generall corruption and wickedneſſe of the whole Kingdome, hee threatneth, or rather propheſieth vnto them, vtter ruine and deſtruction; which (ſhortly after) worthily fell vppon them, as the Britiſh Chronicles by Geoffrey of Monmouth in the twelfth booke of his Hiſtorie and the fifteenth chapter, alſo acknowledgeth: For hee ſayth, That King Cadwallader (who was the laſt of the Brittaines race) vſed theſe wordes, as hee fledde by Sea into Fraunce, with the reliques of the Britaine nation; Væ nobis peccatoribus ob immania ſcelera noſtra, &c. Woe bee to vs ſinners, for our grieuous ſins, wherewith we neuer ceaſed to offend God, while we had time of repentance; and therfore now the puniſhment of God falles vpon vs, which roots vs out of our natiue ſoile. Thus ſaid K. Cadwallader, and more to that purpoſe.

King Cadwallader flying in to France, acknowledged Gods iuſtice vpon himſelfe and his people for their ſins.

Afterward hapned the inuaſion of the Danes, who firſt by piracies, & after by open wars, cruelly infeſted & troubled the realme at ſundry times, for the ſpace of almoſt 200. yeares. But the good king Alured, or Alfred, Founder of the famous Vniuerſity of Oxenford, recouered all formerly loſt, & droue the Danes out of England: except ſuch as were content to become Chriſtians, to whom he gaue the kingdomes of Northumberland, and of the Eaſt-Angles, who, during his time, neuer mooued warre. And they of the Eaſterne parts, ſtirring afterward againſt his ſonne, called Edward, were by him vtterly ouerthrowne; as alſo the other in Northumberland, in like manner, and vpon the like occaſion, were ſubdewed by his Grandchilde Adelſtane, who made England a Monarchie, which ſo remained and flouriſhed without further infeſtation of the Danes, during the reigne of four kings, the ſucceſſors of Adelſtane; to wit, his two brethren, Edmond and Eldred (who ſucceeded one another) and the two ſons of Edmond, called Edwin and Edgar, which Edgar was (for his excellent vertues, and proſperous reigne) called Honor & deliciæ Anglorum, The honour and delight of England: or, as Ingulphus tearmeth him, Honor & Roſa Regum: The Honour and Roſe of Kings.

The mercie of God to the poſteritie of the good king Alured, to the 4. generation. Guil. Malmeſ. lib. 2. cap. 8. Ingulph. hiſt. Anglorum.

Of whom it is written, that in his time, all Eccleſiaſticall Orders flouriſhed, learned and vertuous men were highly eſteemed, all ciuill and forraine warres ceaſed, and he was called the King of Albion, being no leſſe powerfull by Sea, then by Land. No yeare of his reigne paſſed, wherein hee built not a Monaſterie, or elſe did ſome great and notable good to his Countrey: And ſuch were his vertues, and great fame for felicity, that there came principall men from out of all the Countries adioyning, to ſee, and be acquainted with him.

The Danes returned againe into England, and conquered it. Polyd. Hiſt. Angl. lib. 7.

Now, whereas the Danes returned againe into England, ſhortly after Edgar, in the reigne of his ſonne Etheldred; and not onely moleſted it with incurſions (as they were wont) but alſo conquered and poſſeſſed it for a time: it may well be preſumed, that they were but the inſtruments of Gods iuſtice therein; and that this conqueſt made by the Danes, proceeded of the ſinnes, partly of the famous King Edgar (though hee were dead before) and partly of his wife Alfreda; and laſtly, of their ſonne Etheldred, in whoſe time the Countrey was conquered. For, although King Edgar excelled in all pietie and vertue in his latter dayes; yet he did an acte in his youth, whereof it may be thought, that his children and poſteritie payed the penaltie.

Polyd. Virg. Hiſt. Anglic. lib 6. What the offence was of King Edgar, and Alfreda his wife.

This I ſay, for that after the death of Elfreda his wife (by whom hee had King Edward the Martyr) hee fell in loue with Alfreda, wife to a Noble man called Ethelwoolfe, whom (with her conſent) he cauſed to be killed, to the end he might marrie her. How grieuous this ſinne was in the ſight of Almightie GOD, and how iuſtly puniſhed in his poſteritie, wee may well iudge by the like offence of King Dauid, who, to the end he might marry Bathſheba, procured the death of Vrias her huſband, for the which, the Prophet Nathan, in the ſecond booke of the Kings, chapter twelue, verſe ten, told him from Almightie God; that the ſword ſhould neuer depart from his houſe; and that his ſonne in the Cradle, ſhould die therefore. Beſide, Almightie God permitted (for puniſhment of that ſinne) that all his other children (except Salomon) died moſt vnfortunately. For Amnon, hauing deflowred his ſiſter Thamar, was killed by his brother Abſolon; and Adonias by Salomon; and laſtly, Abſolon rebelling and fighting againſt his owne father King Dauid, was miſerably ſlaine, hanging on a tree by the haire of the head. And therefore no marruell, that the like ſinne of King Edgar, was alſo ſeuerely puniſhed in his children.

2 Reg. 12, 10

2 Reg 13, 29
3 Reg. 2, 25.
2 Reg. 18, 9.

To this purpoſe, it is to be noted, that his marriage prooued moſt vnfortunate, not only to the fruit that proceeded thereof, and the whole Realme (as ſhall be declared hereafter) but alſo to king Edward, his ſonne by his former wife, who ſhortly after was killed, by the meanes of Alfreda his ſtepmother, for the aduauncement of her ſonne Eltheldred. Wherein I cannot but note (by the way) the ſeueritie of Gods Iuſtice in puniſhing ſinne, ſeeing the ſayd young Prince, being very holy and innocent of life, could not eſcape the temporall puniſhment, due to his Fathers offence.

Polyd Virg. lib. 6. in fine.

The ſeuerity of Gods Iuſtice in puniſhing ſinne.

But to proceede, ſuch was the common opinion of the innocencie and holineſſe of this young King Edward, and enormitie of the ſinne committed by Alfreda, in the murder of him: that the conceit of moſt men at that time was (as William of Malmesburie witneſſeth) that the Conqueſt of England by the Danes, was a puniſhment of God for the ſame; which wel may be ſo preſumed, eſpecially, if we adde thereunto the offence, not onely of his father (whereof I haue already ſpoken) but alſo of his brother Etheldred, for whoſe cauſe hee was murthered; and in whoſe time that Conqueſt hapned. For it may be thought moſt conſonant to the Iuſtice of Almightie God, that Etheldred (being the ſonne of the wicked Alfreda, and fruit of the curſed marriage; yea, and withall, moſt wicked of himſelfe) ſhould beare the penaltie as well of his owne, as of both his parents ſinnes: As partly was fore-tolde at his coronation, by Dunſtane then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſaying: That for his Mothers ſin in the murder of King Edward, both hee and his children ſhould bee ſeuerely puniſhed, and his Kingdome transferred to ſtrangers.

And if wee doe conſider the manner of his life, and the nature and qualitie of his offences; we ſhall find them to be the very ſame, which the Scriptures affirme to bee the cauſe of the tranſlation of Kingdoms from one nation to another; whereof Eccleſiaſticus ſaith: Regnum de gente in gentem transfertur, &c. Kingdomes are transferred from one nation to another, becauſe of iniuſtice, iniuries, calumniations and diuers deceits. In which kinde of ſinnes ſinnes King Etheldred greatly exceeded; for he had his eares ſo open, and ſhewed ſuch fauour to all kind of accuſers and calumniators; that (as Polydore Virgill ſaith) No mans life was in ſecuritie. Beſides, on euery light occaſion, ſpoyld & baniſhed the richeſt and wealthieſt of his ſubiects, beeing alſo addicted to all kinde of riot and diſſolution. And therefore William of Malmesburie writeth of him briefely thus: Eius vita curſus ſæuus in principio, miſer in medio, turpis in exitu: The courſe of his life was cruell in the beginning, miſerable in the middeſt, and ſhamefull in the end.

Polyd. Virg. l. 7.

Guliel. Malſm. de geſt. Reg. lib. 2. cap. 16.

Furthermore, he was ſo cowardly and baſe minded, that hee was no leſſe contemptible to ſtrangers abroad, then hateful to his owne ſubiects at home. Whereupon, the Danes tooke courage to enter England againe, who made him graunt them a yearely tribute, wherewith they were content for a time; and after turning thither agayne, forced him to flie into Normandie, and to leaue his kingdome to Sweno their King, who exerciſed all kind of cruelty vpon the Engliſh, and enioyed the Kingdome as long as he liued. Which was not paſt fiue yeares. After whoſe death, Etheldred recouered it againe, and poſſeſſed it two yeares, whileſt Canutus ſonne to Sweno was held buſied at home, with a rebellion of the people of Norway.

King Etheldred expelled out of England by Sweno King of the Danes, who reigned there fiue yeares.

In which meane while, Etheldred returned like the dogge to his olde vomite of cruelty and iniuſtice, eſpecially againſt the Danes (who had beene for ſome yeares planted and marrowed in England) cauſing many of them to be killed with cruell torments. And amongſt others, Sigifredus and Morgandus, two of the nobleſt of them) were falſly accuſed of fained crimes, and put to death for the ſame. Beſides, Prince Edmund ſonne to Etheldred, rauiſhed the wife of Sigifred, being a woman no leſſe admirable for her beautie, then commendable for her chaſtitie. All which when Canutus vnderſtood, being mooued with deſire, as well to reuenge theſe iniuries done to his Countreymen, as alſo to recouer the Kingdome of England, conquered by his father: hee paſſed ouer thither with an Armie, and put all to fire and ſword; whereupon Etheldred dyed with ſorrow.

King Etheldred after the death of Sweno, recouered England againe, & vſed his former cruelty and impiety.

And although his ſonne, ſurnamed Ironſide (after diuers conflicts, and a combate fought hand to hand with Canutus) poſſeſſed the one half of England by compoſition: yet within a yeare, Canutus enioyed the whole by the ſodaine death of Edmond, ſlaine vpon a priuy as he was eaſing himſelfe; and ſo he remayned abſolute King thereof as long as hee did liue, which was about ſome twentie yeares after.

Edmond Ironſide, Son to king Etheldred.

Canutus king of England.

Herein neuertheleſſe it is to be noted, how the mercie of Almightie God concurred with his Iuſtice, and moderated the rigour thereof; for that (of his infinite bounty) he determined by this conqueſt, as it ſeemed, rather to chaſtiſe, correct and redreſſe England, then to ruine and oppreſſe it. And therfore, after he had ſomewhat ſatisfied the ſeueritie of his iuſtice, not onely vpon the Realme, by the fiue yeares cruell reigne of Sweno (who ranſacked and ſpoyled all ſorts of men, aſwell Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall) but alſo vpon the perſons of Etheldred, and his ſonne Edmund: hee gaue them Canutus, ſonne to Sweno, for their King, who, although he was a ſtranger, yet gouerned with all clemencie and good example of life, doing continually actes of pietie, making good Lawes and wholeſome, eaſing the people of taxes and impoſitions, and deſeruing well of all eſtates, by the meanes whereof England flouriſhed (in his time) in peace and much plentie. Of whom I can not forbeare (this occaſion beeing offered) to expreſſe and declare heere (by the way) a notable acte, which I wiſh all Princes would well weigh and conſider, in the height of their proſperity and greateſt fortune.

The mercy of God towards the Engliſh, in turning their conqueſts to their comfort.

The great vertue and piety of king Canutus.

It chanced once, as he was walking at Southhampton, by the Sea ſide, ſome of his noble men flattered him, and extolled (aboue meaſure) his great power, calling him the moſt mightie and potent King of all Kings, commaunding abſolutely ouer men, land & ſea. Whereupon, to correct their flatterie, and to ſhew mans infirmitie, he went to the very Sea ſide, and ſitting downe, ſaid to the waues (as the tide was coming in,) I commaund yee, that you touch not my feete. And beeing preſently after well waſhed with a waue that came in vppon him; hee aroſe, and turning himſelfe to his noblemen, ſaid vnto them:

A memorable acte of King Canutus.

Loe my Lords, you call me King of Kings, and Lord of Land and Sea; though I cannot commaund one of theſe little waues : Therefore know yee, that the King of Kings, and hee that commaundeth Land and Sea, is the Father of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, by whoſe will and prouidence all things were gouerned. And hauing thus ſaide, hee returned to Wincheſter, and tooke the Crowne which he vſed to weare vpon his head, and put it (with his owne hands) vpon an Image of CHRIST crucified, which was in the Church of Saint Peter and Saint Paule, and would neuer after weare any crowne ſo long as he liued.

Henricus Huntind. Hiſt. Angl lib. 6.

Though this may ſeeme a digreſſion from my matter, yet I thought good to recount it heere, as well for the raritie of the example; as alſo that it may appeare, how mercifully God dealt with the people of England, to giue them ſuch a King, by whoſe pietie their Conqueſt turned to comfort. And this his mercie appeared much more afterward, when it pleaſed his diuine Maieſtie ſo ſweetly to diſpoſe, that after the death of Canutus, and his two ſonnes Haraldus and Hardicanutus, or (as Polydore calles him) Cunuæus, which two reigned but ſixe yeares: the Crowne returned agayne to Engliſh blood; yea, and to ſo excellent a Prince, as was King Edward the Confeſſour, who reigned in all tranquility, peace and felicitie aboue three and twenty yeares.

Now, although learning, religion, and vertue had flouriſhed many yeres among the Engliſh, yet a little before the comming of the Normans, the ſame was vtterly deſtroyed and decayed. For (ſayth William of Malmesbury, who liued in the ſame age) the Prieſts were ſo vnlearned, that they could ſcant pronounce truely, the very words of the Sacraments and diuine ſeruice. And ſuch was the ignorance generally of all men, that a Grammarian was helde for a wonder; Religious men were wholly giuen to delicacie and kept no rules of Religion; the Noblemen and Gentlemen gaue themſelues to gluttony and laſciuiouſneſſe; there was no reſpect of Religion, nor care of Iuſtice: inſomuch that the common people ſerued for no other then as a prey to the Nobility, who ſpoyled and ranſacked them at their pleaſure. It was a common cuſtome when men had got their maid-ſeruants with childe, eyther to ſend them to the Stewes, or to ſell them for Slaues. Drunkenneſſe, and all the vices which commonly doe accompany the ſame, or follow thereon, were generally throughout the whole Realme; This reporteth William of Malmesburie in ſubſtance.

Alſo holy King Edward himſelfe, declaring a Viſion which happened to him, ſayd, That the Magiſtrates, as well ſpirituall as temporall, were no better then miniſters of the diuell; that God was euery where diſhonoured, lawes contemned, truth trodden vnder foote, pitty and mercy baniſhed, crueltie helde for a paſttime and entertainement. And therefore (ſayd he) the wickedneſſe of the Engliſh is now compleate and growne to the height, and the reuenge and puniſhment thereof is ſhortly to follow.

This was proued true by the euent, which in a yeare after, when William Duke of Normandie, called the Conquerour, came into England, whom God made the inſtrument and miniſter of his Iuſtice, to chaſtiſe them. For, beeing admitted and crowned King (preſently after the bloody battell, wherein king Haralde and twentie thouſand men were ſlaine) hee beganne to tyrannize vpon all eſtates: hee ſpoyled the Nobilitie of their lands, goods, dignities and offices, to giue the ſame to the Normans. He oppreſſed the people with infinite and intollerable taxes and impoſitions; he depriued Cities, Biſhoppricks and Monaſteries of their immunities and priuileges, forcing them to redeeme them of him againe for great ſummes of mony. Hee tooke from Churches and Religious houſes, not onely ſuch mony as they had in ſtore, but alſo the holy veſſells, dedicated to Gods ſeruice. He aboliſhed the olde Lawes, and ordayned new, cauſing them to be written in the Norman tongue, which the Engliſh vnderſtood not: whervpon there grew great confuſion in the exerciſe thereof in all ſortes of Actions and Pleas, as well criminall as ciuile, and many men wrongfully loſt their lands, and goodes, and many their liues, and a gate was (at that time) opened to all iniuſtice.

The tyranny of William the Conqueror vpon all eſtates.

Olde Lawes aboliſhed, and new ordained in the Norman tongue.

Furthermore, he was not content onlie to ſpoyle the Engliſh of their wealth, but alſo depriued them of their pleaſures, taking from very many Noble men and Gentlemen

Gentlemen, their Parkes and Chaſes for his owne vſe; but alſo ouerthrowing houſes, Churches, Villages and whole Pariſhes, to make Forreſts. Inſomuch, that (as Polydore Virgill reporteth) to make the Chaſe, which now is called New Forreſt, hee diſpeopled and made deſert all the Countrey betwixt Salisbury and the Sea ſide, for thirtie miles ſpace. And when diuers of his Nobilitie (by reaſon of his tyrannie) rebelled againſt him: he tooke occaſion thereuppon, to vſe all kinde of ſeueritie and crueltie, not only vpon their perſons, when they fell into his hands; but alſo vpon whole Countries and Prouinces, which hee ſo ſpoyled and ranſacked, that they lay waſte for ſome yeares after. Finally, his gouernement, during the time of his reigne, ſeemed to ayme at nothing elſe, but to extirpate and extinguiſh the race and name of the Engliſh.

The extreme cruelty of William the Conqueror.

Whereto if we adde the frequent wars in England in his time, partly by rebellion of his Subiects, and partly by inuaſion of Strangers; wee ſhall finde, that England had not one yeare, no, not one day of eaſe and repoſe, during the one and twentie yeares of his reigne. Which calamitie alſo continued, or rather encreaſed for thirteene yeres after his death, by the ſucceſſion of his ſonne William Rufus, who farre exceeded his father in crueltie, auarice, oppreſſion of his Subiects, and contempt of God and man: by reaſon whereof, hee was ſo hated of the people, that when his death was knowne (which was ſo ſodaine, and exemplary, for he was killed by chaunce with an Arrow, as he was hunting) the people were ſo tranſported with ioy, that they went euery where to the Churches, to giue God thanks therefore, as for the happieſt newes that euer came to England, in hope, that the laſt day of his life, would be the firſt of their libertie. If therefore we conſider all this, we ſhall euidently ſee, how true the prophecy of holy king Edward proued, when he ſaid; That England ſhould be giuen (for a time) into the hands of euill and wicked ſpirits, for the ſins of the Nobilitie, Cleargie and People.

The Engliſh had not one day of eaſe, during the reigne of William Conqueror.

The cruelty and auarice of King William Rufus, ſonne to the Conqueror Polyd. Virg. l. 10.

The Prophecie of King Edward the Confeſſor.

Heere then I conclude, that whereas the firſt Conqueſt ſeemes to haue proceeded, of the ſins as well of the People, as of the Princes; and the ſecond, of the offences, rather of the Princes, then of the People; the laſt was (as good King Edward teſtified) in puniſhment of the peoples ſins, rather then of the Princes. Whereby we may ſee the ſimpathy in the body politike, no leſſe then in the naturall body, betwixt the head and the members in the participation for ſinne, or reward for vertue. Which may ſerue for a motiue to all Princes and Magiſtrates, to haue eſpeciall care, to auoyde the offence of God, not onely by their owne liues, but alſo by puniſhing and reforming their Subiects, leſt negligence in eyther may draw GODS wrath vpon both, to the deſtruction of the whole Common-wealth.

The concluſion of this Chapter, concerning the 3. conqueſts of England, and the cauſes thereof.

An admonition to Princes & Magiſtrats.

CHAP. XX.

The Battell of Gaza, fought betweene Synanbaſha, Generall for Selym the great Turke; And Gazelles, Lieutenant of Tomumbeyo, the Soldane, or Sultane of Egypt. 1516.

AFter the death of Campſon, Selym intending to inuade Egypt, ſent before (from Damaſco) his Generall Synanbaſha into Iudea, with fifteene thouſand horſe, and a very ſtrong power of Harquebuſiers, ſelected out of the Ianizaries and Aſappes, only to ſuruey that Region, and to open a paſſage way to Gaza; which indeed was very moleſtuous & troubleſome, in regard of the potent Arabes. The city is ſeated on the ſea-coaſt, and in the confines of Egypt, neighboring vpon the hote ſandy deſerts; a very hard and painefull paſſage, for ſuch as iourney to the remoteſt Egypt, and to the Citty of Cayro. The people of Gaza, being deſtitute of warlike garriſons of ſouldiers, to ſtead them in extremitie of armes, entertained Synanbaſha at the very firſt view, although in craftie and diſſembling maner, giuing him many thankefull gratulations, for vouchſafing to free them from the Mamalukes intollerable ſlauerie; in requitall of which benefite, they promiſed to continue loyall and ſeruiceable to Selym and his ſucceſſors for euer.

The ſcituation of the Citty of Gaza.

Synanbaſha deceitfully welcommed by the Cittizens of Gaza

Now, while Synanbaſha lay encamped, within an Arrow reach from the Citty, in expectation of Selyms comming, and practiſing his beſt meanes of vnderſtanding the courſe of the Region and Countrey, that ſhould allow them paſſage into Ægypt; endeuouring beſide, to compaſſe friendſhip with the Arabian Commaunders, and ſubborning certaine Spies, that went to Cayro, to vndermine the counſels of the Mamalukes and Tomumbeyo, whome (vpon Campſons death) they hadde made choiſe of to be their Sultane: the inhabitants of Gaza (beeing naturally extreame enemies of the preſent Turkiſh Armie) gaue Tomumbeyo intelligence of Synanbaſhaes comming; aduertiſing him withall, that this power of Turkes might eaſily be oppreſſed and deſtroyed, before Selim could arriue with his ſupplies: onely by ſending a ſtrong power of Mamalukes, vnder conduct of ſome skilfull Leaders, to venture vpon them at an expeditious aduantage, proiected in this maner. A time (in the dead of night) beeing concluded on, betweene themſelues and the Cittizens, the Mamalukes ſhould make a ſodaine inuaſion on the ſleeping Turks, and they likewiſe (at the ſame inſtant) would yſſue forth of the City, and ioyning with them, make vnauoidable ſpoile & hauock of the enemies Campe.

Intelligence ſent by the men of Gaza, to the new Sultane Tomumbeyo.

This aduiſe is allowed and embraced, betweene Tomumbeyo and the Mamalukes; and Gazelles ſent with ſix thouſand horſe or Mamalukes, and a ſtrong Armie of the Arabes. Scarſely was hee departed from Cayro, but (by certaine Syrian Spyes) Synanbaſha had aduertiſement thereof, and that (not ſtaying for any carriages) they would be there within two dayes. Now, as theſe newes preſerued the Turkiſh Armie, ſo was it of no meane moment, for compaſſing the intire victory of the whol warres. And although Synanbaſha had no intelligence at all of the Gazans falſhood, yet (being a man of great wiſedome and prouidence) ſuſpecting what Treacheries might circumuent him, and fearing leaſt hee might meddle with two enemies at once: reſolued to meet the Mamalukes by the way, and ſo try the fortune of fight. So, diſlodging after the ſecond watch, he ſilently marched away out of the Cities ſight, reaching fifteene miles on the way towards Cayro; arriuing neere to a ſmall village, which had the benefit of a plentifull Spring there ariſing, and therefore was the reaſon of Trauellers vſual lodging there.

Syrian Spyes ſend aduertiſement to Synanbaſha, and what he preſently did to preuent all danger.

It fortuned, that Synanbaſha purpoſed to ſtay in that Village, and Gazelles had the like intention of breathing there ſome few houres, to refreſh both his men and horſes, that he might the ſooner galloppe to Gaza in the night time: when, euen at one inſtant (as it were) both the Generals receiued intelligence (on either ſide) by their vant-currers, that a mighty duſt was raiſed, and the enemy neere approached. Gazelles became much perplexed in mind at this ſtrange and vnlookt for accident; perceiuing apparantly, that fayling of his purpoſed intent, hee was alſo vnable to match the enemy, if he ſhould encounter with him, becauſe his horſes vvere halfe ſpent and weary. Yet had he no diſmay in courage, although he was compelled (vpon ſuch a ſodaine) to deuiſe what inſtantly might be done, for generall ſafety of the Army. Whereupon, he aduiſed euerie man to make ready his weapon; and to conſider, that what could not bee performed by ſtealth and ambuſh, according to a precedent intention, required now courragious reſolution, and muſt be diſpatcht by manly valour.

One intention happened to both the Generals, of ſtaying at one and the ſame place

The reſolue of Gazelles in this vnexpected diſtreſſe.

On the other ſide, Synanbaſha hauing his men ſooner ſet in order, then Gazelles could doe, hauing formerly aduertiſed them, what was to be done on the fightes encounter; cheared all the ranks with honourable ſpeeches. And the iſſue of his Oration, was, That flight muſt vtterly bee forgot, becauſe all places round about thē would be ſhut vp, and iniurious to them, except they were victors. Moreouer, of one thing to perſwade themſelues eſpecially, that no man ſhould periſh that day, but he whom heauen had deſtinated vnto death, by the moſt certaine lawes of Fate; and that with equall perill, the Valiant ſhould finde ſafety in middeſt of the enemies ſwords, and alſo the fearfull, death in their very ſafeſt flight, through the power of ineuitable lot.

Synanbaſha his encouraging ſpeeches to his ſoldiers

The Harquebuſiers were in the wings, w were extended foorth in length with a ſingle array, and no man ſtanding nere to another, for handling their Harquebuſſes the more freely, and to compaſſe the enemy: but the Pikes were placed in the very midſt, to ſuſtaine the impreſſion of the Mamalukes. But Gazelles approching, ſent the Arabian troopes before, to diſturbe the Wings; and he himſelf (with a ſquare battaile) charged the middle regiment of the Turkes. The fight was very cruel, and long long time doubtfull, becauſe the Turkes (though ſuperiour in number) were not able to endure the power of the Armed horſſe. And now being beaten from their ground; and diſperſed, ſome one way, and ſome another, by the Mamalukes that brake in vpon them, they looked rounde about for flight, fixing their eies and harts ſtedfaſtly for it. When ſodainly, by Synanbaſhaes commaund, the Harquebuſiers, who (with their firſt ſtorme of ſhotte) had driuen backe the Arabes: reducing in their wings, encloſed all the whole battaile of the enemy.

Synanbaſha releeued his army, beeing on the point of flight.

Now, both men and horſe, were (a far off) beaten down with deadly bullets, ſtorming vpon them in ſuch multitudes, as no place (to expreſſe valour) was left to the encloſed. For, when any troope of Mamalukes ranne in violently vpon the Turkes; they, by reaſon of their nimble lightneſſe (being accuſtomed to giue ground) did ſwiftly flye backe: and in all places this was their endeuour, not to encounter thē with their horſes, but onely to play vpon them with their Harquebuſſes. When Gazelles ſaw, that his horſſes were tyred with extreme wearineſſe, and that manie of his ſtouteſt men, were now either ſlain or hurt, and he himſelf greeuouſly wounded in the necke; he, with the reſt, making themſelues way with their weapons, fled vnto Cayro, through thoſe deſarts that he came, loſing all his Enſignes.

Victory inclineth vnto the Turkes, Fortune frowning on Gazelles, and his forces.

There periſhed in this battel the Captaine of Alexandria, and Orcomas the gouernour of Cayro, men of great account; & beſides them, a great number of Arabes, and almoſt a thouſand horſmen of marke. Nor did Synanbaſha win a ioyfull and vnbloody victory, for hee loſt aboue two thouſand horſe; and (among them) ſome of his cheefeſt Captaines. But becauſe the fight had continued from noone to Sunſet, the Turkes were not able to purſue their enemies, their horſes beeing wellnere dead with thirſt, and they themſelues fainting through want of meate, and extreme labour: but encamped in the place where the battell was fought, neere to the Spring before remembred.

Synanbaſha could not greatly boaſt of his Victory, ſuſtayning a great loſſe.

CHAP. XXI.

Of three ſeuerall Battails, fought in the years 1516. and 1517. betweene Selym the Great Turke, and Tomumbeyo, the great Sultan of Ægipt.

Collected out of Paulus Iouius.

Selym hauing receiued intelligence, that Synanbaſha had ſurprized Gaza, ouerthrowne Gazelles, and had receiued a freſh ſupplie of men by Sea, from Conſtantinople, for his owne further ſeruice he marched with all his Army towardes Gaza, and (vvithin eight dayes more) recouered ſo farre as Cayro*, reputed to be the Sultanes cheefe ſeat, Synanbaſha ſtill marching a daies iourney before him.

*A City in Egypt, not farre from the Iſle Delta.

About the diſtance of ſixe miles from the Citty, there was a ſmal village, named Rhodania, whereto Tomumbeyo (the newe made Sultane) had conueyed all his prouiſion and furniture of great Ordnance, hauing made alſo ditches, croſſe thwarting the plaine fieldes, and high wayes: which ditches were couered ouer vvith light earth, and ſmall ſtickes, artificially ſhadowing them. But himſelfe, with his Mamalukes (who were aboue twelue thouſand) and a great number of Arabian horſemen, fitted for the intent, kept in a place better beſeeming: that vvhen the Turkes Army ſhould drawe neere, they might be there entrapt and beaten downe by the vndiſcouerable Ordnance, ere they could come to reach the Ægyptians with their Harquebuſſes; and then this ſtratagem hauing round engirt them, hee had the aduantage of immediate fight, they being vtterly diſioynted, and faln into the ſnare prepared for them.

A cunning ambuſcado, prepared by Tomumbeyo, to entrap his enemy.

So cunningly and prouidently were theſe matters ordered, and perfected with ſuch anſwerable opportunity, that not a man in the Army could imagine, or vrge any doubt of the dayes victory. And queſtionleſſe, no meane diſaſter had mette with the Turkes: but that the giddie headed Goddeſſe Fortune, ouer-friendly to Selym, and cruelly vnkinde to Tomumbeyo, as

In ſtratagems of wars neuer ſo artificially ordered, Fortune ſtill will be a ſtickler.

as (had not the worthy paines of the Mamalukes, bin treacherously disappointed) onely through the meanes of a few perfidious Varlets, plainly had appeared.

Foure trecherous Mamalukes defeated Tomumbeyos hope for the ambush.

As in all Armies there neuer wantes Villaines, so in the Sultanes were foure Mamalukes, borne Albanoises, who stiffely stomacked, that Tomumbeyo (by suffrages of the contrary faction) was aduanced to the dignity royall. And they, either impelled by lewd disposition, or adducted by hope of rewarde, and more bountifull respect, foreseeing their owne side to fall on wracke, and wisedome aduising, to seeke for new and more assured Friends: fled to Synanbasha, as to their chiefest Turkish Captaine and Countriman. By these horsemen Synanbasha, and (soon after) Selym, vnderstood all the counsels & intents of the enemy, and what an Ambuscado Tomumbeyo had prepared for them, with singular subtilty and dexterious Art, vnauoidable from falling into, except they forsooke the high and direct way. Whereupon, beeing guided by these Fugitiues, they fetched a great compasse about on the left hand, and (before breake of day) recouered their old wonted way, hauing their battels ranged, their Ordnance ready mounted, to auoyde the least delay of fight, and so shewed themselues at the enemies rereward, and neuer coming neere the front of their Campe.

Preuention of perill is no meane helpe in accidents of Armes.

When Tomumbeyo saw this, he coniectured by his enemies march, that (by his owne mens treason) his prouided ambush was discouered. And albeit his mind was afflicted with matchlesse greefe, to see so painfull an employment of his men, and so full of expectation, to be in a moment vtterly defeated: yet notwithstanding, he being a man of vnconquerable courage, called all his senses and valour to sodaine counsell, and summoning his Captaines about him, gaue present order for those things which were to be done. And now was Tomumbeyo in so narrow a straite and necessity, that all thinges, and at one instant, must receiue order from him. Hee was to giue the signall to his Soldiers, for mounting on horse-backe, vsing theyr weapons, turning the course of his camp, ranging his battailes, encoraging his men, and conueying his Ordenance to contrary quarters, as the occasion required. All which things, as one Captaine could not performe alone, but very hardly and confusedly; so must they needs be effected as rawly, peruersly, and to halfes, by manie indiscreet vndertakers.

A distresse that would trouble the braine of the best soldier in the world.

The best capacity of a Generall or Commander, is well tried in warre.

But that which most hindered speedie performance, was the hudling of men together, for remouing the Ordnance from place to place, they being ill-fauored huge pieces, made of Iron, and sette in great stockes of Wood, with Iron ringes, after the rude and nauall forme of Workmanship, vsed in elder times: and so, by reason of their excessiue waight, could not be carried from their places, but by the draught of many beastes; besides, great heauing with iron Crowes and Leauers, requiring greeuous labour of men. And the other great Field-peeces, mounted on carriages with wheeles, being drawne by the witlesse and hasty multitude, with great clamor of such as haled and shoued them through all parts of the Campe: the tumultuous passage of them, disordered men mounted on their horses, and the Souldiers repairing to their ensignes: yet two maine helps equalled these hindering difficulties; namely, the chearefulnesse of the soldiers, and the singular constancy of them all, almost beyond the compasse of mans beleefe: because they had not conceiued so much as a thought of feare, nor failed in their hopefull hearts, as it commonly happeneth in sodain aduerse chances, whereby old tryed soldiers do manie times forget their ancient valour. For, being twice before vanquished in battel, yet they resumed the greater confidence and courage: perswading themselues, that not valour or skill in fight, but onely fortune fayled them.

Many inconueniences happen thorough want of discreete and orderly Military discipline

A great comfort to a Generall, when his Souldiers contain their chearefull disposition.

Nowe, when Tomumbeyo had set his men in good order, and the soldiers (with earnest desire of fight) requested the signall: he commanded the multitude of the Arabians, to bring their winges about on the rere of the enemy, and to beginne the fight first, that the Turkish horsmen might be troubled and disordered with a doubtfull danger of fight, before himselfe would issue forth with his selected troops. Strait way he commanded the great Ordnance (which by this time was brought about, and directed against the enemyes) to bee shot off. And immediately the Turkes did the like; who had once discharged their smaller and greater peeces, when they they were a iuſt diſtance off, and quickely re-charging them, had brought the within an Arrowes ſhoote of the Ægyptians Ordnance, fighting a long time on either ſide, onely with diſcharging their Ordenance, while the Armies approched neerer. In which contention, almoſt all the Ægyptians Gunners were ſlain, and moſt of their Artillery diſmounted from theyr wheeles, beeing broken in peeces by violence of the enemies bullets.

The Egyptiãs Gunners for their great Ordnance almoſt all ſlain.

The Turke had very skilfull Gunners in his Campe, whom he had allured (by his great rewardes, and rich entertainment) out of Italy and Germany, and eſpecially many out of the Iewes rable, who beeing expelled by the piety of King Ferdinand out of the Spaines; brought afterwardes ſuch rare and vnuſed deadly Artes into all the Eaſt, to ſpite our men withall. The Captaine or cheefe man of all theſe Gunners, was one Iames, borne at Reggio in Lombardie, a man of extraordinary skill in thoſe Artes, who being enticed by Turkiſh giftes: had (a little before) forſaken the ſeruice of Chriſt, and reuolted vnto Mahomets ſuperſtition. The fight beeing brought (on both ſides) to handy ſtrokes, the Mamalukes raiſed a cruel and horrible cry, and in three quarters, charged the Turkes with great valour: For Selym (keeping his old order) ſo marched, that hee approached in the forme of a Creſcent. The Captaine of the Aſians in the right Wing, was Muſtapha, and Innubaſha of the Europeans in the left: but himſelfe gouerned the middle battell, wherin was the ſquadron of the Ianizaries, with a great multitude of Ordnance.

The order & managing of Selyms army.

But Synanbaſha being made General of the fielde, had choſen for himſelfe a band of the valianteſt men, taken and pickt out of all the companies, to ſerue for all vncertaine euents of the battaile. Whereto hee added (out of Selyms ſquadron) fiue hundred foote of extraordinary valor and ſwiftneſſe, that hee being ready in all places of the battaile, and for all chaunces (were they neuer ſo ſodaine) might ſuccour that part of his fellowes, which was moſt preſſed by the enemy. So that almoſt at one time; when Tomumbeyo had ſtood in the middle battaile againſt Selym, and the wings of the Mamalukes, had encountred the Turkiſh with equall Front, and the Arabians had fought valiantly at their backes, as they had beene commanded; foure fights were very furiouſly and hotly attached at one time, and in diuerſe diſtinct places.

Synanbaſha General of the field, and his bande of men.

Foure fightes at one time in foure diſtinct places.

They that were preſent at this battell, do report, that thorough the cries of the Soldiers, the noiſe of Drums and Trumpets, the thundering of the Artillery, the clouds of duſt, and claſhing of Weapons, all mens minds were ſo amazed and confounded, that they, being al on both ſides alike blinded with furie, ruſhed on with ſuch deſperate madneſſe, that neyther could the voices and watch wordes bee heard or knowne one from another, nor the Enſignes ſeene, nor commaundes of Captaines be regarded; but euen (by mutuall error) they ſlew a great number both of their owne fellowes, and alſo of theyr enemies, without any reſpect at all. For neuer before that day, had any armies encountred together, enflamed with greater ſpleene and hatred; nor euer had two ſuch mighty Emperors, more conſtantly and feruently declared their valour both of body and minde; nor with leſſe care of life and ſafety. For, when both of them plainly perceiued, that with like daunger of themſelues and their Armies, they had ſet their liues and Empires vppon preſent ruine: they alſo well vnderſtoode, that there would be no other hope lefte to eyther of them, but that which victorie it ſelfe ſhould bring with it.

Credible reports concerning this dreadfull battell.

The mad and deſperate fury of both the Armies, as the like was neuer heard of.

Now Gazelles enflamed with deſire of honor and reuenge, to returne the Europeans a foile equall to that which hee had receiued at Gaza, charging Innubaſha with great violence, had ouer-run the formoſt and reſiſting troopes; had beaten downe the Guidons: and the Arabes purſuing on hard at his heeles, had made the vanquiſhing companies (euen thoſe of the Thracians, Theſſalians, and Macedons) to turne their backes, which neuer any enemie had done before.

The courage of Gazelles in hope of foiling his enemies.

Then Synanbaſha, beeing readie for all occaſions of victoty, flew vpon the ſide of the enemy, with a freſh and powerfull company of his men, re-enforcing the battell, which was much declined & foully ſcattered. But anon after, Synanbaſha, who had diſcontinued the manifeſt victory of the enemy, by exerciſing a ſupreme acte of proweſſe, was ſlaine, fighting verie valiantly before his men, after that the Mama-

Synanbaſha ſlaine fighting valiantly before his men.

Mamalukes (vnder their fierce Captayne Bido) had turned themſelues prowdly on their new enemy. And his horſemen ſtriuing to take vp their dead captaines body from the ground, were (a great number of them) ſlaine and put to flight by Gazelles, who had ſpread abroad his troups, that hauing the more ſpacious roome, they might the more freely vſe their ſwords; in which kinde of fight the Mamalukes doe moſt excell. And alſo that noble band of Ianizaries, being encloſed, were ouer-runne & ſlaine; after that they (being forſaken of the horſmen) had long time reſiſted very valiantly.

Heylius Diadarius and Giapall Orcomas, two famous Captaines of the Egiptians.

In another quarter, Muſtapha giuing a vehement charge with all his horſe, vpon the left wing of the Egyptians (wherin cõmaunded the moſt renowned captaines Heylius Diadarius and Giapall Orcomas) very ſharply vtged them. A litle before they had receiued a notable detriment, by the Ordnance, which (by chaunce) was ſhot frõ Selyms middle battell thwart the field; which Muſtapha perceiuing, and being deſirous to trample on olde ignominy, they being once diſordered, conſtrained them fiercely, & bringing in his troupes freſhly vpon them, brake thorow, ouer-ranne and beat them downe. And being remarkeable all the battell ouer, both by his Armes and voyce: adhorted the Aſians to conſider, that their ancient martiall honor, they lately loſt at the battell of Alepo, muſt be recouered now by height of manhood, or (at vttermoſt) by an honourable death.

The vndauntable ſpirit of Tomumbeyo, in the thickeſt throngs.

At the ſame time alſo, Tomumbeyo, hauing broken through the midle regiment of horſe, was come to the foot, and being a mighty man both in body and ſtrength, performed infinite actions of worth with his Cemitarie: the Arabians likewiſe encloſed the outer-wings of the Turkes, forcing them (in many places) to fight with double front. And Selym adnaunced forward his foote-ſquadron, which was his onely and aſſured helpe in this extremitie, whoſe charge, neither the fierce barded horſe, nor the victors men could abide: becauſe moſt part of his Souldiers being harquebuſiers, and beeing impaled with pikes, did much miſchiefe, for their immoueable force, being cloſed into the array of one body, bare downe all that they incountred. Yet they fought with variable euẽt on both ſides, from the fourth houre of the day, till Sun-ſet, neither was there any part of eyther Armie, but ſuffered ſundry alterations, Fortune being ſome while proſperous, and then againe aduerſe. For, both the vanquiſhed and victors, beeing madded with mutuall & implacable rage, fought with obſtinate & indurate hearts; the Mamalukes diſdaining, that victorie ſhould be taken from them, by men (of whom) they had ſlaine ſo many: and the Turkes chafing, that they whom they had before foiled in two ſeueral battels, ſhould make ſo long reſiſtance againſt them. Inſomuch, that their bodies, wearied and tired with wounds, and their armes faintly languiſhing, yet ſupported onely by furie & pertinacy of heart; ſeemed able to haue maintained another daies murdering, but that dark ſhut vp the violence of ſo great a ſlaughter.

Variable euẽt and ſucceſſe alike in both the Armies, from the 4. houre of the day till Sun-ſet.

Tomumbeyo, who (no doubt) was vanquiſhed, diſtruſting the entire loſſe of the field; firſt commanded retreat to be ſounded, that his men, who now could not match the other ſquadron, might ſeeme not to haue bin beaten backe, but onely to be led backe: which he conceiued to be of no meane moment, both for the eſtabliſhing of his ſouldiers, & maintenance of his owne authority. As one that being deceiued in his firſt hope, might promiſe himſelfe (as men in miſery commõly do) more proſperous ſucceſſe afterward, prouided, that he fainted not in corage. Whereupon, preſeruing thoſe few powers left him, he intended a freſh reparation of warre. The battell being broken off by the nights countermãd, the Turks being victors, won the enimies tents and Ordnance, purſued the Mamalukes ſtill very late in the night, albeit (almoſt in maner of flight) they marched towards Cayro.

Retreate was firſt ſounded in the Campe of Tomumbeyo.

The hope of Tomumbeyo for better ſucceſſe in a ſecond battaile.

In the flight were taken Diadarius, who could make no ſpeed, by reſon of his grieuous wounds, and with him Bidon, hauing one of his knees brokẽ with a falcon-ſhot, which alſo ſlue his horſe. But the next day, Selym cauſed them both to be ſlain, either in regard they could not be healed, or as thinking them to be acceptable ſacrifices for appeaſing Synanbaſha; for whoſe loſſe hee greatly lamented. Now albeit the Turkes had nobly vanquiſhed, yet was their ſtrength mightily empayred, and by the meanes of theſe fortunate battells, wherein the 4. part of them was ſpent with ſickneſſe ſickeneſſe and wounds, and a great number of their Horſes vtterly foyled, eſpecially through the tediouſneſſe of this daies ſeruice.

Selym reſteth his weary Army four daies at Rhodania.

Theſe were maine motiues, to hinder Selym in his wonted courſe of expedition, becauſe (as yet) he was ignorant, what deuotion the Ægyptian inhabitants of Cayro bare towards him; neither did rumour afford him any intelligence, where Tomumbeyo had beſtowed himſelfe, or what hee further intended. For, till he had deliberately conſidered on all theſe occaſions, he would not aduenture the ſafety of his owne perſon, and perill of his whole Armie, to the mercy of innumerable Cittizens, and in the greateſt Cittie of the world. Wherefore, abiding foure dayes ſpace in his old Campe at Rhodania, cauſing the wounded to bee cured, and his ſlaine ſouldiours to bee buried: but the bodies of his enemies, he left to be deuoured by Birds and Beaſts. And then diſlodging thence, and marching towards Cayro; he encamped on a plain, between old Cayro and Bulach: for the City of Cayro is diuided into three Townes; old Cayro, new Cayro, and Bulach, for their more commodious ſeruice of water.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the ſecond Battell at Cayro, betweene Selym and Tomumbeyo.

The valiant corage of Tomumbeyo, not withſtanding all his greeuous misfortunes & loſſes Tomumbeyo, beeing all this while nothing bruiſed, notwithſtanding ſo many lamentable loſſes and diſaſters; ſtill aſſembled together the Mamalukes from all parts, and pitched his Campe in a moſt commodious place, betweene new Cayro and the riuer Nilus, wherein he had eight thouſand Æthyopian ſlaues or bondmen, which kinde of men he had not (till then) made any vſe of, in regard of an ancient Rebellion by them committed. Beſide, ſetting open the old Armory, he gaue armor and weapons to the Mamalukes ſonnes, and to Moores which were their retainers, as alſo to the Iewes and Arabians, preparing for farre ſharper warre againſt the Turks, then formerly had bene. But afterward, hauing intended a ſodaine camiſado vpon the Turkiſh Campe, and the ſame againe vnluckily diſcouered to the Turkes (who beeing readily prepared for it, repelled (though with ſome loſſe) his formoſt rankes; he by the aduice of all his Captaines, entred the City of Cayro.

His proiectes and intentiõs alwayes were vnfortunately diſcouered.

The motiue heereto was, becauſe the Mamalukes (hauing bene foyled in all precedent battailes) conſidered with themſelues, that they muſt now make warre after ſome other manner of way: & in that regard, aduiſed him to fortifie the Cittie, placing ſtrong Courts of guard in the moſt conuenient parts thereof, to hinder euery way their enemies entrance. And being in this lamentable condition, that they muſt needes fight for their houſes, wiues, and children; they helde it highly honourable, and anſwerable to the glorie of their ancient valour, to dye fighting in their ſight, and euen before theyr owne doores.

The Mamalukes reſolued to dye in the ſight of their wiues & children.

Heereupon, each Mamaluke going to his own houſe, furniſhed all his houſhold, and the very toppe of his houſe with all kinde of weapons: inſtantly alſo entreating the Egyptians in each ward & ſtreete to take Armes againſt the common cruell enemie, not ſuffering themſelues to bee ſlaine, and their wiues and children carried away as ſlaues. For (quoth they) if the ſauage and inſatiate enemy do winne the victory, as accidents of warre are alwayes doubtfull: no ſpare will bee made, no not of ſuch as beare themſelues but indifferently, leaning in help to neither ſide; becauſe victory ſwelles with ſuch inſolent licence, as he reſpects not any man, but ſuch as (without doubtful ſtaggering) run deſperately to aſſiſt his fortune, when war ſtands vpon vncertaine ſucceſſe.

Victorie admitteth no reſpect of perſons.

Moſt of the Egyptians that were rich and wealthy, as they did well foreſee, that alteration in the State and Empire would be very hurtfull, and bring great loſſe and hinderance to their wealth and Trafficke: ſo, in deuotion and helpe, they vvere not failing to the Mamalukes. As on the contrary, moſt of the poorer Citizens, and no meane multitude of the worſer ſort (who, being voide of danger, do euermore gaine by others loſſes) remembring all the villanies and extreme oppreſſions, which they had had ſuffered (for the ſpace almoſt of three hundred yeares) vnder the Mamalukes, in very wofull and wretched ſlauery, they kept themſelues within doores, awayting for the fights ſucceſſe: iocondly hoping, that the time was now come, for puniſhing their proud oppreſſors, and that reuenge would be ſought by the bloud of ſtrangers; the iſſue ſorting ſo, that theyr eyes ſhould be ſatisfied, with a pleaſing & long expected ſpectacle.

The baſer ſort make their beſt benefite by fiſhing in troubled ſtreames.

Tomumbeyo fortified the gates & waies belonging to the City.

In the meane time, Tomumbeyo with moſt indulgent care and labour, fortified the gates, and all the waies of the Citties entrance, appointing Captaines for euery ſtreet. In euery market place, Court, and aſſembly of people, he made very witty and perſwaſiue Orations, permitting no idle loytering in the workes: and finally (which is ſaide to be the hardeſt matter in diſtreſſe and danger) he carried an vnappalled countenance, deliuering ſignes of extraordinary hope and valour no way to be daunted. But the Mamalukes, ouer and aboue neceſſity (which in extreamities makes men mad and deſperate; yea, kindleth courage in errant Cowards) being ſtirred vp by emulation: did ſpeedily and couragiouſly execute the duties and offices of worthy Captaines; for euerie one of them, as his wit and inuention beſt inſtructed him, made trenches thwart the moſt paſſable ſtreetes, laying alſo great Logges of Timber croſſe vpon them. Others, made priuy pits and holes, with ſharpe-pointed ſtakes ſurely faſtened in them, whereon the enemies vnwarily falling, might gore and ſplit themſelues. Others likewiſe fitted the houſes and Windowes of euery turning ſtreete, with ſuch plenty of ſhot as their ſtore and ability afforded; and all theſe thinges were performed with ſuch expedition, as no man (not the very Mamalukes) made it nice, or ſtrained courteſie, to take the pickaxe & ſpade, or to do any ſeruile ſeruiceable Worke: whereby it appeared, that nothing could be thought deuiſed, but it was as expeditiouſly effected.

The buſie imployment of the Mamalukes againſt their enimies, without any curioſity, or ſcorne of taking paines.

Now, although the Citty (being verie great and old) had no wals to encloſe it; yet there were Gates, and but certayne wayes for entering into it, one whereof was a direct and very broad ſtreet, leading from the Eaſt gate to the Caſtle, and into the middeſt of the Citty. The reſt of the wayes wer but very narrow ſtreets or paſſages, ſomewhat vnſightly and diſgracefull, where no Ordnance could be drawn, nor an aranged battell meete with his oppoſite. Into this maine way or ſtreete had Tomumbeyo eſpecially brought a power, becauſe he well perceiued, that their enemy would couet entrance, in regarde of the ſpacious admittance. But the other quarters of the City further off, hee kept with ſmall guards: yet the inner & middle part, where the Caſtle ſtood, was guarded with a ſufficient power, for the better ſupply of all other places, where the enemies cry, or their owne fellowes perill might call their aſſiſtance. For the Citie, being the greateſt of all other, with ſo ſmal a power, could not be defended round about, namely, wayes lying open into it in euery place.

The great City of Cayro was not encloſed with wals.

One maine or cheefe ſtreete in the City, all the reſt but of ſlender paſſage.

When Selym had receiued certaine intelligence, that Tomumbeyo vvas entred Cayro, and all the Mamalukes (gathering their ſtrength into one maine head) wold try the vtmoſt fortune of warre: hee marched with his Army neerer to the Cittie. All the way he encouraged his troopes, to conſider with themſelues aduiſedly, that now they muſt intend an entire conqueſt of thoſe Enemies, whom they had already ſo often vanquiſhed; and to take a little the more paines, that their victorious rewards, might be anſwerable vnto theyr braue endeuour, for which they had formerly coueted with immoderate deſires. So pauſing a while, and commaunding a Trumpet to ſummon general ſilence, thus againe he proceeded.

Selyms armie marcheth on toward grand Cayro.

A briefe Oration of Selym, to his Souldiers.

Friends, and Fellowes in Armes, let mee intreat you to remember; that there remaineth now but a few wretched men, with a forſaken naked King; who, being lately ſpent with wounds and feare, were not able to endure the field, but flying thence cowardly, haue verily determined, to expect at home (in the ſight of their wiues and children) the ſupreme and laſt caſt of a miſerable life.

He encourageth them by their late receyued good ſucceſſe.

Moreouer the Egyptians (of their owne accord) haue ſent for me: for they deadly hating ting the Mamalukes very name: doe vvith greedy deſire expect their deſtruction, and promiſe to fight from their owne houſes, vterly to deſtroy the race of thoſe wicked ſauage men. Neuertheleſſe, the abſolute victory of the whole war, conſiſteth in vtter vanquiſhing the remnants of the defeated, & thorowly affrighted Army; becauſe they cannot bee accounted as ouercome, that are yet hopefull in Armes, and poſſeſſe the ſeat of the Empire, euen the greateſt Citie thereof.

The entrance of Selym into Cayro at Baſſuel gate, and manner of his further proceeding.

The ſouldiers ſoules were on fire with deſire of ſpoile, and being all readily ranked, wanted but the ſignall for irruption. Whē Selym entring at Baſſuel gate, ſent in his horſe troopes at many places at once: but the Ianizaries entred at the broader paſſage, where the horſe (on eyther ſide) meeting together, a cruell & bloudy fight began in the turning ſtreets, and narrow lanes. The foot, haling out their Falcons and Culuerings before them in the front; flanked all the ſtreetes with them as they went along, making them naked of anie defendants. But when they came to the munitions and trenches, labouring to remoue the logges and beames, which were great hinderances vnto their paſſage: the Mamalukes gaue them very valiant reſiſtance, and either ſide ſhewed ſuch rare corage and valour: as neuer (in our memory) did men encounter more fiercely & bloodily. For both the Mamalukes and Turkes ſtoode on their higheſt tearmes of manhood, vſing all their cunning ſlights & policies of war, in this one deadly dāgerous fight; neither part beeing ignorant, that this was the laſt hope of life and Empyre, Fortune equally and indifferently preſenting them with honorable rewards for the Conqueror, and ſhamefull diſgrace for the vanquiſhed.

No fury comparable to fierce contention for victorie.

The great harm done by the ambuſhed trenches and downfals.

Mighty ſlaughter was made at the munitions, by reaſon that the Turkes raſhly running vpon the couered trenches, pits, and downfals, were ouerthrown on heaps one vpon another, the hindmoſt thruſting them on that were before; others, beeing gored & ſpitted on ſharpe pointed ſtakes: vpon which aduantage, the Mamalukes wiues and children (with man-like hardineſſe) hurled and tumbled down tiles and great ſtones on them thus ouerthrowne beneath, beating out the braines of verie many. On the contrary ſide, the Turkes with their Harquebuſſes, fetcht off ſuch as they ſaw in the windowes, & on the houſes, breaking open the doores where any harmfull thing was throwne downe, and fighting in thoſe houſes with diuerſe euents. Alſo the Egyptians, beholding fortune now on the one ſide, and then againe turned to the other; aſſayled both ſides alike as equall enemies, leaning where the lot of victory was likelieſt to happen, that they might appeare onely to haue aſſiſted that part, and thought vtter enemy to the other.

A cunning crafty manet of fighting in the Egyptians

Many encounters happened in diuers quarters at once, and according to theyr confuſed running in the ſtreets, now this company, then that, lighting vppon freſh and new troopes of enemies: & they that conſtrained the victors in the Front, were often intercluded by the aduerſe part, and beaten downe in the Rere. It was a wofull ſight to beholde, the diſtances betweene houſe and houſe, ouer-flowing with reeking blood, which ranne out of the ſlaine mens bodies, as there they lay mangled & diſmembred on heapes: that the Duſt, which roſe like a thicke miſt or dark cloud before, was now laide therewith, and not to be ſeene at all. Notwithſtanding, the ayre was meerly darkned with the ſmoake of the Ordnance and leſſer Artillerie, as alſo clouds of Arrowes ſhot from theyr bowes: and ſo great was the cry and clamour among the ſoldiers, the clattering of weapons, and thundering of the Cannons, that the very earth ſeemed to groan and tremble, and the houſes were rent & torne in peeces. They fought continually two dayes and two nights, with doubtfull fortune, and ſlender apparence of aduantage on either ſide: but only that the Mamalukes (being few in number, and not able to endure labour and watching) had retreated themſelues by little and litle, into the inner parts of the City, vtterly forſaking the formoſt munitions.

The extremity of a thicke riſing duſt allayed by the blood of ſlain mens bodyes.

They fought two dayes and two nightes continually.

The third day, when the Mamalukes were in the very pitch of perill of loſing their whole eſtate, and all that they had, (which caſe vſually augmenteth ſupreme enterprizes) chearing vp the hearts and endeuours of all men, they renewed the fight with ſuch ſurpaſſing valor, that they droue the Turkes a great way backe, and intercepted certaine of their Faulcons. Which accident, made Selym to deſpaire of victory, ſo that hee commanded to ſet the houſes on fire in all places: iuſt wrath againſt the Ægyptians, compelling him to that cruell proclamation, becauſe (in his very ſight, and but a little before) Innubaſha was greeuouſly wounded in the head, by a great ſtone thrown down from a window.

Now were the houſes on a flaming fire, now was nothing heard but wayling and weeping of the ſuppliant entreating Ægyptians: and nowe the Turkes fighting ſomewhat faintly, expected that retreate ſhould be ſounded: when ſodainly newes was brought by many men together, that in another quarter, the Mamalukes being beaten from their ſtand, and defeated by enforcing Muſtapha, repoſed theyr lateſt refuge in flight. For Muſtapha thorough the intimation of certaine Egyptians, and fugitiue Mamalukes, came to a very large ſtreete, where the Mamalukes had placed their horſes ready bridled and ſadled; intending, that if any ill hap befell thẽ, their recourſe might bee thither, where taking their horſes, they might eſcape to places of further determination. He got al thoſe horſes, and led them away, hauing chaſed their guides within a part of the citie, nothing ſuſpected, which was very weake, & defended by none but boyes and horſe-keepers.

A ſodain ſucceſſe hapning to Muſtapha, againſt the Mamalukes.

Which accident (as commonly it hapneth in ſerious and vnexpected chances) did wonderfully weaken their valour and reſolution, wherefore when they wer thus defeated in their hope of flight, and they ſo roũd ringed about, that the fight could be maintained by no other helpe or comfort, but onely meere manhood: being as men vanquiſhed by their own confeſſion, they turnd their backs. Many making haſt to Nilus with Tomumbeyo (who had in vaine tried all Art of valiancie, wiſedome, and policy, to auoide the foile in this battaile) paſſing ouer the riuer by boats, went into the Region of Seiectica. Another multitude hid themſelues in the Egyptians houſes, and in moſt ſhamefull lurking dennes. But aboue 1500. of the valianteſt Mamalukes, fled vnto the greateſt Temple of the Citty; where after they had long time defended themſelues, as out of a caſtle, becauſe they would not yeeld but vpon honorable termes: at length, beeing confounded with thirſt, wearines, wounds and the Ordnance violently playing ſtill vpon them, they ſubmitted themſelues to the will and pleaſure of the Conquerour. Part of them were preſently ſlaine before the Temple, by the angry ſouldiers of Selym, he politickly winking thereat; & another part (ſome few dayes after) were caried downe the riuer to Alexandria.

The victory thus ſtanding for Selym, he ſent two bands to quench the fires, and proclamations were made thorough all parts of the Citty, that all the Mamalukes which would come in and yeelde themſelues, and within the limitation of twelue houres ſpace, ſhould be ſecured from any further harme. But all ſuch as were found after that time, ſhould dye for their refuſall; and large rewards were promiſed to all the Egyptians, that could diſcloſe the lurking Mamalukes. Contrarywiſe, ſuch as hid or concealed any of them, were preſently to be ſpitted vpon ſtakes, & ſelling their wiues and children as ſlaues, to burn their houſes to the ground. Vppon the fame of this Proclamation, a great number of them came abroad, who were inſtantly put in yrons, & afterward all moſt cruelly ſlaine in priſon; becauſe they were ſaid to haue practiſed an eſcape. But diuers, who would not violate the rites of faith and friendſhippe by betraying their friends, being accuſed by their neighbors, ſuffered loſſe of life, dying very conſtantly for their friends.

The victorie fauouring Selym altogether, he lendeth his ſouldiers to quench the flaming fires.

A cruell murthering of the Mamalukes in priſon, after that they had yeelded themſelues.

After this, the ſoldiers encreaſing their fury, vpon the pride of this victory, ſearching all places; drew violently out all ſuch as were hidden, and preſently ſlewe them, ſpoiling alſo the Egyptians houſes where they were found, leauing no place ſhut or concealed from them. And the very ſame day it hapned, that Gazelles cam to Cayro; who had beene ſent (a little before) into Thebus, to leuy Arabians, & to hire aides. But ſeeing the caſe to bee quite changed, and that he was able to do no good either by his perſon or aduice; hee came with three Arabian Captaines, and many horſe with them, and yeelded himſelfe to Selim; who entertained him and all his traine very honourably, euery man according to his degree and merit.

The coming of Gazelles to Cayro, & his ſubmiſſion to Selym.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the third and last Battell fought at Nilus, betweene Tomumbeyo and Selym, with the ill succesſe and diſgracefull death of Tomumbeyo, and hard fate of his Mamalukes.

BVT Tomumbeyo, being fled (as ye haue heard) ouer the Riuer of Nilus, into that region which is called Seiectica, lying towards * Cyrenaica; although with ſo many diſaſtrous miſhaps he had formerly bin vanquiſhed, yet ſtill hee made a couragious reparation of the war. For, there was come to him a potent ſupply of Mamalukes frō Alexandria, being ſent for by letters out of the Cittie Garriſons, and many more alſo followed him in flight. Beſide, the Arabians of Affrica repaired to him, and the Moores likewiſe which were inhabitants of that coun try, promiſing him their vttermoſt fauour and helpe. Nay more, diuers Ægyptians of Cayro, whoſe houſes and people had bin ſpoyled and diſhoneſted, by the couetous and luxurious Turks, gaue faith alſo, that they would raiſe a tumult and inſurrection, if he would ſpeedily come thither in the dead of night; wherby might be compaſſed, that ſuch Turkes as were lodged in the City houſes, might ſodainly be deſtroyed by inuaſion of all the people together. For the Citizens, hauing ſuffered by them all abhominable and enemy-like parts, could no longer endure the iniuries of ſuch proude and malapart oppreſſors. Further they alledged, that the Turks, being (before) a potent army, were now reduced to a contemptible number: for, a great part of them were ſlaine in the battels at Rhodania and Cayro, and well-neere all the reſt were ſpent with woundes and ſickneſſe.

While Tomumbeyo was thus buſied about his needfull preparations, Albuchomar the very greateſt man (for authority, lands, & riches) in all Seiectica, came to Selym: eyther to preuent the miſchiefe of imminēt warre, to the no meane peril of his countrey, or elſe to win the victors fauour by Treaſon: and acquainted him not onely with the new collected powers of Tomumbeyo, but alſo with the practiſes concluded among the Cittizens of Cayro. Which when Selym vnderſtood, he cauſed ſtricte and ſtrong watch and ward, to bee planted in all parts of the City; commanding alſo, that the ſuſpected Cittizens ſhould be kept in the Caſtle, which (vppon the Garriſons forſaking it) very eaſily hee ſurprized. Furthermore, in diuers places along the riuer of Nilus, he ordered a great number of veſſelles, well furniſhed with Ordnance and ſoldiers, to defend the further banke of the riuer.

Neuertheleſſe, conſidering aduiſedly with himſelfe, how perilouſly he had often fought with moſt valiant enemies, and how difficult it would be for him to intercept Tomumbeyo, who (by flight) ſtill into waſte and vnknowne Regions prolonged the Warre, ſtill getting freſh and newe ſupplies. Conſidering alſo, that his owne power was ſo ſmall, and ſo far from ſuccour, as it might eaſily bee oppreſſed in that mighty Citty, by huge multitudes of men of vncertaine Faith. Vppon theſe diſcreete conſiderations, hee deſired rather to conclude the Warre by ſome honeſt compoſition, then by forcible further contending, to entangle himſelfe in new dangers.

And ſo much the rather, becauſe hee had intelligence by them of Seiectica, that freſh Companies of Horſſe were leuyed from all partes by the Mamalukes, which had fledde into diuers Regions: and the Nauie likewiſe, which was ſent into the ſtreights of the Red Sea, in the Arabian Gulffe againſt the Portugals, ſtoode now vppon the hopefull expectation at Porte Suezzia.

In the Nauy were aboue three thouſand Mamalukes, and Amyraſſes, and Ray Salomon, all very expert Captaines: and a great number of braſſe Peeces: whereby it appeared, that Tomumbeyo might gather ability, to repaire his former receiued iniuries, and ſo returne againe to the Cittie, being ſent for thither by his friends.

But the maine motiue of all, was his care of the Perſian affairs, leſt Humbracoſſa (whom he had ſent before to the mountaine Taurus) ſhould not prooue able to match the Perſian power, whereby hee ſhould

Selyms prouiſion to withſtand Tomumbeyo.

Selyms ſerious deliberation concerning his owne dangerous condition.

Freſh companies of Horſſe leuied by the Mamalukes.

The cheefe matter that moued Selym to ſeeke compoſition with Tomumbeyo.

ſhould be excluded out of the leſſer Aſia and Syria, before the Fleet from Conſtantinople could come to Alexandria, with new ſupply of Victuals and ſoldiers. Hereupon, he ſent very honorable men of the Cleargy, and likewiſe certaine Ægyptians of great eſtimation amongſt them, as Ambaſſadors from him vnto Tomumbeyo. The effect of their Commiſſion was briefly thus. To counſell him for a ceſſation from Armes, and now (at length) to acknowledge the Victors great fortune, engaging their faith to him, that if (in ſuppliant manner) he would come to Selym; by humanity and fauour of the Conqueror, he ſhould quietly enioy the kingdom, which he was not able to hold by power. But if hee would proceede and continue Warre, careleſſely forgetting his owne weakeneſſe: then, when warres fortune was thorowly found and determined; according to his iuſt deſert, he ſhold expect no condition of dignity or life, at diſpleaſed Selyms hands. Theſe Ambaſſadors being come into Seiectica, were (with franticke and barbarous cruelty) all ſlaine by certaine Mamalukes, before they had any audience.

The effect of the charge giuen to the Ambaſſadors.

The Ambaſſadors barbarouſly murdred.

Which proud and cruell deede, brake off all further patience in Selym, who was a man by nature (though not otherwiſe mooued) extraordinarily vehement and fierce. Immediately he proclaimed a voyage into Seiectica againſt Tomumbeyo, cõmanding victuals and other prouiſion for it. Moreouer, he gathered Boats from all parts, cauſing a ſure and a very broade bridge to be built ouer Nilus riuer: as allowing it neyther anſwerable vnto his dignitie, nor ſuting with the vrgent occaſion, to make his paſſage ouer with Boats.

A bridg builded ouer Nilus by Selym.

When Tomumbeyo had intelligence by his Spies, as alſo from the Cittizens of Cayro, that ſuch an intention was prepared againſt him, and ſo ſtrong a Bridge made ouer Nilus; hee (doubting the vnfaithfulneſſe of the Prouincialles, whoſe hearts he feared to be reuolted from him, by the treacherous departure of Albuchomar) determined to try the ſelfe-ſame fortune of battell, which had ſo oftentimes deceiued his hopes. For, he being inferior in all things, could not now lengthen out the war, nor make expectation of his enemy: neither did he hold it good for him, to fly againe with loſſe of his dignity, and thorough farther wilderneſſes of hazardous aduenture, and dangerous ſucceſſe.

Tomumbeyo diſtruſted the Prouincials conſtancie to him.

Wherefore, conſulting with his Captaines & Commanders, concerning this laſt attempt, which he and his Mamalukes were to make; by breake of day he departed frõ Seiectica, accompanied with 4000. horſe, and twice ſo many Moores and Arabes foot, continuing trauel night & day til they came to Nilus, that (by a bolde and ſodain aduenture) he might deceyue the Turkes, who (as he vnderſtood) ſuſpected no ſuch forwardnes, in weake, vanquiſhed, & more then halfe diſmayed men, wheras celerity would forſtall any fame of his vnlookt for comming; ſo to deſtroy ỳ part of the Turkiſh power, which firſt had aduentured ouer the riuer, before they could receiue ſuccour by their following Fellowes. Nor did the ſpace of time beguile his opinion, becauſe the hours (being truly accounted) made iuſt agreement with his ſpeedy march thither; and euen as hee formerly coniectured ſo fel it out, that the vaw-ward of the Aſians had alreadie paſt the Riuer. But the Muleters and boyes of Selyms Camp, ſeeking for the pleaſanteſt places for pitching their Tents, raunging ouer farre, were the firſt that deſcried the duſt of the approching enemy: whereof Muſtapha being certified, the allarum was preſently giuen.

His departure from Seiectica, to preuent the intention of the enemy, by a ſodain & vnexpected ſtratagem.

The diſcouery of Tomumbeyos neere approaching.

This rumour ſo danted all hearts with feare, both of them that had already paſſed the riuer, and theirs alſo which ſtoode ready to follow after them: that Tomumbeyo charging the Aſians with incomparable valour, while they were making themſelues ready, and reſorting vnto their Enſignes, ſlew them in the Front, that durſt endure the ſhocke of the aſſailants, diſperſed the reſt, and forced them to flight: and all the vantgard was wel-neere ouer-run, and trodden downe, beſide the diſorder of the reſt: before Muſtapha (albeit hee fought fearleſſe in the van, & very chearfully encouraged his ſouldiers) was able to retaine them that ſtedde, or to repayre the other in array. For, in this ſodaine and vnexpected chance, euery place was full of the peoples confuſed hudlings together, ſlaughter, flight, and feare: and all along the riuer banke both aboue and below the newe made Bridge, were diuers companies of men diſcerned, looking ruful-fully behind them, and crying out to their fellowes for succour. Many also being enforced (by the vrging troope of the Enemy) to the very brinke of the banke, fell headlong downe into the riuer; and many also perished at the end or heade of the bridge, by reason they could not passe ouer it, beeing hindred by them that were continually sent from the further side; beside, many that would haue ascended the bridge, being impeached by fear, & thrust backe by their owne fellowes, were drowned in the riuer.

The Bridge was spacious and large for passage.

The bridge was so broad, that 4. horse in rank might well passe ouer together, & a great number sent ouer in an houres space. But because the Ordnance was to be drawne ouer, fewer horse were sent, then either the greatnesse of the danger, or sodainnesse of such a chance did vrgently require. Nor was there any helpe in the Ordnance, which could not speedily bee drawne ouer, or shot off from the hither banke to the other against the Enemie, without great danger to themselues, by reason that their owne men stoode in the way. In the meane time, Selym who ranne downe to the riuers side, at the beginning of this hurly burly, filled small boates with Ianizaries Harquebusiers, & sent them ouer to succour their distressed fellowes; commãding the horse also to make what hast they could ouer the bridge, the nimble Marriners vsing their best pains, in often passing and returning with fresh supplies; so that within a short space they had conueyed ouer many bands of Ianizaries, whose comming confirmed the disordered Asians, and now boldly they endured the enemies violence.

Selim maketh a notable supply by the help of his Ianizaries sent ouer in small Boats.

The Tartares passed the Riuer Nilus with their horses.

Also Canoglas, son to a Tartar king, encouraging his troopes of Tartares to take the riuer with their horses; attained to the further bank of the riuer, to the admiration of all men, and losing but fewe of his men: for the Tartares hauing learned to swim ouer the violent and mightie Riuer of Tanais and Volga with their horses, were the more apt for passage heere. At the same instant also, Tomumbeyo fore-seeing, that the speedy victory consisted therein, endeuoured with his thickest troopes, to win the head of the bridge, that pulling away the formost boats, and cutting in sunder the cables, which fastened the rest together, & to the bankes: the whole bridge being so let loose at liberty, might be caried away with the streames violence, & all the Turkes that were vpon it. This caused a very dangerous conflict, for the chosen and best armed Mamalukes constraining the front, fought with singular valor. And on the other side, Mustapha perceiuing the present perill, brought vp the colours, and all the valiantest of his soldiours, to make good that place: so that both sides contended with such surpassing manhood as the weightinesse of the case required. For, the Mamalukes saw manifestly, that if they could winne that place, they should (with very short worke) ouerthrow all the enemies former victories: and the Turks as plainly perceiued, that except they kept and preserued the bridge, the safety of thẽselues, the whole estate of the army, yea & the ruine of their Emperor, lay now at the stake, and all brought to vtter despaire.

A worthy policy deuised by Tomumbeyo, to cut away the bridg of boats

The maine aime on eyther side, in their hope & expectation.

Hereupon, Mustapha so preuailed by his Harquebusiers, & troops of Greek horse, which in sundry companies had passed the bridge: that the enemies were repulsed & forced to retire a great way backe. Now Tomumbeyo that he might giue some respit to his Mamalukes to breathe themselues a while, being not able to fight fiercely, because their horse were spent and tired, & that after a fresh repairing of their strẽgth he might aduenture the extreme & latest fortune of the battell, encouraged the Moores and Arabians to maintaine the fight, vntill the Mamalukes had breathed a little. Which when they had valiantly performed, and the Mamalukes (hauing somwhat comforted their own bodies & horses) making good their place, the battel was againe renewed with such rigour on their behalfe, that Selym (distrusting the victory) doubted not to ascend the bridge, and runne to succour his men, although his friends earnestly labored him to the contrary.

Tomumbeyo encourageth the Moores & Arabes to maintaine the fight.

His coming (which brought fresh hope into his Souldiers hearts, they coueting to win reward and praise, by doing some seruiceable action in their Emperours sight) repressed all the enemies best endeuour, and were forced vnto flight, onely through the valiancie of the Ianizaries. Pursued were they ouer all the Fieldes, by those Horse which had beene at the fight, and likewise by the Tartares, who gaulled them very greeuously with with their Arrowes. But afterward, Muſtapha, Cayerbey, and Gazelles, were ſent with a company of freſh and ſwift horſe, to follow them that fled, and not to ſuffer Tomumbeyo to eſcape: who the third day after, was found by certaine Peazants, ſtanding in a Mariſh vppe to the waſte in Water, among Bull-ruſhes and Reedes; and they (for feare of death) deliuered him to the Captaines, who brought him to Selym, who would not vouchſafe to ſee him.

Tomumbeyo taken and brought to Selym.

After he had cauſed him to bee a long time in vaine tormented, to diſcloſe the treaſures of Campſon; at laſt he gaue command, that he ſhould be carried about all the famous ſtreets of the Citty, riding on a vile Camels backe, and in poore ragged Garments, with his hands bound behind him; and then to bee hanged vp with an halter, for the murthering (as hee pretended) of his Ambaſſadors, although the Noble Prince was altogether guiltleſſe thereof. The like fate alſo befell to all the Mamalukes that were in priſon, or could be taken. After the ſhamefull death of Tomumbeyo, who was executed the thirteenth day of Aprill, Anno 1517. all the whole Empire of the Soldan yeelded, and likewiſe all the Princes that had beene tributaries to the Soldan, euen vnto the dominions of Preſtre Iohn.

How baſely Selym vſed Tomumbeyo, and afterward hanged him.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the firſt inuention of wearing Ringes: to what end it was. And of many ancient and admirable things, tending vnto the ſame purpoſe.

AMong all other Iewels and Ornaments, inuented by the ſpirite and induſtry, or rather by the vanity of man, to embelliſh & beautify himſelfe withall: there is not any comparable to that of Rings: bee it for riches, or curioſity in workemanſhip. For, ouer and beſide that they are made in a round and circular figure, which is the moſt perfect of all other: they are beſide ſo ſubiect and light, that they may be worne on the leaſt finger of the hand. Neuertheleſſe, they are alwayes made of the very richeſt mettall of all, and accompanyed with ſtones, the moſt precious and exquiſite that are to be had, and valewed to bee the onely eſteemed things in the world. Behold then, what meanes the ambition of men found out, to weare a ring vpon one finger, valewing in price the worth of a Citty: for, it is not vnknowne, there are ſome ſuch precious ſtones, that are eſteemed as a world of Gold, and yet notwithſtanding, they hinder not the hand from the vſe of any exerciſe whatſoeuer. And albeit that Rings haue ſerued, and yet do, to ſome other more neceſſary ends & effects, then thoſe before related: yet the very principall point which brought them into vſe, was to glad and delight the eye, and to deliuer an outward teſtimonie of Nobility, and ſhew the perſons eſtimation. But becauſe they are now grown very common, and yet much eſteemed, I will ſet downe certaine ancient Hiſtories, incident to our preſent purpoſe, not greatly irkſome to reade or heare.

Rings inuented by the vanity of man.

Ringes made of the pureſt and richeſt mettall of all other.

The principal end that did bring Ringes into vſe.

Rings were outward notes of riches and Nobility.

In the firſt place, it is not reſolutely determined, who was the prime inuenter of Rings: and yet ſome do ſay, that the firſt Rings knowne to be worne, was in the remembrance of Prometheus, who (as the Poets faigned) beeing chained to a rocke by the appointment of Iupiter, was deliuered by Hercules, with the permiſſion of Iupiter; with this condition neuertheleſſe, that in perpetual memory of his impriſonment, the ſaide Prometheus ſtood obliged, to weare inceſſantly a ring of gold, enchaſed with a ſtone of the rocke whereto hee was priſoner; and thereby ſome hold, that the vſe of rings tooke thence the firſt beginning. Pliny and many other authors reputed this diſcourſe for a fable, as al Chriſtians ought to do: and becauſe it is a leaſing, and friuolouſly feigned, I meane to inſiſt thereon no further.

Concerning the inuention of Rings.

Prometheus deliuered frō the rocke by Hercules.

Concerning mine owne opinion, I am of the mind, that the inuention of Ringes came not by one man only, but from many, and in diuers times; conſidering, it neuer was any note of great cunning, to take the fingers bigneſſe by a thred, and with that meaſure to make a Ring of Golde or Iron: ſuch as aunciently were worne by the very cheefeſt Lordes of Lacedemon and Rings neuer the inuention of one man onely.

and Rome, before they gaue themselues ouer to the superfluities and dissolutions, which afterwardes reigned in all things. And vndoubtedly, the custome and ceremonie continued long time amongst the Romaines, that the Ring of Honour, which the husband sent to his spouse on the marriage day, was made of yron. Plinie discoursing on the antiquitie of Rings, saith, That they were not in vse in the war time betweene the Greekes and Troians: considering that Homer (who wrote thereof very amply) maketh no mention at all of Rings, much lesse, that they sealed then with Rings. And yet notwithstanding, he speaketh sufficiently of Chains and Bracelets, which were at that time worne, and of the manner of closing and sealing Letters: so that if Rings had then bin in vse, Homer would neuer haue let it sleepe in silence.

The mariage Ring of Honour vsed among the Romanes.

Rings not in vse at the wars of Troy.

But the good olde man Plinie, cannot ouer-reach vs with his idle arguments and coniectures; for we reade in Genesis, that Ioseph (who liued aboue fiue hundred and fifty yeares before the warres of Troy) hauing expounded the dreame of Pharaoh, King of Aegypt, was by the sayde Prince made Superintendent ouer his kingdom, and for his safer possession in that estate, he tooke off his Ring from his hand, and put it vpon Iosephs hand. And surely, kings did not onely weare Rings in those times, becausse we reade that Thamar, desiring to haue issue by the race of Iudah her father in lawe (who was brother to Ioseph) had his company, vnder colour of beeing a common whoore, and receiued as presents from him, his Staffe and his Ring. In Moses time, which was more then foure hundred yeares before Troy warres, wee find Rings to be then in vse; for we reade that they were comprehended in the ornaments, which Aaron the High-Priest should weare, and they of his posteritie afterward, as also it was auouched by Iosephus.

Ioseph. in lib. Antiq. Iudaic. 4. cap. 5.

Whereby appeareth plainely, that the vse of Rings was much more ancient, then Pliny reporteth them in his Coniectures: but as he was a Pagan, and ignorant in sacred writings, so it is no maruell, if these things went beyond his knowledge. According as himselfe apparently manifesteth, speaking of them of his owne Countrey: for hee sayth, the vse of Rings were anciently so rare in Rome, & specially such as were of gold; that there was no auncient Statue to be seen ringed, except those of the Kings, Numa, and Seruius Tullius, for all other Statues were without Rings. Hee sayth moreouer, that (ordinarily) no other Rings were worne in Rome, but of yron, and that the custome of the Romans was, to giue Rings of gold (by way of prerogatiue) to Ambassadours, which they sent to any King, or to some strange Nation. And yet notwithstanding, they that entred Rome triumphantly, wore no other Rings then of yron, although crownes of gold were allowed for their heads, & long time did this custome continue.

Plin. in lib 7. cap. 18.

Statues of kings wearing Rings.

Triumphers in Rome, wore Iron Rings, but Crownes of gold.

Afterward, when the Romaines became more braue and sumptuous, yet did they expresly prohibite in Rome, to all mechanicall persons, and men of meane condition, to weare Rings of golde: except they were rancked with the Souldiers, or Romain Cauallerie, which was a third estate, betweene the Order of the Senators, and the common popularitie; as now-adayes is our Nobilitie. Whereuppon, Rings were so priuiledged, that in giuing licence to any one to weare a ring of gold, it was as much as to ennoble him, and to passe him for a Gentleman. For, as Pliny, Dion, and many other haue left in their writings, the Roman Knights were known, and those of the Military Order, amongst the common people, and distinguished from them by Rings, which they wore on their fingers: euen as euidently as Senatours were knowne by their long Purple Roabes, embroidered with large headed nailes. For this cause, the Poet Horace attributed Rings to the Cauallerie, bestowing on them the name of Knights, or Gentlemen.

No Mechanick or mean persons to weare Rings of gold in Rome.

Dion in lib 9. Plin. in lib. vbi supra.

Equester ordo.

This priuiledge then of wearing Rings of golde, might not be graunted, but to such as had accomplished some high enterprise, or that were men of power, and worthily deserued. And assuredly, this prerogatiue was so affected generally, that Iulius Cæsar, coueting to embolden his Souldiours by remunerations and promises: after a long Oration made to them, hee would lift vp his finger, in signe, that they should enioy whatsoeuer he promised. And all his Army conceiuing, that by this signe, hee would permit them to weare Rings of golde, which intimated asmuch,

Who onely were allowed to weare rings of gold.

asmuch, as that they should all be knights; were the more sprightly encouraged, and serued him with most chearful dispositiō.

Rings giuen to such as deserued them not, onely in the Emperors times.

Very true it is, that in the time of the Emperours, this preheminence was giuen to many that deserued it not, as wee may see in Iuuenall and Suetonius, as also in the Commentaries or Chronicles of Iulius Cæsar, and of Vitellius. Neuertheless, the Edict, whereby it was inhibited to Mechanickes to weare Rings of golde, was not in force at the second warre against the Carthaginians, and the ouerthrow of the Romaines which happened at Cannas: for, according as Pliny and Titus Liuius doe report, three bushells of Ringd (belonging to the Romaines slaine in the battell of Cannas) were found among the slaughtered bodies. In like maner, as Cicero alleadged in his fift pleading against Verres, he vsed these very words; When a Generall of the Romaine Army, obtained any victorie, hee ordinarily gaue a Ring to his Secretarie, as a reward for his faithfulnesse. Many other things were also in custome then, which wee will heereafter more at large discusse: after we haue proued by Examples and Histories, to what end Rings were worne in elder times, and in what manner.

3 bushells of rings found in the field at the battel of Cannas.

On what finger our graue elders vsed to weare their ringa, & theyr reason for so doing.

First then, our reuerend predecessours vsed to weare their Rings, on the next finger to the least vpon the left hand, according as it was obserued by the Statues of Numa, and Seruius Tullus, Romain kings; because that finger was called Digitus Annularis, The Ring finger. And certainely (as Plinie saith in his seauenth Booke and eighteenth chapter) the Ring worne vpon the left hand, was a meere expression of modesty: the Romaines imagining, that it was a matter ouer-curious and superfluous, to weare any Rings at al: and therfore, to make the lesser shew of them, they did euer weare them on the left hand. Nor can we say (according to Plinie) that this was done to any other end, but because the left hand was more at liberty then the right in the mannaging of Armes, it seruing then, but as a defence to the bodie, in carrying onely Shields and Targets, as Souldiers vsed then to doe, the right hand hauing no such ease.

The left hand more at ease then the right

Neuertheless, some do say, that Rings were worne on the left hand, for the more safetie and assurance, considering that it is the hand least employed; and that the Ring-finger was elected for the same respect: For it is least set to labour of all the fingers, as Macrobius saith. Pursuing the same case, and alleging Pliny for the point, he addeth these words; There is a veine or nerue, comming from the heart, which taketh his ending in the Ring-finger for which cause and reason, that finger deserueth to be crowned with golde. Aulus Gellius also is of the same opinion. Others affirme, that Rings are worne vpon that finger, for physicke, or physically: and that the vertue of precious stones enchased in them, doe penetrate to the heart, by meanes of the forenamed veine. Macrobius, grounding his conceit vpon the Pythagorian numbers, whereof the Egyptians made vse; alleageth many other reasons concerning Rings, which I passe the lightlier ouer, as seeming to bee matters of small importance. We will resolue then on the last opinion, appearing to bee the most receiuable: although we see rings to be worne indifferently, vpon all the fingers that are on the hand.

A veine in the ring-finger coming from the heart.

Rings worne on Digitus annularis only for phisicke, in regard of the veine leading to the heart.

Macrobius doth auouch, that the most principall cause of inuenting or finding rings, was to serue as Seales: for in former times, euerie man caused to be engrauen in Stones so enchased in Rings, what did best please his owne minde and affection, and wherewith to seale vp his Letters.

Rings deuised for the sealing of Letters at the first.

This was then the reason of bringing Rings in vse, although now-adayes they are that way least imployed: and assuredly, men (in elder dayes) were so curious for well keeping their Rings and Signets, that they would seale with them verie seldome. Which I thinke not to be so vsed amongst the Romaines, because they were so neare-handed, as not onely they sealed their Letters with their Signets, but also sealed therewith their Chests, Coffers, Ambries, Cub-boords and purses, that kept the housholde keyes; yea, and sealed their Cellers, wherein were their stored wines, for feare lest they should be stollen away from them; and Marcus Tullius Cicero himselfe sayth, that his mother did the same.

The grippleneese of the Romaines in sealing vp all things.

Now cōcerning the vse of sealing with Rings, it is very ancient, according as we may reade in many Examples and Histories, especially in the sacred Scriptures, where where it is said, That Queene Iesabel, wife to Achab King of Samaria, sealed with the Kings Ring, the Commaund whereby she sent to haue Naboth put to death: and yet notwithstanding, this was fifteene hundred yeares before the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The antiquity of sealing with rings.

3 Reg 21,8.

Moreouer, when the Prophet Daniel (by the Kings commaundemenr) was put into the Denne of Lions; the stone which closed the mouth of the sayde denne, was sealed with the Kings Ring, and the rings of all the Princes in the kingdome: whereby appeareth, that Rings serued them to seale withall; as now they are vsed in any Kingdome, when the King confirmeth any especiall priuilege.

Dan,6,17.

And in these venerable elder times, Stones were enchased and fixed in Rings, vpon which stones were cut and engrauen diuers formes and figures, deuised onelie to seale withall. Heereupon did the Poet write:

Iuuenall

I knew the Letter, and the faithfull stone.

Asmuch to say, as hee knew the partie from whence the Letter came, by the figure engrauen vpon the stone in the ring, implying, that he knew the Seale. In regard wherof, when men made their rings, they studied to exceede one an other in riches and costlinesse, especially Kings and other great Lords; witnesse the so much renowned Seale-ring of Polycrates a Tyrant in the Isle of Samos. And although many did suspect the narration of that Seale, as a matter meerely fabulous: yet notwithstanding, Cicero, Plinie, Strabo and Herodotus, doe holde it for a true historie, affirming it to be an Emerauld engrauen, wherewith this Prince vsed to seale his Missiues and Patents, as briefly wee will say somewhat of the discourse.

The famous Seale-ring of Polycrates. Cicero de finib. bon. & malor. Plin. in l. 14. c. 9 Strabo in lib. 4. Herodot. in l. 3.

This Prince, hauing long time liued in great prosperitie, neuer finding Fortune any way contrary to him, knowing also in others her instabilitie to be such, as it was impossible for a man to passe through the courses of this life, without experimenting her variable trauerses; was willing to fal into a voluntary misfortune, as hoping (by that meanes) to satisfie whatsoeuer Fortune could inflict vpon him. Hereupon, taking the Ring which he so highly esteemed, he threw it into the very deepest place of the Sea, to haue the lesse hope for euer finding it againe; which yet he did, as Herodotus maintaineth, by the aduice of Amasias King of Aegypt, and his confederate. It hapned, that within some few dayes after, a Fisher-man presented him with a fish caught in the Sea, which was very great, and much remarkeable. As the Cooke belonging to Polycrates was in dressing the same fish, he found in the bowells thereof, the Ring which his Lord had throwne into the Sea; an accident very admirable, and fortunate to Polycrates. When King Amasias heard thereof, hee departed from the league of friendship which hee had long continued with Polycrates, sending him expresse word by his Ambassadours; that it was impossible for a man to be so fortunate, but ere long he must fall into farre greater misfortune, euen to the pittying of his best friends. As it hapned to him in short time after: For, King Darius making war against him, was taken in the said war by Orandus, Lieutenant generall to Darius, who caused him to be hanged and strangled. This came thus to passe, two hundred & thirty yeres before the foundation of the Cittie of Rome.

The history of Polycrates and his voluntary faling into misfortune.

Such accidents do not happen to many men, let them make triall neuer so often.

The fortunat man is alwaies waited on by misfortune.

Pliny sayth, that the Stone enchased in this costly Ring, was a Cornalline: yet Herodotus affirmeth it to be an Emerauld; but there appeareth some defect heerein, because Pliny sayth, How was it possible in those times, that an Emeraulde could bee engrauen? In briefe, it was an ordinarie matter among Princes, to seale Letters with their Rings. As we may obserue by Alexander the Great, who (according as Quintus Curtius, and many more beside doe auouch) being willing to acquaint Hephestion, his choice fauourite, with a secret which he had set downe in a Letter, shewing it to him, he tooke the Ring from his finger, and set it to Hephestions lippes, as a signe of sealing them vp with silence.

Plin. in lib. vbi supra.

An ordinary thing for Princes to seale with their Rings.

Suetonius sayth, that Octauius the Emperour vsed the forme of a * Sphinx in his Seale; whereupon the Poets fained, that the Sphinx was a monster like to a * Harpia, which demaunded many doubtfull questions of passengers, ouerthrowing and also killing such, as could not resolue their Riddles. Whereupon the Romaines emblazoning the Seale of Octauius, vsed as a commō saying; that his Sphinx might raise some such doubtfull cause, as would be very difficult to resolue. And this made

Octauius

Octauius to alter his Seale, engrauing therein the Image of Alexander the great.

Doubtfull figures in Signet Rings.

Mecœnas, a great fauourite of the ſayde Octauius, had a Frogge engrauen in his Seale; and although that creature is naturally very timorous: yet notwithſtanding, the Romains greatly feared the Frog of Mecœnas, becauſe by vertue of the Mandations ſent vnder that Seale, they payed great ſubſidies and tributes. Pompey the Great had a Lion in his Signet.

A ſignet ring cauſed the long war betweene Marius and Silla.

In briefe, Signets were ſo much reſpected, as it is well remembred, that the Signet Ring of Silla, moued that moſt cruell warre, which happened betweene him and Marius. In that Ring was engrauen the Image of Bocchus, King of Carthay or Mauritania, whom Silla tooke with king Iugurthe; which was ſo highly diſpleaſing to Marius, to whom Silla was Lieutenant; as hee tooke occaſion thereby, to enter open Armes againſt him. Plinie alſo ſaith, that the Sociall warre, which the Romaines waged againſt their confederates, was moued by the meanes of a Signet, which procured the enmitie betweene * Druſus and Scipio.

*Grandfather to Cato.

Mens figures engrauen in Rings, as in the time of the Romane Emperors.

But paſſing from theſe particular Signets of diuers Princes, we are to obſerue, that the Romains cauſed their owne proper figures to be engrauen in their Rings. As is well deliuered by Plautus, who introduceth a Bawde in one of his Comedies, that by the impreſſion of a Ring, knew the ieſts and countenance of a ſouldier her friend. Neuertheleſſe, when the Emperours reigned in Rome; ſuch as then were pleaſing to them, carried their Images engrauen in their Signets. It may then be helde for certaine, that (almoſt) from the beginning of the world (by that which hath already beene ſaid) Rings were in vſe to bee worne, euen as now-adayes they are in many Countries, where Armes and other deuices, are ordinarily carried in Rings.

Rings onely deuiſed for brauery, and the eyes contentment.

Wee may conclude then, that Rings were made (at the firſt) for brauerie, and onely to giue delight to the eie; as alſo for ſome other reaſons, whereof wee ſhall ſpeake heereafter. And vndoubtedly, the cuſtome of wearing Rings hath beene of long continuance; for, beſide the Hiſtories and Examples before related, wee reade of that couragious woman Iudith, who hauing ſworne the death of Holophernes, ſhee put off her mourning garments, and to execute her intention, ſhee clothed herſelfe with goodly habites, enriching hir comely perſon with Bracelets, Rings and eare-rings. The Romains likewiſe wore Iewelles, and Rings on all fingers of the hand, except on the middle finger, which is the greateſt aboue all the other, and which they holde to bee infamous; for a reaſon, whereof I purpoſe not now to ſpeake.

Iudith 10,4.

All fingers ringd except the middle finger.

Pliny ſaith, that after the victory which Pompey obtayned in Aſia, the Romaines greatly inured themſelues to weare rings; and brauery grew then into ſuch requeſt, that in Winter they vſed to weare bigge rings: but thoſe appoynted for Summer, were much more light, ſubtile and ingeniouſly made. Alſo, they named theyr Rings according to the fingers whereon they wore them, as is affirmed by Iulius Pelagius. Plinie ſaith, that the ſecond finger, or that whereon the Romaines beganne to weare their rings, next vnto the Ring-finger, was the firſt finger, which is neareſt to the pulſe; and then afterwards they wore them on the litle finger. Moreouer he ſaith, that many (in his time) wore three Rings on ech finger: neuertheleſſe, ſuch as were moſt dainty and curious, would weare but one Ring only vpon the whole hand.

Rings for Winter and for Summer.

Plin. in lib. 7. cap. 18.

From hence it enſued, that euery Nation beganne to ſeeke very diligently for ſtones that were of greateſt price and value; onely to ſerue in Rings as Signets, and thereon to engraue their deuices. Notwithſtanding, among the ſtones of choiceſt eſteeme, that of Pyrrhus (who waged warre againſt the Romaines) in auncient times was accounted to be moſt excellent. For, in that precious ſtone, (without any helpe, inuention or arte of man) was naturally diſcerned, the figures of nine goddeſſes, and a yong naked child ſtanding by them: ſo that they were cenſured, by graue opinion, to bee the portraits of the nine Muſes, and of Apollo. A matter very ſtrange, and ſomewhat difficult to be credited: neuertheleſſe, many Authors (worthy beliefe) doe auouch it for a true hiſtorie, eſpecially Plinie. And queſtionles, according to the iudgement of Philoſophers, this might happen thus naturally, by the great and immeaſurable heate of matter conſiſting in the ſayde ſtone; ſtone; or elſe by ſome correſpondencie, or celeſtiall influence, with the Stars and Planets, euen as a woman may produce a monſter, wholly different from humane kind, and by the ſelfe ſame influences.

Rich ſtones ſought for by all Nations to make Signets.

Albertus Magnus ſaith, that he ſawe at Collen, in the chappell of the three Kings, a Stone, wherein was naturally figured and diſcerned two mens heads, placed vpon a Serpent. Leonardus Camillus, in his Mirrour of precious Stones ſayth, that this may be ſo, naturally; affirming moreouer, to haue ſeene ſeauen trees, all of one forme, naturally portrayted in a Stone. And not to tie my ſelfe to other mens teſtimonies, I haue obſerued in Columnes of Marble and Iaſper, men naturally figured, and many other ſhapes beſide, very remarkeable, both for the diuerſitie of colours, and ſingularitie of ſhadowes naturally thereto belonging. And therefore, ſeeing ſo manie credible perſons haue written, concerning the precious Ring-ſtone of King Pyrrhus: it might very well be, that the Nine Muſes were therein naturally figured, and appearing to the life.

Now, for that which is reported, as touching the Ring of Giges, King of Lydia, (which Plinie attributeth to King Midas) it ſeemes a matter ſtrange and incredible. This Ring had ſuch a property, that being on the finger, and turned to the in-ſide of the hand, the wearer went inuiſible; but turning it to the out-ſide, then he was viſible againe, and to be ſeeue of all men as before; all which was made ſo publiquely knowne, that men tooke it offenſiuely, when they were demaunded, if they had ſeene Gyges Ring, or no. Plato the diuine Philoſopher ſayth in his Booke of Common-wealth, that by reaſon of a certaine tempeſt and earthquake, the ground opened, and a great deepe gulfe was publikely diſcerned. Gyges, being then a Sheepheard, but a man of bolde ſpirit, deſcended downe into the gulfe, and found there a great horſſe, which was of Braſſe, and hollow; within which horſſe was a dead body, of a Giant-like and prodigious ſtatue. He looking conſideratly on the huge body, eſpied a Ring vpon his finger, which he tooke off, and hauing put it vppon his owne, found himſelfe ſodainely returned to his fellowes: where they (as then) were keeping Cattell.

The wonderfull Ring of Gyges king of Lydia.

Plato in lib. Reipub. Concerning the hiſtory of Gyges, and in what manner he found his Ring.

It came to paſſe, that Gyges (accidentally) turned the ſtone in the Ring toward the palme of his hand; and then heard his companions talking of him, as if hee was abſent from their company: whereupon, beeing wiſe and ingenious, hee preſently conceiued, that this proceeded from ſome hidden vertue in the Ring. So, finding it to be true; and truſting to the ſecret vertue thereof, he went to the Court of Candaules King of Lydia, where hee preuayled ſo fortunately, that he obtained the loue of the Queene. Afterward, hauing ſlaine the King, by meanes of his wife, he poſſeſſed himſelfe of the kingdome, and ſo became King of Lydia. Cicero taketh this narration of Plato, no otherwiſe then as a morall Fable, applyed by him to colour what he ſayd. Philoſtratus, diſcourſing of Serpents and dragons in the Indiaes, ſaith, That in certaine Stones, the heads of Serpents and Dragons are to be ſeene, naturally figured; and that this may be proued by the Ring of Gyges. Seeing then, that ſo many famous Writers make mention of Gyges Ring, we may well allow it to be a true Hiſtorie, and no Fable.

CHAP. XXIIII.

¶ Of the properties and vertues, ſecretly concealed in precious Stones: And whence the vertue proceedeth, which is ſayd to be in Magicall Rings.

AS touching the before remembred Ring of Gyges, albeit I will not reſolutely affirme, that it had (indeede) any ſuch propertie (as elſewhere in other places, according as hath beene obſerued by experience, and as may be gathered by the writings of diuers credible authors, cõcerning precious ſtones, hauing wonderfull and vnſpeakeable qualities and vertues:) yet notwithſtanding, making no ſuch ſtrange reckoning of that ring, Magitians haue promiſed to execute far greater matters, then the ring of Gyges was able to do. Therefore, if that which is written of Giges be true, I am of the mind, that he did it by the Art of Magick, rather then any other vertue elſe: as all they doe, that that compaſſe all their intentions, by the power of Aſtrologie, obſeruing times, as alſo the aſpects and influences of Starres and Planets, whereunto they aſcribe peculiar rules, whereof we purpoſe to ſpeake ſomewhat.

More vertues reputed to be in precious ſtones, then the Author ereditеth.

But, returning to the vertues and properties of precious ſtones; It is very certayne, that our graue Ancients did place ſuch ſtones in their Rings, and wore them vpon their fingers, onely to be ſenſible of their properties. Neuertheleſſe, although they ſhould be indued with great vertues, yet I am perſwaded, that theyr qualities are not ſo precious, as proclamation is made of them. Wherefore, not to ſtand on deſciphering their virtues particularly, I will direct my Readers to ſuch Bookes, where their natures are at large deſcribed; contenting my ſelfe, to ſpeake of ſome few, as they haue beene (in ſome meaſure) related to me.

Of the Diamond, and his properties

Firſt then, it is ſaide of the Diamond, that it is very ſingular againſt ſorcerie, charmes and enchauntments, naturally ſtrengthening the heart by his vertues: but eſpecially againſt illuſions of phantaſies and ſpirites, which terrifie by ſodaine affrightings. Alſo I reade, that it is exceeding good for women with child, for the conſeruation of their fruit.

The Amethyſt.

The Amethyſt ſerueth as a counter-poyſon, and likewiſe is a defenſatiue againſt drunkenneſſe.

The Rubye.

The Balais or Ruby, reſtraineth the inordinate appetites of the fleſh, and is a ſoueraigne help to the health of any body.

The Carbuncle.

The Carbuncle is very preſeruatiue againſt peſtilentiall and infecting ayres, and aſſwaging luxurious or carnall deſires, doth greatly comfort and delight the heart.

The Corall.

The Corall contayneth in it diuers eſpeciall properties; for it ſtencheth or ſtayeth bleeding; it is a preſeruariue againſt gaſtly viſions, and dreadfull dreames; it is likewiſe very chearefull to the heart and vitall ſpirits.

The Cryſtall.

As concerning the Cryſtall, it is ſoueraigne againſt ſuch perſons or things, as can enchaunt or charme by their looks or ſight: and it alſo is a reſtriction and defence, from dreaming of offenſiue matters.

The Iacinth.

The Iacinth, is cordiall and comfortable to the heart, in like manner as the Corall is; and is alſo a ſoueraigne preſeruatiue againſt the peſtilence.

It is credibly reported and written, that wearing an Emeraulde on the finger, it maketh the partie chaſte and continent, as hating and deſpiſing the luſts of the fleſh. And ſome holde it for certaine, that if it be worne on the finger of a Maide, that hath loſt her virgin-honour, it will break immediatly. It is alſo greatly auaileable againſt euill ſpirits, againſt tempeſts, and againſt the falling ſickenes.

The Emerald called the ſtone of Chaſtity.

The Cornaline moderateth all wanton appetites, and glads the heart wonderfully: this ſtone is the beſt of all other to ſeale withall, becauſe waxe will neuer cleaue vnto it.

The Cornaline or Cornixe.

The Topaze doth appeaſe the paſſions of the mind, aſſwageth the imperuous tempeſts of choller and phrenſies, quite ouerthroweth the melancholy humour; and finally, it purifieth the blood. Behold what ſeuerall vertues remayne in the fore-remembred Stones.

The Topaze

Many other there are, of great and extraordinary vertue, which I let paſſe the lightlier, referring the Reader to Ariſtotle (although the booke of Stones, and bearing his name, was none of his worke, by plaine appearance;) and to Albertus Magnus, in his Treatiſe of Minerall matters; to the Poet Marbodeus, in his Booke of precious Stones; to Serapion, in his Booke of Simples; to Iſidorus, in his ſixt Booke of Etymologies; to Bartholomeus the Engliſhman, in his Tract of the Properties of naturall things; and (aboue all) to Leonardus Camillus, in his Mirrour or Glaſſe of precious Stones. Plinie alſo hath written of them in many places; likewiſe Vincentius, and many other, whom I ſpare to name for breuities ſake.

The ingenuity of men, by enchaſing precious ſtones in Rings.

But I pray you, let vs beſtow a little conſideration, on the perſpicacitie and ready apprehenſion of mans ſpirit, in finding out the maner and meanes to ſet and enchaſe precious Stones in Rings, thereby to enioy their proprieties and vertues. Nay, there were ſome that conueighed poiſon into their rings, to compaſſe their owne ſpeedy death, if any misfortune did throw them into any dangerous diſaſter: notwithſtanding it enſued from the inſtigation of the diuell, inducing diuers auncient Pagans to deſpaire, as may be obſerued in ſundry olde Hiſtories.

Poyſons put into diuers Rings in elder times.

Eſpecially renowned Hannibal, who vſually caried poyſon in his Ring, whereof he dyed in Bythinia, becauſe he would not fall into the hands of Titus Flaminius (Ambaſſador from the Romaines) his capitall enemie; Heliogabalus the Romane monſter.

Heliogabalus, a very vile conditioned prince, ordinarily carryed poyſon in his Ring, and to the ſame end: albeit as Lampridius ſayth, in reporting his life, he deſerued not ſo honourable a death, as impoyſoning. Pliny ſpeaks of this matter, and maner of carrying poyſons in rings, to bee an ordinary obſeruation, and very common in his time.

Aſpects and influences of the ſtars enchaſed in rings, and greatly truſted vnto.

Moreouer, thoſe ancient fore-goers did ſingularly obſerue the aſpects, & influences of Starres, as well by forging them into their rings, as alſo by engrauing them in ſtones, when they were to be enchaſed, by thoſe meanes to giue them vertue: a moſt wicked, vile & vnworthy action, not meet to be remembred amõg Chriſtians. And aſſuredly there are many Authours, which diſcourſe on thoſe Images & Carracters, made by obſeruation of Aſtronomicall Conſtellations, and which made promiſe of mountaines and meruailes by thoſe meanes. Affirming, that ouer and beſide the naturall vertue of the ſtone; it attained to a new ſtrength and quality, by the Image engrauen thereon, as alſo by the alliance and propinquity, which it had with the mettall wherein it was placed. And they would maintayne, that thoſe Planets and Starres gaue influence, and communicated their virtue to thoſe rings, forged in that ceremonious manner; euen as to the things ſubiected to their influences; and ſo by this means, the naturall vertue of thoſe ſtones, was fortified by the Magicall vertue thus attained vnto.

Magical rings made vnder the obſeruation of Starres and Planets.

Rings baptized by naturall Magicke, and in what maner, being applyed for the curing of ſundry infirmities.

In this manner, they baptized (by the name of naturall Magicke) this colligation or connexion, which they performed by hearbs, mettalls, perfumes and carracters, and which they vnited or combined together in one ring, ſaying: That rings compoſed in that maner, were ſoueraigne againſt the Apoplexie or dead palſie, and anguiſh in the ſides. Some there were made proper to reioyce the heart, to heale and mittigate the rage and fury of a madman; and alſo that they ſerued as preſeruatiues againſt poyſon, and for many other diſeaſes; as to conſerue a man, euen for the encreaſing of his naturall ſtrength. In briefe, they attributed many admirable proprieties to theſe Rings, wherein breuitie conſtraineth me to be ſilent. Notwithſtanding, whoſoeuer deſireth to be heereein further informed, may make his recourſe to the Mirrour of precious Stones, ſet downe by Leonardus Camillus, and to Cornelius Agrippa, in his Booke of Secret Philoſophie; to Albertus Magnus; and Tabitheus, a Philoſopher highly renowned, diſcourſing on this Argument; as the like doth Iuſtinatus, Soſſerinus and diuerſe other. Neuertheleſſe, I doe not greatly rely on what they haue ſayd; becauſe I neuer expetimented the vertue of Magicall Rings.

Helps for further information to ſuch as are deſirous.

Rings to be made vnder each ſeuerall Planet, and their ſecret infuſed vertues.

True it is, that ſuch as make profeſſion heereof, do ſay and auouch, That by obſeruing the Conſtellations, requiſite as well for forging the mettall, as for engrauing the ſtone enchaſed in the Ring, and vnder the Planet named Mars; that ring doth fortifie the heart, and hath the retentiue vertue, working many other great effects, almoſt incredible. Likewiſe, ſuch Rings as are made vnder the influence of Mercurie, doe adorne the ſpeaking of a man; and maketh him a ſingular Orator, as alſo apt to deale in merchandiſe. And ſo the like may bee ſayde of ſuch, as are made vnder the obſeruation of other Planets.

Carracters of the Zodiack engrauen in rings, & their vertue.

Others engraue in their Rings, the carracters belonging to the ſignes of the Zodiacke, and according to their triplicities, ſaying; that they of the firſt triplicitie, as namely, Aries, Leo and Sagittarius, doe ſerue for colde diſeaſes, for Feauers occaſioned by phlegme, and for dead Palſies. Alſo the caracters appertaining to the ſecond and ayrie triplicitie, as Gemini, Libra and Aquarius; are ſingular againſt corruption and putrifaction of the blood. And ſo doe they ſay of other triplicities of the ſignes, according to their Elementarie qualitie. And indeed, this obſeruation is very auncient, and was practiſed a long time amongeſt the oldeſt Philoſophers, as well Chaldeans, and Aegyptians, as the Iewes.

Of rings tearmed fortunate rings.

Some alſo affirme, that the ſeauen fortunate Rings, which King Iarchas gaue to Appolonius Thyaneus (according as Philoſtratus ſayth) were of the ſame temper.

Iarchas was cheefest of the Indian Philosophers.

Farther affirming, that the sayd Prince did daily weare a Ring, answerable to the Planet that day reigning: by the which meanes, he preserued himselfe for an hundred yeares, being alwayes as in the floure of his age. The grand-father to this King Iarchas, liued an hundred and thirty yeres, by vertue of the afore-sayd Rings, beeing continually in manly verdure. And hereupon, the Greekes made great vse of these Magicall and sophisticated Rings, as may be seene in the Comedies of Aristophanes, where hee bringeth in a man-Bawde, peremptorily contesting against Diseus, who had threatened him, and these are his words: I care not for all the threatnings that can be vsed against me, hauing this Ring vpon my finger, which his Mistresse solde for a Drathma. And shewing the Ring, he proceedeth thus: With this Ring I wil keep my selfe from his teeth, and from his barking.

A man liued 130. yeares by vertue of a Ring.

Aristophanes in Pluto.

Erasmus, speaking of these Magicall Rings, hath these words: Some daily vse to weare Rings, wherein are certayne caracters engrauen, vnder obseruation of constellations and aspects of Starres, and firmely holde, that they serue for diseases in the sides, and are proper (also) for diuerse infirmities. Others, imagining this to be true, do counterfeit these Rings; but all is meerely abuse. For, to giue them such vertue; the course of the Starres must be diligently obserued, and the constellations when they are made. Notwithstanding, many regarde not the influences of the Starres at all; but onely respect the nature of the stone enchased in the Ring, and the carracter there engrauen. This may bee seene in the Bookes of the wings of Rogerius, and in the writings of Leonardus Camillus, as also of Tetellus and Caclus, in those bookes which are attributed to Salomon for their credite, and which amply doe discourse thereon. For, according as Tetellus sayth, a Iaspar stone enchased in a Ring, hauing the Image of a Maiden engrauen thereon: preserueth the wearer from ill spirits, and from water. If a Lambe be engrauen thereon, the Ring defendeth from the Apoplexie, and cureth also the feauer quartane. A Cornalline also, hauing the shape of a man figured thereon, holding in his hand some goodly and respectable thing; doth stench the fluxe of blood. In briefe, they speake of so manie matters, pleasant to heare, and very hard to be credited: as I can say nothing in the case; but let such as please, make their own experience of them.

But returning againe to Rings & Signets, in Spaine they serue in all contracts, instead of full determination: also in matter of marriage, the two parties giue rings to ech other, as a signall and confirmation of the mutuall promise, which they haue made one to an other. In like manner, when religious women doe vndertake the veile; in signe of their profession, Rings are giuen them, as well from the religious house, as from their Parents, in testimony of this true and chaste marriage. There is yet an other poynt, concerning this case in question, and though of small importance, yet it doth diuers needfull seruices. Many will change their Rings from one finger to another, for better remembring some occasion to be performed, which otherwise might remayne forgotten. Wherefore, if we consider well the vse of rings, they are not so much to be blamed, as Pliny and some others doe: For, (in all times) men of vertue and honour haue vsed them. Hereto we may adde, that God created golde and precious stones, for the seruice of man, and to maintaine him in health; enduing them with such sundrie proprieties, to the end they might be the more commodious for men. Finally, Rings are particularly attributed vnto Bishops, in signe of dignitie.

CHAP. XXV.

¶ Whence it came at the first, that the name of Gentleman was giuen, aswel to Knights, as to the sonnes of Presidents & Councellers. What Armes the ancient Romans carried: And whence came the inuention of emblazoning Armes first in Escutchions.

THE custome ordinarily obserued in Fraunce, Italy and Spain, is to call him a Gentleman, that is a Knight extracted of a noble house; especially such a one, as is a Gentleman by name and Arms. Also, when a King sends a man of noble house in Embassie, he stileth him so in his Patent, by these words: I send you a Gentleman of my house. Kings and Princes, as well in these dayes, as in times past, vsed to haue (ordinarily) in their Courts, men of learning, and Knights, who who were named Gentlemen of the kings house, or Gentlemen seruants. And these Gentlemen were discended of great houses in the Kingdome; as well Schollers as Souldiers, and they remained continually in the Court, attending on the King in times of peace and warre. Wherefore, the name of Gentleman, signifies asmuch as Noblemman, and extracted of a noble linage. Neuertheless, it appeareth not much differing from our purpose, to say somewhat, concerning whence came the name of Gentleman, or of Gentillitie, together, with the custome of bearing Arms in Escutchions.

As touching the first point, the name of Gentile came from the Latines, who called such men Gentles or Gentiles, as were of one and the same race, and of one selfe same name; being at libertie, and of free condition from all Antiquitie: and those houses also were tearmed Auncient Gentiles, euen as now-adayes wee call them houses of Noble race, houses of Gentlemen. Which Cicero well witnesseth, in his Topickes, speaking thus: We call them Gentiles, that are of one name, and who from all times haue beene of free condition: so that no part or parcell of their race, was euer seruant or slaue, and much lesse, degraded from honour, and of the Romaine Burgesship. And Boetius also sayth in his Topickes, We call ancient Gentiles, all such as are issued of one ancient house and race, franke and free: as were the Scipioes, the family of Brutus, & other noble houses of Rome. Cicero likewise taketh this name of Gentile, For one that is of our race, and that beareth the same name and Armes as we doe.

The learned Budeus, speaking of deuoires or duties of parentage, obserued among the Romaines, sayth: They were three in number: Duetie of consanguinitie; Dutie of bloud and linage in direct line; And duety of Gentilitie, as much to say, as when a man is discended of the same name & Armes. The title then of Gentle or Gentility, was and should be attributed onely to Noble houses. And therefore the name of Gentleman among the Romaines, valued as much as a Nobleman among the Castilians and French. And assuredly, the Romaine Gentlemen did (ordinarily) shew the Images and Deuices of their predecessors, that had illustrated their memorie by their worthy deedes: and this representation of Nobility, was highly esteemed among the Romaines, euen as yet to this day, are ancient Armes, and Penons and Standards, belonging to the predecessours of Gentlemen, who would not forget any thing of Antiquitie (concerning their linage) in funeral orations, made at the obsequies of their parents, thereby to haue the man accounted so much the more Noble.

Ancient arms in Penons & Standards belonging to Gentlemen.

Cicero in Orat. lib. 3.

In this respect Cicero reprooued Piso, in the change and pleading he made against him, saying; The honours and estates which thou hast obtayned, were giuen thee, onely for respect of the smoakie images of thy predecessours, of whom thou carriest the colour onely; so that thou canst not be denied to be a Gentleman. And in another place, speaking of himselfe, he confesseth: To haue no Images of his race; for by his excellent knowledge, admirable wisedome and highly esteemed eloquence, he so much ennobled himselfe; that he came to be Consull of Rome, enioying other degrees and prerogatiues, euen as if hee had beene a Gentleman of race, and issued from the house of a Senatour. Which himselfe also further confesseth in his last pleading against Verres, saying: Thou beeing great Surueyour of Rome, for some especiall seruices done by thee to the Common-wealth, hast a place appointed for thine Image, and enioyest the priuiledges of a Gentleman.

Cicero in Declamat cont. Verres.

I reade, that the Romaines were verie careful of those images, which were called Stemmates: for commonly they were made of waxe, and placed ouer the portalles of their houses; or else prouidently kept in aptly contriued boxes, and so preserued in places appointed for theyr standing, as witnesseth Iuuenal, Martial, Seneca, Plinie, and many more.

Images made of waxe, and crowned with Garlands of Flowers.

And when there was question of some publique ceremony or of funerall pompe, the people of the houses would make a goodly shew of the Images belonging to their Aunceſtours, with their names fixed vpon them, according as Plinie reporteth. He also declareth in his ninth booke and fift chapter, that the Romaines would place before their houses, the Ensignes, Penons and other Coates of Armes and spoyles, which they had wonne from their enemies in war, and remained there to perpetuitie: so that if the house were solde, it was not lawfull for the buyer to take them away, because they serued for an honour and preheminence vnto their houſes.

The original of bearing Armes in an Eſcutchian.

From hence came the cuſtome of bearing Armes in a Eſcutchian, as now-adaies Gentlemen vſe to do. Notwithſtanding, it ſeemes that the emblazoning of Armes, receiued their originall from thoſe deuices, which were on the Banners and Enſignes, as well of the Romaines, as other ſtrange Nations, and carried by them in warre. As at this very day, the Emperors beare an Eagle in their Armes; becauſe Iulius Cæſar, the firſt Emperour of Rome, carried an Eagle in his Enſignes. As much may be ſaid cõcerning the Flowers de Luces, which the Kings of France carrie, and of diuers other.

The Romane Eagle borne by Emperors.

Now, concerning mine owne opinion, I finde, that long time before the Romains were, the Armes of Gentlemen were in vſe. For, it is ſaid, in the firſt Booke of the Macchabees, that Simon, Captaine generall of the Iews armie, made a very ſumptuous ſepulcher for his father, mother and brethren, which was enriched with Pyramids and Pillars, whereon was engrauen Ships, in maner of a Deuice; and thereon were fixed coats of Armes, wherewith he had vanquiſhed his brethren. Meſſala Coruinus, in the Oration which he made, to honour the linage of the Emperour Octauius (although the Oration deſerued not the title of Meſſala, alleadging Virgil, vpon that he wrote; affirming Antenor the Troian, to be the founder of Padua) ſayth; The Troians Armes were placed by Antenor, on the Temple of new Padua; and that the emblazon of the Armes, was a Swine in a field golde. So that, if Meſſala do ſpeake truely, the vſe of Armes is very auncient. Heereupon I conceiue, that the emblazons of Gentlemen, took name of Armes or Armories, becauſe they were continually engrauen neare to their Armes. For, as Meſſala ſaith; Our Auncients, after they had obtained any victorie, ordinarily placed in their Temples, the Armes and Enſignes, wherewith they wonne the victorie from the enemie.

Wherefore we may well ſay, that the name of Gentleman, and the manner of bearing Armes in Eſcutchions, is no moderne matter, but very auncient; and that the name of Gentle or Gentile, came from thoſe ordained and appoynted for horſſemen in the Romaine Cauallerie: who were of the third eſtate or degree amongſt the common people. And they that wore the long robe or Gowne, were the Order of Senators, and their ſonnes aunciently called Patricians; aſmuch to ſay, as iſſued from fathers. For, in the time of Romulus, according as Titus Liuius auoucheth: The Senatours were called Fathers, and their ſonnes Patricians, and this degree was the moſt noble and chiefeſt in Rome. Other Gentlemen, that were not of this rancke, were ſtiled Knights: from whence inſued, that Gentlemen in Spaine are called Cheualiers. The like wee ſay of the long gowned men, who commaund ouer the people, as Senatours; and yet notwithſtanding, they come after the other. Briefly, the name of Knight is come to ſuch credite, as the very greateſt doe holde themſelues honoured to bee called Knights: albeit the name of Knight was but ithe proper title of a Souldier of the ordnances, or of the light horſe.

¶ Of the Septuagint, or Seauentie Tranſlatours of the olde Teſtament, out of Hebrue into Greeke: At what time it was done, and for what occaſion.

EVeryman is very briefe, concerning the traduction of the Seauentie perſons, who tranſlated the Olde Teſtament out of Hebrew into Greek; but yet very few do know, whence it came, and wherefore that tranſlation was ſo appointed: wherein aſſuredly, many Diuines, in their publique preaching, haue declared ouer-much ſloath & negligence. Firſt then it is to be obſerued, that this Tranſlation of the Seauentie men, hath beene only in the Church holily and religiouſly reſpected: but in the time of Pope Damaſus, Saint Hierome conuerted it into Latine. And to ſpeak ſeriouſly, the traduction of the Septuagint hath beene of ſuch authoritie, that it is alleadged for diuine: for ſo it appeareth by our bleſſed Sauiour and his Apoſtles, in often alledging Scriptures, according to the ſaide Tranſlation.

Negligence in many, concerning the Septuagint.

And becauſe the hiſtorie of that Tranſlation is very worthy and famous, I will ſet downe that which is ſayd by Saint Auguſtine, in his Booke of the Citie of God, Ioſephus the Iew, Euſebius, Irenæus, Iuſtinus, Ruffinus, and many other.

Aug in Ciuit. Dei. lib 4.

Here is to be noted, that the fiue books of Moſes, the Prophets, and other Hiſtories of the holy Bible, were firſt of al written in the Hebrew tongue, which was the firſt vſuall tongue among men; before the confuſion of Tongues, which happened at the building of the Tower of Babylon. In that tongue and language God ſpake firſt to his Prophets; as the like our bleſſed Lord and Sauiour did, when he was conuerſant among men. This language then being particular to the Iewes, and the myſteries and prophecies (as alſo the coming of Chriſt) being concealed therein: it was very requiſite, that ſuch myſteries ſhould bee written in a tong more common then the Hebrue: as that was then among the Greekes, who were ſole Gouernours of the wide Vniuerſe, by the freſh and recent victories of Alexander the Great. So that, by the frequentation and traffique of men, the Greeke tongue had courſe generally, and was eſteemed the moſt common of all other Languages whatſoeuer.

The hebrew tongue the firſt generall tongue.

God ſpake to his Prophets in the hebrew tongue.

The Greeke tongue eſteemed the moſt frequent tongue.

To the end then, that the myſteries of ſacred Scripture, might bee vnderſtood of euery one, before the comming of Ieſus Chriſt; it was requiſite of neceſſitie, that the Scriptures ſhould be traduced into a common and vulgar tongue; for feare leſt the Iewes at the Meſſias his coming, ſhould ſuppreſſe them, or elſe falſifie them (for that race of people was of bolde and moſt wicked inclination) becauſe it might not be ſayd, that the Chriſtians had added or diminiſhed any thing from the Scriptures, according to their owne humour and phantaſie. And therefore, about two hundred and ſeauentie yeares before the Incarnation of Ieſus Chriſt, it pleaſed the goodneſſe of Almightie God, to inſpire Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt, to procure the tranſlation of the holie Bible. But ſeeing we are fallen into diſcourſe of that Prince; we will reach into his Hiſtorie ſomewhat higher.

The Tranſlation of the Bible, 270. yeares before Chriſts incarnation.

After that Alexander the great had ſubdued Aſia (which he performed in ſmall compaſſe of time) and that he had ranged a great part of Europe and Affrica: he died without any lawfull heire, that might ſucceede him in ſuch great Empires. He being dead, the Princes and Captains of his Court, who were all moſt valiant and famous men: laboured by force of Armes to poſſeſſe themſelues of what they poſſibly could: So that the kingdomes apperteining to Alexander onely, became diuided into many parts: for Antigonus poſſeſſed himſelfe of Aſia; Seleuchus of Chaldea, and of many other Prouinces. By the ſame meanes alſo Ptolomie, the ſonne of Lagus made himſelf king of Egypt, of Phœnicia, of Cyprus, and diuerſe other Countries, among which Iudea then was one. Being Lord of Iudea, he made there many great booties, leading away ſtore of Iewes captiues into Egypt, where hee had ordained the chiefe ſeate of his Kingdome. So that he was the firſt King of Egypt, that called himſelfe Ptolomie: which name remayned hereditary to the ſucceſſours in the ſayd Kingdome; for, before that Cambyſes, ſonne to Cyrus, King of Perſia, had conquered Egypt, all the Egyptian Kings called themſelues Pharaohs.

The death of Alexander the Great.

Alexanders Kingdome diuided into many parts.

The firſt Ptolomy King of Egypt, after the Pharaohs.

But returning againe to our Ptolomie, after he had reigned a long time, he dyed, and then ſucceeded him Ptolomie Philadelphus, who likewiſe reigned peaceably in Egypt.

This Prince gaue leaue, and ſet at libertie all the Iewes, which his father led priſoners into Egypt. And then it came to paſſe, according to the pleaſure of Almightie GOD, that this King erected a goodly Librarie, in Alexandria the capitall Cittie of Egypt, by the meanes of Demetrius Phalareus the Athenian; a man much renowned for his knowledge, and to whome hee gaue full power and commiſſion. So that, by the diligence of Phalareus, hee compaſſed the finiſhing of the faireſt and moſt compleate Librarie, that euer was ſeene in the world; as well for number of Bookes, as the quelitie of Authours, and diuerſitie of diſciplines.

Demetrius Phalareus, a Noble Philoſopher and Oratour, Scholler to Theophraſtus, for his excellent vertues gouerned the Athenians ten yeares.

This King, vnderſtanding that the Books of the Iewes, contained admirable and vnexpreſſable myſteries, reſolued to haue them reduced into the Greeke language. And to effect this his purpoſe, he diſpatched an Embaſſie to Eleazar, Prince of the Iewiſh Synagogue, with great preſents, intreating him, in memory of fauors Ptolomies Ambaſſage to Eleazar the Iew.

by him to those of his Nation, and for the good neighbourhood betweene them, to send him a Bible in Hebrue, as also such lerned and skilfull men, as could translate it into the Greeke tongue. Iosephus and Eusebius haue set downe the forme of the Letter, which was as followeth:

The Tenour of the Letter, sent by King Ptolomy Philadelphus, to Eleazar the High-Priest.

Ptolomy a King, to the High-Priest Eleazar, health.

The Iewes were diuers times brought as captiues into Egypt, by seuerall kings conquests ouer them.

NO man can be ignorant, that manie Iewes haue dwelt in this kingdome of Egypt, being brought thither prisoners by the Persians, at such time as they subiugated Iudea. And againe, when the late deceassed king my father brought diuers hither also, to whom (neuertheless) my said Lord & Father trusted so much, that they did him seruice in his warres: yea, he planted them in strong forts, by way of Garrisons, to keep the Egiptians in awe & feare.

King Ptolomy vsed great kindnesse and humanity to the Iewes.

As for my selfe, from such time as I came to the Crowne, I haue alwaies vsed humanity towards your Nation, and haue sent home more then rooooo that were detained here as slaues, paying their ransome & charges to them that held them prisoners. Such as desird to follow the wars, to them I haue giuen wages, euery one answerable to his worth and merit. Many of them I haue lodged in mine owne house ordinarily, as hoping by this meane, to do somewhat acceptable to God; who deliuered this Kingdome into my hands.

He desireth the full furnishing of his goodly Library.

And the better to declare the affection I beare in doing all pleasures that I can to you, and all the rest of your nation, aswell for the time present as to come: I haue determined, to cause your Bookes in the Hebrew language, to be translated into the Greek tong, because I would not haue my newly erected Library, to remaine vnfurnisht anyway. And therefore you shall doome a great fauor, to chuse fiue auncient men out of each Tribe, that are expert in your Lawe, and well verfed in the Greeke for this intended translation. Not doubting, but that it will redound to our great honour, and ample contentment of mind. For this purpose, I haue sent vnto you Andreas and Aristeus, who more at large will informe you of mine intention: to them haue I deliuerd large summes of gold and siluer, to fulfill the Sacrifices as I haue appoynted them, desiring you to send mee by them, such as may further this negotiation. Assuring you, that you cannot doe me a greater pleasure, nor more, to maintaine the friendship begun betweene vs: if (as I intreat you) this may be done with some expedition. Ptolomie.

Two men of great honour and worth, sent by the King.

After that the High-Priest Eleazar had receiued the Kings Letters, and vnderstood the further trust referred to the Ambassadors; he entertained them very honorably, receiuing (with chearefull looks) the golde and siluer sent by king Ptolomie, which (according to Iosephus) was a mightie quantitie. And hauing assembled the principall men of the twelue Tribes of Israel, hee acquainted them with the Kings intention, and to what end he had sent the Ambassadors. Wherein, to satisfie his desire, they elected out of each Tribe sixe aged men, well experimented in the Lawe, and expert in the Greek language. For the Iewes had a custome to send their people into Asia, to learne the Greek and Latine tongues, as also the Artes and Sciences compriſed vnder those languages, euen as yet to this day they obserue the same; so that all the men made choice of, were seuenty two. After they were thus chosen, they were sent with the Ambassadors to King Ptolomie, and the Bookes of the Old Testament with them, written (as Iosephus sayth) in most places all in golden Letters, and vpon such parchment, the most ingeniously made that euer was seene. Moreouer, he sent diuers great gifts to the said Prince, returning him answere in maner following.

Eleazar entertained the Ambassadors very honourably.

The Iewes by frequenting Asia, learned the Greeke and Latine Languages.

The Answere of the High-Priest Eleazar, to great king Ptolomy Philadelphus, Eleazar, to his friend King Ptolomie, health.

The High-Priests vsed to write very familiarly to such kings, with whom they were leagued in amity

I Am very glad of your present welfare, and the health of Queene Arsinoe your wife, with the young Lords your Sonnes, or any thing you can wish to your contentment: certifying you likewise of my instant instant healthfull condition. By the Missiue you sent vnto mee, I vnderstand the faire loue and affection, which you beare to our Nation, and haue caused your letters to bee publikely read before all the people, and to let them fully vnderstand, what holy deuotion you declare towards God; I haue exposed to open view, the twenty Vessels of gold, and thirty of siluer, together with fifty Cups, and a Table of siluer for the sacrifices, beside forty Talents of gold, and as many of siluer, sent by you to furnish the Ornaments of our Temple. All which I haue receiued from the hands of the Noble Lords Andreas and Aristeus, your faithfull Counsellors and Ambassadors, who haue amply enstructed vs in the cause by you required. And therefore, we haue sent them backe againe vnto yee, offering our selues by them, to accomplish your good pleasure.

The royall gift sent by Ptolomy Philadelphus.

And because the extraordinary great fauours which you haue done to them of our Nation, are such, as it is impossible for vs to vse or return any condigne requital: wee must make our recourse to solemne prayers and sacrifices, for the prosperity of you, of your Queene, and of the Noble Lords your sonnes. In which holy action, all our people very voluntarily desire to imploy their vtmost paines, in craving of God, to further and finish your desires, as may best stand with the conseruation of your Estate, and maintainance of your Kingdome in glory and honour.

A confession of the Iewes vnablenes to requite so great & gracious a kindnesse.

Now concerning the Translation of the Bookes of our Law, by you so greatly and earnestly desired; we haue elected six Auncients out of our seuerall Tribes, who we send vnto you, with the Bookes of our Bible. But when the Translation shall be perfected; according to the office of a iust and louing king, wee desire that they may be sent back againe to their natiue Country.

Eleazar, and the people of the Iewes.

The 72. translators separated one from another, and yet differed not one fillable in al their labours.

When King Ptolomy had receyued the Letters of Eleazar, with the Books of the Bible, and such Presents as were sent by Eleazar; he most royally welcommed the seuenty two aged men, and (as Iosephus saith) ioyed not a little for their arriuall. Their lodgings being prepared, & all things necessary for their imployment, they setled themselues to the Bibles translation: wherein happened an admirable and miraculous case; for the seuenty two men being placed separately, according to the kings Commission, without any meanes or power of conferring one with another: after they had thus diuidedly finished their Translation, they all appeared before the King with their seuerall labours, and were found therein all so coforme and agreeing, that one man had not a fillable mote then another; which doubtlesse could not bee done, without the power and especiall grace of the holy Ghost, according to the saying of S. Augustine, Ireneus and Tertullian; who auoucheth in his time, to haue seene at Alexandria in Egipt, the written Bookes of the seuenty two Translators, vnder their own hands, which were in Hebrew and in Greeke.

Aug. in Ciuit. Dei lib 8. Ireneus cont. Valent. Tertul. cont. Gentiles.

As much is said and maintained by Iustinus the Philosopher, in the book of Aduertisements, which he wrote to the Gentiles and Pagans, where he speaketh thus. King Ptolomy caused to bee builded without the Citty of Alexandria, seuenty two Halles, to lodge therein separately, the seuenty two Translators, and there prouided for them all things necessary, in most honourable manner. In which places the Translators remained, without seeing one another; vntill the translation was perfected. Nay more, he affirmeth to haue seene the ruines and olde wals of those buildings, which were esteemed as reliques and sacred things. And although S. Hierome and Ruffinus do disagree concerning the number of those Halles or Chambers: yet notwithstanding, that is no matter of any moment, cōsidering (according to S. Augustine, and many other Authors) each Translatour wrote his bookes alone by himselfe, not any way conferring one with another, and yet neuertheless, all the Translations were found conformable.

Iustin. in Aduer. ad Gent.

The diffrence of S. Hierome and Ruffinus about the buildings.

And assuredly, when I consider aduisedly on this mystery, I hold it for a mighty miracle, that they should agree in such a conformity of stile, order and method, traducing matter so long and diuers, although they had beene admitted altogether, and had begun the worke with their owne agreement, because we see it a matter of no meane moment, to finde two mē agreeing vpon one and the same point, when

The admirable conformity of stile, method and matter, in so long a labour.

when they are to intermeddle with one argument together. But, after the translation was finished, the Iewes which dwelt in Egypt, and were very learnedly skilfull in their Law, commended these Sacred writings to the King, wherewith hee was most highly pleased. And according as Iosephus and Eusebius do maintaine, King Ptolomy, beeing amazed at those Scriptures, and the holy mysteries in them comprized, demanded of Demetrius Phalareus, who had the charge of his Library, how it hapned, that Lycurgus, Solon, and other Law-makers, were silent in this law of the Iewes? Whereto Demetrius thus answered.

King Ptolomy amazed at the sacred Scriptures.

Sir, this Law, as your selfe haue sufficiently seene, came from God; and no Lawyer euer durst be so bold, to meddle with it vnreuerently, or misuse any text therein contained. Theopompus was smitten with the hand of heauen, with an extraordinary perturbation in his senses, and mighty paine at his hart: because he medled with the holy Histories of the Hebrues among his owne, beautifying thē with borrowed words, and rhetoricall phrases. But vpon his true repentance and humiliation to God, committing himselfe wholly to his mercy, it was reuealed to him in his sleep: that this disaster happened to him, because he durst be so bolde, to embellish and enrich the sincerity of holy Scripture, with curious and adorning words; and thereby to impart them to Pagan and Infidell Nations.

Theopompus punished for prophaning the Sacred Scriptures.

Gods sacred word hath no need of mens vaine adorning.

I remember also to haue read, that Theodorus a Tragicall Poet, lost his sight sodainly for taking a place of Scripture to maintaine an argument in his Tragedy: and yet vpon his vnfeigned repentance, his sight was restored to him againe.

The punishment of Theodorus a Tragicall Poet.

King Ptolomy wondering at this discourse of Demetrius, placed the translated Bible in his Library, and hauing thankefully respected the ancient Iews, he licensed their departure, giuing to each man sumptuous gifts; thanking likewise (by his Letters) the Prince Eleazar, to whom he sent Kingly presents. Thus you see, how the translation of the Septuagint was performed, they being men (as S. Augustine and Saint Hierom saide) that then had the spirit of Prophesie: which appeared plainly, in that our blessed Lord and his Euangelists, alledged Scriptures according to their translation. And if perhappes any thing is found in the Hebrew Bible, which is not in the translatiō of the Septuagint, wee may well say, that the holye Ghost would not reueale it by their means. And contrarywise, if some thing bee in their translation & is not in the Hebrue text: we must verily beleeue, that the blessed Spirite reuealed the passage by their meanes. For the selfesame Spirit that directed the Prophets, when they set down their Propheſies in writing, gouerned the seauenty two Translatours in traducing the holy Bible; so saith S. Augustine, concerning the version of the Old Testament.

Aug in Ciuit. Dei l. 7. Hier. in Præfat. Bibli.

One and the same blessed spirit guided the Prophets and Septuagint.

This was the first, before the comming of Iesus Christ; for, after our Sauiours Passion, Aquila the Iew wrote another. Two other translations were afterwardes performed, but by whom it was not knowen: notwithstanding, they came to the hands of Saint Hierom, as Eusebius maketh mention in the sixt booke of his Ecclesiasticall history. By these translations the Bible was reduced out of Greeke into Latine: but Saint Hierom did his out of Hebrew into Latine, without staying on the Septuagints labour, nor the other Greeke translations. Beside, Psalmes and other thinges are sung and sayde in the Church, whereof no disputation neede to be made, whether they were of S. Hieroms writing or no.

Aquila the Iew wrote the second translation.

CHAP. XXVII.

¶ Of the admirable vertues and proprieties, which God and Nature hath giuen vnto the Ant, Emmet, or Pisse-mire: And what worthy examples haue from it bin deriued.

YOu may well say, that it is no difficult matter for mee, to speake of the Nature and properties of Creatures, hauing for my Patrones, Maisters, and Guides, Aristotle, Pliny, Aelianus, and many other, writing on that argumeut: but because my desire extendeth it selfe beyonde ordinary compasse, couecoueting things curious, and knowne to few people; I purpoſe to ſay ſomething of the Ant, Emmot, or Piſſe-mire, albeit in regard of the creatures ſmalneſſe, ſome may thereby take occaſion to condemne my diſcourſe. Neuertheleſſe, let their humors ſerue them howſoeuer, I cannot exclude this creature out of our rich & ſpacious Forreſt: for there is not any garden how warily or cloſely ſoeuer it bee kept; but the Ant will make his entrance, euen in deſpight of the Maſter and Owner. And how little in our iudgement and ſubſtãce of the creature, it ſeemeth to vs; yet many renowned Authors haue written wonderfull things thereof.

The Ant will haue roome in all mens places.

Very true it is, that Pliny ſayeth; This creature is vnprofitable, and of no worth at all, but onely for it ſelfe: when contrariwiſe, the Bee, as little as it is, doeth (neuertheleſſe) giue a pleaſing taſte to our food, by the ſweet ſaucur of his hony, whereas the Ant doeth gnaw and eate them. But yet in another place, he ſpeaketh wonders of the Ant, & extolleth it extraordinarily. For, concerning the blamefull imputation hee impoſeth on this little creature, it proceedeth from a certaine kinde of Couetouſneſſe, whereunto man is ſo inclined for his own particular profit, that he would deriue benefit from all creatures, how ſmall ſoeuer they be, being greatly offended, that our Ant ſhould prouide it ſelfe of one poore graine of Corne. But if we would conſider things, in ſuch kinde as duly appertaineth to them, we ſhould finde more profit from the Ant, then from the Bee. For the Ant ſerueth vs as an example of induſtry, prouidence and friendſhip, and of many other vertues beſide, related at large by Salomon in his Prouerbes, who ſendeth the ſluggard to the Ant, to conſider what paine and ſolicitude ſhe taketh, and to learne diſcipline and direction of her. For, hauing neither guide or Captaine, or any to command and direct her: ſhee prepareth her food in the Summer for Winter.

Plin. in l. 5. c. 3. The Ant good for none but it ſelfe.

The couetouſneſſe of men to gather benefite from all kind of creatures.

Prou. 6. 6, 7, 8.

From hence it enſued, that Saint Ambroſe (ſpeaking of this ſilly little creature) vſeth theſe words: The deſſeignes and enterpriſes of the Ant, being iuſtly conſidered, do farre exceede her power and ſtrength. And although ſhe haue none to incite her to labor: yet notwithſtanding, by a certaine kind of dominion or authority, ſhe prouideth for afterclaps and future neceſſities. Behold what Saint Ambroſe hath ſaide, who ſpeaketh much more amply concerning the propricties of this little Ant; whereon Cicero likewiſe diſcourſing, ſayeth: That the Ants Commonwealth is to be aduiſed to euery City. For, not onely they haue vnderſtanding like other Animalles: but alſo they haue ſenſe, reaſon, and memory.

Ambroſ. in Hom. 1 rimit ſect. 4.

Cicero in Tuſculan. Cap. 19.

Pliny, Ariſtotle, and Elianus, are verie ſtayed in iudgement, for their conſideration of the Ant, and not without great reaſon: for in duly obſeruing her forme, her dreadfull aſpect, her hardneſſe, her liuely colour, and her piercing ſnowte; there is not any Lion ſo fierce as this creature, were it but as great as it is little; it is ſo ſtrong, bold, and dreadfull.

Pliny, Ariſtotle, Elianus.

Firſt, there is not any animall, that can carry the weight of himſelfe: but the Ant carrieth and draweth ten times a heauier load then it ſelfe, ſo that if this ſmal creature were as great as a horſe, it would eaſily beare the burthen of foure Waggons. Other beaſts can hardly defend thẽſelues againſt her aſſaults; for, although ſhee is ſo ſmall a worme, yet notwithſtanding, her teeth are ſo ſtrong, as the very hardeſt graine of Corne is not able to withſtande them. Nay, ſhe wil carry hard ſtones in her teeth, and howſoeuer ſhe faſteneth vpon them, ſhee will ſquaſh and bruiſe them, holding them ſo forcibly: that no pincers are able to open her mouth. And ſo opinitiue is ſhe is of her power, as ſhee will rather ſuffer her ſelfe to be rent in peeces, then to forſake whatſoeuer ſhee holdeth: which ſtrength would be farre greater, if her body were equiualent thereto.

No beaſt able to beare ſo great a burthen as the Ant.

The wonderfull & great ſtrength in her teeth.

But leauing her ſtrength (whereof ſo ſmall account is made, in regard of her litleneſſe) let vs ſomewhat conſider the naturall inſtinct, together with the vertue & wiſedome abiding in her. For nature (thoroughout the whole wide world) hath not produced any other creature, making more demonſtration of vertue, then the Ant: nor ſuch profeſſion of amity, induſtry, prouidence, and diuers other ſingular vertues, as wee ſhall haue occaſion to ſpeake of heereafter, in theyr apte places.

What vertues are in the Ant by naturall inſtinct.

In the prime place, Ants haue the form of a Commonwealth among themſelues, according as Pliny ſaith; for they haue neither King, Lord, nor any Commander; as much is affirmed by Ariſtotle and Salo- mon:

mon: And yet their Commonwealth is ſo well policied and ordered, as they haue neuer any Warre or ciuill contention among them. Likewiſe they are neuer ſeen to fight or kill one another, as men doe: but, as hath bene obſerued, all labour for the Weale-publike, without laying aſide any thing for priuate vſe, as other Creatures do, that fight for feeding of theyr bellies.

Hnw they ſupply one anothers weakeneſſe in liking their prouiſiō.

Ants helpe and aſſiſt one another, in conducting home their ſtore, and make their prouiſion generally for all together; and if any one be ouer-loaden or wearie, his fellowe giues his ſupply, and in ſuch decent manner, as one is no hinderance to another. And if there be any thing ouer heauy to bee carried away with their prouiſion, they take ſo much thereof as is needfull, and eaſie to bee trained along, going on together ſo chearfull and dexterioully, that they may well be ſaid, to bee creatures fit and apt for portage. Other creatures haue their neſtes and retreats a part by themſelues, ſo that (oftentimes) they neceſſarily war againſt them of their kinde, for their neſts and lodgings: whereas the like ſilly Ants haue but one roome or receipt for them all in general, without any diuided chambers or Parlors for particular perſons: by which meanes, they maintaine loue and friendſhip one vvith another, therein giuing vs a familiar example, to vſe the like ſociable vertue as they do.

Antes haue their dwelling in frendly maner altogether.

Moreouer, the induſtry which they declare in their Caue or roome, is a matter maruellous; becauſe if it bee poſſible for them, they will alwayes make their dwelling nere to a riuer, or ſome little running brooke, and plant the earth which they bring to the mouth of their caue, to ſerue as a rampier againſt rough winter, as fearing leaſt water ſhould winne entrance: & within the entry, they winde and turned diuers wayes, to the end, that their maine abiding ſhould not eaſily be found, & the mouth or doore is very narrow, in regard of the ſpaciouſneſſe within.

Their caue is commonly nere to ſome Brook or Riuer.

Beſide, they haue three roomes or ſtages within their Caue; one whereof is for the males, the ſecond for the Females, where they produce their yong ones, for there are male and female of theſe ſmall Creatures. In the third ſtage they make their Garner, wherein they beſtow theyr food and prouiſion, according as Ariſtotle affirmeth. Vſing their ſtore ſo meaſurably, as they neuer haue any want of victuals. And becauſe the moſt part of their puruey ance is Corn, to preſerue it in ſuch ſort, that moyſture may not make it ſprout; they bite and nibble the Graine within the midſt, where the ſprouting yſſueth foorth; a thing moſt admirable and miraculous in Nature, notwithſtanding, Pliny, Ælianus, and many other good authors, do auouch it to be certaine & true. If they finde their Corne to bee wette and moiſtned with winter raines, they haue a naturall vnderſtanding, to dry and refreſh it againe in the Sunne, to preſerue it from putrifying: ſo that the little poore Ant is neuer idle either day or night, for then ſhe vſeth the helpe of the Moone, when the Sunne-ſhine is denied her, which enſueth from incomparable prudence.

Ariſt in Lib. de anim. 4. cap. 6

A miraculous induſtry in the Ant for preſeruing her prouiſion.

Such as haue written on this argument, and daily experience confirmes the ſame, that the Ants are well inured to theſe labors; for they dayly rome abroade from their Caues, to bring home freſh and new nouriſhment. And after that ſuch nouell prouiſions is brought in, whether theyr knowledge conſiſteth in the ſmelling it, or by a naturall inſtinct giuen from God, enſtructing how to order and vſe it, all come forth together, to refreſh both their olde and new prouiſion, and following theyr guides in great crowds, conuey their ſtore in all by one way, without the leaſt iniury one to another: becauſe in doing a kinde of courteſie, they make way for each others free paſſage, and ſometimes walk on in couples together.

Daily care & endeuour for freſh ſupply of food.

Courteſy don each to other in the portage of their prouiſion.

Now here is a further matter to be obſerued, what order they keepe, when they come to the place, where they do charge themſelues with their prouiſion. For ſome get the Corne out of the ſtraw; Others, carry it to the Caue, at the entrance whereof, there ſtand diuers other readie to receiue it, and ſo conuey it into the garner, euery one doing his duty according vnto his office and degree. And when they carry a Peaſe, a Chiche, or ſome other grain, more weighty then a graine of Wheate; three or foure vndertake the burthen, or ſo many as the caſe requireth, pacing on very gently together, without any crowding or diſorder.

The maner of carrying their prouiſion to the garner, & in what mutuall order they are helping one to another.

And if by chance they come vnto any pl[illegible],

place, irkeſome or offenſiue to their paſſage, the order is admirable which they obſerue therein. For, ſome raiſe vp the loade aloft, and others labour to thruſt it forward, by ſtepping vnder to eaſe theyr fellowes: and if any meete them accidentally by the way, they all lay helpe to get home the burthen. And being come vnto the Caues entrance, if the graine be greater then the mouth thereof will admitte: they cut it in quarters, and ſo carry it into the Granary. In the while of this their buſie toile, others are not negligent, in bringing home purueyance beſide: ſo that wee may ſay (in concluſion of this point) all generally labour for the Weale-publique.

These admirable qualities in the Ant are touched by many good Authors.

After their prouiſion is thus made, and their Garner well ſtored for the ſeaſon, they fortifie and faſt cloſe vp the Caue, againſt the iniurie of winters ſtormes and raine: noriſhing themſelues all the while, with their plenty formerly brought in. Which naturall inſtinct is denied vnto all other Animals, man onely excepted: and yet there are many men, ſcarſely prouided for a morrowes neceſſity. Moreouer, that the Ant maketh a double prouiſion for her age, is very conſiderable; for, according as Virgil ſaith: She prouideth for her aged yeeres, which enſueth to her by inſtinct of Nature, preparing ſtill (euery yeare) for a following Winter, implying the Winter of her age.

Many meleſſe prouident then the Ant, that maketh prouiſion for her age.

Virgil in Bucol.

This creature, hath alſo a naturall inclination, quite contrary to all brutiſh behauiour. For, ſhe ſeemeth to haue ſome knowledge of God, and a kinde of religious vnderſtanding. For as Pliny and Ælian do both affirme, they obſerue Religiouſly certaine feſtiuall daies, as all the newe Moones; a matter ſomewhat hard to bee credited, and yet poſſible neuertheleſſe. The ſame authors ſay alſo, that they haue a naturall kind of charitie amongſt them; becauſe they will bury their dead, euen in meere compaſſion.

The Ant deuout and religious.

The Ant charitable.

Cleanthes reporteth an admirable hiſtory, which by Aelian is maintained to bee true. Cleanthes beeing a learned Philoſopher, and ſitting one day by an Ant hillocke, to conſider their naturall diſpoſition: he eſpied two Ants bearing a thirde Ant that was dead, and comming neere to the Caues entrance, which belonged to the other dead; they ſet downe theyr load, and two other Ants came out of the Caue to them, ſeeming to confer & talke together by outward action. The laſt two returned into the caue againe, & brought foorth a little Worme betweene them, which the other receiued of them, as in payment for their paines, and returned backe, leauing the dead Ants bodie, that they of the Caue might giue it buriall, the which they preſently did, ſo ſoone as the other were departed.

An admirable hiſtory recorded by Cleanthes and Elianus.

Vndoubtedly, it is a matter maruellous, that theſe creatures, being ſo ſmal, as ſom of them can ſcarſely be ſeene, ſhould thus ſerue as an example to mē, to ſtudy peace and concord, and to be good houſe-keepers, laborious, prouident, and charitable; aptly therein enſtructing the ſpirit & vnderſtanding of men; not reputing the Ant to bee ſo vnbeneficiall, as Plinie did, thogh it produce no hony or other food. Yet it is greatly auaileable for the health of man, eſpecially her Egges, which (as Pliny ſaith) being incorporated vvith the milke of a Bitch, healeth all paine and anguiſh in the ears. If they be beaten in pouder, they make an Vnguent, which mixed with ſalt, taketh away all pimples and puſhes in the face: and Ants beeing eaten, dooth cure all diſeaſes incident vnto the eyes.

What an example the Ant is to men in many matters.

The Ants egs helpefull for paines in the eares.

Neuertheleſſe, becauſe this poore Animall feeds on graine, herbes, and fruits of trees, onely to conſerue her ſelfe in her being, and to perpetuate her generation, whereby ſome damage may redounde to the fields: reuengefull man, finding himſelfe offended at ſo little harme, hath inuented a thouſand wayes to worke her death. For (as Pliny ſayth) the power of Origan, incorporated with ſulphure, and a little vnſlaked Lime, killeth Ants. He ſayth moreouer, that damming vppe the mouth of their Caue with Sea-mud and Aſhes, they can neuer get forth. Notwithſtanding, there is not any thing more proper to kil Ants, then the Hearb called Heliotropium. And beſide, Auicenne ſtudied in a whole Chapter, how to be the death of this poore Creature, taking as much paines therein, as if it had beene to expel the plague, or the feauer quartane.

The malice of man againſt the poor Ant, onely to deſtroy it.

Meanes wherby to kill beds of Ants.

and the people feare them as they do Lyons, according to the teſtimony of diuers Authors. And ſome ſay, that in digging and turning vp the earth, they throwe vp great quantities of gold; which the country people go to gather, when theſe dread-full Ants are retired; which they dare not do, if they but ſent them in the fields. For ſometimes, theſe Antes hauing winded thoſe ſeekers for Gold, ruſh foorth vpon them, and kill as many as they can meete withall.

And they haue no other means to ſeek for gold with ſafety, but by comming thither mounted vppon light Camels, for their better expedition in flight. And if (by miſchance) theſe Ants do winde thoſe Gold-finders; they haue ſome peece of fleſh hanging about them, which ſodainly they let fall, and ſo eſcape away. Finally, it ſeemeth a thing monſtrous, that our Ants ſhould be charged with wings: Neuertheleſſe, there is a common Prouerbe, ſaying: To the damme of the Ant, wings are proper. Whereby it appeareth, that ſome further meaning is hid therein: becauſe ſuch creatures as haue Wings, the winds will carrie them whether they pleaſe.

CHAP. XXVIII.

From whence it proceedeth, that ſome men liue long, and others farre leſſer vvhile. And what complexion is the beſt for liuing long. Alſo how we are to vnderſtand the place, where it is ſaid, that The dayes of a man are numbred.

THE Apoſtle S. Paul ſayeth, That all men are ſubiect once to dye, and therein all men are equall and alike. Notwithſtanding, there is a difference in the tearmes of life; becauſe ſom liue long, and other leſſe ſpace. Neuertheleſſe (as Iob ſaith) The time of our life is compaſſed, and no man can paſſe the boundes which God hath limited and determined to our life. Theſe things then ſtanding thus (as in truth they do) it is not ill or amiſſe, to vnderſtand that which cauſeth the life of man; wherefore one liueth longer then another; what complexion is moſt proper for long life: and laſtly, how it ought to be vnderſtood, when it is ſaid, that our dayes are counted and determined, being no way able to paſſe on further, which are points ſufficiently obſcure, and comprehended by few people.

Though all men are ſubiect to death, yet the number of their dayes are not alike. Iob. 14, 5.

To vnderſtand therefore the cauſe of long life, it behoooueth vs to preſuppoſe in the firſt place, that the life of man, and maintenance of this his humane bodie, conſiſteth in the concord and hermony of the foure Elementary qualities whereof it is compoſed, as namely heate, colde, moyſture, and drineſſe. But expreſſely in the proportionable hermony of heate and moiſture, which Ariſtotle well declareth: who onely maketh mention of the conueniency of theſe two qualities, for the ſupport and continuance of man. In like maner, we perceiue by experience, that man hath little care of his owne failing, ſo long as he keepeth his naturall heate: for that heate is the principall inſtrument, to conſerue the vegetatiue ſoule.

The hermony of the foure elementarie qualities gouerne the body of man.

Now, to ſpeake vprightly, the life of man conſiſteth in nothing elſe, then in maintaining the inſtruments and organes of the ſoule; among which, naturall heat (by right) holdeth the prime place: for this heate is ſo neceſſary to ſupport mans body, as whenſoeuer it is failing, the ſoul is conſtrained to forſake the body, & giue a period to the life of man. And becauſe this naturall heate holdeth of fire, which (of his owne nature) conſumeth whatſoeuer it meeteth withall: it was truely conuenient, that another contrarie qualitie ſhould be oppoſed againſt it, for conſeruation of the inferiour bodies. Vppon which occaſion, God placed the radicall or naturall humor, with this natural heate, onely to nouriſh and maintaine it, euen as fire feedeth it ſelfe by Oyle. And, in regard that this radicall humour conſumeth and diminiſheth it ſelfe daily; to ſupply & defend it, it was neceſſary, that all Creatures ſhould browſe and feede, and that by meanes thereof, the humor (being the cauſe of digeſtion) ſhould ſupply the naturall defect.

Wherein the life of man mainly conſiſteth: naturall heate being the chiefe inſtrument,

Of the radicall or naturall humour.

But ſeeing that (according to Ariſtotle) the humor which is cauſe of digeſtion, is neuer ſo perfect as the radicall and naturall, although it ſerueth much for maintenance: of neceſſity the radicall humor decayeth cayeth it ſelfe dayly (for the accidentall humour, cauſe of digeſtion, is neuer ſo perfect as the radicall, which vaniſheth away) and by this meanes of intirely vaniſhing, naturall heate looſeth it ſelfe, and the body takes ending. For, if the humour radicall, and cauſe of digeſtion, were ſo perfect as the naturall humor vaniſhed away, a man ſhould liue infinitely, according as Diuines ſay. Who maintain, that the propriety of the Tree of life, which God placed in the terreſtriall Paradiſe, conſiſted in this principally: that eating the fruite thereof, it ſhould re-eſtabliſh the radicall humor, that elſe would vaniſh & be loſt. From hence it enſued, that this tree was prohibited to Adam and Eue, after they were excluded out of terreſtriall Paradiſe. For, if our firſt Parents had kept themſelues in their originall righteouſnes; they and their ſucceſſors, feeding on the fruite of that tree, had liued eternally in the flower of their time, without euer taſting corruption, or old age: vntill ſuch time as God had glorified theyr bodyes, without enduring the paſſage of death. But ſeeing that humane Linage hath loſt this prerogatiue by ſinne, which brought death into the world; it is no wonder, if this defect ſheweth it ſelfe in vs all.

The humour which is cauſe of digeſtion, is neuer ſo perfect as the radical humor.

The Tree of life in the terreſtriall Paradiſe, preſeruing from corruption & old age.

Proceeding nowe to our former purpoſe, I ſay, that life endureth more or leſſe, according as the radicall humour is concordant and proportionable: for they in whom theſe qualities are moſt temperate and beſt proportioned, liue longeſt, and not ſuch as abound in thoſe qualities. From thence it cometh, that wee ſee many ſmall animals, who haue leaſt heat and humidity, to liue (neuertheleſſe) longer then they that are of bigger and greater bulke, and abound more in the ſaide qualities; which likewiſe commeth ſo to paſſe in trees, as well as in men. So that we may ſay, and ſay truly, that long life conſiſteth in the temperature and iuſt proportion of heate and moiſture: which wanting their kind companion life, diſſolueth it ſelf. For when heate ouer aboundeth humidity, it conſumeth the body in little time, as may be diſcerned in chollericke men. Where contrariwiſe, by exceſſiue humiditie, heat feeleth it ſelfe to be quenched, as in Flegmaticke perſons it happeneth in the ſame maner. Neuertheleſſe, we do not by theſe examples vnderſtand, that hee muſt alſo faile, who hath as much of the moyſt humor as of heat, becauſe it is neceſſary, that a proportion ſhould be obſerued therein: that is to ſay, heate to exceed humiditie proportionably. For, one thing beeing agent, hath no great vertue in working on the other, if it ſurmount not the part patient. And this did Ariſtotle couertly declare, when he ſaid; Among thoſe two qualities before remembred, there ought to bee a little coldnes mingled, to moderate the heat of the radicall fire, to the end, it may not whollie conſume the humour naturall. And drineſſe alſo is as requiſite, to dry vp the radicall humour, ſo that it may not extinguiſh the naturall fire. As we often ſee to happē in yong children, that dy by ouermuch humidity; notwithſtanding, among theſe foure qualities, heate and moiſture are held for the principall, as being vitall complexions, & cauſing life. As for the humors cold and dry, although they ſerue greatly to the conſeruation of life: yet neuertheles theſe two qualities are held for the doore & entrance to death. Becauſe cold is enemy to heate, wherein principally conſiſteth the point of life: and drineſſe is oppoſite and contrary to moiſture, which yet is the noriſher of naturall heat. According as wee ſee in aged people, who grow to be colde and dry, when they draw nere to death; as chiefly in dead bodies, which ordinarily are dry and cold. A man then (according to the good temperature of heauē) ought alſo to temper his complexxion by theſe foure qualities, and that in ſuch ſort: as, to maintaine his heate in the firſt place, and humidity next after, cauſing cold and dry to do ſeruice, according to their offices & quarters. By which meanes, they that finde not themſelues thus proportionably temperated, are naturally of ſhort life: thus then you ſee the cauſes of long life.

Life laſteth longer or leſſer time, according to the proportion and temperature of the radicall humor.

Life dieth, loſing her companions heate and moyſture.

Heate ought to exceed humidity proportionably.

Ariſt. in Anim. lio. 5. cap. 10.

Yong childrē dying by ouer abounding moiſture.

Concerning the diuerſitie of contrarieties.

By the good temperature of heauen, a man ſhould gouerne his own complexion in thoſe foure qualities.

Now remaineth that ſomewhat ſhould be ſaide, concerning the beſt complexion of all other, for the maintenance of long life. Firſt of all then is to be noted, that of the foure complexions, as Choler, flegme Blood, & Melancholy, blood is the beſt, to help him in the length of life; for blood is hot & moiſt, which qualities are the apteſt to prolong life. But the humidity muſt not be watry, but airy, being hot & moiſt; and ſo the ſanguine complexion, participating of ſome temperate heat and moiſture ſufficiēt to noriſh the heat, it is moſt proper of all the complexions to make long life. As for the Cholerike cõplexion, it is of leſſe continuance, becauſe the viuacity and force of his fire, and alſo of the heate, cannot long endure with his dryneſſe.

Blood the beſt of all the four complexions in man.

The Phlegma tick & wattie.

The Phlegmaticke & watrie complexion, cannot bee digeſted by heate, in regard of his exceſſiue humidity: & therefore falleth eaſily into corruption, which (in the end) procureth death.

The Melancholy.

The melancholy complexion, beeing earthie, abridgeth life by his coldneſſe & drought, which are qualities contrary to heate and moiſture: and therfore it is not to bee wondred at, though they ſhorten life, by ouer-abounding in ſome bodyes.

Choller and Phlegme.

Notwithſtanding, if Choller mingle it ſelf with Phlegme, and that it ſurmounteth proportionably the Phlegme; that Complexion alſo is very apt to maintaine long life.

Blood and Melancholy.

When likewiſe blood ſurpaſſeth Melancholy in a good proportion, that complexion is good: for the heate and humidity of the blood do beguile themſelues, with the cold and drineſſe of melancholy.

Compounded Complexions

Whereby we may gather, that there are compounded Complexions, which are much better then the Sanguine ſimplie, to preſerue and proſper the length of life.

The life of man limited by power of his complexion.

By that which formerly hath bene ſaid, wee may perceiue, that the life of man is limited by power and vertue of his Complexion, and by the proportion of Elementary qualities: ſo that the diuerſitie of proportions doe cauſe the diuerſity of tearmes of life in man. And ſome hold, that a man may liue ſo long as naturall heate laſteth, and the radicall humor giueth maintenance. Alſo, whereas ſome ſay, that the life of man hath his limit, beyond which, it is impoſſible for him to paſſe; it is to be noted, that although the complexion and naturall vertue of man, may ſupply and maintaine vnto the lateſt point; yet notwithſtanding, of a thouſand men, hardly one attaineth to that point, becauſe there are ſo many diſaſters which happen accidentally, or elſe by ſome diſorder; that the moſt part die, before nature failes in them, either by hunger, peſtilence, poiſon, gourmandize, whoredome, bad victuals, or by diſeaſes, cauſed thorow infinit exceſſes in mẽ, by them daily committed, and ſo the true naturall tearme of mans life, is, when nature faileth, being thẽ vtterly impoſſible for them to paſſe that point.

Many men dy before nature faileth in thẽ through theyr owne extremity of exceſſe.

Thus are we to vnderſtand that place in Iob, where it is ſayde: Lord, thou haſt eſtabliſhed the bounds of mans life, which is impoſſible for him to go beyond. Whereby may clearely be diſcerned, that a man may very eaſily ſhorten his life, but not lengthen it. So that we ſee many of good complexion, and likely to liue a Worlde of yeares: who neuertheleſſe are of ſhort life, by ſome exteriour cauſe, which haſtens on the expiration of their daies. Notwithſtãding, that paſſage in Iob may bee otherwiſe vnderſtood, in regard of Gods preſcience or foreknowledge, who giueth to euery one his terme of life; be it by his naturall complexion, or by ſome other meanes, which he hath aſſigned to the life of man. And becauſe ther is nothing hidden from the wiſedome of God (for, hee knoweth all the cauſes and accidents that can happen to man) it is impoſſible for man, to haue any power of lengthening his life, beyond the ordination of God, although there were contingent cauſes.

Many men likely to liue long, haue yet their dayes ſhortned.

In this reſpect it may be ſaid, that there are two tearmes in the life of man, one whereof, dependeth vpon the hermony & proportion of the Elementary qualities; and the other is according to the preordination and preſcience of God. Between which tearmes, there is onely this difference, that a man may come or proceede ſo farre as the firſt, and yet without paſſing it; but all men attaine to the ſecond. And although that (by courſe of nature) ſome one may paſſe on to his ſecond terme: yet notwithſtanding, there is not any that can go beyond it; as the like may bee ſayde of other creatures and plants.

Two termes in the life of man, and how they are attained vnto.

Concerning the naturall hermonie of Elementarie qualities, supporting mans body.

peare good to vnderstand, at what times the naturall hermonie of the Elementary qualities (which support the body of man) began to grow into decadence; which, from the beginning of the world, euen to this instant day, hath kept alwayes in diminution, concerning the temperature of Complexions, with the quality of foode, which do conserue and establish life, and yet mans life daily waxing to be lesse and lesse in continuance.

The long life of our forefathers in the first world.

In the first world, men liued eight hundred and nine hundred yeares, according as we haue already declared in our former volume, and the eight Chapter; where is amply related the yeares of our auncient fore-fathers, farre differing from ours. Our present intention and purpose, is to speake concerning the decadence of the age of man; a matter very remarkeable, & whereof the sacred Scripture doth make mention. For it is written, that the first declining of mans yeares or age, was ruled and limited to an 120. yeares, immediatly after the flood, according as we read in Genesis, where the Lord God himselfe said, The life of man shall be an hundred and twentie yeares. Not that hee saith, that a man cannot out-liue six score yeares; but as if that the rest or ouer-plus of his life, will be but wearisome and insupportable old age.

Gen. 6,3.

Genesis 25,7.

Abraham, who was long time after the deluge, liued an hundred seuenty and fiue yeares. Iacob was an hundred and thirty yeares olde, when he went down into Ægypt, where hee yet liued ten yeares longer. And so of many other to bee alledged, that liued many happy yeares. Since then, the life of man became shortned againe, euen in the time of Dauid, who speaketh thus in one of his Psalmes. The dayes of our age is threescore yeares and ten, & though men be so strong, that they attain to foure score yeares; yet is their strength then, but labour and sorrow, so soone it passeth away, and we are gone. Now a dayes we see, that such as are of feeble Complexion, passe not aboue fiue and fifty yeares, and (very strong men) but three score & fiue (I meane in lusty disposition, for operations and actions to be in men) & therefore the life of man in these our daies, lasteth not the twentith part; of those men liuing in the worlds first Age, and howe much shorter they will be, God only knoweth.

Genesis 46,6.

Psalme 90,10.

The yeares of weak & strong men in these our instant times.

The ancient Philosophers labored very seriously, in seeking a reason for this difference and decadence in mens yeares. Some attributed it to the celestiall influences. Others alledged farre contrarie reasons, as Plinie, and many more beside, that limit the life of man to sixe score yeares. Berosus alloweth no more then an hundred and seauenteene; Petosiris, an hundred twenty six: but Censorinus (following the opinion of the Philosopher Essatius) assigneth a man to liue but foure score yeares. Dioscorides, imitating the Egyptians, and speaking of the life of man, saith: It is long or short, according vnto the poise or weight of his heart. Euen as wee haue more at large deliuered, in the precedent part to this Volume, where manie reasons are alledged, making to this purpose, without presuming into any secret, concerning the will and prouidence of God.

The search of Philosophers for the reason of mans short life, as is to be seene in their seuerall writings.

In the first place, God ordaind al creatures to eate and drinke, for maintenance of the naturall and radicall humor, graunting them means also, to perpetuate their seuerall kindes, by the acte of generation. But, as eating & drinking is not sufficient enough, to re-establish the radical humor, which diminisheth and vanisheth away of it selfe daily, so that life may likewise be lost as soone as it; so is it not possible also, to yeeld a body by the act of generation, of such compleat perfection, as others were, that liued in the first age of the world. For the vertue and power of the radical complexion (which is called the principal complexion) is mightily decayed: & from hence it ensueth, that the life of man became abridged and shortned dayly more and more.

All creatures appointed to feede for maintaining the humor radicall and naturall.

The radicall complexion, the principall Complexion.

Another reason, which neuertheles dependeth vpon the former, is this; that the food wherewith man sustaineth himselfe, hath lost, and commeth far short of such vertue, as it had at the beginning of the world. So that it is vtterly impossible, to haue mankinde in such bodily perfection, as the men of the first worlde had. And therfore the vertue of complexion failing in man, and the hermony of the Elementary qualities beeing adulterated and bastardized, and foode likewise decayed in goodnes; it is no maruel, if our present life be become so much shortned. And thogh those times then obserued, euen as an ordinarie limitation to the life of man: yet notwithſtanding, diuers perſonnes (among them) haue bene noted to liue longer then ſome other, by being of a ſtrong and good complexion; and, in regard it pleaſed God that it ſhould be ſo, whoſe hand is neuer tied, much leſſe ſubiected to any law or limit. Neuertheleſſe, becauſe we may not complaine, concerning our little time of life, and alſo to comfort vs in the breuity thereof: I will ſet downe certaine examples of ſome men, that haue exceeded others in length of lite, though not ſpeaking of any in the firſt age, becauſe ſuch as I purpoſe to diſcourſe on, liued long ſince that large extent of life came to be ſhortned.

The life time of men after the generall deluge. Gen 11,12,13 14.

Arpachſhad, ſonne of Sem, and Nephew to Noah, liued two hundred yeares after the flood; and yet notwithſtanding, he attained to foure hundred and thirty yeares before he dyed. Shelah alſo his ſonne, liued foure hundred and three yeares. Heber, the ſon of Shelah, (of whome the Hebrewes took their name) liued foure hundred ſixty and ſeuen yeares. In his time happened the confuſion of tongues: but he ſafely preſerued the Hebrue (which was the firſt language of the worlde) becauſe he conſented not to the proud building of Babels Tower.

When the confuſion of tongues was.

Terah, the Father of Abraham, liued two hundred and fiue yeares, and Abraham liued an hundred, ſeauentie and fiue yeares; as alſo Iaacob an hundred ſeauenty fiue yeares, after which time, the life time of men beganne greatly to diminiſh. Neuertheleſſe, Moyſes liued ſix ſcore yeares, and Aaron ſixe ſcore and three yeares: Sara, that ancient matrone (ſo much renowned) liued ſixe ſcore and ſeuen yeares, and that valiant woman Iudith who ſmote off the head of Holofernes, lyued an hundred and fiue yeares; as wee may reade in the ſacred Scriptures, which render true teſtimony of all that hath hitherto bin ſaid.

At what time mens liues began to ſhortten.

Now, as concerning prophane Hiſtories, many are recorded to liue long time: as Neſtor, who liued ſo faire and large an extent of life, that our reuerend predeceſſors, when they deſired the long life of any man; they wiſhed, that hee might liue Neſtors yeares, hee being three hundred yeares old, when he went with the Greekes to Troy. For Homer ſayeth: Prince Neſtor being about three hundred yeares of age, went to ſuccour the Greekes againſt the Troyans, with a potent army by ſea.

Valerius Maximus, and Pliny alſo ſay, that he reigned foureſcore yeares, and liued ſixe ſcore yeares. Pliny likewiſe maketh a large Narration, of certaine Kings in Arabia, and many other (as well men as women) that liued multitudes of years: but becauſe matters fecht ſo farre off, may raiſe doubt and ſuſpition, I will inſert other hiſtories, which are maintained to be true and certaine.

Valerius Maximus Coruinus, did liue an hundred yeares, at it is auouched by Valerius Maximus, hauing beene ſixe times Conſull of Rome: and further ſaieth, That there were ſixe and forty yeares betweene his firſt Conſulſhip, and the laſt yeare of his honor in the ſame dignity, and that he liued the reſt of his age in abledifpoſition, ſo that hee could make good vſe of all the dignities and Offices impoſed vppon him.

Theſe were ſports vſed from one 100 yeares to another hundred.

And, not to eſtrange or barre women, from the benefite of our inſtant diſcourſe, but to bleſſe them alſo with hope of long life; it is obſerued that Terentia, the wife of Cicero, liued an hundred and ſeuenteen yeares. Claudia, the Wife of Offellus, attained to an hundred and fifteene yeares of age, hauing had fifteen male children.

Plin in l. 10. c. 7

Pliny reporteth a matter very admirable, and yet true, that in the accounts and numberings made by Titus and Vespasian, then Censors, there liued three men at Parma, each of them being aged six score yeares, and two that were sixe score and ten yeares old; beside a woman, that was aged sixe score and twelue years. He saith moreouer, that in Romania, there were foure and fifty men, each of them beeing an hundred yeares olde: fifty seauen men being aged an hundred and tenne yeares: foure men, aged an hundred and thirtie yeares: and other foure men, who were seuerally aged sixe score & fifteen yeares: beside foure men more, each of them being seauen score yeares old, a thing not vsuall, and hardly to be seene in these daies of ours.

A note well worthy obseruation.

But leauing Italy, let vs looke vpon some further strangers, that liued long. Gorgias Leontinus*, a Philosopher greatly renowned, who liued (in very healthfull disposition) more then an hundred yeares. Hee hauing attained to an hundred and seuen yeares, was demanded, why he tooke so great delight to abide in the world; wherto he thus replyed, I thanke God, I neuer did any thing, whereby I deserued to bee blamed in mine Age. An answer very excellent and singular, for such as are able to make or speake it truly.

*A Rhetoritian, scholler to Empedocles, and Master to Isocrates.

Seneca* the Philosopher, borne at * Corduba, liued an hundred & fourteen yeeres. The famous Appollonius Thyaneus hadde passed an hundred yeares before he dyed. Democritus, by the testimony of Diogenes, liued an hundred and nine yeares; and dyed, hauing neuer felt Feauer, nor any other disease. Galen, the Prince of Physitians, liued (in absolute and able disposition) an hundred and forty yeares: and dyed by defect of Nature, without the sense of any sickenesse.

Attyla*, King of the Gothes, who (in his time) was most cruell, and of great power liued an hundred and foure years, seruing as a scourge to mankinde, and making lamentable waste and spoile by his warres, and infinite cruelties. Massinissa, King of Gninea, liued fourescore and seauenteene yeares, hauing reigned threescore. This Prince neuer had his head couered, neyther from the Sun, windes, or raines, or greatest Tempests, but continued so (bareheaded) to his very latest dayes: marching alwayes on foote in his Armour, and as lightly as the youngest souldier in his Armie. When hee was fourescore yeeres of age, he begate a Son, and left (after his death) foure and forty sonnes, by him begotten.

*A valiant Scythian Prince, who subdued Pannonia, &c.

He was also King of Numidia.

As for Hermites and ancient Fathers, many are recorded to liue long, onely by their abstinence; as Saint Paule, the first Hermit, who liued sixe score yeares; Saint Anthony the Ægyptian Hermit, who liued an hundred and fifty yeeres; and Creonius (his Companion) an hundred. Now a dayes, wee finde few, or none at all, to liue so long, for (day by day) the life time of man groweth shorter and shorter; whereby it appeareth, that the end of the world approacheth neere. Neuertheless God hath declared his wonderful workes in all times; for in the life of the Emperour Conrade, which was in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, and forty, or nere thereabout, a man dyed, who had serued the Emperour Charlemaigne in his warres, so large a time, that this man was founde to haue liued three hundred and threescore yeares, and was called Iohn of Time. Which name was giuen him (as I thinke) in regard of his great age; and I am halfe perswaded also, that of him was raised the old Prouerbe, when men commonly saide, Iohn, Iohn, trust thou in God.

CONcerning the Originall of the people inhabiting these coũtries, wee finde, that two Brethren, sonnes to the king of *Cathes, the one being named Battus, or Batton; and the other Zelandus, were the first Fathers of them, and that (from them) they deriued their Names. For these two Princes, being too extreamly pursued by the hatred of a Stepmother, and no way pitied or supported by the King their father (escaping many traines and machinations, of poysoning, murthering, and diuers other dangers by her daily deuised and put in practise against thẽ) were forced to forsake their natiue abyding, & fly to an Island within the Rhine: where Battus determining to make his stay, called it Battauia, after his owne Name; and that is (in plainer vnderstanding) Holland.

*A people neere to the Scythians.

Battauia is Holland.

Zelandus, not liking to liue so neere, or with his brother (least pursute should surprize them both, and reuenge there fasten which in more desperate place they had auoyded) he trauelled on to the vttermost confines of the Rhine, and liking there to set downe his rest, imitated his Brothers example (in styling the country) and called it Zeland.

Zeland, named by Zelandus.

Concerning their building of Cities, Townes, Castles, and Forts, which afterward came to be ruined & defaced againe by warres with the Romans, Saxons, Gauls, Danes, &c. or to what order of life the people disposed themselues, and through how many and infinite encumbrances (from their originall) they passed, for no meane store of yeares together: these are matters meerely exempt from our intended breuity, and may more amply be seen in the history at large, whereunto I refer any such desirous Reader, and borrowing fauour for so large a leap, I instantly proceed to the yeare, 863. when Holland first became to be an Earledome.

In the yeare before mentioned, Charles the Bald, King of France, at Bladel in the Prouince of Campaigne, hauing there (in his company) a generall assembly of his Princes and Barons, for consultation of many important matters; pleased to aduance the two sonnes of Count Haghen (who was Vnckle to the King) for theyr great deseruings, and for the farther encouragement of the like vertuous minded Gentlemen. Walger, who was the eldest sonne, he made Earl of Teysterbandt; and Thierry the yongest son, or Theodor, as some tearme him, beeing formerly called Thierry of Aquitaine, he made earle of Holland.

The two sons of Count Haghen.

This gift of the kings, especially that to Thierry, was much withstood by the Frizelanders, as scorning to be commanded by any new Lord or Ruler: wherefore they consulted with the Hollanders, and a plot was laid to expell this new Earle. But it proued to no effect, for the king comming thither (in person) with a powerfull army, made such an example on the Ring-leaders in this rebellion, that the rest (in very great humility) submitted themselues, casting their Weapons not onely at the Kings feete, but likewise at the Earles, and (vpon pardon) they vowed their continuall bounden duty to Thierry. His authority was then further strengthened, in the year eight hundred sixty eight, by the letters Patents of King Charles, as also by them of Lewes King of Germany, confirming him to bee Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Frizeland.

Thierry Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Frize land.

This Thierry married Genna, or Ienna, daughter to Pepin the Bald, king of Italy, sonne to the Emperor Charlemaigne. Hee worthily foyled the Danes, that then possessed the Towne of Vtricht, the Wiltes and the Slaues, disabling them from any further footing in Holland, which made them presume to meddle in Zeland, but thence they were repulsed likewise. By which meanes, he remained afterward in peace, beautifying his Countries both with faire buildings and good Lawes. He dyed very old, hauing reigned 40. yeares, and after him succeeded 2 Thierry his son, second of that name, Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lord of Frizeland, who married with Hildegarde. daughter vnto King Lewes of France, the Stammerer, and Sister to King Charls the Simple. The Frizelanders did twice reuolt from their obedience, and would not allow Earl Thierry to be their Lord, slaying very many of them that obeyed the Earl, wasting, spoiling, and burning all the way as they went. But at length they were iustly repayed for their insolencie, and such a slaughter was made of the Frisons (without any mercy) that few or none of them returned home to their dwellings. Afterward, he forced them to make the doores of entrance into their houses, so lowe and narrow, that they must stoope verie lowe before they could get in; and this he did, to make them the more humble and seruile, receiuing a new Oath of allegeance of them. And hauing reigned about fiftie yeares, being then aged 88. yeares old, he dyed, leauing two sonnes behind him, the eldest whereof (being named Egbert) became Archbyshop of Treues, and Arnold his yongest son succeeded him.

The Frizelanders rebell againe.

3 Arnold, or (as others will haue it) Arnulph, yongest son to Earle Thierry, followed in rule as his fathers successor: but he held the Earledomes of Holland, Zeland, and Lordship of Frizeland, no longer of the crown of France, but of Otho the third, Emperour; and so became in fee to the Empire. A very fearefull Comet appeared in his time, with straunge Ecclipses both of the Sunne and Moone, beeing as red as blood, and terrible Earthquakes: a fire also fell from heauen, in similitude like an huge Tower, burning for a long time: after which ensued so violent a pestilence, that the liuing died burying the dead. The Frizons reuolting again from obedience, made all his reigne a continuall warfare, and the Armies (on either side) meeting neere vnto Winckell, so dreadfull a battaile was fought betweene them: that the Hollanders sustained the worst, Count Arnold being there slaine, and a great number of his cheefest Nobility. This battaile was fought the eighteenth of October, the morrow after S. Lamberts day, in the yeare 993. So this Earle Arnold, hauing reigned fiue yeares, and being thus vnfortunately slaine, was buried by his Father and Grandfather, in the Abbey of Egmont.

A dreadfull Comet, ecclipses and earthquakes

4 Thierry, third of that name, and son to Count Arnold, succeeded as fourth Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Lorde of Frizeland. Being desirous to reuenge his Fathers death vpon the Frizons: hee was much impeached therein by Adelbold, Byshop of Vtrecht, against whom (neuertheless) hee preuailed in two foughten battailes, in the yeare 1018. and (with great slaughter of the Frizons) brought them vnder obedience to his youngest son Floris, whom he made Lord of them. This Earle Thierry, liuing afterward in verie peacefull dayes, vndertooke a Pilgrimage to Ierusalem, with the Lord of Arckell, his loyall subiect; who died at Hierusalem, & was there very honourably buried by Thierry. After whose return home, and some yeares passed in peace with his Wife and Children, hauing reigned 46. yeares, hee died in Anno 1039. and was buried by his father in the Abbey of Egmont.

Adelbold byshop of Vtrecht.

5 Thierry, fourth of that Name, was the fift Earle of Holland, Zeland, & Lord of Frizeland, after the decease of Thierry his Father. In a Tourney of Princes and Lords, performed (for pleasure) in the Citie of Liege, it was this Earles hard happe, to kill a Brother of the Byshops of Cullen and Liege: whereby ensued such discorde and molestation, that, after many aduentures of reuenge, vndertaken by the Germaine Gentlemen, albeit therein they sustained much losse of men, the Earle was shot into the thigh with a poisoned dart, of which wound hee dyed the fifteenth of May, one thousand foure hundred and eight, after he had gouerned nine yeares, and was buried by his father, in the Abbey of Egmont. He was neuer maried, and therefore left not any childe to succeede him.

6 Floris, who (as you haue heard before) was Earle of Frizeland, now after his brothers death, became the sixt Earle of Holland and Zeland. The former mishappe at Liege, could not as yet be forgotten by the Byshops of Cullen and Liege; but they wold needs prosecute fresh reuenge on Count Floris, who being a man of vndãted spirit, defeated his enemies in two attemptes. Once by a cunning stratagem, causing ditches and pitfals to be made in south Holland, couering them with straw and grasse, so that they could not be easily discerned. At this time a bloody batell being fought betweene betweene them, there was forty thouſand of the Earles enemies ſlaine, beſide twenty ſixe thouſand more, who were drowned and ſmothered in thoſe ditches, Anno Domini 1058. The ſecond foyle of his aduerſaries, happened foure yeres after this, when the Hollanders (putting the Germans to flight) returned with rich ſpoiles, and great ſtore of priſoners; this was in the yeare of our Lord 1062. Yet was it this Earles ill fortune, to be afterward ſlayne vnarmed, as he ſate vnder an Elme, taking the ayre, his enemies preuayling by this aduantage. He had ruled in Holland foureteene yeares, and in Frizeland 21. yeares, and lyeth buryed at Egmont.

7. 8. Gertrude, widow to Earle Floris, in regarde that Thierrie her ſonne was in his nonage, gouerned thoſe Countries in his right. And in the yeare of our Lord, 1063. ſhe re-married with Robert the Frizon (ſonne to Baldwine of Liſle de Bucke, Earle of Flaunders) with the good liking of all the States and Nobilitie. Hee alſo was made Guardian of young Earle Thierrie, and (had by this Gertrude) three ſonnes, Robert, ſurnamed the Yong (who went with Godfrey of Bullen to the holie Land, and was (after his fathers deceaſe) Earle of Flaunders;) Philip, father to William of Ixt, and Baldwin Biſhop of Teroanne; beſide three daughters alſo, which he had by the ſaid Gertrude. This Robert was called the Frizon, not in regarde of his birth, but of his bigge ſtature, ſtrength and courage. For, hauing preuailed againſt the Frizons, and hearing of his Brothers death, Baldwine de Mons, Earle of Flaunders; hee layd clayme to the ſayde Earledome, and (notwithſtanding the oppoſition of Fichild, widow to Earle Baldwine: by meanes of the Flemings, he ouerthrew the King of France in battell, and ſhe with her ſonne Baldwine, remayning ſatisfied with the Countie of Henault, Robert became quietly Earle of Flanders. For eight yeares ſpace, hee carried himſelfe with great wiſedome and valour, and dying in the yeare of our Lord 1077. was buried in the Cannons Church, founded by himſelfe at Caſſell. Gertrudes time of rule by her ſelfe, and Roberts after, are reckoned as two ſeuerall gouernements.

9. Godfrey, ſurnamed the crooke-backed Duke of Lorraine, in this time of yong Earle Thierries minoritie, was made an inſtrument (in regard of the former quarrel of Count Floris, and the Biſhops of Cullen and Liege, as yet not reuenged to their mindes) to ſuggeſt a falſe information to Henry the fourth, Emperour, whereby the ſayde Godfrey became an vſurper of the young Earles right, for the ſpace of foure years. But as he was ſitting on the draught to eaſe his body, a ſeruant of young Count Thierries, did thruſt a Iaueline vp into his fundament, whereof he died (not long after) at Maeſtrecht.

The crooke-backt Duke of Lorraine.

10. Thierrie, the fift of that name, who (by crook-backt Godfrey, and other ſtrange oppoſitions) had long time beene debarred from quiet poſſeſſion of his right; at length, by an abſolute conqueſt of the Frizons, in two ſeuerall great battells, recouered all, and returned home as a Conqueror. Afterward, he married Whithilde, daughter to Fredericke, Duke of Saxonie, by whom he had a ſonne and daughter: Floris that ſucceeded him, and Mathilde, married to the Duke of Orleance. Earle Thierrie hauing gouerned fifteene yeares, dyed, and was buryed in the Abbey of Egmont.

The Frizons conquered in two battels.

11 Floris, the ſecond of that name, & ſurnamed the Fat or Groſſe, ſucceeded next after his father Thierry: he greatly fauoured Church-men, whereby the Abbey of Egmonts reuenews were largely encreaſed. He being a man of very peacefull inclination, little or no diſturbances happened in his time: but onely by the Frizons, who, for their rebelling, were ſeuerely puniſhed, and forced to ſubmit themſelues to his mercy. This Floris married Petronilla, or Parnell, daughter to Didier, Duke of Saxonie, and ſiſter to Lotharius the Emperour: By her he had three ſons, Thierrie, Floris, called the Blacke Prince of Kenemerlandt; and Symon, alſo one daughter named Hadewicke, who was Counteſſe of Gueldres. Hauing gouerned his Countries very honourably, for the ſpace of one and thirty yeares; he dyed in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand one hundred thirty and three, and lyeth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

12. Thierrie, ſixt of that name, ſucceeded his father Floris, and was much moleſted by the Frizons, in regard that his brother Floris the Blacke Prince, enuying the happines and quiet of Thierrie, went and tooke part with them againſt him; vntill ſuch ſuch time as the Emperour Lotharius (being theyr vnckle) had reconciled them, and made them friends. Conrade beeing ioyned as competitor in the Empire with Lotharius, cauſed a freſh quarrell between Thierrie and the Biſhop of Vtrecht, he ratifying the former graunt of Henry, which cauſed very long contention, and much bloud to be ſhed on either ſide. Thierrie hauing gouerned his Countries of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland fortie yeares, died in the yeare 1163. and lieth buried in the Abbey of Egmont.

13 Floris the third, eldeſt ſonne of Thierry, as heyre to his father, inherited his right in Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland. The Frizons (pretēding their former freedomes and imperiall liberties) made ſtill their reuoltes from time to time, imboldned thereto by the often ſuggeſtions of Godfrey of Rhemen, Biſhop of Vtrecht, who (as his predeceſſors had done before him) ſtill queſtioned the Earledomes of Oſtergo and Weſtergoe in Frizeland: but the Emperour Fredericke, went himſelfe in perſon, and made an agreement between them. All which notwithſtanding, much hurt was done on eyther ſide, as time and treachery fitted them with apt opportunity. A great controuerſie happened betweene the Earles of Holland and Flaunders, for the Iſle of Walchren, and Count Floris (in triall of fight) became priſoner to the Earle of Flaunders: who neuertheleſſe vſed him princely, and they beeing accorded by the Archbiſhop of Cullen, and the Biſhoppe of Liege; the great hole neare to the damme or ſluce; was recouered with much adoe, by caſting a dog-fiſh thereinto, and ſpeedy filling it vp with earth, whereon they named it Hondidam, that is, Dogs-ſluce. This Earle Floris, aſſiſting the Emperour Fredericke, Phillip King of France, Richard King of England, with many other Dukes, Chriſtian Princes and Earles, at the ſiege of Damieta in Soria: fell there ſicke in the Army, and died 1208. hauing gouerned his prouinces twenty ſeuen yeares.

14 Thierrie the ſeuenth, hearing of his fathers death in Paleſtine; ſucceeded as his heire in all his Earledoms. The whole time of his regiment, was in war and continuall combuſtions. Firſt by his brother Lord William of Holland (who was with his father Floris in Paleſtine, and performd there many honourable ſeruices) thorow diuers diſagreements that happened betweene them; notwithſtanding, as many laboured reconcilings, and pacifications. Next, Baldwine Earle of Flaunders, he was as moleſtuous to him likewiſe, for the Iſle of Walchren: beſides the Frizons rebellions, and his trouble with the Biſhops of Cologne and Liege, as alſo his impriſonment to the Duke of Brabant, and then the intruſion of the Biſhop of Vtrecht, after which, enſued a peace and vnited amity on all ſides. This Count Thierrie had no heires male, but two beautifull daughters; Adella, marryed to Henry of Gueldres, who dyed without anie Children, and Ada, meanly marryed by her mother (after her fathers death) to Count Lewes of Loos, that ſo the gouernement might be diſpoſed at her pleaſure. In the yeare of our Lord, 1203. Earle Thierry dyed, hauing gouerned his Countries thirteene yeares, and and lyeth buryed in the Abbey of Egmont.

15 Ada, daughter to Earle Thierrie, was Counteſſe of Holland and Zeland, after her fathers death; which mooued a great heart-burning in the Lordes and Gentlemen, that they ſhould liue vnder a Woman, and a poore Earles command. Therefore, they ſent into Frizeland for Count William, proteſting to aſſiſt him in attayning the gouernement of Holland. The young Counteſſe Ada was ſurprized in their firſt attempt, and her husband the Earle of Loos driuen to flight; who yet wunne the Biſhop of Vtrecht (by money and other promiſes) to ayde him, and by this means he had ſome ſmall ſucceſſe for a while. But the Counteſſe Ada dying without any children, Earle William was then the true and onely heyre to Holland and Zeland. In which right of his, hee went with his power againſt the Earle of Loos, and ſuch was his ſucceſſe, that the Women did beate his enemies with Diſtaues and Stones, they beeing glad to caſt away their Armour for lightneſſe, to ſaue themſelues by flight; yet many were drowned in the Ditches, and a great number taken priſoners, with all the Earle of Loos Tents, Pauillions, Plate, Iewelles, and Munition, which Count William royally diuided amongſt his Hollanders, remayning abſolute Prince of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland.

16 William, firſt of th at name, ſucceeded

1128. ded rightfully in all his Earledoms, by the death of his Neece the yong Counteſſe Ada. He had ſome ſtrife with Didier Biſhop of Vtrecht, and Gerard Vander Are his brother: but (vpon certayne Articles) all diſpleaſures were qualified. By his firſt wife Alix, daughter to the Earle of Gueldres, he had Floris, that next ſucceeded him, Otho Biſhop of Vtrecht, William Lieutenant of Holland, and two daughters, the one was Abbeſſe at Rhynsbourg, aud the other at Delfte. His ſecond wife was named Mary, daughter to Edmund of Lancaſter, ſon to Henry the third, King of England, by whom he had no iſſue. He gouerned 19. years; and dying, lies buried at Rhynsbourg.

Edmond of Lancaſter, ſon to the King of England.

17 Floris the fourth, ſucceeded his father Count William in his Earledomes. He took great delight in Iuſts & Turnaments, and the Earle of Clermont proclayming a publike Triumph for all commers, at the Counteſſe his wifes requeſt (who greatly deſired to ſee this Floris, of whom ſhe had heard much commendation:) this honorable Erle of Holland, Zeland, &c. was there treacherouſly ſlaine, onely through iealous ſuſpition of the old Erle of Clermont, who was there likewiſe preſently ſlaine himſelfe, and the Counteſſe (grieuing for this great miſhap) died ſoone after. This Count Floris had a daughter named Mathilde, or Margaret, as ſome call her, who was married to Count Herman of Henneberg. She deſpiſing a poore widdow, that deſired her almes vpon vrgent neceſſitie, holding in either arme a ſweet yong child, both which, God had ſent hir at one birth; gaue hir very reprochful words beſide, as, that ſhe could not be honeſt of her bodie; and (by her husband) haue two children lawfully begotten. The poore woman, grieuing to be reiected in ſuch extreame want and need, but much more, to heare her reputation ſo nearely touched, knowing her ſoule cleare from al diſhoneſt detection: made no further ſuite to the Lady, but (falling vpon her knees) appealed to God for defence of her Innocencie, and earneſtly deſired, that as ſhe had cõceiued and borne thoſe two infants lawfully by her husband; euen ſo, if euer that Ladie ſhould be ſubiect to the cuſtome of Women, that it would pleaſe him, to ſend her as many children at one birth, as there are daies in the yeare. Not long after, the Lady conceiued with childe by her husband, & (for her deliuerance) went into Holland, to viſite the Earle her brother, taking vp lodging in the Abbey of religious women at Loſdunen, and grew ſo exceeding great, as the like had neuer before beene ſeene. When her time came, on the Friday before Palme-ſunday, in the yeare of our Lord God 1276. ſhee was deliuered of 365. children, the one halfe being ſonnes, and the other daughters; but the odde childe was an Hermaphrodite, and they were all well ſhaped and proportioned in their little members. Theſe children were layd in two baſins, and were all baptized by Guydon, Suffragan to the Biſhop of Vtrecht, who named all the ſonnes Iohn, and the daughters Elizabeth, but what name hee gaue the Hermaphrodite, it is not recorded. They were no ſooner baptized, but they all died, and the mother alſo. The two Baſins are yet to bee ſeene in the ſayde Church of Loſdunen, and a memorie of them, both in Latine and Dutch. The Latine beginning thus: Margareta, Comitis Hennebergiæ vxor, & Florentij Hollandiæ & Zelandiæ filia, &c. Vnderneath are theſe verſes:

This Count Floris, being ſo treacherouſly ſlaine, as yee haue heard before, had his body brought backe into Holland, by the Earle of Cleues, and other noble Lords, who buried it in the Abby of Rhynsbourg; he hauing honourably and vertuouſly gouerned his Countries twelue yeares. He left but one ſon named William, ſix yeares old, who was in the tutelage of his vncle Otho, Biſhop of Vtrecht, during his minoritie.

This Hiſtory is auouched for a truth by diuers good Authors.

18 William, ſecond of that name, ſucceeded his father Floris in all his dominions, being all the time of his vnder yeares, in the gouernement of Otho Biſhop of Vtrecht his vncle, who was a very worthy & carefull Guardian to him. The Pope hauing depoſed Fredericke the ſecond, and Conrade his ſonne from the Empire: the Princes Electors (in deſpight of the Pope) made this Earle William King of the Romans, and crowned him at Aix le Chapelle, he hauing then attained to the age of 20. yeares. A long & tedious trouble hapned, betweene him, & Margaret Counteſſe of Flanders, a very high-minded and proude woman, woman, for the country of Walchren, wherin, after a great foile and ſlaughter of the Flemings, (taking part with her) and impriſonment of her two ſonnes (Guy and Iohn) ſhe implored the aid of Charles duke of Aniou, againſt king William, & ſped therby no better then ſhe had done before, but was glad in the end to ſeek reconcilement. This King William built the Pallace of the Earles of Holland, in the vilage of La Hage, or the Hague, where it is at this day, and a goodly Cloiſter at Harlem. At his warres in weſt Frizeland, where he preuailed very ſucceſſefully, he would needs (without any other aſſiſtance then himſelfe) follow the rebells ouer the Ice, where his horſſe ſlipping in, himſelfe almoſt drowned, and none neare to helpe him (but enemies of the Frizons, that lay ſecretly in ambuſh:) they beate him downe with clubbes and ſtaues, not knowing that it was the King, and ſo they ſlew him. But when afterward they tooke better notice of him, by his Target and Armes thereon emblazoned: in very hearty ſorrow for their foule deed, they buried him ſecretly, in a poore houſe in the village of Hooktwond, thinking ſo to wipe out all remembrance of him. But his body was after found, and buried in the Abbey of Middlebourg, in the Iſle of Walchren.

King William cruelly ſlaine.

19 Floris the fift, ſon to King William, who was ſlaine ſo inhumanely; albeit hee was but ſixe months old, yet he ſucceeded his father, his vncle Floris being his Gouernor and Tutor. At 17. yeares of age, he went with an army againſt the euer-reuolting Frizons, and ouercame them at a village called Schellinckhout, very ſeuerely reuenging his fathers death on them, and (by building foure Caſtles in Frizeland) brought them wholly vnder his obediēce.

1290. Afterward, Count Floris made a voyage into England, where a marriage was contracted, betweene Iohn, eldeſt ſon to Earle Floris, and Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward the firſt: Iohn being (not long after) ſent into England, to accompliſh the ſayd mariage, where he remained in the Court of England, vntill his fathers vnfortunate death, which briefly was thus:

The Hiſtory of the death of erle Floris.

A knight liued in the Earles Court, named Gerard van Velſon, who had beene a whole yeares ſpace detayned in priſon, & his brother beheaded, through certaine falſe ſuggeſtions whiſpered to the Earle, which (afterward) appearing to be a meere iniury: the Earle ſought to repayre this wrong, with very eſpeciall fauors done to the knight, great aduancements, & would haue beſtowed alſo his concubine in marriage on him. Which Gerard diſdaining & replying, that he would not weare his caſt ſhooes: the Earle raſhly anſwerd, that he ſhould take his leauings, in deſpite of his hart. To preuent mariage with the Earles minion, the knight beſtowed his affections elſe-where, and wedded a Ladie of great honour and beauty. Which when the Earle vnderſtood, he purſued his former raſh folly, to the price of his own life: Sending Gerard on an employment of much credit & reſpect, and wherewith he was not a little pleaſed, not doubting anie ſuch wicked intention. The Earle came to Gerards houſe, vnder color of hoſpitality, and there (winning her to priuate conference in her bed chamber) forcibly defloured her, to performe his raſh promiſe to her husband. At Gerards returne, and this foule wrong diſcouered, it was purſued with very bloudy reuenge, by a reſolued conſpiracy ſworne againſt his life: which albeit he had ſome warning of (by a paper deliuerd him by a poore woman;) yet his diſaſter being ineuitable, a traine was laid for him as he rode a hawking, and twentie one wounds he receiued on his body, by the hand of the ſayd Gerard. But hee and the reſt of the conſpiratorſe ſcaped not vnpuniſhed, for they had their heads ſmitten off, and were then laid vpon wheeles; but Gerard was put (ſtark naked) into a Pipe ſtucke full of ſharp nailes, and was ſo rowled vp and downe through all the ſtreetes of Leyden. Then was he beheaded, & layd on a wheele, and al his kinred (to the ninth degree) put to death, and laid on wheeles.

A ſeuere reuenge for the Earles death.

1297. 20 After the wicked murder of Earle Floris the fift, committed by the Fryzons, as hath beene declared: Iohn his only ſon (being then in England with King Edward his father in law) was next to ſucceed him as his rightfull heire. But before he could leaue England, ſome partialities and factions happened in Holland for the gouernement, which ſoone were qualified at Earle Iohns being there preſent, notwithſtāding the ſubtile policie of Wolfart of Borſſele, ſeizing the perſon of Earle Iohn, and Lady Elizabeth his wife, thinking to haue the gouernement of the ſayd Earle, becauſe, as yet, 1300. yet, he was but young. Earle Iohn preuailed againſt the Frizons, and the Biſhop of Vtrecht, and hauing gouerned his Countries about foure yeares, hee fell ſicke at Harlem, and there dyed. He was the firſt of al the Earles of Holland, that died without children: wherefore in him failed the line maſculine of the Earls from the dukes of Aquitaine, which Thierry, or Theodor, the firſt Earle of Holland, had continued 437. yeares. He was buried in the Abbey of Rhinsbourg, his widdow Lady Elizabeth being caried back into England, where ſhe was afterward maried to the Earle of Oxford: So that by the death of Earle Iohn in this manner, thoſe Countries were deuolued to the Earles of Henault, iſſuing by the mothers ſide frō the earles of Holland.

The end of the race of the Dukes of Aquitaine, & ſucceſsion of the Earles of Henault.

1301. 21 Iohn, the ſecond of that name, called Iohn of Henault (claiming his right from Alix, Siſter to William king of the Romans) ſucceeded after Iohn, as Earle of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland, &c. He had a long and tedious trouble with Iohn de Reueſſe, who perſwaded the Emperour, that Iohn Earle of Holland dying without iſſue, his Earledomes ought (in right) to returne to the Empire; according as Charls the bald, Emperor of the Romans, had at firſt giuen them in fee and homage to Thierry of Aquitaine. This ſuggeſtion raiſed the Emperour Albert in Armes againſt Iohn of Henault, but the Biſhop of Cullen compounded the matter betweene them; and Iohn de Reueſſe was afterward drowned, by which means, Iohn of Henault, hauing gouerned Henault thirty yeres, and his countries of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland fiue yeares, died, & was buried at Valenciennes.

Iohn de Reueſſe drowned.

1305. 22 William the third, ſonne and heire to count Iohn of Henault, ſucceeded his fathers Earledomes: he was commonly called, The good Earle William, for his vertues, iuſtice, good life, and honourable actions. In his time hapned ſo great a dearth and famine in Holland, that poore people dyed with hunger, euen in the ſtreets as they went: ſeeking alſo for hearbs and rootes in the fields and woods, there they were likewiſe found dead, and in the common high wayes: little children dyed ſucking at their mothers breaſts, and ſome were enforced to feede on their dead children. In this time of famine, a poore woman in the Towne of Leyden, being extreamely ouercharged with hunger, entreated her owne ſiſter, (being a woman of better abilitie) to lend her ſome bread, which ſhe would thankefully repay againe, when God ſhould enable her. She, very vnkindly, and without any pitty of her extreamity, denyed her oftentimes, notwithſtanding the others often vrgings; that ſhee was aſſured, that ſhee could not be without bread. Heereupon the vnmercifull ſiſter (lying, both to God and to her owne poore ſiſter) ſayde: If I haue any bread, I wiſh that it may inſtantly be turned into a ſtone: wherewith the heauy diſpleaſure of almighty God laid hold vpon her words, and going afterward to hir Cupboord (to relieue her ſelfe) ſhe found all her loaues of bread conuerted into apparant ſtones, and died herſelfe with extreamity of hunger. It is credibly ſaid, that one or two of thoſe ſtones, are yet to be ſeene in Saint Peters Church at Leyden, as a memorie of this iuſt iudgement of God.

The good Earle William.

1316. A wonderfull dearth.

A ſtrange example of an vnmercifull ſiſter.

There is alſo recorded another memorable Hiſtorie, of vpright Iuſtice done by this good Earle William, to a poore country-man, againſt a Bayliffe of South Holland, who had taken a goodly faire Cowe from him, that was the reliefe of himſelfe, his poore wife and children; as there are ſome Kine in that Countrey, which doe giue twenty pottles of milke and more, in a day. The Bayliffe at the poore mans complaint to this good earle William, who lay then ſicke in his Bed at Valenciennes (yet neuer debarred any ſuiters from audience, were he ſicke or well) was adiudged to giue the poore man an hundred crownes of good gold, for the wrong he had done to him, which was accordingly performed. But for his iniurie to publike Iuſtice (being himſelfe an Officer) and abuſing the authority committed in truſt to him; the Earle ſent for an Executioner, and cauſed his head to be ſmitten off by his beds ſide. This good Count William, beeing a vertuous Prince, victorious in warre, a man learned, wiſe, wel ſpoken, and iudicious, a great friend to peace, gracious to all men, and beloued in all courts, hauing gouerned his Prouinces 32. years, dyed the ninth day of Iune 1337. and was buried with great pomp at Valenciennes.

A worthy action of iuſtice done by this good Earle William.

1337. 23 William the fourth, ſon to the good Earle William came to his fathers Earledoms by lawfull ſucceſſion. He was a man of high merit, & a moſt famous Souldier, whereof wherof he made good proofe; first against the Sarazins and Moores, in the kingdome of Granada: Next, with the Emperor Lewes, and many noble Earles, ayding his brother in lawe Edward the third King of England, against the king of France; thirdly, in ouer-running Lithuania, Liuonia, and warring against the Russian Infidels, lading home his men with victory & wealthy spoiles: And lastly, in preuayling against the Frizons, and Robert of Arckell gouernour of Vtrecht: Yet it was his hard hap to be slaine vnknowne (amongest the Frizons) before any could haue power to helpe him: so that he left no lawfull child to succeede him, and therefore his sister, (beeing Empresse) remayned his onelie heire.

1342. Robert of Arckell, Gouernour of Vtrecht. 1346.

24 Margaret, wife to Lewes of Bauaria, (then Emperour) and the eldest sister to Earle William, slayne (as you haue heard) by the Frizons, by the Emperors interposition of his authority, and her owne natiue right, went downe by the Rhine into Holland, accompanied with a most princely and well-beseeming traine, and was acknowledged to be Ladie and Princesse of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland. But before her returne back to the Emperor againe, shee constituted both his and her eldest sonne (named William of Bauaria) to bee her Regent there in those Countries, for a summe of money yearely payed to her: but remayning vnpayd, she might resume all her rights to herselfe againe. The Emperor deceasing, the Empresse Margaret came thither againe, and had resignation (from her sonne William) of all the aforesaide Countries, retyring himselfe into Henault, as being well contented there to liue: vntill by intestine discord, and dangerous practises of two intruded factions, called Cabillaux and Hoecks (wherin both nobles and gentlemen did too far enter) the mothers gouernment did grow vnsufferable, and Duke William was recouered from Henault, to vnder-goe the sole authority. Two very bloody battels were fought betweene the Empresse and her sonne; and in the first, Earle William escaped with great difficultie, and fledde into Holland, for this battell was fought at La Vere in Zeland. But in the second, there was so much bloud spilt, that (for three dayes after) the old Riuer of Mense (at full Sea) was (all ouer) red in that place. The

A great effusion of blood.

Empresse (by helpe of a small Barke) escaped into England; and vpon an agreement afterwards made betweene them: Duke William had the quiet possession of Holland, Zeland, and Frizeland assigned him, and the Empresse Margaret had the countie of Henault, where (fiue yeares after) she ended her dayes, and lyeth buried at Valenciennes.

25 Duke William being peaceably possessed of his Seigneuries, according to the former composition, being also Duke of Bauaria, Palatine of Rhine, and Earle of Henault by his mothers death, tooke to wife the Lady Matilda, daughter to Henry duke of Lancaster in England, by whom hee had no children. Much strife, warre, and blody bickering, hapned betweene him and the Bishop of Vtrecht, with shrewd disaduantages on eyther side, till, by the meanes of some Noblemen, they were reduced to amitie.

Matilda, daughter to Henry Duke of Lancaster.

This Duke William (vpon what occasion it could neuer be knowne) fell distracted of his senses, and slew a Knight with a blow of his fist: so that hee was shut vp (vnder good Guarde) for nineteene years space, euen till he dyed. Hauing gouerned his prouinces of Holland, Zeland and Frizland (before his madnesse) seauen yeares, and Henault two.

1358

26 Albert of Bauaria, brother to Duke William, in the time of his distraction, was sent for from Bauaria, and made Gouernor of his brothers Countries, in hope of his recouery, which by no meanes could be compassed. Hee vanquished the Frizons in many rebellions, tooke the towne of Delft, and beheaded the Baron of Eughien, vpon sinister reformations, which caused great trouble betweene him, and sixe brethren of the said Baron: but, vpon their reconcilement, Count Albert builded the Chanonry of the Chappell, at the Court of the Hague.

The Baron of Eughien beheaded.

In his time, a Sea-woman (by reason of great tempests at Sea, and extraordinarie high Tides) was seene swimming in the Zuyderzee, betweene the Townes of Campen and Edam; which being brought to Edam, and cleansed from the Seamosse growne about her, by her long abiding there: she was like to another woman, endured to be apparelled, and would feed on meats as others did, yet sought she all meanes to escape, and get into the water agayne, had ſhe not very carefully beene tended. Shee did learne to ſpinne, and exerciſe other womanly qualities, beeing daily ſeene of infinite perſons, who haue made perfect teſtimoniall of this rare accident, and ſignified it for an vndoubted truth, auouching, that ſhe liued fifteene yeares, and lyeth there buryed in the Church-yard. In the yeare of our Lord, 1404 one thouſand foure hundred and foure, this famous Prince Albert dyed, after hee had gouerned his Countries ſixe and fortie yeares: nineteene as he was Tutour to his diſtracted brother, and twenty ſeauen as Prince, heire and Lord of thoſe Countries, beeing buryed at the Hague in Holland.

27 William, ſixt of that name, after the death of Duke Albert of Bauaria his father, ſucceeded as his immediate heyre. His firſt wife was daughter to Charles the fift, King of Fraunce, and ſhe dyed yong, without any iſſue. He ſecondly marryed the daughter of Iohn, ſonne to Phillip the bold Duke of Burgundy, by whom he had one onely daughter, named Iaqueline or Iacoba, as the Dutch vſe to call her. This Count William waſted Frizeland, ſpoyled Liege, and preuayled againſt the Gueldres, and alſo the Lordes (father and ſonne) of Arckell at Gorrichom, and reconciled the Duke of Burgundy to the French King. The Dolphine of Fraunce, ſonne to King Charles the ſixt, marryed Iaquiline, Count Williams daughter; but hee being poyſoned, by putting on a ſhirt of maile, dyed without iſſue. As Earle William himſelfe did not long after, being bitten in the leg by a mad Dogge, which hurt could neuer be cured. So that the Lady Iaqueline (his daughter, and widow to the Dolphine of Fraunce) was his true heire in all his Seigneuries: Hee gouerned thirteene yeares, and lieth buried at Valenciennes in Henault.

28 Iaqueline, or Iacoba, daughter and ſole heire to William of Bauaria, ſucceeded her father in all his Earledomes and Seigneuries, beeing then widdow to the Dolphine of Fraunce, and yet but nineteene yeares of age. In regard of her youth and widowhood, ſhe endured much moleſtation in her gouernement, chiefly in Holland: for the two factions tooke head againe, and bandied their boldnes on both ſides, the Hoeckins fauouring the Counteſſes faction, and the Cabillantines her enemies, by which meanes her rule was greatly diſturbed. For Iohn of Bauaria (forſaking his Biſhoppricke of Liege) ſought to make himſelfe an Earle, and marrie his Niece Iaqueline (vtterly againſt her will) and yet to diſpoſſeſſe her of her rightfull inheritance, for which purpoſe he leagued himſelfe with the Cabillantines, and other powerfull friends, who neuertheleſſe were ſlaine in their bolde aduenture at Gorrichome. And, to fruſtrate the Biſhops vaine hope, the Pope diſpenſed her marriage with Iohn Duke of Brabant, albeit he was her neare kinſman, whereby their patrimoniall inheritāces were the more ſtrengthened, and hee acknowledged as their Prince, in Henault, Holland, Zeland, Frizeland, &c. It were needeleſſe heere, to relate the following moleſtations of Iohn of Bauaria the Biſhop, to his Niece Iaqueline, taking on himſelfe the title of Earle, and therefore, (by ſome) rancked among the Earles of Holland, or the after-marriages of Lady Iaqueline; to the Duke of Gloucester, vncle to Henry the ſixt, King of England; the fourth and laſt time (in great priuacy) to Franke of Borſſelle, Lieuteuant of Zeland, or her (no meane troubles) by the Duke of Burgundy, to whom ſhee reſigned vp all her Countries. Let it ſuffiſe, that ſhee liued in continuall vexations n ineteene yeares, and dying at the Hague, was buryed in the Chappell of the Court of Holland.

30 Phillip Duke of Burgundie, beeing (both by father & mother) rightfull heire and ſucceſſour to the aforenamed Counteſſe Iaqueline; was thus entitled: Phillip Duke of Bourgogne, Brabant, and Lembourg; Earle of Flaunders, Artois, Burgogne, Henault, Holland, Zeland, and Namure; Marqueſſe of the holie Empire; and Lord of Friſeland, Salins and Macklyn. Hee had three wiues; by the two firſt hee had no children; but by the laſt, named Iſabell (daughter to Iohn King of Portugall) hee had three ſonnes; Anthony and Ioffe, who dyed yong, and Charles Martin, Earle of Charolois, and ſucceſſour vnto his father. This Phillip of Bourgogne inſtituted the order of Knighthood of the golden Fleece, and had much diſcontent with his ſonne Charles, whom (at length) he marryed to the Lady Margaret, ſiſter to Edward the fourth, King of England. of this Phillip; hee beſieged Callis, ſurprized Luxembourg, ſubdued Liege; and ouercame the Hamecons. Hee exceeded all his predeceſſors (dukes of Burgogn) in riches, Seigneuries, height of Pompe and State. He dyed the fift day of Iune 1467. hauing gouerned about fortie yeares. In his time was the famous Arte of Printing firſt inuented; the men of Harlem in Holland do challenge the firſt honour thereof, but it was reduced to perfection at Mentz, by one Iohn Fauſtus, who had beene ſeruant to Laurence Ianſon of Harlem, as they conſtantly affirme.

31 Charles, ſurnamed the Warlike Duke of Bourgogne, ſucceeded in all his fathers Titles and Dignities. The Inhabitants of Gaunt reſiſting him, he brought them vnder obeiſance, and defeated the Liegeois in battell, which enforced Liege to yeelde to him. He made peace with the French king, who doubted to be detained at Peronne by Duke Charles. Vpon a freſh rebellion of the Liegeois, the duke forced King Lewes to go with him to the ſiege of their town; which he ruined, and practiſed the like to the houſe of Brederode. He warred againſt the Frizons; and carried many Princes in hope of his daughters marriage. The French King, and the Duke, ſought to deceiue each other, and the Conſtable of Saint Paul (waxing hatefull to them both) they reſolued his ruine, and (on a Truce taken for nine yeares, betweene the King and Duke) the Conſtable was beheaded at Paris. The Duke warred againſt the Swiſſes, and was defeated by them, both at Granſon and Morat, wherewith the Swiſſes were enriched. The Duke beſieged Nancie, and was there ſlaine in battell, by the treaſon of the Earle of Campobachio, an Italian; where beeing engirt with a great troupe of Lanciers, he receiued wounds, one in the head, the ſecond in the thigh, and the third in the fundament. Hee left one only daughter and heire.

32 Mary, daughter and heire to Duke Charles, the warrelike Duke of Bourgogne, ſucceeded her father in all his Countries: being but eighteene yeares old when hee was ſlaine before Nancy, wherefore ſhe remained vnder the charge of the Duke of Cleues, and his brother the Lord of Rauenſteine. The French King ſezied Piccardie & Arthois: and ſhe hapning into the Ganthois power, endured much trouble, by putting her chiefeſt ſeruants and councellers to death. The Flemings were defeated, and the yong Duke of Gueldres ſlaine. Afterward, a marriage was concluded betweene Maximilian Arch-duke of Auſtria, ſonne to the Emperor Fredericke, and the Lady Mary of Bourgogne, albeit ſhe would more gladly haue matched with the houſe of Fraunce.

33 Maximilian, Arch-duke of Auſtria, and ſonne to the Emperour Fredericke, marying the Princeſſe Mary of Bourgogne; was thereby wedded to much warre and trouble. For, firſt the Guldres reuolted from the houſe of Bourgogne. Next happned the battell of Guinegate, wherein the Arch-duke was Conqueror: Then, Turnay yeelded to him; truce was taken betweene him and the French King, and the new tumults of the Cabillaux and Hoecks, were alſo by him pacified. Dordrecht was ſurpriſed by the yong lord of Egmont; alſo, many Townes in Gueldres yeelded to the Arch-duke: and (not long after) followed the death of the Arch-dutcheſſe Mary; who had (the firſt yeare of her marriage) a ſonne named Phillip, father to Charles the fift) the ſecond yeare a daughter, called Margaret, betroathed in her infancie, to Charles the Dolphine of Fraunce, ſonne to Lewes 11. and the third yeare, a ſonne named Frances, according to the name of Fraunces Duke of Brittaine his godfather. Maximilian being choſen King of the Romans, he made Engelbert Earle of Naſſau, Gouernour of the Netherlands in his abſence: and afterward, vpon the bold inſolency of the Ganthois and Brugois (keeping the K. of Romans priſoner) Albert duke of Saxony, was made ſecond gouernor of the Netherlands, & General for the Emperor Fredericke againſt the Flemings. But Frederick dying, his ſon Maximilia ſucceeded him in the Empire, by which means Philip of Auſtria, ſonne to Maximilian, inherited his right in Holland, Zeland, Frizeland, &c.

34 Phillip, ſecond of that name, being 16. yeares olde, and ſucceeding his father Maximilian, Emperor in the Netherlands, had theſe Titles: Philippe Arch-duke of Auſtria; Duke of Bourgogne, Lothier, Brabant, Styria, Carinthia, Lembourg, Luxembourg, and Gueldres; Earle of Haſpourg, Flaunders, Arthois, Bourgogne, Ferretto and Kiburch; Palatine of Henault, Holland, Zeland, Namure and Zutphen:

1497. Marqueſſe of the holy Empyre, and of Bourgogn; Landtgraue of Elſaten, Lord of Windiſmarke, Portnean, Salynes, & Macklyn. Vppon his full poſſeſſion of the Netherlands, peace was made between him, and Charles the eight, King of France; war hapning betwixt the Arch-duke and the Duke of Guelders, great inconueniences followed thereon: but Duke Albert being ſlaine before Groningen, the Arch-Duke inherited the Realme of Spain by his wife, being made King of Caſtile, & George duke of Sazony (being then made Gouernor of the Netherlands, for the Arch-duke Phillip) continued the Warres in Frizeland.

1503. For, vpon the death of Iſabell, Queene of Caſtile, Iane her daughter being the onely heyre, and married to the Arch-duke Phillip; ſhe hereby inueſted him in the realms of Spaine, Leon, Granada, &c. as abſolute King. But he enioyed that Dignitie not long: for in the yeare 1506. the 27. day of September, he dyed (ſodainly) in the Citty of Bourgos, ſuſpected to bee poyſoned.

1505. After the death of Phillip King of Caſtile, the Emperor Maximillian took vpon him the gouernmenr of the Netherlandes, as Guardian vnto Charles and Ferdinand, his Grand children, being the ſons of Phillip and Iane, King and Queene of Caſtile.

1506. 35 Charles of Auſtria, ſecond of that name, ſucceeded rightfully in al his fathers Lands and Seigneuries, and by the Emperors appointment, his daughter the Lady Margaret (Dowager of Sauoy, and Aunt to the Princes Charles and Ferdinand) was 1508. Regent of the Low countries. Afterward, Prince Charles took poſſeſſion of the Netherlands, and being crowned K. of Spaine and Arragon, ſoone after followed the 1515. death of the Emperor Maximillian, and in an aſſembly at Francfort, for choyſe of a new Emperor, Charles king of Spaine had free election, by the name of Charles the 5.

1419. Then was Lady Morgaret (widdow both of Caſtile and Sauoy, and Aunt to the Emperor Charles) accepted as ſole gouerneſſe of the Netherlands, in her Nephewes abſence. Troubles hapned in Spaine, by reaſon of the Kings departure thence, & not onely warre in Frizeland, but likewiſe betweene the French and Bourguignons, as alſo the warres of Boores or Peazants in Germany; and the Groningeois reiecting the Duke of Gueldres, did yeild themſelues to the Emperor: then hapned the ſecond bloody edict from the Emperor, againſt the Netherland proteſtants, and then was the imperial diet at Ausbourg, where the proteſtant Princes preſented the confeſſion of their faith. After followed the deuouring inundation in the Netherlandes, and the death of the Lady dowager Margaret, whereby Mary of Auſtria, ſecond daughter to King Phillip, and Queen Iane of Caſtile, ſucceeded in the gouernmentof the Netherlands. War hapned betweene the Emperor and the French king, but vpon the coming of queene Elenor of France to the Emperour her brother, peace was concluded betwixt them.

1520. Lady Margaret ſole gouerneſſe.

1526. 36 While Mary of Auſtria gouernd the Netherlands, for the Emperor Charls her brother, great troubles hapned vnto the Proteſtants, by oppoſition of the Pope & Emperor againſt them. The Emperor affected the Empire for Prince Phillip his ſonne, which bred a quarrell betwixt the Emperor, and his brother Ferdinand king of Hungary, to whom the Princes of the Empire were more enclined, then to Phillip; and then the Proteſtants denied their comming to the Councel of Trent. Philip King of Spaine married Mary queene of England: And not long after, the Emperor reſigned the Netherlands to his ſonne King Phillip (whereby he was reckned the 36. Earle of Holland, Zeland, &c.) and the Empire to his brother Ferdinand, King of the Romans and Hungary, departing out of the Netherlands, to end his dayes quietly in a Monaſtery, not far from Placentia. Reſeruing an hundred thouſand crowns yeerely to himſelfe, employing four thouſand for his dyet and maintenance, appointing the reſt vnto young Maydens marriages, and the releeſe of Widdowes and Orphanes, hee not liuing aboue two yeares after. When not onely happened his death, but likewiſe the deathes of the Queenes Dowagers of France and Hungary, as alſo of Mary Queen of England; after whome, ſucceeded her Siſter Elizabeth. In which time, Emanuell Philebert, Duke of Sauoy, and Prince of Piemont, was Gouernour, and Lieutenant Generall of the Netherlandes, for King Phillip; till the King of Spaines marriage (beeing turned into teares, by the moſt vntimely death of the French King) cauſed Margaret of Auſtria, Baſtarde to the Emperor Charles the fift, and Dutcheſſe of 1568. Now, albeit the tyranny of the Dutcheſſe gouernment in the Low-countries, was more then the people could well endure, yet (to put a ſharpe ſnaffle in their mouths) K. Phillip remoued his Baſtard ſiſter Margaret, & ſent Don Ferdinando Aluares, Duke of Alua, who quickly brought the Netherlands into a moſt pittifull eſtate: making himſelfe ſure of Gaunt, and Count Horne and count Egmont (abuſiuely) made priſoners: he built the Caſtle of Antwerp, where he erected his own proud ſtatue, & proceeded to apprehend the prince of Orange by Commiſſion, ſetting down Articles by the Spaniſh Inquiſition (which were confirmed by the king) to ruinate the Netherlands, vpon which ſoone followed the execution of the ſonnes of Batembourg at Bruſſels, as alſo the Earles of Egmont and Horne. William of Naſſau prince of Orange, was made gouernor of Holland, Zeland & Vtrecht for the States, & proued very fortunate in many attempts againſt the D. of Alua, which made him labour his repeale home into Spaine, with Don Fredericke his ſonne. Don Lewes de Requeſens, the great Commander of Caſtile, was ſent to ſpoyle the dukes place in the Netherlands, for the K. of Spaine, to whom Aluaes former behauior ſerued for an example in his proceeding; and notwithſtanding, his beſieging of Middlebourg (near hand to famiſhmēt) yet was his fleet defeated before his face, and the town yielded vp by Collonell Mondragon, to the Prince of Orange. After many dangerous turmoiles on both ſides, the States ſent to require ſuccour of Elizabeth Q. of England, and ſoone after dyed Don Lewes de Requeſens at Bruſſels; in whoſe roome ſucceeded Don Iohn of Auſtria (baſtard ſonne to the Emperour Charles the fift) as gouernor for K. Philip in the Netherlands, all the Prouinces whereof were vnited at the pacification of Gand; whereupon, the Caſtle was yeelded to the States, and al the Spaniards departed out of Antwerp caſtle, which was alſo deliuered into the States hands. Don Iohn being receiued as Gouernor, he ſought occaſions how to renew warre againſt the prince of Orange, and diuers diſcontentments, as alſo treacherous practiſes, being noted in D. Iohn, the States grew iealous of him, & he was proclaimed the Countries enemy. Then was the Arch-duke Mathias called to bee Gouernor, and while the heart-burnings held betweene Don Iohn and the States, the Duke of Aniou, and Duke Caſimire alſo were required to ſuccour them, but to little effect: for Arthois and Henault, fell from the Netherlands generall vnion, and then folowed the death of Don Iohn of the plague, in the Campe neare vnto Namure.

1578. Then Alexander Farnaſe, Duke of Parma and Placentia, baſtard Nephew to the King of Spaine, ſucceeded Don Iohn in the Netherlands gouernment: Whereupon, a ſtricter vnion (then before) was made betweene the Prouinces at Vtrecht. The D. of Aniou was called to be Protector, and partly Lord of the Countries in the Vnion, which made the King of Spaine proſcribe the Prince of Orange, and ſet his life at ſale, to which proſcription the Prince (in euery poynt) made his iuſt anſwere. Then were valiant and worthie ſeruices performed by ſir Iohn Norris, and Captaine (afterwards) ſir Roger Williams. In the yeare following, the generall Eſtates of the Prouinces, hauing declared Phillip K. of Spaine, ſecond of that name, to be fallen from the Seigneury of the ſayd Prouinces, in regard of his extraordinary and too violent gouernment, againſt their priuiledges and freedoms (ſolemnely ſworne by himſelfe.) In way of right and Armes, took vpon them al the gouernment of the politike Eſtate, & of the religion in thoſe Prouinces, breaking the Kings Seales, abſoluing the ſubiects of their oath to him and cauſing them to take a new oath, for preſeruation of their country, and obedience to the ſaid States. Vpon a bargaine made by the K. of Spaine, to kill the prince of Orange, the ſaid prince was ſhot by one Iohn Iauvregui, a bākerupt-merchants ſeruant, who was inſtātly ſlain, but the prince eſcaped that attempt with life. Afterward he was traiterouſly murdred by Balthazar

Gerard a (high Bourguignion) at Delft in Holland: whereon, Prince Maurice (being his Sonne) succeeded his father in the gouernment. Then followed the siege of Antuerpe, in which time, the States once more, re-commended their cause to the Queene of England: eyther to giue her the full Soueraigntie of the Netherlands, or else to succour and releeue them with her forces, vpon good conditions offered. Her Maiesty graunted to send them assistance, but no soueraignty or protection of them, would she take vpon her: whereupon, certaine cautionarie Townes and Skonces were deliuered vp to her, for repayment of such summes of mony, as should be disbursed by hir, and Articles of couenant set downe betweene them. Also, Robert Lord Dudley, Baron of Denbigh, and Earle of Leicester, was appointed by the Q. of England, to be her Gouernour generall, ouer the English powers in the Netherlands.

1585. The Earle of Leicester.

In the time of the earle of Leicesters gouernement for the Queene, were sundrie worthy seruices performd by the Earle of Essex, sir Iohn Norris, the Lord Willoughby, sir Phillip Sidney, sir William Russell, &c. besides the subtile pretences of sir William Stanley, Rowland Yorke, Patton, and others, who held faire weather with the Earle of Leicester, and had the gouernment of Zutphen skonce, and the strong towne of Deuenter (to the great dislike of the States) yet performed no such matter, as the Earles hope was perswaded of them: for, after the death of that matchles noble Gentleman sir Philip Sidney, he being shot before Zutphen, & therof dying; the Earle of Leicester (being gone for England) both Deuenter & Zutphen Skonce were deliuered vp to the Spaniards, by base corruption of money. And (not long after) the Prince of Parma beleagring Scluice; by composition it was also yielded vp, after it had endured 17000 cannon shot & more. Beside, vpon some discontentment, betweene the Earle of Leicester, and the States; the Queene called home the sayd Earle into England, and the Lord willoughby remained there Generall of the Englisch forces. The sundry worthy seruices, both by him, and the Englisch performed, with the Spanisch vndoubted hopes of Englands Conquest, in the dreadefull yeare, one thousand fiue hundred eightie and eight, Prince Maurice his entrance into the Netherlands regiment, and the Dukes of Parmaes warres in Fraunce; all these do I passe ouer, referring such as desire farther satisfaction therein, to the large Historie of the Netherlands.

1588. Prince Maurice.

The Prince of Parma dying at Arras (after his retreate from Rouen) the second of September, one thousand fiue hundred ninety and two: Maurice of Nassau, borne Prince of Orange, Marquesse of La Vere, and of Flushing, &c. was made great Captaine and Admirall generall of the vnited Prouinces in the Low-countries, by the Estates: and Ernestus, Archduke of Austria, was also made Lieutenant Gouernour, and Captaine generall for Phillip of Spaine.

1592.

Ernestus D. of Austria.

Prince Maurice prouing very successefull in his warrelike attempts, a Renegate or Apostate Priest (in the habite of Souldiet) was corrupted (by the Arch-duke Ernestus) to murther the Prince Maurice at Breda; and, vpon his owne confession thereof, he was executed at the Hage. Afterward, vpon Prince Maurice his valiant surprizall of Gronning, Ernestus had dealt in like maner with a Souldier, named Peter de Four (who had sometime serued in the companie of the Guarde to Prince Maurice) to vndertake the murthering of him at Lillo: the which treason being confessed by the man himselfe, he was executed in the towne of Berghen vp-zoom. Here might be much said of the honorable seruices of sir Frances Vere, and others, but our purposed breuitie is the onely imbarment; and the Netherlands Historie (at large) may thereof discharge me. The Arch-duke Ernestus dyed the twenty one day of February, one thousand fiue hundred ninety and fiue; Mondragons forces defeated by Prince Maurice, and La Motte slaine before Dourlaus: the Estates (vnder the king of Spaine) gladly sought peace with the vnited Prouinces, and sent Articles in writing to Prince Maurice, for consideration of their motion. This was not done, but vpon good aduice in the King of Spaine, perceiuing the Netherlands, and Prince Maurice his great fortunes against him, adding euery day, (more and more) to his vtter abolition thence. Hereupon, Albertus the Cardinall, brother to deceased Ernestus, and Arch-duke of Austria, was sent (by the King) to gouerne there for him; many Easterlings and Netherland therland ſhippes, which had beene ſtayed in Spaine to meete the Indian fleete, were ſodainely releaſed; and Phillip of Naſſau (who is now Prince of Orange and Earle of Buren, that had long time beene reſtrained of his liberty in Spaine) for the better countenancing of th'intended buſines, he likewiſe was ſent along with the Cardinall Albertus.

1596.

The Cardinall being made Gouernour for the King of Spaine, tooke Callice from the French King, as his firſt peece of ſeruice: but for loſſe thereof, he recouered La-fere from the Spaniards. Whereupon, the Cardinall beſieged Hulſt in Flanders, which yeelded in the end: but it was a deare purchaſe to the Cardinall, for this ſiege, (continuing ſome two moneths) coſt him the liues of aboue three-ſcore valiant Captaines, beſides other Commanders, Collonels, and men of marke, and aboue fiue thouſand well approoued ſouldiers.

Hulſt beſiedged.

Then did the King of Spaine diſpenſe with himſelfe for payment of his debts, which made many Merchants in Spaine, Italy, Antwerpe, Amſterdam, and Middlebourg, to become Bankerouts. A league was made betweene the French King, the Queene of England and the States, againſt the Spaniards; and then did Prince Maurice go to Tournhoult, where the Earle of Varax was ſlaine. Amiens alſo was ſurprized by the Spaniards; but ſoone beſieged and recouered by the French King, albeit the Cardinall did offer ſuccour; which proued in vain. Prince Maurice beſieged, and tooke the Townes of Alpen, Meurs, Rhinberg, Groll, Brefort, Enſcheyde, Oldenzeel, Otmarſom, Goot, and Lingen; all which ſeruices he performed in three moneths. Then happened another treacherous plot, againſt the life of Prince Maurice, by perſwaſion of the Ieſuites of Daway, and vndertaken by Peter Panne, a Cowper by trade; but being then a Broker or Bankerout Merchant, who hauing receiued the Sacrament to performe the deede, eyther with knife, ponyard, or piſtoll: the Prouinciall of the Ieſuites made a long Sermon, to encourage him in the action, and aſſuring him of Paradice, if he performed it, vſed theſe words to him beſides; Goe in peace, for thou ſhalt goe like an Angell, in the guarde of God. But the man (being terrified in conſcience) diſcouerd the whole treaſon, without any compulſion, and was therefore executed at Leyden in Holland. The King of Spaine growing weake and ſickely, gaue his Daughter the Infanta, named Iſabella Clara Eugenia, in marriage to the Arch duke and Cardinall Albertus, with tranſaction of the Netherlands and Bourgogne: whereupon he left his Cardinalles habite, and went to fetch the Infanta. Soone after dyed the King of Spaine, on the thirteenth day of September, in the yeare of our Lord God 1598. beeing ſeauentie one yeares olde, and foure moneths.

Then happened the ſiege and memorable battaile of Nieuport, where Prince Maurice tooke diuers Fortes from the Spaniards, and ouerthrew the Arch-dukes Armie, he beeing there in perſon: but gladly fled away, leauing his Armes, Horſſe of Combate, all his Houſhold, Artillery, and baggage behinde him, and loſt ſixe thouſand men, beſides eight hundred taken priſoners, among whom was Don Franceſco de Mendoza, Admirall of Arragon, Marqueſſe of Guadaleſte, and Lieutenant generall of the Arch-dukes Army, who was ledde to Ooſtend; Don Baptiſta de Villa noua, led to Horne in Holland; Don Alonzo Ricquell, to Delft; Don Gonzalo Hernandes de Spinola, to Vtrecht; Don Pedro de Montenegro, to the Hague; Don Pedro de Valaſco, to Berghen, with Don Franciſco de Tarres, and Don Antonio de Mendoza, and Don Pedro de Leuſina, to Enchuiſen: beſides the Archdukes three Pages, Count Carlo Rezi, Don Diego de Guzman, and Mortier: Don Pedro de Monte-maior, his chiefe Taſter; alſo his Phiſition, Barber, Harbinger, Rider, Cook, Porter, Grooms of his Chamber, moſt of the Archers, Halberdiers of his Guarde, and (in a maner) all his houſhold; with three Prieſts or Monkes; forty Auncients, and thirty ſeauen Pentioners, tearmed (by them) Ancients and Sergeants reformed. The occurrences in the following years as the beſiedging of Oaſtend, the enterprize on Fleſſigne, the practiſe to ſacke Antwerpe againe, Graue yeelded vp vnto Prince Maurice; alſo his honorable offers to the towne of Sluice, and it being yeelded to him vpon compoſition, euen in the view of the Archdukes army: they require a larger field of diſcourſe, thē by this breuity can be admitted. Proceed we then to ſpeake of the long continued ſiedge at Oaſtend, which laſting three whol years and eleuen weekes, was at laſt compounded withall, and on the twentie two day of September, 1604. yeelded to the Archduke.

The long ſiege at Oaſtend.

What numbers were ſlain in this long continued ſiege of Oaſt-end, can hardly be gathered, albeit, a note was found in a Commiſſaries Pocket (who had bin ſlain the ſeuenth of Auguſt, 1604. before Oaſtend) wherein were diuers good obſeruations; eſpecially concerning the Arch-Dukes Campe, and alſo what number (of each degree) dyed and were ſlaine therein, during this ſiedge, vntill the yeilding vp thereof, viz) Maſters of the camp ſeuen; Colonels fifteene; Sergeant Maiors twenty nine, Captaines 565. Lieutenants 1116. Enſigns 322. Sergeants 1911. Corporals 1166. Lanſprizadoes 600. Soldiers, 54663. Mariners 611. women and Children, 119. all amounting to 72124. perſons.

The Archdukes loſſe at Oaſtend.

To continue the memory of this long ſiedge, as alſo the winning of Sluice; counters (of Siluer and Copper) were made in the vnited Prouinces, bearing (on the one ſide) the figure of Oaſtend, and on the other, the Towns of Rhinberke, Graue, Sluice Ardenbourg, with the Forts of Iſendyke & Cadſant, with this inſcription round about; Plus triennio obſeſſa, hoſti rudera, Patria quatuor ex me vrbes dedi. Oaſtend being more then three years beſiedged, gaue the enemy an heape of ſtones, and to her Natiue Countrey foure Townes. Another Counter, concerning Sluice, had theſe wordes on the one ſide, Traxit, duxit, dedit, Anno 1604. And with the Armes of Zeland on the other ſide, were theſe words: Beatus populus cuius adiutor Deus. For the following yeares, from 1604. to 1608. I find no eſpeciall or memorable accidents; but an enterprize by Prince Maurice, on the riuer of Scheld and Antwerp, with the taking of the Caſtle of Wouwe, neere vnto Berghen Vpzoome; Spinolas taking of Linghen, with an attempt on Berghen & Groll, taken by compoſition, &c. For a treaty of peace happening betweene England and Spaine, the like alſo chanced to be talked on concerning the Netherlands, and many other meetings were made to bring it to effect. At length it was brought to paſſe, by the labour and endeuor of a Friar (as it was reported) who made manie errands between Spaine and the Netherlands, vntill it was accompliſhed. Since when, nothing hath hapned of any conſequence, but the taking of the Towne of Guliche in Germany, where the Prince Maurice did behaue himſelfe very honorably.

CHAP. I.

Containing, a breefe diſcourſe of the Originall of the Venetians; the foundation of Venice, and how it hath beene gouerned, from the yeare of our Lord, 421. to this inſtant.

HIſtoriographers who haue written of the Venetians, doe not agree together in their true Originall. For ſome doe write, that they are deſcended of the Venetian Gaules, inhabiting along the Ocean ſea in little Britaigne, called Armorica, whereof one of the principall Cities (beeing a Byſhops See) was called Vennes. Others, and (among them) Titus Liuius, born in Padua, aſſures vs, that they came forth of Paphlagonia, and that Philemon their Captaine (being ſlayne at Troy the great) they went with Antenor into Italy. Others write, that this Nation, hauing beene neighbours to the Cappadocians, and venturing fight with the Cimmerians, they hazarded farre further vppon the Adriaticke Sea in their Fortune. The moſt common opinion, is of them, who ſay, that the Hinitians or Henetes came with Antenor; and, in ſometime after (by changing of a Letter) were called Venitians, or Venetes.

People of Paphlagonia.

Firſt of all, they expelled the Euganeans who inhabited this country, between the Adriaticke ſea and the Alpes, and builded the Citty of Padua. Afterward, by ſucceſſe of time, they increaſed in ſuch ſort, as they would not be ſatisfied to be Maſters (onely) of that which had appertained to the Euganeans (conſiſting of thirty foure fayre Cities and Townes;) but inrruded farther, to ſeize on Breſſano and Forli. Some report this Countrey to be bounded with the Riuers of Pau, and that of Adde, as alſo the Lake of Guard, anciently called the Benacke, the Alpes, and the Adriaticke ſea.

People by the inner gulfe of the Adriatick ſea, towardes the Alpes.

And ſo the ancient Venitians in this maner, extended their Dominion, both in longitude and latitude, in the moſt pleaſant Countrey of Italy: but the ſeating of the places did daily beget the elder eſtate of the Venitians hatred. For on the one ſide, the ordinary robberies of the Liburnians, and on the other ſide, the frequent and frightfull courſes of the Barbarians, did hinder them from any long time of continuing in quiet. For, without theſe impeachments, this Nation had bin moſt fortunate, in conquering (by the right of Warre) one of the moſt goodly & beautifull regions in all Italy.

Liburnia, the countrey of Croatia, betweene Iſtria, and Dalmatia.

Now ouer & beſide, that on the ſouth-ſide, it is enuironed with a moſt calme circuite of the ſea, and in regard thereof, is the moſt capable of receiuing al ſtrange Merchandizes: ſo it is likewiſe Watered with very delectable riuers, wherby whatſoeuer commeth from the Sea, is eaſilie tranſported to the very Nauel of the Prouince. It aboundeth in Pooles, Ponds, Forreſts, and vnder-woods, & the whole Land is choiſely fertile in Corne, Wine, Oyle,

The ſituation of Venice; & capacity therof.

Oyle, and all kindes of fruites. It is alſo plentifully ſtored with Countrey houſes, Townes, Cities, and Villages, Caſtles, Fortes, and ſuch like, verie commendable for the ſcituation & encloſure of their Walles.

Theſe new inhabitants, when their weake eſtate beganne to grow in fayrer forme: they were ſildom exempted from the Warres and incurſions of ſtrangers. For, after many bolde inſolencies of the Barbarians, with continued Warres againſt each other, euen from their verie beginning, vntill the time of Attila: they were yet much more dreadfully encumbred, with the furious aſſault of the Goths, a Tempeſt farre exceeding in turbulency, all other former diſaſters happening vnto them whatſoeuer. For firſt, the Hunnes (a people of Scythia, dwelling neere to the Riphean Mountaines) conducted by Attila, the Sonne of Mandlucke, diſperſed themſelues ouer Italy, and making horrible ſpoile whereſoeuer they went, fell into the Prouince belonging to the Venitians. After a long ſiedge, they tooke the Citty of Aquilea, and ſpoyled and burnt it wholly. In like manner did they alſo ruinate the two Citties of Concordia and Altina, and almoſt all the Venitian region.

Mountains in the north part of Scythia, where ſnow lieth continually.

An ancient Citty in that part of Italy, called Forum Iulij.

At the feareſull newes of this Warre, the Venitians were more amazed then any other, and ſo much the rather, becauſe they had beene formerly inured, to ſuſtaine their cheefeſt miſhappes amongeſt the Barbarians. Whereupon it is ſaid, that (euen then) a great number of perſons withdrew themſelues from the firme Land, to the Iſles where Venice at this inſtant is builded: haſting thither from all other parts, eſpecially vppon the arriuall of this cruell enemy Attila.

The firſt foundation of Venice.

Some (of the better ſort of Padua) firſt beganne the retreate, and being come to the entrance or iſſue of the Riuer, which was then very deepe (whence the name of Rialto hath remaind to the ſame place, as deriued of the word Riuealto) they there laide the firſt foundation of the Cittie of Venice.

Little Iſlands in the ſea, and neere adioyning.

The meaner people of Padua, enforced by the ſelfe-ſame feare; fled thence, and beganne to people themſelues in Chioggia, Malamocco, and Albiola. Som of them of Aquileia (at the ſame time) betooke themſelues to the Marſhes or Fennes of Grada; and, vpon the freſh returne of Attila, the people ran (in mighty affluence) along the Coaſtes to the Neighbouring Iſles. They of Aquileia beſtowed themſelues in Grada, a place neereſt vnto firme land, yet engirt with Waters. They that fledde from Concordia, made vſe of Coarli and the Attinois, ſixe little Iſlands neere to one another, which they gaue names vnto, acording to the names of the gates of their former loſt and ruined Citties: to wit, Torcello, Maiorbo, Buriano, Muriano, Amiana, and Conſtantiaco.

The prime eſtate of the place where Venice now ſtandeth.

Theſe ſeuerall places, where at this preſent the Citty of Venice is ſeated, were (in elder times) very ſtraight or narrowe Iſlands, and neere vnto each other; ſauing onely that they were ſeparated by the pleaſing courſe of Riuers, which ranne into, and returned againe from the Sea, according to the changes of his fluxe and refluxe. Nor in theſe ſtraights were then any dwellings to bee diſcerned, but onely of Sea-Fowles, that flew thither from the Seas, to diſport themſelues vppon the Sunny bankes; and Fiſher-men likewiſe, would ſometimes there put in for harbour.

The firſt builders of Venice, and at what time.

The Paduans, that tooke vp the Rialto, were the firſt that beganne to builde, and it was in the very ſame place, where the firſt foundation of the Citty was layde: Namely, the fiue and twentieth day of March, in the yeare of our Lord, 421. and ſecond yeare of the reigne of Pharamond, firſt King of the Gaules or French-men; in the time alſo of Pope Boniface the firſt, and of the Emperour Honorius. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that at one and the ſelfe-ſame time, began both the kingdome of France and the Commonwealth of Venice. And that both the one and the other haue continued to this preſent, for twelue hundred yeares, very little, either more or leſſe.

Their firſt buildings deſtroyed by fire

This Citty ſo newly begun, encreaſed dayly both in people and buildings. But ſee what happened vppon a ſodaine, a Greeke Carpenters houſe (or rather hee was one of the Shipwrights, named Entinopus) falling on fire; conſumed in a moment (with a violent & continuall embracing) 24. faire new built houſes. Which when theſe new come inhabitants perceiued, & fearing that heauen was offended with with this their manner of beginning, forgetting God, and seruing their owne appetites. They fell all to prayer, and made a solemne vow, to build a Church in the honour of God, and in memory of the Apostle Saint Iames; at which verie instant time, a mighty tempest of rain (as sodainly fell) whereby the rest of the new begun City was happily preserued.

That Church is yet at this day plainely to be discerned, with the markes and appearances of great antiquity, euen in the very midst of the Rialto: And it was then consecrated by foure Byshops, to wit; Seuerianus byshop of Padua; Ambrose, Byshop of Altina; Iocundus, byshop of Treuisa and Epodius, byshop of Vderzo, and a Priest was there appointed, to performe diuine Seruice.

The first Church built in Venice.

The first foundations of this Famous Citty, were men of honest repute, Noble, and rich. For the ancient Venitians, at the chaunge of their abiding, brought vvith them thither their wiues and childrē, with the very wealthiest moueables which they had, and so (at leysure) withdrew themselues, to places of a more secure dwelling. But being impeached (by incursions of the Hunnes) to Till the groundes vpon the sea Coasts; such as had any meanes or apt commodity: gaue themselues to fighting, and to make salt, or to transport the goods of their neighbors; esteeming the benefit thereby gotten, to be no more dishonest or vnbefitting, then to plough and husband the grounds of others.

Noble & rich men the first Founders of Venice.

As for the wealthier sort, they addicted themselues to traffick Merchandizes with strangers, and by their frequent aduenturing into diuers Countries, some of them being very skilfull Miners, and well experienced in the triall of seuerall Oares or Mettals hidden in the ground, which by industry and endeuour they found in the earth, became Finers or Tryers of those Mettals, and extracted (from the grosser substances) the purer perfections of Gold and Siluer, whereby, in theyr owne Language, they were termed Orifici, deriued of the Latine word Aurifex, Gold-smithes, or Hammer men, that (of those refined Mettals) could frame Cups, Pots, Rings, Basons, Ewres, or any other needful matter whatsoeuer, both for the seruice of God in Churches and Temples, and for the royalty of Emperors, Kings, & Princes. So that, by the consent of diuers good Authors, as Liuie, Florus, Cassidorus, Trogus Pompeius, and others, the first Gold-smiths, workers in Gold and Siluer, and framers of those excellent mettalles into such orderly meanes for vse (within the parts of Europe) liued in Venice, whereas yet (to this day) do remaine the very best ingenious, and perfect workmen for such matters (according to the iudgement of many) that are to be found in any part of the world. Concerning such as remained more ordinarily at home, for care & safety of the Citty; they applyed their spirits, to deuise good lawes and customs for generall benefit. During which time, such was their due respect of iustice, & so precise care of equity and right to all men; as among so great a number of people, there could not bee any disorderly differences noted.

The first gold smiths known in Europ, wer in Venice.

Care of iustice and common good.

Catholike religion they so singularly commended, and the dayly presence of some reuerend Prelates, who had saued themselues with their Compatriots; that it augmented (among them) a common affection to piety. And their assistance appeared verie requisite, not onely for the ministry of holye Offices; but also for retention of the inhabitants of this new City, in ancient piety and religion. Fearing least they might be infected with the poison of Arrian heresie; because nothing els made more spoile and hauock through all the Prouince, except the weapons of the Gothes and Hunnes.

Loue of religion in especial respect.

Such was the beginning of the City of Venice, and in such manner of liuing, and in such exercises shee spent her first infancy; till (by her vertues) shee attained vnto greater groweth, and grounded her selfe in her instant state and condition. It hath constantly bene held, that this Common-wealth (euermore) retained that forme of gouernment, which is termed Aristocratia, that is, that the most noble and worthiest Citizens should guide and gouern. For, although it be saide, that it hath bene gouerned first by Consuls, then by Tribunes, and lastly by Dukes, and Maisters of warlike power: yet notwithstanding, all these dignities, being but electiue, and not hereditary, the election should (in right) appertain to the most Noble Islanders, and Gentlemen of name, by whose aduice the Common-wealth ought to be mana-managed, euen as it hath bin, and ſtil continueth to this day.

The gouernement of Conſuls, and who were the firſt in Venice.

Conſuls, to the number of three, were choſen for two yeares, and albeit that this kinde of Gouernment laſted for about the ſpace of threeſcore yeares, yet wee finde onely but three conſecutiue or ſucceeding elections of them. The firſt Conſuls, were Albertus Phalarius, Thomas Candianus, and Zeno Daulo. Theſe men firſt gouerned the Citty in her Nonage, & ſome are of the minde, that they were the firſt Authors of the Paduans flight, and their retirement to the Lakiſh or Mariſh Iſles, as alſo of their firſt building there. The ſecond Conſuls, were Lucianus Graulus, Maximus, or Marinus Lucius, and Hugo Fuſcus. The third, were Marcus Aurelius, Andreas Claudius, and Albinus Maurus. The names of ſuch as were elected after theſe, are not to bee found in anie Hiſtories.

The creation of Tribunes, and what they were.

After, that the Iſles (about the Rialto were filled with inhabitants: in ſtedde of Conſuls, Tribunes were created, and for their creation, the matter was firſt debated priuately by few people, afterward, it was ordained and reſolued in open aſſembly of the Iſlanders: that in each Iſle there ſhould be a Tribune, and hee ſhould bee a yearly Magiſtrate, to render Iuſtice to the Cittizens, and with ſeuerity, to puniſh their offences. But the remaynder which concerned the generalitie of the Common-weale: was referred to the generall aſſembly of the Iſlanders, to bee by them determined. Afterward, there was but one Tribune created for gouernment of the Iſles, which continued for ſome yeares. Finally, they concluded to create ten, wherunto were added two more, who ſhould dwell in Heraclea; & this Tribunary dignity held place for more then two hundred yeares. Heere is to bee noted, that the Tribunes of the Iſles, abuſing their authorities, did ſo trouble the State with ciuill diſſentions, as it plainly appeared, that the maine body of the Cittie would be diſſolued, without ſome good and immediate remedy. Which gaue occaſion, that (to hear the complaints of euery one) a general aſſembly of the Iſles was publiſhed, and their meeting to be in Heraclea.

In this aſſembly, Chriſtophero byſhop of Grada was Preſident, accompanyed with a great number of the Cleargie, and after diuine ſeruice was performed, the firſt propoſition which he made, was, that (for good of the Common-wealth, each man might complaine of the future Tribune, which being done, and the offences no longer to be endured, for publike benefit of the ſtate in generall, reſolution was ſet downe, to make election of a Duke, who ſhould repreſent all honor and Maieſty in the State or Seigneury, & he ſhold haue power to aſſemble the general counſell, when queſtions were to be made, of any important matter concerning the Commonwealth. He ſhould haue power alſo, to elect yearely Tribunes or Magiſtrates in euery Iſle, and their appellations to bee brought before him. Moreouer, if any ſhould obtaine any dignity, Prelacie, or Benefice, by ſuffrages of the Clergy or people: that he ſhould not enioy it, or be poſſeſſed therof, without the good liking and conſent of the Duke, whoſe power alſo ended with his life.

Who was the firſt Duke of Venice.

This being thus concluded, in the year 697. Paullucio was created the firſt Duke; and ſo hath that Ducall dignity continued euer ſince. Saue onely that in the yeare 737. after the death of the third Duke Orſo, it was determined, that no duke ſhold be elected, for ſix yeares, but that a Maſter of the armed troopes or Souldiours ſhould be eſtabliſhed, and his Authoritie to be annuall; which laſted no longer then fiue yeares. For in the year, 742. they proceeded againe to a Dukes election; and ſince that time, the Common-wealth of Venice hath euermore had Dukes & Princes of the Seigneury; by whoſe wiſedome (and his counſell aſſiſting) it hath bin preſerued in an euer flouriſhing eſtate, euen to this inſtant yeare, 1619.

CHAP. II.

A ſhort Summary, of the liues of the Dukes and Princes of Venice: And a breuiate alſo of the moſt remarkeable actions, in the times of their Gouernment.

PAuluccio Annapeſto, was firſt Duke of the people, choſen in Heraclea. He took his his Oath before Christophero, Patriarke of Grada, to gouerne according to the lawes, & to regard nothing more then the weale publike. He pacified the difference which Luitprand, king of the Lombards had with K. Aribert, and made friendſhip with them both: as well by his authority, as by arms. He brought the rebellious Aquileians vnder obedience, encreaſed the Citties cuſtomes and reuenews, and dyed, hauing beene Duke twenty yeares, ſixe moneths, and eight dayes.

2 Marcello Tegaliano, of the ſame place of Heraclea, was elected his ſucceſſour, by common voyce of the people. He was deuoute, modeſt and affable; but much leſſe diligent in gouerning, then his predeceſſour. The Patriarchat of Grada was tranſferred into Aquileia in his time, by Luitprand, and there hee had great warres, about the diſſentions of the Biſhops, wherinto he would not interpoſe himſelfe, but dyed, hauing beene Duke nine yeares, and twenty one dayes.

3 Orſo Hipato, a nobleman of Heraclea, wonne himſelfe great reputation by his famous deedes. Paulo the Exarcho had recourſe to him, the Gracian Armie beeing broken, and ſiege layd to Rauenna by Luitprand. He re-gained Rauenna, made the Kings nephew his priſoner, ſlew the duke of Vicenza, and reſeated the Exarcho in his due rights. Hee brideled the Aquileians, who troubled the publike peace, and put corage into the ſoules of the yonger ſort. He was ſlaine, by reaſon of the diſſentions of Ieſolo, the eleauenth yeare, and fift moneth of his Principality.

4 Theodato Hipato, ſonne of Orſo, was proclaimed Duke 5. yeares after the death of his father: during which time, the people were gouerned by a Marſhall or Maiſter of the Souldiers: and forſaking Heraclea, he brought the State to Malamocco. There he was the firſt created, and limited his Confines with Aſtolpho King of the Lombards. He was alſo ſlayne by Galla a Cittizen of Malamocco, in the thirteenth yeare of his Principalitie.

5 Galla de Malamocco, a wicked and ſeditious man, yet ſhewing himſelfe as Protector of publique peace, was eſtabliſhed in the place of Theodato. But his wickednesſe being knowne, and that (being but a ſubiect) he would needs make himſelfe abſolute Lord, hauing before ſlayne his chiefe Maiſter Theodato: the people plucked out his eyes, and tooke from him the Dignitie, which hee had a yeare vſurped.

6 Dominico Monegario, of Malamocco, was ſeated in the ſteade of Galla. Somewhat to bridle this Dukes authoritie, the people ioyned two yearely Tribunes with him. But he, being a man audacious and arrogant, ſought to tyrannize ouer the people: whereat they growing into furie, pluckt out his eyes, the eight yeare of his Principalitie.

7 Mauritio Galbaio, a noble Heraclean, for his iuſtice, wiſedome, and wealth, was choſen to this dignity. He made his ſonne Duke with him, and they gouerned together. In his time, the Church of Grada being moleſted, he ſent an Ambaſſadour to Pope Stephen, to accord the difference. The Biſhopricke of Saint Peter de Caſtello Oliuolo, was then erected. And he died, hauing gouerned twenty three yeares.

8 Giouanni Galbaio, hauing bene Duke nine yeares with his father, gouerned the Commonwealth yet nine yeres more, and after the ſayd time, hee made Mauritio his ſonne, companion with him in the Principality. But they being both of vnſufferable and wicked life, hauing murthered Iohn Patriarchat of Grada, throwing him downe headling from an high tower: Fortunatus, ſucceſſour in the Patriarchate, made a conſpiracie againſt them, and another was elected Duke. Whereat, being not a little confounded, the father fled into Fraunce, and the ſonne to Mantua, the ſixteenth yeate of their rule.

9 Obelerio, being elected Prince by them that had intelligence with Fortunatus, tooke his brother Beato as his aſſociate, and Valentine beſide (being their third brother) was admitted with them in the ſame dignitie. And it is worth the noting, that of theſe three brethren, Beato is onelie placed in the ranke of Dukes in the Counſell chamber of Venice; whereas Obelerio incited Pepin King of Italy, to make warre on the Venetians: and Beato maintaind the Common-wealth, raigning fiue yeares.

10 Angelo Participatio, after he had wel borne himſelfe in the warre againſt Pepin, was elected Duke, the people being ſummond to the Rialto. He founded the Dukes palace, in the ſame place where that now built, ſtandeth. The diuiſion of the Empire was made in his time, and the Venetians left in their owne liberty. The Citie was diuided into wards, ſtreets, and precincts. The Pregadi, and the Quaranta, who (for criminall offences) was then inſtituted among them. He gouerned 18. years.

11 Giuſtiniano Participatio, hauing beene an aſſociate in the dignity with his father, was (after his death) confirmed by the people. Hee repealed home his brother Iohn, who was then at Conſtantinople, & accepted him as his fellow ruler: hee made the peoples authority greater then before, & gaue ayde to Michael the Emperor againſt the Sarazins. The body of Saint Marke was in his time brought from Alexandria, accepting it into his protection, and the Church remaining at this day, was conſecrated in his memory. He died the ſecond yeare of his dignity.

13 Giouanni Participatio, remained in the royalty, and enlarged the Church of S. Marke, placing therein a great number of Prieſts and Canons, & appointing a Primicerio to gouerne them. Hee cauſed the head of Obelerio to be cut off, whome hee had beſiedged in the Iſle of Curtia. He made war vpon the Nauratines, and ouercame them. In the end, a conſpiracy was deuiſed againſt him, and beeing confined to Grada, in the eight yeare of his Principality; he ſhaued his head and beard, and made himſelfe a Monke, in which eſtate he dyed.

12 Pietro Tradonico of Pola, hauing carried himſelfe to the peoples contentment in the warres againſt Pepin, was elected Duke. He ioyned Iohn his ſon in rule with him, and gaue ſuccour to the Emperor of Conſtantinople, who made requeſt thereof by Theodoſius Patricius. He was made Protoſpotary of the Empire: in help whereof, he ſent 60. Gallies. Lewes 2. granted him many priuiledges, and in the end, hee was ſlaine by a ſedition, in his 27. yeare.

14 Orſo Participatio hauing appeaſed the ſedition, was made Du. The Turks hauing ſpoiled Dalmatia, euen ſo far as Grada, wer vanquiſhed by him and Giouanni Participatio his ſon, whom he made aſſociat with him in his gouernment. Baſilius the Emperor, highly honoured him for that good ſeruice, and made him Protoſpatary of the Empire. He gouerned 17. yeares.

15 Giouanni Participatio, beingconfirmed in his dignity, tooke and burned Comachio, waſted the County of Rauenna, to reuenge himſelf on the Count of Comachio, who had impriſoned and wounded vnto death his Brother Bradoario. He growing much ouercome with ſickneſſe, cauſed the Church of Saint Cornelius, and S. Cyprian to be built at Malomocco; and hauing gouerned fiue yeares, and ſixe moneths, renounced the Dignity.

16 Pietro Candiano, was elected after the voluntary diſmiſſion of his Predeceſſour. He was a valiant man, and verie expert in Armes; and yet notwithſtanding, greatly addicted to deuotion. He went (in perſon) with ten Gallies againſt the Nauratines, who (as Theeues) robbed and purloyned from the Venitians. Fighting valiantly againſt them, hee dyed at the ſecond time, with the Weapons in his handes. He gouerned no longer then fiue moneths.

Dominico Tribuno, is ſet (by ſome) in ranke with the Dukes: but others, leſſe curious in ſearch of the Hiſtory, haue omitted him; becauſe he was duke but three moneths, and thirteene dayes, and nothing is remarkeable in his time, but a certaine priuiledge, granted by him to Chioggia.

17 Pietro Tribuno, ſonne of Dominico, was elected Duke. He obtained of Guydo, Emperour and King of Italy, a confirmation of all ancient Priuiledges. The Barbarian Hunnes came againe into Italy, and burned Heraclea, Capo de Argier, and Chioggia. This Prince ouercame them, with very much honour: and this was the third time, that thoſe Strangers ſought to vſurp on that State. He gouerned twenty foure yeares.

18 Orſo Badoaro, called himſelfe Participatio, and was the firſt that chaunged his name. He ſent for his ſonne Pietro to Conſtantinople, and hee was made Protoſpatarie. In the yeare nine hundred and twentie, hee obtained of Rodulphus, Emperour and King of Italy, the confirmation of the Venitians ancient authoritie, to ſtampe Moneyes. Hee addicted himſelfe wholly to piety, and in his 20. yeare, he renounced the Dignitie, to make himſelfe a Monke, and liue priuately.

19 Pietro Candiano the ſecond, was a worthy man, and made Warre on Lauterio, Marqueſſe of Iſtria, who hindred the Traffick of the Venitians. He ouercame him him, and re-conquered the people of Capo d'Istria. He vanquished Albertus, sonne to the Emperor Berengarius, who impatronizing himselfe of Rauenna, impeached the passage of the Venitians shippes. In his time, Maidens were stollen by the Testaines, to ioyn in marriage with them; but they were soone recouered. He gouerned seuen yeares.

20 Pietro Badoaro, the sonne of Orso, was redeemed by him from the Sclauonians. He gouerned but two yeares and seuen moneths, alwayes in peace, which he much affected. Berengarius the Emperor did him many fauours, for his great deserts.

11 Pietro Candiano the third, sonne to the second Candiano, associated himselfe in his dignity with his sonne Pietro: and at two seuerall times armed three & thirty Shippes against the Narentines; but at the second time, he made peace with thē. His sonne being reproued by him for his bad behauiour; reuolted from him, and against the Common-wealth. The people would haue slaine him, but hee was sent thēce into exile: wher ioyning with Guydo, sonne of Berengarius, hee endangered the Commonwealth: whereat his Father greeuing, died in his fifteenth yeare of gouernment.

22 Pietro Candiano the fourth, being repealed from exile (albeit the people had sworne neuer to receiue him) was made Prince with very great applause. He dealt in such sort with Pope Iohn the twelfth, that the Churche of Grada was made Patriarchall, and Metropolitane of all the Venitians State, and of Istria. Otho the Emperor, granted him many honourable priuiledges. He rnined Vderzo, and was slaine with his Sonne in a sedition of the people, hauing gouerned about twentie yeares.

23 Pietro Orsoolo, was a man altogither deuout, and was elected by the people against his will. He would very often walk in an vnknowne habit, to visit the houses of poore people and Hospitals. Hee appeased the dissentions between the Venitians, and them of Capo d'Istria, who yeilding themselues tributary; hee went with Beato Romualdo of Rauenna, to liue Religiously. He gouerned two years and two months, doing many worthy and charitable deeds.

24 Vitale Candiano, Sonne of Pietro the third, made the confederacy with the Emperour Otho. He fell sicke so soone as hee entred vppon his charge: wherefore hee became a Monke, hauing gouerned about a yeare.

25 Tribuno Memo, was very rich, but no man of State. In his time happened great dissentions, betweene the families of Moresina and Calloprina; by reason whereof, many notorious murthers were committed. He tooke part with the Morisini, which caused the faction to withdraw themselues to Verona, to the Emperor Otho. He gaue the Isle of S. Giorgio Maggiore to the Abbot of Moresini: and renounced the Principality in his twelfth yeare, entering into Religion.

26 Pietro Orseolo the second, beeing a very discreete man, ordered the matter so well with the Emperours Basilius and Alexius: that the Venitians were exempted from Tolles and Taxations. Otho the Emperour lying at Verona, did highly fauour him; and, among other graces, to holde one of his sonnes at Baptisme. Hee was the first that extended their Confines on the Sea, winning many places in Istria and Dalmatia. Hauing caused the Church and Pallace to be finished in his time, hee dyed in the eighteenth yeare of his Principality.

27 Ottone Orseolo, hauing Gouerned some space with his father Pietro, was confirmed in the dignity, at the age of eighteene yeares. He wunne such reputation, that Geta King of Hungaria, gaue him one of his Sisters in marriage. In person he conquered them of Istria, who vvere become Rebelles; and went into Dalmatia, in the enterprize agaynst Cresmura. At length, the malicious enuiers of his glories, deuised a Conspiracie agaynst him, vppon the which, he was confined into Greece, in the seuenteenth yeare of his rule.

28 Pietro Centranico, or Barbolano, succeeded next to Otho. But hauing not well qualified all dissentions, as well concerning the Cittizens remooving, as the other Neighbours; he was compelled to forsake the dignity, and make himselfe a Monke. Orso, Brother of Otho, returned from Constantinople, beeing Patriarche of Grada, and he was constituted in expectation of Othos cōming. He continued about a yeare in the Palace, and forſooke the Principality, newes being brought of Othos death. Dominico Orſeolo would then perforce vſurp the dignity; but he was expelled by the people the next morning, & died at Rauenna.

29 Dominico Flabanico, was elected during his exile, by the faction of them that had excluded Dominico Orſeolo. In his time and in the year 1040. the national Councell was held, for gouernment of the Eccleſiaſtickes. He made the family of Orſeolo ſuſpitious to the State, by his owne meanes, and laboured for their vtter ſupplantation. He gouerned ten yeares, foure months, and twelue dayes.

30 Dominico Contarini was verie pleaſing to the people. He brought Dalmatia to peace, beeing heauily burthened vvith the rebellion of Zara. Hee fauoured the Normans againſt Robert King of Apulia. And the diſcord which hapned betweene the Common-wealth, and Pepo, Patriarch of Aquileia, was by him qualifyed. Hee builded the Monaſterie on the Lido, and dyed in the eight and twenty yeare of his Principality.

31 Dominico Silino, won himſelfe ſuch reputation, that Nicephorus, Emperour of Conſtantinople, gaue him his ſiſter in marriage; by whoſe perſwaſion, he made war vpon the forenamed King Robert of Apulia, and (at the firſt attempt) returned with a very honourable victory, poſſeſſing himſelfe of Duras. But at his ſecond aduenture, hee fought with ſmall aduantage; whereby enſued the diminution of his credit. He pergetted the Church of Saint Marke with Marble, firſt and before any other, cauſing it alſo to be beautified with an artificiall Checker.worke. He died in the thirteenth yeare of his gouernement.

32 Vitale Faliero being made Duke, he immediately obtained of Alexius, then Emperour, to haue the ſoueraigntie of Dalmatia and Croatia. Henry, ſucceſſor in the Empire, did him many great fauors: and comming in deuotion to Venice, hee helde one of his daughters at Baptiſme. The Office of proprieties was conſtituted in his time, and the workemanſhip of S. Markes Church continued. He died in his ſixteenth yeare.

33 Vitale Michele, by his worthy aduenturing on the ſea, did very farre extend the Commonwealths limites. Hee made the Eaſterne warre (by the perſwaſion of Pope Vrban the ſecond) for Conqueſt of the Holy Land, with the Princes of Chriſtendome. The Iſle of Smyrna, Suria, and Ieruſalem were then recouered from the Infidels. He died in his ſixt yeare.

34 Ordelaſo Faliero, ſonne of Vitale, aſſiſted King Baldwine againſt the Infidels in conqueſt of the holy Land: and made ſuch progreſſion, as they deuided the Empire betweene them, thoroughout all the kingdome of Iudea. In the 8. yeare of his Principality, Malomocco was almoſt al burned and ſubmerged; by reaſon whereof, the Epiſcopal See was transferred to Chioggia. He went in perſon to the Warre againſt Zara, which was becom rebellious, and winning the victory: he would needs returne thither againe a ſecond time, and on the like occaſion; where hee died in Armes, in the fifteenth yeere of his Principality.

35 Dominico Michele, being made Duke for his high repute and merite, went to giue aide to the Chriſtians in the Holie Land. With 200. well appointed ſhippes and Gallies, he made the Infidels to raiſe their ſiedge from before Ioppa. Hee tooke Tyre, which he gaue to Vaumoud Patriarch of Ieruſalem. Emanuel the Emperor made war againſt him, frō whom he won Chio, Rhodes, Samos, Mitylline, and Iſter. He renounced his principality, in the 13. yeare of his rule.

36 Pietro Polani, kinſman ro Michele, was a very wiſe man, inſomuch as he was made Arbitrator of the diffrence, betweene Conrade and Emanuel the Emperour. Hee made war againſt them of Piſa & Padua, whom he conquered. He armed himſelfe againſt the Duke of Apulia, in behalfe of the ſame Emanuell, to whoſe Empire hee added many worthy poſſeſſions'. Some ſay, it was his ſonne that won all the battailes, and that himſelfe being falne ſicke, returned thence, and dyed in his 18. yeare of rule.

37 Dominico Moreſini, hee ſwept the Gulfe of certaine Pyrats of Ancona, the cheefe whereof beeing called Guiſcardo, was taken and hanged. Hee layed ſiedge vnto Pola, which he tooke, with Parenzo; which Cities were become rebellious in Iſtria. He held confederacy with William king of Sicily, of whom hee obtayned many many exemptions for the Trafficke of his Merchants. Zara made the Metropolitane Cittie (at his instance) and hee so preuayled, that Dominico his Sonne was made an Earle. Hee beautified the Buildinges of the Cittie of Venice, and began the Tower of Saint Marke. He dyed seauen moneths after the eight year of his Election.

38 Vitale Michele the second, subdued the Tarentines, which now had rebelled the third time. He imprisoned Vtrich, Patriarch of Aquileia, and twelue Chanons. In an hundred dayes, he put forth an hundred Gallies, and twentie Shippes on the Sea, against the Emperor Emanuell. The great Family of the Iustiniani, were, in his time brought to one onely man, and hee was become Religious; whom hee tooke foorth of his Monastery (by the Popes consent) and gaue him his owne daughter in marriage, becausehee woulde not haue so worthy a house to be extinct. Ther hapned a great Pestilence in his time, the occasion whereof, the people (in theyr weake iudgment) laid vpon him. He was wounded, and dyed, hauing gouerned seuenteene yeares, and xxvii. daies.

39 Sebastiano Ziani, was the first that euer was elected by the eleauen Electors. In his time there was a great Schisme in the Church, by meanes of the Emperour Fredericke Barbarossa, who caused Alexander the third to forsake the See, Octauian hauing bene made Anti-pope, Alexander made his retirement to Venice, where hauing a long time serued in the Monastery of La Charita; he was in the end knowen, and taken thence by the Prince and Seigneury. Heereupon, Barbarossa made warre against the Venetians: but his sonne Octauian being taken, he mediated reconciliation betweene them. He died in the fift yeare of his gouernment.

40 Orio Malipiero, or Mastropetro, was the first Duke elected by the forty; and for that purpose was created by the death of Ziani. Hee had sixe Councellors allowed him to authorize his deliberations. He reconquered Zara, that had now the fourth time rebelled. Hee sent supply vnto the Christians against the Moores, who began to vsurpe in the holy Land 88. yeares after that Baldwine had deliuered it. Ptolomais was recouered, and Andronicus, successor to Emanuell the Emperor; deliuerd many Venitian Marchants. Hee renounced the Principality in his 14. yeare, and entred into Religion.

41 Henrico Dandolo was likewise elected by the forty. They of Zara were once againe vanquished, and Pola conquered. In his time was the surprizall of Constantinople, & the acquisition of the East Empire, wherein hee assisted the Princes and French Barons. He died in his thirteenth yeare, being Generall of all the Christian Army.

42 Pietro Ziani, sonne of Sebastian, was made Duke within a while after the death of Dandolo, the Correctors beeing then first instituted. In his time came Ambassadors from Athens and Achaia, to submit themselues in obedience to the Common wealth. Candia was then peopled with a Colony of noble Venitians. He marryed Constance, daughter to Tancred K. of Sicily. In the end, he renounced the Principality, hauing gouerned 24. yeares.

43 Giacomo Tiepolo, was made Duke by chance, in concurrency of Renieri Candolo, who had as many voices as he. Candie rebelled, and the seditious were seuerely chastised. Zara, that had long borne the yoke, was now reduced vnder obedience. He had Warre against them of Ferrara, and against Ezzelino, who would haue inuested himselfe with Padua. In conclusion, he gaue ouer the Principaly in his 20. yeare, and died soone after.

44 Marino Moresini, was made Duke by the one and fortith, by reason of the precedent concurrence. In his time was another Courtly Noble-man sent into Candie, who builded the Canea. He made Warre against Ezzelino, who besiedged Mantua, and who (in a furious rage) caused 1200. Paduans to be hewne in peeces, which he had with him then in his armie. He died in the 4. year of his Principality.

45 Reineri Zeno Podesta at Bermoge, was elected Duke, and sent to be fetcht thence with foure Gallies. Vnder him, the Commonwealth wonne a famous victorie, against them of Genes: but the contentment therewith was very breefe, because Michaell Paleologus, expelled both the French-men and Venitians out of Constantinople, being ayded by the Geneway forces, which was eight and fifty yeares after the surprizing of the sayde Cittie: yet once more (after that) the selfesame people were againe reconquered: and hauing gouerned this dignity 16. yeares, he dyed.

46 Lorenzo Tiepolo was made Duke, in memory of the victory hee had againſt them of Genes at Tyre. Hee allyed two of his ſonnes (verie Nobly) with two ſtrange Ladies: by reaſon whereof, a Lawe was then made, that the like might not be afterward done. He brought Sernia in obedience to the Common-wealth, and the Bolognians were vanquiſhed by him: hee gouerned ſeuen years, and fiue and twenty dayes.

47 Giouanni Contarini, being aged eightie yeares, and Atturney of S. Mark, was made Duke. The law againſt illegittimates was then enacted, and they excluded from all publike Offices. There were ſome rebellions moued in Iſtria, and by them of Genes; but they were quickely appeaſed. At length, thorough vnwelidineſſe of age, and by aduice of the Senat, hee gaue ouer the dignity, hauing gouerned in this authority, foure yeares, and ſix moneths.

48 Giouanni Dandolo was elected, being then abſent. The Citty was (in his time) much afflicted by water, & an earthquake. He made warre in Iſtria, againſt the Patriarch of Aquileia, and the Count of Goritia. At the inſtance of Pope Nicholas, he aſſiſted the Archbyſhop of Tripoli with 25. Gallies. He died ſeuen monthes after his eight yeare of rule.

49 Pietro Gradanigo, a man of great corage, deliuered the Common-welth from two important dangers. One, was a high diſgrace, which happened in a battell againſt them of Genes. The other was the conſpiracie of Baiamonte, which was boldly checked with weapon in hand, vppon the place of S. Marke. It was then ordayned, that Noblemen onely ſhould gouerne, and the counſel of ten was then inſtituted. Hauing ruled 22. years, and nine months, he dyed.

50 Marino Giorgio, was a man of ſuch life, that they termed him a Saint. Venice was continually excommunicated in his time, by reaſon of the taking of Ferrara. Zara rebelled again the ſixt time, & much labour it coſt, to reduce it vnder obedience againe. After he builded the Monaſtery of Saint Dominicke, and died (at the age of eighty and one yeares) in his firſt yeare, hauing gouerned ten months, and ten dayes.

52 Giouanni Soranzo, had the honor of recouering Zara, and many other places, which had reuolted in his predeceſſours time. Negropont, was re-obtained, & war afreſh commenced againſt them of Genes. The excommunication was quitted from Venice, by the interpoſition of Franciſco Dandolo, kneeling before the Pope, with a Chaine of iron about his necke. The number of Atturneyes of S. Marke, was increaſed to ſixe. Hee gouerned ſixteene yeares, and ſix months.

52 Franciſco Dandolo, who had ſo lowly humbled himſelfe for his Countreyes good, was therefore exalted to her higheſt dignity. They of Pola, and of Valeſia, ſubmitted themſelues to the Commonwealth, which gaue way vnto the warre againſt the Patriarch of Aquilea. Padua was taken on Albert Scaliger, and Treuiſa, and the County remained to the Common-wealth. This man was of the league with the Chriſtian Princes, againſt the Turke, and in his time were ſixtie ſeuerall Ambaſſadors at Venice. He gouerned ten yeares, and ten months.

55 Bartolomeo Gradenigo, Atturney of S. Marke, was made Duke at ſeuenty ſix yeares of age, by the interceſſion of Andrea Dandolo, and his ceſſation. In his time was Venice myraculouſly deliuered from a mighty imminent inundation. Candie rebelled, and the rebelles were ſeuerely puniſhed. There hapned a great dearth in the Citty, which droue the people to diſcontentment: he dyed in his fourth yeare.

54 Andrea Dandolo, who had before reſigned his place vnto Bartolomeo Graningo, cauſed the dearth for to ceaſe; by ſending for great ſtore of Corne out of Sicily. Hee obtained of the King of Babylon, free Nauigation into Egypt. Zara rebelled the ſeauenth time, and was reprized.

The Warre betweene them of Genes and the Citty, was troubled by two great accidents happening; the one, was an Earth-quake very dreadfull; and the other, was a greeuous Peſtilence. Hee gouerned twelue yeares, wanting ſome fewe months.

55 Marino Faliero, was elected Duke, being then Ambaſſador at Rome. Hauing recei-receiued an iniurie by ſome particulars, which was not reuenged according vnto his owne deſire: hee determined in the eighty yeare of his age, to make himſelfe abſolutely Lord, without any controule. The conſpiracy being diſcouerd by Nicholao Lion; he had his head ſmitten off within the Pallace. And it was ordayned, that his Picture ſhould not be placed amongſt the other dukes, but the place being left voyde, had only this Writing: This is the place of Marino Faliero, who, for his grieuous offence, had his head cut off: hee was duke but ten moneths.

56 Giouanni Gradenigo had an excellent ſpirit, but a much miſ-ſhapen countenance. The warre was renewed againſt the Genes, which tearmined with a mutuall peace. He had warre againſt the King of Hungarie for Dalmatia. Treuiſa was beſieged in his time, and thither he went in perſon. Hee gouerned one yeare, three moneths and foureteene dayes.

56 Giouanni Delfino, was elected Duke when hee was in Treuiſa, defending it againſt the King of Hungary. The Senate ſent to demaund free paſſage for him; which being denyed, he came forth with two hundred horſſe to beard the enemie, and ſo attained to Margliera, where the Senate in perſon receiued him. In ſhort time he gaue end to this warre, and recouered Conciliano, Serualla, and Aſola. He made peace for the ſoueraignty of Dalmatia; and dyed aged forty and fiue yeares, hauing gouerned foure yeares, two moneths, and eleuen dayes.

58 Lorenzo Celſo, vpon a falſe bruite, of a victorie againſt them of reuolted Genes; was made Duke in concurrence of Pietro Gradenigo, Leonardo Dandolo, and Marco Cornaro. Candie rebelled againe, and it was regained with a very great difficulty. On this occaſion, a Iuſt and feaſt was publiquely made in the place of Saint Marke: he dyed two daies after the fourth yeare of his Principalitie.

59 Marco Cornaro, a man very wiſe and learned, was ſent into Candie, which was rebellious, and there he made a cruel blody warre: the Pope graunting plenary Indulgence to all ſuch as went thither. The Rebels being ſeuerely puniſhed, the common-wealth ſent to Pope Vrbane the fift, a certaine number of their Gallies. He gouerned two yeares, fiue months, and foure and twentie dayes.

60 Andrea Contarini, fled to the Paduans fearing to be elected Duke, and as preſaging the ruine which (in his time) would betide the Common-wealth. Firſt of all, he made warre with them of Trieſto, then ſoone after, with Carrara for the confines of Padua: and ſuch was the fortune, that Chioggia being taken, the Citty of Venice found it ſelfe to bee in extreame danger. But in the end, he went and oppoſed himſelfe (in perſon) againſt the enemies, vanquiſhed them, and regained Chioggia: he dyed, hauing gouerned fifteene yeares, foure moneths, and fifteene daies.

61 Michele Moriſini, was a man well furniſhed with Learning and Wiſedome. Some ſay, that in his time the Iſle of Thenedos was taken, and not in the time of his predeceſſour Contarini. There were diuers Lawes then made (and amongeſt others) it was ordayned, that Homicides, who had formerly beene hanged, ſhould afterwards haue their heads ſmitten off. He liued but foure months, and fiue daies in his dignitie, and dyed in the threeſcore and foureteene yeare of his age.

62 Antonio Veniero, was a rigorous obſeruer of Iuſtice. He confined one of his owne Sonnes in exile, becauſe he had (ouer-lightly) offended the familie of a noble Venitian. Hee made league with Galeazzo the Vicount, againſt Carrara, whereupon he tooke Padua. He aſſiſted the Emperour Emmanuell againſt the Turke; and gaue aid alſo vnto Sigiſmond, King of Hungaria, who afterwardes came to the Empire. The place of Saint Marke, and that of the Rialto, were greatly beautified in his time. Hee dyed two moneths, and three dayes, after the eighteenth yeare of his rule.

63 Michele Steno, had the dignitie of Attourney of Saint Marke, with that of Duke. Hee wonne an important battell againſt the Genewaies. Carrara was now the laſt time vanquiſhed, and Padua and Verona ſurprized. They of Vicenza, to free themſelues from his tyrannie, yeelded themſelues to the Common-wealth. Ladiſlaus King of Hungaria, did likewiſe forgoe Zara: Hee dyed, hauing gouerned thirteene yeares, and three dayes.

64 Thomaſo Mocenigo, was firſt Generall of the Goulfe. He embraced peace, to the end, that the Cittizens might traffike.

Vdina

Vdina became obedient to the Commonwealth, with the Countrey of Friuoli; by meanes of the Lords of Sauorguani, who were made noble-men of Venice. The Florentines were alſo ſuccoured againſt the Duke of Milaine. In his tenth yere he died.

65 Franceſco Foſcari ſtoutly repreſſed the Duke of Milaine, who proceeded too farre on the liberties of Italy. Breſcia, Bergamo, and other Citties of Lombardy were then wonne: amongſt which were Loda and Parma, and Rauenna in Romania. Hee made alſo a large progreſſe on the Seas, euen into Morca. The Senate aſſiſted Paleologus the Emperour, againſt the Turks, who vſurped Conſtantinople, in the yeare 1453. Hee was made Arbitratour by the Duke of Milaine, in certaine differences of neighbour-hood. The King of Dacia was made a noble Venitian: And afterward, the Duke (in regarde of his age and infirmities) was diſmiſſed, hauing gouerned thirty foure yeares, and ſixe moneths.

66 Paſchale Malapiero, was appoynted in the place of Foſcari, being Atturney of Saint Marke, who dyed two dayes after his diſmiſſion. He made a Lawe, That in following times, the Duke ſhould not be depoſed. In his dayes, the famous Arte of Printing was brought into Venice. The Arſenall was greatly encreaſed: And hee maintayned the people in peace, during foure yeares, ſixe moneths, and fiue daies that he gouerned.

67 Chriſtophoro Moro, a Procuratour of Saint Marke, was made Duke. He liued for ſome time in peace, till the ſecond yeare of his gouernement; and then the Turke (proud of his ſurprizall of Conſtantinople) declared warre againſt the Venitians. He made peace with Pope Pius the fift, and the Duke of Burgundy: But the Pope dying, they remayned alone, and maintayned warre which laſted twentie yeares. And yet he dyed, hauing reigned nine yeares, and ſixe moneths.

68 Nicholo Trono had ſuch good hap, that (in his time) the Common-wealths affaires went well againſt the Turke. Pietro Mocenigo, Generall in the Archipelagus, vnited his power with the Popes. The king of Naples, and they of Rhodes ſent eightie fiue gallies together, and tooke Satalia, a Citty of Pamphilia. He made league likewiſe with the King of Perſia, againſt the Turke. Iames King of Cyprus comming to Venice, eſpouſed Catharina Cornara, adoptiue daughter of Saint Marke. He gouerned one yeare, eight moneths, and fiue dayes.

69 Nicholo Marcello, Atturny of Saint Marke, after ſome laws made by the Correctors; was elected Duke. In his time there was a conſpiracie in Cyprus, to haue the Kingdome fall into the power of Ferdinand King of Naples. Pietro Morcenigo went thither with a great Armie, where he appeaſed all troubles, and ſeuerely chaſtiſed the Rebells. Scutari, a Cittie in Liburnia, was beſieged by the Turke, and valiantly defended by Antonio Loredano. This duke gouerned one yeare, foure moneths, and ſeuenteene dayes.

70 Pietro Mocenigo was elected Duke, in deſert of all his worthy deedes. Lepanto was beſieged in his time by the Turke, and vertuouſly maintayned by Antonio Loredano. They brought their power likewiſe before the Iſle of Stalimena, but the ſame Loredamo (by his valour) defended it. The daughter to King Ferdinand came to Venice, with the Cardinall her brother, where they were roially entertained. This Prince cauſed a Money to bee ſtamped, which hee ſurnamed by his owne name: And gouerned but two yeares, and nine moneths.

71 Andrea Vendramino had ſuch ill hap in his gouernement, that the Venitian Army was two ſeuerall times put to flight by the Turkes: Once, neare to Croya in Albania, and the other in the country of Friuli. He was a goodly man of perſon, and had a moſt beautifull Lady to his wife, by whom he had as goodly children, whom he allied in marriage with the chiefeſt Families: he gouerned one yeare, and eight moneths.

72 Giouanni Mocenigo, brother to Pietro Mocenigo, hauing continued the warre againſt the Turke; in the end made peace with him: ordering the matter ſo, that he left Scutari and Stipula in liberty of Commerce, and power to keepe a Deputie at Conſtantinople. Hee made warre againſt Ferdinand King of Naples, at the inſtance of Pope Sixtus the fourth, which occaſioned the long warre called Sociale. In the end, peace was made, the Common-wealth hauing gotten Rouigo & Poleſano. The Cittie became much diſgraced by fire, and a peſtilent ſickeneſſe: The prince dyed, dyed, hauing raigned ſeauen yeares, and ſixe moneths.

73 Marco Barbarigo, the plague being ceaſed, cauſed all to be new builded, which the fire had defaced in the Pallace. Hee was greatly differing from all other Princes, to wit, in pardoning, and forgetting particular iniuries doone vnto him: but ſuch as were cõmitted againſt the State, he would haue reuenged with ſtricteſt ſeueritie. The grand Signeur or Turke ſent a particular Ambaſſadour vnto him, to congratulate his election. He gouerned but nine moneths.

74 Agoſtino Barbarigo, withſtood the progreſſe of Charles the eighth King of Fraunce, when hee made warre againſt them of Arragon, for the Kingdome of Naples, which he conquered. The Turke vſurped on the Common-weales of Lepanto, Modona, and Corona. The Kingdome of Cyprus was brought vnder the tutelage of the Senate, and Qu. Catharina brought thence to Venice. The office de la Sante was created, by occaſion of the peſtilẽce: This Duke gouerned fifteene yeares, and twenty one dayes.

75 Leonardo Lauredano ſuſtained a very rigorous war, againſt the chiefeſt Princes of the world: there beeing a League made betweene the Emperour Maximilian; the King of Fraunce; them of Naples; and the Dukes of Sauoy, Ferrara, and Mantua, incited thereto by Pope Iulius the ſecond. All the whole eſtate of firme land was ſurprized, except Treuiſa; but in the end it was recouered. He liued in the Principality nineteene yeares, eight moneths, and twenty dayes.

76 Antonio Grimani, being Generall, had a moſt infamous diſ-rout or foile, by which occaſion, hee was diſmiſſed of the charge of Procurator of Saint Marke, and confined to Cherſo. He brake his limitation, and withdrew himſelfe to Rome to the Cardinall his ſonne: where he had ſo many worthy Offices impoſed vpon him, as, not onely he was re-eſtabliſhed in his Atturneys place againe; but he was likewiſe made Duke, at the age of foure ſcore and two yeares, and gouerned but one yeare, ten moneths, and two dayes.

77 Andrea Grutti, gaining the beſt part of the glorie, for the reprizall of Padua, was in very great eſteeme. Hee dealt ſo with the King of Fraunce, (to whome he was priſoner) that his Maieſtie allied himſelfe with the Common-wealth, and Breſcia and Verona were reconquerd. He knew very well, how to make his carriage pleaſing to the Senate, during the warres betweene Charles the fifth, Emperour, and King Fraunces the firſt, as alſo againſt Solyman. He gouerned fifteene yeares, ſeauen moneths, and eight dayes.

78 Pietro Lando continued the defence of the Commonwealth againſt the Turke: with whom (at laſt) he made a peace, knowing how to make vſe thereof, and maintaine his owne charge, whileſt the warre continued betweene Charles the fift, and King Frances the firſt. Hee gouerned ſixe yeares, and eight moneths.

79 Franceſco Donato, making benefite alſo of this peace, beautified the Cittie with many goodly buildings, beſides that of the Pallace. He ſent ſuccor to the Emperour, againſt certaine Rebells in Germanie. The Princes of Guiſe, coming to Venice in his time, were entertained as fitted their degree. He gouerned ſeauen yeares, and ſixe moneths.

80 Marco Antonio Treuiſano, a man altogether deuout, laboured that the Common-wealth might abound in goodneſſe and ciuill manners; preuenting (by his owne worthy example) that vices ſhould not be wincked at, as, in too many countries they are. He gouerned a yeare, wanting three dayes.

81 Franceſco Veniero, could ſo well skill of gouerning the Common-wealth, that albeit the Turke (in his time) made warre in Apulia, and the King of Fraunce in Tuſcanie: yet all was well at Venice, and the Queene of Poland roially welcommed thither. He gouernd two yeares, one moneth and twenty dayes.

82 Lorenzo Priuli, was ſollicited (by the Pope) to make warre againſt the Emperor. But, he being a friend to the Common-wealth; by no meanes would offend him, but mediated a pacification of thoſe affaires. In his time peace was made betweene Fraunce and Spaine, and Charles the fift dyed. This Prince gouerned three yeares, eleauen moneths, and eight dayes.

83 Girolamo Priuli, brother to the precedẽt prince, enioyed thoſe great honors, which Pope Pius the fourth gaue vnto the common-wealth: And all his delight was to heare ambaſſadors in the hall of Kings.

In

In his time the Councel of Trent was concluded, whither he sent (as Ambassadors) Nicholo de Ponte, and Matheo Dandolo.

The Common-wealth helde (at Baptisme) the sonne to the Duke of Sauoy, by a Deputie borne of Margueret of Fraunce. He dyed, hauing gouerned eight yeares, two moneths, and foure dayes.

84 Pietro Loredano, by the concurrence of two others, was elected Duke, contrarie to the hope of all, or his owne expectation. The Arsenall was burned in his time, and there then also happened a very great dearth of all things. Selim, successour of Solyman, tooke occasion to breake peace with the Common-wealth, demaunding of them the kingdome of Cyprus, and moued warre vpon this Subiect. He gouerned foure yeares, fiue moneths, and eight dayes.

85 Luigi Mocenigo, warre being kindled against the Turke, lost the kingdome of Cyprus, Nicosia being taken, and Famagosta surrendered. The Common-wealth made league with Pope Pius the fifth, and Phillip King of Spaine, so that their armies (being ioyned togither in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand fiue hundred seuenty one) they obtayned a worthy victorie against the Turkes. Soone after, Henry the third, king of France, came to Venice, where he was magnificently entertayned. This Prince dyed in his seauenth yeare.

86 Sebastiano Veniero, was elected by common voyce, and with such applause, that diuers Turkes ranne to him and kissed his feete. He created fiue Correctours of the Lawes, for ruling the affaires of the Pallace. The Citty was deliuered of a dangerous plague, and the Pallace was againe very greatly defaced by fire. This prince gouernd not aboue a whole yeare.

87 Nicholo de Ponte, was created Duke, a man very learned in all the Sciences, and whereof hee had made publike profession in Venice. He passed thorow all the honors of the Common-wealth, wherewith the Citizens could possibly gratifie him. The Seminary of Saint Marke was instituted by him. Certaine princes of Iapponia arriuing then at Venice, were by him most honourably entertained. He builded the bridge of Canareggio: and gouerned seuen yeares, nine moneths, and thirteen dayes.

88 Paschale Cicogna, Procuratour of S. Marke, was elected when he was at diuine Seruice in the Church. In his time there was great warres, betweene Fraunce and Spayne about Piedmont, and betweene the Emperour and the Turke, for some parts in Hungaria. He caused the towne of Palma to bee builded, in the confines of the Countrey of Friuli, and a new castle or fortresse, in the Isle of Cephalonia. He had the honor of the wonderfull bridge of the Rialto, which he builded: And gouerned ten yeares, or thereabout.

89 Marino Grimini, Procuratour of Saint Marke, was so highly in grace and fauour of the people, that on the day of his Election; they declared extraordinarie signes of ioy, and continued them for many following dayes. The second yeare of his Principality, he caused the dutchesse his wife to be crowned in great triumph. At which time, Pope Clement the eight sent her the Rose of gold. In his time was much ioy and triumph made, for the peace concluded betweene the Kings of Fraunce and Spayne. Vpon occasion of the Popes comming to Ferrara, obtained by the Ecclesiasticall Estate, the Cardinall Aldobrandino passed thence to Venice, where he was most honourably wel-comed, with diuers other Cardinalls. There was such an extraordinary ouer-flow of waters, in the fift yeare of his Principality, that the Barkes, Boates, and Gundoloes floated on the place of Saint Mark, euen as if they had beene in a full maine riuer. He dyed, and was much bemoaned of the people, hauing gouernd ten yeares, and eight moneths.

90 Leonardo Dandolo, hauing by his worthy deseruings, singuler wisedome and dexterity, mannaged passed affaires, and gone thorow all honors of the Common-wealth, giuing euident testimonie of his care and faithfulnesse; was aduaunced in the place of Grimani, the tenth day of Ianuary, 1606. He had beene sent Ambassadour to Constantinople to Mahomet (hee being newly come to the Empire of the East) in the Common-wealths name, to salute him with accustomed complemēts. He hath such a practick braine, & so happie a memory, seated in a soule so religiously zealous for common benefite; that the Senate hath referred more vnto him, then to any other of his Predecessours.

The Cttie hath (in his time) beene excommunicated, by Paulus Quintus, now Pope, Pope, about ſome pretentions appertaining to his See: But it may well be ſayd of this Prince, that, againſt ſuch Thunderclappes and Lightning flaſhes, hee hath ſhewne himſelfe an immoueable rocke, in defence of that eſtate in generall. In like maner, two principall Pillers of Chriſtendome, threatned great diſaſter and ruine: but that moſt Chriſtian Henry the fourth, King of Fraunce, embracing thoſe two Collomnes, vpheld both the one and other, and redreſſed all diſcontentment, by the entermiſe of his Ambaſſadours, and hath erected a triumphall Arche, to the immortalitie of his glorie. This Prince now liuing happily in peace, doth daily acknowledge to Fraunce, his particular affection for ſuch fauour, & may (in time) much better declare it. God long preſerue him, and all other good Princes.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of Wounds made by Gun-ſhot, and other fierie Engines.

IN the yeare of our Lord, 1536. the victorious king Fraunces ſent a great Armie vnto Piedmont, to vitaile Thurin, and to recouer thoſe townes and caſtles, which had beene taken by the Marqueſſe Du Guaſto, Lieutenant generall of the Emperour, where Monſieur the Conſtable, then great Maſter, was Lieutenant generall of the Army, and Mounſieur de Monte-jan Captaine generall of the Footmen (of whom I was then Chirurgian.) A great part of the Armie arriued at the Pas of Suze, where we found the enemie keeping the paſſage, and had made vnto themſelues certayne forts and trenches; in ſuch ſort, that before they could be raiſed from thence, wee entered into battell: in which conflict there was many hurt and ſlaine, as well on the one ſide as on the other. But they were inforced to quit that paſſage, and to recouer the caſtle; which they held not long, but were compelld to giue it vp; marching away in their ſhirts onely, hauing each of them a white W and in their hands: of whom, the moſt part went to the Caſtle de Villane, where there was about ſome two hundred Spaniards. To this caſtle my Lord the Conſtable drew his forces, becauſe hee would make his way cleare before him. It is ſituate vpon a little Mountaine, which giueth great aſſurance to thoſe within, that there can bee no Ordinance planted againſt it, to batter it downe. They were ſummoned to reſtore it vp, or elſe were threatned to haue it battered in peeces; which they flatly refuſed: anſwering withall, that they were as good and faithfull ſeruants to the Emperour, as Mounſieur the Conſtable was to the King his maiſter. Their anſwer being vnderſtoode, the ſame night there was mounted two great Canons, by the force of armes with ropes and cordes, by the Switzers, where, (as miſ-fortune would) thoſe cannons being planted, a Gunner by indiſcretion fired a barrel of Gun-pouder, wherewith he himſelfe was extreamely burned, together with tenne or twelue ſoldiers. Moreouer, the flame of the pouder was the cauſe of the diſcouerie of the Ordinance, whereby thoſe of the Caſtle, the night following, diſcharged their Ordinance at that place where they diſcouered our Cannons; inſomuch, that we had many of our men hurt and ſlaine.

Pas of Suze.

The Caſtle de Villane beſiedged and taken.

The morrow after, very early wee beganne the battery, and in few houres after the breach was made; which thoſe of the Caſtle perceiuing, deſired a parley, but it was too late; for in the meane time ſome of our foot-men, perceiuing them to be aſtoniſhed, mounted the breach, and entred the Caſtle, putting euery man to the ſword, except onely a certaine beautifull Piedmonteſe, which a great Lord entertained into his ſeruice. The Captaine and Ancient were taken aliue, but were preſently after hanged vpon the Gate of the Towne, to terrifie the reſt of the Emperours ſouldiers, not to be ſo foole-hardie, to hold ſuch places againſt ſo great an armie. Now, the ſouldiers of the Caſtle ſeeing our men ruſhing in vpon them in ſuch great furie, made all the reſiſtance they could to defend themſelues, in killing and wounding a great number of our Souldiers with their pikes and muskets; where the Chirurgians had a great deale of work cut out to their hands.

I was (at that time) but a yong Chirurgian,

The Author entreth into the matter.

gian, and but little experienced in the Art, becauſe I neuer (as yet) had ſeene the curation of anie Wounds made by Gun-ſhot. True it is, that I had read Iohn de Vigo, his firſt booke of Wounds in generall, chap. 8. where he ſaith, That thoſe wounds made by fiery Engines, do participate of venenoſity, becauſe of the Powder; and for their curation, he commands to cauterize them with the Oile of Elders mixed with a litle Treacle: yet neuertheleſſe, becauſe I would not be deceiued, before I would make vſe of the ſaid boyling oile, knowing that it brought with it extreme paine to the Patient, I obſerued the methode of other Chirurgians in the firſt dreſſing of ſuch wounds; which was by the application & infuſion of the foreſaid Oile, as hot as poſſibly they could ſuffer it, with Tents and Setons: wherefore I became emboldned to do as they did. But in the end my oile failed mee, ſo that I was conſtrained to vſe in ſtead thereof, a digeſtiue made of the yolke of an egge, Oile of Roſes and Terebinth. The night following, I could hardly ſleep at mine eaſe, fearing leſt that for wãt of cauterizing, I ſhold find my Patients, on whom I had not vſed of the aforeſaid Oyle, dead and empoyſoned; which made mee to riſe earely in the morning to viſit them: where, beyond my expectation, I found thoſe on whom I had vſed the digeſtiue medicine, to feele but little paine, and their wounds without inflammation or tumor, hauing reſted well all that night. The reſt, on whom the aforeſaide Oile was applyed, I found them inclining to Feauers, with great paine, tumor, and inflammation about their Wounds: then I reſolued with my ſelfe, neuer to burne ſo cruelly the wounded Patients by Gun-ſhot any more.

A remedy found by accident.

When we entred Thurin, I was tolde of a Chirurgian, who was exceeding famous, eſpecially for his curing wounds made by Gun-ſhot, with whom I found the means to acquaint my ſelfe: yet it was neare two yeares and a halfe, before hee would acquaint mee with his Medicine which hee called his Balme. In the meane time, Mounſieur the Marſhall of Montejan, who was Lieutenant generall of the King in Piedmont, dyed: then I tolde this Chirurgian, that I had a deſire to returne to Paris, withall, requeſting him, that he would performe his promiſe, which was, to giue me the receit of his Balme, which he willingly did, ſeeing that I was to leaue that country. He ſent me to fetch him two yong whelps, one pound of earth-worms, two pounds of the oyle of Lillies, ſix ounces of the Terebinth of Venice, and one ounce of Aqua-vitæ: and in my preſence, he boiled the whelps aliue in the ſaid oile, vntill the fleſh departed from the bones. Afterward, he tooke the wormes (hauing before killed and purified them in white Wine, to purge themſelues of the earth which they haue alwayes in their bodies:) being ſo prepared, he boyled them alſo in the ſaid oile, till they became dry; this he ſtrained thorow a napkin, without anie great expreſſion; that doone, hee added thereto the Terebinth: and laſtly, the Aqua-vitæ, and called God to witneſſe, that this was his Balme which hee vſed in all wounds made by Gun-ſhot, and in others which required ſuppuration; withal, praying me not to divulge his ſecret

From thence I returned to Paris, where ſhortly after, Mounſieur Siluius, Lecturer of the King in Phyſicke, a man greatly eſteemd among learned men, requeſted me one day to dine with him, which I did willingly; where hee asked me many Queſtions, and among the reſt, of the eſſence of wounds made by Gunne-ſhot, and of the combuſtions made by Gunne-pouder. Whereupon, I preſently prooued vnto him, that the pouder was not any thing venomous at all; becauſe that no Simple that enters therein is any way venomous, much leſſe the compoſition. Alſo, I haue ſeene by experience, that ſome Souldiers being hurt, will take of the ſaid powder in wine, ſaying; That pouder ſo taken, doth preſerue the body from the enſuing accidents, the which I approue not. Alſo, others hauing vlcers on their bodies, doe commonly vſe of the ſaid pouder drie, and heale them without any daunger at all. And as for the Bullets, they can not containe any ſuch heat, that they ſhould haue the faculty of burning: for a bullet being ſhot againſt a ſtone-wall, it may preſently be helde in the naked hand, although the colliſſion made againſt the Stones, ſhould (in reaſon) heate it the more: And as for combuſtions or burnings made by Gun-pouder, I neuer found any particular accident in it, whereby the cure ought to be diuerſified from the cure of other combuſtions.

bustions. Whereupon, I related this History. A certaine boy of the Kitchin, of Mounsieur the Marshall de Monte-jan, fell into a Caldron full of oyle, almost boyling hote; to dresse whom being sent for, I went presently to an Apothecarie, demanding of him such cooling medicines, which are commonly applyed vnto burnings. An auncient Countrey-woman being by, hearing mee speake of this burning, counselled me to apply for the first dressing (to prevent the rising of pustules or bladders) of rawe onions, bruised with a little salt. I demaunded of this woman, Whether she had euer made experience of that Medicine before: Shee presently sware vnto me in her language, Si meſſé, à la fe de dé; which did incite me to make experience heereof, on this scullion of the Kitchin, where truely I found the morrow after, that in those parts, where the Onions had touched, to bee altogether free from vessickes or blisters, and the other parts, where the Onions were not applyed, to be much blistered.

* Yea Sir, by the Faith of God.

Not long after, a certaine Dutch-man, one of the guard of the said Lord de Monte-jan, hauing drunke hard, by indiscretion, set his Flask afire, which caused a great disaster, both to his hands and face; and being called to dresse him, I applyed of the saide Onions on the one halfe of his face; and on the other side, of other common remedies. At the second dressing, I found that part where I had applied the Onions, to be altogether without blisters, or any excoriation, and the other altogether blistred: then I first purposed to write of the effect of the said Onions.

How the Patient ought to be situate in the extraction of Bullets.

Moreouer, I tolde vnto the sayd Sylui-us, that for the better extraction of bullets which are hidden in any part of the body, it is requisit, the Patient should be placed in the same situation, that he was in at that time when he was wounded. Many other things I discouered vnto him, which are contayned in this Booke following. My Discourse ended, he prayed me very earnestly, that I would publish it by writing; to the end, that that false opinion of Vigo might be altogether abolished; the which I willingly consented vnto; and caused many instruments to be cut, such as had not beene diuulged; for the extraction of Bullets, and other vnnaturall things out of the body.

And it was first Imprinted in the yeare, 1545. and well receiued, which caused me to renew it agayne, and publish it the second time, in the yeare 1550. and lastly, in the yeare, 1564. where I haue enriched it with many other things, because I haue since followed the warres, haue beene in many battells, and besieged Townes, as in Metz and Hedin. Also, I haue beene entertayned into the seruice of fiue Kings, where I haue alwayes discoursed with the most excellent Physitians and Chirurgians of those times, to learne and discouer, if there were any other methode or way, to cure those wounds made by gun-shot; whereof the most part (specially those that haue followed the warres, and are guided by reason and experience) are of my opinion, which is, to vse Suppuratiues in the beginning, and not boyling oyles. And I did protest moreouer to the sayd Sylui-us, that I haue found those wounds as easie to cure (being in fleshy partes) as all other great contused wounds are. But, where the Bullet meeteth with the bones and neruous parts, it teareth, dilacerateth, breaketh, and shiuereth in peeces, not onely where it toucheth, but also the circumiacent parts, without any mercy; causing great accidents, which happen specially in the iounctures or ioynts, and in bodies of euill constitution, and in time subiect to corruption, that is to say, where the Ayre is hote and moyst, then is the cure most difficult, and oftentimes impossible; not onely of wounds made by gun-shot, but also of those which are made by other instruments; yea, though they were but in fleshie parts.

The cause that maketh wounds by gun shot hard to be cured.

Therefore, the aforesaid accidents do not proceede from the venenosity which is in the powder, or by the combustion or burning of the Bullet. For proofe of which, I will alleadge this obseruation, which I haue experimented (not long since) on the person of the Earle of Cowndon, Lord of Achindon, a Scottish-man, whom I cured by the commaundement of the Queene-mother, who was hurt with the shot of a Pistoll cleane through both the thighs, without fracture of the bones; he standing so neare the mouth of the Pistoll, that the fire tooke holde of his breeches; neuertheless, hee was perfectly cured in two and thirtie dayes, without a Feauer or anie other euill accident. dreſt him at S. Iohn de Latran, in the houſe of the Archiſhoppe of Glaſco, then Ambaſſadour for Scotland, who came euery day to ſee him dreſt. Moreouer, for teſtimony, I could produce Mounſieur Brigard, Doctor Regent in the facultie of Phiſicke, who was an aſſiſtant with me; together with Iames Guillemeau, Chirurgian to the King, and ſworne at Paris, who was with me vntill his perfect curation. The ſame likewiſe Mounſieur Hautin, Doctour Regent in the faculty of Phyſicke can teſtifie, who ſometimes came to ſee him. Alſo Giles Buzet, Scotchman and Chirurgian, euery of them maruailing how hee became ſo ſoone cured, without the application of hot and ſharp medcines. Now, the reaſon wherefore I haue made this litle Diſcourſe, is to demonſtrate, that it is aboue 30. yeares agoe, ſince I firſt found out this maner of curing wounds made by gunſhot, without the vſe of boiling oiles, or any other ſharp or burning medicines, vnleſſe I was conſtrained to vſe them, for ſuch accidents which hapned in Cacochymed bodies, or through the euil diſpoſition and malignancy of the ayre, as I will ſhew more amply in this Diſcourſe following, which I made vnto the deceaſſed King, after the taking of Roan.

CHAP. IIII.

¶ An Anſwer vnto a certayne demaund, propounded by the victorious Prince Charles the ninth, as touching the qualitie and Eſſence of wounds made by Gunne-ſhotte, at his Maieſties returne from the ſiege, and taking of the Towne of Roan.

Occaſion of this diſcourſe.

AT one day pleaſed your Maieſtie, together with the Qneene-Mother, my L. the prince of La Roche-ſur-Yon, and many other Princes and great Lords, to demād of me how it came to paſſe, that in theſe laſt warres, the moſt part of ſuch Gentlemen & Soldiers, who were wounded by Gun-ſhot, & other inſtruments of war, died, or were very hardly recouered from their diſeaſes, although the wounds they receiued were but of ſmall apparāce, and the Chirurgians which were employed for their cures, did performe their duties according to Art; I haue bin the bolder to publiſh this diſcourſe, to ſatisfie (in ſome meaſure) the duty of my Art, & that my Profeſſion might not be ſpotted with the leaſt diſhonor; and that your Maieſtie might vnderſtād the reaſons, which might haue bin the cauſe of the death of ſo many valiant mē; the moſt part of whom I haue ſeene (to my great griefe) to finiſh theyr dayes pittifully, without any poſſibilitie in mee, or anie other more experienced then my ſelfe to giue them remedy.

Inſinuation into the good acceptance of thoſe who are of the contrary opinion.

I know that this following Diſcourſe will aſtoniſh ſome, who repoſing themſelues vppon their owne particular opinions, and not examining the matter deeply, will finde the firſt front of my diſputation very ſtrange; becauſe that the contrary hath beene ſo long imprinted in their fantaſies. For I doe hold, that the cauſe of the malignancy of wounds by Gun-ſhot, not to proceed from any poyſon or venomous quality in the pouder (as they imagine) or from the Bullet it ſelfe, being rubbed or infuſed in any venomous mixture. Neuertheleſſe, if their meekeneſſe and patience will extend ſo farre, as firſt to weigh the motiues, which firſt moued me to vndertake this ſubiect, which was a zeale of the publique good; towards the which the Lawe of Nature bindeth me, to ſhew the vttermoſt of my power in ſuch things which the ſingular prouidence of Almighty God hath reuealed vnto me. And ſecondly, that they will examine with iudgement, the reaſons which I ſhall vſe in this preſent Treatiſe: then I ſhall bee certayne, they will both accept my labour thankefully, and free it from all future calumnie. Otherwiſe they will ſhew themſelues to be ſo ill affectioned toward me, as if I ſhould preſent my ſelfe before them, enriched with all the treaſures of the auncient Philoſophers, and they ſhould place mee in the number of the podreſt and ignoranteſt men in the world. To preuent therefore all the Arguments of venome and poiſoning, which the Aduerſaries heere aboue mentioned may alleadge, I will make it plaine vnto your Maieſtie, that ſuch as are wounded by gunne-ſhot; I ſay the malignancie of ſuch wounds, not to proceed from the venome of the Powder, beeing of it ſelfe ſimply conſidered: and much leſſe from the cobuſtion or cauterization which the Bullet

The Author propoſeth two points, which he would refute, viz. the poyſon of the powder, and the fire of the Bullet.

Bullet ſo heated by the fire of the powder can make in thoſe parts, which it rendeth & dilacerateth thorow the violence thereof: although neuertheleſſe ſome do ſtriue to maintayne; alledging for all, reaſons, That a certayne Tower full of powder hath heeretofore beene ſeene ruinated in an inſtant, onely by the meanes of a Cannon ſhot. Alſo of a thatched houſe ſet on fire with a Muſket ſhotte. Moreouer, becauſe that ſuch wounds which are made by Gunne-ſhotte, we commonly behold their Orifices and other circum-iacent parts ſo blacke, as if an actuall Cauter had paſſed thereon. As alſo the fall of a certayne eſcarre, as they ſay. All which Arguments are ſo ill framed, that they deſerue no authoritie, beeing builded on ſo ſlender a foundation: much leſſe, that the reſolution of your demaund ſhould be taken from them, as I truſt to giue you plainely to vnderſtand in the Diſputation following. Which (after I had ſeene a great number of thoſe wounds, and diligently obſerued them, handling them according to the methode) I haue collected from the auncient Philoſophers, Phyſitians, and Chirurgians to preſent vnto your Maieſty, and to withdrawe your minde from the admiration of the lamentable death of ſo many braue Gentlemen and Souldiers.

The preſent diſputation is taken from Philoſophers, Phyſitions & Chirurgians.

Now, to enter into the matter propoſed, and to anſwer the Arguments before alledged, we are firſt to examine, whether there be any poyſon incloſed in the powder, or no: And if there bee, whether it may infect by meanes of the pretended poyſon thereof. Which, that it may appeare plainely, wee muſt ſearch into the compoſition of the ſayd powder, conſidering that it is not of ſubſtance ſimple, but compound: and ſo by examining the nature of ſuch Simples, which enter into the compoſition thereof; I meane their qualities, effects, and operations, we ſhall the ſooner attaine to the ſcope and intention pretended.

The compoſition of the powder.

As for the Simples it is a moſt aſſured thing, that there are but three in all, which make the compoſition thereof, that is to ſay, coales of willow or birch, ſulphure, and ſalt-peter, and ſometimes Aqua-vitæ: which ingredients ſeuerally conſidered, are altogether exempt and free from poyſon, or any venomous quality. And firſt for the coales, there is not any thing conſiderable in them, vnleſſe it bee a drying quality, of ſubtile ſubſtance, by meanes whereof it is apt to take fire, euen as a linnen cloth burned into Tinder doth the ſparkes that fall from a Flint ſtone. Sulphure is hote and drie, neuertheleſſe, not exceſſiue, and of a more oilie and viſcuous ſubſtance, yet not ſo eaſie to inflame as coales, although it doth retaine the fire more forcibly when it is once inflamed, and is very hardly extinguiſhed. As for the ſalt-peter, it is ſuch, that many make vſe thereof inſtead of ſalt. Now let vs examine, whether there be any venenoſity in the nature of theſe ſimples; namely, in that of ſulphure; which is the moſt ſuſpected. Dioſcorides in his fift booke, chap. 37. preſcribeth it to be taken in an Egge, in the aſtmaticke paſſion, coughes, and to ſuch which ſpit matter, and thoſe that haue the Iaundiſe. And Galen in his ninth booke of his Simples, cha. 36. ordaineth it as a topicall remedy, vnto ſuch who are bitten by venomous beaſts; and in all malignant practiſes or itchings; as for the Aqua-vitæ, it is a thing ſubtile, that it will euaporate if it be ſet in the ayre; beſides, it is vſed by moſt Chirurgians inwardly in drinkes, and outwardly in embrocations as a moſt ſingular medicine. Theſe things conſidered, make mee to affirme, that the whole compoſition of powder is altogether free from venome or poyſon, ſeeing that the ingredients are altogether cleare from the leaſt touch in that kind.

Salt-peter is Sal of ſtones.

Moreouer, I haue obſerued it to bee the practiſe of the Hollanders, beeing wounded by Gunne-ſhotte, to diſſolue two charges of powder in Wine, and to drinke it off, hoping, by that meanes to be freed from all future accidents which might happen to their wounds (although I doe not approoue thereof, becauſe it is a moſt inſufficient remedy.) Alſo, ſuch vlcers which are made through the combuſtion of powder, are of no other nature then thoſe that are made by fire, or ſcalding water. But, wherefore ſhould I alledge any forraine example? Do we not ſee amongſt our owne ſouldiers, I do not know on what occaſion, but only to ſhew themſelues braue fellowes, to emptie their charges of pouder into their cuppes, and drinke it without anie inconuenience at all; and others in like manner, beeing hurt on any part of their bodies, will apply of the same vpon their vlcers to drie them, and finde much profit by it. As for those which do affirme that it is not in the powder, but the Bullet, which being subtilly pierced in many places, or filled vp with venome, or stieped, rubbed, or mixed with any poyson, causeth the aforesayd daungerous accidents: To such do I answer without further trouble, that the fire set to the powder, is sufficient to purifie the poyson of the Bullet, if any there were; the which can not be done by impoysoned Swords, Pikes, Arrowes, and such like, because they passe not thorow the action of the fire. Briefly, to confirme my opinion to be true, there is not anie one of those that were in your Maiesties Campe at Roan, that doth not assuredly know, that those Bullets which were shotte against those of the Towne, to be altogether free from poyson. Neuertheless, the besieged Townes-men affirmed, that all those Bullets were poysoned. Also, the Souldiers of your Maiesties Camp had the same opinion, of such Bullets which were shot at them out of the town, that they were all impoysoned by them; rather beleeuing and iudging of the qualitie of the wounds by their euill succesſe, then by the Causes whereby they were made.

Refutation of those that affirme the Bullet to be impoysoned.

True it is, that as in Physicke, according to the Sentence of Hyppocrates in the Epidemies; as Galen noteth on the twenty sentence, and the twenty one of the third Section of the third booke, all diseases are called Pestilentiall and venomous, being from common and general causes of what kinde soeuer they be, and such kill many persons: so in the like maner, we may call such wounds as are made by Gunne-shot venomous, which are more difficult to heale then others; not because they doe participate of any venonosity, but from some generall cause depending, either frō the Cacochimie of the body, putrifaction of the aire, or the corruption of the victualls, whereby those vlcers are brought to be more malignant Cacoethes, and rebellious to all medicines.

To affirme, that it is onely the combustion of the bullet, which causeth the afore said danger; I cannot conceiue their reasons, seeing that the Bullet is (for the most part) made but of lead, and therefore vnable to indure any great heate, without being altogether dissolued, which we neuertheleſſe do see to passe thorow a coat Armour, and to penetrate the body through and through, and yet to remaine whole.

Refutation of those that affirme that the Bullet causeth combustion.

Moreouer, we do obserue, that if a Bullet be shot against a stone, or against anie solid matter, it may in the same instant be handled of vs in our hands, without feeling any notable heate, although the violent striking and colliſſion made against the stone, should in reason encrease the heate, if anie there were. And which is more, if a Bullet bee shot against a bagge full of powder, the fire will not endanger it. This I dare be bolde to say and affirme moreouer, That if a quantitie of powder should take fire, being kept in a Tower, or any other place, by the meanes of a Bullet shot; it was not the heate of the Bullet, but rather the violent striking of the Bullet against the stones of the said Tower, which might cause sparkes of fire to fall amongst the powder; euen as the smiting of a steele against a flint stone. The like wee may iudge of such thatched houses, which haue bene set on fire by a musket shot, to haue rather proceeded from some wad, either of Towe or Paper, rammed in with the powder, and so fired with it. But that which doth most confirme mee in the assurance of mine opinion, is, that if a ball of Waxe be shot out of a Musket, it feeleth no force of fire at all, for then would it melt; neuertheleſſe, it will pierce an inch boord. An argument of sufficient weight to prooue, that the Bullets cannot be so extreamely heated by the force of the powder, that they should cauterize and burne, as many haue esteemed.

An example of a Ball of Waxe.

And as for that blackeneſſe, which is ordinarily found to be about the Orifices of such wounds, and other adiacent parts: I affirme, that this accident doth not proceed from any qualitie of fire accompanying the Bullet, but because of the great convulsion that it maketh. For it cannot enter into the body otherwise then by an extreame and incredible force, because it is of a round figure.

Whence it prodeedeth, that wounds made by gun-shot, are ordinarily blacke.

Vpon this point, if the wounded persons themselues be demaunded; I beleeue they will testifie the trueth of my saying, because they are no sooner strooke with the Bullet, but they doe feele in the same instant, as if a club or some other heauie burthen burthen were falne on the offended part, in the which they feele a heauy paine, with a benummed ſtupifaction of the part; which diſſipateth and ſometimes extinguiſheth the naturall heate, together with the ſpirites contayned therein; from whence there foloweth oftentimes a gangrene and mortification of the part, yea ſometimes of the whole body. And as for the Eſcarre which they affirme there to be, and fall away as they ſay, they doe abuſe themſelues: for it is onely ſome certaine portion of the membranes and contuſed fleſh, dilacerated by the Bullet, which becometh corrupted, and ſo ſeperateth it ſelfe from the ſound parts which are greatly contuſed.

Reaſons of thoſe of contrary opinion.

Although that theſe reaſons doe make it manifeſt enough, that there is no venomous qualitie in the powder, nor action of fire carryed with the Bullet; neuertheleſſe, many, building their opinions vpon naturall Philoſophie, doe maintayne the contrarie, affirming that Cannon ſhot is like vnto the clappes of Thunder, which burſt foorth of the Clouds in the middle Region of the ayre, and ſo fall violently on the earth. From the which ſimilitude they would inferre and conclude, that there is both fire, and a venomous qualitie in the Bullet, as it proceedeth out of the mouth of the Cannon. I know (I thanke God) that Thunder beeing ingendered from a groſſe and viſcuous exhalation, by means of vapour conioyned with it, doth neuer breake foorth of the Clouds to penetrate heere below; but it draweth and bringeth immediately with it a certaine fire, ſometimes more ſubtle, ſometimes more groſſe, according to the diuerſitie of the matter, whereof the exhalation is compoſed. For Seneca writeth in the ſecond Booke of his Naturall Queſtions, chapter 49. that there are three kindes of Thunders, all diffring the one from the other, according to the quantitie and manner of their inflammation. The firſt, by reaſon of the matter thereof, it being moſt thin and ſubtle, it doth pierce & penetrate ſuddenly the obiects which it toucheth. The ſecond kind, by reaſon of the violence thereof, breaketh and diſſipateth the ſame things, becauſe the matter thereof is more violent, and compact as a tempeſt. The third ſort being compoſed of a more earthie matter, burneth with manifeſt tokens of the heate thereof. I alſo know, that the Thunder is of nature peſtilentiall and fætide, becauſe of the groſe & ſlimy matter thereof; which being burnd, leaueth behind it ſuch a ſtinking ſauor, that all animals do ſo much auoid it, that if it do happen to fal into their dennes, other places of haunt, they will vterly abandon and forſake ſuch places; ſo much do they hate the infectious ſtinke of that poiſon. The ſame is noted by Olaus Magnus, in his Septentrionall Hiſtorie, that in certayne places where Thunder hath falne, preſently after the fall thereof, the fields haue beene found afterwards to be couered & ſtrewed ouer with ſulphure, neuertheleſſe vnprofitable, and almoſt extinguiſhed. For all theſe reaſons, I muſt not confeſſe, that the blows of Gun-ſhot are accompanyed with poyſon and fire, as the clappes of Thunder are. For although they doe agree the one with the other, in ſome ſimilitude, it is not therefore in their ſubſtance and matter, but rather in the manner which they haue to batter, teare, and diſſipate the obiects which they doe meete with, that is to ſay, the clappes of Thunder through the force of fire; and of the bolte or ſtone ſometimes engendered therein: and the blowes of Gunne-ſhot by the meanes of the Ayre forced away by impetuoſitie, and ſo conducting the Bullet, cauſeth the like diſaſter.

Anſwere to the contrary Reaſons.

What if I ſhould be conuicted by ſtronger Arguments, ſo that I were enforced to auouch, that Thunder and the Cannon to be of the like ſubſtance; yet I ſhould neuer bee forced to ſay, that the ſhotte of the Cannons and Muskets doe participate of a fierie qualitie. Plinie ſaith in the ſecond Booke of his Hiſtorie, and the 51. chapter, that among Thunder, one kinde is compoſed of a maruellous drie matter, diſſipating all ſuch things it meeteth withall; neuertheleſſe, without anie ſigne of burning: others, of a more humid nature, which in like manner burneth not, but blacketh and diſcoloreth much, more then the firſt. Others are compoſed of a very cleare and ſubtile matter: the nature whereof is moſt maruellous, forſomuch that it is not to be doubted (as Seneca hath well ſaid) that there is therein a certayne diuine vertue: and it is in melting Golde or Siluer in a mans purſe, the purſe it ſelfe not beeing ſo much as touched therewith.

Seneca. Three kindes of Thunders.

A maruailous effect of thunders.

Alſo in melting a ſword, the ſcabberd thereof remayning whole. Alſo, in diſſoluing into droppes the yron head of a Pike, without burning, or ſo much as heating the wood. In ſhedding the wine out of a veſſell, without burning or breaking of the caske. According to the aforeſayd teſtimony, I can aſſure you, and that without any preiudice, that thoſe Thunders, which onelie breake and diſſipate without any burning; and ſuch which do leaue effects full of great admiration, not to be much vnlike in ſubſtance to the Canon ſhott, and not thoſe which carrie immediately with them the action of fire.

Example. To prooue my ſaying true, this one example ſhall ſuffice. A certaine Souldier receyued a wound in his Thigh with a Musket ſhot, from whence I extracted a bullet; the which beeing wrapped in the Taffatie of his breeches, made a very deepe wound. Neuertheleſſe, I drew it forth of the wound with the ſame Taffatie, it being without any ſigne of burning.

And which is more, I haue ſeene many men, who not beeing ſhot, nor anie thing touched therewith, vnleſſe it were in their apparrell only; haue receiued ſuch an aſtoniſhment by a Cannon ſhot, that onely paſſed nere them: that their members thereby haue become blacke and liuid; and ſhortly after, haue fallen into a gangrene and mortification, whereof in the end they haue dyed.

Theſe effects are like vnto thoſe of the thunder before ſpoken of. Neuertheleſſe, there is not in them any fire or poyſon: which maketh mee conclude, that there is no poyſon in the common and ordinarie powder. Seeing therefore, that this diſaſter was common to all thoſe which were hurt in theſe laſt warres, and yet neither by fire or poyſon that ſo many valiant men dyed. To what cauſe may wee impute this euill? I am ſo confident of the true cauſe (my Liege) that I hope preſently to make your Maieſtie vnderſtand the ſame, to the end that your demaund may be fully ſatisfied.

Thoſe which haue conſumed their age and ſtudy in the ſecrets of naturall Philoſophie, haue left vs this amongeſt other things, for authenticke and appooued of all times. Which is, that the Elements doe ſymbolize in ſuch ſort the one with the other, that they doe ſometimes tranſforme and change themſelues, the one into the other, in ſuch ſort, that not onelie their firſt qualities, which are heate, coldnes, drineſſe and moyſture: but alſo their ſubſtances are changed, by rarification or condenſation of themſelues; ſo the fire doth conuert it ſelfe ordinarily into ayre, the aire into water, the water into earth; and contrariwiſe the earth into water, the water into ayre, and the ayre into fire. The which wee may dayly behold, and prooue it by thoſe bellowes of Copper which the Dutchman brings vs, being compoſed in the forme of a Boll, which beeing filled with water, and hauing but one hole in the middeſt of the Sphericall forme thereof: receiueth the tranſmutation of the water within it into ayre, thorow the action of the fire, neare vnto the which the Boll muſt bee placed; and ſo thruſteth the aire forth of it with violence, making a continuall noyſe or ſound, vntil all the ayre be gone foorth of it. The like may be knowne by Egges or Cheſſenuts; for eyther of them being put into the fire before they are crackt, or the Rhinds broken, preſently the watery humidity contained in them, doth conuert it ſelfe into ayre, through the action of the fire: and the ayre in making his paſſage, burſteth the ſhell, becauſe it occupieth more place being in the forme of ayre, into the which it was chaunged by rarification cauſed by the fire, then it did vnder the forme of water; and not finding paſſage, is conſtrained to make one by violence, according vnto the propoſition helde for moſt certayne and true amongeſt all Phyſitians; that is to ſay, of that one part of earth is made tenne of water: and of one part of water is made tenne of ayre, as of one part of aire ten of fire. I do ſay and affirme ſo much of the matters contayned in the ſaid Gun-pouder, which by meanes of the fire is conuerted into a great quantity of ayre; the which becauſe it cannot be contained in the place, where the matter was before the tranſmutation thereof, is compelled to iſſue foorth with an incredible violence: by meanes whereof, the bullet breaketh, ſhiuereth and rendeth all that euer it meets with, yet doth not the fire accompany it. Euen as we ſee a Bow, or a Sling ſhoote foorth an Arrow or Stone, without any aire at all.

But the bullet drieth before it ſuch a ſubtle winde, and ſo ſwiftly agitated, that ſometimes the very winde it ſelfe, without the action of the Bullet, cauſeth ſtrage and wonderfull effects. For ſometimes, I haue knowne it make a fracture in the bones, without any diuiſion of the fleſh. And heerein it may be compared (as wee ſaid before) vnto the effect of Thunder: euen ſo we ſee, that if the ſaide powder bee incloſed in Mines and Vaults of the earth, and being conuerted into aire thorough the action of the fire ſet vnto it, howe it doeth ruinate and reuerſe huge maſſes of earth almoſt as bigge as Mountaines. Alſo in this yeare, in your Maieſties Towne of Paris, a certaine quantity of powder, but newly made in the Arcenall, by taking fire, cauſed ſuch a great tempeſt, that the whole Towne ſhooke at it: for with an horrible fury, it leuelled with the Earth all the houſes neere vnto that place, and diſcouered and battered down the windowes of all thoſe that ſtood within the fury of it. And to be briefe (euen as a clap of thunder) it did reuerſe heere and there many men halfe ſlaine; taking away from ſome their eyes, from others their hearing, and left others no leſſe torne and mangled in their members, then if foure horſes had drawne them in pieces: and all this by the onely agitation of the ayre, into which ſubſtance, the powder was conuerted. The which, according to the quantity and quality of the matter thereof, and according to his motion, either more or leſſe violent, hath cauſed ſo many wonderfull accidents in our Prouinces; altogether like vnto thoſe which are cauſed through the incloſing of windes in the bowels and cauities of the earth, not being perſpirable. The which, ſtriuing to haue vent, bloweth with ſuch a ſtrong and violent agitation, that they make the earth to tremble & quake thereat: thereby deboliſhing Cities, and ruinating buildings, and tranſporting them from one place to another. As the Townes of Megara and Egina, anciently much celebrated in the Country of Greece, periſhing by Earth-quakes can witneſſe vnto vs.

The effect of Artillery like to the thunder

I omit to diſcouer (as but little ſeruing to our purpoſe) how the winde encloſed in the Entrailes of the earth, maketh a noyſe of diuers ſounds, and very ſtrange, according to the diuers formes of the conduits and paſſages, through the which it iſſueth by, euen after the manner of muſicall Inſtruments; the which being large, do giue a great and baſe ſound, & being narrow, do make high and ſharpe notes, and being crooked or replied, make diuers ſounds; as wee ſee by experience in the Huntſmans horne, and in Trumpets, the which alſo, being moiſtned with water, do make a hollow gurguling ſound.

In like manner, theſe noiſes, murmurings, and clamors, are ſundry wayes diuerſified, according to the places whence they proceed; in ſuch ſort, that ſomtimes hath bene heard a clamorous cry, repreſenting (as it ſeemed) the aſſault of a Citty, the cryes and lowings of Buls, or the neighing of Horſes, roaring of Lyons, ſound of Trumpets, reports of Artillery, and many other dreadfull thinges; yea ſometimes humane voyces. As it is reported by one, who had heard a voyce (as it were) of a woman beating; which made (as he imagined) ſuch a wofull and greeuous lamentation; where-with he became ſo greatly affrighted, that he had ſcarſely breath ſufficient to make this report. But when he had well vnderſtood the cauſe of this plaintiue voyce, he was preſently deliuered from that feare, which otherwiſe might haue killed him.

Diuers ſounds iſſuing out of the veines of the earth.

But ſome perhaps will ſay, that theſe things haue alwayes bene, and no leſſe ordinary in the times paſt, then they are at this preſent: and therefore it is a great folly in me to alledge them, for efficient cauſes of the death of ſo many men. The which imputation, I ſhould freely confeſſe, if I ſhould preſent them for ſuch: but ſeeing, that by them I would onely paralel and compare the impetuoſity of Artillery, with that of thunder, and the motions of the earth; which being ſo, it will appeare, that it maketh nothing againſt my firſt intention, as I hope to demonſtrate cleerely, that I am ſlandered without a cauſe, if you pleaſe to giue eare to the deduction following. In the which, I will plainly and briefely deſcribe the true cauſes of the late mortality, which happned among your Highneſſe Soldiers.

Amongſt the things neceſſary for our liues, there is nothing that can more alter our bodyes, then the ayre; the which, continually (willing or vnwilling) we inſpire by thoſe conduites which Nature hath appointed pointed for that end; as the mouth, the nose, and generally through all the pores of the skinne and Arteries therein infixed, whether wee eate, drinke, watch, or sleepe, or doe any other action, whether Natural, Vitall, or Animall. From thence it commeth, that the aire inspired into the Lungs, the Heart, and the Braine, and vniuersally in all the parts of the bodie, to refresh, and in some measure to nourish the same, is the cause that a man cannot liue one minute without inspiration; according to the which wonderfull benefit, the excellent Physitian Hippocrates hath pronounced, and that truly, that the aire hath a kinde of Diuinity in it; because, that in breathing and blowing ouer all parts of the world vniuersally, it doth circumuolue all things therein contayned: nourishing them miraculously, strengthning them firmly, and maintaining them in an amiable Vnion; altogether symbolizing with the Starres and Planets, into the which the diuine prouidence is infused, which changeth the aire at his pleasure, and giueth it power not only ouer the mutation of times and seasons, but also of the alteration of naturall bodyes. And therefore the Philosophers and Physitians haue expressely commanded, that we should haue a principall regarde vnto the situation and motions of the heauenly bodies, and constitutions of the Ayre, when the preseruation of health, or the curation of diseases are in question: but especially the course and mutation of the aire is of great power, as wee may easily iudge by the foure seasons of the yeare. For the Aire being hot and dry in Sommer, our bodies in like manner doth therby become heated and dried: and in winter the humidity and coldnesse of the ayre doth likewise fill our bodies with the very same qualities; in such order neuertheles, and in so good a dispositiõ of nature, that although our temperatures seeme to bee changed, according to the foure seasons of the yeere; we neuertheless receiue no harme thereby, if those times doe keepe their seasons and qualities free from excesse. But to the contrary, if the seasons be so peruerted, that the Somer is colde, and the Winter hotte, and the other seasons in the like distemperature; this discord bringeth with it a great perturbation, both in our bodyes and in our spirits, constrained neuertheless to receiue the danger, by reason that the causes are extreame, and on euery side encompasse vs; so that we are constrained to lodge it in vs by those Organes and Conduites appointed by Nature to that end, as partly, to expell the superfluous excrements of our nourishment, and partly to receyue the said externall causes, which is the ayre or winde, producing in vs diuers effects, according to those parts of the world frõ whence they do proceed.

The alienation of seasons cause of diseases.

Hyp. in the Preface of his Prognost.

Hyp. in the beginning of his book de Aere locis & aquis.

For, it beeing so, that the Southerly Windes are hot and moyst, that of the North cold and dry; the Easterly Winds for the most part are cleare and pure, and the Westerly cloudy and subiect to rain; yet it is a most assured thing, that the aire which we do inspire continually, holdeth in all, and through all, the qualitie that is most predominant. And therefore, wee should of necessity consider in all diseases, and the inconueniences which happẽ therein, the quality of the winds, and the power which they haue ouer the bodies; as Hippocrates hath lernedly left vs by writing, in the third Booke of his Aphorisms. Chap. 3. and 17. saying, That our bodies do receiue a great alteration through the vicissitude of the times and seasons of the yeare. As by the South-winde our bodyes are subiect to all diseases, because that moysture is their primitiue cause: it also weakneth our naturall heate, the which in the opposite case is much fortified thorough a cold and dry winde, which also maketh our spirits more quick and subtle. Th verity of which sentence, the inhabitants of the Territory of Narbonne doe too much experiment to their dammage. For being themselues betweene the lustiest and healthfullest people of all France; yet neuertheless they themselues are very sickly for the most part, their bodyes leane, their countenances sad and heauy; their faces tawny, or of an Oliue colour, do manifestly shew the same. Also among other diseases, they are almost all subiect to the white Leprosie; and the last Vlcers which they haue, which we make no account of at Poictiers or Paris, do ordinarily continue with them a whole yeare together. Not for any other cause, as they themselues confesse, and as all straungers know that haue liued in their country, but onely because they are for the most part, blasted blaſted and breathed vpon with a Southerly Winde, which in their language they call Altan, & maketh the aire to be groſſe and clowdy; cauſing in their bodies al the effects which are attributed by Hippocrates to the Southerly winds, in his third booke and fift Aphoriſme, that is to ſay, when it reigneth, it dulleth the hearing, dimmeth the ſight, ſwelleth and aggrauateth the head, weakneth and abateth all the forces of the body.

Lib. 13. Aphor. 25. Alſo, when Hippocrates compareth the temperatures of the one qualitie with the other, he reſolueth vpon this point; That the dry ſeaſons are farre more healthfull then the humid, that haue continued for a long ſucceſſion of time, becauſe exceſſiue humidity is the true matter of putrifaction, as experience telleth vs. For wee ſee, that in thoſe places where the Marine or Sea-winds haue long blowne, all kindes of fleſh (though neuer ſo new and freſh) will corrupt in leſſe then an houre. Theſe things beeing conſidered, that it is moſt neceſſary for the conſeruation of our bodies in health, that the ſeaſons ſhould follow their naturall temperatures, without any exceſſe or contrariety, there is no doubt to be made, but that our bodies wil fall into many vnnaturall diſeaſes, when the naturall qualities of the ſeaſons are peruerted thorough the euill diſpoſition of the aire and winde, that predominateth therein. It being ſo, that for theſe 3. yeares ſpace heere in France, the ſeaſons of euery yeare haue not kept their ordinary qualities. In the Sommer wee haue but little heate, in the Winter a little or no cold at all. Alſo the other haue bene continually diſtempered with raine and moyſture, together with much ſoutherly winds whoſe nature we haue declared before, & this throughout all France.

I know no man ſo little ſeene in natural Philoſophy, or in Aſtrologie, which will not finde the aire to be the efficient cauſe of ſo many euils, which for theſe 3. yeares ſpace haue happened in the Kingdome of France. For from whence ſhould proceed thoſe contagious Peſtilences, which happened indifferently to old and young, to rich and poore, and in ſo many places, but from the corruption of the Ayre? From whence ſhould proceede ſo many kinds of Feauers, Pleuriſies, Apoſtumes, Catars, defluctions of ſmall Poxe and Meazels? So many kindes of venomous Beaſtes, as Frogges, Toads, Graſhoppers, Caterpillers, Spiders, Flies, Waſpes, Snailes, Serpents, Vipers, Snakes, Lizards, Scorpions, and Aſpickes, but onely from a putrifaction reſulting from the humiditie of the aire, accompanied with a languiſhing heate. This is it (I ſay) that hath engendered in vs, and in all the Country of France, ſo many ſtrange and vnknowne accidents. Behold therefore how our naturall heate hath bene weakned, how our blood and humors haue beene corrupted through the malignity of the ayre, which theſe Southerly winds haue cauſed, thorough the hote and moyſt quality thereof.

Thus much I haue obſerued, that wher there hath bene need of Phlebotomizing, there hath beene but little bloud drawne from any, whether they wer yong or old, wounded, or not of ſo good or euill temperature, but it hath bene corrupted, and appeared of white or greeniſh Colours. This I haue alwayes obſerued in theſe laſt Warres, and in other places where I haue bene called to cure the wounded: ſuch as haue bene phlebotomized by the preſcription of the Phyſitian, either for the preuention of accidents, or the furtherance of the cure. In all which, I ſay indifferently, I haue found the bloode putrified and corrupted.

This beeing ſo, it muſt needes follow, that the fleſhy parts of our bodies cannot be otherwiſe then euilly diſpoſed: and all our bodies Cacochymate; ſeeing that their nouriſhment which is the blood, is putrified, and the ayre altogether corrupted. From whence it followeth, that thoſe bodies which were wounded in the fleſhy parts, were difficult to cure, conſidering that there was in them a perdition of ſubſtance; the which hauing neede of the regeneration of the fleſh, could not bee accompliſhed, neither by Medicines, nor any Art of the Chirurgian; ſuch & ſo great was the Cacochimy or euill conſtitution of their bodies. Euen as in an Hydropticke perſon, there can no fleſh be regenerated, becauſe the blood is too colde and watery: and in the Elephantick or leprous diſeaſe, the fleſh and other parts do abide in putrifaction, becauſe of the corrupted blood whereby they are nouriſhed. In like manner, in wounds of Cacochymed bodies, dies, there can be no regeneration made of any good ſubſtance, becauſe that to reſtore a lawdable fleſh in the wounded part it is required, that the blood ſhould not offend neither in quantity nor quality, & that the offended part bee in it naturall temperature. All theſe things were wanting in the times of theſe laſt Warres: and therefore it is not to be wondred at, if the woundes which were then receiued (although they were but ſmall and of little cõſequence in the noble or ignoble parts) haue brought with them ſo many tedious accidents, and in the end death; becauſe that the aire which doeth encompaſſe vs, maketh the wounds to be corrupt and putrified, by reaſon of the inſpiration and tranſpiration thereof, eſpecially when it ſelfe is corrupt and putrified, by altering & corrupting the humors.

A ſimilitude.

Intollerable ſtinke proceeding from the wounded parts of men.

Of this point I haue had the experience in many Wounds, which I haue bin called to dreſſe, that haue rendred a moſt inſupportable ſtinking ſauour, as a certaine witneſſe of corruption and infection, inſomuch, that the aſſiſtants could hardlie endure to be preſent at their dreſſings. It need not to be here alledged, that this was for want of being cleanely kept, or often dreſſing, or for not adminiſtering to them things neceſſary: for this corruption was as common to Princes and great Lords, as vnto poore ſoldiers; whoſe wounds (if by chance one day eſcaped wherein they were not dreſt, ſo great was the number of the hurt ſoldiers) you ſhould finde in them the morrow after, a great quantitie of wormes, with a maruellous ſtinking ſauour. And moreouer, there hapned vnto them many Apoſtumes in diuers parts of their bodies oppoſite to their hurts. For if they were ſhotte in the right ſhoulder, they ſhold haue an Apoſtume on the left knee; and if the wound were in the right leg, the Apoſtume would ariſe in the leſte arme. As it hapned to the late K. of Navar, to Mounſieur de Neuers, and to Monſieur de Rendan, and almoſt to all others. So it ſeemeth, that Nature being ſo much oppreſſed with corrupted humors, could not be ſufficiently purged and diſcharged of them by wounds onely, but ſent ſome part of the corruption to ſome other part either hidden or apparent. For, if the Apoſtumes appeared not outwardly, they ſhould be found in the inward part; as in the Liuer, Lungs, or Spleen. Frõ thoſe putrifactions were ſtirred vp certain vapors, which through their combination vvith the heart, cauſeth continual Feauers; with the Liuer, a let and hinderance of the generation of good blood; & with the brain ſwoonings, faintings, convulſions, and conſequently death.

Venomous wounds.

Now becauſe of thoſe aforeſayde accidents, it is vnpoſſible for any Chirurgian (were he neuer ſo expert) to correct the malignity of the aforeſaid wounds: neuertheleſſe thoſe that are employed therein, ought not to be reprehended; becauſe it is impoſſible for them to warre againſt God, nor againſt the aire, wherein oftentimes are hidden the rods of his diuine iuſtice. If therefore, according to the ſentence of ancient Hippocrates, who ſaieth; That all contuſed woundes ought to bee brought to ſuppuration, thereby to bee perfectly cured; which method wee are ſomtimes conſtrained to change, becauſe of the putrifactious Gangrenas and mortifications which doe accompanie ſuch wounds, thorough the corruption of the aire; and can any blame or accuſe vs, becauſe we are conſtrained through neceſſity to change and alter that manner of curation, and inſted of ſuppuratiue medicins to vſe other remedies, to reſiſt ſuch accidents which not onely happen in wounds made by Gun-ſhot, but alſo by ſwords or ſtaues: which remedies ſhall be deſcribed in this preſent Diſcourſe. Beſides humane cauſes, that man is ill inſtructed in the knowledge of Celeſtial things, which doth not beleeue for certaine, that the wrath of God hangeth ouer vs, to punniſh the faults which ordinarily we cõmit againſt his Maieſty. His ſcourges are prepared ready, his rods and weapons haue theyr miniſters alwaies at hand, to execute the commandement of his diuine iuſtice, into whoſe ſecrets I dare enter no further, but will conclude with the opinion of the beſt aduiſed Practitioners, that the principall occaſion of the aforeſaide mortalitie, did proceede from the pure and determinate will of God, who by the temperature that he hath giuen to the ayre and windes (as the Heraldes of his diuine Iuſtice) hath made vs apt to receyue the aforeſaide inconueniences, which we haue incurred by our iniquities.

CHAP. V.

¶ Of the Excellencie of the Arte of Phisicke, going farre beyond all other humane Arts and Sciences whatsoeuer.

What humane Arts are trulie ſalde to bee.

WE vnderſtand humane Artes (as well Liberall as Mechanicall) to bee all thoſe, that Man (inſpired by God) hath inuented for his neceſſitie, commoditie, or recreation. Amongeſt which alſo is Phiſicke, the practiſe of naturall Philoſophie vppon the bodies of men, for whom all mechanicall Arts were deuiſed; as Artes liberall for exerciſe of the minde. We except onely from all ordinary profeſſions of Man, the ſacred Science of Diuinity; which we vnderſtand, not to come within compaſſe of this cõpariſon, when we extoll Phyſicke to be aboue all humane Arts: becauſe it is neyther Art or humane Science; but a matter meerely and purely diuine, not inuented by men, but infuſed by God; concerning ſoules, and not bodies; eternall, infallible, immutable, hauing (for obiect) God Almighty, Creator of the World, who made it of nothing, and for the ſeruice of man. In whom we are to conſider a reaſonable ſoule, the body, and benefits which are giuen vnto him, for the ſupport and maintaining of his life.

All Arts inuented for the vſe of man.

Diuinity excepted from all humane Arts.

Diuinity hath her eſpeciall care of the ſoule, and next to her, Moral Philoſophy. Skill and knowledge, reſtrained vnto humane Lawes, do diſcourſe on goods and proprieties appertaining to men, rendering to euery one that which is his owne. Betweene them both is Phyſicke, conſeruing the body in health, expelling Diſeaſes, and ſauing from death, ſo farre as it pleaſeth God to permit. If then the excellency of profeſſions, is to be eſteemed in and by their ſubiects, according as they ought to bee: Phyſicke will then aſſume the ſecond place. For, the ſoule is more then the body, and the bodie more then garments.

The nature or qualitie of knowledge in human lawes.

The place allotted to phyſick in the ſecond degree.

I will not heere conteſt with my Grand Maſters the Magiſtrates, who haue power ouer mens bodies, as well in caſe of life, as death: for their authority is nothing elſe but a meere declaration; either of pardoning, or puniſhing with death, according to the quality of deſert. As for the power of abſolution or pardon, if it be in grace, as the ſole Prince or Soueraigne Magiſtrate may do it: it proceedeth from the priuiledge giuen him by God, and not from any knowledge of the Lawes. Like to the other, that declareth the innocence and preuention of the accuſed: the which is properly to ſaue, or giue life, becauſe the party ſtanding ſo accuſed, hath not therefore deſerued death.

The power of Magiſtrates in caſes of life or death, holding their authority from God.

And as for power of putting to death, therein is no praiſe; at leaſt, it ought not to be compared with the power of ſauing life. For, ſo much doth the Phyſition (the grace of God aſſiſting) to man, beeing attainted with deadly diſeaſes, and doubtles ſhould dye, except they were ſuccoured in ſuch manner. Now, whether it is effectable, or no, and that (by the Art of Phyſicke) life may be prolonged: that we ſhal more amply relate in the following chapter. Onely our intent heere, is, to ſhewe the excellencie of man; to confirme the excellency of that Art, which is dedicated onely to his conſeruation.

What diuerſity there is betweene the two powers, of ſauing life, and putting to death.

The principall dignity of Man, is in this, that God hath vouchſafed to beſtow on him his owne Image and reſemblance, giuing him an immortall ſoule, capable of the Diuinity: in regard that all thinges were ſubmitted to him, for his neceſſitie, commodity, and recreation; hauing made (for his ſeruice) Heauen, Earth, the Sea, and all that is in them. For God hath no neede of any thing, made by himſelfe: All is for our vſe, and therefore it is eaſie to vnderſtand and know, that Man is more worthy and excellent then all the worlde. So, to ſpeake truly, Heauen and Earth, which haue had a beginning; were ordained for an ending, and to waxe olde like a Garment. Onely Man ſhall neuer end, but change his condition, and of beeing mortall, he ſhall become immortall; in a ſhort while after the ſoule ſhal receiue her diuorce from the body, taking it vp again, in much more glorious manner then before, and in ſuch a perfect temper, as neuer can be ſubiect to corruption.

Wherein the cheefeſt dignitie of Man doth conſiſt.

Man was' ere ated neuer to haue ending, but to change his preſent condition.

Seeing then, that Man is the worthieſt thing in all the world, beſide al other what ſoeuer: the Science ordained for his perſon,

Man the only worthy thing in al the world son, must needs bee the most excellent aboue all other, next vnto that which properly concerneth his Creator. For, Man is the most worthy creature of all, and (by consequence) the Art or Science which maintaineth him in life and health, is the onely excellent of all humane Arts. This is a strong argument, for the preheminēce and dignity of Physicke, according to the singularity of the subiect whereon it discourseth.

The Antiquity, Necessitie, and vtilitie of Man.

I could giue a glance at some other matters, which make (in like manner) for his commendation: As his Antiquity, Necessity, and Vtility, together with the Authority of them, that haue the more reuerenced and esteemed him, for the same reasons. As concerning his Antiquitie, no man doubteth, but it is as olde as the transgression of Adam, and that so soone as he had sinned, he (thereby) becam subiect to sickneſſe. He must needs be Physition to himselfe, to whom God had giuen knowledge, concerning the vertue of all thinges whatsoeuer, and causing him to giue them seuerall names, answereable and according to their seuerall proprieties.

Adam was Physition to himselfe.

What attribution is made to Physick by profane histories.

Prophane Histories, doe attribute the inuention of Physick to god Apollo, which is the Sunne: signifying therby, that from the Sun proceedeth the vertue of Plants, and other medicaments, which the earth produceth. Hereupon they conclude, that Æsculapius (the first that made profession of this Art) was his sonne; and he the Father of Machaon & Podalirius, vulnerarie Physitions (otherwised called Chirurgeons) who were in the warre of Troy, the History whereof, is the very ancientest in the world.

Chirurgions termed vulnerary Physitiōs

Now, concerning Antiquity, it is one of those conditions, that commendeth something; prouided, that it hath beene continued. For, if it be neither vse-able, nor beneficiall, it will soon haue ending. But we see (euen to this instant) that Physicke hath beene well maintained, euermore in augmentation, beauty, and liberall bounty. And that, by industrie of the cheefest persons that haue bin, not onely Philosophers by profession, but likewise by Kings, Princes, and other men of greatest esteeme, it hath beene highly honoured, according as ancients Histories, and their learned labors lefts to vs of Physicke, do plainly testifie.

Philosophers, Kings, and Princes, haue bin Physitions

True it is, that the Romaines did let it passe by them, for about sixe hundred yeares, as holding it in detestation; for the cruelty of some Chirurgeons which came forth of Greece, a Nation to them very suspitious. But since those times, Physitions were honoured, much respected, & maintained in Rome; holding ranke with the cheefest Noblemen and Knights.

Plin. in li. 29. c. 1

Physicke neglected in Rome for some time.

Now, touching the Necessity thereof, it is so manifest, as nothing more. But it seemeth, that this may diminish the excellency of the Art; because it is not expetible or desireable of it selfe, but onely for neede. Like as in Moral Philosophy, that is most esteemed, which is desirable of it selfe (As to haue children, then affectable, for some other respect, as to haue goods for those children;) Euen so, Physicke, being not desirable of it selfe (like to Musicke) but for necessity; it appeareth to be the lesse commendable, euen as Mechanicall Arts, which cannot passe without vse. Yet notwithstanding, this is contrary; for, the more necessary Physick is, so much the more it is to bee desired: and the excellency of her effects, maketh her to be the more excellent.

Of the necessity of Physicke.

Physicke not desireable of it selfe.

Mechanicall Arts cannot passe without vse.

And heere, Vtility or commodity ioyneth with it, commending it in the highest degree. For, as there is nothing in the world more welcome then Health, nor more desireable then long life: Physicke, prouiding both for the one and other, is the more beneficiall to the contentment of men, then any other humane Science can be. For (by the contrary) as whosoeuer that hath not health, is vnprofitable to the world: euen so he y hath lyued but a litle while, brought therto the lesser benefit with him. For, as the Father of Eloquence sayd: We are not borne for our selues onely; but our Parents, Kindred, & Friends, our Countrey, yea the whole world; all these do vrge from vs some emolument, and commodity.

Of the vtilitie of Physicke,

Sicke men are vnprofitable to the worlde.

Cicero in lib. 1. de Senectute.

It remaineth now, to confirme al these reasons by great and good Authoritie, of such as haue much esteemed and extolled Physicke, and the professors therof, commending it infinitely by their Writinges. In the performance whereof, I shall contente my selfe, with the exhortation made in Ecclesiasticus, and the remonstrance of our graue father Hippocrates. Nor is he to bee be suspected in the matter, because he was a Physition: for, he was neuer mercenary, nor at the seruice of any man; but free and most liberall of his profession. And he it was, that first diuided Physicke from Philosophie. Because (in elder daies) Physitions were not distinguished by themselues, but Philosophers did contemplate vpon diseases, and their remedies among naturall thinges: for their vse principally (as Celsus witnesseth) who had most need aboue other, in regarde of their bodyes weakenesse, being ouercome with continuall depressions of Age.

Exod. 1

Authority for the honour of Physick.

Hippocrates first seuered Phisicke from Philosophie.

Hippocrates then was the first, that deuided this Art from Philosophy, aud made profession therof publikely; as (afterward) did Diocles, Praxagoras, Chrysippus, Herophilus, and Erasistratus, all his successours. And they (at length) diuided Physicke into three parts, for better accommodation thereof to sicke persons: referring mechanicall people to manuall operation, called Chirurgery, and the preparation of Medicines, which are tearmed Pharmacie or Apothecaries skill, according as (in these our dayes) it is exercised among vs. But it is by mercenary people (for the most part) whose testimonie in the Art of phisick, can carry here no credit; no, not that of Galen himselfe, although he was one of the first subiected seruants thereto.

Physick distinguished three seuerall waies

Galen disallowed in this respect.

Wherfore that shall satisfie me, which is recorded by so great a Father, after I haue made recitall of the words of Ecclesiasticus, the wisedome of Iesus the sonne of Sirach, writing thus in his 38. Chapter, verse 1. Honor the Physition with that honor which is due vnto him, because of the necessity thou hast of him; for the Lord hath created him. 2. Healing commeth of the most High, and the Physition shall bee honoured euen of Kinges. 3. The knowledge of the Physition exalteth his head, and in the sight of Princes he shall be had in admiration. 4. The Lorde hath created Medicines of the Earth, and he that is wise will not abhorre them. 5. Was not the water made sweete with woode, that men should know the vertue thereof? 6. So he hath giuen knowledge vnto men, that hee might be glorified in his meruailous workes. 7. With such doth he heale men, and taketh away their paines.

Eccles. 38

Exod. 15, 25.

8. The Apothecarie maketh his commixtions, and yet hee cannot finish his owne work: for, it is from God, that health commeth ouer all the earth.

Concerning the Apothecaries.

9. My sonne, faile not in thy sickenesse, but pray vnto God, and he will make thee whole.

10. Leaue off from sinne, and order thine hands aright, and clense thine heart from all wickednesse.

11. Offer sweete Incense, and fine Floure for a remembrance; make the Offering fatte, for thou art not the first giuer.

12. Then giue place to the Phisition: for the Lord hath created him, let him not goe from thee, for thou hast need of him.

13. The houre may come, that their enterprizes may haue good successe.

14. For they shall also pray vnto the Lord, that hee would prosper that which is giuen for ease, and their Physicke for prolonging life.

These diuine words do conclude (& verie sufficiently) our purpose, for the dignity, excellency, necessity, vtility, and prerogatiue of Physitions: condemning all such, as hold them in vile esteeme, and (in them) do despise the great goodnesse of Almighty God, who hath bestowed vpon men such meanes of healing. Let vs now heare what was spoken by the learned Hippocrates. The good olde man, in the Booke of the Lawe, complayned so long since, that (euen in his time) Physick was but slenderly esteemed, in regarde of abuse; much more then must it needes be now at this day.

Sufficient proofe for the authoritie of Physicke.

The Art of Physicke (saith hee) is the most apparant of all other: but by the ignorance of some that vse it, and such as indge of the Professours; it is too farre ouergone by all other Artes. The faulte (meethinkes) proceedeth principally from this: That in Cities, there is no punishment appointed to the Art of Physicke, as to other. Except dishonours done it, which are not inflictions sufficient for such as fayle therein.

Hippocra. in lib. de Leg. cap. 14.

They may well bee compared vnto the Actors in a Tragedie, who haue the habite, visage, and outward behauiour, of those personnes which they represent and counterfeit. In like manner, there are many Physitions in name and repute; but verie few that are the men indeede. For, in him that would truely haue the knowledge of Physicke, sixe seuerall qualities or conditions, are necessarily required, which followe thus. 1. The Nature. 2. Discipline. 3. Good Manners. 4. Learning from his Childe-hoode.

A familiar cõparison for the bold abusers of so singular a Science.

Six things required in a true Physitiō, and (without which) he is no body.

5. Loue to the toyle and labour; 6. And obseruation of apt times and seasons. With, and by these he shall become a good Physition, not onely in name, but in deed also. But Ignorance is a wicked treasure, & a Iewell of vile price, to such as haue it, and liue but as in a dreame or opinion.

Plin. l. 19. c. 26

Plinie pursuing this matter, and to the same purpose, taxing the vulgare, that know not how to distinguish betweene the good and badde Physition, listening onely to such as are full of talke, making great vaunts and bragges of themselues, hath these wordes: They get (saith hee) a little taste of the Arte onely, and their rash iudgement so dainly conceiueth, that presently they are skilfull Physitions; albeit (in anie kinde of lying) there is no greater daunger, yet it is not easily discouered, so pleasing is the sweetnesse to a man, in perswasion, and commending himselfe.

Pliny his reprehension of prating Physitians.

Moreouer, there is not any Lawe, for the punishing of capitall ignorance, where it importeth the liues of men, neither is there anie example of vengeance: for, they vndertake matters of difficulty and danger, and make their proofes by killing men, and yet passe vnpunished for thus murdering men. Nay, and that which is farre worsse, when themselues do iustly deserue the reproch: they excuse it, by the sicke patients intemperancie, and impudently doe lay their owne sinne vppon the dead.

No punishment for capital ignorāce

Ignorant Phisitions are meere murderers of men.

I thought it expedient to set downe these words, to the end it may be known, that (euen in these dayes of ours) there are many, that wearing the maske and apparance of Physitions, cause Physicke (thorough their abuses) to bee greatly despised. Euen as many other things (good of themselues, or newtrall) are made worsse then they be indeede, in regard that they are very easily abused. But because I haue formerly promised, to declare in another Chapter, whether life may be prolonged by Physicke, or no, which is an action singular and excellent: I will nexte set downe in ample manner, what mine opinion is concerning that point.

The reason why Physicke is contemned by many.

CHAP. VI.

Whether it bee possible, or no, to prolong the life of man, or woman, by Physicke.

THis Question hath alwayes appeared to bee verie difficult, and hath much afflicted the verie greatest spirits: as lying hid and concealed in the darkest and deepest secrecie of Nature; and therefore it hath bene the more painfull, to such as haue curiously sought after it. The reasons of them that haue debated it, are so strong and powerfull on either side; that hardly can any resolution bee yeelded, or what best may be saide in the case. For there are very many Arguments, absolutely concluding; that the life of man cannot be prolonged, by any remedies or meanes of Physicke. On the contrary, Physitions haue and doe maintaine, that it is possible. Therefore, for the better disciding of this doubt, I will first of all defend each of the seuerall sides, and in the end (like to an honest and indifferent Arbitratour) deliuer therein, mine owne opinion and iudgement.

A question of no mean difficulty to be decided.

Arguments on either side very contradictory to ech other.

That there is a tearme or limitation, appointed vnto the life of man, and that hee cannot goe beyond it by any meanes whatsoeuer; wee haue (in the first place) that which the patient man Iob said, chapt. 14. verses 1. 5. inspired by the Spirite of God. The dayes of Man are short; the number of his Moneths are with the Lord; He hath ordained the boundes and limits of his life, which he cannot passe.

A certain date of time prefixed to the life of Man.

Aristotle affirmeth the same, in his second book of generation and corruption; The time and life (saith he) of euery thing, hath his infinite count and determination: For, in all thinges there is an order, and all life and time is measured by a period. Also, in his fourth booke of the Generation of Creatures, hee sayeth; It is but reasonable, that there should be periods and seasons, as well for Groweth, as for Generation and Life: which are accounted by dayes, monethes, yeares, or other times that are decree- decreed for them heere. And Auerroes explicating the ſame ſaith; All things that are, haue (neceſſarily) life determined vnto them.

All Natures works conſiſt on a certainty of order.

Seeing then, that all the works of Nature do (neceſſarily) conſiſt on a certainty of order, ſo that they neither can bee otherwiſe, or auoide it: And ſeeing alſo, that Art is heerein much inferiour to Nature: it may eaſily bee concluded (as Galen diſputeth in the Booke called Maraſmus) that life is no way to bee prolonged by any cunning. Whereunto Auicen conſenteth, where hee maketh an expreſſe ſearch, for the cauſes of our ineuitable death, ſaying: This naturall death is vndiuidable to euery man, differing one from another, according to their prime complexion, vntill the time they haue in their power, for conſeruing their naturall humidity. For, euery one hath his tearme prefixed, which is diuers in their indiuiſion, by diuerſity of their temper: who haue naturall tearmes, which in other are ſhortned; and yet all according to the will of God, &c.

Galen in Lib. Maraſ.

Auicen in lib. 1. Tempt. 1. doct. 3. cap. 3.

If then the tearmes of life are prefixed and aſsigned to euery perſon, by the will of God, and his ordinance (Nature being but a ſeruant to God, to wit, eſtabliſhing things (by order in this World) from their beginning;) it is not to bee exceeded or out-ſtept, by any meanes in Man, but onely by the grace & goodneſſe of Almighty God. As to King Ezechias, to whom the Prophet Iſaiah had ſignified his death. Yet vpon his Repentance, life was prolonged to him for fifteene yeares, onely by the mercy of God. Who alſo promiſeth in his ſacred Law long life vnto children, That Honor their Father and Mother, and are no way ingratefull to them.

Exod. 20. 12.

Thus we ſee, if (contrary to theſe allegations ſo certaine) wee can extend and prolong the naturall termes of life, by any ordinances or remedies in our Arte. Becauſe there are ſome ſtore of reaſons, which perſwade, that not onely the order of Nature, but alſo our induſtry, doth promiſe long life. Firſt of all, Aſtrologers do maintaine it, where they diſcourſe on elections, figures, and Images. And this hath bene confirmed by experience, in the care and diligence of Phyſitions to manie perſons, who being aſsiſted by remedies and good gouernment: haue maintained themſelues in health. And being crazy & ſickly, haue held out for long time: whereas otherwiſe, they had dyed yong, and neuer ſeene ſo many yeares.

Of remedies and good gouernment for maintaining health.

Plato & Ariſtotle (great and graue Authors) without all exception, doe teſtifye (to this purpoſe) that a learned man, named Herodicus, the moſt ſubiect to ſickneſſe of any in his time: did yet neuertheleſſe liue an hundred yeares, by great skil, and exquiſite manner of Gouernment. Galen alſo (in diuers places) confeſſeth his owne naturall infirmity; but he ſaith withall, that he had ſo wel corrected it, as hardly was he (at any time) ſicke; at leaſt, after he gaue himſelfe wholly to exerciſe Phyſick. Except, when he was once or twice affected with the Ephemerie (which is of a daies continuance) onely being painfull to him, in trauailing to viſit his Friends. And, if wee may credite ſome that haue written, he liued aboue ſeuenſcore years, which may be counted a goodly time.

Sickly Herodicus that liued an hundred yeares.

Galens experience approued on himſelfe.

We ſhall not need to cite the authority of Plutarke, who ſpeaketh of manie verie weak (yet delicate) bodies, that liued long time by the meanes of this Art: becauſe we ſee the ſame now daily experienced on as many. Nor ſhall we likewiſe neede to oppoſe againſt them, diuers intemperate and diſſolute perſons, that daily haue deſpiſed all good gouernment; and yet notwithſtanding, haue attained to great yeares, yea, to decrepite age. For, it is verie certaine, that if ſuch perſons as are wel borne, and of good temper, woulde liue and be aſſiſted by Phyſicall means in their neceſſities: they ſhould be ſlower to Age, and haue the benefit (doubtleſſe) of long life. Which is eaſie to proue, becauſe wee oftentimes ſee, that ſome, who are vnhelthfull by nature, or elſe by accident: do yet liue longer time, thē others that are more ſtrong and luſtie. Becauſe ſtrong bodies, truſting onlie in their ſtrength; do liue diſorderly, without any lawe or gouernment at all. Others, being ſober and continent, abſtaining from hurtfull things, and obſeruing a certaine manner of liuing, by direction of a skilfull Phyſition indeede; haue hadde their life time longer, and much more healthfull. Whereuppon grew the old Prouerbe, A crackt Pitcher (ſometime) laſteth longer, then one that is new.

Intemperate bodies haue liued long, without any helpe of Phyſicke.

Of perſonnes wel born, and of good temper.

Heereupon Galen ſaide well: It is verie credible, that ſuch men liue leſſe time, then is ordained them by Nature: who (being ignorant) do deſpiſe the healthfull maner of liuing. For, the Science of Phyſicke, prouiding for the health and life of Man, hath ſuch vertue; as if any one ſhal raſhly contemne the ordinances thereof; he not only liueth in miſery, and all irkeſomneſſe of diſeaſes, but alſo cutteth off his length of life, and abridgeth the tearme which Nature had prefixed for him, anticipating his death, and (as we may well ſay) thereby cutteth his owne throate. As much to ſay, when (by vſing euill gouernment) he conſumeth his radicall humour, ſooner then it was ordained for him, or ſuffocateth, or quencheth his naturall heate: on both which, do conſiſt the continuance of life.

For ſuch as deſpiſe the art of Phyſicke.

The radicall humour and naturall heate

Now, if ſuch be the law and nature of contraries, that they are ſaid to be in one and the ſame ſubiect; as, if the one hold, the other alſo muſt do the like: it followeth then neceſſarily, that if the one can ſhorten life, the other like wiſe can prolong it. And ſeeing it is moſt euident, that if the life of Man may be abridged, by diuers faultes and blemiſhes of exceſſe: it may alſo as ſufficiently be concluded, that life may bee prolonged by good gouernement and diſcreete order. For, although the diſcommodities, which depend vpon the principles of our generation, are not (by any means) to be auoyded or preuented (as the effluxion and continuall diſſipation of our whole ſubſtance, which is done by naturall heate, beeing the reaſon of Ages ſooner enſuing, in regard of exceſſiue and ineuitable exſiccation:) yet notwithſtanding, it may bee tardyed by Phyſicke, and ſo hindered, that the laſt day ſhall not come ſo ſoone, nor ſo haſtily.

If diſorder do ſhorten life, good gouernment may prolong it.

The reaſon of the ſodaine ſtealing of aga vpon vs.

Hath it not beene (almoſt) in generall obſeruation, that diuers haue lien gaſping, yea, euen ready to giue vp the ghoſt; who (neuertheleſſe) haue bin continued in life for longer time, by taking a ſmall quantity of Malmeſie, Aqua vitæ, Aqua Imperialis, the Confection of Alkermes, or ſome other cordiall thing? The period and laſt limit of life beeing then ſo neere; hath it not bene deferred (by thoſe means) vntill another houre? It is reported of laughing * Democritus, that being entreated by his Houſhold ſeruants (ſeeing his health very crazie) that hee would baniſh all greefe and ſorrow from his houſe, during the Theſmophorian Feaſts, which were then neere at hand, by prolonging his life till then: that he did it by the ſmel of Hony, though ſome others ſay, that it vvas by the ſauour of hot bread. Thus you ſee what our Phyſitions haue deliuerd, wherin there is a verie great apparance of trueth.

Life kept and retayned in great extreamity by drinkes and Cordials.

*A Philoſopher that laughed at the follies of the worlde.

Wee haue heard the two parties plead and debate, by contrarietie of ſentences and reaſons on either ſide: it behoooueth now, to qualifie the contention, and to reſolue on that which hath the beſt hold. And to the end, that it may bee done with the greater cunning; it is neceſſarie alſo, to diſtinguiſh the tearmes of life; that ſome are ſuper-naturall, others naturall, and others accidentarie, which wee call ſhortned or abridged.

The ſeuerall termes of life diſtinguiſhed by themſelues

We call thoſe ſuper-naturall, which GOD Almighty ordained and prefixed to ſome, out of his owne meere will, ſuch as are not to bee inſtituted by anie Arte or Councell. As the date of verie long life, which God appointed in the firſt Age of the Worlde, and before the Flood, for the multiplication of mankind: and eſpecially to Noah, for the reſtauration thereof.

Of ſupernaturall life as before the flood.

Thoſe which we tearme Naturall, are they that be beſtowed vpon euery man, according both to the diuerſity of temper and building, as they are in the principles and foundations, eyther ſtrong or weake. In regard whereof, ſome may liue long, others leſſer while, according vnto the order of Nature. And they that doe attaine vnto theſe tearmes (the grace of God aſſiſting) except they fal into diſorder, or ſome inconuenience happeneth to them; which are (already to bee called) the limits or termes of the thirde kind, and which we haue named accidentary, or accidentall, that may happen in, or to any age, by caſuall and inopinate caſes; as Wounds, Poyſons, Burnings, fals, ruines, ſhipwrackes, plagues, and other populare harmes. Such inconueniences are (moſt often) ineuitable, and it lyeth not in the Science of Phyſicke, to vſe any precaution againſt them; but onely to heale the harme already happened, if it be poſſible. So leauing theſe tearmes of life to the arbitration of fortune (which is nothing elſe, to ſpeake more piouſly) then the Naturall life giuen to euery one, thogh not all alike.

Accidentall life hapning in any age whatſoeuer.

Inconueniences no way to be auoyded.

After the ſeauenth Paradox of the firſt Decade.

then the pure will of God, without order of Nature, as elſewhere we haue enſtructed: let vs ſpeake onely concerning the tearme of naturall life, and explicate the manner thereof more amply.

Naturall heat and the Radicall humor do prolong life.

All the Philoſophers and Phyſitions do agree together, that we ought to meaſure and bound the continuance or duration of our life, on that which may lengthen naturall heate, and the radicall humor. Now, to the end that theſe things may laſt the longer in vs, our good Mother Nature (as Galen ſpeaketh) hath placed in vs a meruailous power, which by continuall application of Nouriſhment, defendeth the ordinary diſſipation of our ſubſtance and Radicall humour, maintayning our naturall heate, as well by this meanes, as by reſpiration, and the pulſe of Arteries.

An admirable power giuen vs by Nature.

But ſuch a kinde of power as we terme Nutritiue, being limited, and not infinit; cannot alwayes defend and conſerue the ſayde humour in ſuggeſting another. Whereby it commeth ſo to paſſe, that the body wexing dry, by little and little; procureth thence, that that power (afterward) is not well exerciſed in it ſelfe: but weakneth dayly more and more, ſo that in the end, the bodies power ceaſeth, from being nouriſhed ſufficiently. In this manner, thoſe parts becomming ſapleſſe and withered, the body wexeth meager & diminiſhing: and ſo paſſing on further thus, it dryeth; and then this condition is called wrinkled Age. This is the principall natural neceſſity of corruption and death, to all bodyes begotten: for death enſueth then, when the humor primitiue, ſuſtayning or radicall, fayleth, and natural heat becommeth quenched; and this is the end of life, which we terme naturall ending.

The reaſon of our ſoon coming to wrinkled Age.

Auicenne his words concerning the Arte of Phyſick, aſſuring it two waies helpfull to mans life.

As concerning the Art of Phyſicke: It is an Art (ſaith Auicenne) that exempteth not from death, nor can conduct euery one, ſo farre as to the lateſt tearme of humaine life. But it aſſureth and exempteth from two thinges; the one is from putrifaction, that it can no way ſeize vppon the body, except it bee by ſome externall occaſion, as the Peſtilence, or poyſon; the other is, in defending the naturall humiditie, to the end, that it may laſt the longer, and bee the ſlower in conſuming.

Theſe two things are in the power of Phyſicke, whereby it may prolong life, for ſo long time as it is due, according to the temper of euery man, and that by three meanes. The firſt whereof, is, to preoccupate ſtraunge heats; to hinder opilations; and to eiect the excrements, from whence enſueth the generation of putrifying; or when they are engendered, to qualifie and quench them. The ſecond is, the due adminiſtration of drinking & eating; in ſubſtance, quality, quantity, time, and order. The third is, to abſtaine from things, which, in conſuming and exhauſting the Radicall humour; in a very ſhort while doeth reſolue, or diſſipate together the naturall heate; as exceſſiue trauaile or labour; vſe of ſharpe or piercing things, watchings, cares, and diuers paſſions of the minde. But aboue all other, immoderate carnall Copulation, and at incommodious houres; with ſome other ſuch like things, which a man may, and ought to ſhunne, by following the good and wholeſome ordinances and rules of Phyſicke.

Three ſeueral means for the prolonging of life.

Teſtimonies of ſome particular things hurtfull vnto health.

But (ſay you) no man neede doubt of theſe things, for euery one will gladly agree, to mooue the foreſaide Reaſons; that ſuch cannot but liue long, as keepe within the compaſſe of temperance, and haue an eſpeciall care of their health. This is not the matter, of attaining vnto the end and tearme ordained by Nature, without abridging or ſhortning it, although this is a caſe verie rare. But I demaund principally, whether the end and naturall period of life, may be aduanced and prolonged by the Arte of Phyſicke, or no? The Anſwere heereto, is, That life is not onely conſerued by Phyſicke, but likewiſe prolonged. For, it ſtandeth with good reaſon, that the thing muſt needs be the more confirmed and auanced, the principles, foundation, and productions whereof, may be continued and extended, yea, & (eſpecially) made the ſtronger. Nowe, the principles of life (that is, naturall heate, and the primitiue humor) if they cannot bee re-integrated, yet (at leaſt) they may be repaired, & made more vigorous by this Art. According as the curing of Hecticke or continuall Feauers doth ſhew vs, and the recouering or amending of euery complexion; whereby the naturall heate is ordered and tempered.

A yeelding to the former allegations, with a further obiection.

An Anſwer to the principall point in queſtion, concerning the power of Phyſick

If then, by way of liuing humectiuely,

The way and meanes for preſeruing the radical humor and naturall heate.

or moiſtly, as by Bathes of pure freſh waters, and other ſuch like remedies, the radicall humour may be the longer conſerued, which otherwiſe would be ouer ſoon conſumed; and naturall heat kept temperate; ſo that it may conſume her feeding the more ſparingly, by defect whereof, death naturally enſueth:) wher is the man who wil not confeſſe, that life may be pro longed by Phyſicke, which elſe wold haue bin much ſhorter, and according to Nature? I know well, and I confeſſe it, that the ſolid and ſpermaticke parts, cannot be moiſtned ſubſtantially, & of themſelues: neuertheles, you will grant, that they may be moiſtned through the voide ſpaces and pores, by which the feeding humour inſinuateth it ſelfe, and whereby alſo the waſting of the radicall humour is the more tardied. And it is almoſt in the ſame maner, as when we put water with oyle into a Lampe; to the end, that the Oyle may the more ſtrongly reſiſt the flames deuouring.

Concerning moiſtening of the ſolide and ſpermaticke parts.

A further enforcing, for better information in the maine Argument.

But yet (ſay you) although the termes of life may bee lengthened, yet it is not ſtrongly enough proued by this argumēt. Let me then reply, that of the Complexions or tempers of the body, that of the moſt and cheefeſt life, is moiſture, or that which is in like manner (or together with it) hot and moyſt, which vulgarly wee vſe to terme Sanguine: the contrary, which we call Melancholy, is of far ſhorter life. So that, whenſoeuer both of them ſhall vſe one gouernement together, and like maintaining; yet notwithſtanding, the firſt will be of longeſt laſting, becauſe it hath the terme of it owne life furtheſt off, from the principles of it own generation. Now, the Art of Phyſicke enſtructeth, & the vertue thereof is ſo great, that it can chaunge (by little and little) the naturall temperature of cold and dry, into theyr contrary: as Galen teacheth how to do it, in his two laſt bookes of the preſeruation of health. Doth it not follow then hereby immediately, that the tearme of life may likewiſe be prolonged by the Art of Phyſicke? Yea, and that ſome one, vnfortunately borne, and (euen bound as it were) to ſhortneſſe of life; hath yet chaunged the condition, and become thereby farre more liuely and chearful. Onely by this meanes (in mine opinion) that euerie one eaſily vnderſtandeth, how to learn of another; which is nothing elſe, but how to lengthen the limits of all Ages, whereby enſueth, that the courſe of euery life may be prolonged.

How Phyſick enſtructeth to alter temperatures.

Euery one is couetous in deſire how to lengthen out life in all degrees.

And firſt of all, that the vigor and flour of youth, may long time be preſerued by the Art of Phyſicke; Galen declareth it in this manner: There are two principall ends in the conſeruation of health, vvhich are in our power: namely, to reſtore the ſubſtance diſſipated by meats and drinks conuenient, & to reiect the excrements proceeding from them. If no defailance bee made in any of theſe: the body (ſo long) ſhal inioy helth, and will bee very long time conſerued in the ſtrength of his owne vigour. In like manner, and by the ſelfeſame reaſon, Age (altogether vnauoidable, of ſuch as ought to dye by naturall death) is to bee prolonged by the helpe of Phyſicke: ſo that ſwoonings, trances, and the pale aſhie countenances of extreme olde Age, ſhall come very ſlowly.

Gal. in Lib. vlt. de Regim. Sanit. cap. 9.

The ſtealing on of Age to be holpen by phyſicke.

Heereby finally we may conclude, that as in all ages (for we may in like manner, and much more eaſily, vnderſtande the tearmes of childhood, infancy, & youth) and euery eſtate of life: the tearmes may be prolonged by Phyſick, for further time then they are ordained by Nature. And theſe are the limits, which God (the principall Authour of Phyſicke) would haue ſubiected to this Art: which are in our power, ſo long as God permitteth, and cutteth not our thred of life, vntill it pleaſeth him. Euen as in like manner heeretofore, and beyond all the order of Nature by him appointed: he ſuſtained and prolonged life myraculouſly, without anie Phyſicall helpe, yea, euen without eating and drinking.

Life in all degrees of Age, may be prolonged by phyſicke.

CHAP. VII.

Againſt ſuch as hold opinion, that Phyſitions do delay, and prolong hurts & diſeaſes, and are meere abuſers of the world.

The Art of Warre & the Art of phiſick compared together in hardnes of fortune

THere is not any other Art, ſo much ſubiect to ſlander and calumnie, as the Art Military, and that of Phyſicke: which which agree likewise (very wonderfully) together in many other things, as may more at large be discerned, by diuers discourses following. For, to explicate (familiarly) the deeds of Physicke, I shall often borrowe similitudes from warre-like actions, and namely at this instant (meethinkes) I may serue my turne with one, which aptly offers it selfe for my purpose, thus. If a Generall besiedge a Towne, & take it not within some promised time, or else so soon as they hope, who are far off, without knowing how it might be taken; although the Captaine performed his vtmost diligence: he shall be suspected and accused in diuers kindes, as of negligence, slothfulnesse, intelligence, corruption, treason, ignorance, precipitation, or tardinesse in his enterprizes, badde conduction, pusillanimity, or some other defect in his charge, & yet all these vtterly false. But they which iudged thus peremptorily, knew not what resistance the besiedged made, what good prouision they had, what strength of men, and all thinges requisite to defend themselues, beyond the expectation of the besiedged; who might be abused by his scowtes and spies, and diuers, making report of the estate of the place, and of some other exteriour semblances, whence might be imagined, what was within the Towne.

Example of a Generall in his besiedging a town or City, and what rash imputations (vndeseruedly) may be laid vpon him

They that see by imagination, are worse then blindmē.

So fareth it with the Physition, who besiedgeth any disease, treacherously entred into the bodye of Man, to enforce him forsake the place. Oftentimes, hee is abused by exteriour signes, and very goodly outward resemblances: whereby, thinking that he is at the end of the Cure, he is compelled to beginne againe. For, hee meeteth with more corruption and ill humours, then hee knew how to fore see, the Disease making farre greater resistance, then the Physition thought on: reenforcing, and repayring it selfe dayly more and more, against the best succour and remedies applyed. So that the sickenesse will last longer, then himselfe that hath it expected, and cannot be cured so soone, as (perhappes) the Physition promised, or others inmagined, that had intelligence thereof. Whereuppon, hee groweth suspected presently, eyther of ignorance, or of negligence, of couetousnesse, malice, or some other vice, which inducеth him to lengthen out the disease, longer then it ought to be.

The former discourse aluded vnto the Physitions labour.

The best Artf man may bee deceiued in his owne skill.

As touching ignorance, I suppose it could not bee so, but that the Physition was held to bee skilfull, expert, and an honest man. If he prooue not such a one, it was ill done to call him, and to commit the patients life into his handes: so that the Patient may well say, as Iesus Christ replyed vnto Pilate, Iohn 19, verse 11. He that deliuered mee to thee, hath the greater sinne.

Conce ning ignorance in the Physition.

Iohn 19, 11.

As for negligence, I grant that there are Physitions learned, expert, and men of good esteeme, who may passe (somewhat ouer-lightly) their visitation and curing of sicke persones: but I can neuer thinke, that it should bee to any such end, as to prolong the paine; but rather that it is a negligence of inaduertence, as may happen in diuers of their other affayres. For which, there is very good remedy, by erneſt solicitations, inciting them (as they ought) to doe their dutie, and wishing them to be more frequent in attendance; or else, by giuing them a coadiutor or assistant, to make them the more diligent in their care.

For Negligence in their attendance on sick & weake patients.

The most that is to bee doubted (in mine opinion) is greedie Auarice: For the vulgar sort thinke, that Physitions (commonly) lengthen out Diseases, and draw thē into some time of continuance, to deriue the greater profite from them. Wherefore, I would gladly stand somewhat the longer vpon this point, to refute this false opinion, which is the most erroneous of all.

Auarice and couetousnesse to prolongthe patient in paine.

First, I am of the minde, that the the Physition should bee an honest man, in regarde, that hee ought to loue his owne Honour and Reputation. I desire also, that hee should profite in his profession; as euerie one should gette Goodes honestly by his Vocation. If hee bee an honest and Worthie man; hee hath bowelles of Christian Compassion, and neuer will suffer any man, (by or with his will) to languish out in sickenesse or disease: but if hee bee no such man, hee ought not to bee employed, as I haue formerly saide. But if hee be badly enclined; he may make his aime and intent, to grasp vp Wealth; getting a name for no other end, but to become rich. Yet let me tell yee, if hee prolong Diseases, which he may and can shorten: he he is no able man, but goeth quite contrary to his intention. For, if he can cure in leſſer time then other men do; he ſhall be in the greater requeſt: hee ſhall haue ſuch crowdes of patients reſort vnto him, as hee can hardly come neare them himſelfe, and rather they wil giue him a french Crowne, then a Teſter to any other. For, what is hee, that would not rather pay double, treble, yea foure-fold more then ordinarie, to be ſo ſoone recouered? If, to ſome other Phyſitian, who commeth ouer-late to the cure, ten Crownes bee giuen: there needeth no complaint, if fiftie Crownes be diſtributed to him, that ſhall abridge the time of a mans agony, in halfe the third or fourth part of ſufferance.

The Authors answere concerning this couetous point, in behalfe of good and honest Physitions.

It is a matter of no great conſequence to be famous and to haue great reſort of Patients.

But, to ſpeake vprightly, it is not in the Phyſitians power, to doe any ſuch acte at his owne pleaſure. He would gladly wiſh it ſo, that he had ſuch a vertue, as to heale by touching, ſeeing, or the very firſt receipt giuen, or onely by good gouernement, or any other ſuch light direction. He ſhould haue the leſſer paines, be tenne times the more eſteemed; and gaine infinitely to his owne aduantage. Oh good God! how ſoone might hee be rich, that could be ſo proſperous and ſucceſſefull. It is not then to be imagined, that Phyſitians (prouoked by couetouſneſſe) ſhould delight in prolonging diſeaſes: ſeeing they may gaine ſo much with good-will, reputation, yea, and extraordinarie recompence, if they had power to cure with ſuch expedition. But I pray you tell me one thing, Is there a Phyſitian, that hauing parents, kinred & familiar friends, of whō he wil take nothing for his paines? Can hee cure them (for his credite ſake) in leſſer time: the diſeaſe being alike, and the ſubiect anſwerable? Hee winneth nothing by the length of ſuch ſickeneſſes; it is enough if he looſe not the good opinion conceiued of him, and diuers kind offices done vnto him. Let mee ſay moreouer, when himſelfe, his wife, or children lie ſicke; they depend vpon his owne expence, and neede not to haue any delay in their recouerie: but can he ſooner cure them, then any other beeing in the ſame diſtreſſe? Queſtionleſſe, it is a great follie, to thinke, that Phyſitions ſhould be ſo forgetfull of themſelues, as, to prolong diſeaſes willingly, and with their knowledge; in regard of iuſt affection to their owne honour and profite.

Phyſitions are not able to cure or recouer at their own pleaſure.

Phyſitions ſhould take ſmall delight in lingring diſeaſes.

It may fall out with them, as it often doeth to hardie Souldiours, in beſieging ſome appoynted or determined place, who thinke to effect the buſineſſe in three dayes compaſſe, and yet continue there a moneth before it, without diſſembling or ſparing any paines. They were perſwaded, that a wall could not reſiſt tenne ſhotte of the Cannon; and yet it out-ſtoode more then an hundred. They held opinion, that the beſieged were not ſtored with victualls and munition, for aboue eight dayes; and finde them furniſhed for more then two months. Whatſoeuer is thought or conceiued in this kinde, be they neuer ſo many, they are but coniectures, idiomes of ſome reſemblance, examples and obſeruations, which faile as often as they ſpeed. And yet (for all this) the valiant Captaine aſſaylant, ought not to bee accuſed, for ill doing his duety, when hee perfourmed all that Arte and Induſtrie could require.

Another familiar alluſion of Martial diſcipline, to Phyſicke.

In all reſpects, this is the Phiſitians caſe, who is moſt excuſable altogether, when hee fayleth in the quantity and efficacie of his remedies. For this is the principall matter (as Galen auoucheth in many places) that makes the Arte of Phyſicke coniecturall, Defining coniecture to be a meanes or condition, betweene perfect knowledge, and pure ignorance. Therefore it ought to bee interpreted to the beſt, and taken in good part, what ſucceſſe the remedies ſort vnto, which a learned, expert, diligent and honeſt Phyſition applyeth fitteſt for the purpoſe, and the moſt iuſtly as is poſſible for him; euermore referring the euent and iſſue to Almighty God, who giueth and taketh, augmenteth and diminiſheth the power of thoſe remedies, according as it beſt pleaſeth him, whether the diſeaſe ſhall be ſoone or ſlowely ended; one while indifferently amending, an other while agayne as doubtfully depending.

Mallice or ſpleene now remayneth; which may be ſuſpected in the Phyſitian. If there be the very leaſt occaſion of rancour, hatred and ill will betweene the Phiſitian and his patient: there was no good aduice or diſcretion, in calling ſuch a man to the buſineſſe. For (on the contrary) it is very expedient, that the ſicke perſon ſon ſhould loue his Phyſitian, and he him agayne in like manner, although they haue no knowledge of each other, eyther by name or action. In this caſe, a ſtrict concordance of amity, ought to be contracted betweene their hearts: For otherwiſe, the patient will neuer kindely receiue his Phyſitions beſt ſuccour, nor the other care for adminiſtring, where hee findeth his paynes not to bee affected. As for deliberate and purpoſed mallice, with an intent to doe hurt ſecretly; if there be any Phyſitian to be taxed with ſuch a ſin: hee ought rather to be rancked with impoyſoners, and not any way to bee imployed.

Of mallice or hatred in the phyſition towards his Patient.

Of purpoſed mallice to do harme priuily

But, I vnderſtand by the vulgare ſort, that they take this word Mallice in another kinde of ſence, to wit, that Phyſitians (with their intent and knowledge) doe caſt downe their patients bodies ouerlowe, by abſtinence and euacuations, euen endangering the very lateſt paſſage. And that this is done, but in oſtentation of their Arte, and to winne the worthier reputation, when they can come off with any credit: or elſe they ſalue and ſhield it, with ſome prognoſticke opinion, conceyued at the beginning and vndertaking the buſineſſe, that the patient was (euen then) in daunger of death; but this doth proceede from ſuch, as haue formerly fallen into the ſame perill. Thus doe I comprehend the doubtful coniecture of the common people, and (many times) they ſpare not to ſpeake it.

How mallice in the Phyſition is vnderſtood by the common people, in their vulgar interpretation.

In very truth, it were moſt maliciouſly, traiterouſly and wickedly doone, if anie Phyſitian ſhould play ſuch prankes with a poore ſicke bodie: yee, as vilely done, as if a man ſhould throw ſuch a one into a riuer, as knew not how to ſwimme, hoping quickely to caſt a cord after him, thereby to get him on ſhoare agayne. For, it may ſo fall out, that the party thus ſowſed and ſubmerged in the water, knowes not how to catch the cord, or cānot hold it ſtrongly enough, or hath not power ſufficient to be drawne foorth, and ſo is drowned in this diſtreſſe. But ſurely, it is not credible or likely, that any Phyſitians ſhould be ſo bad minded, as to bring ſicke bodies ſo lowe by their applications: which (if they are not) ought to bee well inſtituted, and accordingly as beſt appertayneth to the caſe. It is the diſeaſe it ſelfe, which continually vndermineth the forces of nature, encreaſing ſtill his owne power to a certayne poynt, which is the vigour and ſoueraigne condition of the ſickeneſſe. After which, if the diſeaſe be curable, enſueth the declination and diminution of the maladie; and thorow all theſe accidents, the patient proceedeth on to health, as wee ſhall haue fitter occaſion to ſpeake of heereafter.

No excuſe can ſalue or couer ſuch treacherous dealing in any Phyſition.

How ſickneſſe vndermineth the ſtrength of Nature, to gaine the vpper hand thereof.

There are people ſomewhat more modeſt, who ſay not, that Phyſitians do take downe their patients bodies ſo lowe, and bring them into daunger: but that they ſtretch foorth the ſickeneſſe in length, eyther by their indulgence (that is, by ouermuch pleaſing the ſicke perſons humour) or to binde him in the larger aduantage to them, by recouering him out of a long lingering maladie. As touching indulgence, or tender-heartedneſſe, it is verie true, that many ſicke men affect rather, to be ſlowe in recouering, then ſpeedily, only by being the gentlier handled: which is an excuſe ſufficient for the Phyſitian, prouided, that hee makes proteſtation thereof, for ſafetie of his owne honour and reputation.

Of ſuch as are more modeſt in complaining on Phyſitions, for lengthning their diſeaſes.

As for ſuch as prolong ſickneſſe, thereby to deriue the greater benefite: that were a ſmoothe-faced kind of treaſon, and (indeede) meere villany. And ſurely, it cannot be credible (if the Phyſitian do vnderſtand himſelfe well) that he ſhould (at any time) offer to delay a diſeaſe. For, he is not able to meaſure, or comprehend the times length; and, by giuing way to ſuch protraction, the interiour euill may grow the worſſe; wherein is greater perill, then delaying ſimply, or the cure wexing long. It is another maner of thing, then vlcers dealt withall by the Chirurgian: for they may well bee maintayned, without any preiudice to the perſon, becauſe the inner parts of the body may be ſafe enough, purging themſelues by the vlcer, and that there be no other harme, then the vlcerated parts.

Of prolonging ſickneſſe for the larger benefit.

Vlcers and ſickneſſe of the body are not equall in curing.

For proofe whereof, wee oftentimes appoynt, that Fiſtulaes ſhould be entertayned with delay, and make iſſues and fontanelles in many places of the body, which wee muſt haue kept open for verie long time. But inward maladies are of an other conſideration, and neuer ought to be dallyed withall: but if they can be cured, Inward ſickneſſe is to be ſpeedily cured and no way delayed.

red, to procure it with all possible speede, or so soone as may be.

That physitions doe nothing else but abuse the world by their confused dealing.

Another point of calumny, is, that Physitians doe abuse the world, that men may well be cured without them; nay, much better and sooner: and, they doe nothing else but deale confusedly. Wee haue already sufficiently confuted this follie, by the sacred authority of Ecclesiasticus. Notwithstanding, I will borrow one similitude more from that famous (and as much wronged) Militarie profession, our Arte holding therein equall comparison. Some places doe gladly yeeld themselues to the besieger, in regarde hee hath cutte off all their victualls and prouision. Others, at the very first view of the Cannon: Other at the first assault: And contrariwise, some there are that remain impregnable. Now, if we should argument in this manner, we daily see places, that yeelde themselues without enforcing: what neede is there then of besieging, assaulting, fighting, ruinating the walles or any other hostile acte? What neede we to make warre on Towne or Cittie; when (many times) wee see them voluntarily submitte themselues? It is then but an abuse, and a foolish idle expence to the country (how seditious soeuer it be) to haue Souldiers, Artillerie, and any other furniture for warre: where such employment is counted a meere inuention, and cheating of the people, who liue free from such molestation, and all goes well with them.

Another allusion to Military seruice.

The Country that is free from warre, hath no need of weapons.

To our purpose then. If all places be feeble, and no resistance is made, by men well munited, and prouided with courage, and other things requisite for their defence; those places may easily yeelde themselues. As the like doe light diseases, against which needeth no force of notable remedies; but many times do weare away of themselues: yea, and sometimes the very strongest, as burning feauers, when there is no great munition within the body to entertaine them, but that the naturall forces make worthy resistance, against the insolencie of the euill. Otherwise, there is neede of succour, to employ batterie, and all kindes of the best remedies: albeit often it commeth so to passe, that all these doe aduantage nothing, the disease remayning still incurable.

Sicknesses incident to the body with their apt cõparatiues.

What benefite is it to sorrow then, or say, that the partie might haue beene better holpen without all this, or that the patient is meerly abused? Rather account that truely for an abuse, if a man promise cure of a disease, which is held to be incurable; hee not knowing any remedie, that hath power sufficient to ouercome it. Euen as he shall be abused, that attempteth to compell a Towne to yeelde, by blowes of his fists, or to beate downe the walles with a harquebuze shot: where the Cannon is rather too little, and no answerable engin or instrument is to be had. Such are the notable abuses, & true cheateries, which Mounte-banke Empericke impose vpon the people, promising the curing of all diseases, and more then all many times. Wel may it be said, that they abuse the world, and not naturall Physitians, being learned, expert, and approued honest men.

Where the Physition is refused, no meruaile if the cure grow desperate.

Such are those beggerly wãderers about the countries.

CHAP. VIII.

¶ That it is neither sinne, or any acte ill done, to call for the Physition, and to vse his remedies, when men are diseased.

THere is an other kinde of error grounded on the fooliſh superstition of some Ideots, who thinke it an offence to God; if they call for the Physitian, to cure their harms & sicknes; saying, It is to contradict, and oppose our selues against the will of God, who hath visited them with such an affliction, and onely for their good: because, by chastising the bodie, the soule is purged from sinne. Adding further, as maister Guydo Chauliac declareth in his singular chapter. God hath sent it me, as he pleased, and he will take it from mee, when he pleaseth, the name of God be blessed, Amen. Referring their health and recouerie (wholy) to the intercession of he Saints and she Saints of Paradise, making Vows, Almes, Prayers, and Pilgrimages, &c.

Curious Coxcombes that well vnderstand not what they say but rather offend God themselues by their nice curiosity.

This opinion most erroneous, is easily refuted, by that which wee haue alreadie alleadged, out of the Booke of Ecclesiasticus, where he piously exhorteth the sicke (and with great wisedome) To reconcile himselfe first to God, whome hee hath offended: and after, to giue way to the Physition, whom God hath created, & giuen him knowledge,

The aduice of the Wise man to euery sicke person.

ledge, to be glorified in his wonderfull works. It is most true, that God sendeth afflictions for our chasticement, and hath made vs subiect vnto them, because wee should acknowledge our owne infirmities. From him also proceedes health and recouerie, by those means which he hath ordered in nature: giuing vertue to plants and other creatures, to ouercome and expell diseases: ordaining the Science of Physicke, & the Apothecaries skill to that effect, euen as well as Tillage and husbandrie, ordayned for the sustentation of men, and support of this fraile and mortall life.

God onely is the giuer and maintainer of helth, by such meanes as he hath appointed.

Physicke ordained by God, for benefit of the sicke, and healthful, and that no man should despise it.

Well may wee say then, that these are the meanes which ought not to be despised; for, a wiseman will no way disdayne them. Otherwise it is to tempt God, as if (vainely) wee would haue him to worke myracles, according to our appetite. For, he that saith, If God will that I shall be healed of this sickenes, I shall be healed, without vsing the Physition: And if I must die, the Physition can not saue mee. This is euen as if hee should say; If I must yet liue a yeare longer, and that it be so appoynted by God: I shall safely liue without eating or drinking, and then such expences may well bee spared. For, if I must liue so long, it is impossible that I should die before, although I neither eate nor drinke.

Proud and arrogant words in tempting God.

An extraordinarie follie and rashnesse, for a man to promise to himself, that God will worke a miracle vppon him: euen to tempt him by such an essay, hauing foode fit for him, and appointed by God for the nourishment of his body. Is not this meerly tempting of God, to trie whether hee will worke against the order of nature, or no? He may suffer him to die in this follie by meere extreamitie of hunger, and the poore Idiot shall then finde by effect, that he vainely collected this fantasticke brutalitie in his minde, that God should maintaine him in life, without receiuing sustentation. If God will, he can doe so, but we know the ordination of his owne will, for all men to make vse of his blessings in their foode; whereto we are to keep vs, and not to seeke after other extraordinarie means, which are vnknowne to vs, and not to bee imployed, according to our presuming appetites.

There is small wisedome to tempt God in such bolde manner.

All things that God can doe, he will not do to pleale presumptuous men thereby.

So standeth the case of Physicke, appointed by God, for the health of the sick, and conseruation of them in sound condition. For, whosoeuer will be cured otherwise, and hath gotten an opinion, that if he must haue health, he may haue it without helpe of the Physition, who hath the only meanes to doe it: he tempteth God, and expects, that hee should perfourme a miracle, foolishly contemning the naturall course, which God ordained against diseases. Euen as if his house were on fire, and hee will suffer none to quench it with water, saying: If God will that it shalbe saued, the fire will be quenched by other means.

CHAP. IX.

¶ Concerning the ingratitude and vnkindnes in sicke and diseased persons, towardes Physitions.

INgratitude is most odious both to God & men, and hath iustly bin repuputed for so notorious a vice: as he that speaketh of Ingratitude, speakes of all the euills in the world. And this sin is so common amongst men, especially in the case of Physitions; as I am amazed many times, that any generous heart will be a Physition: his profession beeing euerie where subiect to calumny, and cosine germaine to Ingratitude.

An ingrateful man is the onely foule name in the World.

But there are some friends, men of reason, honest and acknowledging, who can yet cleanely couer this offence: seeming willing in any goodnes towards the profession, and not altogither so vnthankefull as others are. For there are some so compleate in courtesie, as they haue protested publikely, & very often: that (next vnder God) they hold their liues of such & such Physitions. And, hauing acknowledged (according to their faculty) the labor and industry of the Physition; will also confesse freely, that they are vnable to recompense him with all their goodes, as therein they speak no more then truth. For, if they owe their liues to the Physitions succour, and life is of greatest valew aboue all their goods: it is not in their power to discharge that debt, though they gaue him all their substance.

Outward professors of loue to physitions, all in ceremony, but little in acte.

Life is more worth then all the wealth in the world.

But the chiefest poynt of recompence, is, their thankful protestations to the Physition, saying; they stand obliged to him, and Wherein the cheefeſt point of recompẽce conſiſteth, in gratifying Phyſitions.

and are indebted to him for their life. This is euen as much, as if a man ſhould ſnatch a ſword out of anothers hand, that ſtoode ready to kil him therewith; or a ſtrangling cord, by which he meant to end his daies. Were it your caſe, ſtood you not beholding to that man for your life? And could (all you had) make him ſufficient recompence? Some will ſay, I haue well payed my Phyſition, yea, ouer-payed him; I haue giuen him ſo much euery day, I owe him nothing. If he haue made me well, I haue as wel requited him. Alas poore man, that which is giuen to the Phyſition, is a ſmall acknowledgement, for ſo great a good as thou haſt receiued: for thou payeſt or recompenceſt him with the fruit of his own labour: If hee preſerued thee from death, (as happily he did, the grace of God aſſiſting) there is no equal recompence in thy power, except thou expoſe thy life for him, as he made no ſpare of his for thee. In this maner thou remaineſt (for euer) indebted, and thus thou confeſſeſt truely thy obligation, when (with an intire and vpright heart) thou makeſt ſuch an acknowledgement to him.

The common words of many ingratefull men in theſe wretched times.

How the words of ſauing life, and preſeruing from death, are harſh to many nice hearers.

I know there are ſome, who wil thinke theſe words to be hard, and harſh; when I ſay, he ſaued thy life, and preſerued thee from death; notwithſtanding, it is diſcerned euidently. Put the caſe, that a man being wounded, loſeth his bloud in extreme abundance, and doubtleſſe dyeth inſtantly, except the bloud be ſtaied: he that puts his finger into the wound, & thereby ceaſſeth bleeding; is not he worthily ſaid, that hee ſaueth life? As much, and farre more doth he, that reſtraynes it by medcins, and ſo conſolidates the wound, as (otherwiſe) it could not be healed. As much alſo doth he, that reſtrayneth a fluxe in the belly; an extreame vomiting, or ſome other pernicious and deadly vacuitie: Or (conueniently) healeth a Pleuriſie: Or him, whom the Squinzie hath ſtuffed and halfe ſtrangled. As much alſo (queſtionleſſe) doth he, that catcheth a child out of the fire, where he had beene burnt to death, but for ſuch preſent ſuccour.

Cures performed by phyſicke in extremity of danger.

No leſſe account ought to be made of Phyſitions, who make prouiſion againſt inward euilles, and ſuccour nature ſecretly by diuers means, the power whereof appeareth by worthy effects; becauſe they are (as Herophilus ſaith) The hands of God.

The words of Herophilus, concerning phyſitions.

For he releeueth and draweth from deadly dangers, by the means of apt remedies, which the Phyſition vſeth in needefull time. Is it not then a worke more diuine then humane, and can no way be ſufficiently recompenced? whereof Eccleſiaſticus ſpake very well. The Science of Phyſicke, and knowledge in the Phyſition, ſhall exalt his head, and make him admirable among Princes: the Phyſition ſhall be honoured of Kings. Theſe are the principall acknowledgements due vnto him, honour and gratitude, as a certaine obligation: and not perſwaſion, that money can returne him ſufficient, or equall recompence.

Eccleſ. 38, 3, 4.

But there are ſome, that doe deale farre worſe, who, after they haue beene healed, by the means of good and loyall ſuccour: can not endure to be tolde, that they are beholding to the Phyſition, but growe hatefull againſt him, that ſaued their liues. Oh extreame ingratitude! but yet not only in theſe our dayes: For Hyppocrates, in his Epiſtle to Damagetes, maketh Democritus to ſpeake in this manner. I thinke (ſaith he) O Hippocrates, that in our Science, many things are ſubiect to obloquie and ingratitude. For, ſicke perſons (if they eſcape) referre their recouerie to the Gods, or elſe to Fortune, or elſe to their owne good complexion, robbing the Phyſition of all honour: Whome (oftentimes) they hate afterwards, beeing angrie and offended, that anie ſhould thinke them beholding, or indebted to him.

Ingratitude in the very higheſt degree, to hate him that preſetued their liues.

Hip. in Epiſt. ad Damaget.

Moreouer, they will not atteſt or confeſſe their obligation: but rather are well pleaſed; that ignorants in the Arte (who neuertheleſſe liue by the Profeſſion) ſhould be of the ſame temper, kicking enuiouſly againſt him. &c.

This ſuiteth (beſt of all other) with theſe our dayes. For, the moſt part of ſicke people now referre theyr recouerie wholly, to ſome he-Saint or ſhe-Saint of Paradiſe, to whome they vowe and deuote themſelues.

Our times learnd ingratitude of former Ages, but not a iote of thankfulneſſe.

And although (many times) they do not perfourme their vowes; yet can they follow that which the Italian ſayd: Paſſato lo malo gabato lo Santo: The diſeaſe being paſt, the Saint is cheated. Euen (for all the world) as men make great promiſes to the Phyſition; ſo long as the extreamitie of anguiſh laſteth, proteſting to giue him mountaines and maruailes; yea, to pay all in Golde and precious Stones, or elſe, a good penſion all his life time.

In

Mountaines promised, and not Mole-hils performed.

In briefe, much goodnesse is pretended to be doone him; but when the patient commeth to health, then hee is of a quite contrary minde: Eyther, that the Physition perfourmed not the cure, but that it might haue beene doone without him. Or else, from the sollemne vowe he made, came the cause of his recouerie, with the good attendance of his Keepers, and diuers comfortable broaths. Or else, from the Apothecarie, to whome hee rather will attribute all the successe, rather then to the Physition; although the other did nothing but by his direction. Else, hee will attribute it vnto the goodnesse of his owne complexion: or to some casuall chaunce, by some disorder in him committed and doone: some of these must haue the reference of his healing: So that the Physition shall surely haue the smallest part, or rather none at all, of the honour, gratitude, kindnesse and recompence.

All means deuised, to rob the Physition of his due honour,

For performing of promises to physitions.

And as concerning promises, the man beeing recouered, then he considereth, what charges the sickenesse hath cost him; how long hee hath depended vppon the cure, and what an hinderance it hath bin vnto him. Thus his debt to the Physition is forgotten, and to him hee imputeth a part of his expences, reputing all superfluous, and keeping his bodde ouer long, hoping hee should haue beene restored much sooner, and with a great deale lesser charges. So that (in his account) the Physition should be indebted to him: and if hee could finde Iudges answerable to his minde, hauing iudiciall authoritie; he would haue him condemned in the greatest part of his expences. Heere is good acknowledgement of a benefite receiued, was there euer the like ingratitude?

There are too many such in these vngratefull times.

Surely, I can compare it with none other, then as if a man should strangle himselfe by despayre; or otherwise, and some one comming to succour him, did cut the cord: when the other (maliciously) afterwards, should make him pay for cutting the halter. Or an other man, ready to be drowned in the water, any man endeuoring to saue him, put his own life in perill (by chance) teare a lappet of his garment, and the drowned man (after) to enforce repayment for his torne garment. So, they which should be payers, doe become demaunders; confessing neyther gree nor grace, for all the good seruice perfourmed vnto them: but rather affect, that an ignorant varlet, or some charre-chamber woman, procured their healthfull recouery, then the care and industrie of the painefull Physition. And I guesse this to ensue from one of these two reasons; eyther that they are so dull and sottish, as they haue not the capacitie of comprehension. Or else, knowing it well enough; they are ashamed and confounded, for not hauing the will to acknowledge and confesse it. Well may I then conclude, as I beganne this Chapter: Ingratitude is most contemptible to God and men.

The apt comparisons agreeing with the physitions fortune.

Two imagined reasons of this base ingratitude to well deseruers

CHAP. VI.

¶ That the vulgare sort doe account it nothing, if they be not cured or healed contrary to their owne opinion. That the latest applyed remedies haue all the honour: And happy is the Physition that commeth to the declination of the disease.

OVr next ensuing errour, is strongly in coiunction with the former, and (oftentimes) is the cause of the sayde Ingratitude. For, if a sicke person bee not healed against his owne opinion, or of such as come to visite him; there is nothing at all doone, and therefore they know not how to conceiue of the Physition.

Recouery cõtrary to opinion, is distinguished two wayes.

Now, to heale or recouer a man against opinion, consisteth of two partes: One is, to heale in least time, and (as it were) at vnawares. As, if the disease last commonly with so much accesse, or so many dayes; to cure it in much lesser space. For otherwise, say they: Well sir, the malady hath made his full course, and yet the Physition hath doone little or no seruice at all; as well might it haue beene done within the same time. Poore iudgements, doe yee not beholde, that in one and the same kinde of infirmitie, some are short, and others long? There are certian Feuers or Agues, and of conti-

1. Of healing in lesser time, then the disease lasteth.

Of tertian Feuers, and them of continuance.

nuance also, which last and hold for a moneth or two,, you imagine, that the Tertian should not exceed (at the most) a seuenth accesse, which are fourteene daies, and the continuer to consist of seauen, eleauen, or foureteene, as you haue heard Physitions speake, which is the tearme of exquisite feauers. But you know not, that of a thousand, we shall hardly meete with two such, because the most part are confused and mingled, whereby their tearme is much more lengthened, as in all diseases engendred of diuers humours.

You imagine (and it is true) that if the tertian Ague doe end within three weeks, or a moneth, beeing well beaten by our remedies: that (but for such encountring) would haue endured two or three moneths, as hath bin seene in many others. Was it not well rebated, and cunningly out-stept for the patient? Yet nothing at all is doue (saith he) if much more be not performed, then he pretended. For, he is of the mind, that a Physition may handle sickenesse, as men doe Stirrop-leathers, in lengthening or shortening them as they list. The acte is not sufficient to abate or extenuate a quarter, a third part, or the moitie of the paine, and to hinder or appease those diuers accidents, which commonly happen in all kindes of diseases, deliuering sound and probable reasons, for the best account that can be possible, and the charges equall to his owne desire.

The sick man accounteth nothing to be well done, if it be not answerable to his owne opinion.

Yet this is falling into an other part of vulgar opinion, as namely, that all is nothing worth Sir, except ye can heale such as are held for dead. For, admit the sickness to be deadly, as all diseases are, which we call eager (that is to say, cutting, goes on swiftly, and is not without terrible accidents) if the patient or his visitants hold opinion, that his great danger may be recured, and it proouue to be so: yet still nothing is done. Contrariwise, if the sicke man chaunce to die, then the Physitian is in all the fault. For, the assistants were perswaded (though the Physition found the contrarie in his prognosticke rule) that he might be recouered. But if they imagine that a man will dye, or hold him alreadie for dead, then the Physition beholdeth great wisedome. For, though he doe nothing else, but appoynt Broaths for him, with some drogueries or confections, especially restaurative and cordiall things (albeit they are not to any purpose;) yet hath he performed a chiefe piece of work. Heere is a rare cure; hee hath recouered such a man, giuen ouer for dead: he hath raysed him agayne: Oh, he is a great and worthy man, & pitty it is he should want.

2. It is nothing to cure sicke men, except they be reputed for dead, or very neere it.

Men repute themselues iudicious and wise in their owne conceit.

The same Doctour, at the very same time, hath another patient, whose sickenes is not reputed deadly, because the euill lies more closely concealed. He takes very great payns to restore his health, and to compasse his intent, imployeth all his skill and industry for the patients safety: whom he knoweth to be in greater daunger, then all the friends (standing by) doe or can imagine. At the last, he dyeth, quite contrary to their common opinion. Look then vpon Maister Physition, his reputation is sodainely lost, and then they tell him: That hee meddleth with too many matters at once: The other man was much better gouerned. Thus, neuer is any thing doone of value, if it be not performed, against the hope and expectation of the vulgare.

The recouery of one patient, is not a warrant for all other in the like case.

An other errour propounded in this Chapter, is, the attribution of the successe in the cure, to the latest administred remedies: euen as they referre the occasion of sicknes, to the last hurtfull acte that the party committed. As if a man had fed on some fruit, salad, or other thing lesse ordinary, & (soon after) the party falls sicke, of some disease more then of a months continuance) yet that must be the only cause: neuer remembring other precedent disorders, which procured the greater part in preparation. For, euill humors will haue a meeting together by little and little, till they come to a certayne quantity, against which, nature hath power to resist no longer. Euen as wee see a Glasse (set in the raine) to fill it selfe by many drops of water, so long as till they come to the brim: but being full, the least drop then following, makes an ouer-flow. Euen so, the least addition, to that which nature hath already supported, makes hir to sinke vnder the ouer-plus: as a yong Mule, vsed to a common charge: how little soeuer is added to her vsuall burden, she is (by no meanes) able to beare.

3. The third proposition.

Sickenesse imputed to later occasion, whē the infirmity hath bin of longer continuance.

Nature is so sufficient of it selfe, that needlesse addition breedeth but diseases.

It was not then the last morsell, meate, or disorder, that did the harme, the precedent riots had performed their parts before. Euen as in the felling of a tree, 100.

cuts

Sicknesses may seeme sudden, but they haue other precedent occasions.

cuts (giuen with an Axe) appeare to be in vaine, and stil it stands; for tis the hundred and eleauenth stroake that ouerthrows it. Now, if a man shal say, the last odde blow did the deed; should he not do great wrõg to all the rest? As also, when a strong Tower hath endured 1000. discharges of the canon, and at the last shot of all, it falleth: Did the last do any more then the first? It is all one in iudging of remedies, which abate the harme, and expell sickenesse out of the body. The last application (whatsoeuer it was) may haue the honor by vulgar censure, speaking according to their capacity: but what was the labour and paines perfourmed before, of purging, glysters, drugges of diuers kinds, administred both within and without, did all these nothing? In the end, some one thing is added, and then the man is made well. Poore idle opinion, if this last admired acte had beene done at the first, it had serued to no vse at all: but, after the hot seruice of so many other remedies, which controuled and disheartned the euill, shaking, and renting it from the root; the least thing in the world could then quite displace it.

Ir is not the last application in physick, that is the Master-piece.

Like to poore besieged people, no longer able to hold out; let but a man be slain among them, and they yeelde themselues immediately. Shall it therefore be sayd, that all the battery, all the assaults, cutting them off from vittailes, and other good means for conquering; these serued to nb purpose at all? But only he did the deed, that discharged the last Musket; and yet (notwithstanding) he killed but one man: If he had slaine a chiefe Commaunder, it had bin a matter of much more moment: Euen so, a briefe or ticket, hung about the necke; or drugges tied about the wrist of a man; shall haue the honour of healing Agues, affirming, that they could not bee cured by any other applyed good orders, directions, remedies, and great medcines. This is all one, as if the disease hung but by a twine threed, which may easily bee broken by perswasion and opinion, and thereupon the sicke man restored: but if this had beene applyed in the beginning, the patient could not haue beene cured, by an hundred times as many perswasions, or the very strongest imaginations. Perswasion & imagination may do somwhat in healing, but not all, nor alone of themselues. Thus you see how true and certaine remedies, are robbed of their due honour, by iudging ill of the successe; because men would be cured sudenly, before any thing at all is done to effect it: otherwise, all indeuor else is but in vaine, & serueth to no purpose. He only is the author of the happines, after whom (immediatly) a man findes himselfe to be recouered.

The Argumẽt still holding between physicke and Military Discipline.

Perswasion may do somewhat in physicke, but not absolutely performe the Cure.

And bicause it is commonly said (which is the fourth poynt of this Chapter) Happy is the Physition, that comes to the declination of the disease; we must imagine, that what soeuer was done before, health stoode at the doore, tarrying but for his entrance, & healths introduction is attributed to him. And although that Physitian shall do nothing at all, nor appoint or giue direction; yet (say the people) he is the cause of the happines: and if he had bin sent for at the beginning, the sicke man had sooner bin set on foot. But if the Physition be wise & honest, he will not be bonneted with this honor, consenting to thieuish larceny and detraction; against them that well entreated the patient, & (vnder God) were truly the Authors of his restoring: Rather he will reforme those poore opinionists, by shewing them, that the accidents formerly past, were of the nature of the sickenes, which hath had such a course; and that (by good directions already administred) all succeeded well, and to the aduantage of the patient.

4. The Physition is esteemed a happy man, that comes to the ending of an infirmity.

No honest mã will be the base preferrer of another mans truely deserued reputation.

If he doe otherwise, and attribute that honor to himselfe, or accept it from their vulgar ignorance; he commits a shameful wrong, and the like Iewell may afterwards hang at his owne eare. For, of what sufficiency or reputation soeuer he be, it may so come to passe, that another Physition shall be called, vppon the ending of some cure by him taken in hand at the first, and he may requite him in the same kinde. Euery man therefore ought to be well aduised, and honestly content himselfe, with such honor as is due vnto him; not robbing his colleague or fellow-labourer in painefull endeauours, yeelding good and faithfull testimony, of ech others laudable performed actions. Accounting himselfe happy (neuertheless) that he came to the declination of the disease; where, taking no more pains, yet he shared a part in the gratefull acceptation, due vnto them that were employed from the first beginning.

Whosoeuer doth another man wrong, may meete with the like himselfe.

A duty necessarily required among learned and honest physitions.

CHAP. XI.

Against such as censure and iudge of Physitions sufficiencie, by their successe: which oftentimes is more due to a happy chance, then skill or knowledge.

Badly can a blinde man iudge of colours, no more can a foole of Physicke.

IT is a great matter, that the Science of Physicke shold be so obscure & profound, as nothing more: and yet notwithstanding, there is not any so fooliſh but will take on him to censure the knowledge of a Physition. To iudge soundly & iustly, concerning the sufficiencie of anie man: it behoooueth him (at the least) to be of the same profession, and to know somthing therein too. It must needs then be great rashnesse, for men that vnderstand nothing in Physicke, to enterprize to iudge, who are the best and most skillfull Physitions. Their eye and censure waites on the successe of their practise; & if som one heale (by chance, or sodainely, as we said before:) he is censured for a singular Physition, although he did not any thing deseruing speech. On the contrarie, the Physition little knowes, whether the patient shall die, or linger long in the agonie; which the vulgar esteeme lightest of all. Modesty will neuer say, such a mā is more or lesse skilfull, if he be reputed learned among men of knowledge: but will rather say he is not happy among sicke men, and consequently, no great Physition; euermore censuring by the successe.

Successe of practise is the vulgars direction in cēsure on the paines of any Physition.

It is vndoubtedly true, that in al things there is a happinesse and vnhappinesse, & (as the Italian saieth) La buena è la male sorte, Good fortune and bad. And the best happinesse for the Physition is, not to be called or employed, for such as are certain to die. For, there is no reputation to bee had, no, not in respect or friendship; neuertheless, he shal be sure not to escape blame, although he hath done his very vttermost endeuour, and ought to bee no lesse esteemed, then if the patient had escaped. Euen as we may say of a Captain, that shall defend a Town to the very latest Effort and labour, hauing eaten vp all the horses, Asses, Dogs, Cats, Rats, which the besieged place could afford, hides, parchments, and other vile foode (as is sayde of them of Sanserre, in the yeare 1573. who fed vpon the very tiles and slates, making bread of them, as I know not how.) Hauing lost the most part of his men, the wal all battered, and no meanes wherby to resist any longer; constrainedly (in the end) renders vp the Towne. Shall hee deserue lesse commendation (nay rather not farre more) then he that saued his own towne, being well munitioned and prouided of al things needfull, which he preserued without any paine, & very easily might do so?

Good and ill hap awaiteth vpon the actions of al men, and consequently vpon Physitions.

No thanks for a Generall to saue a Town, when he is able to withstand all resistance.

If this case should bee controuersed, it were easie to be discided; prouided, that the censurer be a man of iudgement, and not transported with affection; as the most part of men are, in being wilfully blinded. Whereuppon ensueth, that they will not bee perswaded, but that there must bee a fault in the Physition, if the patient (of whom he is most carefull and diligent) amend not as they desire and hope. Nor doth this case differ from the Captaines, that was the Gouernor of the lost Town, against whom remaineth continuall rancour and discontentment; because he did not sufficiently foresee the sieges affaires; but thus is all his paines baffulde in particularities of opinions, euen to the valewe of a straw. Whereas contrarywise, he shal be accounted for a valiant man (although hee bee the basest villaine in the world) if hee haue but good successe in his enterprizes.

Men are ouer much addicted and led by their own selfe-perswasion, & wilfully blinded.

Assuredly, it is no meane matter, for a man to bee happie in his attemptes; but this happinesse dependeth not vppon his knowledge or sufficiency, because it is an especiall gift of God; without which, he may be called to succour such as shal escape, continuing and effectuating the vertues giuen to remedies; as also, in not being called to such as shall dye, to whome the greatest paines and skill profiteth nothing. It is then verie ill done, to censure the sufficiency of a Physition by successe, which is more due to happinesse, and to the grace of God, then to all the knowledge that can be in man.

It is a great matter for a man to bee happy & successefull in his affaires.

And yet wee may not from hence inferre, or conclude, that it is all one, whatsoeuer Physition is called, to say; If God will that the sicke man shall recouer, hee will bestow his blessing on the remedies, if they bee ministred by the most ignorant man man in the world, and they ſhall prooue happy. It is very true, but yet it is to tempt God, as we haue formerly alleadged. As if we would haue him, that of ſtones, he ſhould make bread; and, of a remedie to no purpoſe, make it profitable. It is a common ſaying: Helpe thou, and God will aſſiſt thee. Let all the beſt meanes bee ſought that may be vſed, and referre the iſſue to God, in whoſe hands are all things.

CHAP. VIII.

Againſt ſuch men, to whom all things are ſuſpected, and Phyſitions ſlaundered, in the moſt part of thoſe accidents, which happen in diſeaſes.

A heauy burden to the very beſt Phyſition.

ONe of the very great paines, which a Phyſition (beeing the moſt generous, and of beſt ſpirit) hath, is, to ſupport the reproaches, and falſe accuſations of the ſicke perſon, or of his aſſiſtant friends, who are ſo vnreaſonable; that all the accidents which do happen in ſickeneſſe, they attribute them to the remedies; and thoſe of good ſucceſſe, they doubt whether they are due to the Phyſition, or no.

Accuſations vpon the patients weakneſſe, and imputed to the Phyſitions error.

For, firſt of all, when they ſee the perſon very weak, they accuſe the abſtinence and paucitie of food, appointed to him by the Phyſition: or elſe letting him bloud, or the purgation, and that they are the cauſes of the weakenes; imputing no vertue to the remedies, which (in diminiſhing the euill and bad humours) ſuſtained the ſicke body in farre greater ſtrength; for, but by the vſe of them, his eſtate would be a great deale weaker. That this muſt needs be ſo, do we not ſee ſome, who, condemning abſtinence, bloudletting and purgatiues, become in farre more feeble condition? If they that make no vſe of ſuch remedies, maintaine themſelues in greater ſtrength then other; one then might better ſay, that the remedies are the occaſion of weakenes but on the contrary, we behold thoſe deſpiſers to be more feeble, and (in the end) to die ſooner then the other.

For ſuch as deſpiſe all good meanes ordayned for their health.

Imputation laid vpon diuers other accidents, by ignorance of ſuch as are ſeuere cenſurers.

So is it of the other accidents, imputed vniuſtly to the remedies; as vomiting, flux of the belly, diſtaſte of meates, alteration, paine, want of ſleepe or watching, rauing and ſuch like, happening by reaſon of the diſeaſe properly, & from the nature thereof: but not from applyed remedies as ignorant people ſuppoſe. For, if after the patient hath taken ſomething, by ordination of the Phyſition, or onely ſome matter is applyed vnto him, and then (quickely after) he hath a caſting, or fluxe in the belly: this was the cauſe, by reaſon he did it not before. After ſuch a medicine receiued, this Syrrope, that Reſtauratiue; this Cordiall potion is ſo diſtaſtefull, as nothing can be more, alteration hath made the impreſſure far greater then before.

Of idle Aruments, pretending cauſes without any true ſence or reaſon.

It is true, that theſe occurrences happen after, but not thereby cauſed. And is it not as ill argued, if a man ſhould ſay: Since it ſnowed, my cloake grew more torne then it was before; therefore the ſnow was the cauſe thereof. Or otherwiſe; Since I fed on that Capon, I haue had the head-ach, the Collicke, or fluxe in the belly; therefore the Capon cauſed al theſe accidents. Sillie capacities, whatſoeuer commeth after, proceeds not from all that which hath preceeded. The fluxe in the belly, the caſting, diſtaſting, alteration, lacke of ſleepe, rauing, and the like other cauſes (to you vnknowne) which produce ſuch effects in their due times was, as the learned Phyſition knew how to direct the medicine, by breaking the courſe of the diſeaſe, foreſeeing the dangerous accidents, and diminiſhing them. All which notwithſtanding, in deſpight of what hee hath doone; the ſickeneſſe will make his part good againſt him, and encreaſe it ſelfe to a certain point commonly called, the eſtate of the diſeaſe: but that may grow on more gently, then is to be permitted.

When the ſickneſſe is violent, it checketh much skill in the phyſition.

And if alteration, diſtaſte, and other accidents doe encreaſe, after the vſe of ſome medicaments well appointed: beleeue aſſuredly, that they are from the diſeaſes further progreſſion, notwithſtanding all the re-trenchings and reſiſtances formerly made. Credite alſo, that the ſickeneſſe would haue beene more furious, and the aforenamed accidents leſſe ſupportable, if no meanes had beene made againſt them: as wee ſee by good experience, in ſuch as miſ-priſe thoſe remedies. For if it be true, that many do die through want of helpe (which is a Maxime receyued generally) it muſt needes fall out then; that they haue had more accidēts,& more tediouſnes, then ſuch as eſcape in the like perils. There is no need then of ſuſpecting, or calumniating the remedies, which haue bin followed by ſome accidents, olde or new, and then to ſay; This frontall (after the vſe of it) he hath ſlept leſſe, or raued more; for the fronrall was no cauſe thereof, but the ſickenes it ſelfe, that could not by the beſt meanes then be tamed.

Wilfull refuſall of helpe killeth many, and diuers dye for lacke of helpe.

Faults are eaſily found, but few good reaſons can be ſhewne for them.

Next, after the Cordiall potion, he had the hiccoke, the diſſenterie, or the cramp. It is very true: but this taile belongs not to this Calfe, as we ſay in the common Prouerb, this is another maner of ſtraine. I deny not, but remedies may be ſhrewd occaſions ſometimes, for they may be ill ordered, and but badly to the purpoſe. But I euer preſume, that the Phyſition ſhould be learned, diligent and affectionate: of all which he ſhould continually reliſh, for the better interpretation of his ordināces, and receuing them in the more reſpect; attributing rather to the diſeaſe, or the expreſſe will of God, thoſe accidents which happen (be they new or olde) then to the remedies. For there are diuers ſodaine incounters, and which cannot any way bee foreſeene, to make a guarde or preuention of them: as ſometimes of a very light medicine, we ſhal proceed ſo far as bloud, becauſe the patient was then vppon the poynt, of hauing the fluxe in his belly.

Of diuers encounters, no way to be foreſeene or preuented.

The Phyſition, who can not diuine, eſpecially on a neutrall body, neither ſicke nor ſound, that keeps not in bed, becauſe he would be no ſicker then he liſted: if nature make ſome euacuation of it ſelfe; hee (knowing it needfull) makes his medicine light enough. It hapneth hereupon, that after the operation, nature paſſeth on further, and makes a flux in the belly, which continueth inordinately: becauſe the expultrix vertue, being pricked by the eagre and mordicant excrements, cannot of her ſelfe reſtraine them. And the matter being corroſiue, cuts out the way as it paſſes along, that bloud enſueth of it. The medicine muſt endure the accuſation of al this, which (notwithſtanding) gaue but two or three ſmall ſieges: all the reſt was but a ſurrounding, & as a meere torrent of humours, gathered together of longer time. As ſomtime it comes to paſſe, that a man pulling but one ſtone out of a wall; a fadome or two follows after, becauſe it was ſo old and ruinous. Againſt a ſtrong wall, there needs a Cannon or double cannon; but for a weake and feeble wall, a fielde-peece there will make a great breach.

Nature will haue her free paſſage in the body of man, beſide all application of phyſicke.

And alſo, to iudge well of the effects of medicins; their true condition & eſtate muſt firſt be knowne, which none can ſo well do as the Phyſition, and not to iudge only by the effects. For, if during the operation, or ſoone after, we ſee that happen, which is not of that nature, caried or forced from the medicine; it is not to be attributed thereunto. No more then as if a child, ſhould giue a blow with his fiſt to a drunken reeling man, and hee ſhould ſodainely fall to the ground. It was not the ſtroke of the hand, that had ſuch ſtrength; but the wine or ſtrong drinke which had ouercome him, whereby the fal happened to him.

The quality & condition of remedies muſt be knone rather then their effects.

Neuertheleſſe, ſome one may reply by the ſelfeſame compariſon, that in like maner, to a ſicke man (very weake) a light medicine being giuen, it hath the power to ouerthrow him to the ground. Then may we well couple therewith this other compariſon; If a man ſhould giue a fillop on the arme, to a woman beeing great with child, immediatly after ſhe ſhould miſcarry. Hapned this by the fillop? The arme is far enough from the belly, & the fillop too light to enforce it: It is to be vnderſtoode then, that from ſome other inward occaſion, this ſo ſodaine miſ-hap receiued ſuch vigour. Euen ſo, many other things doe meet together of themſelues, not any way depending one vpon another; but caſually & accidentally, & the cauſes (commonly) neuer pretēded, or by any means diſcernd.

Compariſons that hold no true correſpondency with the rules of phyſicke.

CHAP. IX.

¶ That there are more ſtore and plentie of Phyſitions, then of anie other ſort of people.

IFinde recorded, that Alphonſo de Eſte, Duke of Ferrara, being on a time in familiar cōference, demaunded; of what trade or profeſſion there was moſt people. One anſwered, of Cordwainers or Shoomakers; another ſaide, of Tailers; another, of Carpenters; another, of Mariners; and another, of Lawyers. Gonella, a famous Buffone,

A pretty queſtion moued by the Noble Duke of Ferrara.

Buffone or Ieſter, replied, that there were more ſtore of Phyſitions, then of any other kinde of people: and waged againſt the Duke his maſter (who was far off from any ſuch conceite) that he wold approue his wordes, within the compaſſe of foure and twenty houres.

The policy of Gonello, to make good what hee promiſed to the Duke.

On the morrow morning, Gonello went from his lodging, with a great Night-cap on his head, and a Kerchiefe binding vp his chin, and then a huge hatte couering them all, beſide a warme cloake about his body. In this furniſhment, hee tooke the way towards the Pallace of his Excellencie, along the ſtreete called La rue des Anges. The firſt man he met withall, demanded of him, what he ayled? Whereto hee anſwered, that he had an outragious pain in his teeth. O my good friend (ſayde the other) I know the beſt receit in the world for it, telling him the matter & the means. Gonello wrote downe his name in his Tables, making ſhew, as if he had ſet downe the receipt. Not two paces further had he gone, but hee found two or three talking together: who demaunding of him the ſame queſtion; each man declared to him a ſeuerall remedy; he writing downe their names, as he did the firſt.

Many are medlers in giuing councell but fewe or none can giue right directions.

As he held on his way along the ſame ſtreet, going a ſoft and gentle pace, euerie man he met withall, ſtil gaue him counſel for ſeuerall receipts, and no one agreeing with another; yet ſtill each friend aſſured him, that (what he ſpake off) had bin approoued certaine and infallible; and ſtill he wrote downe euery mans name. Being come to the low Bulwarke of the Pallace; hee was round engirt with many people there attending; becauſe he was moſt familiarly knowne to them all; and euerie man pittying to ſee him thus diſtreſſed, (vnderſtanding the reaſon of his pain) aduiſed him to many receiptes, which each man auouched to be the verie beſt in the World: he writing downe their Names, gaue them infinite thankes at his departing.

The fool cunningly beguileth the Duke his maſter, for the winning of his wager.

Being entred into the Dukes chamber, his Excellencie no ſooner ſawe him, but running to him, ſaide: How now Gonello, what ayleſt thou? In pittifull manner hee replyed (euen as if he had bene ſcarſe able to ſpeak:) Ah my Lord, I haue the toothake, in the moſt cruell manner that euer man had. Whereuppon, his Excellencie ſaide vnto him; Alas poore Gonello, I know a thing that will helpe thy paine preſently, yea, if thy teeth were ſpoiled and rotten: Meſſer Antonio Muſſa Braſſonolo, my Phyſition, neuer found a better in all his practiſe; take it, and it will immediatly helpe thee. Sodainely, Gonello threw off all his ſickely outſide, ſaying out alowde: How now my Lord, what are you become a Phyſition too? See heere my roll of Phyſitions, how many I haue met withall, betweene mine owne Lodging, and your Court: they are in number almoſt two hundred, and yet I haue paſt through but one ſtreete only. I will gage as much more to my wager, to finde aboue ten thouſand in this Cittie, if I ſhould but go thorow it, as I haue done this one ſtreete: finde you out as many more my Lord, of ſome other profeſſion.

Euery man perſwadeth himſelfe, to haue much more knowledge, then diuers Phyſitions haue.

A hiſtory well met withall to our purpoſe, and verie true; for, euery man will be a Phyſition for one thing or other, and there are very fewe people, but they pretend to knowe enough, nay more then ſome Phyſitions do. I ſet aſide ſome Chirurgeons, Barbers, Apothecaries, Nurſſes, or attendants vppon ſicke perſons, wiſe women, Mountebankes, and other Empericks, euen to very Merchants, who, to make ſome profeſſion of a part of Phyſick become meere Polypragmons; pretending to vnderſtand more then Maiſter Mouche, making great outward ſhewes, and medling with many diſeaſes, accompanied with ſhameleſſe aſſurances, and no meane promiſes. I would leaue them, but that they are ſuch a goodly number, and daily they encreaſe by multitudes, out of the baſeſt mechanical trades; as it is moſt lamentable to behold, and many liues periſh by their meanes.

The name of a cunning Iugler, a Mountebanke in France.

There are diuers of them, that will controule the directions of a Phyſition, preſuming to handle the pacients pulſe, and obſerue his Vrine. Deliuering theyr own aduices, quite contrary to that which the Phyſition appointed. If there be any, who are better aduiſed heerein; I thinke the number of them to be ſo ſmall, as a man had much rather write of thoſe preſumptuous companions, making vp a role of ſo manie vndertakers, as (indeede) they would appeare to be infinite. Some of the are ſo bold and impudent, as before the learned Phyſition (yea, euen in his preſence)

Among verie baſe mechanicall Trades, there are plenty of theſe Phyſicke profeſſors, leauing their owne, becauſe they cannot liue by them.

sence) they will deliuer opinion, whether the patient should be let blood, or no: and when he bleedeth, that so much may bee taken, and no more: That it is not good to purge, the season is not proper, but fitter for nourishing; when to minister restoratiues, diets, coullises, pressis, Orges mondes, &c. which must be giuen by their order, or else the patients friends will neuer be quiet.

The verie chiefe controler of all Arte and knoledge.

In briefe, the great controller, euen the prime and cheefest Iudge of all, is, the ignorant vulgar, most vniust and vnindifferent, who (as Terence saide) Thinke nothing to be well done, but what they do themselues. And if their aduice be not followed, it is attributed to the Patients death, or to the prolonging of his sickness, if that some other course is not taken. Let thē but imagine, and the Patient bee perswaded (by them) that it must be so; all other proceeding is absolutely erroneous, and thinges else is blamed, be they applied to the true purpose indeede. Is not this a miserable case? In other Arts, which are lesse obscure and difficult, and all thinges (well-neere) apparant to euery eye; the Arte-zan is permitted to follow his owne mind.

All Arts else but Physicke, are not subiect & to somuch controule & obloquy.

In Physicke, the most secret and hidden of all, and wherein the people cannot discerne a iot; euery man will dominere, like Rats in straw. Nor shall wee euer see better successe by the order of Nature, for the most part of diseases, in persons of degree, that haue great visitation of followers: but alwayes they haue health soonest of whom the least account is made.

CHAP. XIIII.

That it is not for the sicke Patients profite, to haue many Physitions, as in ordinarie: but one Physition sufficeth, being assiduate and skilfull.

The Authour writeth heere to such as are Physitions indeede.

THis proposition may be vnderstood, by what we haue lately saide, touching vulgar estimation of Physitions: but I would not be mistaken, because my meaning here properly is; of such as are truely Physitions, in skill, knowledge, and profession. It is very reasonable and necessary, that the aduice of many should bee had, in difficulties, and matters doubtfull concerning a sickenesse. For (as the common saying is) Foure eyes may see more then two; that is, supposing them all to see clearly; for, one may aduise one thing, and a contrary party another; whereby, their meeting and agreement, is to the profit of the patient. But to haue many Physitions, in ordinary (as it were) and all to haue equall care of the sicke person; can no way bee for his good and profit. For, in euerie purpose, they may contradict one another in some thing, or else about a matter indifferent, one in enuy of another, and more for ostentation then necessity.

Aduice of one Physition to another, cannot be hurtfull to the patient.

Pliny did very well obserue and note this writing thus. It neede not to be doubted, that Physitions (coueting reputation by some nouelty) make a sodaine Traffick of our soules. Hence ensueth those miserable contestations, about sicke bodies; none of them beeing of one and the same opinion, because no repetition must be made. Thence came that superscription on the vnhappy Tombe: I was spoilde, by hauing too many Physitions. Meaning thereby the Emperor Adrian, who (in dying) cryed out: That the multitude of Physitions had kild him.

Plin. l. 29. c. 1.

The words of the Emperor Adrian on his death bed.

The reason of this mischeefe is diuers waies vnderstood. As first, the enuy or iealousie, which (commonly) one man beareth to another; especially such, as are the worst created, ambitious, and couetous, beyond the ordinary course of other Artesmen. For, it is vsually seene: That one Potter is enuious at another, according to the ancient Adage. But much more (without comparison) the Physition, because he desireth, that the whole honour should be referred to him, of well predicting, well ordering, and well finishing the disease. Wherefore, hee cannot willingly endure, that any other should share a part with them. I speak of the couetous ambitious man: who is likewise (comonly) quarrellous, a detractor, and insupportable.

One Begger is wo, another by the doore doth go.

Of couetous, ambitious, & quarrellous Physitions.

You haue some men very modest, but yet iealous of the honor, which they conceiue is due to them; chiefely, in such occasions, which they thinke may bee done by themselues, as being cases light, common, and ordinarie. They can bee well con-contented, not to be contradicted; & yet notwithstanding, they will giue consent, and yeelde to the desire or pleasure of the Patient, or those friends that are about him. But this is not for the sicke parties profit, as I haue vndertaken to proue. For, although there be three or foure Physitions, one assisting to another for cure of the man, being all modest, peacefull, and skilfull: yet notwithstanding, wee knowe not how to preuent and auoide, the most part of such inconueniences as I will sette downe, and are (oftentimes) ordinary. For I leaue to them, who haue obserued it by others, to iudge, how much this maner of proceeding is incommodious, and hurtfull to poore patients.

Of the first inconuenience by multiplicity of Physitions.

First, if there be but one or two Physitions ordinarily employed: they will (no doubt) be most carefull, most diligent, most affectionate, to come off with theyr credit and honour. And yet one man alone, who shall haue the charge layde on his shoulders, may be there much more attentiue, because the trust is wholly reposed in him, and all the worth must redound to him. If that man haue a good heart, he will studie and labor, to do much better, then if he were consorted with another; considering euermore (as he ought to do) that in all difficulties he may quickly haue counsell.

Of the second inconuenience.

Another discommodity is; that many Physitions can hardly meete together, to visit the sicke patient, and all at one hour. For each of them haue other cures of visitation, beside some hapning in the meane while, and other affaires of importance: whereby, men are ofttimes compelled, to faile of the appointed time, that all cannot be present with the sicke person. In this case, the Physition most vsed, or such as meete there, are greatly hindered in giuing their aduice, or for ordering against some occasion which may happen; fearing least the absent parties or partie, shall not allow their iudgement; whereupon, it may breede an error in the patient, or his assisting friends, who will after knowe his opinion, and demand it alone by himselfe. Sometime, this may chance but about a Cherry, or a difference of as small moment, deseruing (of it selfe) not to bee spoken of; but yet al must agree togither, and giue consent in the case. This keeps the attending Physitions in no meane affliction, and many times the patient in much more.

Many Physitian can hardly meet: al at an houre.

In like manner (comming now vnto a third point) they may endure many small things, which the ordinary and present Physition would order otherwise, following such occasions as present themselues at euerie moment. I do call them small of themselues, yet often might bee brought to the patients great benefit; but hee dare not apply them, dreading discontentment in them which are absent. Hereby the patient may passe thorow diuers afflictions (from which hee might haue bene freed) as, during too much drought, or beeing kept ouer-hot, or too much pressed vvith foode and Medicines, or prohibited of some pleasure and recreation, no way preiudiciall to his healing, and such like. I hold my selfe satisfied, in setting downe these three inconueniences, which are ordinary in the plurality of Physitions, to shew and approue, that it is much better (without comparison) to haue but one Physition; prouided, that he be assiduate and carefull.

The 3. inconuenience.

Many afflictions hapning to a man in sickneſſe, yet easily holpen.

It is the greatest happinesse for the sick man (that can be) to haue but one Physition, that goeth not away from him. For, by visiting him once or twice in a day, the patient cannot bee well cured: this may be called healing in grosse, and not exactly. For the present Physition, obserueth many particularities, which causeth him to change opinion euery houre; as wel of his nourishment, as in other Remedies. Wherefore Celsus saide very well, where he sheweth, what diligence a Physition ought to vse, in well directing the patients foode, for due houres, and measure of them, because it is one of the cheefest points in the whole cure. For (as hee writeth) Foode fitted to purpose, is a most singular Medicine and remedy. It ought alwaies to be obserued, and generally, that the attending Physitian do continually respect the Patients strength: When it shall be good & able, to vse abstinence; and when hee beginneth to doubt his weakenesse, then to make supply of food. For it is his duty, that he surcharge not the sicke body with superfluous matter; neyther to betray it to feeblenesse, by famine, or starueing, &c. Heereby may easily bee vnderstood, that many (together) cannot bee cured by one Physition: & that he (if he vnderstand truely his Art) is most proper, that neuer parteth

Great happinesse to a sick patient, in hauing but one Physition, that shall attend him diligently.

The words of Celsus, a most learned Physition.

teth from the ſicke perſon. But ſuch as are addicted to gaine, beecauſe much is to bee had by a multitude of people: they willingly embrace thoſe Rules, which require no ſuch great curioſity, as in this caſe. For it is verie eaſie, to account daies, and houres, and other times of acceſſe; eſpecially in ſuch, as vſe not often to ſee their patients. But it behooueth him to be attendant, that muſt haue a care of all needfull things, and when the patient ſhall bee once feeble, to ſee that hee haue good nouriſhment.

The great importance of the ſick mans ſeruice.

Heereby you may perceiue, how important the ſicke mans ſeruice is, that he muſt alwayes be aſſiſted by a good Phyſition, both for his gouernement, and alſo for the vſe of remedies. For, by being preſent, hee may aduance or tardie, encreaſe or diminiſh, and doe many things in other manner, then when the ſick-man is ſeene but by ſtarts and leyſures, as is too much practiſed vpon the people. Wherefore, it is beſt to haue but one Phyſition, though he be of the leſſe ſufficiency or reputation (and conſequently of leſſe preſſure; ſo that he be honeſt, moſt frequent, and diligent. For diligence, vigilancy, & carefull obſeruation in the ordinary Phyſition; may counterpoize one of greater knowledge, that is not halfe ſo much imployed.

One honeſt painfull Phyſition is better then twenty.

CHAP. XV.

Againſt ſuch as complaine on the ouer-ſhort viſitation of ſome Phyſitions.

Hip. in Epiſt. ad Demag.

Vr life is ful of contrarieties, according as Democritus declared to Hippocrates, in the conference which they had together: as Hippocrates writeth to Damagetes in his Epiſtles. For, that which pleaſeth vs now, will diſcontent vs within an houre. The labourer would bee a ſouldier, and (in ſhort time) fall to his former condition againe. The Merchant would be made a Gentleman, and (ſoone after) returne to his Merchandize againe. But contradiction is yet more palpably diſcouered, when wee ſee contradictorie quality in one and the ſame thing. As, to be a ſoldier, and yet not engaged to follow war, to be a great landed man, and yet not ſubiect to ſuites in law; to haue Varlets and Drabs in the houſe, and yet to be free from robbing; to liue diſſolutely, and neuer to be ſicke. So is it in many, who would haue Phyſitions of greateſt following, and moſt reported of for practiſe, (of whome the vulgar giue great iudgemen, that they are men of ſingular knowledge, as oftentimes it ſo fals out, though not alwaies.) And ſodainely they make complaint, of their too ſhort or ſeldome viſitation, and that they come not (ſo often as they ought) to ſee them.

All conditions are ful of contrarieties.

Contradictions contrarie to themſelues

Complaint made of Phyſitions viſitings.

This is a complaint commonly made of our Pariſian Phyſitions, being the moſt famous, who in ſo great a Citie, haue ordinarily ſuch plentie of patients, as it is vterly impoſſible, that they ſhold ſtay long with any one of them. For, if a Phyſition haue twentie patients to viſite in a day, is is not much, if hee abide with each one a quarter of an houre at a time? For, in the longeſt day, which may conſiſt of xvi. houres, I would haue him begin to viſite at fiue of the clock in the morning, and ſo continue vntill ten: then begin againe at noon, and hold on till fiue in the euening, heere are ten houres imployed in viſitation. It is verie neceſſary, that hee ſhould haue ſome time of reſt, as from tenne to twelue for his dinner, & refreſhing from fiue to ſeauen in the ſame euening, and then to ſleepe in quiet: for if he ceaſe not day nor night, it is not poſſible for him to haue long continuance.

The Phyſitiõs of Paris in France.

Allowance of times, for viſitation.

I will yet allow ſix houres for the morning, and ſix more after dinner. For, to go from one houſe to another, to mount and deſcend againe all the ſtaires, importeth wel the ſpace of two houres, in viſiting of twentie ſeuerall perſons. For no man whatſoeuer, can ride in poſte quite thorough a Cittie; and then in the Sommer, when the dayes bee long, the ſwiftneſſe of motion is very dangerous, by ouer-heating, ſweating, alteration of body, and other ſuch like accidents. There remaineth then ten houres wholly cleere, that the Phyſition may bee by each ſicke mans bedde, and that is the moſt for ſuch imployment: And howe much time is heere allowed then to each of the twenty? If I could account well, there were (for euerie one) a quarter of an houre in the mor-

Six houres for morning, and ſixe more for afternoon for viſitation.

A very ſhort time for viſiſiting twentie patients.

morning, and as much againe after dinner.

But very certaine it is, that the most famous Physitions, haue to visite (som such dayes) aboue thirty patients; and besides that, to vse consultations, where a man is constrained to stay longer then a simple visiting. Whence ensueth necessarilie, yea, and inevitably, that each of the other visitations, cannot bee halfe a quarter of an houre. For, hee must conrent euerie man, and he that imparts himselfe among so many, must needes allow euery one a little. Thus the Physition doth but enter and depart, and (cursorily) informeth himselfe of the patients estate; feeles his pulse, obserues his vrine, speaketh a word of that which is to be done, and then away to another.

Famous Physitions haue many cures to attend on.

Great men are guided by the fame of Physitions.

He is not iustly to bee blamed, for his celerity and summarie visitation, seeing it is not possible for him to doe otherwise; and they that call such men to their cure, are not well informed. Nay more, if the Physition answer sometime, that hee can haue no leysure, considering the great number of patients he is to attend: some one or other will reply, O good Sir, if you do but looke in a doores, and then depart; the sicke man will thinke, that he shall bee healed by your verie sight onely: if you woulde but once in a day see him, as you passe along, hee were well satisfied. As much saith another, yea, three or foure: What shall we say to such a man?

Physitions that vse summary visitations, with nimble celerity.

When all will haue one man onely, what vse is like to be made of the rest?

But some one will answere mee: He ought to haue regard of the persons quality, and make longer stay with a great Lord, Byshoppe, Abbot, Earle, Baron, President, Councellor, Treasurer, Generall of the Finances, and other men of Honour, who haue wherewithall to acknowledge and recompence him better, then ordinarily other men doe or can. I heare one make reply, that he ought to do his duty towards all men, and to acquitte himselfe faithfully of his Charge. Beside, that (by some) he is to be much more commanded; as his parents, neerest Kindred, Friends, Familiars, and some to whom he standeth in high degree obliged. Such persons indeed (according vnto humane sense and iudgement) ought to be preferred before the other, what ranke or degree soeuer they hold. And such, of whom no money is to be taken, in regarde of the fore-named obligation; do iustly require of the Physition, much more care and diligence, then they from whom hee may expect recompence. And therefore, it is no small matter, to haue a learned & wise Physition obliged and affected vnto anie one, who will alwayes make more regard of friendship, then of greatnesse.

That great persons shall bee more respected, then men of meaner quality.

Men of lesse note may haue as good experience as greater boasters, & what they prolong, performe in lesser time.

And although the most part of our greatest personnes, haue no other knowledge of the Physition, but by his Fame onely, and are much lesse knowne to the Physition; yet such knowledge being not reciprocall, and hauing no familiaritie, friendship, nor mutuall Obligation; the Phisition is no more proper to them, then any other beside of the same profession, who hauing fewer crowds following thé, may (happily) as soone minister succour, and giue more respect. But passion is so preualent in these our dayes, as none must bee had, but hee that is in most request; and euery man would very willingly haue him, which properly is no way possible, and yet they complaine of his slack attendance too.

If a man say, I am none of the meanest persons, and I haue wherewithall to pay him, as wel as another: you shal haue an hundred to speake the same Wordes. What shall the Physition then doe? But diuide his visitations into so many pieces, as euery one may haue a little. But euer more let him reserue the longest, for such to whom hee is most obliged, and standeth engaged; as reason and humanitie commandeth him.

Wherefore, it were much better (in my minde) that men heerein would take more aduisement, and to desire y which they may haue: that is, a Physition easyer to bee had, among them that are accounted learned and expert, and yet haue not such busie imployment; because their season is not as yet come, beeing post-poned to others, that haue more name, and longer time. And if there bee any difficultie in the disease, it may as iudiciously bee consulted on, as they that bragge most, and performe least. Beleeue it vndoubtedly, that if the Phisytion be an able ma, he can soone vnderstand, and hath fewest words; which he had rather should appeare by proofe, then waste the time in vaine lip-labour.

Parents and kindred challege no meane priuiledge in ceremony and respect.

This is the best aduice that a sicke patient tient can take, of what quality ſoeuer hee be, for his ſooneſt helpe and ſuccor. And if his meanes be ſuch, as to haue the Phyſition ſtill with him, or that hee goe but little from him: it wil be much the better for him, imitating what hath bin diſcourſed in the precedent Chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

How much it importeth, that the ſicke patient ſhould repoſe confidence in his Phyſition.

The Authors clearing himſelfe concerning the former chapter.

SOme may miſ-vnderſtand, that which I haue ſet down in the neighboring Chapter; as if I reprehended the affection which many haue to be viſited by the moſt famous Phyſitions, and who (for their great reputation) haue moſt acceſſe in the beſt Cities. God forbid, I ſhould therein do wrong to very venerable and rare perſons, who (by their merit) haue acquired ſuch renowne: And I ſhould alſo offer iniurie to the ſick if I perſwaded them from affection, and recourſe to the healers of theyr harmes. For, on the contrary, if men may ioy plainely, and ſo much as neede requireth; none in the Worlde may better doe it then they.

He taxeth nothing but vulgar cõplaints onely.

I taxe onely vulgar complaint, and in ſuch as (to their owne ſhame) are diſcontented, becauſe they cannot enioy what they would haue. I alwaies maintain, that they are onely the meeteſt men, in regard of themſelues, and for their reſpect. Onely this is my deſyre, that men of ſuch fame and reputation, remaining alwaies in ſo great requeſt: ſhould alſo be moſt skilfull and expert, happy in their practiſes, and conformable to their patients. For otherwiſe, their high ſailes will ſtrike, and their reputation (badly grounded) will flie vp in ſmoake.

In commendation of the renowned generally by the world.

But for the choiſe men themſelues, they are verie meete, apt, and correſpondent, to cure the greateſt diſeaſes, and in the worthieſt perſonages: in which reſpect, they holde reputation, and the cheefeſt ranke among Phyſitions, onely for happineſſe in their cures. Becauſe opinion conceiued of them, gines certaine confidence to the ſicke man, to bee recouered better, and more ſecurely by their means, then any other whatſoeuer. Whereupon, we commonly ſay in our ſchooles, He healeth moſt diſeaſes, in whom moſt confidence is repoſed. And this proceedeth from ſtrong imagination, which hath mightie power, to make impreſſion in vs; as I ſufficiently haue ſhewne, in the Preface to my 2. booke of Laughter.

Confidence in the patient, is halfe a help to the Phiſition.

It is a power of the ſoule, which ſtrongly mooueth the blood and ſpirits, in ſuch a ſtrange manner; that if ſhe walke along (hand in hand) with firme opinion and confidence, the very powers of Nature aſſemble, to fight againſt the ſicknes. And thereupon, great changes are noted in the Patient, onely at the very preſence of a Phyſition deuoutly attending. For, deſire and hope being ſatisfied, the ſoule releeueth it ſelfe, and re-enforceth againſt the ſickeneſſe. So that (verie often) Nature maketh ſome braue ſally and effort; chaſing the matter of offence impetuouſlie, by a Criſis as we vſe to call it, which is the conflict of Nature and Sickneſſe. Contrariwiſe, if the Phyſition be not verie anſwerable in liking to the patient, perceiuing him not ſo ſuccourable, as hee deſireth or would haue: ſuch a Phyſition ſhal neuer proceed ſucceſſefully, and the ſicke man (contriſting and diſcouraging) will become much more feeble then euer hee was. For his ſpirites being danted, they haue no vigour at all; onely by the feare and diſtruſt which hath before ſeized vpon his heart.

The power of Deſire and hope on their ſatisfaction.

An vnpleaſing Phyſition can do no good to his patient.

There is another benefite, which returneth to the patient, by hauing a Phyſition as his owne deuotion, and according to his wiſh and liking; becauſe from him hee hopeth to haue great comfort. For, hee willingly apteth and accommodateth himſelfe, to whatſoeuer he ordaineth for him: with a chearefull confidence, that all this will ſurely helpe and heale him. As on the contrarie, what hee receiueth (from another Phyſition) all is in miſlike & diſdain; whereby, nothing can be profitable vnto him. For, although it were the beſt, and moſt delicate thing in the world, if hee haue not a good opinion of it, the ſtomack fals to a loathing, and neuer can it come ſo gladſome to his heart, as when he takes it with a chearefull diſpoſition. Wine, the brothe of a Capon, and the Brawne of a Par-

Nothing can be welcom to the patient, if he be out of loue with his Phyſition.

Partridge, are most excellent nourishments, delicate, and dainty: but if a man take them frowningly, with an ill opinion of the Butlers bringing them, or that the Cookes dressing them is not agreeable; all will doe no good, the stomack being directly opposite vnto them. What will he thinke then of things, which (are of themselues) very vnpleasing, and sickenesse abhorreth naturally, as medicines & other druggeries?

Many afflictions happens to the patient if he bee not confident in his Physition.

It followeth moreouer, that the patient will endure many annoyances, wherein he shall be greatly impatient to his owne preiudice: if he haue not a good opinion of his Physition, and be confident in him. For, hee may approoue him to bee such a man, as the credite of any other could neuer perswade him. Therefore, it is not in vaine, that poore sicke men should desire such as holde great reputation, and of whom (commonly) passeth good opinion; for such haue the best efficacy in their proceedings and directions. But yet they are not so much to bee affected, as no respect at all should be vsed of other: wherof choyse also may bee made at a second or third time of occasion, and they then must needs bee vsed, for want of the former. When any such man happens to be called: the patient must likewise repose his trust, confidence, and affection in him, without desiring any other; relying onely vpon God, who giueth vertue to remedies, at his owne good will and pleasure.

Mariage vsed as a comparison with the present argument.

For, in mariage, Maids couet to match in great houses; but if it will not come so to passe, they must content themselues with meaner place, giuing all their loue and affection, to the husbands chosen by themselues. And God may giue them as much (or more) happinesse and contentment with their meane match, then if they had the richest husbands in the Worlde. This may redound to an honest household life, whereas the other might haue prooued iust nothing like the Physition, standing out of his patients affection, beeing daily desirous of another.

CHAP. XVII.

Of such as will haue Physitions, and yet deny to do as they appoint and direct them.

The Negatiues of Physitions better credited then their affirmatiues.

NOt long since, I met at Narbona with a Gentleman of Venice, who was Ambassador to the Seigneury, and he talking purposely concerning Physitions, pleasantly said: That he wold beleeue them well in their Negatiues, but not in their affirmatiues. This was a good old man, gallant and pleasantly disposed, who came from Spaine, hauing accomplished the tearme of his legation with King Phillip. Hee thus interpreted Negatiues prohibited by Physitions: As not to drink Wine, nor eate fruite, nor to feede on windie meates, and such like. And their affirmatiues were, to take medicines, glisters, Inleppes, and other things by them appointed. Was not this a goodly proposition, which many put in practise, to their extreame harme. For, they are willing to haue Physitions: but go looke for such as shal do as they direct them. Hardly will they keepe within the boundes of this Venitian, who (at least) would abstaine from what he was forbidden: but the most part of patients now a dayes, do quite contrary. What auaileth it to haue a Physition, if a man bee resolued, not to execute and accomplish his counsell, for the defence of his owne life?

The Physition may be kindly welcome, but his counsell nothing respected.

Friuolous answers in denying the Physitions counsell

Some will answer, that the presence of the Physition comforteth, delighteth, and encreaseth courage; whereby they feele the infirmity to diminish, & their strength to augment. Another saieth, I will doe something that the Physition doth aduise mee, at least of foode and gouernement; but of his Drugges I will not heare him speake.

Well may wee compare this case, vnto people besiedged in a Towne or Cittie; calling some good and expert Captaine or Commander, for their succour and defence. Hee being come to them, they wil not obey him, nor accõplish any of his ordinances, but ſay: That they are vvell pleaſed with his preſence, and they are ſufficiently fortified; it is enough for them, if he but take order for victuals, & be prouident in policie. As for fight, mounting the Artillery, and other needfull preparations, they will not heare a word of that. Is this any thing elſe, but meerly to mock a braue ſoldier for his paines, & ſend him away with loſſe of credit?

Eccleſ. 38, 4. I durſt not tearme this folly, if Eccleſiaſticus had not taught me, ſaying; Hee that is wiſe, will not abhorre the Phyſition. Oh, but Phyſicke (ſay ſome) is very tirkeſome to take. It is true, and God hath ſo ordained it, that it may the better fight againſt the euill. For, as health is pleaſing and acceptable, ſo is it entertained with as acceptable things: and as ſicknes is vnpleaſing, ſo muſt diſtaſtful things helpe to conquer it. It is not wiſedome, if we apply not our willes, to whatſoeuer the Phyſition appointeth, without contemning any thing. For oftentimes, thorough defect of one obſeruation, which may ſeeme but ſmall: the diſeaſe impaireth, euen to death. Like as a Towne may (ſometime) bee loſt, by lacke of a Sentinell; or by the meanes of a little hole or paſſage, which appeared to be of no importance. Sometime, a ſparke of fire enflames a whole heape of Straw, and thereby a houſe, and of one houſe, a whole Burrough or Towne. If a ſmall fault grow into exceſſe, or faileth of help in due time, no meane diſorder enſueth thereon.

By taſting ſicknes, we know the better how precious a thing health is.

Small errours may grow ouer great to be eaſily appeaſed.

What then ſhall become of ſuch as deſpiſe the Phyſition, when he (many times) hath worke enough to doe, to ſaue them, that are willing to doe whatſoeuer hee would haue them? Commonly, it falleth out with them who are ſo difficult, that (in the end) they would yeeld to all, & more, euen then when there is neither meanes, nor time, and can no way bee preſerued from death, as they might haue bene before, by Gods gracious aſſiſtance. Euen like to beſiedged people, that began but coldly in their owne defence, not imploying all their means; but ſparing theyr bedtickes, balles of Wooll, Cheſts, Cuppeboords, and other moueables, for re-impairing their victualles and money, that their Soldiers, Armes, and perſons might be the better ſecured, and to fight valiantly. But at length, beholding themſelues conſtrained; then they can offer bags of Gold, Plate, Iewels, yea, all to their verie bowels, onely for ſafety; when there is no remedy at all to ſted them, but become wiſe too late, with the Phrygians, according to the Prouerbe. Wherefore, let euery man determine with himſelfe (euen in the very beginning) to doe willingly what the Phyſition ſhall counſell and ordaine for him, without reſtriction, or diſtinguiſhing Negatiues and affirmatiues, that God may the better giue his bleſſing, to concurre with the Phyſitions true endeuour.

Contemners of Phyſicke ſeek for helpe thereby, when it is too late.

Delay in ſuch caſes is euermore dangerous, & hardly recouered.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of ſuch as in their ſickneſſe, will admitte no medicine or remedy; but only for the preſent paine and anguiſh.

IObſerued this opinion, in a Gentleman of Viuares, affected greatly to his pleaſures. He made no particulare account of infirmities, which were without greeuance, thinking remedies to ſerue little or nothing at all for them; euen as if it were neceſſary, that the diſeaſe ſhold haue his courſe. And whatſoeuer was done, the infirmity would paſſe his foure times, if it were recouerable: but if it were deadly, then there was no remedy that could bee proper for it; which were erroneous ſpeeches, grounded on thoſe folies heretofore refuted. In breefe, he would not allow of any Phyſition, nor any medicine; but to take away inſtant anguiſhes. But, if he wer falne into a palſie, which is a diſeaſe without paine, I beleeue he could gladly haue deſired, that it might be cured by medicin, or any other helpe elſe whatſoeuer.

No application of remedie, but to the place of preſent paine.

Now, concerning dolorous and painefull diſeaſes, it is to bee vnderſtoode, that greefe there is not the principal (although of very great importance) and that the euill muſt and ought to be taken away, frō which the anguiſh proceedeth, if men do deale iuſtly in their cures. For, if one ſtand trifling ſimply vpon the paine, & the cauſe is miſtaken (which is the ſourſe, root, and mother of euill:) there are then but two meanes; meanes; the one is by Anodyne medicines, which diminish the pain in some measure, and causeth the party to endure the rest more patiently.

Concerning dolorous and painfull diſeaſes, wherein anguiſh is not cheefe.

The other is by Arcotick medicins, that is to say stupifying, making the member sleepy, in astonning the Naturall heate. Which is not to be vsed, but in extreme necessitie, and very wisely: but, as wel the one, as the other, do not let passe or lessen the greefe, but onely for a time.

The ground & cause of euils are to bee taken away, or else all our labour is to no purpose.

Euermore, wee should come to Cure the principall, otherwise it is still to begin againe. And if our remedies serue not to take away the euill, which is without paine, or which causeth paine: that were the greatest falshoode in the worlde, as I haue apparantly proued before, where I ouerthrew the idle imagination, that Phisitions serued to no purpose, but abused the world. If any yet shall reply vnto me, that many are well re-cured, both without Physitions and Medicines: I answere also in the same manner, that as many lose their greeuances, without Physicke, or any other applyed remedies, whereby that proposition is meerely confounded of it selfe.

CHAP. XIX.

¶ That such as are subiect to diseases, are in like manner subiect to Physicke: and e-ther's not.

Men strong & healthful, condemne such as are weak, and sickly.

MANY throw aspersions of blame and reproofe, on such as obserue some orderly rule and gouernment, subiecting themselues to certaine remedies, to maintaine their healthfull condition, and preuent some knowne euilles, whereto they are subiect. They that condemne those meanes, are (doubtles) verie healthfull, and of good Complexion: in which respect, the position is verie true, according to that which is saide in Sacred Scripture, The law was not giuen to the iust. Math. 9. 12. But more expressely, where it is saide, The whole need not the Physition, but they that are sicke. These words likewise do confirm the contrary, to wit; That such as are sick, haue need of the Physition; & such as are subiect to any sickenesse, are also subiect to some rule. Euen according as we are subiect to sin, so are we subiect to the Law.

Celsus in lib. 1. c. 1.

I shall alwaies giue consent with most eloquent Celsus: That the healthfull Man, while he carieth himselfe well, and is truely himselfe: needeth not to be tyed to any Law or Gouernment, nor to imploy the Physition. It is very expedient, that he should haue diuers manners of life; one while in the field, then againe in the City, but more often in the field: To Nauigate, hunt, to be at rest and ease sometimes, but yet to exercise himselfe more oftē. For, sloath and idlenesse, maketh the bodye drowsie and dull; but trauell confirmeth it: The one, is the hastner of Age, the other is the continuer of iolly youth.

Excellent aduice giuen by lerned Celsus, to a healthfull man.

It is good also sometimes to bath, and sometimes to vse colde waters; one while to annoint, then againe to forbeare. Feare no kind of meats, that are vsed among ciuill people; to be sometimes present at Feasts, another while to refraine them. One while feede some-what immeasurably, and afterward soberly. Make two meales a day more often then one, and alwayes eate well, so long as it may haue digestion, &c. As concerning carnall Copulation, it may not bee desired too much, nor too much feared neither: That which is rare and seldome, exciteth the body; that more frequent dissolueth it, &c.

He that is well & cannot keep himself so, the blame is his owne.

These rules are to be obserued by such, that haue their health firme, and can so keepe themselues; that remedies ordayned for euil carriage be not employed & consumed in vaine. In this maner are men of sound health indifferent to all, and subiect to nothing, while they beare themselues well, and are so firmely in health, as Celsus hath limited. It were very great shame for a man, to make himselfe delicate, soft, and tender, soupling and enerue his good and strong Complexion; which would extend it selfe a great deale more, by bolde, valiant, and manly exercises. But for valetudinarie personnes, vnhealthfull, subiect vnto manie Diseases, as Epilepsies (commonly called, Mal de S. Iean) Megrimes, Rheumes, Catarhs, shortnesse of breath, Ache in the bones, Oppilations in the Liuer or Spleene, the Winde Collicke, or Stone, Gowts, and the like infirmities (whereof the most part are Hereditarie, yea, and the Leaprofie too) who makes any doubt or question, but that such men ought to liue within rule, if their owne eaſe they be not enuious of, and deſire to ſee manie dayes?

Such alſo as addict themſelues to ſtudie, or vnto publike charges in the Common-wealth, becauſe they are ſubiect to many neceſſities, ought to be gouerned; otherwiſe, they often fall into diuers infirmities. For they tie & conſtraine themſelues to ſtore of things, which are verie hurtful for them. And Celſus in the words before alledged, preſuppoſeth, that the healthfull man, muſt alſo be wholly himſelfe in all reſpects.

How we are to vnderſtand our being ſubiect to ſicknes

Now, in the poſition formerly alleadged, ſaying, Subiect to diſeaſes; we vnderſtand a particular ſubiection & aptitude. For all men in the world are ſubiect to all kinds of ſickneſſe, euen as we are all ſubiect to death. But we ſay, ſome are ſubiect thereto particularly, that haue an inclination and diſpoſition to ſome euil, the rudiment wherof is in them: not that they are already ſicke, but becauſe a ſmall matter will throw them into ſickneſſe; and therefore, they ought the more reſpectiuely, to carry themſelues. By example of him formerly ſpoken of, who being the only ſick man in his time: made ſhift yet to liue an hundred yeares, by great cunning, and exquiſite manner of life.

CHAP. XX.

That ſuch as know ſome little matter in Phyſicke, are more dangerous to be neere ſicke perſonnes, then they that know nothing at all.

In the 13. chapt. before.

I Muſt confeſſe, that this error ought to haue followed a former Chapter, where we declared, that there were more Phyſitions, then of anie other profeſſion. But fearing to offend any ſuccorable people, I had a long conflict with mine owne cogitations, whether I ſhould taxe and reproue them in ſuch publique manner. At length, I concluded to holde on my courſe; knowing, that ther is more danger (then we wold eaſily think) in ſuch as know ſomething, and imagine to know all things. For out of this ouer-weening, either they preſume, and vndertake the very greateſt cures; or withſtand and hinder Phyſitions, from beeing imployed in principall remedies, neceſſarily requiring quick and ſure healing. But theſe inſolent controllers, keep them ſo engaged to feat; that they neither dare, nor vvill aduenture.

The leſt skill or knowledge in ſome ſmall matter, preſentlyinciteth to preſumption.

There are ſome perſons, who know not any thing in Phiſick, in regard of diſcourſe and reaſon; as ignorant women, who can neither write nor reade; but onelie haue certaine obſeruations and rules, knowing how to make a good Broth, a Cullice, a Reſtoratiue, to make a bed well, and knit a kerchiefe about the ſick mans head. Beſide, they know ſome infant remedies, againſt itch, ſcabs, burnings, falling of the Vuula, wormes, the Mother, &c. Hereupon, they imagine themſelues compleat in knowledge, and make many things out of their owne braine and fantaſie; and if their experiment ſucceede ill, they ſpare not to vaunt, that the Phyſitions great Gowne ſhall couer all this.

Of ignorant women Phyſitions, that can neither reade nor write, yet haue knowledge in ſome petty cures.

It were very good and expedient, that aſſiſtants about ſicke patients, did knowe nothing elſe, but to obey the Phyſitions directions. It were a knowledge very beneficiall to the patient; for, ſuch as do not preſume of theſelues, will neuer attempt to execute any thing, but what is preſcribed, ordained, and commanded. Others, that dreame they haue knowledge; they will adde, diminiſh, alter, or elſe do iuſt nothing at all. Like to lewd Apothecaries, who execute the Phyſitions directions at their owne pleaſure, as preſuming to know the curing of the diſeaſe, and the nature better in courſe, then he doth: being drunke with ſome opinion concerning the like; as hauing obſerued diuers the like ſickneſſes, attended many Phyſitions, and ſeene the ſucceſſe of the like receipts.

There ſhould be no preſumers about ſicke perſons, when they lye vppon their ſicke beddes.

O dangerous ouer-weening! ſee here the verie ruine of moſt ſicke perſonnes. It were much better (before God I ſpeak it) not to know any thing, then to know thus in this Empericke manner. What more vnhappineſſe for the patients life, and honour to the Phyſition, then to haue an Apothecarie ſo ouerweening, temerarious, and preſumptuous? In Italy, and in Spain, the Better to know nothing at all, then to haue knowledge in dangerous manner.

the ſicke are in much better manner ſerued. For, the Apothecary goeth not to ſee the ſicke man, except it be in courteſie and friendſhip; and yet not as an Apothecary neither: nor do the Phyſitions vnder write their bils of receipts, by or for whō the remedies were compounded. Whereby, the Apothecarie knowes as litle of the Phyſitions intent, euen as if hee were acquainted with nothing. By this meanes, hee cannot abuſe the Phyſitions directions; or, much leſſe then our Apothecaries, to whom all is imparted ouer familiarly.

A great inuectiue againſt ouer preſuming Apothecaries.

Next to Apothecaries, I ſpeak of thoſe vile and bad (not good, prouident, modeſt, and honeſt people, that meddle not, but what they haue to doe withall) yea, moſt dangerous keepers or ſeruants, attending about poore weak patients, who thinke they haue more knowledge then the Phyſition (eſpecially, if they be anciently traded in the buſineſſe) touching nouriſhing principally; beecauſe it ought to be of ineſtimable importance, qualitie, fit houres, and meaſure. True it is, of the quality they credite enough by the Phyſitions order; but for the houre and meaſure, they do all at their owne liking. I ſpare the drugeries they couertly vſe, and the omiſſions of Ordinances appointed to them, when they meete with patients fitte for their purpoſe. Such people are moſt daungerous, and much better to haue them that know no ſuch cunning, neither haue learned any other leſſon; but to doe what they are apointed, which is the main article of their duty.

For Nurſſes, keepers, and attenders about patients, pretending to haue no mean knowledge.

CHAP. XXI.

The manner of knowing Opportunity truely, for vnderſtanding or performing ſuch actions, as we would haue to be well done: And how our graue Elders vſed to depict or figure Occaſion.

Opportunity is the greateſt matter, belonging to the life of man.

THere conſiſteth no meane wit and iudgement, in knowing howe to make vſe of Opportunity; & to perform our actions in due time: beecauſe great care is to be had, either for doing, or not doing a thing at a time; in regarde there is no alteration or returning backe, when defect falleth vppon the aduenture. Heereupon, the Grecian Philophers lefte vs many notable ſentences in writing, making to that purpoſe: in regard that they truely vnderſtoode, what wiſedome depended vppon knowledge, for doing a buſineſſe in apt opportunitie, and taking occaſion when it is fairely offered.

Salomon ſaith in his Eccleſiaſtes: To all things there is an appointed time. There is a time to be borne, and a time to dye: A time to plant, and a time to plucke vp that which is planted: A time to kill, and a time to heale: A time to builde, and a time to ruinate: A time for warre, and a time for peace. In breefe, many examples might bee alledged, whereby to demonſtrate, what loſſe relyeth on dooing any thing out of due time; and what benefite redoundeth vnto men, when things are accompliſhed aptly to time and place.

Ecc. 3, 1, 2, 3, 4 A diſcourſe made by Salomon concerning times.

Menander, a Greeke Poet ſaid; That all things done to purpoſe, & in time, haue great grace, for Opportunity hath more power then Law. So that a little attendance giuen on time, is eſteemed highly worth. Heſiodus, a Greeke Authour alſo, appointed vs to keepe meanes and obſeruation of times: For, the importance of all affayres (ſaith he) conſiſteth in attending on time and opportunity. Pindarus ſaid; Time hath great power in all things. Alſo (according to Horace,) A man ſhould alwaies ſet forward his affaits, when he ſeeth due time. Socrates, writing to Democritus, ſaid; All things are naught, being done out of due ſeaſon. In breefe, there is no man of iudgement or experience, but will purſue his buſines in fitteſt times.

The wiſe ſaying of Menander.

Heſiodus.

Democritus.

All which notwithſtanding, it is to be noted, that as it is good to waite on Opportunity, and apteſt times to perfourme any thing; ſo likewiſe, the point or inſtant is not to bee ſlipt, for exact executing any matter when it commeth. This is that which hath commonly beene ſayde, Occaſion is neuer to be miſprized. For, all things ỳ are done out of their conſtellation, & conſent of the ſtars (although occaſion commeth otherwiſe) can neuer grow to good perfection.

Opportunitie muſt by no meanes be let ſlip, but taken while it may be.

And to ſpeake ſeriouſly, occaſion and opportunity for our actions, was in ſuch high esteeme with our Ancients, as well Greeks as Latines; that they had alwaies her portraiture, like as a Mirrour before their eies. The Latines figured Occasion in the form of a woman; but the Grecians figured her in the shape of an infant, holding one foot vpon a turning wheele, and all before the face couered with Hayre, dangling downe in long tresses; but al the head behind was bald and shauen. This shape was giuen to occasion or Opportunity, by Posidius, or Posidippus as some called him, a Greek Poet, translated into Latine by the learned Erasmus, and Ausonius the Lombards Poet. Whom Sir Tho: More of England, a man much renowned for wisdome and learning, traduced into the Castillian tongue, in forme of a dialogue. For More said, that Occasion, standing so vpon a wheele, declared thereby her instability; and hauing wings both at her handes and feet, shewed, how lightly shee past away, without tarrying. Moreouer, said he, her forhead and face being couerd with hairy long locks, expressed; that she might easily be held, by such to whom she presented her selfe; but being vnwilling to be known to others, shee kept her face so couered, because she would escape away vnknown: being also bald and shauen behinde, for feare she should be stayed, after shee was once past. Whereby may be comprehended, that Opportunity once lost, is not to bee recouered, by all our paines applyed afterward.

Occasion or Opportunity, moralized in Figure.

Occasion familiarly described by Syr Thom. More, Englishman.

Ausonius making a further addition to this picture, placed the figure of Repentance, sitting vpon the shoulders of Occasion: declaring thereby, that whatsoeuer happeneth by the losse of Occasion, may well be repented. And truly there are two kinds of people, who might make good vse of this example. For, some are so sodaine in their affaires, that they can neuer bring them about, by not tarrying for opportune time. And others (on the contrary) are so long and tedious in concluding their businesse, beeing troubled with so many inconueniences, which may happen; that in the time of this lingering negotiating, Occasion hath past by the. Both which extremities are to bee auoyded by men of good iudgement, who, in waiting the time for best performing their busines suffer no occasions (in the meane while) of faire offer, to ouer-slip them. For other wise, they may fall into a tardy repentãce, which will be little to their credite and benefite.

Repentance figured sitting on the shoulders of Occasion.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Fauour, Grace, or Good opinion: How it hath bene described by picture, and also concerning the Morall signification.

THe precedent discourse, cõcerning the portraiture of Opportunity, or Occasion, hath brought that to my remembrance, which the ancient Romanes gaue and granted to Fauor, Grace, or good Opinion: as well for the great cõueniency which these two things hold together, as also becausse the tru time and very occasion of wel-doing any thing is, when Fauour standeth faireſt for him; as much to say, as when the Prince lendeth an attentiue eare, and vouchsafeth (withall) a gracious countenance: For, a man that is in credite with a Prince, is very much made of by all men, euerie one thinkes well of what he doth, or saith; becausse all things succeede to his good and honor: for all are full of fauour towardes him, either with an honest heart, or else in outward ceremony.

The excelent correspondencie betweene Opportunity and Fauour.

The fauour of Princes are no meane blessings to such as haue them

Little need is there to produce Histories or examples to this effect, considering that (at all times) it hath bin in practise, & euery yeare is a breuiate therof; wherfore it shal suffice me only to represent the true figure of Fauor, according to the draught of our graue Elders, which may som way conforme it selfe with that of Occasion. For, in their truest picturing Fauour, they figured a yong infant blind, being alone, & without any company. Bartholomeus Dardanus, moralizing vpon this picture (introduceth himselfe) speaking to the Painter Apelles, by way of dialogue, in this maner.

The true picture of Fauor, according as it was drawne by Apelles.

O Apelles! Perceyuing the great paines that thou hast taken, to portraite truely the Image of Fauour: I pray thee tell mee, of what race shee is descended? Whereunto Apelles sodainly replying, sayde; Her Race is knowne, but to verie few people. And indeede, the Originall of Fauour is hardly to to be found. For ſome ſay, that fauour commeth by corporall beauty: Others hold, that ſhe commeth by aduenture, or good hap. Yet ſome will haue her to be the daughter of Fortune, or of accident. And yet neuertheleſſe, many are of the minde; that ſhee yſſueth from true Nobleneſſe of the minde. As is eaſilie diſcerned, by this ſhort Dialogue following, where a Poet, ſpeaking to Apelles, beginneth thus.

A diſcourſiue Dialogue (according to Morall ſence) betweene a Poet and Apelles, concerning the true Image of Fauour.

Poet. WHat is that Woman, ſtanding on yonder ſide, who is neuer forſaken, but ſtill hath ſtore of company?

Apelles. Her name is Flattery.

Poet. And what is ſhee that attendeth, or followeth after her?

Apelles. Her Name is commonly called Enuie.

Poet. What people are they that ſo round engirt her?

Apelles. They are ſuch as continually keep company with Fauour, and are eſpecially obedient to her: As namely, Riches and Pleaſures, the ſourſe and originall of all vices.

Poet. Why haſt thou (in figure) giuen wings to Fauour?

Apelles. Becauſe ſhe cannot ſtep a foote abroad, but ſhe mounts aloft, when the wind of good Fortune raiſeth her.

Poet. And wherefore haſt thou painted her blinde?

Apelles. Becauſe ſuch as are in credite, will no more take knowledge of their ancient Friends.

Poet. And why haſt thou placed hir feet vpon a wheele?

Apelles. Becauſe ſhe followeth the ſteppes of Fortune, being euermore as inconſtant as Shee.

Poet. But why doſt thou make her puffe and ſwell ſo proudly?

Apelles. Becauſe proſperity blindeth the vnderſtanding of all men.

This Dialogue, reported in the Language belonging to it, would haue much more grace, then any tongue elſe can beſtow vpon it. Neuertheleſſe, the moſt gracious Fauourites may heereby take aduice, to know, what companions attend vpon Fauour, and the inſtabilitie both of them and her. To the end, they may the better gouerne themſelues with modeſtie in their credit, without puffing or ſwelling vp into pride. For, ouer and beſide, that God is greatly there-with offended, there are many other dangers elſe, by the obſeruation of paſſed times: as true teſtimonie hath beene made, by the vnhappy and lamentable end of many Princes Fauourites, that knew not howe to vſe their credit ſo wiſely, as they ſhould haue done.

The greateſt Fauourites of Princes haue bene ſubiect to many misfortunes

CHAP. XXIII.

Of thoſe ſeuen Wiſe men of Greece, commonly called the ſeuen Sages: With many notable Sentences which they left behinde them in writing.

AMong the ancient Græcians, ſuch were called Sages, or Wiſe men, as now we vſe to terme Philoſophers. But Socrates, accounting the title of Sage or wiſe to be ouer-arrogant (becauſe it was onely proper and peculiar to God, to bee abſolutely called Sage or Wiſe) inuented the name of Philoſopher, as much to ſay, as a louer of wiſedome; and being ſomewhat better qualified, and more moderate then the name of Sage or Wiſe; ſo that al wiſe men, which were ſince the time of Socrates, were well contented with the Title of Philoſophers. Notwithſtanding, there were ſeuen ſeuerall men, vnto whom the name of Sages or Wiſe-men, were attributed, by common conſent of all Greece, in regarde of their Knowledge and Vertue.

Socrates firſt inuented the name of Philoſopher, as thinking the title of Sage or Wiſe, to be ouer-arrogant.

And indeede, many Authors (as well Ancient as Moderne) do make mention of them, and of notable ſentences leſte by them for memory: whereof (I purpoſe) to ſet downe heere a breefe ſummarie, that vnderſtanding Readers (yet ignorant in the originall Language) may the better be acquainted with their wittie ſayings.

The Authors intention, concerning this Chapter.

Set-

Setting aside then that vaine and fooliſh Booke of the Seauen Sages, which hath runne thorow too many Countries, with many opinions divulged, concerning their liues (which yet were diſcredited, and rent in peeces by Diogenes Laertius) I will ſhape my courſe, according vnto that which hath beene auouched by Saint Auguſtine, Eraſmus, Philip Melanchthon, Beroaldus, Raphaell Volateranus, and many other Authors of great fame. The names of thoſe ſeauen men, were Solon, Chilo, Cleobulus, Thales, Bias, Pittacus, and Periander, and they are all liuing together at one time: although ſome of them were more aged then the other, and (happily) liued longer then the reſt did. For, all of them were in perfect beeing, during the reigne of Cyrus King of Perſia, at ſuch time as the Iewes remayned captiues in Babylon: which was about the ſpace of fiue hundred and fiftie yeares, before the comming of our Lord and Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, as Euſebius ſaith.

We purpoſe to ſpeake of them particularly, and likewiſe of ſome of their principall Sentences, which they left reſpectiuely for vs: albeit memory hath embrared infinite common ſayings of theirs, as ordinarily all Authors haue concluded in their writings. Auſonius, a famous Poet of Lombardie, verie elegantly reduced into verſe, many notable Sentences of thoſe Sages, whereof he maketh very ample relation, in three ſeuerall Bookes publiſhed by him.

Anſonius the Lombard Poet.

FIrſt then, we will begin with wiſe Bias, who was borne in Priene, a Sea-coaſt towne of Ionia, a Region in Greece, hauing a very poore man to his father, named Totamus. This Bias was a great Oratour, a good Aduocate, and well ſeene in all the Sciences; beeing otherwiſe endued with many vertues. Among which, he held in higheſt eſtimation, to contemn the riches and honors of the world. Cicero, ſpeaking of him, ſaith, that when the enimy deſtroid the towne where he dwelt, and euery man labored to ſaue and carry away the beſt of his goods: Bias would not ſaue any thing belonging to him. And being demanded, why he was ſo reſpectleſſe of his goodes: he anſwered; All my goods I carry with mee: meaning his wiſedome, which (indeed) is the greateſt wealth of all.

Bias one of the Sages, and where he was borne.

Cicero in Orat. pro Cluent.

Omnia mea mecum porto.

Aboue all things, this man ſought ſtill to maintaine loue and amity, & therefore he was held the chiefeſt in the Commonwealth: he would ſay, he had much rather be a iudge between two of his frinds, then between two of his enemies: for in condéning a friend, he ſhould looſe his frendſhip; but in iudging betwixt two enemies, hee for whome the ſentence was giuen, would become a friend.

Of Friends and Enemies.

A lewd man once demanded of him, what was to be pittied in religion; wherto Bias anſwered not a word: the man growing angry, mooued the ſame queſtion againe; and Bias replyed; Why doſt thou aske ſuch a caſe of me, as concerns not thee at all?

Irreligious fooles ſhould alwayes be ſo anſwered.

He vſed oft-times to ſay, that the greater part of men, were the worſt men; and Auſonius took great paines in confirming this ſaying. But it is ſo manifeſt and true, that it needs no other confirmation, then what is auouched in the Goſpell, where it is ſaid: Many are called, but few are choſen. Cicero alſo maintaines it to be true, affirming the race of the wicked to be great. Plato alſo ſaide to the ſame purpoſe, That good men were gone, and growne to nothing: but contrariwiſe, the vices of the wicked encreaſed daily, euen as if they were watered hearbs.

Auſonius in lib 1. cap. 5.

Cicero in Tuſ. cul. cap. 3.

Plato in Trimo.

There are ſome Authors, who alledge many other ſentences of Bias, very ſingular, and neceſſary; as, Attribute to God all the good thou doeſt: Neuer be enuious at the rich. Hee may well be called a good man, that hath no remorſe of conſcience. The greateſt danger that happens to a man, commeth from man: The very richeſt gift in a woman, is to be vertuous and honeſt.

Many worthy ſayings attributed to Bias.

Ariſtotle attributeth this to Bias. Degrees of honor and offices, do moſt manifeſt what a man is: for, many appeare to be honeſt men (as indeede their actions ſhew no leſſe) beeing priuate perſons: but hauing power to command, doe manifeſtly declare the malignitie of their hearts: He addeth alſo. That a man ſhould ſo carry himſelfe to his friend, as if (another day) he ſhould become his enemy: and ſo to deale with an enemy, as hoping (one day) he may be his friend. Yet Ariſtotle himſelfe reproued this ſaying, in his Rhethoricke. Notwithſtanding, in due conſideration of managing friendſhippe in theſe dayes, wee ſhall finde this Sentence to be moſt true.

There are many other sayings, well deseruing memorie, which are attributed to this Philosopher, & would aske too much time heere to insert: and therefore I will leaue them, hauing first informed the Reader, that after the death of Bias, his funerall was sollemnely performed, at the cost and charge of the Common-wealth, in signe of his perpetuall honour.

Bias buried at the Common welths charge

THe second Sage or wiseman of Greece was Solon, although some ranke him in the prime place. Plutarke, and many other haue written at large of his life, saying; That hee was borne in Salamina, an Iland in subiection to the Athenians, issued of an auncient and most Noble house; his fathers name being called Aecrestides. The Athenians made such pretious esteem of Solon, aswell in regarde of his wisedom, and the victories which he had obtayned against them of Mytilene, with sundry other enterprises, which hee had finished very dexteriously; that they limited themselues to his ordinances, which were great (as Plutarke affirmeth) recording many of them by particular mention.

Solon, the second Sage or wise Man of Greece.

Solon highly esteemed among the Athenians.

Plut. in vit. Solõ

Especially he moderated the Lawes of Draco, which were very rigorous, so that for the very least facte committed in Athens, life depended thereupon. For, Demas the Oratour sayd, That the Lawes appoynted by Draco, were written downe with the blood of men. Solon therefore corrected them, and confirmed in Athens, the Councell of the Areopagites, according as Aristotle and Plutarke do plainly maintayne.

Draces lawes registred in blood.

Hee had a concurrent or corriuall in Athens, a kinseman of his owne, named Pisistratus; so that, the more Solon labored the libertie of his Countrey, so much the more did hee study and endeauour to oppresse it. Nenertheless, in conclusion, the eloquence of Pisistratus had more power, then all the approoued goodnesse in Solon, whereby hee possessed himselfe of the Seigneury and Rule of Athens; which Solon might haue done (much more easily then hee) if he would haue vsed but his owne meanes. For, when the men of Athens offered him the soueraignetie of their Citty, hee made them answer thus: The house of tyrannie is very pleasing, but it must haue a winding stayres to mount it: And therefore, I will neyther be a tyrant, nor subiect to a tyrant.

Pisistratus, an opposite against Solon.

Solons refusal of gouerning Athens, & his wise reason.

Heereuppon, after that Pisistratus had gotten full possession of Athens, Solon departed thence, and trauelled Countries for the space of tenne yeares, as well in Egypt as in other places. Till at the length, hee came to the Court of Crœsus, the rich and powerfull King of Lydia, who hauing shewed him his aboundant treasures, demaunded of him, if euer hee had seene more Royall possessions? Whereto Solon (like a Philosopher and Free-man) replyed: That he had seene the possessions of diuers Fowles, Cockes, Capons, and such like, which seemed goodlier to him, because they were naturall to them. Againe hee demaunded of him; If euer hee had seene any man more rich, or so happie as hee was? Solon answered him (without flattery) that hee had seene a man in his owne Countrey, named Tellus, who (in his opinion) was more happie then Crœsus; for hee was an honest and vertuous man, and had seene his children, and the children of his children so well aduaunced, that hee receyued seruice from them in his age. Nay more, being growne into the extreamitie of yeares; he dyed in the defence of his Countrey, and repelling the enemy.

Solon left Athens & trauailed Countries.

His comming to rich Crœsus, King of Lydia, and his conference with him, about his riches and happinesse.

The King being much displeased at the answer of Solon, sayd vnto him: Why dost not thou attribute to me some degree of happinesse? Whereunto Solon replying, shewed him the great trauerses and mutations, which may ensue vnto such as are constituted in great Estates: and they being subiect to such alterations, he could not tearme them truely happie, alledging a common Prouerbe, vsed among the Athenians: That the end of life must first bee seene, before any iudgement of happines passe thereon.

Croesus wold haue some degree of happnesse granted to him.

A witty Athenian prouerb.

O most notable saying, though to Aristotle, it seemed not receiuable: for, while a man continueth in life, hee is alwayes vncertayne of his estate and condition, as also of his fame and reputation: as it was well approued by the Wise man, who said, Commend no man before his death. And our blessed Lord also, would haue his Apostles and Disciples to make stay in no place, or to salute any bodie by the way: which some expounded according to the saying of Solon, who affirmed, that man (in his life time) could not assure him

No man can be happy before his death

Eccles. 12, 14

Math. 28, 19.

selfe

The ſayings of Solon approued by many good authors. Plin. in lib. 14. cap. 10. Ouid. in Metamorp. lib. 3.

ſelfe from falling into many inuitable inconueniences. Pliny alſo conforming him ſelfe to Solon, ſayd; One day iudgeth another, and the laſt day iudgeth all. Ouid maketh the like affirmation, ſaying: Whoſoeuer conſidereth the laſt day of man, which is vncertaine; it is not poſſible for him to ſay, that he can be any way truly happy.

But returne we againe to King Cræſus, who, notwithſtanding the wiſe anſwere Solon had made him, he regarded him not, neither what great benefit might after befall him, by enioying the companie of a man ſo worthy, as neuer reſpecting future occaſions to follow. Whereuppon Solon departed from his Court, with very vnkinde entertainement: but afterward, ſuch an aduenture happed, as made him dearely acknowledge his errour, and well to remember the words of Solon. For, Great King Cyrus waging new warre againſt him; and hauing vanquiſhed and taken him priſoner, gaue Sentence, that hee ſhould be burned aliue. Hee being vpon the pile of wood, and fire making readie to conſume him: cryed ſodainely out aloude, O Solon, Solon, Solon, remembring now in this extreamitie, that his ſaying was true, and that no man could be happy while he liued! Cræſus commanding the Officers to ſtay, and to keepe the fire from the pile: would needes vnderſtand of him, wherefore he vſed that inuocation vppon Solon, or expected thereby for deliuerance from death? Cræſus reported the whole Hiſtory to him, what Solon had ſayd, concerning his imaginarie happineſſe; the truth whereof he had now too apparantly proued. Cyrus being much amazed thereat, and entring into mature conſideration, of the ſtrange and vnauoidable mutabilities of Fortune; deliuered King Cræſus from death & captiuity, doing him ſo great honor, that he made him his aſſociate in his kingdomes. Whereby we may perceiue, that this wiſe and worthy ſaying of Solon, was the meanes of ſeeing one mighty King from death, and made an other alſo much wiſer then hee was before.

Solon departed from king Creſus, as a man vnregarded.

Creſus found Solons words true, to the no mean hazard of his life.

Cyrus giueth life to Creſus, and made him Competitor in his Kingdomes.

Solon, hauing attained vnto the age of foure ſcore yeares, dyed at Rhodes, ordayning by his teſtament (as Ariſtotle ſayth) that his body ſhould bee burned, and his aſhes ſcattered in the Iſle of Salamina: becauſe they ſhould not be caried to Athens, for conſtrayning them (by that meanes) to keepe his ordinances. Becauſe, before he departed from Athens, he made the Athenians to take an oathe, that they ſhould keepe his Lawes inuiolably, vntill he was returned from his voyage. And indeede, according vnto Ariſtotle, the Commonwealth of the Athenians maintained them ſelues very proſperouſly, ſo long as they kept the Lawes of Solon.

Ariſt. in polit. lib. 3. cap. 13. The death of Solon in the Iſle of Rhodes.

Now, as concerning the ſentences and ſayings of Solon; for the moſt part, they were conformable to Chriſtian Religion, and all Ciuilitie. As, Honour God: Be helpfull to thy neighbour: Maintaine the vertue of thy friend: Obey the Lawes: Bridle thine anger: Honor thy father and mother: Sweare not: Keepe thy ſelfe from Enuy: Be not too light in confirming a friend, but learne to keep him when thou haſt him. Marrie with thine equall: Reproue thy friend in ſecret, but publikely thou mayeſt commend him: Shunne the company of wicked people: Praiſe and follow vertue. Hee ſayd moreouer, That Lawes were like to Spyders webs, wherein poore litle Flies were ſoone entangled, but ſuch as were great and ſtrong, could eaſily breake thorow. Such, and the like notable Sentences, are found among his Lawes and Ordinances: And ſo much for Solon.

Solons ſaying conformable to Chriſtian Religion and Ciuility.

Chilo, the third Sage or wiſe man of Greece.

Chilo called Ariſtagoras, for his ſuccinct diſcourſing.

Plin. in lib. 16. c. 3.

Chilo, ſon of Amaratus, was alſo numbered amongeſt the ſeauen Sages of Greece. He was of Lacedemon, a citty highly renowned in Greece, where he was elected in the Councell of the Ephori, in regard of his great wiſedome & knowledge: this was an Eſtate among the Lacedemonians, as the Conſeruatours and Tribunes were among the Romains. Chilo was very ſummary and ſuccinct in his Diſcourſe, as (ordinarily) all the Lacedemonians were: and hee was likewiſe called Ariſtagoras, in regard of that qualitie. When any one compiled an Oration, in few and witty words, they vſed to ſay; That he had written a Chilonicall Oration. He liued ſo long (as Pliny and ſome others ſay) euen till nature fayled in him. Neuertheleſſe, he dyed with a conceit of ioy, ſeeing one of his ſonnes, to winne the prizes of Honour in the Olympian games, and after his death; the Lacedemonians performed his funerall with great ſolemnitie.

The ſingular wiſedome of this man, appeared ſufficiently, by the notable Sentences

Chilo enstructed all men to know thé-selues.

tences which he had written; but especially in this, that he exhorted euery man to know himselfe. Which being heedfully obserued, men would not bee so vaine, nor so proude and inordinate, as vsually they are: beeause all vices and disorders do proceed from selfe-conceite, and no man truely knowing himselfe. Heereupon the Christian Church tooke an order, that euery yeare (in the begining of Lent) all men should bee admonished to remēber, that from dust they came, and to dust they should returne againe.

Plat.in lib.de legib.3.cap.9.

Plato recordeth, that this saying of Chilo, Know thy selfe, was written in letters of golde, vpon the portall of Apolloes Tēple. Iuuenall saith, That this saying came frō Heauen. Macrobius, in his Tract of Scipioes Dreame, saith; That the Oracle of Apollo being demanded the meanes, what course should be taken, for attaining to felicity, answered: Onely teach a man to know himselfe. Demonicus, being asked, at what time he began to be a Philosopher, answered; When I began to know my selfe. O most necessary rule; for if a man would consider himselfe well, and study but to vnderstand his condition, estate and vacations, and frame his life accordingly thereto: hee could neuer bee so changed, to attempt such things, as he neyther should or ought to do, neyther would there bee so much disorder in the world, as now there is.

Iuuenall.

Things fit and necessary for all men to know and vnderstand.

Witty and graue sentences written & vsed by Chilo

Chilo also had an accustomed kinde of Prouerbiall speeches, to wit: Remember thou must dye, and therefore prouide for thine owne saluation. Honour olde men. Be no murmurer. Speake no euill of an offendour. Chuse rather losse, then dishoneſt gaine. In violence and constraint bee milde and humble. Labour rather to be loued, then feared. Try Gold by the touch; for, a golden-tongued mā, who speaketh all that comes into his mouth, men may often heare from him, such things as they would not.

Questions moued to Chilo, and his discreete answeres.

Chilo being asked by one, named Æsope, what God had done, answered; Hee exalted humble men, and suppressed proud ignorant Fooles. Being demanded also, what was the hardest thing in the world to bee done, replyed: To vse and imploy a mans time well, and to pardon iniuries and outrages receiued. In briefe, he would vsually say, that he would so dispose the course of his life: That the greatest persons should not despise, nor the meaneſt feare him. Finally, Chilo both wrote and spake many notable things in his time, which would require ouermuch leysure to report: And therefore, we wil take our leaue of him, making way to entertaine our 4. man of Greece.

Cleobulus, the fourth wise man of Greece, a mā of learning and excellent composure of body.

Cleobulus, who was also one of the seauen Sages, was borne in Lindos, a City in the Isle of Rhodes; or as some others say, in Caria, a Towne of Aeolia, a Region in Greece; and his Fathers name was Euagoras. This Cleobulus, beside his being a very singular wise man, was also of very goodly bodily feature, and wonderfully actiue of his person: so that eyther, or both these happy blessings togither, made him admired, and esteemed generally. The loue of learning preuailed in such sort with him, that he forsooke his Country, Parents and Friends; trauailing into Egipt, where (in those times) were many goodly and famous Vniuersities.

Cleobolina, daughter to Cleobulus, a woman of rare ingenuitie.

Her witty Enigma.

He had a Daughter named Cleobolina, that could inuent and write in prose, beyond ordinary compasse of men or women, and very skilfull shee was beside, in propounding questions of difficult resolution; as this one for an example. A Father had twelue children, and each childe had thirty sonnes, all white by nature, and thirty daughters, all of them naturally blacke: all which were immortall, and yet (notwithstanding) were discerned to dye daily. By which Enigma, shee vnderstood the yeare, that hath twelue Moneths, and euery Moneth thirty dayes and thirty nights.

Cleobulus his commendation of Mediocriry.

But come we againe to Cleobulus, who after his returne out of Egipt, deserued so highly by his learning and iudgement, as to be ranked among the seauen Sages of Greece. And many of his learned sayings and sentences, were held as rules and directions for mens liues. Among other, he vsed most of all to say; That Mediocrity was without compare. And assuredly, these words greatly confirmed the saying of Chilo, who wold haue euery man to know himselfe: For if we knew our selues well, and as we ought to do, a meane then in all things would easily gouerne vs. By this sentence then of Cleobulus, making such precious account of Mediocrity; we may well conclude, that all extremities are vicious. As much to say, when there is too much, or too little: whereupon our ancient Philosophers vsed to say; Beware of Omne quod est nimis vertitur in vitium.

too much, declaring thereby, that all excesse is vile.

Aristotle attributeth this sentence to wise Bias, and some other to Solon, but be it howsoeuer: Vertue alwayes consisteth in mediocrity: According to the saying of Aristotle: Vertu tormenteth it selfe by too much, or too little: For vertue is nothing else but a mean or mediocritie, consisting betweene two extreamities. Horace appointed in his Discourses, that a meane should be obserued in all things. For (saith he) all that goeth before it, or contendeth to come after it, keeping neither meane nor measure, can neuer be said to be well accõplished.

Arist. in Polit. lib. 3. cap. 7.

Horace in lib. 1. cap. 6.

An infinite number of examples may be alleadged to this purpose, especially concerning the foure principall vertues, which are commonly called Cardinall. For, Fortitude is lodged betwixt Feare & Boldnes; & Liberality keeps the mid-way betwixt Couetousnes and Prodigality; as the like may be sayd of other vertues, and humane operations, which ought to gouerne themselues by time and necessity: yet with this charge neuertheless, to beware of ouer-much in any. This is a doctrine conformable to the saying of Hesiodus, oftentimes alledged by reuerend Erasmus, commanding all men to obserue a measure in their actions. As much maintaineth Plato, Terence, Plautus, and many other Authors both ancient and moderne, euery one of them auouching commonly, That happy men alwayes follow a meane in their trauells.

Approbation by the foure Cardiual Vertues, & their contraries or opposites.

Hesiodus. Erasmus. Terentius. Plato. Plautus.

And (in this case) the reason is peremptory, for all things are euen as nothing, they haue their beginning and their end, and so they passe away: Reason then fits them with an apte conclusion, that theyr perfection consists in the midst of the fiue Zones or Plages, which girdle round the whole wide Vniuerse; the two extremest are held to be inhabitable; and yet contrarywise, those in the middst are allowed to be most perfect. The Sunne which is held to be Prince of the Planets, is in the midst of the errant or wandring Stars. Among men, the place of honour is in the midst, & (indeed) it is hard to make any agreement, except ther be a third, to serue as the means. To conclude, the meane so much commended to vs in all things, concernes chiefly Christ, that hee would be caled the Mediator betwixt God & man.

Comparison of the fiue Zoanes.

The Sunne, Prince of the planets.

The onely cheefe meane aboue all other.

He vsed diuers other notable sentences beside, as, Beware of giuing thy friend occasion to reprooue thee: shunne the ambushes of thy enemy: Before thou goest out of thy house, remember what thou hast to do: and vpon returning home, consider what thou hast done: match not in marriage, but with thine equall, for if thou takest a wife of a better house then thine owne, thou makest thy selfe a slaue to her and her kinred: Pardon the errours of other men, and neuer be sparing of thine owne: The more liberty thou hast, so much the lesse vse make of it: Be not prowde in prosperity, nor faint-hearted in aduersity. Inure thy selfe to beare the trauerses of fortune patiently. Many other singular Sentences are attributed to Cleobulus, which Ausonius and Diogenes Laertius haue recorded in their works, affirming withall, that he dyed at the age of seauenty yeares.

Other sentences vsed by Cleobulus.

Ausonius in l. 3. Diog. Laert. in vit. Cleob.

NOw it remaineth to speake of Pittacus, of Mitylene, the capitall Citty in the Isle of Lesbos, and at this day called Mitylene, his fathers name being called Hyrradius. He was of such learning, wisedome and ingenuitie of spirit, that the Græcians placed him in ranke among the seauen Sages. The loue hee bare to his Countrey, moued him to make warre against the tyrant Meleager (who vsurped thereon) so that he enforced him to flight. In the war betwixt the Athenians and them of Mitylene, about a field then in controuersie; hee was Generall for the Mityleneans, and became Conquerour, and slew Frinenes Generall for the Athenians in the open field. Whereupon, the Athenians quitted vnto Pittacus, the contentious field which they quarrelled for, in regarde of the victorie which hee obtayned against them: and gaue him the gouernment of their Common-wealth, which he ruled worthily the space of ten years, ordayning many good Lawes and Constitutions for the benefit thereof. Which hauing done, he willingly gaue ouer his gouernement, as it was freely put vpon him: and liued vntill hee was seuenty yeares olde, beloued and honoured generally.

Pittacus, the 5. of the Grecian Sages.

He made war on the tyrant Meleager, & was Generall against the Athenians.

Pittacus made Gouernor of the athenians.

His sayings and Sentences are no lesse considerable, then those of the other Sages, neyther the maner of his life. For, first of all, he made so smal account of the dignity, gold and riches of Cræsus, King of Lydia, that hee would not receiue any of him:

The slender esteeme hee made of king Crocsus, and all his pompe.

him: but sent him word, that he had no need of his gold or siluer, because he had already a great deale more, then willingly he would haue. Giuing thereby to vnderstand, that hee was sorry for his Brothers succession, which happened to him, because he affected his Brother, better then his owne welfare. He often saide, that things to come, were very difficult to vnderstand; and that there was nothing in the world more certain then the earth; and contrariwise, that there was not any certainty in the Sea.

The earth reputed to be certaine, but the sea most vncertaine.

A wise man (quoth he) ought to foresee disasters before they happen, the better to shun and keepe himselfe from them. Recouer that with patience, which force cannot command. He that knowes not how to holde his peace, knowes no fit time when he should speak. In time of prosperity get thee friends, & make proofe of them in aduersity. Neuer boast of what thou wilt doe, least thou bee scorned if thou canst not doit. Looke how thou art towards thy Father, such shall thy children bee to thee. So much for Pittacus.

Worthy sayings vsed by Pittacus.

THales, the sixt of the Sages of Greece, was a Natiue of Miletum, a Citty much renowned in Greece; and for the many vertues abiding in him, deserued well, that the cheefe place among the Sages, should be assigned to him. For, in the first place, he was Soueraigne in Geometry, and the first man that discouered the principall secrets of Astrology: as the course of the Sun, the reason of his Eclipses; and likewise of the Moone, and the Equinoctials. In briefe, he brought to light the course of the Planets, and many other secrets of naturall Philosophy. Moreouer, he was the cause, that the proud Title of Sages, remained to the seuen learned men of Greece, by this accident.

Thales, the sixt of the seuen Sages.

Thales the first discouerer of Astrologie.

Vpon a day, sundry young men, and friendly companions of Miletum, had bought a draught of certaine Fishermen, hauing cast foorth their Net into the sea, and these young men were to haue the benefit, of al to be drawne vp at that time. A most admirable case suddenly happened; for when the Net was drawne vp, they found therein a Table of Golde, beautified and enriched in most costly and sumptuous manner. They which bought the draught, pretended, that the table of gold belonged to them, by their bargaine. The Fishermen (on the contrary) auouched it to be no fish, & that they bought nothing of them, but onely all the fish which shold be taken: and therefore (in that respect) they had no right at all to the Table. A long and great contention grew between them; which to be the sooner ended, by full consent on eyther side, they sent to the Oracle of Apollo, for a finall resolution: where he, or the diuell speaking by him, made this answere; That the Table must be giuen to the only wise man of Greece. Which beeing thus vnderstood, the golden Table was sent to Thales, as being the wisest man in Greece. But he was so modest, that he sent it to another of the Sages before named (for they were al liuing at that time) and hee sent it to another, so that the Table of gold passed from hand to hand, vntill at last it came to Solon, who likewise would not enioy it, but sent it to the Temple of Apollo, at Delphos.

A Table of gold drawne vp out of the Sea in a Fishermans net.

The Oracle of Apollo must end the controuersie.

The Table of gold sent to Thales, as the onely wise man of Greece

Ausonius, Callimachus, and many other write, that through the courtesie vsed in the Sages one towards another, the Table returned againe to the hand of Thales, to whom at first it was presented; and that he sent it to the Delphian Oracle. But howsoeuer those Authors write diuersly, concerning this History; yet all doe agree together in this, that Thales was the first mã, to whom the golden Table was sent.

Variation among Authors, concerning this History.

Aristotle making mention of Thales, reciteth many conceited sayings proceeding from him, especially in his Bookes of Pollicies, and namely one, which he vsed ordinarily. That when he pleased, he could be rich. Whereof he made good and sufficient proofe; for foreseeing by Astrology, that there would be a good season for Oliues, and Oyle of Oliues (soone after) was likely to be deare; he laid out his money, to buy Oliue-Oyle while the season serued, which afterwards hee solde at what rate he pleased. Not because thereby hee would enrich himselfe; but to make a manifestation, that when he listed he could be rich, considering what knowledge he had, both for times of abundance, & likewise of dearth, when they would happen.

Arist. in 3. lib. Polit cap. 9.

Thales would be rich when he listed.

On a time it came to passe, that as he was gazing vpon the stars, he fell into a ditch; which an old woman seeing, & comming (vpon his outcry) to help him, in mocking maner said to him. Tel me Thales, how dareſt thou presume to foretell of things to come, by consideration of the Stars, and yet couldst not

Thales being fallen into a ditch, was reproued by an olde woman.

Diuers wiſe ſayings often vſed by Thales.

ſee what was vnder thine owne feet vpon the ground. And yet notwithſtanding, he was knowne to be an admirable wiſe man. He was wont to ſay; That ouer-great aſſurance and confidence, was euermore accompanyed with repentance. For many times, ſuch as truſt too much to others faithfull promiſes, are faine to pay the debts, from which no other caution could preuayle with them. He ſayd moreouer; That the true meanes of liuing vertuouſly, is, by not doing ſuch things, as we condemne in other men.

Being demanded, what was the eaſieſt thing in the world to doe; he anſwered; To know other mens faults, and none of our owne. He ſayd alſo; That few Tyrants liued to be old. Diogenes following the opinion of * Hermippus, ſayd; that Thales vſed to thanke God for three things (though this Sentence is fathered on Socrates:) Firſt, that he had made him a man, and not a beaſt. Secondly, that hee had made him a man, and not a woman. Thirdly, that hee was borne a Greeke, and not a Barbarian.

*A philoſopher & ſcholler to Philo Biblius, a Iew, borne in Alexandria.

Periander the laſt of the ſeuen Sages of Greece.

Now we come to ſpeake of Periander, the laſt of the Græcian Sages, of whom I haue no great matters to relate; becauſe (according to diuers authors) he was not in the rancke of the ſeauen Sages, and yet a man of ſingular wit and vnderſtanding. Periander was King of Corinth, and the ſon of King Cipſilas: the maner of his life being rather tyrannicall, as liuing like a Soldiour or Captaine, rather then a Philoſopher. And hence it enſued, that Heraclides, and many more beſide, eſteemed this Periander to be none of the ſeauen Sages of Greece: but another Periander, who was (indeed) a great Philoſopher; and a man highly renowned for vertue. Neuertheleſſe, the moſt voices gaue the title of Sage to Periander; for although hee reigned by power at Corinth: yet notwithſtanding, he was ſo diſcreet, valiant and of ſo abſolute vnderſtanding, that thereby he won the name of Sage among the Greeks.

Periander reputed not to be a philoſopher, but king of Corinth

His anſwere when he wold not leaue his Kingdome.

It was demaunded of him, why he did not depart from his tyranny & kingdom? becauſe (quoth he) I may fall into as great daunger, by willingly leauing my kingdome, which none other can diſpoſſeſſe me of by force. He vſed continually many notable Sentences, and had the word Conſideration very frequent in his talke, as declaring therby, that the principall thing wee ſhould haue care of, is, to conſider well what affaires we vndertake. The Poet Auſonius, expounding the word Conſideration, ſaith; A man ſhould thinke tenne times on any thing, before hee preſume to attempt it. For men (often-times) fall into great daungers, through much inconſideration: eſpecially, when they will not be gouerned by wiſedome or counſell, but raſhly follow the perſwaſions of Fortune.

Auſonius, cõcerning the word Conſideration.

Vertue (ſayd Periander) is immortall, but the pleaſures of this world are of ſmall continuance. In times of proſperity, be wiſe and modeſt, & in aduerſity patient and conſtant. Liue in ſuch ſort, that thou mayeſt haue honour by thy life, and that after thy death, men may account thee happy. Let ancient Lawes and Ordinances be rules for thy gouernement, inducing no nouelties into the Common-wealth. Profite ſhould alwayes be accompanyed with good grace and honeſtie. Performe that chearefully, which thou canſt not preuent but cowardly.

Wiſe & learned Sentences of Periander, left to eternall memory.

Compleate he was in theſe, and infinite other of the ſame nature, which breuity maketh me ſpare to ſpeake of.

CHAP. XXIIII.

¶ That Sight is the chiefeſt and principall Sence of all the reſt. And of many being blind, who neuertheleſſe were men of great honour and renowne.

Ariſtotle had great reaſon to ſay: Sight is the very principall of all the other corporeall ſences. For, it is ſeated as in the maine Cittadell, in the high & moſt eminent part of the body, whereby we may vnderſtand, that it partaketh greatly with fire: by vertue and power whereof, it is placed aboue all the other ſences. Touching hath a terreſtriall participatiõ, for the earth is moſt touchable and tractable; and of all the Elements, Taſting holdeth with Aquoſitie and humiditie: for, without humidity, a man cannot taſte any thing. As for Smelling, Ariſtotle attributeth it to fire, ſaying: Heate is the foundation of odour, and her end conſiſteth in vapour, ioyned to an Ayre groſſe, and full of exhalation. Concerning Hearing, Ariſt. in 1 lib. Animal cap. 5 The eminent ſeate of ſight.

The Elementary qualities of the bodily ſences.

Hearing, euerie one well knoweth, that it partaketh with ayre, which entering into the eares, by ſound, cauſeth hearing; but ſight participateth with fire.

Sight holdeth more of Fire, then al the other ſenſes.

And although that the Eye were compoſed of a moyſt and wateriſh bodie, yet notwithſtanding, without Fire, it wer not poſſible to haue ſight: whereby wee may perceiue, that Sight or Seeing houldeth more of fire, then all the other ſenſes doe beſide. And becauſe the eye (as Ariſtotle ſaith) doth more preſent the figures of things to a man, then all the other ſenſes: to it is granted, the beginniug of contemplation, and knowledge of all things. For from ſight proceedeth admiration, and the conſideration which a man hath by ſeeing, occaſioneth a deſire in him, of coming to vertue: So that (by good right) we may call the Eye, the Author and Inuenter of all Arts and Diſciplines.

Sight the beginner of contemplation.

The ſingulare benefit receyued by ſight.

In the prime place, by the Eye, a man conſidereth the admirable Architecture of the heauens, & of all the other bodies: by the Eye we diſcerne their colours and greatneſſe, their formes, number, proportion, and meaſure; their ſenſe, motion, & their reſting. And although Hearing had ſome concurrence in this caſe with Seeing, ſo that it might be tearmed a ſenſe of doctrine and of diſcipline, becauſe men learne vertue by hearing and vnderſtanding: yet (for all this) that title appertayneth principally to the ſight, as vnto her, that giueth the meanes to the vnderſtanding, to enquire by the plenitude of things which ſhe heareth, to come to the true knowledge of them; to the end, that this knowledge may afterward be communicated to other. Hereby then we may obſerue, that the firſt fourſe or ſpring of inſtruction, commeth from the Sight, who afterward maketh Hearing miſtris of the worke, by comprehending thoſe admirable things preſented firſt to the eies cenſure. Wherein alſo may be noted, that Hearing can comprehend nothing of it ſelfe, without vſing the means of another; but the Sight comprehendeth all thinges (as it were) euen of it ſelfe.

Hearing cannot attaine to the prerogatiue of Seeing but becometh thereby the better enſtructed.

Hearing comprehendeth nothing but by anothers helpe.

Moreouer, Seeing ſurpaſſeth all other ſenſes, in ſwiftneſſe and promptitude of her operations; for in an inſtant, and with no more then a caſt of the eye, ſhe perfecteth her deſſeignes: whereas the other ſenſes are long, & laborious in their worke. For, Touching muſt haue one thing or another, to execute her power and office vppon, before ſhee can expreſſe her prerogatiue. Taſting alſo muſt needs tarry, for ſome things anſwerable to hir pallate. And Smelling requireth ſuch a leyſure, in receiuing an ayre qualified, as may penetrate into her noſtrilles: As the like doth Hearing, to comprehend a voice entering into the eares. But Sight only worketh inſtantly, and preſently comprehendeth the images of things preſented to hir in an vnſpeakable and gracious manner. For, blowes may bee ſeene giuen a great way off, and although the ſound or noyſe of them bee not heard ſo ſoone; yet notwithſtanding, there is nothing that can conceale ſight of the ſtrokes, for they are ſodaine and apprehenſiue vnto the Eye. And therefore, Seeing ſurmounteth the other ſenſes, becauſe it extendeth it ſelfe ſo farre.

The swiftnes and celeritie of the Eye in her operatiõs in regarde of tardines in all the other ſenſes.

The Eye diſcerneth along way off from where the perſon is, ſo can none of the other ſenſes.

In this reſpect, by many Hiſtories and examples reported by Pliny, wee may eaſily gather, that Sight hath a farre larger extent, then all the other ſenſes, without any compariſon, or wearying her ſelfe tediouſly, as all the other do. For the Taſte tireth it ſelfe by too much feeding. The Eare is eaſily offended, by talkatiue babling. The Smell is trauailed extremely, by continuation of ſweete Odors. But Sight ſolie, hath no ſenſe of paine in her operations. Nor doth ſhe at any time ſo wearie her ſelfe, as to cloſe her lids retiredly; but rather, ſhe is neuer ſatiſfied with Seeing. In briefe, the excellency of Seeing is ſo great, that the name of Seeing is attributed to all the other ſenſes, in theyr ſeuerall operations. For, men ordinarily ſay, Beholde the excellencie of this ſweete Odour a little while; or the Delicacie of this Muſicke; or the rare taſte of this Fruite.

The name of Seeing attributed to the other ſenſes in their kinds

The name of Seeing, extendeth it ſelfe to the operations of the vnderſtanding; for it is an vſuall ſaying; Marke how my intention will come to paſſe. It is likewiſe ſayde in the Goſpell, that our Lord and Sauiour ſaw (that is to ſay, knew) the thoughts of the Scribes and Phariſees. And verily, among the miracles & workes which our bleſſed Sauiour did in thoſe vnworthy Countreyes; it is helde for the moſt eſpeciall and ſingular, that he gaue ſight to the blind. And therfore ther is no labor, wherein our Phyſitions more gladly ſtudy and take paines, then to preſerue and maintaine the ſight of men.

A Hiſtory of Fredericke King of Naples.

I reade of a holy man named Azarias, who being preſent in a conſultation, that diuers Phyſitions made before Fredericke King of Naples, concerning the maintaining of mens ſight. When it came to his turne to ſpeake, he ſaid; There is nothing better to comfort the ſight, then enuy: becauſe it will alwayes make the goodes of an other man ſeeme greater then they are. This agreeth with Ouids ſaying; Enuy euer thinks his neighbours Corne, more goodly then his owne. Notwithſtanding, according to the opinion (almoſt) of all men, Spectacles do greatly ſerue to defend the ſight: and ſurely, they were a very good inuention, though the firſt deuiſer neuer knew it.

Of the enuious man.

Spectacles helpe to preſerue the ſight.

A gluttonous Feeder.

I haue heard of a great Lord in Spaine, that would alwaies eate Cherries with his Spectacles on his noſe; onely to make them ſeeme the bigger and more nouriſhing: but yet this gourmandiſe was exorbitant. An other Gentleman, beeing quipt by K. Phillip, becauſe he fed ordinarily with Spectacles on his noſe; anſwered the king, Sir you count it not ſtrange, that I vſe my Spectacles in reading a Letter, in which can be no danger at all: why then do you blame me, becauſe I eat fiſh with Spectacles on my noſe, wherein are ſuch an infinite number of bones, as the very leaſt is able to ſtrangle me, & which I cānot ſee without my Spectacles? Spectacles then ſerue to very good purpoſe many times. But to our former purpoſe againe concerning Sight.

A Gentleman of Spaine alwayes vſed his Spectacles at his meales.

Although Sight is the chiefe guide of man; yet notwithſtanding, I haue read of diuers blind men, who were of no meane fame and reputation: Nature ſupplying their vnderſtanding, for whatſoeuer wanted in their ſight. Appius Claudius the great Orator, highly honored and eſteemed of Cicero and Titus Liuius, although hee was blind; was elected Cenſor at Rome, which office hee managed with ſo ſingular authority, as he only hindred the peace the whole Senate had concluded with King Pyrrhus. Cicero diſcourſeth amply, in the fifth Booke of his Tuſculans Queſtions, concerning the blindnes of Appius Claudius, and of remedies againſt diſeaſes in the eyes.

Diuers blinde men of great honour and excellency.

Blinde Appius Claudius, Cenſor of Rome.

Cicero in Tuſculan. lib. 5.

Caius Druſus, the moſt famous Lawyer and Aduocate, was blinde; and yet neuertheleſſe, his houſe was continually full of clients and ſuters, who rather affected to be guided by his darke wiſdome, then by their owne eye-ſight. Caius Auphidius, a great companion with Cicero in his youth, was Prætor of Rome; and yet left not to opine in the Senate, and all his friends receiued councell from him, in their very greateſt and weightieſt affairs. And notwithſtanding this blindnes, yet he digeſted a very notable Chronicle, of his own writing, whereof was made moſt high eſtimation. Diodorus a Stoicall philoſopher, was greatly renowned in his darkenes, and for all that imperfection, he could ſtudy in the night time, & play on his viole in the day; nay more, he taught Geometry publikely, a matter almoſt incredible, conſidering that it can not be practiſed but by the eie.

Caius Druſus a famous lawyer blinde, & yet wrote a worthy Chronicle.

Diodorus a Philoſopher who taught Geometry in his blindneſſe

Antipater of Cyrenaica, and Aſclepiades the Critike Poet, were both of the blind; and yet bearing their diſaſter with patient ſoules, they neuer gaue ouer ſtudying Philoſophy, but therein ſpent their time to the benifit of many. And when certain Ladies (grieuing at his hard fortune) ſate weeping by Aſclepiades, hee ſaid to them: Forbeare (noble Ladies) becauſe you know not what a pleaſure it is, to dwell in darknes: they then demanding of him, what profit he receiued by his blindnes, he replied; I haue a boy more now to keep me company then I had before. Homer, the Prince of Poets, was blind alſo, as his name imported; according to the ſaying of Cicero: neuertheleſſe, tis vnknowne when he loſt his ſight; but true it is (as Ouid ſaith) that this diſaſter hapned to him in his olde age.

Antipater Cyrenaicus, and Aſclepiades Criticus.

Homer being blinde, was called the Prince of Poets.

Didimus Alexandrinus, may likewiſe be ranked with them that haue gone before, who beeing blinde euen from his youth, became (neuertheleſſe) a moſt perfect Logitian; ſtudying beſides, in all other humane diſciplines; and hee made a very notable Commentary vpon the Pſalms of Dauid. Such then, as wee haue before ſpoken of, perceiuing themſelues to be depriued of their ſight, did yet ſtriue and labour to perfourme things memorable, as Neceſſity is alwayes ſayd to bee induſtrious.

Didimus Alexandrinus, the famous Logitian.

smile at together: For, (as Lucretius and Aulus Gellius do affirme) he pluckt out his owne eies, to inioy the more freedome in his contemplations. But Tertullian (who was an Author worthy of credite) maintaineth, that he did it, onely to auoide the inordinate appetites of the flesh.

Ziska, chiefe Captaine and Commander of the Bohemians.

Aboue all other men, subiected to the infelicitie of blindenesse, Ziska the Bohemian deserueth no meane remembrance; who being blind, was chosen chiefe Captaine and Commaunder of the Sect hee professed among the Bohemians; and so well executed his charge, that he obtained many victories against his enemies, and carryed himselfe so woorthily in his place, that hee atchieued immortall memorie.

Belus, the second King of Hungaria, made blinde by his cruell Vnckle.

Belus also, second king of Hungaria, being elected chiefe of the Hungarian army; had his eyes pluckt out by the meanes of King Colomanus, his owne vnckle. Being blinded thus, hee withdrew into Greece, where he made such plaine apparance of his manly spirit and wisedome: that king Stephen, sonne to king Colomanus, repealed him, and gaue him in marriage the daughter to the count of Seruia. In which dignity he carried himselfe with such rare integritie, as (after the death of King Stephen) hee was chosen King of Hungaria. And being blinde, reigned nine yeares; during which time he had diuers warres, and especially against Broccus, the bastard sonne to King Colomanus; whom yet he vanquished, so that he left the kingdome of Hungaria peaceably to his sonnes.

Iohn, the blinde King of Bohemia, who assisted Phillip of France, gainst King Edward of England.

The last blinde man, whereof wee will speake at this time, was Iohn, King of Bohemia, who reigned in the yeare of our Lord 1350. or thereabout. And surely, it is almost myraculous of this Prince, that blinde Ziska should maintaine his Commaunders place so worthily, being Generall of the Bohemian army, against Belus then reigning in Hungaria: yet I hold all nothing to blinde Iohn of Bohemia, who had so much valour (after his owne victories) to succour (in person) Phillip king of Fraunce, his kinseman, in his warre against King Edward of England. For, this blind King, euer affected to make one in the field; assisting also the Earle of Flanders, and many French Princes.

CHAP. XXV.

¶ That Auarice or Couetousnesse, is a most enormous vice, and subiect to great dangers: With sundry examples of diuerse persons, who were extreamely couetous.

The reason of inserting this Chapter by the Author.

THe Auarice of our instant dayes, induced mee to discourse on this sin, as a case of most perillous and extreame daunger: and to intermeddle among my relations, certaine histories of many couetous men, which may serue as exampls to other yet liuing. Desiring all Readers (in the meane while) to consider the estate of a couetous man, with the like eie, as common people doe diligently looke vpon a monster, which some Iuggler or Mountebancke bringeth into a city, for singularity & obseruation.

Aristotle. Cicero. Thom. Aquinas. The definitiō of Auarice.

As entrance then into our discourse, it is to be noted, that Aristotle, Cicero, Thomas Aquinas, and many other Authours beside, haue diuersly defined what Auarice is; neuertheless, we may deriue this resolution from their definitions. That Auarice is an inordinate desire of a mans enriching himselfe, without sparing part of his goods to any other; so that we may well say, this vice is excessiue in desiring and griping, but very cold and slowe in giuing or parting with any thing. Vnder the cloake of this sinne, march a thousand disorders, infinite iniustices and abhominations, sheltring themselues there so safely, as they cannot doe the like in anie of the other vices. For, as Virgil saith; Execrable famine of gold, is there any vice, which thou inducest not into the heart of man? S. Paul also saith: Couetousnesse or Auarice is the sourse or roote of all euilles, hauing made many to wander from Faith, which otherwise would haue kept and followed it.

Virgill, his exclamation on Auarice.

Rom. 9, 14.

Auarice causeth contempt both of God and Men.

That Auarice is a sinne most abhominable, appeareth sufficiently in this, because it makes a man hated both of God and men, being (of it selfe) quite contrary to Charitie: which is such a vertue, as conioyneth God and men together, euen as the opposite sinne maketh a man hatefull vnto himselfe. For, the loue of our selues is so rooted in our hearts, that wee respect not any thing, in regarde of our ſelues, louing alwayes our owne profit, more then any others. And yet notwithſtanding, Auarice hath gotten ſuch preheminence ouer man, as he cares for nothing but getting money, beeing ſo forgetfull of himſelfe, that hee will neyther eate, drinke, nor clothe himſelfe decently; but rather is content to faſt, and almoſt ſtarue himſelfe, becauſe he will not allow the leaſt leiſure from the ſcraping goods together. Nay, he feareth not to hazard both his ſoule & body, ſo he may be ſure to get money; which is a thing repugnant to the Lawe of Nature, who ordained and inſtructed vs, to affect and maintaine our ſelues, and contemne all things, before our owne liues. And yet the couetous man cares not to looſe and condemne his owne ſoule; yea, and abridge his life, which he will endanger in a moment, for the getting of a Crowne.

Auarice maketh mẽ careleſſe of themſelues in getting money, yea and to endanger their bodies and ſoules.

Vndoubtedly, it is much to be lamented, that a man ſhould not reſpect himſelfe, nor his parents, wife, children nor friends; prouided that he may wallow in wealth and mucke of the world: ſuch an one was the Rich man, ſpoken of in the Goſpell. What a miſerable and wretched follie is it, to endure hunger, thirſt, colde, ill cloathing, and neyther ſleep by day or night, but euery houre to endanger life, and yet make no vſe of golde when it is gotten? It ought, and ſhould ſerue for the ſuſtentation of life, and to that end riches were ordayned. Obſerue the words of our bleſſed Sauiour; What auayleth it a man to winne the whole world. and looſe his life, that is, his ſoule? Surely, I am of opinion, that this happeneth by the Diuine permiſſion, caſting ſuch couetous men into a reprobate ſenſe, to the end they may die in that auaritious will and deſire.

Men care neither for Parents, Wife, Children, Friends, nor themſelues, ſo they may get riches.

Luke 16.19.

And yet notwithſtanding, God often permitteth, that wealth ſcraped together, by ſuch toyle and trauaile: ſhall fall into the hands of other, to ſcatter as prodigally, as it was gotten wickedly, and wonderfully ſparing. This is that whereof Salomon ſpeaketh in his Eccleſiaſtes: Such as heape vp riches, gotten by iniuſtice, leaue them for other to ſpend. For, can that thing bee good for an other, which is euill in him who hath it? Iuuenall alſo vpon the very ſame words ſpeaketh thus. Some doe gaine and make profit, only to maintaine their life; and there are others, who liue not but to gaine. In briefe, this wicked vice doth ſo captiuate a man, that it robbes him of all loue and reſpect to himſelfe: ſo that there is not any wickedneſſe in this world, but it may well bee expected in a couetous man.

The niggard oftentimes gets goods together, for the prodigall to ſpend vnthriftily.

Eccleſ 7,9.

Dion the Philoſopher ſaid; Auarice is the head of all wickedneſſe. Euripides ſaith, An ambitious & couetous Iudge, can neither thinke or deſire any iuſt thing. Saint Auguſtine ſaith, whoſoeuer ſuffereth himſelfe to be gouerned by Auarice, becommeth ſubiect to all vices and wickedneſſe. And this is conformable to good reaſon. For, the couetous man (by Auarice) becommeth a tempter, periured, an euill payer, an vſurer, a deceiuer, a traytor, a turne-taile, a thiefe, a tyrant, and an idolater: ſo that it is not poſſible, that a couetous man ſhould haue any good being; neyther as Lord nor vaſſaile, gouernour nor ſubiect, father nor ſonne, nor friend or couſine, and in the end, neuer doth good, execpt when he dyeth.

greedy couetous man is neuer satisfied, but the more he gaineth, the more he gapeth still after gayne; thinking himselfe poorer and poorer. Saint Ierome sayth: The couetous man is so needie of that which hee hath, as if hee had it not at all. And alwayes his auarice encreaseth, as fire doth, being continually fed with dry wood. As much or rather more, haue many other holie men sayd; all in vtter detestation of this damnable sinne.

S. Ierome, his comparison of a couetous man.

S. Augustine, concerning desire in men, and other creatures, but (aboue all) in the auaricious and couetous man.

Neuertheless, because I will no longer weary the Reader, I shall conclude this poynt with the saying of Saint Augustine: How strangely insatiable is this desire in men? Other creatures haue their appetites limited; for they hunt when they are hungry, and being satisfied, they leaue their prey. But hee that coueteth the riches of this world, is insatiable: for hee seeketh and hoordeth vp daily, taking wealth from all hands, without fearing, eyther God or men, Hee knoweth neyther father nor mother; he maketh no account of his brethren, or any friends of his; hee neuer careth for keeping his word: Hee oppresseth Widdowes, robbeth Orphants, and and serues his turne with free-men, euen as if they were slaues: He is commonly a false witnes, and cares not how hee engrosseth vp dead mens goods: Are not these commendable qualities in a couetous man? Let vs flie then from this accursed vice, which (ouer & beside the former notes of wickednes) is incurable (according vnto the saying of Aristotle) for it encreaseth with age: so that Auarice is in his full reigne, when bodily strength fayleth in man.

Arist. in Polit. lib. 1. c. 10.

To shunne one falling into this slauish sin, I will alleadge some examples of wicked couetous men, among whom, Iudas Iscariot marcheth in the first rancke; he being an Apostle and Disciple of Christ Iesus, was so subiected to Auarice: that he would robbe the money from the rest of his fellowes and companions, by bearing the bagge, and hauing the money in his owne possession. This wicked passion had so farre blinded him, that he accounted the precious Oyntment to bee lost, wherewith Mary Magdalen anoynted the feete of our blessed Sauiour. For, if the Oyntment had beene solde, hee would haue stolne part of the price. In the end, he was so strangely led by this sinne, that (for money) he solde his Lord and Maister. This onely example were sufficient to approoue whatsoeuer hath beene said concerning couetousnes: neuertheless, I am content to report some other, among which, Tiberius Cæsar Emperour of Rome is the formost man; and questionlesse, there is no other vice in the world, better to be exampled in the Romain Emperors, then this of Auarice.

Examples of miserable wretched couetous men. Iudas Iscariot one of Christs Apostles.

Example of couetousnesse in diuers of the Romane Emperors.

This Prince, among other his notorious vices, (whereto hee was very easily mooued) was so subiect to penurious griping, and pinching, that although he was Lord of the whole world; yet notwithstanding, he put to death Cnæus Lentulus (whom he had instituted to be his heire) onely to enioy his wealth. As much did he to the King of the Parthians, who did come to liue with him vnder his safe-conduct; onely to possesse himselfe of the riches and treasure, belonging to the simply abused Prince. He so heauily charged the poore with taxes and toules, that they were enforced to forsake their countries, in such sort; that the Cities and Townes remayned desert and vn-inhabitable. In the end, pursuing on still his vnsatiable inclination: Caligula smothered him betweene two pillowes, and so hee dyed.

Tiberius Cæsar, who couetously put his own heire to death, to enioy his reuennues.

He was found smothered by Caligula.

Domitian the Emperour was more couetous then he: And the Emperor Commodus (therein) exceeded them both: for he (ordinarily) vsed to make port-sale of iustice: and therefore heauen iustly permitted them to be stabd to death by Ponyards. Achelous King of Lydia, was so ouercome with couetousnesse, that hee could not be contented with his Crowne lands, and very large ordinary reuenews; but layd (beside) such taxes and impositions vpon his subiects, that they arose in Armes against him, and hauing taken him, murdered him most miserably, and (afterwards) hung him vp by the heeles. Pontanus maketh mention of a Cardinal, who was so extraordinarily auaritious, as he would often disguise himselfe like vnto a poore groome or slaue, and steale away the prouender from before his owne horses. Horace saith, that there was a man in Rome, named Ouid, who was so aboundantly rich in money, that he could measure his gold and Siluer by many bushels: and yet notwithstanding, hee would goe starke naked, and neuer did eate halfe so much as would suffice him; as fearing still still least he should fall into pouerty, liued most wretchedly all his life time.

Many other might be spoken off, too much addicted to this detestable sinne, as *Primaleon, the brother to Dido, who slew his cousine, onely to enioy his riches. Polistus also, King of Troy, who put to death one of King Priams sonnes, being sent to honour him in his Court: but such prolixity of examples may prooue offensiue. We will content our selues then, to know how we ought to shunne this sin, which is the occasion of infinite euils: and so much the rather; becausse men are continuallie more enclined to Auarice, then to Liberality.

CHAP. XXVI.

A verie singular reason, deliuered by Phauorinus the Philosopher, concerning Astrologers; that it is not good to demand any Question of them, hauing relation vnto future matters.

Iudiciall Astrology continually misdoubted.

OVr Ancient, yea, and more moderne writers, were euer more doubtfull in the act of iudiciall Astrologie, which discourseth of thinges to come, and accidents happening to men, as wel in particular, as generally throughout the world; some condemning it, and vtterly reiecting it; others approouing it in part; some beside maintaining it by strong reasons, and by experience. Moreouer, there are store of bookes, which I could produce here, as warrantable presidents: but I mean not way that to troble my selfe, although I haue studied sufficiently in that part of Astrology, which discourseth on the course and motion of the Starres.

The Authour himselfe a student in Astrologie.

Beeing willing then, not to touch the honour and reputation of any person, I will onely alledge, what the Philosopher Phauorinus saide, according as Aulus Gellius relateth. He being desirous to retreat and turne mens mindes, from reposing any trust in Astrologers, Caldeans, or Mathematitians, concerning the knowledge of things to come: vsed a reason very ingenious and acute, speaking in this manner, and as himselfe hath sette downe the words.

Aul. Gel. in Atti. Noct. l. 5. c. 7.

The admonition giuen by Phauorinus against confidence in the saying of Astrologers.

Be well aduised, that thou giue no credite to Astrologers, in any manner whatsoeuer: For, although they tell thee true, that which they say, will be either good or ill for thee; and being good, it must be truth, or a lye. If it be trueth, thou maist receiue double damage by knowing it: for first of all, thy desire runs into further paine and trauaile, what good thereby shall happen to thee, and how soon. Secondly, a good or benefite to come (whereof thou hast thus receiued intelligence) is alwaies reckoned the lesse, because it cannot bee so compleate, as if thou wert possessed thereof instantly. If it be a lye, thou expectest in vain, the benefite which the Astrologer promised thee, in regard it shall neuer come vnto thee. What if that which the Astrologer foretolde thee, is ill and hurtfull for thee? Being euil & certaine; what more great disgrace can happen to thee, then to be possest of an euill turne, which thou must embrace, and is out of thy power to shunne or auoide? If it be a lye, why should a man be afflicted, or driuen into sadnesse, by feare of a mischeefe that shall neuer come neere him? Be it therefore in what sorte soeuer, it is not good to enquire after future accidents.

The Authors iudgement of the Philosophers counsel.

For mine owne part, I finde the counsel of this Philosopher to be so good, that I hold it agreeable vnto the holy Gospell, which sayeth: It is not for vs, to know times, seasons, nor moments.

CHAP. XXVII.

Diuers examples of sundry accidents, whereby great plots and designements of great Politickes, haue bene dissipated and ouerthrowne. Also, concerning Policies, that (for a time) haue beene profitable, and yet in the end haue proued pernitious.

Plut. in vit. Timoleon.

WE reade in Plutarch, that the people of Sicily (beeing oppressed with diuers Tyrants) craued assistance of the Corinthians, who sent them (for their succour) a Captaine of theirs, called Timoleon; a man famous, not onely onely for Militarie diſcipline; but alſo for morall vertue and piety. This Timoleon had (within a while) ſuch good ſucceſſe, that the Tyrants deſpairing of ability eyther to ouercome him, or to defend themſelues by force againſt him: One of them (being named Icetes) ſubborned a couple of deſperate companions to kill him. And they perſwading themſelues, that it might beſt be done, as he ſhould bee ſacrificing to his Goddes; watched on opportunitie for that purpoſe, and finding him one day in the Temple, ready to ſacrifice; they drew neere him, to execute their intent. But as they were readie to ſtrike him, one of the ſtanders by (who ſuſpected nothing of their intention) vppon a ſodaine, gaue one of the Conſpiratours ſuch a mortall wound, that he fell downe deade in the place. The other (ſeeing his fellow ſlain, and thinking that the conſpiracy was diſcouered) fled into the Altare, and taking hold thereof, craued pardon of the Gods and Timoleon, promiſing, that (if he wold ſaue his life) hee would diſcouer all the practiſe.

An attempt againſt Timoleon, ouerthrowne by a ſtrange accident.

These are the mercies of heauen, to preſerue the liues of vertuous men.

In the meane time, hee that had killed the other Conſpiratour, being fled; was taken and brought back, calling God and Man to witnes, that he had done nothing but a moſt iuſt and lawfull acte, in killing him that had ſlaine his Father. Which being knowne to ſome that were preſent, and teſtified by them to be true: filled all the aſſiſtants with admiration of Gods prouidence; who by ſuch a ſodaine and vnexpected accident, had not onely ouerthrowne the pernitious plot, and deſignement of the wicked Tyrant, and preſerued Timoleon, but alſo had executed his iuſtice on a murtherer.

Murther is a ſin ſo heinous that often it is reuenged by ſtraunge meanes.

Heereupon, Plutarch maketh a notable diſcourſe of Fortune, following the opinion of the Platoniſts, concerning the ſame (which they define to bee Demoniacum poteſtatem, &c. An Angelicall power, connecting diuers and different cauſes, to produce ſome effect.) And therfore, he noteth in this Hiſtory, how the good Angel of Timoleon, did (for his preſeruation) aſſemble, and (as it were) chaine things together, that had no coherence of themſelues, making one of them to be the beginning of another. For, although the murther of his Father that ſlew the Conſpirator, had no connexion with this conſpiracie againſt Timeleon; yet, neither that murther had bene reuenged, if this Conſpiracy had not followed; nor this Conſpiracy had beene diſcouered and ouerthrowne, but by occaſion of that murther committed long before. Thus diſcourſeth Plutarch vpon this accident; which although he referred to Fortune (ſpeaking thereof, according to the opinion of the Platoniſts) yet he aſcribed it principally to the prouidence of God, who by the miniſtery of his good Angell, protected and preſerued his ſeruant Timoleon, in reſpect of his great piety and deuotion: and this beeing well vnderſtoode, is no way repugnant vnto Chriſtian Catholike Doctrine.

The deſignes of Fortune according to the Platoniſtes.

Proclus in Comment in Timæum.

Plutarch aſcribeth the preſeruation of Timoleon, to the prouidēce of God, by the meanes of his good Angell.

But to come to examples neerer our time, Charles Duke of Burgundie, beeing at Warre with Lewes the eleuenth, King of France, had (for his Confederates) the Dukes of Guienne and Britany, whereof the firſt was the Kinges owne Brother. And hauing beene (in former time) twice deceiued by the ſaid King, with falſe treaties, and now deſirous to quite him with the like; offered him to abandon his two Confederates, vpon condition; That he would reſtore vnto him certaine Townes, which he had of his vpon the Frontiers. Aduertiſing his Confederats (in the meen time) that his meaning was not to forſake them, or to keepe any Couenant with the King; but onely to recouer his owne, and then to delude him, as he had bene before deluded by him.

Phil. Com. c. 58.

Another exampleof great deſignement of Charles D. of Burgundy, ouerthrowne by a chance.

The King (ſuſpecting no deceit) accorded to the conditions, and ſent his Ambaſſadors to Duke Charls, to take his oath for performance of the Couenantes on his part. The Duke ſware, or rather forſware himſelfe (promiſing vppon his Oath that which he meant not to performe); & then ſent his Ambaſſadors in like manner vnto the King, to take his oath. In the meane time, before the Ambaſſadours arriued where the King was, it pleaſed God ſo to diſpoſe, that the Duke of Guienne the kings Brother, and Confederate to Charls, dyed. Which the King vnderſtanding and ſeeing himſelfe already deliuered (by his Brothers death) of the daunger of Guiuill Warre, which he moſt feared: refuſed to ſweare, and ſtand to his couenants. And ſo, all the crafty deuice and ſubtle plot of Charls was ouerthrowne, by the ſodaine acci-accident of his confederates death, which he neuer dreamed of; and he himselfe forsworne for nothing.

The ouerthrow of Cæsar Borgia (Machiauels mirrour for a Prince) by a sodain chance Heereto I wil adde Cæsar Borgia, Duke of Valentia; whome Machiauell so highly admireth, that he proposeth him for a paterne or example to his Prince. This Cæsar, being become exceeding rich and potent, by the helpe and Authority of Alexander the sixt, his Father; and fearing nothing so much as his Fathers death, whereby it might chance, that some enemie of his might be chosen to succeede him; studied and laboured by all meanes possible to preuent that inconuenience, & to procure, that the election of his Fathers successour, might fall into the power of himselfe and his friends. Which when hee had prouided sufficiently, as he thought; it chanced by such meanes as I will declare.

Guic. in Lib. 6

Borgia the great politician preuented.

After a while, not onely his Father died; but he fell likewise so extremely sicke at that time, that hee could execute nothing of that which hee had before resolued. Whereby it came to passe (God so disposing in his iust iudgement) that an enemy of his fathers and his (being chosen to succeede) he was within a while vtterly ouerthrowne. In which respect, he himselfe was wont afterward to confesse, and lament the imbecility of mans witte, because when hee thought, that he had foreseene all inconueniences, which might happen to him by his Fathers death, and prouided to preuent them: hee neuer so much as imagined, that he should bee so sicke at the same time, that he should not be able to put any of his designements in execution.

Guic. in Lib. 6

Cæsar Borgia thinking to poison another, poisoned his owne Father & himselfe

And herein is also to be noted, for further proofe of the matter in hand, that he himselfe was the cause, aswell of his owne sickenesse, as of his fathers death, and (consequently) of his owne ouerthrowe, by a wonderfull chance, which hapned contrary to his expectation. For, hauing inuited his Father, and Cardinall Cornetti to a Vineyard, with intent to poyson the Cardinall, to the end to inherit his goods; hee re-commended a certaine Bottle of impoisoned wine, to a trusty seruant of his, with speciall charge to keepe it safe, and giue it to none without his expresse order. But it so fell out, by his seruants negligence (or rather by Gods iustice) that as the Psalmist saith; Incidit in foueam quam fecit: He fell into the pit himselfe, that he had made for other. For his Father, coming into supper very hot and thirsty, by reason of the great heates, and calling for wine; the seruant that had charge of the Bottle (not knowing it was poysoned; but imagining onely, that it was some especiall wine, more precious then the residue) & not hauing any other ready (because the prouision was not brought from the Pallace) gaue him of that wine, whereof not onely he, but his son Borgia dranke. And being both poysoned therewith, the Father (who was old and weake) died presently: but the Sonne being young, and more able to resist the force of the poison; had time to take great and potent remedies, whereby (after a long and dangerous sickenesse) he hardly escaped. Thus was his bloodye plot and pernitious purpose preuented, by an accident which he neuer minded.

Psalme 7, 16.

Guicciard. Ibid.

But let vs come now to an example in our Countrey of England, which manie yet may well remember. The Lord Iohn Dudley, Earle of Warwick, and after Duke of Northumberland, in the time of K. Edward the sixte, meaning to aduance himselfe and his Family; married the Lorde Guilford Dudley (his fourth sonne) to the Lady Iane, daughter to the Duke of Suffolke; pretending to make her Queene after King Edward, in preiudice of the Lady Mary, daughter to King Henry the 8. and eldest sister to the sayd King Edward. For, by reason of the Kings lingering sickenesse, he had time to vse all the meanes, which he thought conuenient for the accomplishing of his desire. And therfore partly for friendship, and partly for feare, hee had heerein so farre preuailed, that there seemed to want nothing for assurance of his intention: but only to haue the Ladie Mary in his hands; whome therefore hee procured the Councell to send for in the Kings name; vpon pretence, that she should come to comfort the king; whereto she obeyed, not suspecting any sinister meaning in the Duke.

The plotte of the Duke of Northumberland, against the Lady Mary, eldest dauter to K. Henry the eight.

Iohn Stow, in vit. Edou. 6.

But as she was vpon the way, and somwhat neere to London; before she fell into the snare prepared for her, it pleased God, that shee receiued aduice of the Dukes designement, from one of his own counsell: wherupon she returned sodainly,

Lady Marie aduertised of the treacherie intended towards her, by one of hi owne councel ly, and within a while after, that ſhe arriued at her owne houſe; ſhe had newes of the King her Brothers death. And although ſhe was deſtitute of men, money, counſell, and all other meanes to enable her, wherby to reſiſt ſo great an aduerſary as the Duke (who was not meanly prouided) yet ſuch was her truſt in God, as alſo the iuſtice and right of her cauſe; that ſhe prouided her houſholde ſeruants to proclaime her Queene preſently, in the countrey Townes thereabout. Whereupon, firſt the common people of the countries adioyning, and (afterward) diuers Gentlemen of account repaired vnto her in ſo great a number; that the Duke of Northumberland and the Councell (who had already proclaimed the Lady Iane in London, and in diuers parts) thought it conuenient to leuy forces, and to make a royall Army, whereof the Duke himſelfe (for the authority of his perſon) was Generall.

The Duke of Northumberland his ouerthrow by gods prouidence and iuſtice.

The Duke then preſently put himſelfe into the fielde, leauing the charge of the Citty & Tower of London, to the Lords of the Councell: who, vpon his abſence, and vnderſtanding the great concourſe of people, to the aſſiſtance of the Ladie Mary, and the equity of her cauſe iuſtlie conſidered: they agreed amongſt themſelues, to proclaim her in London, as preſently they did, and committed to priſon the Lady Iane. Then ſent they order to apprehend the Duke, who was ſo diſmayed therewith when he vnderſtood it; that he vtterly loſt his high and hopefull courage; and being taken priſoner at or nere Cambridge, was brought to London, and there afterward executed.

Theſe are cõmonly the ends of high and ambitious hopes.

By theſe examples, and infinite others which might bee alledged, it is verie euident, that there is no ſurety in the plottes and contriuings of men, be they neuer ſo wiſe, except they be guided by the Spirit of God particularly. For, when they haue built (as a man may ſay) Towers of policy, as high as the Tower of Babel: a ſodaine blaſt of an accident vnexpected, ſhall caſt them downe to the very grounde, to the confuſion (many times) and ruine of the builders and contriuers.

But what ſhall we ſay of counſelles and policies, that ſeeme not only to be grounded vpon great reaſon, and contriued alſo with as great prudence; but alſo ſucceede (for ſome time) notably well, & yet in the end proue to be pernitious? Wherof we haue ſeene ſufficient experience in the Romane Empire, which was ouerthrowen in courſe of time, by that (which for many yeares) ſeemed to bee the ſtrength and ſecurity thereof. For, whereas the firſt Romane Emperors, hauing oppreſſed the Common-wealth by Armes, perſwaded themſelues, that their ſeate was to bee eſtabliſhed and conſerued, by the ſelfeſame meanes as it was gotten, and therefore reſolued, that the ſafety thereof, & of theyr perſons, conſiſted in ſtrong Guards, garriſons, Legions, and Armies of ſoldiers, to be diſtributed throughout all the parts of their Dominions: it is euident, that the ſame was (in the end) one of the principall and cheefeſt cauſes, of the Empyres vtter ouerthrow, though (at the firſt) it ſeemed greatly to eſtabliſh and aſſure the ſame.

The Romane Empire ouerthrown by the ſame meanes that preſerued it for a time.

For, after the death of Nero (when the Family of the Cæſars was ended) not onely the Guards deputed for the cuſtody & ſafegard of the Emperors perſons, called Pretoriani milites; but alſo the Legions & Armies, diſpoſed and placed in diuerſe quarters of the Empire (ſeeing as wel the perſonnes of the Emperours, as alſo the ſtrength of the Empire in their own hãds) did arrogate vnto themſelues, ſuch authority and liberty to chuſe new Emperors: that they ſet them vppe, and pulled them downe at their pleaſure. Wherby in leſſe then one yeare after Neroes death, foure Emperors, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Veſpaſian, were choſen by the Guardes, who forced the Senate to admit and confirme them. And their inſolency grewe to ſuch extremity in time, that after the death of the Emperor Pertinax (whom they killed) they made offer of the empire (by publike proclamation) to whoſoeuer would giue moſt for it.

The factious election of Emperors, by guards and armies of ſoldiours.

Suetonius. Plutarch.

Elius Spartan.

And whereas there was but onely two that offered money for it, Sulpitianus, and Didius Iulianus; they gaue it to the latter, partly becauſe he gaue them ready mony, and partly becauſe Sulpitianus was Father in Law to Pertinax, whom they had ſlain. And, whileſt not onely the Emperours guards, but alſo the ſoldiours of euery army tooke vpon them to make Emperors: it fell out ſometimes, that there were as many Emperors choſen at once, as there were were diuers Armies in the Empire. Insomuch, that in the time of Galen and Valerian, there were no lesse then thirtie Emperours declared in sundry places, within the space of fifteene yeeres. Whereupon it followed, that the Empire (beeing pittifully rent and torne with ciuill warre) was so weakened, that it became a prey to the Gothes, Vandales, Alans, Hunnes, Lombardes, and such other barbarous Nations.

The Empire ſold to ſuch as would giue moſt money for it.

The ruine of many Emperors by their owne Guards

Thus was the Romane Empire ouerthrowne, by the same meanes, that were not only ordained to conserue and maintaine it; but also did indeede (for a time) preserue it from many dangers, both domesticall and forraine, to wit, as well from inuasion of forraine enemies, as from rebellions of Subiects: which by the Emperours Guards, and the ordinary Legions, dispersed through all parts of the empire; were either easily preuented, or speedily represſed. For which cause, the Emperors themselues were content, to stand (as it were) at their mercy, to the end that they might (by them) rule and command others; which although to some it was a safegard and security, yet to manie more it brought ruine and perdition; as to Caligula; Pertinax, Caracalla, Heliogabalus, Pupienus, Balbinus, Galien. Seuerus, Macrinus, Aurelianus, Iulius Maximinus, Probus, with diuers other; some of them being slaine by their owne Guards, and some by their Soldiers.

Suetonius. Iul. Capitolinus. Elius Lamprid. Trebel. Pollio. Flauius vopiscus

The Turkes great Guarde of Ianizaries, dangerous to his State.

This inconuenience, the Emperors of Turkes doe seeke to remedy, in their Tyrannicall Dominion (which they also vphold by force, as the Romans did, though with lesse danger.) For, although they haue aboue three hundred thousãd horse, and foote euer in readinesse, vnder theyr Colonels and Captaines, in Europe, Asia, and Affrica: yet they keepe them alwayes sundered, and farre dispersed, that they neuer come together in any number, vnlesse they are to be imployed in some forraine Warre. Neuertheless, theyr Guardes of Ianizaries, which they haue alwaies neere about them, for the security of their persons, to the number of thirteene or foureteene thousand, haue proued (many times) no lesse dammageable, then dangerous to their States. For they haue not onely sometime set the younger Brother against the elder, and holpe the sonne to depose the father: but also (euen in our Age) haue taken the most confident Officers, and greatest fauorites of the Turke from him by force, and smote off their heades; and compelled him to pardon them, yea, and to giue them whatsoeuer they would demaund, to appease them.

Lazaro Soranzo in his Ottoman. par. 1.

Paul. Iouius, in Commen. rerum Turc. in Baiazet. 2.

Whereuppon, two considerations may be gathered; the one, the infelicitie of Tyrants, who while they seek rather to be feared, then louingly affected: are forced to make themselues subiects & slaues to those, by whome they keepe other in subiection and slauery. Whereby we see, how true it is which Seneca saith; Quod alieno metu magnum est, suo non vacat. That which is great by others feare, is not voide of feare in it selfe. The other consideration, is, how tickle the state of Princes is, how weake their policies, how vncertaine the successe of their plots; and consequently, how needfull it is for them, to craue and haue the especiall protection of Almighty God, in all their designements and actions; seeing the meanes whereby they labour to preserue themselues from dangers, proue many times more dangerous in the end, then the dangers themselues, which they seeke to auoid.

Tyrantes are slaues to those by whom they keepe other in slauery.

The dangerous & tickle state of Princes, without Gods especial protection.

This may further appeare, by the policie which Rodericke King of Spaine vsed, to assure his state against the children and friends of King Vitiza, whom hee had deposed. For, fearing lest his subiects might rebell in their fauour; he dismantled al the strong holds and places in Spaine, and disarmed the people. Whereby, though hee strengthned his state, in regard of domestical danger; yet he weakned it, in respect of forraine attempts. Insomuch, that the Moores inuading him shortly after, and ouerthrowing him in battel; found so slender resistance afterward, that in seauen or eight moneths, they conquered almost al Spaine.

Roderick K. of Spaine, ouerthrowne through his owne policie. Lucas Tudensis. Anno 713.

The like also may be saide of the Britaines, to whom their owne policie prooued most pernitious; for, being molested by the Picts and Scottes; they called in the Saxons for their defence, who (for some time) serued them to good purpose; but in the end, they conquered them & their Countrey.

Ioan Vaseus in Cron. an. 714 Baron. An. 713. Beda hist. Eccl. lib. 1. cap. 14, 15

In like manner, the Queene of Hungarie thought it good pollicie, to procure the the ayde and assistaunce of Solyman the Great Turke, against Ferdinando King of the Romaines, brother vnto the Emperour Charles, the fifth of that name; and (for a certayne time) shee was relieued and supported thereby: but in the end, Solyman comming into Hungarie, in his owne person, with a pretence to succour her: he deprived both her and her sonne of their Kingdome: Also Amurath, one of Solymans Ancestours, conquered and subdewed the greatest part of all Greece, euen by the very like kinde of meanes and occasion.

The very worst kindes of policies to ouerthrow the deuisers themselues.

But peraduenture you will say, that this was so grosse a follie in Christian Princes (to put confidence and trust in the helpe of such potent and perfidious Infidells) that it is not to bee alleadged for an example of pollicie. I graunt that it was follie; but such kindes of follie may bee committed and doone, euen by the wisest Princes and their councells, when Almightie GOD will punish and afflict them. For, hee either taketh from them their politicke wittes, to the end they may erre and precipitate themselues: or, hee ouerthroweth their wisest designements, by such kinde of meanes as they cannot imagine: or else, he doth bring them to such exigents, that they are forced (sometimes) wittingly, to take in hand some daungerous and desperate resolution, whereby they are disgraced and ruined.

No policie preuaileth against the wil of heauen.

CHAP. XXVIII.

¶ A briefe Discourse concerning the first foundation of Ierusalem, What fortunes (from time to time) befell thereto: And of the Kings that there did reigne.

The admirable graces & priuiledges of Ierusalem in precedent times.

NEuer was there any Towne or Cittie (of what estate or condition soeuer) that had so many especiall graces and priuiledges from Almightie God, nor euer had such store of sacred mysteries therein performed, as in the Cittie of Ierusalem: although it had not had that (onely chiefe) note, that our blessed Lord and Saiiour was there crucified, dead and buried; and that the mysteries and secrets of our redemption, had not beene there accomplished. Contrariwise, there is not any City in the world, that euer endured so many miseries and mischiefes, or fell into such slauish seruitude, as shee, and as is to be discerned at this day.

The wealth and sumptuous buildings in Ierusalem. Plin.li.2.ca.9. Cor.Tac.in lib.3.cap.4. Iosep.de Bell. Iudaic.lib.6.

As concerning her riches, and sumptuous buildings, no Cittie vpon the earth could euer equall them; as Pliny extolleth it aboue all the Cities in the East, and Cornelius Tacitus amply describeth the situation thereof: whereby wee may easily collect, that it was one of the most potent Cities in the world. As much affirmeth Iosephus, who describeth the three walles wherewith it was ingirt: which neuertheless were adorned with goodly Towers, Bulwarkes, and buildings most rare; besides the excellencie of the Temple, a thing beyond all compasse of comparison. All which considerd, I thought it not vn-necessary, to make some briefe report, concerning the first foundation of this Citty, with what fortunes happened thereto (as well good as euill) by a summarie Collection, of such things as I find recorded in her owne Chronicles.

Concerning the seating or plantation of Ierusalem.

Ierusalem was scituated and founded, in the very middest of Iudea or Iewrie, at the toppe or knap of Mount Sion; which is helde or reputed (commonly) to be the middle or centre of the earths superficies. Ezechiel also saith, That it was seated in the middest of Nations. Dauid likewise sayth: That the saluation of men was perfected in the middest of the earth. Which Saint Hierome declareth, writing on that passage of Ezechiel before specified. Moreouer, it is written in Genesis, That Melchisedech (which, according to the interpretation of Saint Paul) is as much to say, as a Iust King, or a King of Iustice. Abraham hauing conquered foure Kings, that kept Lot prisoner) mett him and made a sacrifice to God, and that this Prince baptized this Citty of Salom, or (as some say) Salem, which is as much to say, as Peace: in regard whereof, he was called King of Peace.

Genes.14.18. Hebr.7.1.2.3

Salem the first name giuen to Ierusalem.

Salem then was the first name imposed vppon this Cittie: although Saint Hierome is of the opinion, that it had the name of Iebus at the beginning. Strabo, Cornelius Tacitus, and many other Authors beſide, called it Solima, ſpeaking otherwiſe of the foundation, then formerly hath beene ſayd.

It was alſo called Iebus and Ieruſalem.

This Citty likewiſe was called Iebus and Ieruſalem, as wee may reade in the ſacred Scriptures. Saint Hierome writing to Dardanus, doeth giue it three names: Notwithſtanding, it was (in the end) called Aelia, in regarde of the Emperours name Aelius Adrianus, who cauſed it to bee re-builded and fortified. Saint Hierome ſayth, that it had the name of Iebus, in regard of the Iebuſites, who had founded it, vntill the time of the holy Prophet Dauid.

Ioſeph. Ant. Iud. ca. 1 9. li. 1.

Melchiſedech called it Ieruſalem, Viſion of peace.

Ioſephus and Aegeſippus ſay, that Melchiſedech gaue it the name of Ieruſalem, as much to ſay, as Viſion of peace: making one word of Iebus and Salem, ſo that Ieruſalem found it ſelfe to be compoſed of theſe two wordes, onely by chaunging B. into R. Others ſay, that it had the name of Here, that is to ſay, Viſion: by reaſon of the Angell which appeared to Abraham, when hee would haue ſacrificed his ſonne Iſaack.

The houſe or palace of king Salomon.

Some others ſay, that it was called Ieruſalem, as much to ſay, as the houſe of Salomon: in regarde of the admirable buildings which King Salomon erected there: many other opinions are there vpon this poynt, which I paſſe ouer lightly; becauſe I am of the minde, that as the Iewes called it in their tongue Ieruſalem, ſo did the Greekes and the Latines name it Ieroſolima, as wee may reade in Ioſephus and Aegeſippus, Greeke Authors. Yet, Nicholas de Lyra will not haue it to bee ſo receyued, becauſe hee ſayth, that Ieruſalem was firſt called Luca and Bethell: which I can giue but little credite vnto; for (according as Saint Hierome ſayth) Bethell is twelue miles off from Ieruſalem, as wee may ſee it alſo auouched by Ioſephus. Notwithſtanding all theſe opinions, it is to be noted, that Ieruſalem (in former times) had many particular names; which were thereto attributed, in regard of the manifolde high myſteries therein accompliſhed. As, The Holy Citty; The Sacred Cittie; The Cittie of Dauid, and many other ſuch like Titles, beſides her owne proper and peculiar name, Ieruſalem.

The opinion of Nicholas de Lyra concerning Ieruſalem.

Many particular names giuen to Ieruſalem.

But come wee now vnto the Hiſtorie. The Iebuſites and the Canaanites, who were one and the ſame Nation (for Iabus or Iebus, was the ſonne of Canaan, the ſonne of Cam, Nephew to Noah, of whom theſe Nations tooke their name) were Lordes of Ieruſalem, at ſuch time as the Children of Iſraell (deliuered from the Captiuity of Egipt) poſſeſſed themſelues of Paleſtine and Iudea. And it came to paſſe, that in the diuiſion or partage, which the twelue Tribes of Iſraell made of the Land promiſed vnto them: Ieruſalem fell into the portion of the Tribe of Beniamin. Neuertheleſſe, becauſe this Tribe of Beniamin (notwithſtanding all their aduentures in Armes) could not wholly cleare the Country of the Iebuſites: they were conſtrained to let them liue there among them, for more then three hundred and ſeauenty yeares after, euen to the time of Dauid. Hee beeing both a Prophet and King, and deſcended of the Tribe of Iuda; expulſing the Iebuſites, wonne their Fortreſſes from them, building them new againe; and erected there a goodly Pallace, as wee may reade in the Booke of Kings, and alſo in Ioſephus. Dauid hauing thus expelled the Iebuſites, called Ieruſalem, The Citty of God, creating it to be the chiefe and Capitall Citty in all Iudea.

Concerning the Iebuſites and Canaanites the lords and poſſeſſors of Ieruſalem.

Ieruſalem fell to the tribe of Beniamin in the diuiſion.

King Dauid expelled the Iebuſites out of the land. Ioſep. in Ant. Iud. lib. 18 c. 9

During the Reigne of King Dauid, Ieruſalem was in her triumphing iollity, and highly renowned among all the Nations, in regarde of the great victoryes which Dauid obtayned: after whoſe death, wiſe Salomon ſucceeded him. And although this King laboured to liue in peace, yet Ieruſalem ſtill encreaſed in fame, riches and ſumptuous buildings: for Salomon enlarged the walles thereof, and erected there goodly fortifications. Hee builded many other coſtly Caſtles beſide: but eſpecially the Temple, ſo greatly renowned, in regard of the treaſure and arteficiall cunning beſtowed thereon, as neuer could any other building be compared therewith. For, as we may reade in holy Scripture, and alſo in Ioſephus, the Furniture thereto belonging, was infinite and incomprehenſible. So that the very fame thereof, incited the Queene of Saba to viſite King Salomon.

Salomon ſucceeded his father Dauid.

Ioſep. in Ant. Iudaic. lib. 8.

The Queene of Saba viſited King Salomon.

Many

Many Kings likewise sent him choyse Presents to the same effect, Gold, Siluer, and Treasure, which they brought to him by sea, and in such abundance, as no more account was made thereof, then as stones in the streete.

This King neuertheless, forgetting the great blessings which God had bestowed vpon him; became an Idolater, so that God suffered his kingdome to be diuided after his death.

Solomons kingdome became diuided after his death

Hauing reigned forty yeares, Rehoboam his sonne succeeded him; against whom ten of the Tribes reuolted, who elected Ieroboam to be their King. Rehoboam had the but two of the Tribes onely, to wit, Iuda and Beniamin, whereupon he fortified his Cities: and afterward, this Kingdome remaining to his successours, began to take and continue the name of Iewes, because of the Tribe of Iuda. Ieroboam and his successors, called themselues Kings of Israel, and chose Samaria to bee the chiefe Citty of that Kingdome: and by this diuision, those Kings were alwayes at continuall warre, each against other. Notwithstanding, although Rehoboam had but two of the Tribes subiect to him, yet his reputation was so great (because hee was descended of Dauid) that euermore hee preuailed in fight, and was much more feared and obeyed, then the King of Israell, so that Ierusalem became not a iote diminished, eyther in strength or riches. But when the Kings of Iuda and their people, grew offensiue to God by Idolatry: then this goodly Citty suffered many miseries and calamities.

The kingdom of the Iewes and the king dome of Israell.

Rehoboam thriued in all his attempts, being descended of Dauid

Rehoboam hauing strongly defenced his Townes and Cities, and they flourishing in all pompe and prosperity; hee notwithstanding, fell to Idolatry, as we may reade in the holy Chronicles, and likewise in Iosephus. In regard whereof, God raised vp against him, Susac or Shishack, King of Egipt, who came and couered his Country with twelue hundred Chariots, threescore thousand horse, and a countlesse number of Infantery, belonging to the Egiptians, Ethiopians, Troglodites, with many Lybians, which came from Guynea, to his seruice. Boldly they entred into Ierusalem, sacked the Citty and the Temple, from whence they carried infinite Treasures, as is to be obserued in his chronicle. After which chastisements, the anger of God being appeased; Rehoboam remained peaceably in his Kingdome, all the remainder of his life: and being dead, Abias succeeded him, who ouer-came Ieroboam King of Israel; in which conquest were slaine fifty thousand men belonging to Ieroboam.

Shishack raised vp by God against Roboam. 3 Reg. 14, 3.

The first sacking and spoyling of Ierusalem, in the dayes of Roboam.

After the death of Abias, who liued but a while (being also an Idolator; and yet God permitted him to haue this victory, in consideration of Dauid his grand-father) Asa succeeded him. This Prince was good, iust, and feared God, and therefore he gaue him many great and signall victories, against Zarab, King of Ethiopia: who had entred so farre vpon his Country, that he kept Ierusalem besiedged. In his time, the Kingdome of Iuda was so flourishing, that (vpon an account made) there were found fiue hundred and foure-score thousand men, able to beare Armes. I finde also in the sacred Scripture, that this King builded and fortified many Cities.

After Abias, succeeded Asa, a iust and vertuous Prince.

A goodly muster of men made in Iuda.

Hee being deceassed, Iehosophat his sonne came to the Crowne, during whose Reigne, Ierusalem was in great reputation: chiefely in respect of Propliets, as Abias, Micheas, Osias, Elias and Eliseus, who were all then at that time. This King found such fauour in the sight of God (according as wee reade in the holy Chronicles of the Kings) that the Moabites, Ammonites, and the Mountaineers of Seir (being gathered together, with an infinite number of people, to runne vpon this Prince) God sent a dissention among them, that they conuerted thence, and employed their powers to spoyle themselues, so that without striking a stroake, King Iehosaphat returned with great triumph to Ierusalem. Where hauing reigned peaceably, and in no meane power; he dyed, leauing the Kingdome vnto Ioram his sonne, giuing also to his other Children, diuers Cities, with great summes of gold and siluer.

Ierusalem blessed with many famous Prophets.

A mighty army preuented by Gods prouidence.

Ioram being come vnto the Crowne, he followed not the steppes of his Father, nor of his Grand-father; but gaue himselfe to impiety and cruelty, putting to death his owne Brethren. He laboured also to haue alliance with Achab, King of Israell, whose councell he mainely followed in his affaires, and likewise tooke his Daughter in marriage. Whereat

The impious and wicked rule of Ioram.

The countrey of Iudea ſpoiled & ruined.

God being diſpleaſed, ſuffered the men of Edom to reuolt from him. The Arabes alſo made warre vpon him; which proued in ſuch cruell manner, that the whole Countrey of Iudea, was thereby vtterly waſted.

Wicked liues haue commonly as wicked deaths.

After his death, Ahazia, or Ochozias his Sonne, ſucceeded in the Kingdome, with his Mother Athalia: and, as they were both of moſt Wicked life, euen ſo, hadde they as vnhappie an ending.

The Prophet Zacharie put to death by Ochozias.

Next him ſucceeded Ochozias, who gaue good apparance in the beginning of his Reigne, to doe all thinges for the beſt, as well in regard of Religion, as for actions of pollicie. For, hee reduced the Temple into the firſt condition, and re-eſtabliſhed all the damages and iniuries which the Kinges of Egypt (and eſpecially his Father Ahazia) had done. But ſoone after, hee fell vnto Idolattie, ſo that (by common voyce of the people) hee cauſed the Prophet Zacharie to be put to death.

Another gret miſery happning to Ieruſalem.

So highly was the goodneſſe of Almightie God diſtaſted heerewith, that he ſent a terrible chaſtiſement vppon Ieruſalem, and that in the time of King Amaſias, Sonne vnto this Ochozias. Who hauing Warre againſt Ioas, King of Iſraell, and neuer remembering the great Victories, which God had giuen him againſt the Idumæans, and manie other Nations: both hee and his people were ouer-come, and beeing ledde Priſoner vnto Ieruſalem his owne Citty, was compelled to yeelde it to the mercy of Ioas, who cauſed it to be diſmantelled, and foure hundred fadomes of the Walles to bee beaten downe. He ſpoyled the Temple alſo, and poſſeſſed himſelfe of all the wealth and riches belonging vnto King Amaſias: returning home afterwardes (in Triumph) to his Cittie of Samaria.

Amaſias murthered by treaſon, his ſon Azarias ſucceedes him

Furthermore, King Amaſias beeing ſlaine by Treaſon, Azarias, or Ozias his Sonne next ſucceeded, who vvas a verie valiant and potent Prince. Firſt of all, he ſtrengthened Ieruſalem, and all the other diſmantled Citties, enriching his Countrey, by diuers great victories which hee obtained againſt the Philiſtimes, Arabes, and Ammonites, making them all Tributarie vnto his Crowne; ſo that the renowne of Ieruſalem, encreaſed day by day, while hee reigned; and hee founded and builded many Townes and Citties beſide.

Pride and arrogancy iuſtly puniſhed by the hande of heauen.

Neuertheleſſe, pride made him to forget his dutie; for, perceiuing that he had three hundered thouſand men ſubiect vnto him, and all in abilitie to carry Armes: hee grew ſo exceeding arrogant, that hee would needes vſurpe the High-Prieſtes Office. But as hee was perfourming his Sacrifice in the Temple; God ſmote him with a fowle Leaproſie, the which continued with him to the time of his death.

Iotham ſucceeded Azarias his father

After his deceaſe, Iotham his Sonne next ſucceeded him, being a Prince very wiſe, iuſt, and valiaunt; hee alſo enlarged Ieruſalem verie ſpaciouſly, by manie reparations and new foundations; beſides, the building of ſome other Cities. Hee likewiſe ouercame and vanquiſhed the Ammonites, from whom he brought backe great ſummes of Golde and Siluer. But after his death, Triumphing times beganne to weare away, and all vnhappineſſe fell vpon the people of Iuda: For, his Sonne Achaz, ſur-named Eleazar, beeing come to the Crowne; gaue himſelfe to Idolatry, introducing the ceremonies and ſuperſtitions of the Pagans.

Pagane Ceremonies and ſuperſtitions brought into Iudea.

In regard whereof, God chaſtiſed them by the hand of Raſis, King of Suria; and Phezias king of Iſraell, who ſlaughtered (in one day) ſixe ſcore thouſand men. After which pittifull ouerthrow, they ranne thorow the Countrey of Iudea, robbing and ſpoyling it in lamentable manner; and becauſe Ieruſalem was ſtrong, it outſtoode the ſharpe beſiedging of theſe kings ſo long, til they deſpayring of their inſufficiency, were forced (vvith great ſummes of Golde) to buy their ſuccor of Salmanazar king of the Aſſyrians. And for the better ſatisfaction of him, they tooke the Veſſelles of Gold and Siluer, which onely were for the Temples ſeruice, to helpe them withall in this great diſtreſſe.

Ieruſalem redneed againe to diſtreſſe in woful maner.

Salmanazar beeing come to aſſiſt the king of Iuda, vanquiſhed and ouerthrew the king of Iſraell: and yet notwithſtanding, ledde away with him a great number of the Iewes priſoners, to whom he gaue the Region of Ithena to dwell in. And this was the firſt diſperſion and captiuitie of

The firſt diſperſion and captiuity of the Iewes.

of the Iewes, ſince their miraculous deliuerance out of Egypt: and in ſhort time after, the Aſſyrian king, compelled the King of Iſraell, euery yeare to pay them Tribute. At this very time, the Prophets Oſea, Eſay, Amos, Micheas and Ionas were in great reputation.

Ezechias the ſon to vnfortunate King Achaz, ſuccedeed in the kiugdom after his Father.

After the death of this vnfortunate Achaz, next came to the Crowne his ſon Ezechias, a man farre beyond the Nature of his Father; for, hee was wiſe, iuſt, religious, and one that feared God. Ieruſalem alſo (in his reigne) recouered once more her former credite; policy becomming better reformed, and the ſeruice of God reduced to ſuch perfection: that (as the Scripture it ſelfe amply declareth) the Realme of Iudah neuer had a better king; liuing in great proſperity, and honouring his Countrey, with many famous Victories.

His rooting vp of idolatry and warning giuen to the tenne Tribes.

Hee could not content himſelfe; with renting vp the rootes of Idolatry, whereto the people were ouer-much enclined; and bringing them entirely vnto the true ſeruice of God: but hee alſo gaue ſummons to the ten Tribes of Iſraell, to liue according to that Lawe, which God had deliuered by the hand of Moyſes. Whereunto many condiſcending, they came to Sacrifice in Ieruſalem, and to celebrate Eaſter, according vnto the ordinance of Moyſes.

Notwithſtanding, as the ſacred Scriptures doe teſtifye, the reſt perſeuered ſtill in their Idolatrie, and made a mockerie of thoſe gentle inuitations, as alſo the aduertiſements which the Prophets had giuen them. For which contempt, GOD layde his correcting roddes vppon them, aſwell by Salmanazar, as Senacherib, kings of the Aſſyrians, who oppreſſed them greatly, in the firſt yeare of King Ezechias his reigne.

Salmanazar and Senacherib, Gods ſcourges vnto the Iewes.

Alſo in the fourth yeare of the reign of Ozias, King of Iſraell, the Aſſyrian broght ſo heauy a warre againſt ſeuen Tribes of Iſrael, for the ſpace of three whole yeares: as he inforced them to forſake their countries, and to go dwell as ſlaues among the Medes.

The diſperſiō of the Iewes into ſtrange Countreyes.

Thus you ſee how the Iewes were diſperſed heere and there, among forrayne and ſtrange Nations, without euer returning againe home to their owne houſes, ſo that none knew what afterward ſhould become of them. For heere was the end and ruine of the kingdom of Iſrael, which had continued three hundred and ſeuenty yeares.

How the Samaritans firſt receiued that name.

On the contrarie, Salmanazar ſent his Aſſyrians into Samaria, to inhabite there; who (vſurpingly) got poſſeſſion of all the Countreyes (wherein the Iſraelites had formerly dwelt) and tooke the name of Samaritanes vpon them. Yet Euſebius taketh that name but as a Garriſon, wherein his opinion (me thinkes) is not warrantable: for they were called Samaritanes, after the name of Samaria, the chiefe and principall Citty of that Countrey. The Aſſyrians made a mixture of the Iewes Lawes with their Idolatries; yet held them in abhomination, as excommunicated people. As concerning their actions, I ſhall be ſilent therein, becauſe it no way concerneth my diſcourſe: and if heerein I haue committed any error, I ſubmit my ſelfe to the Churches correction.

The kingdom of Iuda remaining after the ruine of the Iſraelites.

After the ouerthrow and ruine of the Iſraelites, the Kingdome of Iuda onely remayned on foote: For the good King Ezechias, to ſaue his people from the fierce rage and furie of King Salmanazar, and to preſerue his owne dominions in peace; gaue him great ſummes of gold, buying (by that meanes) peace for long time. Neuertheleſſe, this Infidell King falſifyed his Fayth vnto him, and came with a mighty powerfull Armie, intending to ruinate the Kingdome of Iuda, as formerly hee had done the Kingdome of Iſraell. But GOD beeing pleaſed to defend his people, ſent the Prophet Eſay vnto King Ezechias to comfort him, (beecauſe this Prophet liued then) and in one night, the Angell of the Lorde, ſlew one hundred and foure ſcore thouſand fighting men in the Aſſyrians camp: by meanes of which great ſlaughter, the reſt retyred thence. And Ezechias, hauing eſcaped this dangerous perill to himſelfe, and his people, lyued the remainder of his dayes peacefully in his Kingdome. And God hauing euidently declared great Myracles, on the behalfe of this King, he dyed peaceably, leauing his Sonne Manaſſes ſucceſſour in his kingdome.

One hundred and fourſcore thouſand Aſſyrians ſlaine in one night.

This Prince wandered from the good wayes of his Father, and addicted himſelfe altogether to Idolatry, committing many moſt abhominable ſinnes, directly contrary to the Law of God, and thereto likewiſe induced the people. Whereat God growing offended, raiſed vp the Aſſyrians againſt him, who ſo well chaſtiſed him; that, ouer and beſide the ouerthrow of his people, himſelfe was taken priſoner, and ledde away captiue into Babylon. Notwithſtanding, he repented him of his ſinnes, which cauſed God to deliuer him out of the Aſſyrians hands; ſo that hee returned home to his owne eſtates, and dyed there in peace. After him, ſucceeded his wicked ſon Amon, who was ſlain moſt miſerably: the Prophets Ioel, Nahum, and Habbakuk ſucceeded in his time. Next him, came to the crowne his ſonne Ioſias, who was a Prince that feared God, & very vigilant for the reformation of his people; performing many other actions, rightly becomming ſo good and iuſt a King. For, he expulſed all idolatry quite out of his kingdom, which had taken deepe roote in the harts of men, and he repaird the Temple alſo. Neuertheleſſe, the anger of God againſt the Iewes was not appeaſed, in regard of the abhominable idolatries committed, in the reigns of the Kings Manaſſes & Amon. Notwithſtanding, in reſpect of King Ioſias, who (thorough his owne folly) dyed poorely; God deferred to chaſtiſe the Iewiſh people, in ſuch manner as he did afterward.

The deeds of the holy king Ioſias, repayring the Temple, and expelling idolatry out of his kingdome.

This king dyed of a wound, which hee receiued on the day that hee had agaynſt Necar, King of Ægypt, when hee might haue bin better imployed. For Necar had no matter of quarrell againſt him, but rather ſought his friendſhip ſo much as hee could; and hauing no other intention, but to imploy his forces againſt the King of Aſſyria. Neuertheleſſe, in a brauery of ſpirit, Ioſias would needs meddle with him, which coſt the deere price of his life. His death was very much bemoaned, eſpecially by the Prophet Ieremy, who wrote his Lamentations on his behalfe.

King Ioſias died of a wound needleſly receiud in fight.

The lamentations of the prophet Ieremie.

Ioachaz his ſon ſucceeded him, who was giuen to all iniquity and wickednes: wherfore God ſuffered him to reigne no more then three moneths: for Necar, who had before foyled his father, depriued him of his kingdome, making the countrey of Iudea tributary, paying an hundred Talents of Gold, and one of Siluer, euery yeare.

Ioachaz being thus defeated of his kingdome, and led priſoner into Ægypt, wher he dyed; Ioachim his Brother, was enſtalled in his place, behauing himſelfe verie wickedly; for hee was wholly affected to Idolatry, and prouoked his people to doe the like. In which reſpect, God ſtirred vp king Nabuchodonoſor to be his enemie, who had already reigned forty foure years in Babylon.

Ioachaz dyed a priſoner in Egypt, led thither in captiuitie.

This Prince hauing won the victorie againſt the Iewiſh people, ledde away the moſt part of the greateſt perſonnes in all the Countrey, as captiue ſlaues and Vaſſals, and tooke away alſo the Veſſelles of the Temple. The occaſion of this warre grew, becauſe Ioachim gaue ayde vnto the King of Ægypt, againſt Nabuchodonoſor, contrary to the counſell of Ieremy. Ioachim hauing reigned eleuen yeeres, and liued priſoner three yeeres, dyed in great pouerty.

King Nabuchodonoſor ouerthroweth the Iewiſh people.

After whom ſucceeded Iechonias, following the ſteppes of his Father, becauſe hee was as wicked as hee. In his time, God began to diſplay his rigorous rods of vengeance, prepared long time before againſt Ieruſalem, but deferred in the regard of Ioſias, according as the Prophets had foretold. For King Nabuchodonoſor came in his owne perſon, with an exceeding great and powerfull Armie, to beſiedge the Cittie of Ieruſalem: but, Iechonias beeing not able to make reſiſtance, ſubmitted vnto his will, himſelfe, his Mother, his Wife, and the principall perſonnes that were of his Houſe. Moreouer, hee made him a preſent, of the Veſſelles and Treaſures which remained (as yet) in the Temple. By which meanes, King Iechonias, and the cheefeſt men of his Court, were ledde away captiues into Babylon: But Nabuchodonoſor, tooke all the aſſurances and fidelitie of Mattathias, vncle to King Iechonias, and made him king of Iudea, calling him by the name of Sedechias.

The long deferred anger of god againſt Ieruſalem, now cometh to appearance in the war of Nabuchodonoſor.

In ſpeaking of this King, I muſt needs ſay, hee was one of the moſt Wicked and vnhappy Princes that euer reigned: For, not onely was hee ingratefull vnto Almightie GOD, for the great Graces which hee had beſtowed vppon him (turning ſtill his backe, and not willing to heare any thing which the Prophet Ieremy tolde him) but alſo did falſifie his word vnto King Nabuchodonoſor; who who had enſtalled him in the Kingdome, denying him his friendſhip. And if this Prince was no more worthy: much leſſe then were the ſacrificing Prieſts, and leaſt of all the common people: ſo that all abhominations and idolatries reigned in Iudea, euen to the prophanation of the Temple, which had beene held in ſuch ſacred eſteeme. And notwithſtanding all the aduertiſements giuen to this King, by Ieremie, Ezechiell, and other Prophets: yet his obſtinacy encreaſed daily more and more. Whereupon, God raiſed Nabuchodonoſor, who, to reuenge the wrongs done him by Sedechias; In the ninth yeare of his Reigne, he came and couered the Country of Iudea with a mighty Army, and held Ieruſalem beſiedged, the ſpace of two yeares, where King Sedechias had betaken himſelfe for his more ſecurity.

The warning giuen to this vngracious King, by Ieremy, Ezechiel, and other Prophets.

The poore people languiſhing with famine & peſtilence, were no longer able to endure the ſiedge; but being thus by extremity compelled, yeelded to the enemies mercy: when hee entring into the Citty, put all to fire and ſword. Sedechias was taken in his flight, and being brought before Nabuchodonoſor; ſaw his own children ſlaine before his face; and as for himſelfe, he had his eyes pluckt out, and ſent (in that miſerable maner) captiue to Babilon. After the Conqueror was returned home, he ſent to Ieruſalem Nabuzaradan, who was one of his principall Captaines, with eſpeciall charge, vtterly to ruinate the Temple. This was foure hundred yeares after the building thereof by King Salomon: as he performed the like, to all the Fortreſſes and ſumptuous buildings of Ieruſalem, beating downe the walles of the Citty, and defacing the Pallace belonging to the Kings of Iuda.

The wrath of God executed vpon King Sedechias & his Children.

The vtter ruine of the Tẽple of Ieruſalem.

Hee carried away alſo all the mettall that was in the Temple, and ledde thence the Sacrificers, and all the chiefe men, as well of Ieruſalem, as throughout the coũtry beſide, with their Wiues and Children; who continued Captiues in Babylon, for the ſpace of about threeſcore and ten yeares. This was the Captiuity of Babylon, which hath ſo much bene ſpoken of, and which happened about ſixe hundred yeares before the comming of our Lord and Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt. Thus you ſee, how the poore Citty of Ieruſalem remained deſert and deſolate, except ſome few of the meaner people, left behinde to till and husband the grounds: vnder the charge (neuertheleſſe) of Godolias, Deputy Gouernor in Iudea. But the people falling into mutiny, ſlew Godolias, and then fearing the fury of Nabuchodonoſor; ſuch as remained of the Iewes, went and dwelt in Egipt, leauing Ieruſalem waſte and vnpeopled.

The captiuity of the Iewes in Babilon, & how long it continued, as alſo the woful depopulation of the Citty.

S. Hierome ſaith, that after the ſurprizal and ſacking of Ieruſalem, there paſſed well neere fifty yeares, when neyther Man, Beaſt nor Bird entred into it: whereby may ſufficiently be knowne, what great puniſhments this people had deſerued, that were ſo highly beloued and priuiledged by God. Seauenty yeares being paſſed ouer, it pleaſed God with the eye of pitty, to looke vpon the Captiuity of his people: being then, when the Empire fell into the dominion of the Perſians, who thereof diſſeized the Aſſyrians, and in the time of the puiſſant King Cyrus. He, being moued by the Spirit of God, ſuffered fifty thouſand Iewes to returne home into their Country, vnder the conduct of Zerobabell their Captaine, and Ioſuah or Ieſus, the ſoueraigne Sacrificer or High-Prieſt: who beeing returned into Iudea, began to repaire the ruines of their Cities, and eſpecially Ieruſalem, which they re-builded with great ioy, offering ſacrifices to God, according to the Ordinances appointed in his Law.

CHAP. XXIX.

What difference there is betweene Leaſing and Lying; And how a man may tell a leaſing, and yet not to be ſaide, that it is a lye.

LYing, is one of the greateſt vices that any man can haue; for it is not any way poſſible to negotiate, or to conclude any matter, with him that is a lyar, becauſe lying maketh euery thing to be ſuſpected. Moreouer, the horrour of lying ſheweth it ſelfe ſufficiently, in that it is directly oppoſite to truth, which is God: as likewiſe the diuell is called the Father of lyes. Salomon (in his his Prouerbs) placeth lying in the second ranke, of the seauen vices greatly displeasing to God. In briefe, this vice hath (at all times) bene so abhorred both by Infidels and Christians; that a man knowne to be a lyar, was reputed as a plague to the Common-wealth, as we may perceiue in Euripides, according as is auouched by Stobeus.

How deteſtable a thing is lying, making men not to be credited when they ſpeake truth.

The hatred to lying, both by Infidels and Christians.

But not to make any longer stay, in shewing how pernitious and detestable a thing lying is, in regard that it is so common and vulgar: I take it as a matter conuenient, to declare what difference there is betweene leasing and lying, according to the saying of Aulus Gellius, and of many other Authors more; for oftentimes, there is a great diffrence in these two bad qualities. Obserue we then to this effect, that to tell a lye, is to affirme the contrary, of that which a man knoweth to bee true. But telling a fallacie or leasing, is to affirme lying, with an intention to speake truth: wherein a man cannot be saide to haue lyed, when he speaketh not against that which he holdeth for truth, & knoweth it so to be.

The difference betweene lying & telling a leasing.

Contrariwise, a man may lye, and yet (notwithstanding) tell trueth, when hee speaketh against that which hee thinketh, although that which he hath said, be true. But when a man vttereth a leasing, knowing the thing it selfe to be otherwise then as he hath said; hee lyeth, and then it is a direct lye. From hence it ensueth, that it is impossible to tell a lye without vice or sinne: but he that speaketh a leasing, thinking to say the truth, lyeth not at all. This is that which Nigidius saith, according to the expression of Gellius: That an honest man will neuer lye, and a wise man hates to tell a leasing. For mine owne opinion heerein, I would aduise all men to auoyde both the one and other vice, although they may imagine to speake truely.

How a man may lye in speaking truth.

Aul. Gellius in lib. 1. cap. 9.

Heere it is to be noted, that although the tongue keepe silence, yet deeds sometimes may belye the person. For as Saint Ambrose saith: He which makes profession of being a Christian, without conforming himselfe to the works of Christ, lieth, or is a lyar. As also that man doth, which makes a solemne promise to obserue Religion, and yet notwithstanding, obserueth none at all. As much may we say of some vgly women, as black as faire diuels, who paint & paint to get them better faces, and look therby worse thē euer they did: And foolish olde men, that would be yong againe by fantasticke meanes.

Ambr in Serm. de Cena Dom.

Of such lyars there are no meane store in the world.

I remember an old man, of whom Theophrastus speaketh, who being of great authority and credite, and hauing some important businesse before the Lacedemon Senate; was very much greeued, to appeare there in such antiquity of yeares as he was stept into; which made him to cut and shaue his head and beard, hoping by this meanes to seeme much younger. As the cause was in debating, Archidamus (speaking for his Clyent, against him) declared to the Senate, that no credit ought to be giuen to the words of him, that apparantly carried lying in his head & face. So that, according to Archidamus, such aged fooles can lye, without speaking any words.

A pleasant history of an ydle-headed olde man, before the Senate of Lacedemon.

CHAP. XXX.

Of the twelue Moneths in the yeare; how both Ancients and Moderne men vsed to figure them: And of some mysteries represented by them.

NO great mystery consisteth in knowing the signification of the twelue Moneths by their figures. Neuertheless, considering that few or none haue written of them, in our vulgar tongue: I am the more willing to take a little paines, in acquainting some particular friends, that by looking vpon their portraitures, they may the better reach to their interpretation.

An argument discoursed by few or none.

First of all then, beginning with Ianuary, it was presented by a man seated at a Table, holding a Glasse of Wine in his hand, as being ready to drinke. Whereby was intended, that in this Moneth, all creatures haue better appetite and desire to eate and drink, then at any other time: because heat is retired inward, & strengthneth the stomacke in such sort, that it is capable of the easier digestion.

Ianuary.

February, was a mā heating his hands about his own body: for in this month, fire is

is very requiſite, in regard of the great coldes in Winter, cauſed by the abſence of the Sunne.

March. March, was figured in form of a Gardiner: becauſe (in this Moneth) the pores and ſpiracles of the earth, do open themſelues, inſomuch, that the moiſture of the earth commeth (of it owne accord) to all the Trees, Hearbs and Plants. In which reſpect, all ſuperfluities are to bee cut away, that the nutritiue humour may extend it ſelfe to the liuing Branches, for bearing the fairer fruite.

Aprill. Aprill, was made in the ſhape of a young man, holding a Noſegay of flowers in his hand: for in this Moneth, the earth hauing communicated his vertue to Trees and Hearbs, maketh euery thing to flouriſh, and bring foorth Flowers.

May. For May, a yong gallant Gentleman was portraited, being mounted on horſebacke, and brauely apparelled, bearing a Hawke vpon his Fiſt. Conſidering, that in this Moneth, the Trees commonly begin to beare fruite. Birds flye abroad merrily, and all creatures ſtriue to haue their beſt pleaſures, and make loue to one another.

Iune. Iune, was painted, carrying a Scythe on his backe; becauſe in this Moneth, the Medowes muſt be mowed downe.

Iuly. Iuly, carried a Sickle in his hand, where-with to reape downe the ripened Corne.

Auguſt. And becauſe theſe Fruites are commonly to bee gathered in Auguſt, and then they are to be laide and lockt vp in Barnes and Garners: Auguſt was figured like to a Country Carter, ſtanding by his laden Cart, with a whip in his hand, as haſtening homeward with his ſheaues of Corne.

September September, was in the habite of a Vintager; as thereby ſignifying, that the beginning of Vintage is to bee in this Moneth.

October. October, was figured like a husbandman, carrying a Sack vpon his ſhoulders, and ſowing Corne as hee paſſeth along. Meaning thereby, that as this Moneth is colde and dry; ſo is it very apt and conuenient, for the ſowing of Seede.

Nouember. Nouember ſtood in the ſhape of a Thraſher, labouring his Flayle vpon the Corne in the ſheaues. He had another companion ſtanding by him, who with a pole did beate downe the Acornes from the Trees, becauſe in this Month, Acorns ſerue beſt to fatten Swine; and then alſo they ordinarily kill Swine, for making Bacon.

December. December ſtood in the likeneſſe of a Butcher, with a knife in his hand, and killing a Hog. Thus were the twelue Moneths vſually figured.

The Yeare. As for the yeare it ſelfe, they made the modell thereof, in the reſemblance of a Serpent, writhed into a roundle, & holding the tayle in the mouth: becauſe the end of the yeare euermore is ioyned with the beginning.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of a ſtrange Coniuration or Conſpiracy, which happened in the goodly Citty of Florence, and of the ſlaughter which enſued thereon.

It is the common affection of all men to liſten after nouelties.

ALL the World is naturally deſirous to heare and vnderſtand the greateſt enterprizes, and ſuch ſtrange accidents as happen to men: to the ende, that they may the better defend themſelues, from falling into ſuch inconueniences, as waite vpon inconſtant and mutable Fortune. And therefore I concluded with my ſelfe, to relate a very rare and admirable chance, which happened in the wealthy Citty of Florence, and which (in mine opinion) is one that deſerueth as much meruaile, as any other that euer I heard of.

The ſumptuous and flouriſhing eſtate of Florence in thoſe times

In the yeare, 1478. the Citty of Florence was in great peace, abounding (day by day) in ſumptuouſneſſe and riches; and the affayrs of the Common-wealth holding on ſuch a proſperous courſe, that no imagination was ſo idle, as to thinke, that any misfortune had the power to alter this happineſſe. In thoſe Sun-ſhine dayes, the illuſtrious houſe of Medicis (of whom the Duke was Coſimo, and all the Dukes of Florence to this day are deſcended) gouerned the ſaid State and Common-wealth: ſo that all affaires paſſed through the hands and intelligence of the two Lords, Iuliano and Laurentio de Medi-

Iuliano and Laurentio de Medices, both Brethren.

cis,

cis, Brethren; who were highly eſteemed among the people, in regard of their Anceſtours, and eſpecially for Coſimo de Medicis their Grand-father, who had beene the onely and richeſt Merchant of Italy; althogh that in Florence wer very wealthy Merchants beſide.

Emulation & hart-burning in ſome againſt the Medicis, in regard of their authoritie.

Now there were (at this time) in the ſaide Citty, many other Gentlemen and rich Merchants, who thought themſelues euery way as ſufficient, to manage and order the Common-wealths affaires; as thoſe that were of the houſe of Medici. Neuertheleſſe, the Medici ſtill had the great opinion, being euery day reſpected, hayled and louingly entertained of the people. In the ende, the houſe of the Pazzi, Saluiati, and many other, iſſued of Noble and ancient Families in Florence (being moued by paſſion and particular affection (coupled with innated enuy, which they bare to them of the Medicis) contriued a ſecret complot, whereby to take the Common-wealths gouernment from the Medici. And this their intent could not be accompliſhed, without the death of Iuliano and Laurentio de Medicis, becauſe they were rich and potent Lords.

The death cõtriued of Iuliano & Laurentio de Medicis.

Franceſco and Giouanni de Pazzi, Couſins-germaine to Giacomo de Pazzi, and cheefeſt men of that houſe, vndertooke to kill the ſaid Brethren of the Medici, and ioyned with them the Family of the Saluiati, eſpecially Signior Franceſco Saluiati, Archbiſhop of Piſa, and they vndertooke to kill Pope Sixtus the fourth, Vnckle to them of the Medici, & likewiſe Ferdinando, King of Naples, whom they had conſtrained into their league: all verily perſwaded, that being rid of them, they ſhould not meete with any reſiſtance in the execution of their purpoſe.

The combination for a moſt horrible murder.

This complot fully agreed vpon, and all things prouided to fit their enterprize accordingly; the Archbiſhoppe of Piſa came to Florence, where (vnder another colour) they entred into roule a number of Soldiours, all well knowne: yet without diſcouering to any one, what was to be done. The Archbiſhop of Piſa, of whom neuer any doubt was conceiued, practiſed ſuch meanes, that a young Cardinall Nephew to Pope Sixtus (who then ſtudied at Bologna) ſhould come to paſſe the time a while at Florence, to fitte their turne (in the action) with him and his people, yet neuer acquainting him with a thought of the intention.

A liſt of Soldiours prepared for the purpoſe.

Order being taken for all occaſions, and euery thing kept cloſe in the boſomes of the principall conſpirators, the concluſion was thus; that the two Brethren de Medici ſhould be ſlaine together, eyther in the great Church, or elſe where the Cardinall ſhould heare Maſſe. Franceſco de Pazzi, and Bernardo Bandino, tooke charge of killing the Lord Iuliano de Medicis: but the death of the Lord Laurentio, was committed to Antonio de Volterra, and to another, called Stephano, being a Prieſt. The houre or moment, aſſigned by Giacomo de Pazzi, for the execution of theſe two murders, was at ſuch time, as the Prieſts ſhold be at the eleuation in Maſſe, holding the Hoaſt or Sacrifice aloft aboue his head, although the two brethren then were in diuers places.

The appointment how the maſſacre ſhould be performed, & by what perſons.

The ſignall for the deed to be done.

Vpon the Sunday following, which was the third of May, 1478. this concluſion tooke effect thus. The Cardinall came to heare Maſſe, and with him the Lord Laurentio de Medicis, without his brother. For they vſed to walke (as men ſuſpecting ambuſhes) ſildome or neuer together in the Citty, for feare of falling into any diſaſter together: knowing right well, that no man durſt make an attempt offenſiuely vpon them, if one of the two were left aliue. The conſpirators perceiuing that Lord Iuliano came not at all; Franceſco de Pazzi, and Bernardo Bandino (who had ſworne his death) vnder the ſhaddow of Courtly attendance, went to come along with him from his houſe, and beſtowed ſo many embraſſadoes vpon him, that they brought him vnto the Church where his Brother was, and yet hee then ſate farre enough off from his Brother. Conſpiring eyes were ſtill fixed on them both, enuying that they ſhould ſitte ſo farre aſunder: but yet the time and place gaue thẽ courage, that they might eaſily accompliſh the acte; and yet not be proſecuted by any, for few or none tooke notice of them.

A care in the two brethren, to preuent miſchiefe.

Ceremonious Courtſhip, many times makes way to diuelliſh practiſes.

The point for performance being come, Franceſco de Pazzi gaue a ſtabbe with his poniard to the Lord Iuliano, which thwarted the ſtomacke, and iſſued foorth at his ſhoulder, ſo that immediately he fel down dead: and Bernardo Bandino, by making haſte (leaſt Lord Iuliano ſhold not be thorowly ſped) wounded himſelfe with his owne owne Dagger in the ſtomacke, albeit hee ſaw the Lord Iuliano lye dead before him. There dyed alſo Franceſco Nori, ſlaine by Bernardo Bandino, becauſe he laid hand on his weapon, in the defence of Lord Iuliano. Antonio Volterra, and Stephano the Prieſt, ſharply aſſayled the Lord Laurentio de Medicis, but yet with ſuch ſlender dexterity; that vſing his owne couragious defence, hee was wounded a little in the mouth, and (in deſpight of all they could do) by meanes of certaine friends, he got into the Sacriſtia or Veſtrie, and there ſaued himſelfe from their fury.

Lord Laurentio ſaued his life in the Veſtry.

This aſſault was ſo ſudden, that it had ſpeedier execution, then any knowledge could be had of them that acted it: for ſuch was the cry of the people, as if the Church had fallen to the earth. The Cardinall had worke enough to doe, to get himſelfe free, and in ſafety to the high Altar. All the Citty was vp in a furious vprore; for ſome cryed out, that the two Brethren de Medici were ſlaine, & others ſaide no, putting themſelues preſently in Armes. They of the houſes of Pazzi and Saluiati, began aloud to cry, Liberty, Liberty, ſo that the Seigneury reſorted to the great Pallace with all diligence, where the Gonfaloniero ioyning with them, they fortified themſelues with armed men in the houſe. The Councellors of the Cittie, and ſuch as tooke part with the Medici, went to ſeeke for the Lord Laurentio; conducting him home to his own houſe, where ſtood readily prepared, aboue eight thouſand armed men.

The young Cardinall hardly ſaued himſelfe.

The whole Siegneury run in haſte to the pallace.

As for the Archbiſhop of Piſa, hee purſuing on ſtill the point with the Saluiati, being accompanied with many of their league, and ſuch as were the Cardinals followers; rode directly vnto the Pallace, with intent to make their meaning well liking to the Seigneury. The Lords of the Seigneury, although they tooke part with the houſe of Medici; yet notwithſtanding they were ſo preſſed, as they had not any leyſure, for making any Armed prouiſion, nor to appoint a Garriſon for the Pallace. Yet they knew well enough, that Lord Laurentio was not much hurt, and that he had men about him valiant & hardy.

The Arch-Biſhop of Piſa rideth to the Pallace, to conferre with the Seigneury.

The Archbiſhop perceiuing, that the Seigneury had no leyſure to take a reſolution, in ſome matters that he would haue propounded to them: diuided the traine of his followers into two Companies, appointing one part of them to keep poſſeſſion of the Pallace Gates. Hee, with the other company, aſcended vp into the Pallace, and made it knowne to the Seigneury, that he had ſome what to acquaint them withall, for generall benefit of the Common-wealth. Whereupon, he being admitted in, with ſome few of his people, that knew no part of his vile purpoſe: the Gates of the Pallace were made ſo ſtrongly faſt; that the Archbiſhop could haue no ſuccor of his followers, nor the Lords of the Seigneury themſelues haue any aſſiſtance. So loudly did the Archbiſhop deliuer his minde, ſpeaking of matters in ſuch vnorderly manner; that the Seigneurie (well vnderſtanding his bad intention) commanded the Gonfaloniero to take hold of him, as alſo of Giacoma Saluiati, and Giacomo, the ſonne of Meſſier Poggio de Pazzi. And ſo vnruly grew the tumult, that all their attendants were inſtantly ſlaine in the fury, and thirty dead bodies throwne out of the Pallace windowes, vpon the heads of them that were beneath in the Court.

The Arch-Biſhop admitted to ſpeake with the Seigneury.

The Arch Biſhop ſeized on, and his followers moſt of them ſlaine.

Within a while after, the common people, who greatly fauoured them of the Medici, ranne in huge heapes and crowds to the Pallace: where all the other part of the Archbiſhops men (that had the truſt of keeping the Pallace Gates) were taken and ſlaine preſently, without any reſpect vſed towards them. As for the Arch-Biſhop, and his two friends with him; they were hanged in the Market-place, to cauſe more terrour in the reſt. Giacomo de Pazzi, and diuers other of the Conſpirators, rode vp and downe through the Citty, crying Liberty, Liberty: but perceiuing none to make them anſwer, as leaning rather to the part of Lord Laurentio; they thought to ſaue themſelues by flight. Only Bernardo Bandino excepted, who lay in his bed very ſicke, by paine of the wound which he had giuen himſelfe; ſo that hee was not able to ſit on horſebacke, or come come abroad out of his Chamber.

The other part of the Archbiſhops attendants ſlaine, & himſelfe hanged.

By this time the whole Citty was vp in Armes, to defend the cauſe of the Lord Laurentio, who extremely greeued, for the death of Lord Iuliano his Brother: cauſing ſeuere purſuite afrer the Conſpirators, ſo that many, who were but meerely ſuſpected suspected in the case, could not escape, although no matter was prooued against them; but no knowne offender could any way be spared. The young Cardinall, Nephew to the Pope, was kept prisoner in the Pallace, with very great perill of his life: but at length, his innocence being truely knowne, he was acquitted; continuing (neuertheless) long time prisoner.

Bernardo Bãdino hanged vp starke naked by the Archbishop.

Bernardo Bandino, was ledde starke naked to the Pallace, and so hanged vp, next to the Archbishop. As for Antonio de Volterra, and Stephano the Priest, who should haue slaine the Lord Laurentio: they were trodden to death among the rude multitude, that ranne euery where in the Citty, crying Medicis, Medicis, burning and pulling downe all their houses, whom they knew to be of the contrary Faction. In briefe, the disorder was such, and so confused, as it exceeded the capacity of writing; especially the furies and cruelties, committed in this horrid tempest.

Seuerity of law inflicted on the bloody offenders.

Giacomo de Pazzi, was taken in his flight, & brought back to Florence: where he was hanged or strangled, and his body being cut in peeces, was after buried in prophane ground; all his lands & goods (which being of great value) were confiscated, and adiudged to the Seigneuries possession. And after condigne punishment inflicted vpon the malefactors, the body of Lord Iuliano was most honourably buried, and with very solemne Funerall pompe.

A briefe suruay of the conspiracy, & the maine actors therein, with some other accidẽts that followed thereon.

Such issue had the Coniuration of the Pazzi, which was a matter very strange. For, in lesse then three houres, the Lord Iuliano de Medicis (an extraordinary rich man) was slaine; the Archbishop of Pisa hanged, with some other of his confederates, and the houses of the aduerse part vtterly destroyed. Pope Sixtus, and Ferdinando, King of Naples, conceiued such a spleene against this action at Florence: that they (together) leuyed a powerfull Army against the Florentines, who (with the aid of their friends) defended themselues so well; that no other aduantage was due to the disturbers, but that the war was long, and very cruell, great effusion of blood happening on eyther side. Behold the poore and vnfortunate issue of these conspirators, who thinking to winne honour, and high degrees by indiscreete meanes: lost their liues, dissoynted the peace and vnity of their Country, and made their enemy much mightier then before, for Lord Laurentio de Medicis gouerned Florence so long as he liued.

CHAP. XXXII.

A very remarkable and worthy Historie, deliuering in true and briefe discourse, the life and memorable actions of that famous Captaine, commonly called, Castruccio Castracagnio.

Castruccio Castracagnio, a Captaine of much fame and merit, in my poore opinion, may be rancked among the greatest and most renowned Captaines of the world: considering the pouerty of his originall, and the slender meanes he had, without the fauours of any, compared also with those strange trauerses, which Fortune put vppon him. Wherein I may well say, that very few Captaines or Generals are to bee found, who with so poore & imperfect furnishment; did euer reach to those honours and estates, as this our Castruccio Castracagnio attained. Wherefore, I thought it no disparagement vnto our precedent best subiects, that his Historie should make one among them: not purposing to vse any larger dilation therein, then already I haue obserued in the rest, because it shall suffice me, summarily to report the courage of this Captaine.

It is not pouerty of birth that hindreth the merite of any well-deseruing man.

Here the Author briefely discourseth the originall of Castruccio Castracagnio, & in what manner he was found.

Beginning then with his originall, which was very strange, you are to vnderstand, that in Luca, a Citty of no meane fame in Italy, there was a Chanon belonging to the Church of S. Michaell, named Messire Antonio Castracagnio, who had a sister (of his owne) liuing with him, being a very honest and vertuous woman. Close ioyning to this Chanons house, was a little Close or Field of * Antines, which was plentifully furnished with variety of fruitfull Trees, as is the manner vsed in Italy. The sister to this Chanon (by fortune) going one morning into this Close, to gather some Hearbs for her vse, without dreming on any such matter as after happned: as she was gathering Hearbs heere and and there, heard a small voyce, as if it were of some new borne babe. And walking that way where she heard the cry; among the leaues and young bourgeons of the Vines, was an infant laide, appearing to bee very lately before borne, tenderly crying, as desiring aide in that wofull distresse.

The widdow brought the Babe to her Brother the Chanon.

The good widdow, somewhat sadly moued at the beginning of this aduenture, yet prouoked by a womans louing compassion: carried in the tender childe, & shewed it to the Chanon her brother; who being amazed at so strange an accident, and yet ouercome with Christianlike pitty, determined to prouide nursing for the Babe. And in regard that it was a manchilde, hee gaue it the name of his owne Father, calling him Castruccio. When the Nurse was come, he caused it to be nourished as if it had bee the his owne: & after growing to a great boy, sent him to schoole, with full intention of surrendring his Chanons place to him. But when the Lad grew to 14. yeares of age, Learning and Bookes was the least part of his care, for he was no way addicted to letters, but rather delighted in handling of a sword: and in regard that he was very actiue of body, he gaue himselfe greatly to leaping, dancing, & wrastling with other strong Lads like himself. Speaking al in a word, he was so dexterious in whatsoeuer he did; as none of his companions could equall him, but Castruccio becãe respected in euery eye.

He called the childe after the name of his owne Father.

Young Castruccio not addicted to learning, but to manly exercises onely

It so fortuned, that Captaine Francesco Guiniguo, a man much renowned, for worthy actions of Armes performed by him in Lombardy, was then at Luca. He hearing such report of young Castruccio, & seeing him bold & brauely spirited; found meanes to haue him in his seruice. And Castruccio being now where he best desired, became (in lesse then fiue yeares) so expert a Souldior, as his like was not to be found, as well on horse as foot: for he could so cunningly manage any horse, that Caualcadore of Italie hardly came neere him.

The first entertainment of young Castruccio in seruice.

Being come to the age of 18. yeares, Captaine Guiniguo, his Master, departed thence for Millaine, in aide of the Viscontines, who were in Armes against the Thuriani, and many other Millaine Gentlemen. He tooke Castruccio along with him, who caried him selfe so valiant and wisely in this war; that hee bare away the fame from all the Soldiors in the Campe. This war lasted fiue or sixe yeares, which being ended by peace or truce; Captaine Guiniguo returned to Luca, with his Castruccio, wher he was most kindly embraced by euery one, as well in general as particular, in regard of the good report noised euery where of him. So that more account was made of him, then of Guiniguo his Master; for hee was so humane and courteous to euery man, that affection increased towards him daily more & more.

Castruccio his first going with his Master to warre seruice at Millaine.

Within a short while after, Captaine Guiniguo feeling himselfe sicke, & in some danger of death; gaue the tutelage & gouernement of Pagola his sonne, to his man Castruccio. In which charge, Castruccio carried himselfe so faithfully, that so long as he liued, he had at his command the affairs of Pagola, euen as if hee had bene his owne sonne. After the decease of Captaine Guiniguo, the credite and reputation of Castruccio wonderfully augmented. Neuertheless, because he was very fiery, impatient and vindicatiue, when any wrong had bene done vnto him: the men of Luca began to grow suspitious, that he purposed to make himselfe Lord of Luca, and not without some pregnant occasion; in which respect, the Seigneury commanded him to auoide the City. Which disgrace Castruccio so much distasted, that he resolued to be reuenged, euen with the ruine and confusion of his head-strong enemies. At this very time, the Factions of the Guelphes and Gibelines reigned powerfully in Italy; and euen thẽ also, the lord Hugo Fagiuola was in some command, who being possessed of the Seigneury of Pisa; Castruccio practised (by insinuation) to compasse grace & fauour with this Lord Fagiuola, & therfore complotted with the Gibelines, to make Figiuola Lord of Luca. Working this traine on secretly, he preuailed so well with some of his friends in the City: that (at an appointed instant) he won a Port of Luca. By means whereof, the Gibelines entred, with such succor as the Lord Fagiuola had giuen them, expulsing thence the Guelphes, after they had done their very vttermost they could.

Castruccio credited with the guardianship of his Masters sonne

He is commãded by the Seigneury to auoide Luca.

Castruccio complotteth against the City of Luca, by meanes of the diffrence betweene the Guelphes and Gibelines.

Castruccio was now in greater esteeme thẽ euer, & in such sort, as he was held to be the Lord of Luca, although he was inferior to the lord Fagiuola, to whõ he made recourse in times of necessity. The Florentines, who deadly despighted Castruccio, vnderstãding the successe of his affaires; leuied a great Army, by helpe of such as were in league with thẽ, purposing to ouer-run Castruccio.

Castruccio reputed the Lord of Luca.

The Florentines sought he death of Castruccio.

But Lord Fagiuola and Castruccio, disposed so well for the meeting with them, that the warre grew to be very cruell & bloody. Concerning men of name in the Florentines Campe, there was among them Don Pedro, Brother to Robert, King of Naples, accompanied with Don Carolo his Nephew, sonne to Phillip. But the vertue of Lord Fagiuola and Construccio, serued wel to counterpoise the greatnes of the other. After that this war had continued for some space of time, the Lord Fagiuola receiued intelligence, that there had hapned a great commotion at Pisa, in redresse whereof, Lord Fagiuola was faine to leaue the Armies conduct wholy to Castruccio: who behaued himselfe so wisely and valiantly in this great trust, that after many sallies and light skirmishes, hee came to battaile with the Florentines. Castruccio maintained the fight with such good order and iudgement, that (although he was the most obstinate mā that euer was born in Italy) yet notwithstanding, the victory remained to him, and the slaughter was so great, that there were slaine aboue tenne thousand Florentines, among whom, Don Pedro and Don Carolo his Nephew, were found in number with the dead. Which victory, assured to the Lord Fagiuola, all those estates (held by him) in farre better security, and enlarged the credite and reputation of Castruccio, beyond all common expectation.

The Army left wholly to Castruccioes gouernment

Castruccio winneth the victory gainst the Florentines, Don Pedro & Don Carolo slaine

Winter being come, Castruccio returned to Luca, by the command of Lord Fagiuola, towards whom he shewed himselfe very obedient. But, as it is a customary case, that wealth and great honors doe cause feare and enuy: so the Lord Fagiuola, perceiuing the credite of Castruccio to encrease daily more and more: determined his death, in recompence of all the worthy seruices he had done him. To effect this dishonourable businesse; he sent one of his sonnes to Luca, who caused Castruccio to be committed prisoner, vnder pretence, of some secret blame imposed vpon him. But the imprisonment of Castruccio was so offensiue to the Lucanes; that the people began to mutiny against their Lord Fagiuola: who hauing aduertisement thereof, left Pisa, and marched thether with a potent Army.

Lord Fagiuola concludeth the death of Castruccio dishonorably

The Lucanes reuolt from Lord Fagiuola.

But there hapned to him a very strange accident, and yet no more then hee iustly deserued for his vnmanly dealing. When the Pisanes were aduertised, that Castruccio was deteined as a prisoner; they began so to stomacke the matter, that they slew the Gouernor, whom Lord Fagiuola had left as his Deputy, and all such as were to do him any seruice; so that they enfranchized themselues from the tyranny of Fagiuola. He receiuing intelligence of this mishap, and that (by this meanes) his returne to Pisa was bard vp against him: pursued on his purpose, to make all sure and safe at Luca. But therin he proued likewise as vnfortunate as at Pisa, for the Pisanes had informed the Lucanes of their affaires, and with such speedy diligence; that the Poste frō the Pisanes arriued at Luca, much sooner then the Lord Fagiuola could do.

The Gouernor of Pisa slaine by the people, and intelligence sent by them to the Lucans

Hereupon, the Lucanes put thēselues in Armes, so that they expulsed the sonne of Fagiuola out of Luca, with absolute purpose, of allowing no entrance to the Father; but gaue freedome to Castruccio, in meere despight of him. Yet some say, that Fagiuola entred Luca, & very quickly was expelled thence; when losing all hope of recouering his estates, he was glad to saue himselfe by flight into Lombardy. But be it howsoeuer, this I am sure of, that hee lost his dominion ouer both the Cities in one day: which he might safely haue enioyed stil, if he had but kept faire friendship with Castruccio: who being thus set at liberty, was elected Captaine and General of the Lucanes, by free consent of the whol Seigneury. In which authority he being loath to liue idle, leuyed a great Army, wherewith hee recouered many strong Holds from the Florentines, which they had long vsurped from the Lucanes: taking diuers other of their owne beside, in despight of their best Forces, albeit they were strong indeed. Castruccio returning then to Luca, was there most honourably welcomed in regard of his worthy victories obtayned, and created absolute Lord of Luca. From which time forward, hee became much feared of the neighbours round about, especially the Florentines, who were the most powerfull in all Tuscany: For, he had many wars against them, and tooke many Forts and Castles from them, yea, and ouerthrew them in a plaine fielde of Battaile, equally appointed on either side.

The Lucanes rise in Armes against Fagiuola, and exclude his son.

Castruccio made Generall of Luca by common consent.

He was created sole Lord of Luca, and became much dreaded.

As thus the fortunes of Castruccio grew daily better and better, the Emperor Fredericke

The Emperor Frederick desired to haue the seruice of Castruccio.

ricke came into Italy, to be crownd Emperor there: wher being enstructed of the many good parts remaining in Castruccio, hee laboured greatly to win him to his seruice. Castruccio then leauing Pagola Guiniguo (of whom he had thus long beene Tutour) as his Lieutenant to gouern Luca: went to see the Emperor Frederick, whom he followed so far as Rome. Some hold, that he came thither before the Coronation; but, after the Emperors return into Germany, Castruccio preuailed so well by good means, that they of Pisa chose him to be their Prince. Which newes being brought to Rene, King of Naples (his old heauy enemy) he begã to grow doubtfull of Castruccio, and perceiuing his power to encrease so greatly: hee made a league with the Florentines against Castruccio, intending now to see the vtter ruine of him, and recouery of all the honors appertaining to him.

Castruccio chosen Prince of Pisa, and enuied by the King of Naples.

Hereupon, the King of Naples & the Florentines prepared a strong army, which was so manfully encountred by Castruccio; that euermore he had the better of thẽ, althogh with great expence of blood, and recouery of many places from them: so that the Florentines were meerely enforced, to craue a truce for certaine time; during which respite, Castruccio largely increased his power. For, as they of * Pistorium were in diffrence one with another within the Towne: Castruccio shouldred in (during their ciuill dissention) and possessed himselfe of Pistoriũ, and all other places subiected to that Citty.

The King of Naples & the Florentines foyled by Castruccio.

* A Citty in the midst of Tuscia.

The Florentines seeing themselues more and more in daily dangers, endeuoured by al the best meanes they could deuise, to gather people from all parts, onely to breake the Forces of Castruccio, or else to driue him out of Pistorium. In which respect, the supplies which came to them, as well from the Kingdome of Naples, as other places more remote, were so great; that vpon the musters account, they were numbred to be 40000. men. Seeing then, that they had so goodly an Army, they began their march directly towards Pistorium, where Castruccio had his Campe, consisting of far fewer people then the Florentines. Neuertheless, he guided his war so wisely, vsing so many surprizals, skirmishes and encounters, that successe attended vpon him continually.

An Army of forty thousand men leuied by the Florentines against Castruccio.

In the end, comming to the day of battaile, he proceeded therein with such good order, that he vanquished the Florentines: in which ouerthrow was great slaughter made, and store of rich booty taken, for all the cheefest of the Florentines were eyther slaine, or taken prisoners. Castruccio himselfe being wounded, and a great number of his men slaine; yet all this could not a iote daunt his courage, but still he pursued vpon his victory, marching in all haste with his Army against * Partum, which he tooke very speedily, as also all the Castles and Townes thereabout. So that (without any resistance) he went and placed his Campe within two miles of Florence, whereat the Florentines were not a little amazed.

The Florentines ouerthrowne in a day of set battaile, by Castruccio.

* A faire town in Tuscany.

As hee was essaying all meanes for his entrance into Florence, hee receiued aduertisement, that the Pisanes were practising some matter to his disaduantage: so that, leauing his intent for Florence, he returned to Pisa a triumphant Conqueror. After he had inflicted punishment vpon the mutiners, he went to visite all the neighbouring parts, taking order for all needfull occasions beseeming warre: becausse he was well assured, neuer to continue long in peace, without some imployment for warre.

He encamped within two miles of Florence, & was called thence by a mutiny at Pisa.

The Florentines, mightily confounded by their peoples ouerthrow, and losse beside of so many Towns: freely gaue themselues to the King of Naples, promising him a yearely tribute of two hundred thousand Crownes. The King of Naples accepted the Florentines offer, and sent Don Carolo his sonne to their assistance, with the most part of the Cauallery and Infantery that hee could command; and the like did some other Citties of Italy, who stood all in feare of Castruccioes Forces: so that now the Army of the Florentines consisted of tenne thousand horse, and thirty thousand foote. With this powerfull preparation (perswading themselues, that Castruccio durst not come into the fielde) they intended to besiedge Pisa; but Castruccio, who was one of the most valiant & politique Generals, that the whole world then afforded, went forth to meete them, attended only with 4000. horse, and 20000. foote, but all in excellent Military order. As these two Camps began to draw neere each other, there passed diuers skirmishes in the plaine field, wherin continually Castruccio had the best. Finally, Castruccio seeking opportunity, to deliuer battaile to the Florentines: passed ouer the Foord at the Riuer of * Arno, and found the Florentines in such disorder, as he compeld thẽ to accept the battel; wherin was a great slaughter on both sides, but yet the victory fell to Castruccio; twenty thousand Florentines being slain in the field, beside two thousand prisoners taken: among whom was Don Carolo, sonne to the King of Naples, and many other Commanders of name. And assuredly (without all question to the contrary) considering this last great victory, which Castruccio had against the Florentines: he might not onely haue conquered Florence it selfe, but likewise no meane part of Italy beside.

But heere may bee apparantly obserued, how weake and feeble the strength of man is; for a Glasse is no sooner crackt & shiuerd, then a mans best might, when Gods assistance giueth him ouer. Castruccio, following his fortune vpon the spurre, and hauing made the surprizall before remembred; rode coasting along the Riuer of Arno like a worthy Generall, to rallire all his people together. And being sore wearied and ouer-sweated, (for he had fought all the day) the fresh coolenesse, or dampe of the Riuer smote him inwardly, that the night following, he fell into a Quotidian Feauer, whereof (no doubt as God had appointed) he dyed on the seuenth day after, being then in the very flower of his time.

Castruccio fel sicke of a Quotidian Feauer, and dyed within seauen dayes following.

Surely, had this Castruccio bene a Natiue of Rome, or Athens, as he was of Luca, where he was borne, without knoledge of Father or Mother; Or had he beene brought vp in the Kings Court of Macedon: he had greatly blemished the renown of Scipio, Phillip, yea, and Alexander the Great. Notwithstanding (a Lucane borne as he was) had hee liued a longer date of yeares, which his youth and ablenes made faire promise of: hee had equalled any of them in richnesse of fame. But returning to our History, Castruccio made Pagola Guiniguo his heyre; albeit some say, that he had Children of his owne, whom he instituted to bee his heyres. But be it howsoeuer, as he got his estate & wealth by manhood and valour: his successours lost all by lewdnesse and negligence, if we may credite Aretine, Blondus, Toninus & Macchiauell.

CHAP. XXXIII.

A Discourse concerning the Windes: And of their seuerall names, as well Ancient, as Moderne.

THE Windes, according as Seneca saith, are very meete and necessary for the spacious Vniuerse; to conserue the temperature of Heauen and Earth; to disperse and scatter raines and mysts; and to helpe the Trees in producing their Fruites. Nature also gaue them creation, to be the meanes of mens Nauigation, whereby they might communicat together the goods of the earth: so that Regions which are fertile in some particular things, may impart them to other that are not so well prouided. In briefe, the Windes do cause an infinity of commerces among men, which my intended breuity will not spare me to speake of.

The opinion of Seneca, concerning the Windes, and of what necessary vse they are.

Onely I haue propounded to my selfe, to shew how many Windes there are, what they are, whence they come, and how they are: wherein I am perswaded, that some benefit will redownd to diuers persons, especially to such as professe sayling on the Seas. To vnderstand then, what the Winde is, I will not relye on diuersity of opinions, in such as haue written thereon: but following Aristotle, and the most common iudgment of the wise; I say, that the Winde is a vapour and exhalation hot and dry, drawne vp into the Ayre by vertue of the Sunne. And being driuen aloft by his heate and lightnesse, proceeding on into the middle Region of the Ayre, which is alwayes colde; commeth to be repulsed by that contrary quality. So that being vnable to mount any higher, it breaketh foorth into blasts whether it can go, & being hindred of descending downe, in regard of lightnes: is constrained to tosse and tumble here & there in the Ayre; eyther more or lesse, according to the strength of the matter wherof it is caused. So that the definition of Seneca is not warrantable, who saieth, That the Winde is nothing else, but the Ayre mooued, without any other matter: because these are the exhalations and vapors, which stir and mooue the Ayre; for, after they are consumed, the winde ceasseth.

The Arguments intended to be discoursed in this Chapter.

The winde a vapour or exhalation hot and dry.

The reason of the Windes blustering in the Ayre.

Exhalations and vapours mouing the Ayre to spend themselues.

As

As concerning their names, our reuerend Ancients impoſed ſuch vpon them, as correſponded with the parts and Regions of the world, from whence they came. Neuertheleſſe, Antiquitie neuer acknowledged ſo many windes, as haue beene ſince thoſe times. For, according as Plinie, Aulus Gellius, Vegetius, Homer and other auncient Poets ſay, no other mention was made, but of foure windes onely, which came from the foure parts or quarters of the world, viz. Eaſt, Weſt, North and South; thoſe are the parts or quarters moſt remarkeable that can be obſerued throughout the world. For, as Dauid and Lucan ſay; Hence cometh day, and thence cometh night.

Antiquity neuer acknowledged but foure windes onely.

According then vnto this proportion, our auncient Latines termed Subſolanus, the winde that came from the Eaſt Equinoctiall: The Greekes called it Apeliotes, or Eurus: In Italy and Spaine; they call it Leuante; and French Marriners terme it Eſt. Now, for the right winde belonging to Sunne-ſetting, which is oppoſite and contrary to the precedent: the Greekes called it Zephyrus, that is, Vinifying: for it makes all plants to flouriſh: The Latines named it Fauonius: And the Italians and Spaniards call it Ponente: But our French Mariners call it Oueſt. And yet ſome others ſay, that the word Zephyrus ſignifieth couching or ſetting. The third winde was called by the Latines Septentrio, in regard of ſeauen Starres, which turne or wheele about the North-Starre. By the ſame reaſon the Greeks called it Apparetias, or Boreas; the Italians terme it Tramontana; the Spaniards Norta briſa; and the French do giue it the title of Nort. The fourth wind, which is oppoſite to the North, the Latines termed Auſter, euen as if they would haue called it a Water-driuer, for that this winde is often rainy; which made the Greeks to call it Notus, that is, watriſh, or moiſt. The Italians name it Mezzodi; the Spaniards Abrego ſur, and Vendeual; and the French, Sud.

Concerning the auncient names of the windes.

The Eaſt winde.

The Weſt winde.

The North winde.

The South wind.

Thus you ſee as concerning the foure windes, whereof only ſpeake Homer, and Ouid in his Metamorphoſis. But (with much more reſpect and reuerence) let vs yet ſay, that our bleſſed Lord and Sauior makes mention of the foure windes, ſpeaking of the laſt day of Iudgement, both in Saint Mathew and Saint Marke, where he ſayth: That hee will ſend his Angells with troupes, to aſſemble his Elect from the foure windes.

Chriſt himſelfe ſpake of the foure windes.

Matth. 24. 31 Marke 13. 21

Now, as touching the qualitie of the foure windes, we will make ſome relation thereof, in diſcourſing on other ſubalternate windes. Since the time of Homer, we find an addition of foure other windes to the former, as aſſigning (between the Leuant or Eaſt, and the Mezzodi, or South) a winde which the Latines call Vulturnus, becauſe this wind whiſtleth like the wing of a Vulture, when he diſlodgeth. The Greekes do terme it Eurus; and ſome call it vulgarly in Italian Leuante, or Stroc, or Sueſt.

Of the qualitie of the windes.

The other winde which rayſeth it ſelfe from the place, where the Sunne mounteth at mid Iune, hath no name amongſt the Latines. Notwithſtanding, ſome call it Ardant, or Helleſponticus, becauſe it cometh from the coaſt of the Helleſponticke Sea. Our Mariners call it Grec, or Nordeſt. Gellius and Vegetius, attribute thereto the name of Aquilo, which neuertheleſſe is the name of another winde.

The Nor th-Eaſt winde.

The North-Weſt winde.

The other winde is iuſtly betweene the North and the Weſt, and cometh from that Region, where the Sunne ſetteth in winter, and is called by the Latines Affricus, becauſe (in regard of Rome) this wind commeth directly from Affrica. The Greekes called it Lybs, becauſe they entitle Guynea to be Lybia: Our Italians terme it Lybechio, the French and Spaniards Sueſt, or Garbin.

The South-Eaſt winde.

The other winde is iuſtly betweene the North and the Weſt, and cometh from the place where the Sunne coucheth him ſelfe in broad day. Some call it Auſo, or Cancro. The Greekes called it Argeſtes, as much to ſay, as full of rayes. His impetuouſneſſe is called Apix, becauſe it cometh from a quarter of Italy, ſo called: Others giue it the name of Olympick. Our Italians ſtile it Meſtrall, the French & Spaniards doe tearme it Nort-oueſt. Theſe are the eight ſeuerall winds, whereof Aulus Gellius and Vitruuius, maketh mention of.

The South-Weſt winde.

Moreouer, Andronicus the Athenian Philoſopher, builded a Tower at Athens, with eight angles or corners of Marble, & at euery angle was figured the Image of a Winde, which blew againſt the ſaide angle. On the top of the ſame Tower, was fixed a Triton of gold (reputed to be the God of the Sea) holding a Rodde in his hand. And this Triton was compoſed in ſuch artificiall ſort, that he turned ſtill with euery winde; like as the Vaynes or weather-flags vpō Caſtles or ſtately houſes now adayes do; ſhewing, or pointing ſtill with his Rod, from whence the winde came, and where it reigned or domineered.

Andronicus the Philoſopher, and his erected Tower at Athens

Foure windes more, added to the former eight, and in what ſeuerall places they are deſcribed to be.

Ouer and beſide the forenamed eight windes, there were yet added foure more, to make vp iuſt the number of twelue: placing two windes on this ſide, and beyond the North, which is the high North, and two other on both ſides of the South, which is the right winde for the South. That on the right ſide of the Tramontana or North, betweene that and the winde Cæſias, they called Aquilo; in regard of his impetuous bluſtering, which is more ſudden, then the wing of the fleeteſt Faulcon that is or can bee. The Greekes alſo called it Borcas, in reſpect of the great noiſe it maketh when it bloweth: ſome other tearme it Meſes. The other winde, which is on the ſide of the couchant or Sun-ſetting, betweene the Tramontana & the winde Cancro, was cald by the Greekes Thraſsias. Seneca giueth it no name at all in Latine; neuertheleſſe, there are ſome who name it Circius, or Cirzus: the Chaſtillians call it Galego.

Two other windes oppoſite to the former.

A South and by East-winde

The other two windes are alſo oppoſite to theſe heere related, whereof the one commeth from the entrance to the right winde of the South, and the Region where the Sunne hideth himſelfe in Winter, which alſo is called Euro-auſter, or Euronorus. Ariſtotle reporteth, that (in his time) in Affrica they vſed to call it Phenicias. The other winde plainly is betweene the direct winde of the South and the Garbin or Su-Weſt: in which reſpect they call it Lybonorus, or Lyboauſter. And theſe are the twelue Windes, according to the foure Regions of the World.

A South and by Weſt wind

Ariſtotle, in his Booke of Heauen & the World, and in his Meteors, maketh mention of the Windes; but he neyther aſſigneth to them any names or number. Pliny notwithſtanding, Seneca and Vegetius doe make mention of twelue; as the like alſo is done by our moderne Aſtrologers and Coſmographers, as namely Orontius, Appianus, Gemma-Friſius, Henricus Glareanus, Stoſlerinus, Ioannes Berenus, Ioannes Fernelius, Robertus Valturinus, and many more beſide. Vitruuius neuertheleſſe, after he hath aſſigned the eight principall Windes to their Regions: doth yet giue two ſubalternate Windes to each of the other Windes; ſo that (by his account) there ſhould be foure and twenty Windes.

Ariſt in lib. Coelet Mund.

Moderne Aſtrologers & Coſmographers.

Foure & twēty windes granted by Vitruuius.

Notwithſtanding, to enſtruct our better apprehenſion of the Windes, he preſuppoſeth three Circles, whereof one ſerueth for the opinion of foure Windes, the other is for that of eight, and the laſt for that of twelue. Hee ſetteth downe (beſide) the names of the Windes, according as Marriners (and eſpecially the Spaniards) haue ſtiled them. Yet (in the mean while) it is to be obſerued, that the windes are alwayes conformed, to the qualities of the Regions from whence they come.

Three Circles alotted to the windes.

For the three Orientall or Eaſt-windes, that is to ſay, Subſolanus, Cacias, and Vulturnus, are hot and dry: whereas contrariwiſe, Zephyrus and his neighbors, which come from the Weſt or Sun-ſet, are colde and moiſt: becauſe the abſence of the Sunne, maketh the Regions colde where thoſe windes blow. As is eaſily diſcerned by the night time, which is euermore colde, as alſo by places ſubiected to ſhades, that are (ordinarily) coole and freſh. From the ſame cauſe proceedeth humidity; for, as heate in the day time dryeth the Eaſterne windes: ſo on the contrary, moiſture encreaſeth in the nights cooleneſſe.

The conformity of the windes to their Regions

The diffrence betweene day and night times.

As for the three Septentrionall or Northerly Windes, they are cold and dry; becauſe they come from colde Regions, & they haue their rayes writhed and wrinckled. Their coldnes alſo cauſeth drineſſe, which they borrow of the eaſtern windes, that are their neighbours: and yet they can take no moyſture from the Occidentall or Weſterne windes, becauſe their drought and humidity are directly contrary.

Of the Northerly windes

Come we now to the Meridionall or Southerly Windes, they are hot & moiſt: becauſe they deriue their warmth from hot Regions, comming from where the Sunne heateth downe right: with this addition moreouer, that they are neighbors to the Eaſt windes, which are hot. Concerning their humidity, they draw it from the

Of the Meridionall or Southerly windes.

the Weſterne windes, and vapours both of the Sea and Land. In Mountainy Regions, charged with Snowes, the Southerly winde may there get his moyſture, as the like hee doth in fenny and muddy places: euen as drineſſe may be cauſed by Plaines and champaigne grounds, ſo that they may be charged in the occurrences, according to the qualities of the windes. Here we are to obſerue, that in euery Region, the three windes comming thence, are all of one quality, & produce the ſame effects, which cauſe other effects (great or ſmall) according to ſuch as they happen to meete withall.

Occurrences in charge, commeth by the qualities of the windes

It reſteth now to ſpeake of the particular qualitie belonging to each winde. Beginne wee then with the right Eaſt winde, which is the moſt healthfull of all. For, it is ſubtile and pure, and partaketh more with choller, then his companions. His neighbour, blowing againſt the South, is more moyſt, and farre more furious then the former, and chargeth the ayre with cloudes. Ariſtotle ſayth, that when this winde bloweth, all things do ſeeme more great and groſſe, then they are indeede. The right winde of the South, cauſeth raines and tempeſts, it troubleth the aire with cloudes, procuring peſtilence and corruption. The winde Garbin, which is neighbor to the right Weſt, is very tempeſtiue, according vnto Virgill. But the Oueſt or Weſt wind, encreaſeth fleugme, and procureth thunders: it beginneth to blow, at the firſt appearing of the Spring. The direct Trimontana, which we call the right North winde, cauſeth colde and froſt, it burneth floures and fruites, and purifieth a corrupted ayre. Now, in regarde it ſhutteth and locketh vp the pores in mens bodies; this winde is helde very apt for health. As much may be ſayde of the other Septentrionall windes, which are his conſorts or companions.

The Eaſt winde the moſt healthfull of all the reſt.

Ariſt. in Coel et Mund. cap. 3.

What winde bloweth at the Springs entrance.

It is to be held then for a concluſion, that theſe windes proceede from vapours and hote exhalations, and that (in al) there are twelue: without depending vppon other allegories, aſſigned to ſome infant windes. The Spaniards hold for principall winds, thoſe foure which come from the foure parts of the world, to wit, Eaſt, Weſt, North and South. As for the other foure, they tooke their names from them precedent: for the North-eaſt is betweene the North and Eaſt wind: that which is betweene the Sunne-ſet and the South, is alſo called South-weſt, and the other betweene the Eaſt and South, is alſo termed South-eaſt; theſe are their ſeuerall nominations.

The full conclusion for the number of the windes, & them that are allowed to be between each of them.

Afterward, eight other were talked of, which are equally bi-parted betweene the former eight, being termed Collaterall, ſide or middle windes. As that which is betweene the North and the North-eaſt, was called North-North-eaſt: The other which is betwixt the Eaſt and the North, is called by the Spaniards Zeſur-deſt, and by French Marriners, North-eaſt; that which is betweene the South and South-eaſt, is called South-South-eaſt; and the other betweene Eaſt and South-eaſt, is named Eaſt-South-eaſt. The other betweene South-weſt and Eaſt, is tearmed Weſt-South-Weſt; and ſo of the other in the ſame diſtinguiſhing: ſo that ſixeteene Windes are equally diſtributed ouer the Earth. Some adde other ſixeteene Windes beſide, which they tearme Quarter windes, by which allowance, wee ſhould then haue two and thirty windes: but theſe latter borrowe all their names of their neighbours. Thus much therefore may ſerue for all the Windes.

Of the Great Prouince of Moſcouia: As alſo the Manners, Religion, and Power, of the Prince there Ruling. Diuided into fiue ſeuerall Tractes.

CHAP. I.

In this firſt Tract, is contained a Coſmographicall deſcription of the whole Countrey; the Climate and Soyle. Alſo what Shires or Regions are therein contained. What Commodities the ſeuerall parts of the land yeeldeth: And then a breefe Collection, of the principall Cities and Townes in Moſcouia or Ruſsia.

The city Moſca, or Moſcua.

Moſcouia ſom time called Sarmatia.

Foure brethren diuided the North-parts between them.

Moſcouia or Ruſsia, is a great northerly Region, containing more then fiue hundred leagues in length. The principal Citie thereof, being called Moſca, or Moſcuua, greater then the Citty Paris in France, and ſeated on the Riuer Moſqua. I read alſo, that this Countrey was (ſometimes) called Sarmatia, and came to varry or change from the name, by calling it ſelfe Ruſsia, as beeing parted or diuided into ſundry ſmall, yet abſolute Regiments, neyther depending, or being in ſubiection one to another.

Some of their Writers doe affirme, that the North partes of the Countrey, chanced to bee diuided betweene foure Brethren, whoſe names were Trubor, Rurico, Sinees, and Varinus, and in that countrey Language, when they ſpeak the word Ruſſe, it implyeth as much, as to part or diuide. They auouch likewiſe, that foure other perſons made the like partition of the South parts, as Kio, Scieko, Choranus, and a Siſter of theirs, named Libeda; and euery one termed his Prouince or Territory, according vnto his owne particular name: and ſo from this their diuiſion, the Countrey came to be called Ruſsia, about the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and ſixty.

Diuiſion of the South-parts.

At ſuch time as it was called Sarmatia, it conſiſted of two peculiar Diuiſions: Namely, the Blacke and White. White Sarmatia contained all that portion that lyeth towards the North, and on the ſide of Liceſland, which Prouinces are now termed Duyna, Vagha, Vologda, Cargapolia, Nouogradia, &c. Nouogradia being the chief and Metropolitane City of them all. The Blacke Sarmatia contained all the country Southward, towards the black or Euxine Sea, with the Dukedome of Valodemer of Moſco, Rezan, &c. It is bounded Northward by the Lappes and the north Ocean: On the Southſide by the Tartars, called Chrimes: Eaſtward they haue the Nagaian Tartar, who poſſeſſeth all the country of the Eaſt ſide of the Volgha, toward the Caſpian Sea: On the weſt and South-weſt border, lye Lituania, Liuonia, and Polonia.

ces. Volodomer (which beareth the firſt place in the Emperors ſtile, becauſe their houſe came firſt of the Dukes of that Countrey) Mosko, Niſnouogrod, Pleſko, Smolensko, Nouogrod Velica (or Nouogrod of the Low countries) Roſtone, Yarusſlaue, Bealozera, Bezan, Duyna, Cargapolia, Meſchora, Vagha, Vſtuga, Ghaletſa. Theſe are the ſhyres naturally belonging to Moſcouia or Ruſsia; but farre greater and larger then the Shires of England; albeit I cannot ſay that they are ſo well peopled. The other Countreyes or Prouinces, which the Emperors haue wonne by power, and more lately annexed to their former Dominion, follow by theſe names. Twerra, Youghoria, Permia. Vadska, Boulghoria, Chernigo, Oudoria, Obdoria, Condora, beſide a great part of Siberia, where the people, (though they are not naturall Ruſſians) obey the Emperor of Ruſsia or Moſcouia, being gouerned by his Countrey Lawes; paying Taxes and Cuſtomes, euen as his owne people doe. Ouer and beſide all which, the Kingdomes of Cazan and Aſtracan (not long ſince obtained by conqueſt) are vnder his command.

Concerning all his poſſeſſions in Lituania (to the number of thirtie great Townes, and more) with Narue & Dorp in Liuonia: they are quite gone from him, beeing (of late yeares) ſurprized by the Kings of Poland and Sweden. The fore-named Prouinces or Shires, are all reduced into foure Iuriſdictions, tearmed by them Chetfyrds, as much to ſay, as Tetrarchyes or fourth-parts, whereof wee ſhall haue more occaſion to ſpeake hereafter.

Iuriſdictions or tetrarchies

The whole countrey is of great length and bredth: for, from the North vnto the South (meaſuring from Cola to Aſtracan, leaning ſomewhat Eaſtward) containeth in length about foure thouſand two hundred ſixty miles, which they terme verſt. And yet the Emperor hath more extendure Northward, farre beyond Cola, euen to the Riuet of Tromſchua, which runneth a thouſand verſt or miles beyond Pechinga, neere to Wardhouſe, yet not intire nor clearly limited, becauſe the kings of Sweden and Denmarke, hauing diuers Townes there, as well as the Ruſſe; are plotted together, the one with the other, all of them laying claime to thoſe whole North-parts as their owne peculiar right. As for the Countreyes bredth, from that part of the Territory lying fartheſt Weſtward on the Narue ſide, to the Eaſtward parts of Siberia, where the Emperors Garriſons are kept, is counted forty four thouſand verſt or miles, or thereabout. They holde a Verſt to be a thouſand paces, yet leſſe (by a quarter) then an Engliſh Mile. If the whole Dominion of the Ruſſian Emperour were all habitable, and peopled in al places; he would either hardly hold it all within one Gouernment, or bee too potent for all his neighboring Princes.

The longi-] tude and lati-tude of the whol country

The Kings of Sweden and Denmarke haue diuers Townes amongſt the Ruſſes.

The Emperors dominion not all habitable.

To ſpeake ſomewhat of the Soile and Climate, for the moſt part it conſiſteth of a ſlight ſandy mould, yet differing farre in one place from another; for yeelding ſuch things as the earth affoordeth. Concerning the Countrey North-ward, vnto the parts of Saint Nicholas and Cola, and North-Eaſt towards Siberia; it is all verie barren, and full of deſert woodes, by reaſon of the Clymate, and extremitie of the cold in winter.

Of the ſoyle and Climate in Moſcouia.

Barren ſoyle and deſart woods.

In like manner, along the riuer Volgha, betweene the Countries of Cazan and Aſtracan, where, though the ſoyle is fruitfull, yet it is vn-inhabited: except on the weſt ſide of the riuer Volgha, where the Emperour hath ſome few Caſtells, and garriſons in them. But this is occaſioned by the Chrim Tartar, who will neyther himſelfe plant Townes to dwell there (as delighting in an extrauagant and wilde kinde of life) nor yet ſuffer the Ruſſe (who is farre off with the ſtrength of his Countrey) to people thoſe parts.

The ſauage & extrauagant kind of life of the Chrim Tartar.

From Vologda, which lieth well-neare ſeauen thouſand verſt from the Port of Saint Nicholas, downe toward Moskо, and ſo towards the South Port, bordering vpon the Chrim, contayning the like ſpace of 1700. verſt: it is a very pleaſant and fruitfull Countrey, yeelding paſture and corne, with woods and waters in great plentie. The like is betweene Rezan (lying South-eaſt from Mosko) to Nouograd and Vobsko, the which reacheth furtheſt towards the mountaines: So betweene Mosko and Smolensko (lying South-weſt towards Lituania, is a very pleaſant and fruitfull ſoyle.

A very fruitfull and pleaſant countrey

To obſerue the whole Countrey, maketh a great difference from it ſelfe, in regard of the yeares courſe; vrging a ſtrange alteration, betweene Winter and Summer in Ruſsia. All the Countrey lyeth in Winter,

A ſtrange inequality of the countrey in winter and Summer.

Winter vnder ſnow, which falleth there continually, contayning (ſometime) two yardes in thickeneſſe, and yet farre greater towardes the North: the Riuers and Waters being all frozen ouer a yard and more in depth of cruſt, how broade or ſwift in current ſoeuer they bee, continuing ſo commonly for the ſpace of fiue moneths; as from the beginning of Nouember, vntill it draw towardes the end of March, and then the Snowes begin to melt.

Mighty deepe ſnowes and ices in Moſcouia.

Well may we iudge of the ayres ſharpneſſe there; becauſe Water dropping downe, or throwne vp into the Aire, freezeth to Ice before it can fall to the ground. And let a man hold a diſh or pot of pewter in his hand, during the extremitie of Winter (except in ſome chamber where the warme Stoaues are) and his fingers will freeze faſt vnto it, euen to tearing the skin off at the parting with it. And let a man go out of a warme room into a cold, he ſhall ſenſibly feele his breath to grow ſtarke, euen as ſtifling with the cold, drawing it in, and vrging it forth.

The extream freezing cold of the country

Many haue bene noted, not onely ſuch as trauaile abroad, but others in the frequented Markets, and common ſtreetes of Townes, to bee mortally pinched, and meerely killed with colde. So that diuers haue beene ſeene to droppe downe dead in the ſtreetes, and many trauaylers are brought into the Townes, ſitting ſtiffe and dead in their Sleds: yea, ſome haue loſt their noſes, the tips of their eares, the balles of their cheekes, their verie Toes, feete, &c. Many times, when Winter is very hard and violent, Beares & Wolues haue come (by huge troopes) out of the woods, as enforced thereto by meer hunger, and entering into Townes and Villages, haue rent and torne whatſoeuer they could finde or meete withall; whereby the inhabitants were enforced to flight, onely for ſafety of their liues.

Diuers frozen to death with cold, in Markets and frequented ſtreets and trauellers on their Sleds

An admirable ſummer time in Moſcouia.

But when the Sommer is come, neuer was ſeene a more freſh and delicate countrey. the woods (conſiſting moſt of Firre and Birch) being ſo ſweet and louely; the Paſtures and Meddowes ſo greene and well growne, yea and vpon a ſodaine, ſuch variety of Flowers, ſuch harmonie of Birdes (chiefely of Nightingales, whoſe notes ſeeme more loud and variable, then in other countries) that no man can lightly trauaile in a more delightfull countrey. From the freſh and ſpeedy growth of the Spring there, the ſnow giueth no meane reaſon of opinion, becauſe all winter time it ſeemeth as mantled in a white Liuerie, which keepeth it warme clothed al winter while, till Spring time, and then the Suns heat diſſolueth it to water. All which, do ſo ſweetly ſympathize with the ground, beſtowing on it ſuch ſufficient drenching and ſoaking (being of a ſlight and ſandie mould, chearing it againe with the ſunnes reuerberating brightneſſe) that it produceth quickly all hearbes and plants in extraordinary aboundance. So that, as winter there ſuperaboundeth in colde, Sommer anſweres it with ſo much the more heate: chiefely in Iune, Iuly, and Auguſt, it equalling then the beſt ayres in any other Countrey.

The reaſon of the ſodaine & freſh ſpring in the Countrey

The Winter not ſo colde, but ſummer is as violently hot.

Comming nowe to ſpeake of the Riuers, the firſt is the famous Volgha, whoſe head or Spring ariſeth at an Alder-trees roote, ſome two hundred Verſt beyonde Yaruſlaue. It entreth into ſuch bignes by the entercourſe of other riuers gyring into it; that in ſome places it extendeth in bredth a mile and more, till at length it falleth into the Caſpian ſea, by eſtimation neere 2800. Verſt or miles in length. Boriſthenes is the ſecond, called now Neper: diuiding the country from Lituania, and thence hauing his courſe into the Euxine Sea. Tanais, otherwiſe termed Don (bounding anciently betweene Aſia and Europ) ſeemeth to haue his riſing out of the Rezan Ozera, paſſing thorough the Chrim Tartares Countrey, till hee makes his fall into the Sea-lake, or great Meare, neere to the Cittie of Azon, called Maotis. Report runneth among the Ruſſes, that from their cheefe Citty of Moſco, euen to Conſtantinople, and ſo into all thoſe parts of the world; men may eaſily make paſſage by this Riuer. But then the conuoy Boate muſt bee drawne ouer a little Iſtmus, ſome fewe Verſtes thwartwiſe, as proofe was not long ſince made of.

Of the principal riuers in Moſcouia, Volgha the chiefe.

Boriſthenes.

Tanais.

Rezan Ozera

Maeotis.

An excellent paſſage afforded by the riuer.

Duyna, being many hundred Miles in length, muſt bee remembred amongſt the reſt, falling North into the Bay of Saint Nicholas, and on the Sea-ſide it hath great Rockes of Alablaſter vppon each banke. Duna emptieth it ſelfe into the Balticke Sea, neere to the town of Riga. And then

Duyna:

Duna.

is

is Onega, which ſome ninetie Verſt from the port of Saint Nicholas, hath his downfall into the Bay at Solouetſco. Not far beneath Cargapolia, this riuer meeteth with another, called Volocke, which by Yama (a ſmall Towne, droppeth into the Finland ſea. Into which Sea, from Saint Nicholas Port, and ſo into the Sound, the Ruſſes eaſily paſſe by water.

Volock.

Suchana

Suchana is another, which flowing into Duyna, runneth on into the North ſea.

Ocka.

As for Ocka, his head commeth from the Chrims borders, ſtreaming on into Volgha.

Moſcua.

Wichida.

And Moſcua glideth thorough the Cittie Moſco, borrowing his name thereof. Wichida likewiſe is a very long and ſpacious riuer, riſing out of Permia, and falling into the Volgha. So much for theſe memorable riuers in this country.

Such fruite as Moſcouia affordeth.

We come now to ſpeak of thoſe fruits as Moſcouia yeeldeth, which are in diuers kinds; as Apples, Peares, Plums, Cherries red and blacke, but the black ones are wilde. Then haue they a Deene, which is like to a Musk Mellon, but much more ſweete and delicious. Alſo Cucumbers, Gourdes (which they tearme Arbouſe,) Raſpes, Straw-berries, and Hurtleberries, beſide many other in great plenty; for euerie Woodde and hedge is well ſtored with them.

What Corne and Graine the Countrey yeeldeth, and at what rate it is ſold.

But if you demand of their Corne and Graine, they haue Wheate, Rye, Barley, Oates, Peaſe, Buckway, Pſnytha, which reſembleth Rice in taſte. The Countrey is ſo ebounding in theſe Graines, that it can allow a large ouer-plus quantity: for Wheate is ſometime there ſolde for two Alteens the Chetfird, valewing ten pence ſterling, and the meaſure amounteth well neere to three Buſhels.

Their ſeaſons for ſowing their Graine.

Concerning ſeaſons of Husbandrie, Rye is there ſowen before Winter, and all other graine in the Spring time. Such as dwell farre off in the North, and deſert places, as the Permians; the partes more Southward do furniſh them: beeing conſtrained yet (ſometimes) to make Bread of a Roote called Vaghnoy, and of the middle rind of the Firre tree, when any dearth hapneth.

The commodities which in beſt maner the Countrey affoordeth.

Natiue commodities yeelded by the Countrey are many, and of good worth, for ſeruice of the peoples beſt expectation, and benefitting the Emperor, by venting them abroad in the World: for the cold of the Climate (being a naturall inconuenience) by Gods great goodneſſe, is therein much remedied. Their cheefeſt Furres are Blacke Fox, Sables, Luſernes, Dun-fox, Martrones, Gurnſtalles or Armines, Laſets or Mineuer, Beuer, Wuluerins, being the skinne of a great water-Rat, that ſmelleth naturally like Muske; Calaber or gray Squirrell, redde Squirrel, red and white Fox, what plentie of theſe are ſpent in the Countrey (becauſe the people weare Furres all the winter time) is almoſt incredible. And yet the Merchants ſome yeares, tranſport thence, to the valew of foure or fiue hundred thouſand Rubbles, to Turkie, Perſia, Boulgharia, Georgia, Armenia, with ſome other of Chriſtendome.

The principal furres vented thence in merchandize

The places that afford the very beſt furs in all their ſeuerall kindes.

In the Countreyes of Pechora, Momgoſorfria, Obdorskoy, and other places, do the beſt Sable furres growe; and the worſer in Siberia, Perm, and ſuch like places. The blacke Foxe and red come from Siberia; as from Pechora the white and Dun: the Wolues and Beares skins (both beeing white) come alſo thence. Perm yeildeth the choyſeſt Wuluerin, and the beſt Martrones come from Syberia, Cadam, Morum, Perm and Cazan. Gallets & Ouglites ſend out the beſt Luſerns, Miniuer, and Ermines: yet ſome come from Nouogrod and Perm; and Murmonskey by Cola hath the beſt breed of Beauers. Common Furres (with ſome of theſe fore-named) are in euerie part of the Countrey.

Wax, wherof euery Poode containeth fortie pounde weight.

A ſecond commoditie is waxe, which hath beene ſhipt thence into far remote Countreyes yearely, the valew of 50000. Pood. Honey alſo is there in great quantity, ſpent dayly in their ordinarie drinkes, which is Mead of all ſorts: and yet carried out of the Countrey in great abundance. Mordua and Cadam nere vnto Cheremiſſen Tartar, yeeldeth the greateſt encreaſe of Hony: but good ſtore alſo commeth out of Seuerskoy, Rezan, Morum, Cazan, Dorogoboſe, and Vaſma.

Hony.

Tallow.

Tallow is yeelded in great weight for tranſportation, by reaſon of much good ground for feeding Cattle; as alſo manie Lents obſerued among them. Partly beſide, becauſe the greateſt perſonnes vſe waxe Lights: as the poorer and meaner ſort do Byrch, dryed in their ſtoues, being cut into long ſlices, called there Luchine-

Many Lents vſed in Moſcouia.

os.

os. Some yeares haue ſent away by Shipping, aboue an hundred thouſand Poode yearely, which hath come out of the parts and Territories of Smolensko, Yaruſlaue, Ouglits, Nouogrod, Vologda, Otfer and Gorodetskey.

Loſh & Cow-hides, & Buffe

Another principal commodity is Loſh and Cow-hides: their Loſh and Buffe beeing very faire. Their Bull and Cow-hide is but ſmall of ſize, for Oxen they make none, nor of weather. Strange Marchants haue tranſported thence ſome yeares aboue an hundred thouſand hides, beſide great ſtore of Goats skinnes, ſhipt alſo thence in large number. The breede for the faireſt Loſh or Buffe, is about Roſtone, Wichida, Nonogrod, Morum and Perm, as the leſſer ſort are in the kingdom of Cazan.

Traine Oyle.

Traine Oyle, beeing made or drawne out of the Seale-fiſh, is no mean commodity there. And becauſe we are ſpeaking of the Seale-fiſh, it ſhall not much diſſent from our matter, to report in what manner they hunt the Seale, whereof afterward this Oyle is made. When the end of Summer draweth neere, and the froſts are not (as yet) begun; they deſcend with their boats into S. Nicholas Baye, to the Cape called Cuſconeſſe or Founoſe, where they leaue their boates till the next ſpring tide. When the Sunne waxeth warme towards the ſpring, and yet the ice not melted in the Bay; they return thither again, and drawing their Boats ouer the ice, vſe them as houſes to lodge and reſt in. Commonly, there are about ſeauenteene or eighteene Fleete of them, being diuided into diuers companies, fiue or ſixe boates alwayes conſorting together.

After what manner they hunt the Seale Fiſh in Moſcouia.

Boates made vſe of to lodg in.

Such as light firſt vpon the fiſhes haunt or reſort, do fire a Beacon, carryed with them for the ſame purpoſe, and certaine are appointed, to obſerue when the Beacon ſhall be fired; whereof report beeing made to the other Companies, they reſort all together, compaſſing the Seals round in a ring, as they ly Sunning themſelues together vpon the Ices, being commonly foure or fiue thouſand in a ſhoale. Then euery man, hauing a Clubbe in his hand, enters ſtoutly vpon them; & if they hit them on the noſe, then they are ſoone kilde. But if on the backe or ſides, they beare out the blowes ſtiffely, and manie times catch the club ſo faſt, and holde it downe with their teeth ſo ſtrongly, that the party is forced to call for helpe to his fellowes.

A Beacon fired to giue warning.

How they ſet vpon the Seales with their clubbes.

The maner of the Seales is, when they perceiue themſelues beſet round about; to gather all cloſe together, as in a throng or heape, to ſway and beare downe the Ice, and to breake it if they can: which bending of the Ice, brings vp ſuch a Sea-water vpon it, that the Hunters are faine to wade a foote or more deepe. When they haue killed what they can, & intend no further ſlaughter at that time: the hunters fall to ſharing, euery boat his part by equall portions. And ſo they flay them, taking off the skinne from the bodie, and the Lard or fat withall that cleaueth vnto the skinne, which they beare thence with them, going to the ſhore, leauing the bodies behind. Pits they dig in the ground, of a fathome & a halfe in depth, and hauing taken off the Fat or Larde from the skin, caſt it into the pits, and then hurle in hot burning coales to melt it withall. The vppermoſt and pureſt is ſold, and vſed to oyle woll for cloth: but the groſſer, being red of colour, they ſell to make Sope.

The Seals naturall behauiour whē they are beſette, in their own defence.

The hunters diuide the ſpoile among them.

Great quantity alſo of Ickary or Caueary, is made vpon the riuer of Volgha, out of a Fiſh called Bellougina, the Sturgeon, the Seueriga, and the Sterledey: moſt part whereof is ſhipt thence by French & Netherland Merchants for Italy, Spaine, and England.

Ickary or Caueary made of Sturgeon.

Flaxe and Hempe is another commodity, whereof hath bene ſhipt at the Port of Narue, the more part of an hundered Ships ſmall aud great yearely. But great abatement is in theſe and other commodities, by ſhutting vp the Port of Narue towards the Finland Sea, which is now in poſſeſſion of the Sweden. The ſtop of paſſage alſo ouer land, by the way of Smolensko and Plotsko, in regard of warre with the Poland: which cauſeth the people to be leſſe carefull in prouiding theſe and other commodities, becauſe they want ſale. For growth of Flax, the Prouince of Vobsko and countrey thereabout is chiefe: like as Smolensko, Dorogoboſe, and Vaſma is for Hempe.

Flax & Hemp

Great hinderance in venting theyr commodities.

Great ſtore of Salt the Countrey maketh, whereof the beſt is at Storarouſe in very great quantity, hauing ſtore of Salt-wels, ſome two hundred fifty nine Verſt from

Salt, whereof ſome is made naturally of the ſea water from the Sea. But at Astracan, Salt is naturally made by the Sea-water, which casteth it vp in great hilles, from whence it is digged downe, and carryed away by Merchants, or any that will fetch of it. Three pence Russe is payed to the Emperour vpon euery hundred weight of Salt, which is likewise made in many other places, as in Berm, Wichida, Totina, Kenitsma, Souoletskey, &c. all out of Salt-pits, except at Solouetskey, which lyeth neare vnto the Sea.

Tarre a great commoditie there.

Tarre also they make great store of, out of Firre trees in the Country of Duyna and Smolensko, sending no meane plenty thereof abroade. To these before remembred, there are many more (naturall to the countrey) though of meaner estimation: As the fish-tooth, which they call Ribazuba, vsed both amongest themseues, and the Persians and Bougharians, who fetch it thence for Beades, Kniues and Sword-handles for Noblemen and Gentlemen, and diuerse other vses.

A fish tooth called Ribazuba.

Slude, which is there as their Moscouie glasse.

Some doe vse the powder of it against poyson; like to Vnicornes horne, and the fish that oweth it, is called a Morse, beeing caught about Pechora: Some of these teeth are well-neare two foote in length, and do weigh eleauen or twelue pounds each tooth.

There is a soft Rocke, which they doe cutte into peeces or into thinne flakes, and are naturally to bee vsed and employed as Glasse, for Lant-hornes and such like: but yet yet is not so brittle in breaking as Glasse, yet it dooth giue a farre clearer light. They doe tearme it Slude, and it groweth in the Prouince of Corelia, and about the Riuer Duyna, towardes the North Sea.

Salt-peter & Brimstone

Besides, they make Salt-peter in many places, as at Ouglites, Yaruslaiue, and Vstug; with some meane store of Brimstone vppon the Riuer Volgha; but they want skill to refine it.

Iron.

As for their Iron, it is but brittle; yet much thereof is made in Corelia, Cargapoleia, and Vstug Thelesna, for other mines they haue none growing within the kingdome.

What strange beasts are in Moscouia.

As for Beasts of strange kindes, they haue the Losh, the Ollen, the wilde Horse, the Wuluering or Wood-dogge, the Lyserne, the Beauer, the Sable, the Martroun, the blacke and dunne Fox, the white Beare, towards the Sea-coast of Pechora, the Gurnstall, and the Laset or Miniuer. Likewise, there is a kinde of Squirrell, hauing growing on the pinion of his shoulder bone, a long tuft of haire, much like vnto feathers, with a farre broader taile then other Squirrels haue, which they doe moone and shake, as they moue from tree to tree, like to a Wing in resemblance, and seeming as if they flewe thereby, whereby they were called, Letach Vechshe, that is to say, flying Squirrells. In the Summer their Hares and Squirrells are of the same colour as other are; but in Winter, the Hare changeth her coate into milke-white, and the Squirrell into grey, and thereof is it that the Calaber commeth.

A strange Squirrell.

Hares milke white.

Fallow Deere likewise they haue, the Roe Bucke, and great plenty and store of Goates. Their horsses are but small, yet swift and hard, and both in Winter and Summer, they trauell them vnshod, vsing no respect at all of pace. Small are their sheepe, bearing harsh and course wooll, not so apt and conuenient for the making of Cloath, as is affoorded in diuers other Countries, nor of so good a wearing.

Fallow deere, Roe Bucks, and Goats.

Of Foules they haue of the principall kindes; and great store of Hawkes, as also the Eagle, the Ger-faulcon, the Slight-faulcon, the Gos-hawke, the Tassell, the Spar-hawke. But the principall Hawke breeding in the Countrey is counted the Ger-faulcon. We may not forget other chiefe Foules, as the Swanne wilde and tame in great plentie; the Storke, the Crane, the Tedder, resembling a Feasant in colour, but much bigger, and liueth in the Firre woods. Of Pheazant and Partridge they haue great plenty; and an Owle, so great and ougly to beholde, as few countries affoorde the like, with a huge broad face, and eares much like to a man.

Foules of diuers kindes, both wilde and tame.

We come now to speake of fresh-water Fish, besides the common sort; as Carpes, Pikes, Pearch, Tench, Roach, &c. they haue diuerse kindes very good and delicate. As the Bellouga or Bellougina, of foure or fiue elles in length; the Ositrina or Sturgeon, the Seueriga and Sterledy, somewhat in fashion and in taste like vnto the Sturgeon, but not so thicke, nor so long.

Varietie of fresh-water Fish and other beside.

Theſe foure kindes of Fiſh breed in the Volgha, and are there catcht in great abundance, ſeruing generally (as a great food) to the whole kingdome. And of the roes of theſe foure fiſhes, are made very great ſtore of Icary or Caueary.

The Ribabela or white Salmon.

Beſides theſe breeding in the Volgha, they haue a Fiſh called Ribabela, or white Salmon, which they hold to be more delicate then the red Salmon, hauing alſo great plenty of them in the Riuers northward, as in Duyna and Cola, &c. In the Ozera, or Lake neare to Periſlaue, they haue a ſmall Fiſh, which they call the freſh herring, of the ſame faſhion, and taſting alſo like a Sea herring. From the trades of fiſhing the Emperor hath an yearely large cuſtome, which they practiſe in the Summer: but ſend it frozen in the Winter into all parts of the Realme.

The Moſcouia freſh herring.

Now, becauſe wee aymed at a formalitie in the deſcription, wee enter into a relation of the chiefe and principall Cities in Moſcouia or Ruſsia, and as our direction guideth vs, theſe are their names.

The names of the cheefeſt Cities in Moſcouia or Ruſsia.

The Citie of Moſco very antient.

The Citty of Moſco is ſuppoſed to bee of great antiquitie, though the firſt founder thereof be vnknowne to the Moſcouites or Ruſſe. It ſeemeth to deriue the name from the riuer, running on the one ſide thereof. Beroſus the Chaldean telleth vs; that Nimrod (in other profane Stories called Saturne) ſent Aſſyrius, Medus, Moſcus and Magog into Aſia, to plant Colonies there, and that Moſcus planted both in Aſia and Europe. Which may make ſome probabilitie, that the City, or rather the Riuer whereon it is built, tooke the denomination from this Moſcus. And ſo much the rather, becauſe of the Climate or ſcituation, which is in the very furtheſt part and liſt of Europe, bordering vpon Aſia.

Beroſus in li. Moſcus planted Colonies in Aſia and Europe, and Moſco ſeemes to take name of him.

The firſt changing the title of Duke into King.

It appeareth, that this Citie was much enlarged by one Euan or Iohn ſonne vnto Daniell, the firſt that changed his Title of Duke into King; though that honor continued not to his poſteritie, the rather, becauſe hee was inueſted into it by the Popes Legate, who at that time was Innocentius the fourth, about the yere 1246. which was much miſliked by the Ruſſe people, being then a part of the Eaſterne or Greeke Church. Since that time, the name of that Cittie hath growne more famous, and much better knowne to the world. Inſomuch, that not only the prouince, but the whole country of Moſcouia or Ruſsia, is termed by ſome, by the name of Moſcouia the Metropolite Cittie.

Moſcouia the Metropolite Cittie.

The forme of this Citty is (in a maner) round, with three ſtrong walles, circuling the one within the other, and ſtreetes lying betweene, wherof the in-moſt wall, and the buildings cloſed within it, lying ſo faſt (as the heart within the body) fenced and watred with the Riuer Moskua, which runneth cloſe by it; is all accounted the Emperours Caſtell. The number of houſes through the whole Citty (being reckoned a litle before it was fiered by the Chrim) were 41500. Since the Tartar beſieged and fiered it (which was in the yere 1571.) there doth lye waſte of it a great breadth of ground, which before was wel ſet and planted with buildings; eſpecially that part on the South ſide of Moskua, built (not long before) by Baſilius the Emperour for his garriſon of Souldiours, to whom he gaue priuilege to drinke Mead and Beere, at the drie or prohibited times. And for that cauſe called his new Cittie Naloi, that is to ſay, Skinke or poure in, So that now the Cittie of Moſco is not much bigger then the Citty of London in England.

The model or forme of the cittie.

The number of houſes before the Cities fiering.

When the Chrim Tartar fiered the Cittie.

A name giuen to the new cittie.

The next in greatneſſe, and (in a manner) as large, is the Citty Nouograde, where happened (as the Ruſſe ſayth) the memorable warre, ſo much ſpoken of in Hiſtories, of the Scythian ſeruants, that tooke vppe Armes againſt their Maiſters, which they haue reported to be after this manner.

Nouograde the next great city to Moſco.

The

The hiſtorie of the Seruants warre againſt their Maiſters, at their returning home from the Tartars warre.

The Boiardines or Gentlemen of Nouograde, and the adiacent territories (that onely are Souldiers after the diſcipline of thoſe countries) had warre with the Tartars. Which being well perfourmed and ended by them, they returned homewards. Where they vnderſtoode by the way, that their Cholopey, or Bondſlaues whom they left at home, had (in their abſence) poſſeſſed their townes, lands, houſes, wiues and all. At which newes being ſomewhat amazed, and yet diſdayning the villanie of their ſeruants; they made the more ſpeed home, and ſo, not farre from Nouograde, mette them in warrelike maner marching againſt them.

A worthy reſolution in Maiſters againſt their bold ſlaues.

Whereupon, aduiſing what was beſt to be done, they all agreed, to ſet vppon them with no other ſhew of weapons, but with their horſe whippes (which as their manner is, euery man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their ſeruile condition, thereby to terrifie them and abate their courage. And ſo marching on, laſhing all together with their whips in their hands, they gaue the on-ſette, which ſeemed ſo terrible in the eares of the villaines, and ſtrooke ſuch a ſence into them of the whips ſmart (whereof they had ſharpely taſted before) that they all fled together, euen like ſheepe before their driuers. In memorie of which victorie, the Nouogradians (euer ſince) haue ſtamped their Coine, which they call a Dingoe Nouogrodskoy, currant through all Ruſſia: with the figure of a man on horſebacke, ſhaking a whip aloft in his hand. Theſe two Cities exceede the reſt in greatneſſe.

A victory wonne by the laſhing of whippes only.

Iaruſlaue the onely Citie for ſcituation.

For ſtrength, their chiefe Citties are Vobſco, Smolenſco, Cazan and Aſtracan, as all lying vpon the borders; but for ſcituation, Iaruſlaue farre exceedeth all the reſt. Becauſe, beſide thoſe commodities yeelded by paſturage and corne, it lieth vpon the famous riuer Volgha, and lookes ouer it, from a banke moſt faire and ſtately to beholde, whereof the Towne taketh name. For Iaruſlaue (in that language) ſignifieth a faire and famous banke. In this Cittie (as may be well imagined by that name) dwelt the Moſcouian or Ruſſe King Vlademir, ſurnamed Iaruſlaue: that married the daughter to Harold King of England, by mediation of Sueno the Dane, as the Daniſh hiſtorie teſtifieth, about the yeare of our Lord God, one thouſand ſixty ſeauen.

A Moſcouian King married the King of Englands daughter.

Nothing greatly memorable, is to be ſpoken of the other Citties and Townes, but onely ruines within their walles: which declareth the peoples decreaſe vnder this gouernement. In ſtead of pauing, the ſtreetes (in their Townes and Citties) are plancked with Firre trees, plained and layd euen cloſe one to an other. Their houſes are of wood, without any Lime or Stone, built very cloſe and warme, with Firre trees playned, and layd one vppon another, being faſtened together with dents or notches at euerie corner, and ſo clapped faſt together. Betwixt the trees of timber, they thruſt in Moſſe, whereof they gather plenty in the woods, to keepe out the ayre: And euery houſe hath a paire of ſtaires, which leade vppe into the chambers out of the yard or ſtreete, after the Scottiſh maner. This building appeareth farre better for their Countrey, then that of Stone and Bricke; becauſe they are danker and more colde, then thoſe woodden houſes; eſpecially them of Firre, which is a verie drie and warme kinde of wood: whereof God hath prouided them ſuch ſtore, that a faire houſe may be built for twenty or thirty Rubbels, or litle more where wood is ſcanteſt.

Pauing of the ſtreetes.

The Moſcouian manner of building their houſes.

Bricke and Stone is no conueniem building in Moſcouia.

Onely the greateſt inconuenience of their woodden building, is the aptneſſe for fiering, which happeneth there verie often, and in as fearefull ſort, by reaſon of the drieneſſe and fatneſſe of the Firre, that beeing once fiered, it burneth like vnto a Torch, and is hardly quenched, till all be quite conſumed.

The danger of their wodden houſes.

CHAP. II.

Our ſecond Tract, relateth of what Linage or houſe the great Emperors are deſcended: And a view of their enſtalment or Inauguration in that ſupreame dignitie: with the form of publike Gouernment, & order obſerued in holding their Parliaments. Then, of the Nobility, dignifying the ſtate, with the regiment of their Prouinces; and Councell attending vpon the Emperour: His Cuſtomes, Reuennews & Sophiſmes; and a breefe relation of the Comminaltie, in their obedience and ſeruice.

Originall of the Moſcouian Imperiall houſe from the kings of Hungary.

THE ſirname of the Imperial houſe of Moſcouia or Ruſſia, is called Beala, receiuing Originall (as is ſuppoſed) from the kings of Hungaria, which may appeare the more probable; becauſe the Hungarian Kings (many years ſince) haue borne that name, as is noted by Bonfinius, and other Hiſtories wrirten of that Countrey. For, about the yeare, 1059. mention is made of one Beala, that ſucceeded his brother Andreas, who reduced the Hungarians to the Chriſtian Faith, from which they were faln by Turkiſh perſwaſion before. The ſecond of that name was called Beala the Blinde, after whome ſucceeded diuers of the ſame name.

The houſe Bealæ not naturally Moſcouian or Ruſſe.

That their Anceſtours came not of the Ruſſe Nation, Iuan Vaſilowich (Father to this Emperour) would many times boaſt, diſdaining (as it ſhould ſeeme) to haue his progeny deriued from the Ruſſian blood. As namely, to an Engliſh-man his Goldſmith, that had receiued Bullion of him to make certaine Plate: whom the Emperour commanded, to looke wel to his weight. For my Ruſſes (ſaid he) are all Theeues. Whereat the workman, looking ſtedfaſtly vpon the Emperor, began to ſmile.

Familiar talk betweene the Emperor, and an Engliſh Goldſmith.

The Emperour being of verie quicke conceite, charged him to tell, what hee ſmiled at. If your Maieſty will pardon me (quoth the Gold-ſmith) I will tell you. Your Highneſſe ſayde, that all the Ruſſes were Theeues, and forgotte (in the meane while) that your ſelfe was a Ruſſe. I thought ſo ſayde the Emperor, but thou art deceyued, for I am no Ruſſe: my Anceſtours were Germaines (for ſo they account the Hungarians, to bee part of the Germaine Nation) although (indeede) they come of the Hunnes, who molleſted and inuaded that country, and reſted in thoſe partes of Pannonia, now called Hungary.

How they aſpired to the Dukedome of Volodemer (which was their firſt degree, and ingrafting into Moſcouia.) And whether it were by Conqueſt, or by Marriage, or by what other meanes; no certainty is to be learned among them. But from theſe beginnings, of a ſmall Dukedom (which bare notwithſtanding an abſolute gouernment with it, as at that time did all the other Shires or Prouinces of Moſcouia) this houſe of Beala ſpred it ſelfe foorth, and aſpired (by degrees) vnto the Monarchie of the whole Countrey, as it is a thing well knowne, and but of late memory.

How firſt they came to the Dukedome of Volodemer not knowne.

The cheefe of that houſe, that aduanced the Stocke, and enlarged their Dominions: were the three laſt that reigned before this Emperour, to witte, Iuan Baſilieus, and Iuan, Father to the other that reigneth at this time. Whereof the firſt that tooke vnto him the Name and Title of Emperor, was Baſilieus, Father to Iuan, and Grandfather vnto this man. For (before that time) they onely were contented, to bee called by the Name of Great Dukes of Moſco or Moſcouia.

The aduancement of the houſe of Bealæ.

What hath beene done by eyther of theſe three, and how much they haue added vnto their firſt eſtate, eyther by Conqueſt, or otherwiſe; wee ſhall ſhew more at large, when we come to ſpeake of their Collonies, or purchaſes perforce. For the continuance of the race, this Houſe of Beala at this preſent, is in like caſe, as are many of the greateſt Houſes of Chriſtendome, (Viz:) the whole Stocke and Race, concluded in one, two, or ſome fewe of the blood. For, beſides the Emperour that now is, who hath no childe (neyther is like euer to to haue, for ought that can bee coniectured by the conſtitution of his bodye, and barrenneſſe of his wife, after ſo many yeares marriage) there is but one more, which is a Childe of ſixe or ſeauen yeares olde, in whom reſteth all the hope of ſucceſſion, and poſteritie of that houſe.

No hope of iſſue by the Emperour.

A great miſhap & much lamented, coſting alſo the Fathers life.

As for the other Brother, that vvas eldeſt of the three, and of the beſt toward neſſe: hee dyed of a blow giuen him by his Father vppon the head (in furie) with his walking Staffe, or (as ſome ſay) of a thruſt with the prong of it, driuen deep into his head. That hee meant him no ſuch mortall harme, when hee gaue him the blowe, appeared by his wonderfull great mourning and paſſion after his Sonnes vntimely death; which neuer left him, vntill it brought him to his Graue. Wherein may bee noted the Iuſtice of God, that punniſhed his delight in ſhedding of blood, with this murther of his Sonne by his owne hand. And ſo ended his dayes and tyranny together, with the murthering of himſelfe by extream greef, for this his vnhappy, and moſt vnnatural facte.

Treachery attempted againſt the young Princes life.

The Emperours younger Brother, of ſixe or ſeauen yeares olde (as was ſaid before;) is kept in a remote place from the Mosko, vnder the tuition and gouernment of his Mother, and her Kindred, of the houſe of the Nagaies: yet not ſafe (as I haue heard) from atempts of making away, by practiſe of ſome that would aſpire vnto the Crowne, if the Emperour dye without any yſſue. For, the Nurſe that taſted before him of certaine meate, (as I haue heard reported) dyed immediately.

That he is the Naturall Sonne vnto Iuan Vaſilowich, the Ruſſe people warrant it, by the fathers qualities, which appear alreadie in his tender yeeres. He delights to ſee Sheepe and other Cattle kilde, and to looke on their throates, while they are bleeding (which commonly, children are affrayde to beholde) and to beate Geeſe and Hennes with a Staffe, till he ſee them dead.

Qualities of no great commendation.

Another title of inheritance by the Durches of Holſt.

Beſides theſe of the maſle kinde, there is a Widdow, that hath right in the ſucceſſion, Siſter to the olde Emperour, and Aunt to him liuing; ſometime wife vnto Magnus, Duke of Holſt, Brother to the King of Denmarke, by whom ſhe had one daughter.

This Woman, ſince the death of her Husband, hath beene allured againe into Ruſsia, by ſome that loue the ſucceſſion better then her ſelfe, which appeareth by the ſequele. For her ſelfe, with her daughter, ſo ſoone as they were returned againe into Ruſsia, were thruſt into a Nunnery, where her daughter dyed this laſt yeare, but of no naturall diſeaſe, as was ſuppoſed.

The daughter dying in the Nunnery, the Mother liueth in no meane anguiſh.

The Mother remaineth ſtill in the Nunnery, bewayling her ſelfe, and curſing the time when ſhee returned into Ruſsia, enticed with the hope of Marriage, and many other fayre promiſes in the Emperours name. And thus it ſtandeth with the Imperiall ſtocke of Ruſsia, of the Houſe of Beala, which is like to determine in thoſe that now are, and to make a conuerſion of the Ruſſe Eſtate. If it bee into a Gouernement of ſome better temper, and milder conſtitution; it will bee happie for the people, that are nowe oppreſſed with intollerable ſeruitude.

Our nexte Diſcourſe, muſt extend it ſelfe, to report ſuch ſolemnities, as are commonly vſed at the Ruſſe Emperors Corronation, which followeth in this manner.

Of the manner of Crowning or Inauguration of the Ruſſe Emperors.

THE ſolemnities vſed at the Ruſſe Emperors Corronation, are on this manner. In the great Church of Prechiſte (or our Ladie) within the Emperours Caſtle, is erected a ſtage, whereon ſtandeth a Screene, that beareth vppon it the Imperiall Cappe and Robe, of exceeding rich ſtuffe. When the day of Inauguration is come, there reſorte thether, firſt the Patriarche with the Metropolitanes, Arch-byſhops, Byſhoppes, Abbots, and Priors, al richly clad in their Pontificalibus. Then enter the Deacons, with the Quier of ſingers: who ſo ſoon as the Emperor ſetteth foot into the church begin to ſing: Many yeares may liue noble Theodore Iuanowich, &c. Whereunto the Patriarch and Metropolite, with the reſt of the Cleargy, anſwere with a certaine Hymne, in forme of a prayer, ſinging it al togeather, with a great noiſe. The Hymne being ended, the Patriarch with the Emperor mount vp the ſtage, where ſtandeth a ſeat ready for the Emperour. Whereon the Patriarch willeth him to ſit down, and then placing himſelfe by him, vppon another ſeate prouided for that purpoſe, boweth down his head toward the groũd, and ſaith this prayer.

The eccleſiaſticall attendants.

The prayer vttered by the Patriarch, before the Corronation.

Oh Lord God, King of Kinges, Lord of Lords, which by the Prophet Samuell diddeſt chuſe thy ſeruant Dauid, and annoint him for King ouer thy people Iſrael; heare nowe our Prayers, and looke from thy Sanctuarie vpon this thy ſeruant Theodore, whome thou haſt choſen, and exalted for King, ouer theſe thy holy Nations. Annoint him with the Oyle of gladneſſe, protect him by thy power, put vpon his head a Crowne of Gold & precious ſtones, giue him length of dayes, place him in the ſeat of Iuſtice, ſtrengthen his arme, make ſubiect vnto him all the barbarous Nations. Let thy feare be in his whole heart; turne him from an euill Faith, and from all errour, and ſhew him the ſaluation of thy holie and vniuerſall Church; that he may iudge thy people with Iuſtice, and protect the children of the poore; and finally attaine euerlaſting life. This praier he ſpeaketh with a low voyce, and then pronounceth alowd: All praiſe and power to God the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt.

The Ceremonies to bee vſed in order.

The prayer being ended, he commandeth certaine Abbots to reach the Imperiall Robe and Cap; which is done verie decently, and with great ſolemnitie, the Patriarch withall pronouncing alowde; Peace be vnto all. And ſo he beginneth another prayer to this effect: Bow your ſelues together with vs, and pray to him that reigneth ouer all. Preſerue him (O Lord) vnder thy protection, keepe him that he may do good and holy things, let iuſtice ſhine foorth in his dayes, that we may liue quietly without ſtrife and malice.

This is pronounced ſomwhat ſoftly by the Patriarch, whereto he addeth againe alowd: Thou art the King of the whol world, and the Sauiour of our ſoules, to thee the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghoſt, be all praiſe for euer and euer, Amen. Then putting on the Robe and the Cap, he bleſſeth the Emperor with the ſigne of the Croſſe: ſaying withall; In the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt. The like is done by the Metropolites, Arch-byſhops, and Byſhops: who all in their order come to the Chaire, and one after another, doe bleſſe the Emperor with their two forefingers.

According to their ancient cuſtome

Then is ſaide by the Patriarch another prayer, that beginneth, O moſt holy Virgin, mother of God, &c. After which, a Deacon pronounceth with an high lowde voyce: Manie yeares to Noble Theodore, good, honourable, beloued of God, great Duke of Volodemer, of Mosko, Emperour, and Monarch of all Ruſsia, &c. Wherto the other prieſts and Deacons, that ſtand ſomewhat far off by the Altar or Table, anſwere ſinging: Many yeares, many yeares to the noble Theodore. The ſame note is taken vppe by the Prieſtes and Deacons, that are placed at the right and left ſide of the Church, and then all together they chaunt and thunder out, ſinging; Many yeeres to the noble Theodore, good, honourable, beloued of God, great Duke of Volodemer, Mosko, Emperour of all Ruſsia, &c.

Homage and obeylance done to the Emperor.

Theſe ſolemnities being ended, firſt cõmeth the Patriarch with the Metropolits, Arch-byſhops, and Byſhoppes; then the Nobility, and the whol companie in their order, to doe homage vnto the Emperour, bending downe theyr heades, and knocking them at his feete vnto the very ground.

The Stile wherewith hee is inueſted at his Corronation, runneth after this manner.

THeodore Iuanowich, by the Grace of God, great Lord and Emperor of all Ruſsia, great Duke of Volodemer, Mosko, and Nouograd, King of Cazan, King of Aſtracan, Lord of Plesko, and great Duke of Smolensko, of Twerria, Ioughoria, Permia, Vadska, Bulgharia, and others. Lord and great Duke of Nouograd of the Low Countreyes, of Chernigo, Rezan, Polotskoy, Roſtoue, Yaruſlauely, Bealozera, Liefland, Oudoria, Obdoria, and Condenſa: Commander of all Siberia, and of the North partes, and Lorde of many other Countries, &c.

This

The Emperor proud of his many Titles.

This ſtyle containeth in it all the Emperors Prouinces, and ſetteth foorth his greatneſſe. And therefore they haue a very great delight and pride in it, forcing not onely their owne people, but likewiſe ſtrangers (that haue any matter to deliuer to the Emperor by ſpeech or writing) to repeate the whole forme from the beginning to the end. Which breedeth much cauill, and ſometimes quarrell, betwixt them and the Tartar, and Poland Ambaſſadors; who refuſe to call him Czar, that is Emperor, and to repeat the other parts of his long ſtyle.

The State or forme of their gouernment.

The manner of their Gouernement, is much after the Turkiſh faſhion: which they doe ſeeme to imitate as neere as the Countrey, and reach of their capacities (in politick affayres) will giue them leaue to doe.

The Ruſſe gouernment tyrannical.

The State and forme of their Gouernement is plaine tyrannicall, as applying all to the behoofe of the Prince, and that after a moſt open and barbarous manner; as may appeare by the Sophiſmata, or ſecrets of their Gouernment afterward ſet down, aſwel for the keeping of the Nobility and Commons in an vnder proportion, and farre vneuen ballance in their ſeuerall degrees; as alſo in their impoſitions and exactions, wherein they exceed al iuſt meaſure, without any regard of Nobilitie or people.

Exaction in Noblemen ouer the meaner ſort.

Furthermore, it giueth the Nobilitie a kinde of iniuſt, and vnmeaſured liberty, to command and exact vppon the Commons and baſer ſors of people, in all parts of the Realme whereſoeuer they come, eſpecially in the place where theyr Lands lye, or where they are appointed by the Emperor to gouerne vnder him. Alſo to the Commons ſome ſmall contentment, in that they paſſe ouer their lands (by diſcent of inheritance) to whither ſon they will: which commonly they do after our Gauill kinde, and diſpoſe of their goodes by gift or Teſtament, without anie controulment. Wherein notwithſtanding, both Nobility and Commons are but ſtorers for the Prince, all running in the end into the Emperors Coffers: as may appear by the practiſe of enriching his treaſurie, and the manner of Exactions ſette downe in the title of his Cuſtomes and Reuennewes.

The Nobilitie and Cõmons, ſtorers for the Prince.

Concerning the principall points and matters of State, wherein the Soueraignty conſiſteth (as the making and annulling of publike Lawes, the making of Magiſtrats, power to make warre or league with any forraine State, to execute or to pardon life, with the right of appeale in all matters, both ciuill and criminall) they doe ſo wholly and abſolutely pertaine to the Emperor and his Councell vnder him; as that hee may be ſaide to be the Soueraigne Commander; and the executioner of all theſe. For, as touching any Law or publike order of the Realme, it is euer determined of, before any publike Aſſembly or Parliament bee ſummoned. Where beſides his Councel, he hath none other to conſult with him of ſuch matters as are concluded before hãd but onely a few Byſhoppes, Abbots, and Friars: to no other end, then to make aduantage of the peoples ſuperſtitions, euen againſt themſelues which think to be holy and iuſt, that paſſeth with conſent of their Byſhops and Cleargy men, whatſoeuer it bee.

Of Soueraign power.

For which purpoſe, the Emperors are content to make much of the corupt ſtate of the Church, as now it is among them, and to nouriſh the ſame by extraordinary fauours and immunities to the Byſhopps Seas, Abbeyes, and Fryaries: as knowing, ſuperſtition and falſe Religion beſt to agree with a tyrannicall State, and to be a ſpeciall meanes to vphold and maintaine the ſame.

Benefit made by corruption

Secondly, as touching the publique Offices and Magiſtracies of the Realme, there is none Hereditarie, neyther any ſo great nor ſo little in that Countrey, but the beſtowing of it, is done immediately by the Emperour himſelfe. Inſomuch, that the very Diackes or Clearkes in euery head Towne, are (for the moſt part) aſſigned by himſelfe. Notwithſtanding, the Emperor that now is (the better to entend his Deuotions) referreth al ſuch matters pertaining to the State, wholly to the ordering of his Wiues brother, the Lord Borris Federowich Godonae.

Offices giuen by the Emperor himſelfe.

Thirdly, the like is to bee ſaide of the Iuriſdiction, concerning matters iudicial, ſpecially ſuch as concerne life and death: Wherein there is none that hath any authority, or publike Iuriſdiction that goeth by diſcent, or is held by Charter; but al at the appointment and pleaſure of the Emperour.

Of iudiciall matters concerning life & death.

And

And the ſame practiſed by the Iudges with ſuch awe and reſtraint; as that they dare not determine vpon any ſpecial matter, but muſt referre the ſame wholly, vp the Mosko to the Emperours Councell. To ſhew his Soueraignty ouer the liues of his Subiects, the late Emperour Iuan Vaſilowich (in his walkes or progreſſes) if he had miſliked the face or perſon of any man whom hee met by the way, or that looked vpon him; would command his head to be ſtrook off. Which was preſently done, and the head caſt before him.

The Emperors power ouer life.

Fourthly, for the ſoueraigne appeale, and giuing of pardons in criminall matters to ſuch as are conuicted; it is wholly at the pleſure and grace of the Emperor. Wherein alſo the Empreſſe that now is, being a woman of great clemency, and withall, delighting to deale in publike affaires of the Realme, (the rather to ſupply the defect of her husband) doth behaue her ſelfe after an abſolute manner, giuing out pardon (ſpecially on her birth day, & other ſolemne times) in her owne name, by open Proclamation, without any mention at all of the Emperor.

Of appeales and pardon in criminall caſes.

The Empres her free pardon.

Their higheſt Court of publike conſultation, for matter of State, is called the Zabore, that is, the Publike Aſſembly. The ſtates and degrees of perſons that are preſent at their Parliaments, are theſe in order. Firſt, the Emperour himſelfe. Secondly, ſome of his Nobility, about the number of twenty, being all of his Councell. Thirdly, certaine of the Cleargymen, &c. about the ſame number. As for Burghers, or other to repreſent the Comminalty, they haue no place there: the people beeing of no better account with them, then as ſeruants or bondſlaues, that are to obey, not to make lawes, nor to know any thing of publike matters, before they are concluded.

The manner of holding their Parliaments.

No commons in Parliament

The Court of Parliament (called Zabore) is held in this manner. The Emperour cauſeth to be ſummoned ſuch of his Nobility, as himſelfe thinketh meete, being (as was ſaid) all of his Councell: together with the Patriarch, who calleth his Cleargy, to wit, the two Metropolites, the two Archbiſhops, with ſuch Biſhops, Abbost, and Fryars, as are of beſt account and reputation among them. When they are all aſſembled at the Emperors Court, the day is intimated when the Seſſion ſhal begin. Which commonly is vpon Friday, for the religion of that day.

The order of the ſummons or aſſembling

When the day is come, the Cleargymen aſſemble before, at the time & place appointed, which is called the Stolly. And when the Emperour commeth attended by his Nobility, they ariſe all, and meete him in an out-roome, following their Patriarch, who bleſſeth the Emperour with his two fore-fingers, laying them on his forehead, and the ſides of his face, & then kiſſeth him on the right ſide of his breaſt. So they paſſe on into their Parliament houſe, where they ſit in this order. The Emperor is enthronized on the one ſide of the Chamber. In the next place, not farre from him, at a ſmall ſquare Table (that giueth roome to twelue perſons or thereabouts) ſitteth the Patriarch, with the Metropolites and Biſhops, & certaine of the principall Nobility of the Emperours Councell, together with two Diacks or Secretaries (called Dumnoy Dyakey) that enact that which paſſeth. The reſt place themſelues on Benches round about the Roome, euery man in his ranck after his degree. Then is there propounded by one of the Secretaries (who repreſenteth the Speaker) the cauſe of their aſſembly, and the principall matters that they are to conſider of. For, to propound bils, what euery man thinketh good for the publike benefit (as in other Countries is vſed) the Ruſſe Parliament alloweth no ſuch cuſtome, nor liberty to ſubiects.

The place of meeting for the aſſembly.

Their maner of ſitting in Parliament.

The points being opened, the Patriarch (with his Cleargy-men) haue the prerogatiue, to be firſt asked their vote, or opinſon, what they thinke of the pointes propounded by the Secretary. Whereto they anſwere in order, according to their degrees, but all in one forme, without any diſcourſe: as hauing learned their Leſſon before, that ſerueth their turnes at al Parliaments alike, whatſoeuer is propounded. Commonly it is to this effect. That the Emperor and his Councell are of great wiſedome, and experience, touching the pollicies and publike affaires of the Realme, and farre better able to iudge what is profitable for the Common-wealth, then they are, which attend vpon the ſeruice of God onely, and matters of Religion. And therefore it may pleaſe them to proceede. That inſtead of their aduiſe, they will aide them with their prayers, as their duties ties and vocations do require, &c. To this or like effect, hauing made their answeres euery man in his course, vp standeth some Abbot or Fryar, more bold then the rest (yet appointed before hand, as a matter of forme) and desireth the Emperor it wold please his Maiesty, to command to be deliuered vnto them, what his Maiesties owne iudgement, and determinate pleasure is, as touching those matters propounded by his Deiake?

The forme of the Emperors answere.

Whereto is replied by the saide Secretary, in the Emperors name. That his Highnesse, with those of his Noble Councell (vpon good and sound aduice) haue found the matters proposed, to bee very good and necessary for the Common-wealth of his Realme. Notwithstanding, forasmuch as they are religious men, and know what is right; his Maiesty requireth their godly opinions, yea and their censures too, for the approuing or correcting of the saide propositions. And therefore desireth them againe, to speake their mindes freely. And if they shall like to giue their consents, that then the matters may passe to a full conclusion.

Heereunto, when the Cleargy-men haue giuen their consents (which they vse to do without any great pausing) they take their leaues, with blessing of the Emperor: who bringeth the Patriarch on his way so farre as the next Roome, and so returneth to his seate, till all be made ready for his returne homeward. The Actes that thus are passed by the Zabore or Parliament, the Deiakeis or Secretaries draw into a forme of Proclamation, which they send abroad into euery Prouince, & head-towne of the Realme, to bee published there, by the Dukes & Deiakeis, or Secretaries of those places. The Session of Parliament being fully ended; the Emperour inuiteth the Cleargy-men to a solemne Dinner. And so they depart euery man to his home.

Of the Nobility, and by what meanes it is kept in an vnder proportion, agreeable to that State.

The degrees of persons or estates of Russia (besides the Soueraigne State or Emperour himselfe) are these in order. First, the Nobility which is of four sorts. Whereof the chiefe for birth, authority, and reuennue, are called the Vdelney Knazey, that is, the exempt or priuiledged Dukes. These held sometime a seuerall iurisdiction, and absolute authority within their Precincts, much like vnto the States or Nobles of Germany. But afterwards (reseruing their rights vpon composition) they yeelded themselues to this house of Beala, when it began to waxe mighty, and to enlarge it selfe by ouermatching their neighbours. Onely they were bound to serue the Emperour in his warres, with a certaine number of horse. But the late Emperour Iuan Vasilowich, Father to this Prince, beeing a man of high spirit, and subtle in his kinde, meaning to reduce his gouernement into a more strickt forme; began by degrees to clip off their greatnesse, and to bring it downe to a lesser proportion: till in the ende, he made them not onely his vassals, but his Kolophey, that is, his very villains or bond-slaues. For so they terme & write themselues, in any publike instrument or priuate petition which they make to the Emperour. So that now they hold their authorities, lands, liues and all at the Emperors pleasure, as the rest do.

The cunning of the late Emperour.

The meanes and practise whereby he wrought this to effect, against those, and other of the Nobility (so well as I could note out of the report of his doings) were these, and such like. First, he cast priuate emulations among them, about prerogatiue of their Titles and Dignities. Wherin he vsed to set on the Inferiors, to preferre or equall themselues to those, that were accounted to be of the Nobler houses. Where hee made his aduantage of their mallice and contentions, the one against the other, by receiuing deuised matter, and accusations of secret practise and conspiracies, to bee intended against his person and state. And so, hauing singled out the greatest of them, and cut them off, with the good liking of the rest; hee fell at last to open practise, by forcing of the other to yeeld their rights vnto him.

The Emperors practise and proceeding against both the Factions.

2. He diuided his subiects into two parts or Factions by a generall schisme. The one part he called the Oppressini or Select men. These were such of the Nobility and Gentry, as hee tooke to his owne part, to protect, and maintaine them as his faithfull subiects. The other he called Zemskey, or the Commons. The Zemskey contained the base and vulgar sort, with such Noblemen and Gentlemen as he meant to cut off, as suspected to mislike his gouernment, and to haue a meaning to practise against him. Wherein he prouided that the Oppressini, for number ber and quality of valour, money, armor, &c. far exceeded the other of the Zempskey side, whom hee put (as it were) from vnder his protection: so that if any of thē were spoyled or killed by those of the Oppressini (which he accounted of his owne part) there was no amends to bee sought for, by way of publike iustice, or by complaint to the Emperor.

The Faction of Oppressini and Zemskey, deuised by the Emperor.

The distinguishing of the Oppressini & Zempskey each from other.

The whole number of both parts was orderly registred and kept in a Booke: so that euery man knew, who was a Zempskey man, and who of the Oppressini. And this liberty of the one part, to spoyle and kill the other, without any helpe of Magistrate, or law (that continued seuen years) enriched that side and the Emperors treasury, and wrought that withall, which hee intended by this practise, viz. to take out of the way such of the Nobility, as himselfe misliked: wherof were slaine (within one weeke) to the number of three hūdred within the Citty of Mosko. This tyrannicall practise, of making a generall Schisme, and publike diuision among the subiects of his whole Realme, proceeded (as should seem) from an extreme doubt, and desperate feare, which he had conceiued of most of his Nobility, and Gentlemen of his Realme, in his warres with the Polonian and Chrim Tartar. What time he grew into a vehement suspition (conceiued of the ill successe of his affayres) that they practised treason with the Polonian and Chrim. Whereupon he executed some, and deuised this way to be rid of the rest.

The reason of this cruell practise.

And this wicked pollicy and tyrannous practise (though now it be ceassed) hath so troubled that Country, and filled it so full of grudge and mortall hatred euer since, that it will not bee quenched (as it seemeth now) till it burne againe into a ciuill flame.

3 Hauing thus pulled them, and seased all their inheritance, lands, priuiledges, &c. saue some very small part, which he left to their name; he gaue them other lands of the tenour of Pomestnoy (as they cal it) that are held at the Emperors pleasure, lying farre off in another Country, and so remoued them into another of his Prouinces, where they might haue neyther fauour, nor authority, not being natiue nor well knowne there. So that now these of the cheese Nobility (called Vdelney Knazey) are equalled with the rest: saue that in the opinion and fauor of the people they are of more account, and keepe still the prerogatiue of their place, in all their publike meetings.

Lands helde at the Emperors pleasure.

Their practise to keepe downe these houses from rising againe, and recouering their dignities, are these, & such like. First, many of their heyres are kept vnmarried perforce, that the stock may dye with thē. Some are sent into Siberia, Cazan and Astracan, vnder pretence of seruice, & there eyther made away, or else fast clapped vp. Some are put into Abbeyes, and sheare themselues Fryars by pretence of a vow to be made voluntary, and of their owne accord, but indeed forced vnto it by fear, vpon some pretenced crime obiected against them. Where they are so garded by some of speciall trust, and the Couent it selfe (vpon whose head it standeth, that they make no escape) as that they haue no other hope, but to end their liues there. Of this kinde, there are many of very great Nobility.

Houses kept downe from rising and recouering their Dignity.

These and such like wayes (begun by the Emperor Iuan Vasilowich) are still practised by the Godonoes, who being aduanced by the mariage of the Empresse their kinswoman, rule both the Emperor, and his Realme, (specially Borris Federowich Godonoe, brother to the Empresse) & endeuour by all meanes to cut off, or keepe downe all of the best and auncientest Nobility. Whereof diuers already they haue taken away, whom they thoght likeliest to make head against them, and to hinder their purpose, as Knez Andreas Guraken Bulgatkoue, a man of great birth and authority in the Country. The like they haue done with Peeter Gollauni (whō they put into a dungeon where hee ended his life) with Knez Vasilie Vriwich Golloohen, with Andrieu Inanowich Suskoy, accounted among them for a man of great wisedome. So this last yeare was killed in a Monastery, (whether they had thrust him) on Knez Iuan Petrowich Suskoy, a man of great valour, and seruice in that Country: who about fiue or sixe yeares since, bare out the siedge of the Citty Vobsko, made by Stepan Batore King of Polonia, with one hundred thousand men, and repulsed him very valiantly, with great honour to himselfe and his Country, & disgrace to the Polonian. Also Micheta Romanowich, Names of the greateſt houſes of the Ruſſe Nobility.

The names of theſe Families of greateſt Nobility, are theſe in their order. The firſt is of Cnez Volodemer, which reſteth at this time in one daughter a widdow, and without childrē (mentioned before) ſomtime Wife to Hartock Magnus, brother to the King of Denmarke, now cloſed within a Nunnery. The ſecond Knez Metheloskey, thruſt into a Friery, and his onely ſonne kept from marriage, to decay the houſe. The third Glimskoy: but one left of his houſe, and he without children, ſaue one daughter. The fourth Suskoy, whereof there are foure brethren young men, and vnmarried all. The fift Hubetskoy. Of this houſe are foure liuing. The ſixt Bulgaloy, now called Guletchey houſe, whereof are fiue liuing, but youths all. The ſeauenth Vorallinskoy. Two left of that ſtock. The eight Odgoskey. Two. The ninth Telletskoy. One. The tenth Taytoue. Three. Theſe are the names of the cheefe Families called Vdelney Knazay: that in effect haue loſt all now, ſaue the very name it ſelfe, and fauour of the people, which is like one day to reſtore them againe, if any be left.

The ſecond degree of Nobility.

The ſecond degree of Nobility, is of the Boiarens. Theſe are ſuch, as the Emperor honoureth (beſide their Nobility) with the Title of Counſellers. The reuennue of theſe two ſorts of Nobles, that riſeth out of their Lands aſſigned them by the Emperor, and held at his pleaſure (for of their owne Inheritance there is little left them, as was ſaid before) is about a thouſand marks a yeare: beſides a penſion which they receiue of the Emperour, for their ſeruice in his wars, to the ſumme of ſeuen hundred Rubbels a yeare, and none aboue that ſumme.

The authority of the Empreſſes Brother, and his large Inheritances.

But in this number, the Lord Borris Federowich Godenoe is not to be reckoned, that is like a Tranſcendent, and in no ſuch predicament with the reſt, being the Emperors brother in law, his Protectour for direction; for command and authority Emperor of Ruſsia. His yearely reuennue (in land and penſion) amounteth to the ſumme of 93700. Rubbels and more, as appeareth by the particulars. He hath of inheritance (which himſelfe hath augmented in Vaſma Dorogoboſe, ſixe thouſand Rubbels a yeare. For his Office of Connick, or Maſter of the Horſe, twelue thouſand Rubbels, or Markes, raiſed out of the Canaslue Sloboday, or the liberties pertaining to that Office, which are certaine Lands and Townes neere about the Mosko. Beſides, all the Meddow and Paſture ground on both ſides the banke of the riuer Mosko, thirty verſt vp the ſtreme, and forty verſt downwards. For his penſion of the Emperour (beſides the other for his Office) fifty thouſand Rubbels. Out of the Prouince or Shire of Vagha, there is giuen him for a peculiar (exempted out of the Chetfird of Poſolskoy, two & thirty thouſand Rubbels, beſide a rent of Furs. Out of Rezan and Seuer, (another peculiar) thirty thouſand Rubbels. Out of Otfer and Turiock, another exempt place, eight thouſand Rubbels. For rent of Bathſtoaues and Bathing-houſes without the walles of Mosko, fifteene hundred Rubbels. Beſides his pomeſt, or lands which he holdeth at the Emperours pleaſure, which farre exceedeth the proportion of land allotted to the reſt of the Nobility.

Allowance for a ſimple Brother.

One other there is of the houſe of Glinskoy, that diſpendeth in land and penſion, about forty thouſand Rubbels yearely. Which he is ſuffered to enioy, becauſe he hath married Borris his Wiues ſiſter, being himſelfe ſimple, and almoſt a Naturall. The ordering of him & his Lands are committed to Borris.

The third ſort of Nobility.

In the third rancke are the Voyauodey, or ſuch Nobles as are, or haue beene Generals in the Emperours warres. Which deliuer the honour of their Title to their poſterities alſo: who take their place aboue the other Dukes and Nobles, that are not of the two former ſorts, viz. of the Vdelney Knazey, nor of the Boiarens.

Theſe three degrees of their Nobility (to wit) the Vdelney Knazey, the Boiarens, and the Voiauodey haue the addition of Vich, put vnto their ſirname as Borris Federowich, &c. which is a note of honor, that the reſt may not vſurpe. And in caſe it be not added in the naming of thē; they may ſue the Beſtcheſt, or penalty of diſhonor vpon them, that otherwiſe ſhall terme them.

The fourth degree of Nobility.

The fourth and loweſt degree of Nobility with them, is of ſuch as beare the name of Knazey or Dukes, but come of the yonger Brothers of thoſe chiefe houſes, ſes, through many diſcents, and haue no inheritance of their owne, ſaue the bare name or title of Duke onely. For their order is, to deliuer their names and titles of their dignities ouer to all their Children alike, whatſoeuer elſe they leaue thē. So that the ſonnes of a Voiauodey, or Generall in the fielde, are called Voiauodey, though they neuer ſaw the fielde, and the ſonnes of a Knez or Duke, are called Knazey, though they haue not one groat of inheritance or liuelyhood, to maintaine themſelues withall. Of this ſort there are ſo many, that the plenty maketh them cheape: ſo that you ſhall ſee Dukes glad to ſerue a meane man, for fiue or ſix rubbels or marks a yeare; and yet they will ſtand highly vpon their Beſtcheſt or reputation of their honours. And theſe are their ſeuerall degrees of Nobility.

The ſecond degree of perſons, is of their Sina Boiarskey, or the ſons of Gentlemen: which all are preferred, & hold that name by their ſeruice in the Emperors wars, being Soldiors by their very ſtocke & birth. To which order are referred their Diacks or Secretaries, that ſerue the Emperor in euery head towne, being ioyned in Commiſſion with the Dukes of that place.

The laſt are their Commons, whom they call Mouſicks. In which number they reckon their Merchants, and their common Artificers. The very loweſt & baſeſt ſort of this kinde (which are helde in no degree) are their Country people, whom they call Chriſtianeis. Of the Sina Boiarskey (which are all Soldiours) we are to ſee in the deſcription of their Forces, and Military prouiſions. Concerning their Mouſicks, what their condition and behauiour is, expect them among the Common people.

The whole Country of Ruſsia (as was ſaide before) is diuided into foure parts, which they call Chetfirds, or Tetrarchies. Euery Chetfird containeth diuers Shires, and is annexed to a ſeuerall Office, whereof it takes the name.

The firſt Chetfird or Tetrarchy beareth the name of Foſoskoy Chetfird, or the Iuriſdiction of the Office of Ambaſſages, and at this time is vnder the chiefe Secretary & Officer of the Ambaſſages, called Andreas Shalcaloue. The ſtanding fee or ſtipend that he receiueth yearely of the Emperor for this ſeruice, is one hundred rubbels or markes.

The ſecond is called the Roſeradney Chetfird, becauſe it is proper to the Roſerade or high Conſtable. At this time it pertaineth (by vertue of Office) to Baſilie Shalcaloue, brother to the Chancellor; but it is executed by one Zapon Abramoue. His penſion is an hundred rubbels yearly.

The third is the Chetfird of Pomeſtnoy, as pertaining to that Office. This keepeth a Regiſter of all Lands giuen by the Emperor for ſeruice, to his Noblemen, Gentlemen, & others, he giueth out & taketh in all aſſurances for them. The Officer at this time is called Eleazar Welluſgine. His ſtipend is 500. rubbels a yeare.

The fourth is called Caſſanskoy Dworets, as beeing appropriate to the Office that hath the iuriſdiction of the kingdomes of Cazan and Aſtracan, with the other towns lying vpon the Volgha, now ordered by one Druzhine Penteleoue, a man of very ſpeciall account among thē, for his wiſedome, and promptneſſe in matters of policy. His penſion is 150. rubbels a yeare.

From theſe Chetfirds or Tetrarchies, is exempted the Emperors inheritance or Vochin (as they call it) for that it pertained (from ancient time) to the houſe of Beala, which is the ſur-name of the Imperiall bloud. This ſtandeth of 36. Townes with their bounds or territories. Beſides diuers peculiar iuriſdictions, which are likewiſe deducted out of thoſe Chetfirds, as the Shire of Vagha (belonging to the Lord Borris Federowich Godonoe) and ſuch like.

Theſe are the cheefe Gouernors or Officers of the Prouinces, not reſident at their charge abroad, but attending the Emperor whereſoeuer he goeth, and carrying their Offices about with thē, which for the moſt part they hold at Mosko, as the Emperors chiefe Seate.

The parts and practiſe of theſe foure Offices, is to receiue all complaints and actions whatſoeuer, that are brought out of their ſeuerall Chetfirds and quarters, & to informe them to the Emperors Counſell. Likewiſe to ſend direction againe to thoſe that are vnder them in their ſaide Prouinces, for all matters giuen in charge by the Emperor and his Counſell, to bee done or put in execution within their Precincts.

For the ordering of euery particular Prouince of theſe foure Chetfirds, there is appointed appointed one of theſe Dukes, which were reckoned before in the loweſt degree of their Nobility, and which are reſident in the head townes of the ſaid Prouinces. Whereof euery one hath ioyned with him in Commiſſion, a Dyack or Secretary, to aſſiſt him, or rather to direct him. For in the executing of their Commiſſion, the Dyack doth all.

The Commiſsion of the Dukes or Preſidents of Shires.

The parts of their Commiſſion are theſe in effect. Firſt, to heare and determine in all ciuill matters within their Precinct. To which purpoſe, they haue vnder them certaine Officers, as Gubnoy Starets, or Coroners, who, beſides the tryall of ſelfe-murders, are to attach Fellons: and the Soudiæ or vnder-Iuſtices, who themſelues alſo may heare and determine in all matters of the ſame nature, among the Country people of their owne Wards or Bayliwicks: but ſo, that in caſe eyther party diſſent, they may appeale, and goe farther to the Duke & Dyack, that reſide within the head towne. From whom alſo, they may remoue the matter to the higher Court at Mosko, of the Emperours Counſell, where lie all appeales. They haue vnder them alſo Sotskoy Starets, that is, Aldermen or Bailiffes of the hundreds.

For criminall matters and ſuch occaſions

Secondly, in all criminall matters, as theft, murder, treaſon, &c. they haue authority to apprehend, to examine, and to impriſon the malefactor, & ſo hauing receiued perfect euidence and information of the cauſe, they are to ſend it (ready drawne and orderly digeſted) vp to the Mosko, to the officer of the Chetfird whervnto that Prouince is annexed: by whom it is referred and propounded to the Emperors Counſell. But to determine in any matter criminall, or to do execution vpõ the party offending; is more then their Commiſſion will allow them to do.

Order for Proclamations & other matters.

Thirdly, if there bee any publike ſeruice to be done within that Prouince, (as the publiſhing of any Law, or common order, by way of Proclamation, collecting of taxes, and impoſitions for the Emperour, muſtering of Soldiors, and ſending them foorth at the day, and to the place aſſigned by the Empetour or his Counſell) all theſe and ſuch like, pertaine vnto their charge.

These Dukes and Dyacks are appointed to their place by the Emperour himſelfe, and are changed ordinarily at euery yeares ende; except vpon ſome ſpeciall liking or ſuit, the time be prolonged for a yeare or two more. They are men of thẽſelues of no credite, nor fauour with the people, where they gouerne, being neyther borne, nor brought vp among them, nor yet hauing inheritance of their owne there, or elſewhere. Onely of the Emperor they haue for that ſeruice, an hundred Marks a yeare he that hath moſt; ſome 50. ſome but 30. Which maketh them more ſuſpected and odious to the people, becauſe being ſo bare, and commming freſh and hungry vpon them; lightly euery yeat they racke and ſpoile them, without all regard of iuſtice, or conſcience. Which is eaſily tollerated by the cheefe Officers of the Chetfirds, to the ende they may rob them againe, & haue a better booty when they call them to account: which commonly they do at the end of their ſeruice, making an aduantage of their iniuſtice, & oppreſſion ouer the poore people. There are fewof them, but they come to the Pudkey or whippe when their time is ended, which themſelues (for the moſt part) do make account of. And therefore they furniſh themſelues, with all the ſpoile they can for the time of their gouernment; that they may haue for both turnes, aſwell for the Emperor, and Lord of the Chetfird, as to reſerue ſome good part for themſelues.

Concerning the Dukes & Dyacks, and their credite.

Heere one theefe robbeth another, and careth for no puniſhment.

They that are appointed to gouerne abroad, are men of this quality: ſaue that in the foure border Townes (that are of greateſt importance) are ſet men of more ſpeciall valor & truſt, two in euery towne. Whereof one is euer of the Emperours priuy Counſell. Theſe 4 border Towns, are Smolensko, Vobsko, Nouogrod, & Cazan, whereof three lie towards the Polonian & Sweaden, one bordereth farre off vpon the Chrim Tartar. Theſe haue larger Commiſſion, then the other Dukes of the Prouinces that I ſpake of before, and may do execution in criminall matters. Which is thought behouefull for the Commonwealth: for incident occaſions that may happen vpon the borders, that are far of, and may not ſtay for direction, about euery occurrent and particular matter from the Emperor and his Counſell. They are changed euery yeare (except as before) and haue for their ſtipend, 700. rubbels a yeare he that hath moſt: ſome haue but foure hundred rubbels. Many of theſe

Officers for the foure bordering towns.

The foure border towns

The yearely ſtipend of thoſe Officers places, that are of greateſt importance, and almoſt the whole Country, is managed (at this time) by the Godonoes & their Clients.

The gouernment of Mosko.

The Citty of Mosko (that is the Emperors ſeat) is gouerned altogether by the Emperors Counſell. All matters there (both ciuill and criminall) are heard and determined in the ſeuerall Courts, helde by ſome of the ſaid Counſell, that reſide there all the yeare long.

Of the Zempskey houſe.

Onely for their ordinary matters (as buildings, reparations, keeping of their ſtreetes decent and cleane, collections, leuying of taxes, impoſitions & ſuch like) are appointed two Gentlemen, and two Dyacks or Secretaries, who hold a Court together for the ordring of ſuch matters. This is called the Zempskey houſe. If any towns-man ſuſpect his ſeruant of theft or like matter, hither he may bring him, to haue him examined vpon the Pudkey, or other torture. Beſides theſe two Gentlemen and Secretaries, that order the whole City, there are Staruſts or Aldermen for euery ſeuerall Company. The Alderman hath his Sotskey or Conſtable, & the Cõſtable hath certaine Decetskeis or Decurions vnder him, which haue the ouerſight of ten houſholds a peece, whereby euery diſorder is ſooner eſpide, and the common ſeruice hath the quicker diſpatch. The whole number of Cittizens (poore and rich) are reduced into Companies. The chiefe Officers (as the Dyacks & Gentlemen) are appointed by the Emperor himſelfe, thẽ Staruſt by the Genrlemen & Dyacks, the Sotskoy by the Staruſt or Alderman, & the Decetskeis by the Conſtables.

Aldermen & Conſtables.

This manner of gouernment of their Prouinces and Townes, if it were aſwell ſet for the giuing of iuſtice indifferently to al ſorts, as it is to preuent innouations, by keeping of the Nobility within order, and the Commons in ſubiection; it might ſeeme (in that kinde) to bee no bad, nor vnpollitique way, for the containing of ſo large a Common-wealth, of that breadth and length as is the Kingdome of Ruſsia. But the oppreſſion and ſlauery is ſo open, and ſo great, that a man would maruell, how the Nobility & people ſhould ſuffer themſelues to be brought vnder it; while they had any meanes to auoid and repulſe it: or being ſo ſtrengthned as it is at this preſent, how the Emperors thẽ-ſelues can be content to practiſe the ſame, with ſo opẽ iniuſtice & oppreſſion of their ſubiects, being thẽſelues of a Chriſtian profeſſion.

Preuention of innouations.

Oppreſſion and ſlauery very great.

By this it appeareth, how hard a matter it were, to alter the ſtate of the Ruſſe Gouernment, as now it ſtandeth. Firſt, becauſe they haue none of the Nobility able to make head. As for the Lords of the foure Chetfirds or Tetrarchies, they are men of no Nobility, but Dyacks, aduanced by the Emperour, depending on his fauour, & attending onely about his owne perſon. And fot the Dukes that are appointed to gouerne vnder them, they are but men of a titular dignity (as was ſaid before) of no power, authority, nor credite, ſaue that which they haue out of the Office, for the time they enioy it. Which doth purchaſe them no fauour, but rather hatred of the people, foraſmuch as they ſee that they are ſet ouer thẽ, not ſo much for any care to do them right and iuſtice; as to keep them vnder in a miſerable ſubiection, and to take the fliece from them, not once in the yeare (as the owner from the ſheepe) but to poule and clip them all the yeare long. Beſides, the authority and rule which they beare, is rent and diuided into many ſmall pieces, being diuers of them in euery great Shire, limited beſides with a very ſhort time: which giueth thẽ no ſcope to make any ſtrength, nor to contriue ſuch an enterprize, if haply they intended any matter of innouation.

An hard matter to alter the State of Ruſsia.

Duke but a titulary dignity

As for the common people (as may better appeare in the deſcription of their ſtate and quality afterwards ſet downe) beſides their want of armour and practiſe of war (which they are kept from of purpoſe) they are robbed continually both of their hearts and money, (beſides other meanes) ſometimes by pretence of ſome ſeruice to bee done for the common defence, ſometimes without any ſhew at all, of any neceſſity of Common-wealth or Prince. So that there is no meanes eyther for Nobility or people, to attempt any innouation, ſo long as the Military forces of the Emperour (which are the number of 8000. at the leaſt in continuall pay) hold themſelues faſt and ſure vnto him, & to the preſent ſtate. Which needs they muſt do, being of the quality of Soldiors, and enioying withall that free liberty, of wronging and ſpoiling the Commons at their pleaſure, which is permitted them of The common people kept from Armour and weapons.

of purpoſe to make them haue a liking of the preſent ſtate. As for the agreement of the Soldiors and Commons, it is a thing not to be feared, beeing of ſo oppoſite & contrary practiſe much one to the other. This deſperate ſtate of things at home, maketh the people (for the moſt part) to wiſh for ſome forraigne inuaſion, which they ſuppoſe to be the onely meanes, to rid them of the heauy yoke of this tyrannous gouernment.

Agreement of the Soldiors and Commons.

Of the Emperors counſell.

The Emperors of Ruſsia giue the name of Counſellor, to diuers of their chiefe Nobility, rather for honours ſake, thē for any vſe they make of thē about their matters of ſtate. Theſe are called Boiarens, without any addition, and may be called Counſellors at large. For they are ſildom or neuer called to any publike conſultation. They which are of his ſpecial and priuy Counſell indeed (whom he vſeth daily and ordinarily for al publike matters pertaining to the State) haue the addition of Dumnoy, and are named Dumnoy Boiaren, or Lords of the Counſell, their Office or ſitting, Boarſtua Dumna.

Boiarens Counſellers to the Emperor, but differing from his priuy Counſell.

The number and names of the Counſellors of State.

Their names (at this preſent) are theſe in their order. Firſt, Knez Feoder Ioanowich Methiſloskey. 2. Knez Iuan Michailowich Glinskoy. 3. Knez Vaſilie Iuanowich Suskoy Scopin. Theſe three are accounted to be of greater birth then wiſedome, taken in (as may ſeeme) for that ende, rather to furniſh the place with their honours & preſence, then with their aduice or Counſel. 4. Knez Vaſilie Iuanowich Suskoy, thought to bee more wiſe then the other of his name. 5. Knez Feodor Michailowich. 6. Knez Micheta Romanowich Trowbetskoy. 7. Knez Timophey Romanowich Trowbetskoy. 8. Knez Andriew Gregoriwich Curakine. 9. Knez Demetrie Iuanowich Foreſtine. 10. Knez Feoder Iuanowich Foreſtine. 11. Bodan Iuanowich Sabaroue, 12. Knez Iuan Vaſilowich, 13. Knez Feoder Demetriwich Sheſtinoue. 14. Knez Feoder Michailowich Troyconioue. 15. Iuan Buterlyuey. 16. Demetrie Iuanowich Godonoe. 17. Borriſe Federowich Godonoe, brother to the Empreſſe. 18. Stephan Vaſilowich Godonoe. 19. Gregorie Vaſilowich Godonoe. 20. Iuan Vaſilowich Godonoe. 21. Feoder Sheremitoue. 22. Andriew Petrowich Cleſhenina. 23. Ignatie Petrowich Tatiſloue. 24. Romain Michailowich Pena. 25. Demetſhey Iuanowich Cheremiſſen. 26. Romain Vaſilowich Alferioue. 27. Andriew Shalcacolue. 28. Vaſilie Shalcaloue. 29. Eleazar Welluſgin. 30. Drezheen Penteleoue. 31. Zapon Abramoue.

Foure Secretaries.

The foure laſt of theſe are called Dumnoy Deiakey, or Lord Secretaries. Theſe are all of the Emperours priuy Counſell, though but few of them are called to any conſultation, for that all matters are aduiſed and determined vpon by Borris Federowich Godonoe, Brother to the Empreſſe, with ſome fiue or ſix more, whom it pleaſeth him to call. If they come, they are rather to heare, then to giue counſell, and do ſo demeane themſelues. The matters occurrent which are of ſtate, done within the Realme, are informed them (at their ſittings) by the Lords of the foure Chetſirds, or Tetrarchies. Whereof mention is made in the Chapter concerning the Gouernment of their Prouinces. Who bring in all ſuch letters as they receiue from the Dukes, Dyacks, Captaines, and other Officers of the Cities and Caſtles, pertaining to their ſeuerall quarter or Chetſird, with other aduertiſements, and informe the Counſell of them.

All matters referred to the Empreſſe Brother, and fiue or ſixe more.

The like is done by the chiefe Officer of euery ſeuerall Office of Record: who may come into the Counſel Chamber, & informe them, as occaſion incident to his Office doth require. Beſides matters of State, they conſider of many priuate cauſes, informed by way of ſupplication, in very great numbers. Whereof ſome they entertaine and determine, as the cauſe or meanes can procure fauour. Some they ſend to the Offices whereto they pertaine, by common courſe of Law. Their ordinary daies for their ſitting, are Mondaies, Wenſdaies, and Fridaies. Their time of meeting, is commonly ſeuen a clocke in the morning. If there be any extraordinary occaſion, that requireth conſultation on ſome other day, they haue warning by the Clarke of the Counſell, called Dorofey Buſhew, who receiueth order from the Roſerad or high Conſtable of the Realm, to call them together at the time appointed.

The Officers of Records.

Of the Emperors Cuſtoms and other Reuenues.

For the receiuing of Cuſtomes, & other Rents belonging vnto the Crowne, ther are appointed diuers vnder-Officers, which deliuer ouer the ſame into the head Treaſury. The firſt is the office of Dwoerſana or Steward of the houſhold. The ſecond is the Office of the Chetſirds:

which I comprehend vnder one, though it be diuided into foure ſeuerall parts, as was ſaid before. The third is called Bulſha Prechod, or the great Income.

The Steward receiuer of the Crowne land rents.

As touching the firſt, which is the Office of the Steward, it receiueth all the Rents of the Emperours Inheritance, or Crowne Land, which they call Vochin. The Vochin or Crowne land, containeth in it 36. Townes, with the Territories or Hundreds belonging vnto them. Whereof the chiefe that yeeld the greateſt rents, are theſe: Alexandriſca, Corelskey, Otſer, Slobodey, Danielska, Moiſalskoy, Chara, Sametska, Strararouſe, Branſoue, &c. The Inhabitants or Tenants of theſe and the other Townes, pay ſome rent-money, ſome other rent duties (called Obrokey) as certaine Chetſirds, or meaſures of Graine, Wheate, Rye, Barley, Oates, &c. or of other victuall, as Oxen, Sheepe, Swans, Geeſe, Hares, Hennes, wilde Fowle, Fiſh, Hay, Wood, Honey, &c. Some are bound to ſowe for the Emperours prouiſion, certaine Akers of ground, and to make the Corne ready for his vſe: hauing for it an allowance of certaine Akers of ground for their owne proper vſe.

The Tenants of Townes & their rent.

Prouiſion for the Houſhold.

This prouiſion for the houſhold, ſpecially of graine ſerued in by the Tenants, is a great deale more then is ſpent in his houſe, or in other allowance ſerued out in liuery, or for the Emperours honour, called Schalouaney: for which vſe there is beſtowed very much, both in graine, and other victuall. This ſurplus of prouiſion is ſold by the Steward to the beſt hand, and runneth into the Emperors treaſury.

Diffrence of the Father & Sons times for prouiſion.

In the time of Iuan Vaſilowich, Father to this Emperor (who kept a more Princely and bountifull houſe then the Emperour now doth) this ouerplus of graine, and other Incomes into the Stewards Office, yeelded to his Treaſury, not paſt 60. thouſand rubbels yearely; but riſeth now by good husbanding of the Steward Gregory Vaſilowich Godonoe, to 230. thouſand rubbels a yeare. And this by the meanes of the Empreſſe, and her kindred, ſpecially (Borris Federowich Godonoe) that account it all their owne, that runneth into the Emperors treaſure. Much of this ſurpluſage that riſeth out of the rent prouiſion, is employed to the payment of the wages of his houſhold Officers, which are very many attending at home, and purueying abroad.

The ſecond Office of receipt called the Chetſirds (being diuided into four ſeuerall parts, as before was ſaid) hath foure head Officers: which, beſides the ordering & gouernement of the Shires, contained within their ſeuerall Chetſirds; haue this alſo as a part of their office, to receiue the Tagla and Podat belonging to the Emperour, that riſeth out of the foure Chetſirds or Quarters. The Tagla is a yearely rent or impoſition, raiſed vpon euery Wite or Meaſure of graine that groweth within the Land, gathered by ſworne men, and brought into the Office. The Wite containeth 60. Chetſirds. Euery Chetſird is three common buſhels, or little leſſe. The Podat is an ordinary rent of money, impoſed vpon euery Soake, or Hundred within the whole Realme.

The Office of Chetſird.

Tagla & Podat, and how they are diſtinguiſhed.

This Tagla and Podat bring in yeerely to the Offices of the Chetſirds a great ſum of money: as may appeare by the particulars heere ſet downe. The Towne and Prouince of Vobsko, pay yearely for Tagla and Podat about 18000. rubbels. Nouogrod 35000. rubbels. Torſhocke and Otſer 8000. rubbels. Razan 30000. rubbels. Morum 12000. rubbels. Colmigroe and Duyna, 8000. rubbels. Vologda 12000. rubbels. Cazan 18000. rubbels. Vſtiug 30000. rubbels. Roſtoue 50000. rubbels. The City of Mosko, forty thouſand Rubbels. Sibierskoy, twenty thouſand Rubbels. Caſtrome twelue thouſand Rubbels. The totall amounteth to foure hundred thouſand Rubbels or Markes a yeare, which is brought in yearely the firſt day of September, that is reckoned by them the firſt day of the yeare.

Sums of money raiſed by Tagla and Podat yearely.

The third (that is called the Bulſha Prechod, or great Income) receiueth all the Cuſtomes that are gathered out of all the principall Townes and Citties within the whole Realme. Beſides the fees & other duties, which riſe out of diuers ſmaller Offices, which are all brought into this Office of Bulſha Prechod. The townes of moſt trade, that do yeeld greateſt Cuſtome, are theſe heere ſet downe. Moſko, Smolensko, Vobsko, Nouogrod Velica, Strararouſe, Torſhocke, Otſer, Tarusſlaue, Caſtrome, Neſna Nouogrod, Cazan, Vologda. This Cuſtome out of the great townes is therefore more certaine and eaſie to be reckned, becauſe it is ſet and rated rated precisely, what they shall pay for the custome of the yeare. Which needs must be paid into the said Office, though they receiue not so much. If it fall out to be more, it runneth all into the Emperors aduantage.

The Emperors customes in their places

The custome at Mosko for euery yeare, is 12000. rubbels. The custome of Smolensko, 8000. rubbels. Vobsko, 12000. rubbels. Nouogrod velica, 6000. rubbels. Stararoussè, by salt and other commodities, 18000. rubbels. Torshock 800. rubbels. Otser 700. rubbels. Tarusslaue 1200. rubbels. Castrome 1800. rubbels. Nesna Nouogrod, 7000. rubbels. Cazan 11000. rubbels. Vologda 2000. rubbels. The custome of the rest that are Townes of trade, is sometimes more, sometimes lesse, as their trafficke and dealings with commodities too and fro, falleth out for the yeare.

The whole receipt of the Bulsha Prechod or great Income.

This may be said for certaine, that the three tables of receipts, belonging to this Office of Bulsha Prechod, whē they receiue least, account for thus much, viz. The first table 160000. rubbels. The second table 90000. rubbels. The third 70000. rubbels. So that there commeth into the Office of Bulsha Prechod, at the least reckoning (as appeareth by their Bookes of Customes) out of these and other Townes, & maketh the sum of 340000. rubbels a yeare. Besides this custome out of the townes of trade, there is receiued by this Office of Bulsha Prechod, the yearely rent of the cōmon Bath-stoaues, and Cabacks or drinking houses, which pertaine to the Emperour. Which (though it be vncertaine for the iust summe, yet becausse it is certaine and an ordinary matter, that the Russe will bathe himselfe aswell within as without) yeeldeth a large Rent to the Emperors Treasury.

Rent of the Bath stoaues

Rents out of the Iudiciall Offices.

There is besides, a certaine mulct or penalty, that groweth to the Emperour out of euery iudgement, or sentence that passeth in any of his Courts of Record in all ciuill matters. This penalty, or mulct is twenty Dingoes or pence, vpon euery rubble or marke, and so tenne in the hundred. Which is paid by the party that is conuict by law. Hee hath besides for euery name, contained in the Writs that passe out of these Courts, fiue Alteens. An Alteen is fiue pence sterling, or thereabouts. This is made good out of the Office, whence the Writ is taken foorth. Thence it goeth to the Office that keepeth the lesser seale, where againe it payeth as much more to the Emperours vse. This riseth commonly to three thousand rubbels a yeare, or thereabouts. Further also, out of the Office of Roisbonia, where all Fellonies are tried, is receiued for the Emperour the halfe part of Fellons goods, the other halfe goeth the one part to the Informer, the other to the Officers.

The Office of Roisbonia.

All this is brought into the Office of Bulsha Prechod, or great Income. Besides the ouerplus or remainder, that is saued out of the Land Rents, allotted to diuers other Offices: as namely to the Office called Roserade, which hath Lands and Rents assigned vnto it, to pay the yearely salaries of the Souldiors, or horsemen, that are kept still in pay. Which in time of peace when they rest at home, not employed in any seruice; is commonly cut off, and paide them by halfes, sometimes not the halfe: so that the remainder out of the Roserade Office, that is laid into the Emperours Treasury, commeth (for the most part) euery yeare to two hundred and fifty thousand rubbels.

The Roserade Office for Soldiors pay.

In like sort (though not so much) is brought in the surplus out of the Strelletskoy Offices, which hath proper Lands for the payment of the Strelsey men or Gunners, as well those at Mosko, that are of the Emperors guard (twelue thousand in ordinary) as on the borders, and other garrison Townes and Castles. Likewise out of the Office of Prechase, Shisiuoy Nomshoy, which hath set allowance of Lands to maintaine the forraine mercenary Soldiours, as Poles, Sweadens, Doutches, Scots, &c. So out of the Office of Pusharskoy, (which hath Lands and Rents allowed for the prouision of munition, great Ordenance, Powder, Shot, Salt-Peeter, Brimstone, Lead, and such like) there is left somewhat at the yeares ende, that runneth into the Treasury. All these bring into the Office of Bulsha Prechod, that which remaineth in their hand at the yeares end. Whence it is deliuered into the Emperours Treasury. So that the whole sum that groweth to this Office of Bulsha Prechod, or the great Income (as appeareth by the Bookes of the said Office) amounteth to 800000. rubbels a yeare, or thereabouts.

The Strelletskoy Office for the shot at Mosko, &c.

For mercenary Soldiors, & prouision of munition.

The Emperors treaſure-houſe within his Caſtle of Mosko.

All theſe Offices, to wit, the Office of the Steward, the foure Chetſirds, and the Bulſha Prechod, deliuer in their receipts to the head treaſury, that lyeth within the Emperors houſe or Caſtle at the Mosko. Where lye all his monies, iewels, crowns, ſcepters, plate, and ſuch like, the cheſts, hutches, and bagges being ſigned by the Emperours themſelues with their owne Seale. Though (at this time) the Lord Borris Federowich Godonoe, his Seale and ouerſight ſupplieth for the Emperour, as in all other things. The vnder-Officer at this time, is one Stepan Vaſilowich Godonoe, Couſin-germane to the ſaide Borris, who hath two Clearks allowed to ſerue vnder him in the Office.

The ſum of the Emperors rent-money.

The ſumme that groweth to the Emperours treaſury in mony only, for euery a yeare.

1. Out of the Stewards Office aboue the expence of his houſe 23000. Rubbels.
2. Out of the foure Chetſirds for ſoake and head money, 400000. rubbels.
3. Out of the Bulſha Precod Office, or great Income, for cuſtome, and other rents, 800000. rubbels.

Summe 1430000. Rubbels cleere, beſides all charges for his houſe, & ordinary ſallaries of his ſoldiours otherwiſe diſcharged.

But beſides this reuennue, that is paid all in money to the Emperours Treaſury, he receiueth yearely in Furres, and other duties to a great value, out of Siberia, Pechora, Permia, and other places, which are ſolde or bartred away for ſome forraigne commodities, to the Turkiſh, Perſian, Armenian, Georgian and Bougharian Merchants, that trade within his Countries, beſides others of Chriſtendome. What it maketh in the whole (though the value cannot be ſet downe preciſely, as being a thing caſuall, as the commodity may bee got) it may be gueſſed, by that which was gathered the laſt yeare out of Siberia for the Emperors cuſtome, viz. 466. timber of Sables, fiue timber of Matrones, 180. blacke Foxes, beſides other commodities.

His yearely benefit by Furs and other duties.

To theſe may be added their ſeizures, and confiſcations vpon ſuch as are in diſpleaſure, which riſeth to a great ſumme. Beſides other their extraordinary impoſitions, and exactions done vpon their Officers, Monaſteries, &c. not for any apparant neceſſity or vſe of the Prince or Cõmon-wealth, but of will and cuſtome: yet with ſome pretence of a Scythian, that is, groſſe and barbarous pollicy (as may appeare) by theſe few Sophiſmata, or counterfeit pollicies, put in practiſe by the emperours of Ruſsia, all tending to this ende, to rob their people, and to enrich their Treaſury. To this purpoſe this by-word was vſed by the late Emperor Iuan Vaſilowich: That his people were like to his beard. The oftner ſhauen, the thicker it would grow. Or like ſheepe, that muſt needs bee ſhorne once a yeare at the leaſt: to keepe them from being ouer-laden with their Wooll.

Of ſeizures, confiſcations, & impoſitions on Monaſteries, &c.

Meanes vſed to draw the wealth of the Land into the Emperors Treaſury.

First.

TO preuent no extortions, exactions, or briberies whatſoeuer, done vpon the Commons by their Dukes, Diacks, or other Officers in their Prouinces: but to ſuffer them to go on till their time be expired, and to ſucke themſelues full. Then to call them to the Praueuſh (or whip) for their behauior, and to beate out of them all, or the moſt part of the booty, (as the Hony from the Bee) which they haue wrung from the Commons, and to turne it into the Emperors Treaſury, but neuer any thing back againe to the right owners, how great or euident ſoeuer the iniury be. To this end the needy Dukes, and Diacks, that are ſent into their Prouinces, ſerue the turne very well, being changed ſo often (to wit) once a yeare: where, in reſpect of their owne, and the quality of the people (as before was ſaide) they might bee continued for ſome longer time, without all feare of innouation. For comming ſtill freſh vpon the Commons, they ſucke more eagerly: like Tiberius the Emperours flyes, that came new ſtill vpon all olde ſores. To whom he was wont to compare his Prætors, and other prouinciall Officers.

The whip ordayned for all denyers or conteſters.

Secondly,

Secondly.

TO make of theſe Officers (that haue robbed their people) ſometimes a publique example, if any be more notorious then the reſt; that the Emperor may ſeeme to diſlike the oppreſſions done to his people, and rransferre the fault to his ill Officers.

A Gooſe ready dreſſed full of money for a bribe.

As among diuers other, was done by the late Emperour Iuan Vaſilowich, to a Diack in one of his Prouinces; that (beſides many other extortions and briberies) had taken a Gooſe ready dreſt full of mony. The man was brought to the market place in Mosko. The Emperour himſelfe preſent, made an Oration; Theſe good people are they, that would eate you vppe like bread, &c. Then asked he his Polachies or executioners, who could cut vp a Gooſe? and commanded one of them firſt to cut off his legges, about the middeſt of the ſhinne, then his armes aboue his elbowes (demaunding of him ſtill, if Gooſe fleſh were good meate) in the end to choppe off his head: that he might haue the right faſhion of a Gooſe ready dreſſed. This might ſeeme to haue beene a tollerable peece of Iuſtice (as Iuſtice goeth in Ruſſia) except his ſubtill end, to couer his owne oppreſſions.

Cutting vp of a Gooſe.

Thirdly.

A cunning colour for taxations.

TO make an open ſhew of want, when any great taxe, or impoſition is towardes. As was done by this Emperour Theodore Iuanowich, by the aduiſe of ſome about him, euen at the beginning of his reigne: when beeing left very rich (as it was thought) by his father, he ſolde the moſt of his plate, and ſtamped ſome into coyne; that he might ſeeme to want money. Whereupon preſently out came a taxation.

Fourthly.

Superſtitious charitie and bountie giuen to Monaſteries to a politike end.

TO ſuffer their ſubiects to giue freely to the Monaſteries (which for their ſuperſtition very many do eſpecially in their laſt Wills) and to lay vp their mony and ſubſtance in them, to keepe it more ſafe. Which all is permitted them without any reſtraint or prouiſo, as was and is in ſome Countries of Chriſtendome. Whereby their Monaſteries grow to exceeding great wealth. This they doe, to haue the money of the Realme better ſtored together, and more ready for their hand, when they liſt to take it. Which many times is doone without any noyſe: the Fryers beeing content, rather to part from ſomewhat (as the encreaſe groweth) then to looſe all at once. Which they were made to doubt of in the other Emperours dayes.

A ſtrange practiſe to get money.

To this end Iuan Vaſilowich, late Emperour vſed a very ſtrange practiſe, that few Princes would haue doone in their greateſt extreamities. Hee reſigned his kingdome to one Velica Knez Simeon, the Emperours ſonne of Cazan: as though he meant to draw himſelfe from all publike doings, to a quiet priuate life. Towards the end of the yeare, he cauſed this new King to call in all Charters graunted to Biſhoprickes and Monaſteries, which they had enioyed many hundred yeares before. Which were all cancelled. This done, (as in diſlike of the fact, and of the miſgouernement of the new King) he reſumed his Scepter, and ſo was content (as in fauour vnto the Church and Religious men) that they ſhould renew their Charters, and take them of himſelfe: reſeruing and annexing to the Crowne ſo much of their Lands, as himſelfe thought good.

Such a practiſe as hath been ſeldome heard of.

By this practiſe, he wrung from the Biſhoprickes, and Monaſteries (beſides the lands which he annexed to the Crowne) an huge maſſe of money; from ſome forty, from ſome fifty, from ſome an hundred thouſand rubbels. And this, aſwell for the increaſe of his treaſurie, as to abate the euill opinion of his hard gouernment, by a ſhew of worſe in another man. Wherein his ſtrange ſpirit is to be noted; that being hated of his Subiects (as himſelfe knew well enough) yet would aduenture ſuch a practiſe, to ſet an other in his ſaddle, that might haue ridde away with his horſſe, whileſt himſelfe walked by on foote.

Fiftly.

Foreſtalling and engroſſing commodities in a ſtrange maner.

TO ſend their meſſengers into the prouinces, or Shires where the ſpeciall commodities of their countrey grow, as furres, waxe, hony, &c. There to foreſtall and ingroſſe, ſometime one whole commodity, ſometime two, or more, taking them at ſmall prices what themſelues liſt, and ſelling them againe at an exceſſiue rate.

rate to their owne marchants, and vnto Marchants ſtrangers. If they ſhall refuſe to buy them, then to enforce them vnto it.

An engroſing of Waxe.

The like is doone when any commodity, eyther natiue, or forreine (as cloth of golde, broad-cloth, &c.) thus engroſſed by the Emperour, and receiued into his Treaſurie, chaunceth to decay, or marre by long lying, or ſome other caſualty. Which is forced vpon the marchants, to bee bought by them at the Emperours price, whether they will, or no.

Not long ſince was engroſſed all the Waxe of the Countrey; ſo that no man might deale with that commoditie, but the Emperour onely.

Sixtly.

Engroſsing forren commodities.

TO take vp and engroſſe (in like ſort) ſometime forreine commodities (as Silkes, Cloth, Lead, Pearle, &c.) brought into his kingdome by Turkiſh marchants, Armenians, Bougharians, Poles, Engliſh, and others. And then to force his Marchants, to buy them of his Officers at his owne price.

Seauenthly.

Monopoliſing of Rents and Cuſtomes.

TO make a Monopoly (for the time) of ſuch commodities as are payed him for Rent, or Cuſtome, and to inhance the price of them, as Furres, Corne, Wood, &c. What time, none muſt ſell of the ſame kinde of commodity, vntill the Emperours be all ſolde. By this meanes hee maketh of his Rent, Corn, and other prouiſion of victuall (as before was ſayd) about two hundred thouſand rubbells or markes a yeare. Of his Rent, Wood, Hay &c. thirtie thouſand rubbells, or thereabouts.

Eightly.

His Cabacks or drinking houſes in euery towne.

IN euery great Towne of his Realme, he hath a Caback, or drinking houſe, where Aqua vitæ is ſold (which they call Ruſſe-wine, Mead, Beere, &c.) Out of theſe he receiueth Rent, that amounteth to a great ſumme of money. Some yeeld eight hundred, ſome nine hundred, ſome a thouſand, ſome two thouſand, or three thouſand rubbells a yeare. Wherein, beſides the baſe and diſ-honorable meanes to encreaſe his Treaſurie; many foule faultes are committed.

The poore labouring man and Artificer, many times ſpends all from his wife, and children. Some vſe to lay in twenty, thirty, forty rubbels, or more into the Caback, and vowe themſelues to the pot, till all that be ſpent. And all this (as hee will ſay) is for the honour of Hoſpodare, or the Emperour. You ſhall haue many there, that haue drunke all away euen to the very skinne, and ſo walke naked (whome they call Naga.) While they are in the Caback, none may call them forth, whatſoeuer cauſe there be; becauſe he hindereth the Emperours reuenue.

Drinking for the Emperors honour.

Ninthly.

Pretence of robbery to an other end.

TO cauſe ſome of his Boiarens, or Nobles of his Court, (whom he vſeth vpon truſt) that haue houſes in the Moſco, to faine themſelues robbed. Then to ſend for the Zemskey men, or Aldermen of the Citty, and to command them to finde out the robbery. In default of not finding it, to praue or ſeaſſe the Cittie for their miſgouernement in eight thouſand, nine thouſand, or tenne thouſand rubbells at a time. This many times is and hath beene practized.

Tenthly.

Exactions countenanced by power and authority

IN theſe exactions, to ſhew their ſoueraignetie, ſometime they vſe very plaine, and yet ſtrange cauillations. As was that of Ivan Vaſilowich, father to this Emperour, after this ſort. He ſent into Permia for certaine loads of Cedar wood, whereof he knew right well, that none grew in that Countrey. The Inhabitants returned anſwere, they could find none there. Whereupon he ſeaſſed their Country in twelue thouſand rubbells, as if they concealed the commoditie of purpoſe. Againe, he ſent to the Cittie of Moſco, to prouide for him a Colpacke, or meaſure ful of liue Fleas, for a medicine. They returned anſwer, that the thing was impoſſible. And if they could get them, yet they could not meaſure them, for leaping out. Whereuppon, hee praued or beat out of their ſhinnes, ſeuen thouſand rubbels for a mulct.

A buſhell of liue Fleas.

By like cauillation, hee extorted from his Nobilitie thirtie thouſand rubbells, becauſe he miſſed of his game, when hee went a hunting for the Hare: as if theyr hunting and murdering of Hares had bin the the cauſe of it. Which the Nobilitie (as the manner is) praued preſently againe vpon the Mouſicks, or common people of the Country. This may ſeem a ſtrange kinde of extortion, by ſuch pleaſant cauils, to fleece his poore ſubiects in good ſadneſſe: but that it agreeth with the qualitie of thoſe Emperours, and the miſerable ſubiection of that poore Countrie.

Theſe, and ſuch like meanes are practiſed by the Emperours of Ruſſia, to encreaſe their Treaſurie.

Of the ſtate of the Communaltie, or vulgar ſort of people, in the Countrey of Ruſsia.

The condition of the Commons and vulgar ſort of people, may partly bee vnderſtoode by that which hath already bin ſayd, concerning the manner of their gouernement, and the ſtate of the Nobilitie in their owne degrees and places with the ordering of their Prouinces, and chiefe townes of the land. And firſt touching their libertie, how it ſtandeth with them, it may appeare by this: that they are reckoned in no degree at all, nor haue anie ſuffrage nor place in their Zabore, or high Court of Parliament, where theyr lawes and publique orders are concluded vpon. Which commonly tend to the oppreſſion of the commons. For the other two degrees, that is to ſay, of the Nobility, and Cleargie, which haue a vote in the Parliaments (though farre from that libertie, that ought to be in common conſultations for the publike benefite, according vnto the meaſure and proportion of their degrees) are well contented, that the whole burthen ſhall light vppon the commons, ſo that they may eaſe theyr owne ſhoulders by laying all vpon them.

The ſeruile & miſerable eſtate of the Ruſſe people.

Againe, into what ſeruile condition their libertie is brought, not onely to the Prince but to the Nobles and Gentlemen of the Country (who themſelues alſo are but ſeruile, ſpecially of late yeares) it may farther appeare by their owne acknowledgements in their ſupplications, and other writings to any of the Nobles or chiefe officers of the Emperors. Wherein they name and ſubſcribe themſelues Kolophey, that is to ſay, their villaines or bondſlaues; as they of the Nobilitie doe vnto the Emperour. This may truely be ſayd of them, that there is no ſeruant or bondſlaue more awed by his Maiſter, nor kept downe in a more ſeruile ſubiection, then the poore people are, and that vniuerſally, not onely by the Emperour, but by his Nobility, cheefe Officers, and Soldiours. So that when a poore Mouſicke meeteth with any of them vpon the high way; hee muſt turne himſelfe about, as not daring to looke him on the face, and fall downe, with knocking of his head to the very ground, as hee doth vnto his Idoll.

Kolophey are villaines or bondſlaues, and ſo the Common people terme themſelues in writing.

Goods, lands, and poſſeſsions of the Commons.

Secondly, as concerning the lands, goods, and other poſſeſſions of the commons; they anſwere the name, and lie common indeede, without any fence againſt the rapine, and ſpoyle, not onelie of the higheſt, but of his Nobilitie, Officers and Souldiers. Beſides, the taxes, cuſtomes, ſeazures, and other publike exactions, doone vppon them by the Emperour: they are ſo racked and polled by the Nobles, Officers and Meſſengers ſent abroad by the Emperour in his publike affaires, eſpecially in the Yammes (as they tearme them) and that thorow-fare townes; that you ſhall haue many villages and townes of halfe a mile, and a mile long, ſtand all vn-inhabited: the people being fled all into other places, by reaſon of the extreame vſage, and exactions on them done. So that in the way towards Moſco, betwixt Vologda and Yaruſlaueley, (which is two nineties, after theyr reckoning, little more then an hundred miles) there are in ſight fiftie Darieunes or Villages at the leaſt, ſome halfe a mile, ſome a mile long (that ſtand vacant) and deſolate without any Inhabitant. The like is in all other places of the Realme, as they that haue trauelled the Countrey, well can report.

Yammes are thorow-fare Townes.

Townes emptie of Inhabitants through oppreſsion.

The great oppreſſion ouer the poore Commons, maketh them to haue no corage in following their trades: for that the more they haue, the more daunger they are in, not onely of their goods, but of their liues alſo. And if they haue anie thing, they conceale it all they can, ſometimes conueying it into Monaſteries, ſomtimes hiding it vnder the ground, and in woods, as men are wont to doe, where they are in feare of forreine inuaſion. Inſomuch, that (many times) you ſhall ſee them afrayd to be knowne to any Boiaren or Gentleman, of ſuch commodities as they haue to ſell. They haue beene ſeene ſometimes, when they haue layed open their commodities for a liking (as theyr principall Furres and ſuch like) to looke

A miſerable condition of poore men.

ſtill

ſtill behinde them, and towardes euerie doore: as men in ſome feare, that looked to be ſet vpon, and ſurprized by ſome enimy. Whereof being asked the cauſe, it was found to be this, that they haue doubted, leaſt ſome Nobleman or Sinaboiarſkey of the Emperor, had beene in company, and ſo laide a traine for them, to pray vpon their commodities perforce.

The people made ydle againſt theyr wils.

This maketh the people (thogh otherwiſe hardned to beare any toyle) to giue themſelues much to idleneſſe and drinking: as caring for no more, then from hand to mouth. And hereof it commeth that the commodities of Ruſsia (as vvas ſayde before) as Waxe, Tallow, Hydes, Flax, Hempe, &c.) grow and goe abroad in farre leſſe plenty then they were wont to doe: becauſe the people being oppreſſed and ſpoyled of theyr gettings, are diſcouraged from their Labours. Yet this one thing is much to be noted, that in all this oppreſſion, there were three Bretheren Marchants of late, that traded together with one ſtocke in common, that were found to be worth 300000 rubbels in mony, beſide lands, cattels, and other commodities. Which may partly be imputed to their dwellings far off from the eie of the Court, viz. in Wichida, a thouſand miles from Mosko, and more. The ſame men were ſaid (by thoſe that knewe them) to haue ſet on worke all the yeare long, ten thouſand men in making of ſalt, carriages by Cart and Boate, hewing of Wood, and ſuch like; beſides fiue thouſand bondſlaues at the leaſt, to inhabit & Till their land.

Of three brethren Merchants.

They had alſo their Phyſitions, Chirurgeons, Apothecaries, and all manner of Artificers of Doutches and others, belonging vnto them. They wer ſaid to haue payed to the Emperour (for Cuſtome) to the ſumme of three and twenty thouſand Rubbles a yeare (for which cauſe they were ſuffered to enioy their trade) beſides the maintaining of certaine Garriſons on the bordors of Siberia, which were neere vnto them. Wherein the Emperour was content to vſe their purſe, till ſuch time as they had gotten ground in Siberia, and made it habitable, by burning & cutting downe woodes from wichida to Perm, aboue a thouſand Verſt, and then tooke it all away from them perforce.

Not many other ſuch men in the whole Country

But this in the end being enuied, and diſdained, as a matter not ſtanding with their policie, to haue any ſo great, ſpecially a Mouſick: the Emperour beganne firſt to pull from them by peeces, ſometimes twenty thouſand rubbels at a time; till in the end, their ſonnes that followed were well eaſed of their ſtocke, & had but ſmall part of their Fathers ſubſtance: the reſt being drawne all into the Emperors Treaſury. Their names were Iacoue, Gregory, and Simon, the ſonnes of Onyka.

Fleecing the three brethré

For the quality of their people otherwiſe, though there ſeemeth to be in them ſome aptneſſe to receiue any Art (as appeareth by the naturall wits in the men, and very children) yet they excell in no kinde of common Art, much leſſe in any Learning, or litterall kinde of knowledge: which they are kept from of purpoſe, as they are alſo from all Military practiſe: that they may be fitter for the ſeruile condition wherein ſtill they are, & haue neither reaſon, nor valor to attempt innouation.

The tiranie & oppreſsion o. uer theyr very minds and wits.

For this purpoſe alſo, they are kepte from trauailing, that they may learne nothing, nor ſee the faſhions of other countreyes abroad. You ſhall ſeldome ſee a Ruſſe a Traueller, except he be with ſome Ambaſſador, or that he make a ſcape out of his Countrey. Which hardly hee can do, by reaſon of the borders that are watched ſo narrowly, and the punniſhment for any ſuch attempt, which is death if he be taken, and all his goods confiſcate. Onely they learne to write, and to reade, and that verie few of them. Neyther doe they ſuffer any ſtranger willingly to come into their Realme out of any ciuil Countrey, for the ſame cauſe; farther then neceſſity of vttering their commodities, and taking in of forraine, doeth enforce them to do.

The iealouſye of the Emperour concerning his State

And therefore not long ſince, they conſulted, about the remouing of al Marchants ſtrangers to the border townes, to abide and haue their reſidency there, and to be more wary, in admitting other ſtrangers (heereafter) into the In-land parts of the Realme, for feare of infection vvith better manners and qualities, then they haue of their owne.

For the ſame purpoſe alſo, they are kept within the bounds of theyr degree, by the Law of their Country: ſo that the ſonne of a Mouſick, Artificer, or Husband man, man, is euer a Mouſick, Artificer, &c. and hath no meanes to aſpire any higher: except (hauing learned to write and reade) he attaine to the preferment of a Prieſt or Dyacke.

Of their Language answerable to the Sclauonian.

Their Language is all one with the Slauonian, which is thought to haue bene deriued from the Ruſſe tongue, rather then the Ruſse from the Slauonian. For the people called Sclaui, are knowne to haue had their beginning out of Sarmatia, and to haue tearmed themſelues of their conqueſt Sclauos (that is) famous or Glorious, of the word Sclaua, which in the Ruſ and Sclauonian tongue, ſignifieth as much as Glory, or Fame. Though afterwards, being ſubdued and trod vpon by diuers Nations, the Italians (their Neighbours) haue turned the word to a contrary ſignification, and tearme euery ſeruant or pezant, by the name of Sclaue; as did the Romanes by the Getes and Syrians, for the ſame reaſon. The Ruſſe Charracter or Letter, is no other then the Greeke, ſomwhat diſtorted.

Geneſ. 10. 26. Ioſep. in Antiquit. Iud. lib. 1. cap. 14.

And becauſe we were ſpeaking of Sarmatia, whence this people ſeeme to deriue themſelues: Some haue thought, that the name of Sarmatia, was firſt taken from one Sarmates, whom Moſes and Ioſephus call Aſarmathes, ſonne to Iocktan, and Nephew to Heber, of the poſterity of Sem. But this ſeemeth to be nothing, but a coniecture, taken from the likeneſſe of the name Aſarmathes. For, the dwelling of al Iocktans poſterity is deſcribed by Moſes, to haue been betwixt Meſcha or Maſius (an hill of the Ammonites) & Sephace, neere to the Riuer Euphrates. Which maketh it very vnlikely, that Aſarmathes ſhould plant any Collonies ſo farre off, in the North, and North-Weſt Countreyes.

Subiects kept in ſeruile ſubiection.

Concerning their Trades, Diet, Apparrell, and ſuch like, it is to bee noted where we ſpeake of their priuate behauiour. This order, that bindeth euerie man to keepe his ranke and ſeueral degree wherein his forefathers liued before him, is more meete to keepe the ſubiectes in a ſeruile ſubiection, and ſo, apt for this and like Common-wealths; then to aduance any vertue, or to breed any rare or excellent quality in Nobility or Commons. As hauing no farther reward nor preferment, whereunto they may bend their endeauors, and employ themſelues to aduance their eſtate: but rather procuring more danger to themſelues, the more they excell in any noble or principall quality.

CHAP. III.

Thirdly, we diſcourſe on their Politicke and Iudiciall proceeding. Alſo the Emperors powers for war, and their ſalaries: with their Muſtering, Munition, and Military prouiſion. Their Collonies, bordering Friends or Enemies, either in Peace or warre.

THeir Courts of Ciuill Iuſtice, for matters of Contract, and other of like ſort, are of three kindes, the one beeing ſubiect vnto the other by way of Appeal. The loweſt court (that ſeemeth to bee appointed for ſome eaſe to the ſubiects) is the Office of the Gubnoy Staruſt, that ſignifieth an Alderman, and of the Sotskoy Staruſt, or Bayliffe of the ſoake or hundred, whereof I ſpake before in the ordering of the Prouinces. Theſe may end matters among their Neighbours, within their Soake, or ſeuerall Hundred, where they are apointed vnder the Dukes and Dyackes of the Prouinces, to whome the parties may remooue their matter, if they cannot bee agreed by the ſaide Gubnoy, or Sotskoy Staruſt.

The Alder-mans Court.

The ſecond is kept in the head townes of euery Prouince or Shire, by the ſayde Dukes and Diackes, that are deputies to the four Lords of the Chetfirds, as before was ſayde. From theſe foure Courtes, they may appeale, and remooue theyr ſuites to the cheefe Court, that is kept at Mosko, where are reſident the officers of the foure Chetfirds. Theſe are the chiefe Iuſtices or Iudges, euery of them in all ciuill matters that growe within their ſeuerall Chetfird or quarter, and may bee either commenced originally before them, or proſecuted out of the inferior Courts of the Shires, by way of appeale.

The Dukes & Diacks Court

The high Court of Mosko.

Their commencing and proceeding in ciuill actions, is on this manner. Firſt, the the plaintiffe putteth vp his ſupplication, wherein hee declareth the effecte of his cauſe, or wrong done vnto him. Whereupon is granted vnto him a Wepis or warrant, which he deliuereth to the Præſtaue or Sergeant, to doe the arreſt vppon the party whom hee meaneth to impleade. Who vppon the Arreſt, is to put in ſureties to anſwer at the day appointed, or els ſtandeth at the Sergeants deuotion, to be kept ſafe by ſuch means as he thinketh good.

The dealing of Sergeants in their offices.

The Sergeants are many, & excell for their hard and cruell dealing toward their priſoners; commonly they clappe Irons vpon them, as many as they can beare, to wring out from them ſome larger Fees. Though it be but for ſixe pence, you ſhal ſee them go with chaines on their legges, armes, and necke. When they come before the Iudge, the Plaintiffe beginneth to declare his matter, after the content of his ſupplication. As for Atturneys, Counſellors, Procurators and aduocates to plead their cauſe for them, they haue no ſuch order; but euerie man is to tell his owne Tale, and pleade for himſelfe ſo well as he can.

No Counſellors or Atturnies to pleade cauſes.

If they haue any witneſſe or other euidence, they produce it before the Iudge. If they haue none, or if the trueth of the cauſe cannot ſo well be diſcerned by the plea, or euidence on both parts; then the Iudge asketh either party (which he thinketh good, Plaintife or Defendant) whether he will kiſſe the Croſſe, vppon that which he arroucheth, or denieth. He that taketh the Croſſe (being ſo offred by the Iudge) is accounted cleare, and carryeth away the matter. This Ceremony is not done within the Court or Office, but the party is carried to the Church by an Officer, and there the Ceremony is done: the money in the meane while hanging vpon a nayle, or elſe lying at the Idolles feete, ready to be deliuered to the party ſo ſoon as he hath kiſſed the Croſſe, before the ſaide Idoll.

Ending of controuerſies by kiſſing the Croſſe.

This kiſſing of the Croſſe (called Creuſtina Chelouania) is as their corporal oath; and accounted (with them) a verie holie thing, which no man will dare to violate, or prophane with a falſe Allegation. If both parties offer to kiſſe the Croſſe in a contradictory matter, then they drawe lottes.

Iudgment by lot, whē both parties kiſſe the Croſſe.

The better Lotte is ſuppoſed to haue the right, and beareth away the matter. So the party conuicted is adiudgd to pay the debt or penalty whatſoeuer, and withall, to pay the Emperours fees, which is twenty pence vpon euery Mark, as before hath bene noted.

When the matter is thus ended, the party conuicted, is deliuered to the Sergeant, who hath a Writ for his warrant, out of the office, to carry him to the Praueuſh or Righter of Iuſtice, if preſently he pay not the money, nor content not the party.

The order of the Praueuſh or Righter.

This Praueuſh or Righter, is a place neere vnto the Office where ſuch as haue ſentence paſſed againſt them, and refuſe to pay that which is adiudged; are beaten with great Cudgels on the ſhinnes, and calues of the legges. Euery fornoon from eight to eleauen, they are ſet on the Praueuſh, and beate in this ſort till the monie be payed. The afternoone & night time, they are kept in Chains by the Sergeant: except they put in ſufficient ſureties, for their appearance at the Praueuſh at the houre appointed. You ſhall ſee fortie or fifty ſtand together on the Praueuſh all on a rowe, and their ſhinnes thus becudgelled and bebaſted euery morning, with a pitteous cry.

Selling wife and children to pay debts.

If after a years ſtanding on the Praueuſh the party will not, or lacke wherewithall to pay his Creditour, it is lawfull for him to ſell his Wife and Children, either outright, or for a certaine tearme of yeares. And if the price of them doe not amount to the full payment, the Creditour may take them to be his bondſlaues for years, or for euer, according as the valew of the debt requireth.

Such kinde of ſuites as lack direct euidence, or ſtand vpon coniectures and circumſtances, to bee weighed by the Iudge, draw of great length, and yeelde great aduantage vnto the Iudge and Officers. If the ſuite be vppon a bonde or bill, they haue for the moſt part good & ſpeedy iuſtice. Their Bondes or Billes, are drawne in a very plaine ſort, after this tenour.

The forme of Ruſſe bils or bonds, as they paſſe between man and man

I Iuan Vaſileo, haue borrowed of Alphonaſſe Dementio, the ſumme of one hundered Rubbles of going money of Moſko from the Kreſhenea (or hallowing of the Water) vntill the Saburney Voſcreſhenea (or counſell ſell Sunday) without interreſt. And if this money reſt vnpayed after that day, then hee ſhall giue intereſt vpon the ſaide mony, after the common rate, as it goeth among the people, viz: for euery fiue the ſixt rubbell. Vpon this there are witneſſes, Micheta Sydroneſkoy, &c: Subſcribed. This Bill haue I written Gabriel Iacoueleſni, in the yeare 7096. The witneſſes and debter (if he can write) endorſe their names on the back ſide of the Bill. Other ſigning or ſealing haue they none.

Proceeding in criminal matters.

When any is taken for a matter of crime (as treaſon, murther, theft, and the like) he is firſt brought to the Duke and Diacke, that are for the Prouince where the party is attached, by whom he is examined. The manner of examination in ſuch caſes, is all by torture, as ſcourging with whips made of ſinnewes or whitleather (called the Pudkey) as big as a mans finger, which giueth a ſore laſh, and entereth into the fleſh; Or by tying vnto a ſpitte, and roaſting at the Fire. Sometimes, by breaking and wreſting one of their ribs with a payre of hot Tonges, or cutting their fleſh vnder the nayles, and ſuch like.

Order after examination.

The examination thus taken, withall the proofes and euidences that can be alledged againſt the party, it is ſent vppe to the Mosko, to the Lord of the Chetfirde or Fourth-part, vnder whome the Prouince is, and by him is preſented vnto the Councell Table, to be reade and ſentenced there, where onely iudgement is giuen in matter of life and death, and that by euidence vppon information, though they neuer ſaw nor heard the party, who is kept ſtill in priſon where the Facte was committed, & neuer ſent vp to the place where he is tryed. If they find the partie guilty, they giue ſentence of death according to the quality of the facte, which is ſent downe by the Lord of the Chetfird, to the Duke and Diacke to be put in execution. The priſoner is carried vnto the place of execution, with his hands bound and a wax candle burning held betweene his fingers.

Men are ſentenced without perſonall appearance.

The order of their cheefeſt puniſhments on common perſons.

Their capitall puniſhments, are hanging, heading, knocking on the head, drowning, putting vnder the Iſe, ſetting on a ſtake, and ſuch like. But (for the moſt part) the priſoners that are condemned in ſummer, are kept for the winter, to be knockt on the head, and put vnder the Ice. This is to be vnderſtood of common perſons. For theft and murther, if they be committed vpon a poore Mouſick by one of Nobilitie, it is not lightly punniſhed, nor yet is he called to any account for it. Their reaſon is, becauſe they are accounted their Kolophey or bond-ſlaues.

On gentlemē and ſouldiers.

If by ſome Sinaboiarskey, or Gentleman Souldiour, a murther or theft bee committed, peraduenture he ſhall be impriſoned at the Emperors pleaſure. If the manner of the fact bee very notorious, hee is whipped perchance, and this is commonly all the puniſhment that is inflicted vpon them.

If a man kill his owne ſeruant, little or nothing is ſaide vnto him, for the aforeſaide reaſon: becauſe he is accounted to be his Kolophey or bondſlaue, & ſo to haue right ouer his very head. The vtmoſt is ſome ſmall mulct to the Emperour, if the party be rich: and ſo the quarrell is made rather againſt the purſe, then againſt the iniuſtice.

No written Law among them.

They haue no Written Lawe, ſaue onely a ſmall booke, that containeth the time and manner of their ſitting, order in proceeding, and ſuch other iudicial formes and circumſtances, but nothing to direct them, to giue ſentence on right or wrong. Their onely Law is their Speaking Law, and that is the pleaſure of the Prince, and of his Magiſtrates & officers. Which ſheweth the miſerable condition of this poore people, that are forced to haue them for their Law and direction of Iuſtice; againſt whoſe iniuſtice & extream oppreſſion, they had neede to bee armed with many good and ſtrong lawes.

Speaking law

Their forces for the wars, with the chief officers, and their ſalaries.

The Soldiers of Ruſsia are called Sinaboiarskey, or the ſonnes of Gentlemen, becauſe they are all of that degree, by vertue of their Military profeſſion. For euery ſoldier is a Gentleman, and none are gentlemen, but onely the ſoldiers, that take it by diſcent from their Anceſtors; ſo that the ſon of a Gentleman (which is borne a ſoldier) is euer a Gentleman, and a Soldier withall, and profeſſeth nothing elſe but Military matters. When they are of years able to bear Armes, they come to the office of Roſerade, or great Conſtable, and there preſent themſelues, who entereth their names, and allotteth them certayne lands to maintaine their charges, for the moſt part, the ſame that their fathers enioyed.

Souldiers by birth and inheritance.

For the Lands assigned to maintaine the Army, are euer certaine, annexed to this office without improouing, or detracting one foot. But that if the Emperour haue sufficient in wages, the roomes being full so farre as the land doth extend alreadie; they are many times deferred, and haue nothing allowed them, except some one portion of the land be diuided into two. Which is a cause of great disorder within that country: when a souldier that hath many children, shall haue sometimes but one entertained in the Emperors pay. So that the rest hauing nothing, are forced to liue by vniust and wicked shiftes, that tend vnto the hurt and oppression of the Mousiak or common sort of people. This inconuenience groweth, by maintaining his forces in a continuall succession. The whole number of his souldiers in continual pay, is this. First, he hath of his Dworaney, that is, Pensioners, or guarde of his person, to the number of 15000. horsemen, with their Captaines and other officers, that are alwayes in a readinesse.

Degrees of Horsemen.

1. Prætoriani, or such as attend the Emperors person

Of these 15000. horssemen, there are three sorts or degrees, which differ aswel in estimation, as in wages, one degree from another. The first sort of them, is called Dworaney Bulshey, or the company of head Pensioners, that haue some an hundred, some fourscore Rubbels a yeare, & none vnder seuenty. The second sort are called Seredney Dworaney, or the middle ranke of Pensioners. These haue sixty, or fifty rubbels by the yeare, none vnder forty. The third and lowest sort are the Dyta Boianskey, that is, the lowest Pensioners. Their salary is thirty rubbels a yeare for him that hath most, some haue but fiue and twenty, some twenty, none vnder twelue. Whereof the halfe part is paide them at the Mosko, the other halfe in the fielde by the Generall, when they haue any warres, and are employed in seruice. When they receiue their whole pay, it amounteth to 55000. rubbels yearely.

And to this their wages, besides Lands alotted to euery one of them, both to the greater and the lesse, according vnto their degrees. Whereof he that hath least, hath to yeeld him twenty Rubbels or Markes by the yeare. Besides these 15000. horssemen that are of better choise (as beeing the Emperors owne gard, when himselfe goeth to the wars, not vnlike the Roman souldiers cald Prætoriani) are an hundred & ten men of special accoũt for their Nobility and trust, which are chosen by the Emperor, and haue their names registered, that find among them for the Emperours warres, to the number of 65000. horsemen, with all necessaries meete for the wars, after the Russe manner.

Two other troops, to the number of 65000.

To this end they haue yearly allowance made by the Emperor for themselues, & their companies, to the summe of 40000 rubbels. And these 65000. are to repaire to the field euery year on the borders towards the Chrim Tartar (except they bee appointed for some other seruice) whether there be warres with the Tartars, or not.

This might seeme (peraduenture) somwhat dangerous for some state, to haue so great forces vnder the commaund of Noblemen, to assemble euery yeare vnto one certaine place. But the matter is so vsed, as that no danger can growe to the Emperor, or his state by this meaus. First, becaũse these Noblemen are many, to wit, an hundred and ten in all, & changed by the Emperor, so oft as he thinks good. Secondly, becaũse they haue their liuings of the Emperor, being otherwise but of very small renennew, and receiue this yearly pay of 40000. rubbels, when it is presently to be paid forth againe vnto the soldiers that are vnder them. Thirdly, becaũse (for the most part) they are about the Emperors person, being of his counsell either speciall, or at large. Fourthly, they are rather as paymasters then Captaines to their companies, themselus not going forth ordinarily to the warres, saue when some of them are appointed, by speciall order from the Emperor himselfe: so the whole number of horsemen that are euer in a readines, and in continuall pay, are 80000, a few more or lesse.

Horsemen in continual pay 80000.

If he haue neede of a greater number, (which sildom falleth out) then he entertaineth of those Sinaboiarskey, that are out of pay, so many as he needeth: and if yet he want of his number, hee giueth charge to his Noblemen (that hold lands of him) to bring into the Fielde (euery man) a proportionable number of his Seruants, (called Kolophey) such as Till his Landes, with their Furniture, according vnto the full and iust number, that hee intendeth to make vppe. The which seruice beeing done, done, preſently lay in their Weapons, and returne to their ſeruile occupations againe.

Footmen in continual pay 12000.

Of Footmen that are in continuall pay, he hath to the number of 12000. all Gunners, called Strelſey. Whereof 5000 are to attend about the Citty of Mosko, or any other place where the Emperour ſhall abide, and 2000. (which are called Stremaney, Streſley, or Gunners at the ſtirrop) about his owne perſon, at the very Court or houſe where himſelfe lodgeth. The reſt are placed in his garriſon towns, till there be occaſion to haue them in the field, and receiue for their ſallery or ſtipend euery man ſeuen rubbels a yeare, beſides twelue meaſures, a piece of Rye, and Oates. Of mercenary Soldiours, that are ſtrangers (whom they call Nimſchoy) they haue at this time, 4300. of Polonians: of Chirchaſſes (that are vnder the Polonians) about foure thouſand, whereof 3500. are abroad in his garriſons: of Doutches Scots about 150. of Greekes, Turkes, Danes and Sweadens, all in one band, an 100. or thereabouts. But theſe they vſe onely vpon the Tartar ſide, and againſt the Siberians: as they doe the Tartar Soldiours (whom they hire ſometimes but onely for the preſent) on the other ſide againſt the Polonian and Sweden: thinking it beſt pollicie, ſo to vſe their ſeruice vpon the contrary border.

Strangers mercenaries in pay, 4300.

The chiefe Captaines or Leaders. Firſt, the Voiauod or Generall.

The chiefe Captaines or Leaders of theſe Forces, according to their names and degrees, are theſe which follow. Firſt, the Voyauodey Bulſhaia, that is, the Great Captaine, or Lieutenant Generall vnder the Emperour. This commonly is one of the foure houſes of the chiefe Nobility of the Land: but ſo choſen otherwiſe, as that he is of ſmall valour, or practiſe in Martiall matters, being thought to ſerue that turne ſo much the better, if he bring no other parts with him, ſaue the countenance of his Nobility, to be liked of by the Soldiours for that, and nothing elſe. For in this point they are very wary, that theſe two (to wit) Nobility, and power meete not both in one, ſpecially if they ſee wiſedome with all, or aptneſſe for pollicy.

Their great Voiauod or Generall at this preſent in their warres, is commonly one of theſe foure: Knez Feodor Iuanowich Methiſloskey, Knez Iuan Michailowich Glinskoy, Cherechaskoy, and Trowbetskoy, all of great Nobility, but of very ſimple quality otherwiſe: though in Glinskoy (as they ſay) there is ſome-what more then in the reſt. To make vp this defect in the Voiauod or Generall, there is ſome other ioyned with him as Lieutenant Generall, of farre leſſe Nobility, but of more valour and experience in the warres then he, who ordereth all things that the other countenanceth. At this time their principall man, and moſt vſed in their warres, is one Knez Demetrie Iuanowich Foreſtine, an ancient and expert Captaine, and one that hath done great ſeruice (as they ſay) againſt the Tartar and Polonian. Next, vnder the Voiauod and his Lieutenant Generall, are foure other, that haue the Marſhalling of the whole Army diuided among them, and may bee called the Marſhalles of the field.

2. Lieutenant Generall.

3 Marſhals of the field four.

Euery man hath his quarter or fourth part vnder him. Whereof the firſt is called the Praua Polskoy, or right wing. The ſecond is the Leuoy Polskoy, or left wing. The third is Ruſnoy Polskoy, or the broken band, becauſe out of this there are choſen to ſend abroad vpon any ſuddaine exploit, or to make a reſcue or ſupply, as occaſion doth require. The fourth is Storeſhouoy Potskoy, or the warding band. Euery one of theſe foure Marſhals haue two other vnder them (eight in all) that twice euery Weeke at the leaſt, muſt muſter and traine their ſeuerall wings or bands, and hold and giue iuſtice for all faults, and diſorders committed in the Campe.

The ordering of each quarter.

4. Marſhals Deputies 8.

And theſe eight are commonly choſen out of the 110. (which I ſpake of before) that receiue and deliuer the pay to the Soldiours. Vnder theſe eight are diuers other Captaines, as the Gulauoy Captaines of thouſands, fiue hundreds, and one hundred. The Petyde Setskoy, or Captaines of fifties, and the Decetskies, or Captaines of tens.

Fiue Coronels vnder Captaines.

Beſides the Voiauoday or Generall of the Army (ſpoken of before) they haue two other that beare the name of Voiauoda: wherof one is the Maſter of the great Ordenance (called Naradna Voiauoda) who hath diuers vnder Officers, neceſſary for that ſeruice. The other is called the Voiauoda Gulauoy, or the walking Sixe Maſters of the Artillery.

The walking Captaine.

Captaine, that hath allowed him a thousand good horſemen of principall choiſe, to range and ſpie abroad, and hadde the charge of the running Caſtle, which wee are to ſpeake of hereafter. All theſe Captaines and men of charge, muſt (once euery day) reſort to the Bulſha Voiauoda, or Generall of the Armie, to know his pleaſure, and to informe him, if there be any requiſite matter pertaining to theyr Office.

Of their muſtering and leuying of forces, maner of Armour, & prouiſion of victuall for the warre.

Their order for muſtering

When warres are towardes (which they faile not of lightly euery yeare with the Tartar, and many times with the Polonian and Sweden) the foure Lordes of the Chetfirds ſend foorth their ſummons in the Emperors name, to all the Dukes and Dyackes of the Prouinces, to bee proclaimed in the head Townes of euery Shire: that all the Sinaboiarskey, or ſonnes of Gentlemen, make their repaire to ſuch a border where the ſeruice is to be done, at ſuch a place, and by ſuch a day, & there preſent themſelues vnto ſuch and ſuch Captaines.

When they come to the place aſſigned them in the Summons or Proclamation, their names are taken by certain Officers, that haue Commiſſion for that purpoſe, from the Roſerade or High Conſtable, as Clearkes of the Bands.

Default of appearance.

If any make default and faile at the day, he is mulcted, and puniſhed very ſeuerely. As for the Generall and other cheefe Captaines, they are ſent thither from the Emperours owne hand, with ſuch Commiſſion and charge, as hee thinketh behouefull for the preſent ſeruice. When the Soldiours are aſſembled, they are reduced into their Bands and Companies, vnder their ſeuerall Captaines of tennes, fifties, hundreds, thouſands, &c. and theſe Bands into foure Polskeis or Legions (but of farre greater numbers then the Romaine Legions were) vnder theyr foure great Leaders; which alſo haue the Authority of Marſhals of the fielde, as was ſaide before.

The horſemans furniture.

Concerning their Armour, they are but ſlightly appointed. The common Horſeman hath nothing elſe but his Bow in his caſe, vnder his right Arme, and his Quiuer and Sword hanging on the lefte ſide: except ſome few that beare a Caſe of Dags, or a Iauelin, or ſhort ſtaffe along their Horſe ſide. The vnder Captains will haue commonly ſome piece of Armour beſides, as a Shirt of Male, or ſuch like. The Generall, with the other chief Captaines and men of Nobilitie, will haue their horſe very richly furniſhed, theyr Saddles of Cloth of Golde, their Bridles faire boſſed and taſſelled with Golde and Silke Frindge, beſtudded with Pearle & precious Stones: themſelues in very faire Armour, which they call Bullatnoy, made of faire ſhining Steele yet couered commonly with cloth of Golde, and edged round with Ermin Furre, his ſteele Helmet on his head, of a very great price, his Sword, Bow and Arrowes at his ſide, his Speare in his hand, with another fayre Helmet, and his Sheſtapera or Horſmans Scepter caried before him. Their Swords, Bowes, and Arrowes, are of the Turkiſh faſhion. They practiſe like the Tartar, to ſhoote forwards and backwards, as they flye and retyre.

The General and cheefe Captaines.

The footmãs furniture.

The Strelſey or Foote-man, hath nothing but his peece in his hand, his ſtriking Hatchet at his backe, and his Sword by his ſide. The ſtocke of his peece, is not made Calieuer-wiſe, but vvith a plaine & ſtraight ſtocke (ſomewhat like a Fouling peece) the barrel is rudely and vnartificially made, very heauy, yet ſhooteth but a very ſmall Bullet.

Prouiſion of victuall.

As for their prouiſion of victuall, the Emperor alloweth none, eyther for Captaine or Soldiour, neither prouideth any for them, except peraduenture ſome corn for their mony. Euery man is to bring ſufficient for himſelfe, to ſerue his turne for foure moneths, and (if neede require) to giue order for more to bee brought vnto him to the Campe, from his Tenant that tilleth his land, or ſome other place.

Their fielde-lodging and diet.

One great helpe they haue, that for Lodging and Dyet, euery Ruſſe is prepared to be a ſouldiour before-hand. Al. though the chiefe Captaines, and other of account, do carrie Tents along vvith them, after the form and faſhion of ours, with ſome better prouiſion of Victuall then the reſt; they bring with them commonly into the Campe for Victuall, a kinde of dryed Bread (vvhich they call Sucharie) with ſome ſtore of Meale, the which they temper withwater, & ſo make it into a Ball, or ſmall lump of Dough, called Tollockno. And this they eat raw in ſtead of Bread. Their meat is Bacon, or ſome ſome other fleſh or fiſh dryed, after the Dutch manner.

If the Ruſſe Souldier were as hardie to execute an enterprize, as hee is harde to beare out toyle and trauaile, or were otherwiſe as apt and well trayned for the warres, as he is indifferent for his lodging and dyet; he would farre exceed the Soldiours of other parts. Whereas now, hee is farre meaner of courage, and execution in any warlike ſeruice. Which commeth partly of his ſeruile condition, that will not ſuffer any great courage or valour to grow in him. Partly for lacke of due honour and reward, which he hath no great hope of, whatſoeuer ſeruice or execution he doe.

Of their marching, charging, and other martiall diſcipline.

The Ruſſe truſteth rather to his number, then to the valor of his Soldiers, or good ordering of his forces. Their marching or leading is without all order, ſaue that the foure Polskey or Legions (whereinto their army is diuided) keepe themſelues vnder their Enſignes, and ſo thruſt all on together in a hurrey, as they are directed by their Generall. Their Enſigne is the image of Saint George. The Bulſha Dworaney or cheefe Horſemen, haue euery man a ſmall Drumme of Braſſe at his Saddle-bow, which he ſtriketh when hee giueth the charge, or onſet.

Horſemen, drummes.

The Horſemans manner of charging.

They haue Drummes beſides of a huge biggeneſſe, which they carrie vvith them vppon a boord layde on foure horſes, that are ſparred together with Iron Chaines, euery Drumme hauing eyght Bearers or Drummers, beſides Trumpets, and Shawmes, which they ſound after a wilde manner, much diffrent from ours.

When they giue any Charge, or make any inuaſion, they make a great hallowe or ſhowte altogether, as lowde as they can, which with the ſound of their Trumpets, Shawmes, and Drummes, maketh a confuſed and horrible noyſe. So they ſet on firſt diſcharging their Arrows, then dealing with their Swordes, which they vſe in a brauery to ſhake, and brandiſh ouer their Heades, before they come to ſtrokes.

The foote-mans charge.

Their Footmen (becauſe otherwiſe they want order in leading) are commonly placed in ſome ambuſh, or place of aduantage, where they may moſt annoy the enemy, with leaſt hurt to themſelues. If it bee a ſet battaile, or if any great inuaſion bee made vppon the Ruſſe borders, by the Tartar; they are ſette within the running or mooving Caſtle (called Beza, or Gulay gorod) which is carried about with them by the Voiauoda gulauoy (or the Walking Generall) whome I ſpake of before. This Walking or mooving Caſtle is ſo framed, that it may be ſet vp in length (as occaſion doth require) the ſpace of one, two, three, foure, fiue, ſix, or ſeuen miles: for ſo long will it reach. It is nothing elſe but a double wall of Woode, to defend them on both ſides, behinde and before; with a ſpace of three yards or thereabout, betwixt the two ſides: ſo that they may ſtand within it, and haue roome enough to charge and diſcharge their peeces, and to vſe their other weapons.

The walking Caſtle.

What the walking Caſtle is.

It is cloſed at both ends, & made with loope holes on either ſide, to lay out the noſe of their peece, or to puſh forth any other weapon. It is caried along with the army wherſoeuer it goeth, being taken in to peeces, and ſo layde on Cartes ſparred together, and drawen by horſſe that are not ſeene, by reaſon that they are couered with their carriage, as with a ſhelfe or pent-houſe.

The planting of the walking Caſtle.

When it is brought vnto the place where it is to be vſed (which is deuiſed & choſen out before by the Walking Voiauod) it is planted, ſo much as the preſent vſe requireth, ſometime a mile long, ſom times two, ſometimes three, or more: Which is ſoone done without the helpe of any Carpenter, or inſtrument: becauſe the Timber is ſo framed to claſp together one peece within another: as is eaſily vnderſtood, by thoſe that know the manner of the Ruſſe bvilding.

The ſhotte againſt the Tartar.

In this Caſtle ſtandeth their Shot well fenced for aduantage, eſpecially agaynſt the Tartar, that bringeth no Ordenance, nor other Weapon into the Fielde with him, ſaue his Sword, and Bowe and Arrowes. They haue alſo within it diuerſe fielde peeces, which they vſe as occaſion doth require. Of peeces for the fielde, they carry vp great ſtore, when they war againſt the Tartar: but when they deale with the Polonian (of whoſe forces they make more account) they go better furniſhed with all kind of munition, and other neceſſarie prouiſions. It is thought, that no Prince of Chriſtendome, hath better ſtore of munition, then the Ruſſe Emperour. And it may partly appeare by the Artillerie houſe at Mosko, where are of all ſortes of great Ordenance, all Braſſe peeces, very faire, to an exceeding great number.

The quality of the Ruſſe Soldier.

The Ruſſe Soldiour is thought to be better at his defence within ſome Caſtle, or Towne, then hee is abroad at a ſet pitched fielde. Which is euer noted in the practiſe of his warres, and namely, at the ſiedge of Vobsko, ſome few yeares ſince: where he repulſed the Polonian king, Stephan Batore, with his whole Army of an hundred thouſand men, and forced him (in the end) to giue ouer his ſiedge, with the loſſe of many of his beſt Captaines and Soldiers. But in a ſet fielde, the Ruſſe is noted to haue the worſe of the Polonian and Sweden.

Reward for valor.

If any behaue himſelfe more valiantly then the reſt, or doe any ſpeciall peece of ſeruice, the Emperor ſendeth him a piece of Gold, ſtamped with the image of Saint George on horſe-backe. Which peece they hang on their ſleeues, and ſet in their Caps. And this is accounted the greateſt honor they can receiue for any ſeruice they do.

Of their Collonies and maintaining of their Conqueſts or purchaſes by force.

The Ruſſe Emperors (of late years) haue very much enlarged their Dominions & Territories. Their firſt Conqueſt after the Dukedome of Mosko (for before that time they were but Dukes of Volodemer, as before was ſayde) was the Cittie, and Dukedome of Nouograd on the Weſt and North-Weſt ſide: which was no ſmal inlargement of their Dominion, & ſtrengthening vnto them for the winning of the reſt. This was done by Iuan, great Grand father to Theodore now Emperour, about the yeare 1480.

The victories & conqueſtes of Theodore.

The ſame began likewiſe to encroach vpon the Countreyes of Liuonia and Lituania, but the Conqueſt onely intended, and attempted by him vpon ſome part of thoſe Countreyes, was purſued and performed by his ſonne Baſileus, who firſt of all wan the Cittie and Dukedom of Pleſko, afterwards the City and Dukedom of Smolensko, and many other faire Townes, with a large Territory belonging vnto them, about the yeare 1514.

These victories againſt the Lettoes or Lituanians, in the time of Alexander their Duke, hee atchieued rather by aduantage of ciuill diſſentions and treaſons among themſelues, then by any great pollicie or force of his owne. But all this was loſt againe by his ſonne Iuan Vaſilowich, about eight or nine yeares paſt, vpon compoſition with the Polonian King Stephen Batore; whereunto he was forced by the aduantages which the Pole had then of him, by reaſon of the foyle hee had giuen him before, and the diſquietneſſe of his owne ſtate at home. Onely the Ruſſe Emperor, at this time, hath left him on that ſide his Countrey, the Cities of Smolensko, Vitobsko, Cheringo, and Beala Gorod in Lituania. In Lituania, not a Towne, nor one foote of ground.

All wonne by the father, loſt by the ſonne.

When Baſileus firſt Conquered thoſe Countreyes, hee ſuffered the Natiues to keepe their poſſeſſions, and to inhabit all their Townes, onely paying him a Tribute, vnder the gouernment of his Ruſſe Captaines. But by their Conſpiracies & attempts not long after, he was taught to deale more ſurely with them. And ſo cõming vpon them the ſecond time, hee killed and caried away with him, three parts of foure, which he gaue or ſolde vnto the Tartars that ſerued him in thoſe wars, & (inſted of them) placed there his Ruſſes, ſo many as might ouer-match the reſt, with certaine Garriſons of ſtrength beſides. Wherein, notwithſtanding this ouerſight was committed, for that (taking away with him the Vpland or Countrey people (that ſhould haue tild the ground and might eaſily haue bene kept in order without any daunger, by other good policies) hee was driuen afterwardes manie yeares together, to Victuall the Countrey (eſpecially the great Townes) out of his owne Countrey of Ruſſia, the ſoyle lying there in the meane while waſte and vntilled.

Lituania, and the Emperors remiſſenes in his Conqueſt thereof.

The like fell out at the port of Narue, in Liefland, where his ſonne Iuan Vaſilowith deuiſed, to build a Towne and a Caſtle on the other ſide the Riuer, (called Iuangorod) to keepe the Town and countrey in ſubiection. The Caſtle he cauſed to bee ſo built and fortified, that it was thought to bee inuincible. And when it was finiſhed, for reward to the Architect (that was a Polonian) hee put out both his eyes, to make him vnable to build the like againe. But hauing left the Natiues all within their owne Countrey, without abating Narue euen in the ſame manner.

A moſt vnkind reward.

bating their number or ſtrength; the Towne and Caſtle (not long after) was betrayed, and ſurrendred againe to the King of Sweden.

Kingdomes won from the Tartar.

On the Southeaſt ſide, they haue got the Kingdomes of Cazan, and Aſtracan. Theſe were wonne from the Tartar, by the late Emperor Iuan Vaſilowich, Father to the Emperour that now is: the one about 35. the other about 33. yeares agoe. Northward out of the Country of Siberia, he hath laide vnto his Realme, a great bredth and length of ground, from Wichida to the Riuer of Obba, about a thouſand miles ſpace: ſo that hee is bold to write himſelfe now, The Great Commander of Siberia.

Permia and Pechora, their conquering.

The Countries likewiſe of Permia & Pechora, are a diuerſe people & language from the Ruſſe, ouercome not long ſince, and that rather by threatning, & ſhaking of the Sword, then by any actuall force: as being a weake and naked people, without meanes to reſiſt.

Meanes of holding his chiefe townes

That which the Ruſſe hath in his preſent poſſeſſion, he keepeth on this ſort. In his foure cheefe border townes of Vobſko, Smolensko, Aſtracan, and Cazan, he hath certaine of his Counſel, not of greateſt Nobility, but of greateſt truſt, which haue more authority within their Precincts (for the countenancing & ſtrengthening of their gouernment there) then the other Dukes that are ſet to gouerne in other places, as was noted before, in the manner of ordering their Prouinces. Theſe he changeth ſomtime euery yeare, ſometime euery ſecond or third yeare, but exceedeth not that time; except vpon very ſpeciall truſt, and good liking of the party, and his ſeruice: leaſt by enlarging of their time, they might grow into ſome familiarity with the enemy (as ſome haue done) being ſo far out of ſight.

The ſtrength of Townes & Caſtles.

The Townes beſides are very ſtrongly fenced with Trenches, Caſtles, & ſtore of munition, and haue garriſons within thē, to the number of two or three thouſand a piece. They are ſtored with victuall (if any ſiedge ſhould come vpon them) for the ſpace of two or three yeares before hand. The foure Caſtles of Smolenſko, Vobſko, Cazan and Aſtracan, hee hath made very ſtrong to beare out any ſiedge: ſo that it is thought that thoſe Townes are impregnable.

Meanes of holding the Countries of Pechora, Permia, and Siberia.

As for the Countries of Pechora and Permia, and that part of Siberia, which hee hath now vnder him, they are kept by as eaſie meanes, as they were firſt got, viz. rather by ſhewing, then by vſing of Armes. Firſt, he hath ſtored the Country with as many Ruſſes as there are Natiues, & hath there ſome few Soldiours in garriſon, enough to keepe them vnder. Secondly, his Officers and Magiſtrates there, are of his owne Ruſſe people, and he changeth them very often, viz. euery yeare twice or thrice; notwithſtanding there be no great feare of any innouation. Thirdly he diuideth them into many ſmall gouernements, like a ſtaffe broke in many ſmall pieces: ſo that they haue no ſtrength being ſeuered, which was but little neyther, when they were all in one. Fourthly, he prouideth that the people of the country haue neyther Armour, nor mony, being taxed and pilled ſo often as he thinketh good: without any meanes to ſhake off that yoke, or to releeue themſelues.

The Kings Brother of Siberia allured from his Country.

In Siberia (where he goeth on in purſuing his Conqueſt) hee hath diuers Caſtles and Garriſons, to the number of ſixe thouſand Soldiours of Ruſſes and Polonians, and ſendeth many new ſupplies thither, to plant and inhabite, as he winneth ground. At this time beſides, he hath gotten the Kings Brother of Siberia, allured by certaine of his Captains, to leaue his owne Country, by offers of great entertainment, and pleaſanter life with the Ruſſe Emperor, then he had in Siberia. He was brought in this laſt yeare, and is now with the Emperor at Mosko well entertained.

The pollicy of their Conqueſt or other preuailing, whereſoeuer they come.

This may be ſaid of the Ruſſe practiſe, whereſoeuer he ruleth, either by right of Inheritance, or by Conqueſt.

Firſt, hee bereaueth the Country of Armour, and other meanes of defence, which he permitteth to none, but to his Boiarskeis onely.

Secondly, he robbeth them continually of their mony and commodities, and leaueth them bare, with nothing but their bodies and liues, within certaine yeares compaſſe.

Thirdly, hee renteth and diuideth his Territories into many ſmall pieces, by ſeuerall gouernments: ſo that none hath much vnder him to make any ſtrength, though he had other opportunities.

Fourthly,

Fourthly, he gouerneth his Countries by men of ſmall reputation, and no power of themſelues, and ſtrangers (in thoſe places) where their gouernment lyeth.

Fiftly, he changeth his Gouernors once a yeare ordinarily, that there grow no great liking, nor intierneſſe betwixt the people and them, nor acquaintance with the enemy, if they lie towards the Borders.

Setting diuels together by the eares.

Sixtly, hee appointeth in one and the ſame place aduerſary Gouernors, the one to be as Controller of the other, as the Dukes and Diacks: where (by meanes of their enuies and emulations) there is leſſe hurt to be feared by their agreement, and himſelfe is better informed what is done amiſſe.

Seuenthly, he ſendeth many times into euery Prouince ſecret Meſſengers (of ſpeciall truſt about him) as intelligencers, to pry and hearken out what is doing, and what is amiſſe there. And this is ordinary, though it be ſudden, and vnknowne what time they will come.

Of the Tartars, and other borderers to the Country of Ruſsia, with whom they haue moſt to do in warre & peace.

Their neighbours with whom they haue greateſt dealings and intercourſe, both in peace and warre, are firſt the Tartar: Secondly the Polonian, whom the Ruſſe calleth Laches, noting the firſt Author or Founder of the Nation, who was called Laches or Leches, whereunto is added Po, which ſignifieth People, and ſo is made Polaches, that is, the People or Poſterity of Laches: which the Latines (after their manner of writing) call Polanos. The third are the Swedens. The Polonians and Swedens are better knowne to theſe parts of Europe, then are the Tartars, that are farther off from vs (as beeing of Aſia) and diuided into many Tribes, different both in name and gouernment one from another.

The Polonians called Laches by the Ruſſe, and the reaſon why.

The Chrim Tartar, or the Great Cham.

The greateſt and mightieſt of them is the Chrim Tartar, (whom ſome call the Great Cham) that lyeth South, & South-eaſtward from Ruſsia, and doth moſt annoy the Country by often inuaſions, cõmonly once euery yeare, ſometime entering very farre within the inland parts. In the yeare 1571. he came as far as the Citie of Mosko, with an Army of two hundred thouſand men, without any battaile, or reſiſtance at all, for that the Ruſſe Emperor (then Iuan Vaſilowich) leading forth his Army to encounter with him, marched a wrong way: but (as it was thought) of very purpoſe, as not daring to aduenture the Fielde, by reaſon that he doubted his Nobility and cheefe Captaines, of a meaning to betray him to the Tartar.

The firing of Mosko by the Chrim Tartar, in the yeare 1571.

The Cittie hee tooke not, but fired the Subburbs, which by reaſon of the buildings (which are al of Wood, without any Stone, Brick or Lime, ſaue certaine outroomes) kindled ſo quickly, and went on with ſuch rage; as that it conſumed the greateſt part of the Citty, almoſt within the ſpace of foure houres, being of thirty miles or more of compaſſe. Then might you haue ſeene a lamentable ſpectacle: beſides the huge and mighty flame of the Citty all on light fire, the people burning in their houſes and ſtreetes, but moſt of all, of ſuch as laboured to paſſe out of the gates, fartheſt from the enemy; where meeting together in a mightie throng, & ſo preſſing euery man to preuent another: wedged themſelues ſo faſt within the gate and ſtreetes neere vnto it, as that three rankes walked one vpon the others head, the vppermoſt treading down thoſe that were lower: ſo that there periſhed at that time (as was ſaide) by the fire & the preaſe, the number of eight hũdred thouſand people, or more.

A ſtrange accident as euer was heard of.

The Chrims ſalutation to the Emperor.

The Chrim thus hauing fired the City, and fed his eyes with the ſight of it all on a light flame; returned with his Army, and ſent to the Ruſſe Emperor a Knife (as was ſaid) to ſtick himſelfe withall: vpbraiding this loſſe, and his deſperate caſe, as not daring eyther to meete his enemy in the fielde, nor to truſt his friends nor ſubiects at home.

The quarrell betweene the Ruſſe and Tartar.

The principall cauſe of this continuall quarrell betwixt the Ruſſe and the Chrim, is for the right of certaine border parts, claimed by the Tartar, but poſſeſſed by the Ruſſe. The Tartar alleadgeth, that beſides Aſtracan, & Cazan (that are the ancient poſſeſſion of the Eaſt Tartar) the whole Country, from his bounds North and Weſtward, ſo farre as the City of Mosko, and Mosko it ſelfe, pertaineth to his right. Which ſeemeth to haue bin true, by the report of the Ruſſes themſelues, that tell of a certaine homage, that was done by the Ruſſe Emperour (euery yeare) to the Great Chrim or Cham, the Ruſſe Emperour ſtanding on foote, and feeding the Chrims Horſe (him-ſelfe ſitting on his back) with Oates out of his owne Cap, inſtead of a Boule or Maunger, and that within the Caſtle of Mosko. And this homage (they ſay) was done till the time of Baſileus, grandfather to this man. Who ſurprizing the Chrim Emperour by a ſtratagem, done by one of his Nobility (called Iuan Demetrowich Belſchey) was content with this ranſome, viz. with the changing of this homage into a tribute of Furres: which afterwards alſo was denied to be paide by this Emperors Father.

Homage done by the Ruſſe to the Chrim Tartar, and in what manner.

The homage releaſed by the Chrims ſurprizall.

Hereupon they continue the quarrell, the Ruſſe defending his Country, & that which he hath won, the Chrim Tartar inuading him once or twice euery yeare, ſometime about Whitſontide, but oftner in Harueſt. What time, if the great Cham or Chrim come in his owne perſon, hee bringeth with him a great Army of an hundred thouſand, or two hundred thouſand men. Otherwiſe, they make ſhort and ſudden roads into the Country with leſſer numbers, running about the liſt of the border, as wilde Geeſe flie, inuading and retiring where they ſee aduantage.

The Chrims comming againſt the Ruſſe.

Their common practiſe (beeing very populous) is to make diuers Armies, and ſo drawing the Ruſſe to one, or two places of the Frontiers, to inuade at ſome other place, that is left without defence. Their manner of fight, or ordering of their Forces, is much after the Ruſſe manner (ſpoken of before) ſaue that they are all horſemen, and carry nothing elſe but a Bowe, a ſheafe of Arrowes, & a faulchon ſword after the Turkiſh faſhion. They are very expert horſemen, and vſe to ſhoote as readily backward, as forward. Some will haue a horſemans ſtaffe like vnto a boare ſpeare, beſides their other weapons. The common Soldiour hath no other armour then his ordinary apparell, viz. a blacke ſheepes skinne, with the wooll ſide ourward in the day time, and inward in the night time, with a cap of the ſame. But their Morſeys or Noblemen imitate the Turke both in apparell and armor. When they are to paſſe ouer a Riuer with their Army, they tye three or foure horſes together, and taking long Poles or pieces of wood, binde them faſt to the tayles of their horſes: ſo ſitting on the Poles they driue their horſe ouer. At handy-ſtrokes (when they come to ioyne battaile) they are accounted farre better men then the Ruſſe people, fierce by nature, but more hardy and bloudy by continuall practiſe of warre: as men knowing no parts of peace, nor any ciuill practiſe.

The manner of the Tartars fight & armor

The common Soldiours Armour of the Tartars, differing from the Nobleman.

Their paſſage of Riuers.

Yet their ſubtilty is more then may ſeeme to agree with their barbarous condition. By reaſon they are practiſed to inuade continually, and to robbe their neighbours that border about them; they are very pregnant, and ready witted to deuiſe ſtratagems (vpon the ſudden) for their better aduantage. As in their war againſt Beala the fourth, King of Hungary, whom they inuaded with fiue hundred thouſand men, and obtained againſt him a great victory. Where (among other) hauing ſlaine his Chancellor, called Nicholas Schinick; they found about him the Kings priuy Seale. Whereupon, they deuiſed preſently to counterfeit Letters in the Kings Name, to the Citties and Townes next about the place, where the field was fought; with charge, that in no caſe they ſhould conuey themſelues and their goods out of their dwellings, where they might abide ſafely without all feare of danger, and not leaue the Country deſolate, to the poſſeſſion of ſo vile and barbarous an enemy, as was the Tartar Nation, tearming themſelues in all reproachfull manner.

The ſubtilty of the Tartar.

The Tartars war againſt Beala King of Hungary, and their cunning pollicy.

For, notwithſtanding he had loſt his carriages, with ſome few ſtraglers that had marched diſorderly; yet hee doubted not but to recouer that loſſe, with the acceſſe of a notable victory, if the ſauage Tartar durſt abide him in the field. To this purpoſe, hauing written their letters in the Poliſh Characters, by certaine yong men whom they tooke in the fielde, and ſigned them with the Kings Seale; they diſpatched them foorth to all the quarters of Hungary, that lay neare about the place. Whereupon the Hungarians, that were now flying away with their goods, wiues, and children, vppon the rumour of the kings ouerthrow, taking comfort by theſe counterfeit Letters; ſtaied at home. And ſo were made a prey, being ſurprized on the ſudden by the huge number of theſe Tartars, that had compaſſed them about before they were aware.

All policies in warre are by them accounted lawfull.

When they beſiege a Towne or Fort, they offer much Parley, and ſend many flattering Beſiedging of Townes or Forts.

flattering meſſages to perſwade a ſurrender, promiſing all things that the Inhabitants will require: but being once poſſeſſed of the place, they vſe all manner of hoſtility, and cruelty. This they do vpon a rule they haue, viz. That Iuſtice is to bee practiſed but towards their owne. They encounter not lightly, but they haue ſome ambuſh, whereunto (hauing once ſhewed themſelues, and made ſome ſhort conflict) they retire, as repulſed for feare, and ſo draw the enemy into it if they can. But the Ruſſe being wel acquainted with their practiſe, is more wary of them. When they come a rouing with ſome ſmal number, they ſet on horſebacke counterfeit ſhapes of men, that their number may ſeeme greater.

A ſubtle rule among the Tartars.

When they make any onſet, their manner is to make a great ſhoute, crying all out together, Olla Billa, Olla Billa, God help vs, God helpe vs. They contemne death ſo much, as that they chuſe rather to die, then to yeeld to their enemy, & are ſeene (when they are ſlaine) to bite the very weapon when they are paſt ſtriking, or helping of themſelues. Wherein appeareth, how diffrent the Tartar is in his deſperate courage, from the Ruſſe and Turke. For the Ruſſe Souldior, if hee begin once to retire, putteth all his ſafety in his ſpeedy flight. And if once he be taken by his enemy, he neither defendeth himſelfe, nor intreateth for his life, as reckning ſtraight to die. The Turke commonly, when hee is paſt hope of eſcaping, falleth to entretie, and caſteth away his weapon, offereth both his hands, and holdeth them vp, as it were to be tied: hoping to ſaue his life, by offering himſelfe bondſlaue.

The Tartars contempt of death.

Of the Ruſſe Soldiour.

Of the Turkiſh Soldiour.

The cheefe booty the Tartars ſeeke for in all their wars, is to get ſtore of captiues, ſpecially yong boies and girles, whō they ſell vnto the Turkes, or other their neighbours. To this purpoſe they take with them great Baskets, made like Bakers Panniers, to carry them tenderly, and if any of them happen to tier, or to be ſick on the way, they daſh him againſt the ground, or ſome tree, and ſo leaue him dead. The Soldiours are not troubled with keeping the Captiues, and the other bootie, for hindering the execution of their wars; but they haue certaine bands that intend nothing elſe, appointed of purpoſe to receiue and keepe the Captiues and the other prey.

The booty of the Tartars.

The Ruſſe borders (being vſed to their inuaſions lightly euery yeare in the Summer) keepe few other Cattell on the border parts, ſaue Swine onely, which the Tartar wil not touch, nor driue away with him: for that he is of the Turkiſh religion, and will eate no Swines fleſh. Of Chriſt our Sauior, they confeſſe as much as doth the Turk in his Alkaron, viz. That he came of the Angell Gabriel, & the Virgin Mary, that he was a great Prophet, & ſhall be the Iudge of the world at the laſt day. In other matters likewiſe, they are much ordered after the manner and direction of the Turke: hauing felt the Turkiſh Forces, when hee wonne from them Azou, and Caffa, with ſome other townes about the Euxine, or Blacke Sea, that were before tributaries to the Chrim Tartar. So that now the Emperor of the Chrims (for the moſt part) is choſen ſome one of the Nobility, whom the Turke doth commend: whereby it is brought now to that paſſe, that the Chrim Tartar giueth to the Turke the tenth part of the ſpoile, which he getteth in his wars againſt the Chriſtians.

The Tartars religion like to the Turke.

Choiſe of the Tartars Emperor.

Heerein they differ from the Turkiſh Religion, for that they haue certaine idoll puppets, made of ſilke, or like ſtuffe, of the faſhion of a man, which they faſten to the doore of their walking houſes, to bee as Ianuſſes or keepers of their houſe. And theſe Idols are made not by all, but by certaine religious women, which they haue among them, for that and like vſes. They haue beſides, the image of their King or Great Cham, of an huge bigneſſe, which they erect at euery ſtage, when the Army marcheth: and this euery one muſt bend and bow vnto as he paſſeth by it, be hee Tartar, or ſtranger. They are much giuen to witchcraft, and ominous coniectures, vpon euery accident which they heare or ſee.

Difference from the Turkiſh Religion.

Addiction to witchcraft.

In making of marriages, they haue no regard of alliance or conſanguinity. Onely with his Mother, Siſter, and Daughter, a man may not marry, and though hee take the woman into his houſe, and accompany with her; yet hee accounteth her not for his Wife, till he haue a childe by her. Then he beginneth to take a dowry of her friends, of Horſe, Sheep, Kine, &c. If ſhe bee barren, after a certaine time Making of mariages among the Tartars.

time, he turneth her home agayne.

The Tartar Nobilitie, and their authoritie.

Vnder the Emperour they haue certayne Dukes, whom they call Morſeis, or Diuoymorſeis: that rule ouer a certayne number of tenne thouſand, twenty thouſand, or forty thouſand a peece, which they call Hoords. When the Emperour hath any vſe of them to ſerue in his wars, they are bound to come, and to bring with them their Souldiers to a certayne number, euery man with his two horſes at the leaſt, the one to ride on, the other to kill, when it commeth to his turne to haue his horſe eaten. For their chiefe vittaile is horſe fleſh, which they eate without bread, or any other thing with it. So that if a Tartar be taken by a Ruſſe, he ſhal be ſure lightly to finde a horſe legge, or ſome other part of him hanging at his ſaddle bowe.

The Tartars dyet, is horſe fleth.

This laſt yeare, when I was at the Moſco, came in one Kiriach Morſey, Nephew to the Emperour of the Chrims that now is (whoſe father was Emperour before) accompanied with 3. hundred Tartars. and his two wiues, whereof one was his brothers widdow. Where being entertayned in very good ſort (after the Ruſſe manner) he had ſent vnto his lodging for his welcome, to bee made ready for his ſupper and his companies, two very large and fatte horſes, ready flayed on a ſledde. They preferre it before other fleſh, becauſe the meate is ſtronger (as they ſay) then beefe, mutton, and ſuch like. And yet (which is maruell) though they ſerue all as horſemen in the warres, and eate all of horſe fleſh, there are brought yearely to the Moſco, to be exchanged for other commodities, thirty or fortie thouſand Tartar horſes, which they commonly call Cones.

A preſent at a Tartars entertainment.

Their vſe of blacke ſheeps milke.

They keepe alſo great heards of kine, and flockes of blacke ſheepe, rather for the skinnes and milke (which they carrie with them in great bottles) then for the vſe of the fleſh, though ſometimes they eate of it. Some vſe they haue of Rice, Figges, and other Fruites. They drinke milke or warme blood, and for the moſt part, carde them both together. They vſe ſometimes (as they doe trauell by the way) to let their horſes blood in a veine, and to drink it warme, as it cometh from his body.

Townesthydo plant none, nor other ſtanding buildings, but haue walking houſes, which the Latines call Veid, built vpon wheeles, like vnto a Shepheards cottage. Theſe they draw with them whither ſoeuer they goe, driuing their cattaile with them. And whē they come to their ſtage, or ſtanding place, they plant their Carthouſes very orderly in a ranke: and ſo do make the forme of the ſtreetes, and of a large towne. And this is the manner of the Emperour himſelfe, who hath no other ſeate of his Empire, but an Agora, or towne of wood, that mooueth with him whither ſoeuer he goeth. As for the fixed and ſtanding buildings vſed in other Countries, they ſay they are vnwholeſome and vnpleaſant.

The Tartars dwelling, walking, or remouing houſes.

Agora, or Towne of wood mouing with the Emperour.

They beginne to moone their houſes and cattaile in the Spring time, from the South part of their Countrey towardes the North parts. And ſo driuing on till they haue graſed all vp vnto the fartheſt part Northward, they returne backe agayne towardes their South Countrey (where they continue all the winter) by ten or twelue miles a ſtage: in the meane while, the graſſe being ſprung vp againe, to ſerue for their cattaile as they returne. From the border of the Shalcan towardes the Caſpian Sea, vnto the Ruſſe frontires, they haue a goodly Countrey, ſpecially on the South and South-eaſt parts, but loſt for lacke of tillage.

The times of remooving their houſes.

Of money they haue no vſe at all, and therefore prefer Braſſe and Steele before other mettalls, eſpecially bullate, which they vſe for Swords, Kniues, and other neceſſaries. As for Golde and Siluer, they neglect it of very purpoſe, (as they do all tillage of their ground) to be more free for their wandring kinde of life, and to keepe their Countrey leſſe ſubiect to inuaſions. Which giueth them great aduantage againſt all their neighbours, euer inuading, and neuer being inuaded. Such as haue taken vpon them to inuade their Countrey (as of olde time Cyrus and Darius Hyſtaſpis, on the Eaſt and Southeaſt ſide) haue done it with very ill ſucceſſe, as we finde in the Stories written of thoſe times. For their manner is, when any will inuade them, to allure and draw them on, by flying and reculing (as if they were affraid) vntill they haue drawne them ſome good way within their Countrey. Then, when they beginne to want vittaile and other other neceſſaries (as needes they muſt where nothing is to bee had) to ſtop vp the paſſages, and encloſe them with multitudes. By which ſtratagem (as wee reade in Laonicus Chalcocondylas in his Turkiſh ſtory) they had well nigh ſurprized the great and hnge Army of Tamberlaine; but that he retired with al ſpeed he could, towards the Riuer Tanais, or Don, not without great loſſe of his men, and carriages.

Laonicus Chalcocondylas.

Pachymerius.

In the ſtory of Pachymerius the Greeke (which hee wrote of the Emperours of Conſtantinople, from the beginning of the Reigne of Michael Palæologus, to the time of Andronicus the elder) I remember hee telleth (to the ſame purpoſe) of one Nogus, a Tartarian Captaine vnder Cazan, the Emperor of the Eaſt Tartars (of whō the Citty and Kingdome of Cazan may ſeeme to haue taken the denomination) who refuſed a Preſent of Pearle & other Iewels, ſent vnto him from Michael Palæologus: Asking (withall) for what vſe they ſerued, and whither they were good to keepe away ſickneſſe, death, or other misfortunes of this life, or no? So that it ſeemeth, they haue euer (or long time) bene of that minde, to value things no further, then by the vſe, and neceſſity for which they ſerue.

A ſtory of a Tartarian Captaine.

For perſon and complection, they haue broad and flat viſages, of a tanned colour into yellow and blacke, fierce and cruell lookes, thin haired vpon the vpper lip, and pit of the chin, light and nimble bodied, with ſhort legges, as if they were made naturally for Horſemen: whereto they practiſe themſelues from their childhood, ſildome going afoote about any buſineſſe. Their ſpeech is very ſudden and loud, ſpeaking as it were out of a deep hollow throate. When they ſing, you would thinke a Cow lowed, or ſome great bandog howled. Their greateſt exerciſe is ſhooting, wherin they traine vp their children from their very infancy, not ſuffring them to eate, til they haue ſhot neere the marke within a certaine ſcantling. They are the very ſame, that (ſometimes) were called * Scythæ Nomades, or the Scythian Shepheards, both by the Greekes and Latines.

Perſon and complection of the Tartars and their naturall inclination.

* A people in Scythia about Meotis.

Some thinke, that the Turkes tooke their beginning from the Nation of the Chrim Tartars. Of which opinion is Laonicus Chalcocondylas the Greeke Hiſtoriographer, in his firſt Booke of his Turkiſh ſtory. Wherein he followeth diuers very probable coniectures.

The firſt, taken from the very name it ſelfe, for that the word Turke, ſignifieth a Shepheard, or one that followeth a vagrant and wilde kinde of life. By which name theſe Scythian Tartars haue euer bin noted, being called by the Greeks, Skúthai Nómades, or the Scythian Shepheards.

The reaſons of the Greek Author, for his opinion of the Tartars.

His ſecond reaſon, becauſe the Turkes (in his time) that dwelt in Aſia the leſſe, to wit, in Lydia, Coria, Phrygia, and Cappadocia, ſpake the very ſame Language that theſe Tartars did, that dwelt betwixt the Riuer Tanais or Don, and the Country of Sarmatia, which (as is well knowne) are theſe Tartars called Chrims. At this time alſo, the whole Nation of the Turks differ not much in their common ſpeech from the Tartar Language.

Thirdly, becauſe the Turke and the Chrim Tartar agree ſo well together, as well in Religion, as matter of Trafficke, neuer inuading, or iniurying one another: ſaue that the Turke (ſince Laonicus his time) hath encroached vppon ſome Towns vpon the Euxine* Sea, that before pertained to the Chrim Tartar.

*A part of the Sea, diuiding Europe from Aſia.

Fourthly, becauſe Orcogules ſonne to Oguzalpes, and (Father to Ottoman, the firſt of name of the Turkiſh Nation) made his firſt rodes out of thoſe partes of Aſia, vpon the next borderers, til he cam towards the Countreyes about the Hill Taurus, where he ouercame the Greekes that inhabited there: and ſo enlarged the name and territory of the Turkiſh Nation, till he came to Eubœa and Attica, and other parts of Greece. This is the opinion of Laonicus, who liued amongeſt the Turkes, in the time of Amurath, the ſixte Tnrkiſh Emperor, about the year 1400. when the memory of their originall vvas more freſh: and therefore the likelyer hee was to hit the truth.

There are diuers other Tartars that border vpon Ruſsia, as the Nagaies, the Cheremiſens, the Mordwites, the Chircaſſes, & the Shalcans, which all differ (in name, more then in Regiment, or other condition) from the Chrim Tartar, except the Chircaſſes, that border South-Weſt, towards Lituania, and are farre more ciuill then the reſt of the Tartars; of a comely perſon, perſon, and of a ſtately behauiour, as applying themſelues to the faſhion of the Polonian. Some of them haue ſubiected themſelues vnto the Kings of Poland, and profeſſe Chriſtianity. The Nagay lyeth Eaſtward, and is reckoned for the beſt man of warre among all the Tartars, but very ſauage and cruell aboue all the reſt.

The Nagay Tartar, the cruelleſt. The Chircaſſe the ciuileſt Tartar.

The Cheremiſen Tartar, very troubleſome and dangerous.

The Cheremiſen Tartars, that lye betwixt the Ruſſe and the Nagay, are of two ſorts, the Lugauoy (that is of the Valley) and the Nagoruay, or of the hilly Country. Theſe haue much troubled the Emperours of Ruſsia. And therefore they are content now to buy peace of them, vnder pretence of giuing a yearely penſion of Ruſſe commodities, to their Morſeis, or Diuoymorſeis, that are cheefe of their Tribes. For which alſo they are bound to ſerue them in their wars, vnder certaine conditions. They are ſaide to be iuſt and true in their dealings: and for that cauſe they hate the Ruſſe people, whom they account to bee double, and falſe in all their dealings. And therefore the common ſort are very vnwilling to keepe agreement with them, but that they are kept in by their Morſeis, or Dukes for their penſions ſake.

The Mordwite Tartar the moſt barbarous of the reſt.

The moſt rude and barbarous is counted the Mordwite Tartar, that hath many ſelfe-faſhions, and ſtrange kindes of behauiour, differing from the reſt. For his Religion, though hee acknowledge one God, yet his manner is to worſhippe for God, that liuing thing, that hee firſt meeteth in the morning, and to ſweare by it all that whole day, whether it be Horſe, Dogge, Catte, or whatſoeuer elſe it bee. When his friend dieth, he killeth his beſt Horſe, and hauing flayed off the skinne, he carrieth it on high vppon a long Pole, before the corpes to the place of buriall. This hee doth (as the Ruſſe ſaith) that his friend may haue a good Horſe to carry him to Heauen: but it is likelier to declare his loue towards his dead friend, in that he will haue to die with him the beſt thing that he hath.

The Shalcans and Country of Media.

Next to the Kingdome of Aſtracan, that is the fartheſt part Southeaſtward of the Ruſſe Dominion, lyeth the Shalcans, and the Countrey of Media: whether the Ruſſe Merchants trade for raw ſilkes, ſyndon, ſaphion, skins, and other commodities. The chiefe Townes of Media where the Ruſſe tradeth, are Derbent (built by Alexander the great, as the Inhabitants ſay) and Zamachio, where the ſtaple is kept for rawe ſilkes. Their manner is (in the Spring time) to reuiue the ſilke-worms (that lye dead all the Winter) by laying them in the warme Sun, and to haſten their quickning, that they may ſooner goe to worke) to put them into bags, and ſo to hang the vnder their childrens armes. As for the Worme called Chriniſin (as wee call it Chrymſon) that maketh coloured ſilke, it is bred not in Media, but in Aſſyria. This trade to Derbent & Zamachio for raw ſilks and other commodities of that Country, as alſo into Perſia, and Boughara, downe the Riuer Volgha, and through the Caſpian Sea; is permitted aſwell to the Engliſh, as to the Ruſſe Merchants, by the Emperors laſt Graunt, as appeareth. Which he accounteth for a very ſpeciall fauour, and might prooue indeed very beneficiall to all kinde of Merchants, if the trade were well and orderly vſed.

Of reuiuing the Silke-wormes in the Spring time.

The Tartars haue no learning or written Law.

The whole Nation of the Tartars, are vtterly voide of all learning, & without written Law. Yet certaine rules they haue, which they hold by tradition, common to all the Hoords, for the practiſe of their life. Which are of this ſort.

Orders and obſeruations among them.

First, To obey their Emperour and other Magiſtrates, whatſoeuer they command about the publike ſeruice.

2. Except for the publike behoofe, euery man to be free, and out of controlement.

3. No priuate man to poſſeſſe any Lands, but the whole Country to be in common.

4. To neglect all daintineſſe and variety of meates, and to content themſelues with that which commeth next to hand, for more hardneſſe, and readineſſe in the executing of their affaires.

5. To weare any baſe attire, and to patch their cloathes, whether there be any neede or not: that when there is neede, it be no ſhame to weare a patcht Coate.

6. To take, or ſteale from any ſtranger whatſoeuer they can get, as being enemies to all men, ſaue to ſuch as will ſubiect themſelues to them.

7. Towards their owne Hoord and Nation, to be true in word and deed.

8. To ſuffer no ſtranger to come within the Realm. If any do, the ſame to be bond-ſlaue to him that firſt taketh him, except ſuch Marchants, and other as haue the Tartar Bull, or Paſtport about them.

Of the Permians, Samoites, & Lappes.

The Permians and Samoites, that do lie from Ruſsia, North and Northeaſt, are thought likewiſe to haue taken their beginning from the Tartar kinde. And it may partly be gheſſed by the faſhion of their countenance, as hauing all broade and flat faces, as the Tartars haue, except the Chirchaſſe,.

The Permians.

The Permians are accounted for a very ancient people. They are now ſubiect to the Ruſſe. They liue by hunting, and trading with their furres, as doth alſo the Samoyt, that dwelleth more towards the North ſea.

The Samoites

The Samoyt hath his name (as the Ruſſe ſaith) of eating himſelfe: as if in times paſt, they liued as Cannibals, eating one an other. Which they make more probable, becauſe (at this time) they eate all kinde of rawe fleſh, whatſoeuer it be, euen the very carrion that lyeth in the ditch. But as the Samoites themſelues will ſay, they were called Samoie, that is of themſelues, as though they were Indigenæ, or poore people bred vpon that very ſoile, that neuer changed their ſeate from one place to another, as moſt Nations haue doone. They are ſubiect, at this time, to the Emperour of Ruſsia.

Indigenæ or beggers.

The Samoites religion.

I talked with certaine of them, & finde that they acknowledge one God; but repreſent him by ſuch things as they haue moſt vſe and good by. Therefore they do worſhip, the Sunne, the Ollen, the Loſh, and ſuch like. As for the ſtorie of Slata Baba, or the Golden hagge, (which I haue read in ſome Maps and Deſcriptions of theſe countries, to be an Idole, after the forme of an old woman) that being demaunded by the Prieſt, giues them certaine oracles, concerning the ſucceſſe, and euent of things; I found it to be but a very Fable. Onely in the Prouince of Obdaria, vppon the Sea ſide, neare to the mouth of the great riuer Obda, there is a Rocke, which naturally (beeing ſomewhat helped by imagination) may ſeeme to beare the ſhape of a ragged woman, with a childe in her armes (as the Rocke by the North Cape the ſhape of a Fryer) where the Obdorian Samoites vſe much to reſort, by reaſon of the commoditie of the place for fiſhing: and there ſometime (as their manner is) conceiue and practiſe their ſorceries, and ominous coniecturings, about the good or the bad ſpeede of their iourneys, fiſhings, huntings, and other ſuch like.

Slata Baba or the golden Hagge.

The Obdorian.

The Samoites habite and behauiour.

They are clad in Seale skins, with the hairie ſide outwards downe, as low as the knees, with their breeches and neatherſtocks of the ſame, both men and women. They are all black haired, naturally beardleſſe. Therefore the men are hardly diſcerned from the women by their lookes, ſaue that the women weare a locke of haire downe along both their eares. They liue (in a maner) a wilde and a ſauage life, rouing ſtill from one place of the country to another, without any propertyof houſe or land, more to one then to an other. Their leader or directer in euery company, is their Papa or Prieſt.

The Lappes.

On the North ſide of Ruſsia next vnto Corelia, lyeth the Countrey of Lappia, which reacheth in length from the fartheſt poynt Northward, (towardes the North-cape) to the fartheſt part Southeaſt (which the Ruſſe calleth Sweetneſſe or Holy noſe, the Engliſhmen Capegrace) about 345. verſt or miles. From Sweetneſſe to Candelox by the way of Verſoga (which meaſureth the breadth of that countrey) is 90 miles, or thereabouts. The whole Countrey (in a manner) is eyther Lakes or Mountains, which towards the Sea ſide are called Tondro, becauſe they are all of hard and craggy rocke, but the in-land parres are well furniſhed with woods growing vpon the hilles ſides, the Lakes lying betweene. Their dyet is very bare and ſimple. Bread they haue none, but feed onely vpon fiſh and fowle. They are ſubiect to the Emperour of Ruſsia, and the two Kings of Sweden and Denmarke: which all exact tribute & cuſtome of them (as was ſaid before:) but the Emperour of Ruſsia beareth the greateſt hand ouer them, and exact of them farre more then the reſt. The opinion is, that they were firſt tearmed Lappes, of their briefe and ſhort ſpeach. The Ruſſe diuideth the whole nation of the Lappes into two ſorts. The one they call Nowremanskoy Lapary, that is, the Norueyan Lappes: becauſe they be of the Daniſh Religion. For the Danes & Norueyans they account for one people. The other that haue no Religion at all, but liue as brute and Heatheniſh people,

Their dyet and feeding.

Diuiſion of the Lappes.

people, without God in the world, they call Dikoy Lopary, or the wilde Lappes.

The Lappes voide of all Learning.

The whole Nation is vtterly vnlearned, hauing not ſo much as the vſe of any Alphabet, or Letter among them. For practiſe of witchcraft and ſorcery, they paſſe all Nations in the world. Though for the inchanting of Ships that ſayle along their Coaſt (as I haue heard it reported) and their giuing of windes, good to their friends, and contrary vnto other, whom they meane to hurt by tying of certaine knots vpon a Rope (ſome-what like to the tale of Æolus his winde-bag) is a very fable, deuiſed (as may ſeeme) by themſelues, to terrifie ſaylers for comming neare their Coaſt.

The Lappes giue or ſell no windes.

Their Weapons are the long Bow, and hand-gunne, wherein they excell, aſwell for quickneſſe to charge and diſcharge; as for nearneſſe at the marke, by reaſon of their continual practiſe (whereto they are forced) of ſhooting at wilde Fowle.

Their Weapons.

Their manner is (in Summer time) to come downe in great companies to the ſea ſide, to Wardhuyſe, Cola, Kegor, & the bay of Vedagoba, and there to fiſh for Cod, Salmon, and But-fiſh, which they ſell to the Ruſſes, Danes, and Norgenians, and now of late to the Engliſh men, that trade thither with cloth, which they exchange with the Lappes and Corelians for their Fiſh, Oyle, & Furs, whereof alſo they haue ſome ſtore. They hold their Mart at Cola on S. Peters day: what time the Captaine of wardhuyſe (that is reſiant there for the king of Denmark) muſt be preſent, or at leaſt ſend his deputy, to ſet prices on their ſtockfiſh, traine oile, furs, and other commodities: as alſo the Ruſſe Emperors Cuſtomer, or tribute taker, to receiue his cuſtome, which is euer payed before any thing can be bought or ſolde.

The Lappes Mart on S. Peters day.

When their fiſhing is done, their manner is, to draw their Carbaſſes, or Boates on ſhore, and there to leaue them with the keele turned vpwards, till the next ſpring tide. Their trauaile too and fro, is vpon ſleds, drawne by the Ollen Deere: which they vſe to turne a grazing all the Summer time, in an Iſland called Kilden (of a very good ſoyle, compared with other parts of that Country) and towards the Winter time, when the Snow beginneth to fall, they fetch them home againe, for the vſe of their ſledde.

CHAP. IIII.

Fourthly, concerning Eccleſiaſticall Offices and Orders; The Rites and Sacraments obſerued in the Moſcouian Church: with their Marriages and other Ceremonies beſide.

Concerning the gouernment of their Church, it is framed altogether after the manner of the Greeks, as being a part of that Church, and neuer acknowledging the iuriſdiction of the Latine Church, vſurped by the Pope. That I may keepe the better meaſure in deſcribing their Ceremonies, then they in the vſing thē (wherein they are infinite) I will note briefly.

Firſt, what Eccleſiaſticall degrees, or Offices they haue, with the iuriſdiction & practiſe of them.

Secondly, what doctrine they holde in matter of Religion.

Thirdly, what Leiturgy, or forme of ſeruice they vſe in their Churches, with the manner of their adminiſtring the Sacraments.

Fourthly, what other ſtrange Ceremonies, and ſuperſtitious deuotions are vſed among them.

Their Offices, or degrees of Churchmen, are as many in number, and the ſame in a manner (both in name and degree) that were in the Weſterne Churches. Firſt they haue their Patriarch, then their Metropolites, their Archbiſhops, their Vladikey or Biſhops, their Protopapes or Arch-Prieſts, their Papes or Prieſts, their Deacons, Fryars, Monks, Nuns, and Eremites.

The Church Officers.

Their Patriarch, or chiefe directer in matter of religion vntill this laſt year, was of the Citty of Conſtanſtinople (whom they called the Patriarch of Sio) becauſe, being driuen by the Turke out of Conſtanſtinople (the ſeat of his Empire) he remoued to the Iſle Sio, ſomtimes called Chio, and there placed his Patriarchall Sea. So that the Emperors & Cleargy of Ruſsia, were wont yearely to ſend guifts thither, and to acknowledge a ſpirituall kinde of homage, and ſubiection due to him, and to that Church. Which cuſtome they haue held (as it ſeemeth) euer ſince they profeſſed the Chriſtian religion. Which how long it hath bene, I coulde not well learne, for that they haue no ſtory or monument of Antiquity (that I could heare of) to ſhew what hath bene done in times paſt within their Countrey, concerning either Church or Commonwealth matters.

The Patriarch.

Onely I heard a report amongſt them, that about three hundred yeares ſince, there was a marriage betwixt the Emperour of Conſtantinople, & the kings daughter of that Country: who (at the firſt) denied to ioyne his daughter in marriage with the Greek Emperor, becauſe he was of the Chriſtian Religion. Which agreeeth well with that which I find in the ſtory of Laonicus Chalcacondylas, concerning Turkiſh affaires in his fourth book: where he ſpeaketh of ſuch a marriage, betwixt John the Greeke Emperor, and the Kings daughter of Sarmatia.

A ſolemne great marriage.

And this argueth (out of their own report) that at that time, they had not receyued the Chriſtian Religion: As alſo, that they were conuerted to the faith, and withall peruerted at the very ſame time, receyuing the doctrine of the Goſpel corrupted with ſuperſtitions euen at the very firſt, when they tooke it from the Greek Church, which it ſelfe then was degenerate, and corrupted with many ſuperſtitions and fowle errors, both in Doctrine & Diſcipline: as may appeare by the Storie of Nicephorus Gregoras, in his eight and ninth bookes.

The Polonian hiſtory.

But, as touching the time of their conuerſion to the Chriſtian faith, I ſuppoſe rather, that it is miſtaken by the Ruſſe: for that which I find in the Polonian ſtory, the ſecond Booke, the third chapter: where is ſayde, that about the yeare 990. Vlodomirus Duke of Ruſſia, married one Anne, ſiſter to Baſilius and Conſtantinus brothers, and Emperors of Conſtantinople. Whereupon the Ruſſe receyued the Fayth and profeſſion of Chriſt. Which, though it be ſomwhat more ancient then the time noted before out of the Ruſſe report; yet it falleth out al to one reckning, touching this point, viz: in what truth and ſincerity of doctrine the Ruſſe receyued the firſt ſtamp of religion: foraſmuch as the Greek church (at that time alſo) was many waies infected with error and ſuperſtition.

The tranſlation of the Patriarchall Sea from Conſtantinople or Sio to Mosko

In the yeare 1588. came vnto the Moſko the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, or Sio, called Hieronomo, being baniſhed (as ſom ſayd) by the Turke, as ſome other reported, by the Greeke Clergy depriued. The Emperour being giuen altogether to ſuperſtitious deuotions, gaue him great entertainment. Before his comming vnto Moſko, he had bin in Italy with the Pope, as was reported there by ſom of his company. His errand was, to conſult with the Emperor, concerning theſe points.

The firſt intention.

Firſt, about a league to paſſe between him and the King of Spaine, as the meeteſt Prince to ioyne with him in oppoſition againſt the Turke. To which purpoſe alſo Ambaſſages had paſſed betwixt the Ruſſe and the Perſian. Likewiſe from the Georgians to the Emperour of Ruſſia, to ioyne league together, for the inuading of the Turke on al ſides of his dominion: taking the aduantage of the ſimple quality of the Turk that then was. This treatie was helped forward by the Emperours Ambaſſador of Almaigne, ſent at the ſame time to ſolicite an inuaſion on the partes of Polonia, that lye towards Ruſland, and to borrow money of the Ruſſe Emperor, to purſue the warre for his brother Maximillian againſt the Swedens ſon, then King of Poland.

Ambaſſage betweene the Ruſſe & Perſian.

But this conſultation concerning a league betwixt the Ruſſe & the Spaniard (which was then in ſome forwardneſſe, and already one apointed for Ambaſſage into Spaine) was defeated, by meanes of the ouerthrow giuen to the Spaniſh king by her Maieſty, the Queen of Englād the laſt yeare before. Which made the Ruſſe Emperor and his Counſell, to giue the ſadder countenance to the Engliſh Ambaſſador there at that time: for that they were diſappointed of ſo good a policy, as was this coniunction, ſuppoſed to be betwixt them and the Spaniſh.

The ſecond intention.

His ſecond purpoſe (whereto the firſt ſerued as an introduction) was, in retirēge of the Turke and the Greeke Cleargye, that hadde thruſt him from his ſeate, to treate with him about the reducing of the Ruſſe church vnder the Pope of Rome. Wherein it may ſeeme, that comming lately from Rome, hee was ſet vppon by the the Pope, who hath attempted the ſame many times before, though all in vaine: and namely in the time of the late Emperor Iuan Vaſilowich, by one Anthony his Legate. But thought this (belike) a far better meane to obtaine his purpoſe, by treaty and mediation of their owne Patriarch. But this not ſucceeding, the Patriarch fell to a third point of treaty, concerning the reſignation of his Patriarchſhip, and tranſlation of the Sea from Conſtantinople, or Sio, to the Citty of Mosko. Which was ſo well liked, and entertained by the Emperor (as a matter of high religion and pollicy) that no other treaty (ſpecially of forraign Ambaſſages) could be heard or regarded, till that matter was concluded.

The third intention.

Reaſons yeelded by the Patriarch.

The reaſons wherewith the Patriarch perſwaded the tranſlating of his Sea to the Citty of Mosko, were theſe in effect.

First, for that the Sea of the Patriarch was vnder the Turke, that is enemy to the faith: And therefore to be remoued into ſome other Country of Chriſtian profeſſion.

The Ruſſe Church, daughter to the Greeke Church.

Secondly, becauſe the Ruſſe Church was the onely naturall Daughter of the Greek at this time, and holdeth the ſame Doctrine and Ceremonies with it: the reſt being all ſubiect to the Turke, and fallen away frō the right profeſſion. Wherein the ſubtill Greeke (to make the better market of his broken ware) aduanced the honour that would grow to the Emperour, and his Country: to haue the Patriarchs ſeate, tranſlated into the chiefe City, and ſeate of his Empire. As for the right of tranſlating the Sea, and appointing his ſucceſſour; hee made no doubt of it, but that it pertained wholly vnto himſelfe.

Cunning in the Patriarch.

The Patriarchſhip of Conſtantinople tranſlated to Mosko.

So the Emperour and his Counſell, with the principall of his Cleargy, being aſſembled at the Mosko, it was determined, that the Metropolite of Mosko, ſhold become Patriarch of the whole Greeke Church, and haue the ſame full authority and iuriſdiction, that pertained before to the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, or Sio. And that it might be done with more order and ſolemnity, the 25. of Ianuary, 1588. the Greeke Patriarch, accompanied with the Ruſſe Cleargy, went vnto the great Church of Prechoſte, or our Lady, within the Emperors Caſtle (hauing firſt wandred through the whole City in manner of a proceſſion, and bleſſing the people with his two fingers) where he made an Oration, and deliuered his reſignation in an inſtrument of writing, and ſo layde downe his Patriarchiall ſtaffe. Which was preſently receiued by the Metropolite of Mosko, & diuers other ceremonies vſed about the inauguration of this new Patriarch.

A ſolēmne Holliday in Mosko.

The day was holden very ſolemne by the people of the City, who were commanded to forbeare their works, and to attend this ſolemnity. The great Patriarch that day was honored with rich preſents ſent him from the Emperor & Empreſſe, of Plate, Cloth of Gold, Furs, &c. carried with great pompe through the ſtreetes of Mosko, and (at his departing) receiued many gifts more, both from the Emperor, Nobility, and Cleargy. Thus the Patriarchſhip of Conſtantinople, or Sio, (which hath continued ſince the Counſell of Nice) is now tranſlated vnto Mosko, or they made beleeue, that they haue a Patriarch, with the ſame right and authority that the other had. Wherin the ſubtle Greeke hath made good aduantage of their ſuperſtition, & is now gone away with a rich booty into Poland, whither their Patriarchſhip be currant or not.

An eaſie matter to be perſwaded.

The matter is not vnlike to make ſome Schiſme betwixt the Greeke and Ruſſe Church, if the Ruſſe hold this Patriarchſhip that he hath ſo well payed for, & the Greekes elect another withall, as likely they wil, whither this man were baniſhed by the Turke, or depriued by order of his owne Cleargy. Which might happen to giue aduantage to the Pope, & to bring ouer the Ruſſe Church to the Sea of Rome (to which ende peraduenture hee deuiſed this ſtratagem, and caſt in this matter of Schiſme among them) but that the Emperors of Ruſsia knew well enough, (by the example of other Chriſtian Princes) what inconuenience would grow to their State and Country, by ſubiecting themſelues to the Romiſh Sea. To which ende, the late Emperor Iuan Vaſilowich was very inquiſitiue, of the Popes authority ouer the Princes of Chriſtendome, and ſent one of very purpoſe to Rome, to behold the order and behauiour of his Court.

With this Patriarch Hieronimo was driuen out (at the ſame time by the great Demetrio Archbiſhop of Lariſſa excluded with the Patriarch.

Turke) one Demetrio, Archbiſhop of Lariſſa: who went into England, and pretended the ſame cauſe of their baniſhment by the Turke (to wit) their not admitting of the Popes new Kalender, for the alteration of the yeare. Which, how vnlikely it is, may appeare by theſe circumſtances.

Reaſons of good & great likelyhood.

Firſt, becauſe there is no ſuch affection, nor friendly reſpect, betwixt the Pope and the Turke; as that he ſhould baniſh a ſubiect, for not obeying the Popes ordinance, ſpecially in a matter of ſome ſequell, for the alteration of times within his owne Countries.

Secondly, for that he maketh no ſuch ſcruple in deducting of times, and keeping of a iuſt and preciſe account from the incarnation of Chriſt: whom hee doth not acknowledge, otherwiſe then as I noted before.

Thirdly, for that the ſaide Patriarch is now at Naples in Italy, whither (it may be gueſſed) he would not haue gone within the Popes reach, and ſo neare to his noſe, if he had beene baniſhed, for oppoſing himſelfe againſt the Popes Decree.

The Patriarks Iuriſdiction.

This Office of Patriarchſhip now trãſlated to Mosko, beareth a ſuperior authority ouer all the Churches, not onely of Ruſsia, and other the Emperors dominions; but throughout all the Churches of Chriſtendome, that were before vnder the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, or Sio: or at leaſt, the Ruſſe Patriarch imagineth himſelfe to haue the ſame authority. He hath vnder him (as his proper Dioceſſe) the Prouince of Mosko, beſides other peculiars. His Court or Office is kept at the Mosko.

The Metropolites.

Before the creation of this new Patriarch, they had but one Metropolite, that was called the Metropolite of Mosko. Now for more ſtate to their Church, and new Patriarch; they haue two Metropolites, the one of Nouogrod velica, the other of Roſtoue. Their Office is, to receiue of the Patriarch, ſuch Eccleſiaſticall Orders, as he thinks good, & to deliuer the charge of thẽ ouer to the Archbiſhops: beſides the ordering of their owne Dioceſſe.

Archbiſhops.

Their Archbiſhops are foure: of Smolensko, Cazan, Vobsko, and Vologda. The parts of their Office is all one with the Metropolits: ſaue that they haue an vnder iuriſdiction, as Suffraganes to the Metropolites, and ſuperiors to the Biſhoppes. The next are the Vladikeis, or Biſhops, that are but fixe in all: of Crutitska, of Rezan, of Otfer, and Torſhock, of Collomenska, of Volodemer, of Suſdalla. Theſe haue euery one a very large Dioceſſe: as diuiding the reſt of the whole Country among them.

Biſhops.

Eccleſiaſticall Iuriſdiction.

The matters pertaining to the Eccleſiaſticall iuriſdiction, of the Metropolites, Archbiſhops, and Biſhops, are the ſame (in a manner) that are vſed by the Cleargie in other parts of Chriſtendome. For, beſides their authority ouer the Cleargy, and ordering ſuch matters as are meere Eccleſiaſticall; their iuriſdiction extendeth to all teſtamentary cauſes, matters of marriage, and diuorcements, ſome pleas of iniuries, &c.

Their Gentlemen, Commiſſaries.

To which purpoſe alſo they haue their Officials, or Commiſſaries (which they call Boiaren Vladitskey) that are Lay-men of the degree of Dukes, or Gentlemen, that keepe their Courts, and execute their iuriſdiction. Which, beſides their other oppreſſions ouer the common people, raigne ouer the Prieſts: as the Dukes and Diacks do ouer the poore people, within their Precincts.

Oppreſſion alſo ouer the Prieſts.

As for the Archbiſhoppe or Biſhop himſelfe, he beareth no ſway in deciding thoſe cauſes, that are brought into his Court. But if hee would moderate any matter, he muſt do it by entreaty with his Gentleman Officiall. The reaſon is, becauſe theſe Boiarskey, or Gentlemen officials, are not appointed by the Biſhops, but by the Emperour himſelfe, or his Counſell, and are to giue account of their doings to none but to them. If the Biſhop can entreat (at his admiſſion) to haue the choiſe of his owne Officiall, it is accounted for a ſpeciall great fauour. But to ſpeake it as it is, the Cleargy of Ruſsia, as well concerning their lands and reuennues, as their authority and iuriſdiction; are altogether ordered and ouer-ruled by the Emperor, and his Counſell, and haue ſo much, and no more of both as their pleaſure doth permit them.

The Emperor appointeth the Gentlemen Officials and not the Arch-Biſhop.

Aſsiſtance of ſeuerall counſels.

They haue alſo their aſſiſtants or ſeuerall Counſels (as they call them) of certaine Prieſts that are of their Dioces, reſiding within their Cathedrall cities, to the number of foure & twenty a piece. Theſe aduiſe with them, about the ſpeciall and neceſſary neceſſary matters belonging vnto theyr charge.

The Church reuennewes.

Concerning their rents and reuennews to maintaine their dignities, it is ſomwhat large. The Patriarches yearely rents out of his lands (beſides other fees) is about three thouſand Rubbels or Markes. The Metropolites and Archbyſhops, about two thouſand and fiue hundred. The Byſhops ſome a thouſand, ſome eight hundred, ſome fiue hundred, &c. They haue had ſome of them (as I haue heard ſay) ten or twelue thouſand rubbles a year; as had the Metropolite of Nouograde.

The habite of their Clergie men.

Their habite or apparrell (when they ſhew themſelues in their Pontificalibus, after their ſolemneſt manner) is a Miter on their heads, after the Popiſh faſhion, with Pearle and precious ſtone, a Cope on their backes, commonly of Cloth of Gold, embroidered with Pearle, and a Croſiers ſtaffe in their hands, layed ouer all with plate of ſiluer double gilt, with a Croſſe or Shepheards crook at the vpper end of it.

Their ordinary habit.

Their ordinary habit otherwiſe, when they ride or go abroad, is a hood on their heads of blacke colour, that hangeth downe their backs, and ſtandeth out like a Bongrace before. Their vpper garment (which they call Reis) is a gowne or Mantle of blacke Damaske, with many liſts or gardes of white Sattin laid vpon it, euery gard about two fingers broad, and theyr Croſiers ſtaffe carried before them. Thēſelues followe after, bleſſing the people with their two forefingers, with a maruelous grace.

Their vpper Garment.

The election of byſhops

The election, and appointing of the Byſhops and the reſt, pertaineth wholly to the Emperor himſelfe. They are choſen euer out of the Monaſteries: ſo that there is no Byſhop, Archbyſhoppe, nor Metropolite, but hath bene a Monke; or Fryer before. And (by that reaſon) they are, and muſt all bee vnmarried men, for their vow of Chaſtity, when they wer firſt ſhorne. When the Emperour hath appointed whom he thinketh good, hee is inueſted in the Cathedrall Church of his Dioceſſe, with many ceremonies, much after the manner of the Popiſh inauguration. They haue alſo their Deanes, and their Arch-deacons.

The learning and exerciſe of the Ruſſe Cleargy.

As for preaching the word of God, or any teaching, or exhorting ſuch as are vnder them; they neither vſe it, nor haue any skill of it: the whole Cleargie beeing vtterly vnlearned, both for other knowledge, and in the worde of God. Onely their manner is twice euery yeare, viz: the firſt of September (which is the firſt day of their yeare) and on S. Iohn Baptiſts day to make an ordinary ſpeech to the people, euery Metropolite, Archbyſhop and Byſhop in his Cathedrall Church, to this or the like effect.

The firſt day of the yeare.

That if any be in malice toward his neighbour, he ſhall leaue off his malice: If any haue thought of treaſon or rebellion againſt his Prince, he beware of ſuch practiſe: If he haue not kept his faſts and vowes, nor doone his other duties to the holy church, he ſhal amend that fault, &c.

And this is a matter of forme with thē vttered in as many words, and no more (in a manner) then I haue here ſet down. Yet the matter is done with that grace & ſolemnity, in a pulpit of purpoſe ſet vppe for this one Act; as if he wer to diſcourſe at large of the whole ſubſtance of diuinity. At the Mosko, the Emperour himſelfe is euer preſent at this ſolemne exhortation.

The Prieſtes fearfull to haue their ignorance diſcoueted.

As themſelues are voyde of all manner of learning, ſo they are warie to keepe out all means that might bring any in: as fearing to haue their ignorance and vngodlineſſe diſcouered. To that purpoſe they haue perſwaded the Emperours, that it would breed innouation, and ſo daunger to their State, to haue any nouelty of lerning come within the Realme. Wherein they ſay but truth, for that a man of ſpirit and vnderſtanding, holpen by Learning and liberall education, can hardly endure a tyrannicall gouernment.

Learning can hardly liue vnder tyrānny.

A Printing houſe erected in Mosko.

Some yeares paſt, in the other Emperors time) there came a Preſſe & Letters out of Polonia, to the City of Mosko, wher a Printing-houſe was ſet vp, with great liking and allowance of the Emperour himſelf. But not long after, the houſe was ſet on fire in the night time, & the Preſſe and Letters quite burnt vp, and (as it was thoght) by the procurement of the Clergy men.

Prieſtes not made for merit or worthineſſe, and the manner how.

Their Prieſts, whome they call Papaes) are made by the Byſhoppes, without any great triall for worthineſſe of gifts, before they admit them, or ceremonies in theyr admiſſion: ſaue that their heads are ſhorn (not

(not ſhauen, for that they like not) about an hand bredth or more in the Crowne, and that place annointed with Oyle by the Byſhop: who in his admiſſion putteth vpon the Prieſt, firſt his Surpleſſe; and then ſetteth a white croſſe on his breſt of ſilke, or ſome other matter, which hee is to weare eight dayes, and no more: and ſo giueth him authority to ſay and ſing in the Church, and to adminiſter the Sacraments.

Their vſuall charge and function.

They are men vtterly vnlearned, which is no maruell; foraſmuch as their makers, the Byſhoppes themſelues (as before was ſayde) are cleere of that quality, & make no farther vſe at all of any kinde of Learning, no not of the Scriptures themſelus, ſaue to reade and to ſing them. Their ordinary charge end function, is to ſay the Liturgie, to adminiſter the Sacraments after their manner, to keep & decke their Idols, and to doe the other Ceremonies vſuall in their Churches. Their number is great, becauſe theyr Townes are parted into many ſmall Pariſhes, without any diſcretion, for deuiding them into competent numbers of houſholds, and people for a iuſt Congregation: as the manner in all places where the meanes is neglected, for increaſing of knowledge, and inſtruction towardes God. Which cannot well be had, where by meanes of an vnequall partition of the people, and pariſhes, there followeth a want and vnequality of ſtipend, for a ſufficient Miniſtery.

Partition of their townes into pariſhes.

The Ruſſe prieſts can marry but once.

For their Prieſts, it is lawfull to marry for the firſt time. But if the firſt Wife dye, a ſecond he cannot take, but he muſt loſe his Prieſthood, and his liuing withal. The reaſon, they make out of that place of Saint Paul to Timothy, 1.3.2. not well vnderſtood, thinking that to bee ſpoken of diuers wiues ſucceſſiuely, that the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of at one and the ſame time. If he will needes marry againe after his firſt Wife is dead, hee is no longer called Papa, but Roſpapa, or Prieſt Quondam. This maketh the Prieſts to make much of their Wiues, who are accounted as the Matrones, and of beſt reputation, among the Women of the Pariſh.

The Quondam Prieſts.

Stipends allotted to the Prieſts.

For the ſtipend of the Prieſt, their manner is not to pay him any tenths of corne, or ought elſe: but hee muſt ſtand at the deuotion of the people of his owne Pariſh, and make vp the Incomes towards his maintenance, ſo well as he can, by offerings, ſhrifts, marriages, burials, dirges, and prayers for the dead and the liuing (which they call Molitua.) For, beſides their publike ſeruice within their Churches, their manner is, for euery priuate man to haue a prayer ſaide for him by the Prieſt, vppon any occaſion of buſineſſe whatſoeuer, whether he ride, goe, ſayle, plough, or whatſoeuer elſe hee doeth. Which is not framed according to the occaſion of his buſineſſe, but at random, being ſome of their ordinary and vſuall Church prayers. And this is thought to be more holy and effectuall, if it be repeated by the Prieſts mouth, rather then by his owne.

Prayers for euerie priuate man.

They haue a cuſtome beſides to ſolemnize the Saints day, that is Patron to their Church once euery yeare. What time all their neighbours of their Country, & pariſhes about, come in to haue prayers ſaide to that Saint, for themſelues, and their friends: and ſo make an Offering to the Prieſt for his paines.

Solemnizing the Saints day of the Churches.

This Offering may yeeld them ſome ten pounds a yeare, more or leſſe, as the Patron or Saint of that Church is of credite and eſtimation among them. The manner is on this day (which they keepe anniuerſary for the Prieſt) to hyre diuers of his neighbour-Prieſtes to helpe him: as hauing more Diſhes to dreſſe for the Saint, then hee can well turne his hand vnto.

The manner of keeping the Prieſtes Anniuerſarie.

They vſe beſides to viſite their pariſhioners houſes, with holy Water, and Perfume, commonly once a quarter: and ſo hauing ſprinkled and beſenſed the goodman and his Wife, with the reſt of their houſhold and houſhold-ſtuffe, they receyue ſome deuotion (more or leſſe) as the man is of ability. This and the reſt laid together, may make vp for the Prieſt towards his maintenance, about thirtie or fourty Rubbels a yeere: whereof he payeth the tenth part to the Byſhoppe of the Dioceſſe.

The Prieſtes maintenance.

The Papa or Prieſt is knowne by his long tufts of hayre, hanging down by his eares, his gowne with a broad Cape, and a walking ſtaffe in his hand. For the reſt of his habite, he is apparrelled like to the common ſort. When he ſaith the Liturgie gie or ſeruice, within the Church, he hath on him his Surpleſſe, and ſometimes his Cope, if the day be more ſolemne. They haue beſides their Papaes or prieſts, theyr Churnapapaes (as they call them) that is, Blacke Prieſts; that may keepe their benefices, though they bee admitted Friars withall within ſome Monaſterie. They ſeeme to be the very ſame, that were called Regular Prieſts in the Popiſh church. Vnder the Prieſt, is a Deacon in euerie Church, that doth nothing but the office of a Pariſh Clearke. As for their Protopapaes, or Arch-prieſts, and their Archdeacons (that are next in election to bee their Protopapaes) they ſerue onely in the Cathedrall Churches.

Black Prieſts for keeping of Benefices.

A Deacon or pariſh Clark, Protopapaes.

Of Fryars they haue an infinite rabble, farre greater then in any other Country, where Popery is profeſſed. Euery Citie, and good part of the Country, ſwarmeth full of them. For they haue wrought (as the Popiſh Fryars did by their ſuperſtition and hypocriſie) that if any part of the Realme be better and ſweeter then other; there ſtandeth a Friery or a Monaſterie, dedicated to ſome Saint.

Friers an infinite company in the Country, and as many ſuperſtitions.

The number of them is ſo much the greater, not onely for that it is augmented by the ſuperſtition of the country; but becauſe the Fryars life is the ſafeſt from the oppreſſions and exactions which fall vpon the Commons. Which cauſeth many to put on the Friers weede, as the beſt Armour to beare off ſuch blowes. Beſides ſuch as are voluntary, there are diuers that are forced to ſheare thēſelues Fryers, vppon ſome diſpleaſure. Theſe are for the moſt part of the cheefe Nobility.

Fryars liue ſafeſt from oppreſsion & taxation impoſed on the Commons.

Diuers take the Monaſteries as a place of Sanctuary, and there become Fryers, to auoid ſome puniſhment, that they had deſerued by the lawes of the realme. For if he get a Monaſtery ouer his heade, and there put on a Coule before hee be attached, it is a protection to him for euer againſt any Law, for what crime ſoeuer: except it be for treaſon. But this Prouiſo goeth withall, that no man commeth there (except ſuch as are commanded by the Emperour to be receyued) but he giueth them Lands, or bringeth his ſtocke with him, and putteth it into the cōmon Treaſury. Some bring a thouſand Rubbels, and ſome more. None is admitted vnder three or foure hundred.

The Monaſterie is as a ſanctuary for offences committed.

The manner of their admiſſion is after this ſort. Firſt, the Abbot ſtrippeth him of all his ſecular or ordinary Apparrell. Then he putteth vpon him next vnto his skinne, a white Flannell ſhirt, with a long garment ouer it downe vnto the ground, girded to him with a broad leather belt. His vppermoſt Garment is a Weede of Garras or Say, for colour and faſhion, much like to the vpper weed of a Chimney-ſweeper. Then is crowne ſhorne a hand bredth, or more, cloſe to the verie skin, and theſe or the like words are pronounced by the Abbot, while he clippeth his haire.

Their maner of ſhearing Fryars.

As theſe haires are clipped off, and taken from thy head: ſo now wee take thee, and ſeparate thee cleane from the world and worldly things, &c.

The Abbots wordes at a Friars admiſſion.

This done, he annointeth his crowne with oyle, and putteth on his Coule: and ſo taketh him in among the Fraternitie. They vow perpetuall chaſtity, and abſtinence from fleſh.

Beſides their Landes (that are verie great) they are the greateſt Marchants in the whole Countrey, and deale for all manner of commodities. Some of their Monaſteries diſpend in Lands one thouſand, or two thouſand Rubbels a yeare. There is one Abbey called Troits, that hath in lands and fees, the ſumme of an hundred thouſand Rubbels, or markes a yeare.

Fryers the greateſt Marchants in the Countrey.

It is built in manner of a Caſtle, walled round about with great Ordenance planted on the Wall, and containeth within it a large bredth of ground, and great variety of building. There are of Fryers within it (beſides their Officers and other ſeruants) about ſeuen hundred. The Empreſſe that then was, had many Vowes to Saint Sergius, that is patrone there: to intreat him to make her fruitfull, as hauing no children by the Emperour her Huſband. Lightly (euery yeare) ſhe went on Pilgrimage to him from the Mosko, on foote, about foureſcore ordinary miles, with fiue or ſixe thouſand women attending vpon her, all in blew Liueries, and foure thouſand ſouldiers for her Guarde. But S. Sergius hath not yet heard her prayers, though (they ſay) hee hath a ſpeciall gift and faculty that way.

What Learning there is among theyr Fri-

The Fryars learning anſwerable to their Byſhops

Fryars, may be known by their Byſhops, that are the choiſe men out of all theyr Monaſteries. I talked with one of them at the City of Vologda, where (to trie his skill) I offered him a Ruſſe Teſtament, and turned him to the firſt chap. of S. Mathews Goſpell. Where he began to read in very good order.

Queſtions & anſweres betweene the Authour & a Ruſſe prieſt.

I asked him firſt, What part of Scripture it was that he had read? Hee anſwered, that he could not well tell. How many Euangeliſts there were in the Newe Teſtament? He ſaide he knew not. How many Apoſtles there were? Hee thought there were twelue. How he ſhould be ſaued? Whereunto he anſwered me (with a peece of Ruſſe Doctrine) that hee knew not whether hee ſhould be ſaued, or no: But if God wold Poſhallouate him, or gratifie him ſo much, as to ſaue him, ſo it was; he would be glad of it: if not, what remedy? I asked him, Why he ſhore him ſelfe a Fryer? Hee anſwered, becauſe hee would eate his breade in quietneſſe and peace.

This is the learning of the Fryars of Ruſſia, which though it be not to be meaſured by one, yet partly it may be geſſed (by the ignorance of this man) what is in the reſt.

Nunneries of Noblemens Widdowes & daughters, and none alſo to be admitted there.

They haue alſo very many Nunneries, whereof ſome may admit none but Noblemens Widdowes and Daughters, when the Emperour meaneth to keepe them vnmarried, from continuing the blood or ſtocke, which hee would haue extinguiſhed. To ſpeak of the life of their Fryers and Nunnes, it needs not, to thoſe that know the hypocriſie and vncleaneneſſe of that Cloyſter-broode. The Ruſſe himſelfe (though otherwiſe addicted to all ſuperſtition) ſpeaketh ſo fowly of it, that it muſt needs gain ſilence of any modeſt man.

Eremites called holy men, like to Gymnoſophiſtes.

Beſides theſe, they haue certaine Eremites (whome they call Holy men) that are like to thoſe Gymnoſophiſts for their life and behauiour: though farre vnlike for their knowledge and Learning. They vſe to goe ſtarke naked, ſaue a clowte about their middle, with their hayre hanging long and wildely about their ſhoulders, and many of them with an iron coller, or chaine about their neckes or middle, euen in the very extremity of Winter.

Prophets and men of great ſanctity.

Theſe they take as Prophets, and men of great holineſſe, giuing them a libertie to ſpeake what they liſt, without any controlment, though it be of the very higheſt himſelfe. So that if he reproue any openly, in what ſort ſoeuer; they anſwere nothing, but that it is Pogræcum, that is, for their ſinnes. And if any of them take ſome peece of ſale ware from any mans ſhop, as he paſſeth by, to giue where he liſte; hee thinketh himſelfe much beloued of God, and much beholding to the holy man, for taking it in that ſort.

An Eremite now liuing in Ruſsia.

Of this kinde there are not many, becauſe it is a very hard and cold profeſſion, to goe naked in Ruſsia, eſpecially in winter. Among other at this time, they haue one at Mosko, that walketh naked about the Streetes, and inueyeth commonly, againſt the State and Gouernment, eſpecially againſt the Godonoes, that are thoght at this time, to bee great Oppreſſours of that Common-wealth.

Baſileo the Ermite

Another there was, that died not many yeares agoe (whom they called Baſileo) that would take vpon him to reproue the olde Emperor for all his cruelty, and oppreſſions done towards his people. His body they haue tranſlated (of late) into a ſumptuous Church, neere the Emperors houſe in Mosko, & haue Canonized him for a Saint. Many miracles he doth there (for ſo the Fryers make the people to beleeue) and many Offerings are made vnto him, not onely by the people, but by the cheefe Nobility, and the Emperor & Empreſſe themſelues, which viſite that Church with great deuotion.

Offerings to a dead ſuppoſed Saint.

A mery miracle monger.

But at my beeing at Mosko, this Saint had ill lucke in working his miracles. For a lame man, that had his limbes reſtored (as it was pretended by him) was charged by a woman that was familiar with him (being then falne out) that he halted but in the day time, and could leape merrily when he came home at night. And that he had intended this matter ſix yeares before.

Now he is put into a Monaſterie, and there raileth vpon the Fryers, that hyred him to haue this counterfeyte myracle practiſed vppon him. Beſides this diſgrace, a little before my comming from thence, there were eight ſlaine within his Church, by fire in a Thunder. Which cauſed his bels (that wer tingling before all all day and night long, as in triumphe of the myracles wrought by Baſileo their S.) to ring ſomwhat ſoftly; and hath wroght no little diſcredit vnto this Miracle worker.

There was another of great account at Plesko (called Nichola of Plesko) that did much good, when this Emperors Father came to ſacke the Towne, vpon ſuſpition of their reuolting and rebellion againſt him. The Emperor, after he had ſaluted the Eremite, at his lodging, ſent him a reward. And the Holy man, to requite the Emperour, ſent him a peece of raw fleſh, being then their Lent. Which the Emperour ſeeing, bid one to tel him, that hee maruelled, that the Holye man would offer him fleſh to eat in the Lent, when it was forbidden by order of holie Church. And doth Enasko (which is as much to ſay as Iacke) thinke (quoth Nicola) that it is vnlawfull to eat a peece of beaſts fleſh in Lent, & not to eate vp ſo much mans fleſh, as he hath done already?

Nichola the Eremite of great eſtimation.

Preſents betweene the Emperor and an Eremite.

So, threatning the Emperor, with a propheſie of ſome harde aduenture to come vpon him, except hee left murthering of his people, and departing from the Towne, he ſaued a great many mens liues at that time.

This maketh the people to like very well of them, becauſe they are as Paſquils to note their great mens faultes, that no man elſe dare ſpeake of. Yet it falleth out ſomtime, that for this rude liberty which they take vpon them (after a counterfeite manner) by imitation of Prophets, they are made away in ſecret: as was one or two of them, in the laſt Emperours time, for being ouer-bolde in ſpeaking againſt his gouernment.

Lawful reproue or finde faults.

Their morning ſeruice they call Zautrana, that is, Mattins. It is done in this order.

Of their Liturgy or form of Church ſeruice, and their manner of adminiſtering the Sacraments.

The Prieſt entereth into the Church, with his Deacon following him. And, when hee is come vnto the middle of the Church, he beginneth to ſay with a lowd voyce: Blaſſlauey Vladika, that is, Bleſſe vs heauenly Paſtor, meaning of Chriſt. Then he addeth, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghoſt, one very God in Trinity: and Aſpody Pomeluy, Or, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, Lord haue mercie vpon vs, Lord haue mercy vppon vs, repeated three times.

This done, he marcheth on toward the Chancell or Sanctum Sanctorum (as they vſe to cal it) and ſo entreth into the Scharſuey Dwere; or the heauenly doore: which no man may enter into, but the Prieſt onely. Where ſtanding at the Altare or Table (ſet neere to the vpper wall of the Chancell) hee ſayeth the Lordes prayer, and then againe Aſpody Pomeluy, or Lorde haue mercy vpon vs, Lord haue mercy vpon vs, &c. pronounced twelue times. Then prayſed be the Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghoſt, for euer and euer. Whereto the Deacons and people ſay, Amen. Next after, the Prieſt addeth the Pſalmes for that day, and beginneth with, O come let vs worſhip and fall down before the Lord &c. and therewithall himſelfe, with the Deacons, and people, all turn themſelues towards their Idols or Images that hang on the Wall, and (croſſing themſelues) bow downe three times, knocking theyr heads to the very ground. After this, hee readeth the ten Commaundements, and Athanaſius Creede, out of the Seruice booke.

The heauenly dore, for none to enter but the prieſt.

Worſhip to their Idols and Images.

This being done, the Deacon that ſtãdeth without the heauenly dore or Chancell, readeth a peece of a Legend, out of a Written Booke (for they haue it not in Print) of ſome Saints life, Miracles, &c. This is diuided into many parts, for euery day in the yeare, and is read by them with a plaine ſinging Note, not vnlike to the Popiſh Tune, when they ſung their Goſpels.

Aſter all this (which reacheth vnto an houre, and an halfe, or two howers of length) he addeth certaine ſet Collectes, or prayers vpon that which he hath read out of the Legend before: and ſo endeth his Seruice. All this while ſtande burning before their Idols, a great many of Wax Candles (whereof ſome are of the biggeneſſe of a mans waſte) vowed, or enioyned by penance, vpon the people of the Pariſh.

About nine of the clocke in the Morning, they haue another Seruice, called Obeiana (or Compline) much after the order of the Popiſh Seruice, that bare that name. If it be ſome high or Feſtiuall day, they furniſh their Seruice beſides, With Bleſſed be the Lord God of Iſrael, &c. and, We praiſe thee, O God. &c. ſung with a more ſolemne and curious note.

Nine a clocke ſeruice in the morning.

Their

Their euening Seruice.

Their Euening Seruice, called Vecherna, where the Prieſt beginneth with Blaſſauey Vladika, as hee did in the morning, and with the Pſalmes appoynted for the Vecherna. Which being read, he ſingeth, My ſoule doth magnifie the Lord, &c. And then the Prieſt, Deacons, and People, all with one voyce ſing, Aſpody pomelui, or Lord haue mercy vpon vs, thirty times together. Whereunto the boyes that are in the Church, anſwer all with one voice, rowling it vp ſo faſt, as their lips can goe; Verÿ, Verÿ, Verÿ, Verÿ, or Praiſe, Praiſe, Praiſe, &c. thirty times together, with a very ſtrange noyſe. Then is read by the Prieſt, and vpon the Holy-dayes ſung the firſt Pſalme, Bleſſed is the man, &c. And in the end of it, is added, Alleluia, repeated ten times.

The next in order, is ſome part of the Goſpel read by the Prieſt, which he ends with Alleluia, repeated three times. And ſo hauing ſaid a Collect, in remembrance of the Saint of that day, he ends his euening Seruice.

All this while, the Prieſt ſtands aboue at the Altare or high Table, within the Chancel, or Sanctum Sanctorum, whence hee neuer mooueth all the Seruice time. The Deacon or Deacons (which are many in their Cathedrall Churches) ſtand without the Chauncell by the Scharſuey Dwere, or heauenly dore: for within they may not be ſeene all the Seruice time, though otherwiſe their office is to ſweep, and keepe it, and to ſet vp the waxe candles before their Idoles. The people do ſtand together (the whole Seruice time) in the Church, and ſome in the Church porch: for Piew or Seate they haue none within their Churches.

The Deacons office or ſeruice.

The manner of the Ruſſe Baptiſme.

The Sacrament of Baptiſme they adminiſter after this manner: The childe is brought to the Church (and this is done within eight dayes after it is borne:) If it be the childe of ſome Noble man, it is brought in a rich Sled or Waggon, with chaires and cuſhions of cloath of Golde, and ſuch like ſumptuous ſhew of their beſt furniture. When they are come to the Church, the Prieſt ſtandeth readie to receiue the childe within the Church-porch, with his tub of water by him. And then beginneth to declare vnto them, that they haue brought a little Infidell to be made a Chriſtian, &c. This ended, he teacheth the witneſſes, that are two or three, in a certayne ſet forme out of his Booke (what their duty is,) in bringing vp the childe after he is baptized, viz. That hee muſt bee taught to know God, and Chriſt our Sauiour. And becauſe God is of great Maieſtie, and we muſt not preſume to come vnto him, without Mediatours (as the manner is when we make any ſuite to an Emperour, or great Prince) therfore they muſt teach him what Saints are the beſt, and chiefe mediatours, &c. This done, he commaundeth the diuell in the name of God (after a coniuring manner) to come out of the water: and ſo after certaine praiers, he plungeth the child ouer head and eares. For this they holde to be a poynt very neceſſary, that no part of the child be left vndipped into the water.

Inſtructions giuen by the prieſt to the witneſſes.

The words that beare with them the forme of Baptiſme, vttered by the Prieſt, when he dippeth in the childe, are the very ſame that are preſcribed in the Goſpel, and vſed by vs, that is, In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Ghoſt, For that they ſhould alter the forme of the words, and ſay, by the holy Ghoſt, as I haue heard they did, following certaine heretikes of the Greeke Church, I found to be vntrue, aſwell by the report of them that haue beene often at their Baptiſmes, as by their Booke of Leiturgie it ſelfe, wherein the order of Baptiſme is preciſely ſet downe.

The Prieſts words at the dipping the childe in the water.

When the childe is baptized, the Prieſt layeth Oyle and Salt tempered together vpon the fore-head, and both the ſides of his face, and then vpon his mouth, drawing it along with his finger ouer the childs lippes (as did the Popiſh Prieſts) ſaying withall, certaine prayers, to this effect: That God will make him a good Chriſtian, &c. All this is doone in the Church porch.

Other ceremonies after Baptiſme.

Then is the childe (as being now made a Chriſtian, & meet to be receiued within the Church doore) carried into the Church, the Prieſt going before, and is there preſented to the chiefe Idoll of the Church, being layd on a cuſhion before the feet of the Image, by it (as by the mediatour) to be commended vnto God. If the childe be ſicke, or weake (ſpecially in the Winter) they vſe to make the water luke warme. After Baptiſme, the maner is is to cut off the haire from the childs head and hauing wrapped it within a peece of wax, to lay it vp, as a relike or monument in a ſecret place of the Church.

This is the manner of their Baptiſme, which they account to be the beſt & perfecteſt forme. As they do all other parts of their religion, receiued (as they ſay) by tradition from the beſt church, meaning the Greeke. And therefore they will take great paines to make a Proſelite or Conuert, either of an Infidell, or of a forraign Chriſtian, by rebaptizing him after the Ruſſe manner.

Proſelites or Conuerts frō infidelity.

When they take any Tartar priſoner, commonly they will offer him life, with condition to be baptized. And yet they perſwade very fewe of them to redeeme their life ſo: becauſe of the natural hatred the Tartar beareth to the Ruſſe, and the opinion he hath of his falſhoode and iniuſtice. The yeare after Mosko was fired by the Chrim Tartar, there was taken a Diuoymorſey, one of the chief in that exploit, with 300. Tartars more: who had al their liues offered them, if they would be baptized after the Ruſſe maner. Which they all refuſed to do, with many reproches againſt thoſe that perſwaded them. And ſo being carried to the riuer Mosko, (that runneth thorough the Citty) they were all baptized after a violent manner: being thruſt downe with a knocke on the head into the water, through an hole made in the Ice for that purpoſe.

300. Tartars that wold not be baptized.

Of Lieflanders that are Captiues, there are many that take on them this ſecond Ruſſe baptiſme, to get more libertie, and ſome-what beſides towards their liuing, which the Emperour ordinarily vſeth to giue them. Of Engliſhmen (ſince they frequented the country) there was neuer any found, that ſo much forgot God, his faith, and countrey, as that he would bee content to be baptized Ruſſe, for any reſpect of feare, preferment, or other means whatſoeuer: ſaue onely Richard Relph, that following before an vngodly Trade, by keeping a Caback (againſt the order of the countrey) and being putte off from that Trade, and ſpoiled by the Emperors Officers of that which he hadde, entered himſelfe into the Ruſſe profeſſion, and ſo was rebaptized, liuing now as much an Idolater, as before he was a rioter and vnthrifty perſon.

Rebaptizing of Lieflāders.

An Engliſhman rebaptized after the Ruſſe manner

Such as thus receiue the Ruſſe baptiſme, are firſt caried into ſome Monaſtery, to be inſtructed there in the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church. Where they vſe theſe ceremonies.

Of ſuch as receiue the Ruſſian baptiſme, what ceremonies are vſed to them.

Firſt, they put him into a new & freſh ſuite of apparrell, made of the Ruſſe faſhion, and ſet a Coronet, or (in Sommer) a garland vpon his head.

Then they annoint his head with oile, & put a wax candle light into his hand: & ſo pray ouer him foure times a day, the ſpace of vii. daies. All this while hee is to abſtaine from fleſh and white meats.

The ſeuen dayes being ended, he is purified and waſhed in a Bath-ſtoue, and ſo the eight day he is broght to the church, where he is taught (by the Friers) how to behaue himſelf in preſence of their idols; by ducking down, knocking of the head, croſſing himſelfe, and ſuch like geſtures, which are the greateſt part of the Ruſſe religion.

The Sacrament of the Lords Supper, they receiue but once a year, in their gret Lent time, a little before Eaſter. Three at the moſt are admitted at one time, and neuer aboue. The manner of their communicating is thus. Firſt, they do confeſſe themſelues of all their ſins, to the Prieſt (whome they call their ghoſtly Father.) Then they come to the Church, and are called vp to the Communion table, that ſtandeth like an Altar, a little remooued from the vpper end of the Church, after the Dutch manner.

The adminiſtring of the Lords Supper

Heere firſt they are asked of the Prieſt, whither they be clean, or no? that is, whither they haue neuer a ſinne behinde that they left vnconfeſſed. If they anſwer, No, they are taken to the table. Where the Prieſt begimeth with certain vſuall prayers, the Communicants ſtanding in the meane while with their armes folded one within another, like penitentiaries, or mourners. When theſe praiers are ended, the Prieſt taketh a ſpoone, and filleth it full of Claret Wine. Then he putteth into it a ſmall peece of bread, and tempereth them both together, and ſo deliuereth them in the Spoone to the Communicants, that ſtand in order, ſpeaking the vſuall words of the Sacrament, Eate this, &c. Drink this, &c. both at one time without any pauſe.

After that, hee deliuereth them againe bread by it ſelfe, and then wine carded together with a little warme water, to repreſent blood more rightly (as they thinke) and the water withall, that flowed out of the ſide of Chriſt. Whiles this is in doing, the Communicants vnfolde their armes. And then folding them againe, follow the Prieſt thrice round about the Communion Table, and ſo returne to their places againe. Where hauing ſaide certaine other prayers, hee diſmiſſeth the Communicants, with charge to be merry, and to cheere vp themſelues for the ſeuen dayes next following. Which being ended, he enioyneth them to faſt for it as long time after. Which they vſe to obſerue with very great deuotion, eating nothing elſe but bread and ſalt, except a little cabbage, and ſome other hearb or roote, with water or quaſſe mead for their drinke.

Bread and ſalt the Ruſsian faſt.

This is their manner of adminiſtring the Sacraments. Wherein what they differ from the inſtitution of Chriſt, and what ceremonies they haue added of their owne, or rather borrowed of the Greekes, may eaſily be noted.

Their cheefeſt errours in matter of faith, I finde to be theſe.

Of the Doctrine of the Ruſſe church, and what errors it holdes.

Firſt, concerning the word of God it ſelfe, they will not reade publikely certain Bookes of the Canonicall Scripture, as the Bookes of Moſes; ſpecially the foure laſt, Exodus, Leuiticus, Numeri, and Deuteronomie, which they ſay are all made diſauthentique, and put out of vſe by the comming of Chriſt; as not able to diſcerne the difference betwixt the Morall, and the Ceremoniall law.

The Bookes of the Prophets they allow of, but reade them not publikely in their Churches, for the ſame reaſon; becauſe they wer but directers vnto Chriſt, and proper (as they ſay) to the Nation of the Iewes. Onely the booke of Pſalmes they haue in great eſtimation, and ſing & ſay them daily in their Churches.

How they allow of the new Teſtament.

Of the new Teſtament they allow, and reade all except the Reuelation: which therefore they read not (though they allow it) becauſe they vnderſtand it not, neither haue the like occaſion, to know the fulfilling of the propheſies contained within it, concerning eſpecially the Apoſtaſie of the Antichriſtian Church, as haue the Weſterne Churches. Notwithſtanding they haue had their Antichriſtes of the Greek Church, and may find their own falling off, and the puniſhments for it (by the Turkiſh inuaſion) in the propheſies of that Booke.

Apoſtaſie of the Antichriſtian Church.

Secondly (which is the fountain of the reſt of all their corruptions both in Doctrine and Ceremonies) they holde with the Papiſts, that their Church Traditions are of equall authority with the written word of God. Wherein they prefer themſelues before other Churches: affirming, that they haue the true and right traditions, deliuerd by the Apoſtles to the Greek Church, and ſo vnto them.

2. Traditions equall to the holy ſcripture

3. That the Church (meaning the Greeke, and ſpecially the Patriarch & his Synod, as the head of the reſt) haue a ſoueraigne authority to interpret the ſcriptures, and that all are bound, to hold that interpretation as ſound and authentique.

3. The church to haue ſoueraigne authority in interpreting the Scriptures.

4. Concerning the diuine Nature, and the three perſons, in the one ſubſtance of God, that the Holye ghoſt proceedeth from the Father onely, and not from the Sonne.

4. The holy Ghoſt to proceed from the Father onely.

5. About the office of Chriſt, they hold many fowle errors, and the ſame (almoſt) as doth the Papiſh Church; namely, that he is their ſole Mediator of redemption, but not of interceſſion.

5 Chriſt not ſole mediator of interceſsiō.

Their cheefe reaſon (if they be talked withall) for defence of this errour, is, that vnapt and fooliſh compariſon, betweene God and a Monarch or Prince of this world, that muſt be ſued vnto by Mediators about him: wherein they giue ſpecial preferment to ſome aboue others, as to the bleſſed Virgin, whom they cal Prechefte, or vndefiled: & S. Nicolas, whom they cal Scora pomoſnick, or the Speedy helper, & ſay, that he hath 300. Angels of the cheefeſt, appointed by God to attend on him. This hath brought them to an horrible exceſſe of idolatry, after the groſſeſt and prophaneſt manner; giuing vnto theyr Images, all Religious worſhip of Prayer, Thankeſgiuing, Offerings, and Adoration, with proſtrating and knocking theyr heads to the ground before them, as to God himſelfe. Which beecauſe they doo to the picture, not to the portraiture of the Saint, they ſay they worſhip not an Idoll, but the Saint in his image, & ſo offend not God. Forgetting the commāde-mēt of God, that forbiddeth to make the image image or likeneſſe of any thing, for any religious worſhippe or vſe whatſoeuer. Their Church walles are very ful of them, richly hanged and ſet forth with Pearle & ſtone vppon the ſmooth Table. Though ſome alſo they haue emboſſed, that ſticke from the boord almoſt an inch outwards. They call them Chudouodites, or their miracle workers: and when they prouide thē to ſet vp in their churches, in no caſe they may ſay that they haue bought the image but exchanged mony for it.

Miracle workers.

6. For the meanes of Iuſtification, they agree with the Papiſtes, that it is not by faith onely, apprehending Chriſt; but by their workes alſo. And that Opus operatum or the worke for the worke ſake, muſt needs pleaſe God. And therefore they are all in their numbers of Prayers, Faſtes, Vowes, and offerings to Saints, Almeſdeeds, Croſſings, and ſuch like, and carrie their numbering beads about with them continually; aſwell the Emperor and his Nobility, as the common people, not onely in the Church, but in all other pub like places, ſpecially at any ſet or ſolemne meeting, as in their Faſts, Law Courtes, common conſultations, entertainment of Ambaſſadors, and ſuch like.

6. Iuſtification by workes.

7. They ſay (with the Papiſtes) that no man can be aſſured of his ſaluation, til the laſt ſentence be paſſed at the day of iudgment.

7. Saluation vncertaine.

8. They vſe Auricular confeſſion, and thinke that they are purged (by the verie action) from ſo many ſins as they confeſſe by name, and in particular to the Prieſt.

8. Auricular confeſsion.

9. They do hold three Sacraments, of Baptiſme, the Lords Supper, and the laſt annoyling or vnction. Yet concerning theyr Sacrament of extreame Vnction, they hold it not ſo neceſſary to ſaluation, as they doe Baptiſme; but thinke it a great curſe and puniſhment of God, if any dye without it.

9. Three Sacraments.

10. They thinke there is a neceſſitie of Baptiſme, and that al are condemned that dye without it.

10 Al damned that dy without baptiſme.

11. They rebaptize as many Chriſtians (not being of the Greeke church) as they conuert to their Ruſſe profeſſion: becauſe they are diuided from the true Church, which is the Greeke, as they ſay.

11. Anabaptiſme.

12. They make a difference of meates and drinkes, accounting the vſe of one, to be more holy then of another. And therefore in their ſet faſts, they forbeare to eat fleſh, and white meates (as we call them) after the manner of the Popiſh ſuperſtition: which they obſerue ſo ſtrictly, and with ſuch blind deuotion, as that they wil rather die, then eate one bit of fleſh, egges or ſuch like, for the health of their bodyes in their extreme ſickneſſe.

12. Difference of meates.

13. They hold mariage to be vnlawful for all the Clergy men, except the Prieſts only, and for them alſo after the firſt wife (as was ſaid before.) Neither do they wel allowe of it in Lay-men after the ſecond marriage. Which is a pretence now vſed againſt the Emperours onely brother, a child of ſix yeares old: Who therfore is not prayed for in their Churches, as their maner is otherwiſe for the Princes blood becauſe he was borne of the ſixt mariage, and ſo not legitimate. This charge was giuen to the Prieſts by the Emperor himſelf, by procurement of the Godonoes: who make him beleeue, that it is a good pollicy, to turne away the liking of the people from the next ſucceſſor.

13. Marriage for ſome perſons vnlawful

An ill perſwaſion in prieſts.

Many other falſe opinions they haue in matter of Religion. But theſe are the chiefe, which they hold partly by meanes of their traditions (which they haue receiued from the Greeke Church) but ſpecially by ignorance of the holye Scriptures. Which notwithſtanding they haue in the Polonian toong (that is al one with theirs, ſome few words only excepted) yet few of them read them with that godlye care which they ought to doe: neyther haue they (if they would) bookes ſufficient of the Olde and New Teſtament for the common people, but of their Leiturgie onely, or Booke of common Seruice, whereof there are very great numbers.

The Polonian tongue differ very little.

All this miſcheefe commeth from the Cleargie, who being ignoraunt and godleſſe themſelues, are exceedingly warie, to keepe the people (likewiſe) in their ignoraunce and blindeneſſe, for theyr liuing and bellies ſake: partly alſo from their manner of Gouernement ſetled among them: which the Emperours (whom it ſpecially behooueth) liſte not to haue changed by any innouatiou, but to retaine that Religion that beſt agreeeth with it. Which notwithſtanding it is not to be doubted, but that hauing the word of God in ſome ſort (though without the ordinary meanes, to attaine to a true ſenſe and vnderſtanding of it) God hath alſo his number among them. As may partly appeare, by that which a Ruſſe at Mosko ſaid to a follower of an Ambaſſador, ſpeaking againſt their Images and other ſuperſtitions: That God had giuen vnto his Country light to day, and might giue it to morrow (if he pleaſed) to them.

A man and his wife kept in priſon 28. yeares, and after burned.

As for any inquiſition or proceeding againſt mē for matter of religion, I could heare of none: ſaue (a few yeares ſince) againſt one man and his wife, who were kept in cloſe priſon, the ſpace of 28. years, till they were ouer-growne into a deformed faſhion, for their hayre, nailes, coulor of countenance, and ſuch like, and in the ende were burned at Mosko, in a ſmall houſe ſet on fire. The cauſe was kept ſecret, but like it was for ſome part of truth, in matter of religion: though the people were made to beleeue by the Prieſts and Fryars, that they held ſome great & damnable hereſie.

The manner of ſolemnizing their Marriages.

The manner of making and ſolemnizing their Mariages, is different from the manner of other Countries. The man (though he neuer ſaw the woman before) is not permitted to haue any ſight of her all the time of his wooing: which hee doth not by himſelfe, but by his Mother, or ſome other ancient woman of his kin or acquaintance. When the liking is taken (aſwell by the Parents, as by the parties themſelues, for, without the knoledge and conſent of the parents, the contract is not lawfull) the fathers on both ſides, or ſuch as are to them in ſtead of Fathers, with their other chiefe friends, haue a meeting and conference about the dowry, which is commonly very large, after the ability of the Parents: ſo that you ſhal hade a Market-man (as they call them) giue a thouſand Rubbels, or more with his daughter.

After liking taken on both ſides.

The manner of endowmēt for Wiues.

As for the man, it is neuer required of him, nor ſtandeth with their cuſtome, to make any ioynter in recompence of the dowry. But in caſe he haue a childe by his Wife, ſhe enioyeth a third deale after his deceaſe. If he haue two children by her, or more, ſhee is to haue a courteſie more, at the diſcretion of the husband. If the husband depart without iſſue by his wife, ſhee is returned home to her friends without any thing at all, ſaue onely her dowry: if the husband leaue ſo much behinde him in goods. When the agreement is made concerning the Dowry, they ſigne bonds one to the other, aſwell for the payment of the dowry, as the performing of the marriage by a certain day. If the woman were neuer married before, her father and friends are bound (beſides) to aſſure her a maiden. Which breedeth many brabbels and quarrels at law, if the man take any conceit, concerning the behauiour and honeſty of his wife.

Agreement concerning the Dowry.

Thus the contract beeing made, the parties begin to ſend Tokens the one to the other; the woman firſt, then afterward the man, but yet ſee not one another till the marriage be ſolemnized. On the eeue before the marriage day, the bride is carried in a Collimago, or Coach, or in a ſled (if it be Winter) to the bridegroomes houſe, with her marriage apparrell and bedſtead with her, which they are to lye in. For this is euer prouided by the bride, and is commonly very faire, with much coſt beſtowed vpon it. Heere ſhee is accompanied all that night by her mother, and other women: but not welcommed, nor once ſeene by the bridegroome himſelfe.

No ſight till the marriage be ſolemnized.

When the time is come to haue the Marriage ſolemnized, the Bride hath put vpon her a kinde of hoode, made of fine knitworke or Lawne, that couereth her head, and all her bodie down to the middle. And ſo accompanied with hir frends and the bride-groome with his, they goe to Church all on horſebacke, though the Church bee neere hand, and themſelues but of very meane degree.

Ceremonies in marriages.

The wordes of contract, and other ceremonies in ſolemnizing the marriage, are much after the order, and with the ſame words that are vſed with vs: with a ring alſo giuen to the Bride. Which being put on, & the words of contract pronounced: the Brides hand is deliuered into the hand of the Bridegroome, which ſtandeth all this while on the one ſide of the Altar or Table, and the Bride on the other. So the marriage knot beeing knit by the Prieſt, the Bride commeth to the Bridegroome (ſtanding at the end of the Altar or Table) and falleth downe at his feete, knocking her head vpon his ſhooe, in token of her ſubiection & obedience. And the Bridegroome againe caſteth the lappe lappe of his Gowne or vpper garment, ouer the Bride, in token of his duty to protect and cheriſh her.

Signs of loue and affinitie betweene the parents and friends.

Then the Bridegroom and Bride, ſtanding both together at the Tables end, cometh firſt the father, and the other friends of the Bride, and bow themſelues downe low to the Bride-groome: and ſo likewiſe his friends bow themſelues to the Bride, in token of affinity and loue, euer after, betwixt the two Kindreds. And withall, the father of the Bridegroom, offereth to the prieſt a loafe of bread, who deliuereth it ſtraight againe to the father, and other friends of the Bride, with atteſtation before God and their Idols, that he deliuer the Dowry wholly and truely at the day appointed, and hold loue euer after, one Kindred with another. Wherupon they breake the loafe into peeces, and eate of it, to teſtifie their true and ſincere meanings, for performing of that charge, and thenceforth to become as graines of one Loafe, or men of one Table.

Drinking of the Bride and Bridegroome, together.

Theſe Ceremonies being ended, the Bride-groome taketh the Bride by the hand, and ſo they goe on together, with their friendes after them, towardes the Church porch. Where meet them certaine with pots and cups in theyr hands, with Meade and Ruſſe Wine. Whereof the Bride-groome taketh firſt a Charke, or little cuppe full in his hand, and drinketh to the Bride: who opening her hood or vaile belowe, and putting the Cup to her mouth vnderneath it (for being ſeene of the Bridge-groome) pledgeth him againe.

Thus returning altogether from the Church, the Bride-groome goeth not home to his owne, but vnto his Fathers houſe, and ſhe likewiſe to hers, where eyther entertaine their friends apart. At the entering into the houſe, they vſe to fling Corne out of the windowes vppon the Bridegroome and Bride, in token of plenty and fruitfulneſſe to be with them euer after.

The euening and night ceremonies.

When the Euening is come, the Bride is brought to the Bride-groomes Fathers houſe, and there lodgeth that night, with her vaile or couer ſtill ouer her head. All that night, ſhee may not ſpeak one word (for that charge ſhee receiueth by tradition from her mother and other matrons her Friendes) that the Bride-groome muſt neither heare, nor ſee her, till the day after the marriage. Neither three dayes after, may ſhe be heard to ſpeake, ſaue certaine few words at the Table, in a ſet forme, with great manners and reuerence to the Bride-groome. If ſhee behaue her ſelfe otherwiſe, it is a great preiudice to her credite and life euer after: and will highly bee diſliked of the Bride-groome himſelfe.

After the third day, they depart vnto their own houſe, and make a feaſt to both their friends together. The mariage day, and the whole time of their Feſtiuall, the Bride-groome hath the honor to be called Moloday Knez, or young Duke, and the Bride Moloday Knezay, or yong Dutcheſſe.

Titles giuen to the Bride-groome and Bride.

In liuing with their wiues, they ſhew themſelues to be but of a barbarous condition: vſing them as ſeruantes rather then wiues. Except the Noble-women, which are, or ſeeme to bee of more eſtimation with their husbands, then the reſt of meaner ſort. They haue this fowle abuſe, contrary to good order, and the word of God it ſelfe, that vpon diſlike of his wife, or other cauſe whatſoeuer, the man may go into a Monaſtery, & ſheare himſelfe a Fryer, by pretence of deuotion, and ſo leaue his wife to ſhifte for her ſelfe ſo well as ſhe can.

Barbarous behauiour in liuing with their wiues.

The other Ceremonies of theyr Church, are many in number: eſpecially, the abuſe about the ſigne of the Croſſe, which they ſet vp in their high-wayes, in the tops of their Churches, and in euery doote of their houſes, ſigning themſelues continually with it on their foreheads & breſts, with great deuotion, as they will ſeeme by their outward geſture and behauiour. Which were much leſſe offence, if they gaue not withall, that Religious reuerence and worſhippe vnto it, which is due vnto none but God onely, and vſed the dumbe ſhew and ſigning of it, inſtead of Thankeſgiuing, and of all other duties vvhich they doe owe vnto God.

The other Ceremonies of the Ruſſe Church.

When they riſe euery day in the Morning, they goe commonlie in the ſight of ſome Steeple, that hath a croſſe made on the toppe of it: and ſo bowing themſelues tovvardes the croſſe, they ſigne themſelues withall on theyr foreheads and breſts. And this is their thankſ-

Riſing in the morning.

giuing to God for their nights reſt, without any word ſpeaking, except peraduenture they ſay, Aſpody Pomelуy, or, Lord haue mercy vpon vs.

Sitting downe to meate. When they ſit downe to meate, and riſe againe from it, the thankſgiuing to God, is the croſſing of their fore-heads and breaſts. Except it be ſome few that adde peraduẽture, a word or two of ſome ordinary prayer, impertinent to that purpoſe.

Oath for deciding controuerſies. When they are to giue an oath, for the deciding of any controuerſie at law, they do it by ſwearing by the Croſſe, and kiſſing the feete of it, making it as GOD, whoſe name onely is to bee vſed in ſuch triall of Iuſtice.

At entring into houſes. When they enter into any houſe (where euer there is an Idoll hanging on the wal) they ſigne themſelues with the croſſe, and bow themſelues to it.

At beginning worke. When they beginne any worke, be it little or much, they arme themſelues firſt with the ſigne of the croſſe. And this commonly is all their prayer vnto God, for good ſpeede of their buſineſſe. And thus they ſerue God with croſſes, after a croſſe and vaine manner: not vnderſtanding what the Croſſe of Chriſt is, nor the power of it. And yet they thinke all ſtrangers Chriſtians, to be no better then Turkes, in compariſon of themſelues (and ſo they wil ſay) becauſe they bow not thẽſelues, when they meete with the Croſſe, nor ſigne themſelues with it, as the Ruſſe manner is.

Holy water. They haue holy water, in like vſe and eſtimation as the Popiſh Church hath. But herein they exceed them, in that they doe not onely hallow their holy water ſtockes, and tubs full of water; but all the Riuers of the Country once euery yeare.

Hallowing of Riuers. At Mosko it is done with great pompe & ſolemnity: the Emperour himſelfe being preſent at it, with all his Nobility, marching through the ſtreetes towards the Riuer of Moskua, in manner of proceſſion, in this order as followeth.

The hallowing of the Riuer at Mosko. Firſt goe two Deacons, with banners in their hands, the one of Precheſte (or our Lady) the other of S. Michael, fighting with his Dragon. Then follow after, the reſt of the Deacons and the Prieſts of Mosko, two and two in a ranke, with coaps on their backes, and their Idols at their breaſts, carried with girdles or ſlings, made faſt about their necks. Next the Prieſts, come their Biſhops in their pontificalibus: then the Fryars, Monks and Abbots: and after, the Patriarchs in very rich attire, with a ball, or ſphere on the top of his myter, to ſignifie his vniuerſality ouer that Church. Laſt commeth the Emperor, with all his Nobility. The whole traine is of a mile long, or more.

Order obſerued at the Riuer. When they are come to the Riuer, a great hole is made in the yce, where the market is kept, of a rod and a halfe broad, with a ſtage round about it to keepe off the preaſe. Then beginneth the Patriarch to ſay certaine prayers, and coniureth the diuell to come out of the water: and ſo caſting in ſalt, and cenſing it with frankincenſe, maketh the whole Riuer to become holy water. The morning before, all the people of Mosko vſe to make croſſes of chawlke ouer euery doore, & window of their houſes: leaſt the diuell being coniured out of the water, ſhould flye into their houſes.

After the ceremonies are ended. When the ceremonies are ended, you ſhall ſee the black gard of the Emperors houſe, & then the reſt of the Towne with their pailes and buckets, to take off the hallowed water for drinke, and other vſes. You ſhall alſo ſee the women dippe in their children ouer head and eares, and many men and women leap into it, ſome naked, ſome with their clothes on, when ſome man would thinke his finger would freeze off, if hee ſhould but dippe it into the water.

Horſes drinke of the holy water on Twelfth-day. When the men haue doone, they bring their horſes to the riuer, to drink of the ſanctified water; and ſo make them as holy as a horſe. Their ſet day for this ſolemne action of halowing their riuers, is that we call Twelfe day. The like is doone by other Biſhops, in all parts of the Realme.

Drinking of holy water. Their maner is alſo to giue it to their ſicke, in their greateſt extreamitie; thinking that it will eyther recouer them, or ſanctifie them to God. Whereby they kill many, through their vnreaſonable ſuperſtition, as did the Lord Borris his onely ſonne, at my being at the Moſco: whom he killed (as was ſayd by the Phyſitions) by powring into him colde holy water, and by preſenting him naked into the Church, to their Saint Baſileo, in the colde of the Winter, in an extreamity of ſickeneſſe.

They

The Image of Chriſt in proceſſions.

They haue an Image of Chriſt, which they call Nerucbi, (which ſignifies aſmuch as Made without hands) for ſo their prieſts (and ſuperſtition withall) perſwades them it was. This in their proceſſions, they carry about with them on high vpon a pole, encloſed within a Pixe, made like a Lanthorne, and doe reuerence to it, as to a great myſterie.

Brewing with holy water.

At euery brewing, their manner is likewiſe, to bring a diſh of their woort to the Prieſt, within the Church: which being hallowed by him, is poured into the brewing, and ſo giueth it ſuch a vertue, as when they drinke of it, they are ſeldome ſober. The like they doe with the firſt fruites of their corne in Harueſt.

Palmeſundaie ceremonie by ancient tradition.

They haue an other ceremony vppon Palme-ſunday of ancient tradition: what time the Patriarch rideth through the Mosko, the Emperour himſelfe holding his horſe bridle, and the people crying, Hoſanna, and ſpreading their vpper garments vnder his horſe feete. The Emperour hath of the Patriarch for his good ſeruice of that day, 200. rubbles of ſtanding penſion. Another Pageant they haue much like vnto this, the weeke before the Natiuity of Chriſt. When euery Biſhop in his Cathedrall Church, ſetteth foorth a ſhew of the three children in the Ouen. Where the Angell is made to come flying from the roofe of the Church, with great admiration of the lookers on, and many terible flaſhes of fire, are made with rozen, and gun-powder, by the Chaldeans (as they call them) that runne about the towne all the Twelue dayes, diſguiſed in their Players coats, and make much good ſport for the honour of the Biſhops Pageant. At the Moſco, the Emperour himſelfe, and the Empreſſe neuer faile to be at it, although it be but the ſame matter played euery yeare, without any new inuention at all.

An other ceremony before Chriſtmaſſe.

Faſts, beſide foure ſeuerall Lents, and at what times they are.

Beſides their faſts on Wedneſdayes, and Fridayes throughout the whole yere, (the one, becauſe they ſay Chriſt was ſold on the Wedneſday, the other, becauſe he ſuffered on the Friday) they haue foure great Faſts, or Lents euery yeare. The firſt, (which they call their great Lent) is at the ſame time with ours. The ſecond, about Midſomer. The third, in Harueſt time. The fourth, about Hallowntide: which they keepe not of pollicie, but of meere ſuperſtitions.

In their great Lent, for the firſt weeke, they doe eate nothing but Bread and ſalt, and drinke nothing but water, neyther meddle with any matter of their vocation, but intend their ſhriuing and faſting only.

Vigils or Wakes they haue three.

They haue alſo three Vigils or Wakes in their Lent, which they call Stoiania, and the laſt Friday their great Vigil, as they do call it. What time the whole pariſh muſt be preſent in the Church, and watch from nine of the clocke in the Euening, vntill ſixe in the Morning, all the while ſtanding, except when they do fall downe, and knocke their heads to their Idoles, which muſt be an hundred and ſeauentie times, iuſt, through the whole night.

Burialls, and their ſuperſtitious ceremonies at them.

About their burialls alſo, they haue many ſuperſtitious and prophane ceremonies: as putting within the finger of the corpes, a Letter to Saint Nicholas; whome they make their chiefe Mediator, and (as it were) the Porter of Heauen gates, as the Papiſts doe theyr Peter.

No buriall in the winter.

In Winter time, when all is couered with ſnow, and the ground ſo hard frozen, as that no ſpade, nor picke-axe can enter; their manner is not to bury their dead, but to keepe the bodies (ſo many as die all the Winter time) in an houſe, in the ſuburbs, or out-parts of the towne, which they call Bohſedom, that is to ſay, Gods houſe: where the dead bodies are piled vp together, like billets on a wood-ſtacke, as hard, with the froſt, as a verie ſtone, till the Spring-tide come and diſſolueth the froſt; what time euery man taketh his dead friend, and committeth him to the ground.

Month-minds for departed friends.

They haue beſides, their yeares and moneths mindes, for their friends departed. What time they haue prayers ſaide ouer the graue by the prieſt; who hath a penny ordinary for his paines. When any dyeth, they haue ordinarie women mourners, that come to lament for the dead party: and ſtand howling ouer the body, after a prophane, and heatheniſh manner (ſometimes in the houſe, ſometimes bringing the body into the backeſide: Asking him what he wanted, and what he meant to die? They bury theyr dead, as the party vſed to goe, with coate, hoſe, bootes, hatte, and the reſt of his apparell.

Buriall according as they were liuing.

Many

Many other vaine and ſuperſtitious ceremonies they haue, which were long and tedious to report. By theſe it may appeare, how farre they are fallen from the true knowledge and practiſe of Chriſtian Religion: hauing changed the Word of God, for their vaine traditions, and brought all to externall, and ridiculous ceremonies, without any regard of ſpirite and truth, which God requires in his true worſhip.

CHAP. V.

¶ Lastly, an Oeconomicall diſcourſe of the Emperours Court; his Familie and Houſholde affaires: And more priuate behauiour of the people.

Of the Emperours domeſtike or priuat behauiour.

THe Emperours priuate behauior, ſo much as may be, or is meete to be knowne, is after this manner: Hee riſeth commonly about foure of the clocke in the morning. After his apparelling and waſhing, in cometh his ghoſtly father, or prieſt of his chamber, which is named in their tongue, Otetz Duhouna, with his Croſſe in his hand, wherewith he bleſſeth him, laying it firſt on his fore-head, then vpon his cheekes, or ſides of his face, and then offreth him the end of it to kiſſe. This being doone, the clarke of the croſſe (calld Chresby Deyack Profery,) bringeth into his chamber a paynted Image, repreſenting the Saint for that day. For euery day with them hath his ſeuerall Saint, as it were a patron for that day. This he placeth among the reſt of his Image gods, wherewithall his Chamber is decked, as thicke almoſt as the wall can beare, with Lampes and wax Candles burning before them. They are very coſtly and gorgeouſly decked with pearles and precious ſtones. This Image being placed before him, the Emperour beginnes to croſſe himſelfe after the Ruſſe manner; firſt on the fore-head, then on both ſides of his breaſt, with Aſpody Pomeluy, Pomeluy mena hoſpody, ſacroy mena greſnick Syhodeſtua: which is as much to ſay, as, Helpe mee O Lord my God, Lord comfort mee, defend and keepe mee a ſinner from doing euill, &c. This he directeth towards the Image or Saint for that day, whom he nameth in his prayer, together with our Lady (whom they call Prechiſte) Saint Nicholas, or ſome other, to whome he beareth moſt deuotion, bowing himſelfe proſtrate vnto them, with knocking his head to the very ground. Thus he continueth the ſpace of a quarter of an houre or thereabouts.

His priuate praier, and the maner how it is perfourmed in ceremonies

The emperors ghoſtly father

Sprinkling with holy water.

Then commeth againe the ghoſtly father, or chamber prieſt, with a ſiluer bole ful of holy water, which they call in Ruſſe, Sweta Voda, and a ſprinkle of Baſill (as they call it) in his hand, and ſo all to beſprinkles firſt the Image gods, and then the Emperour. This holy water is brought freſh euery day from the Monaſteries, farre and neere, ſent vnto the Emperour from the Abbot or from the Priour, in the name of the Saint, which is patrone of that Monaſtery, as a ſpeciall token of good will from him.

The emperors viſitation of the Empreſſe.

Theſe deuotions being ended, he ſendeth in to the Empreſſe, to aske whether ſhe hath reſted in health, &c. And after a little pawſe, goeth himſelfe to ſalute her in a middle roome betwixt both their chambers. The Empreſſe lyeth apart from him, and keepeth not one Chamber, nor Table with the Emperour daily, ſaue vppon the eeue of their Lents, or commō Faſts: what time ſhe is his ordinary gheſt at bed and boord. After their meeting in the morning, they go together to their priuate Church or Chappell, where is ſaide, or ſung a morning Seruice (called Zautrana) of an houre long or there-abouts. From the Church he returneth home, & ſitteth him downe in a great Chamber, to be ſeene and ſaluted by his Nobility, ſuch as are in fauour about the Court. If he haue to ſay to any of thē, or they to him, then is the time. And this is ordinary, except his health, or ſome other occaſion alter the cuſtome.

The Emperor giueth preſence euerie morning.

The emperors high and ſolemne ſeruice.

About nine in the morning, he goeth vnto another Church within his Caſtle: where is ſung by Prieſts and Choriſters, the high Seruice (called Obeadna or Complin) which commonly laſteth the ſpace of two houres: the Emperor in the mean time, talking commonly with ſome of

of his Councell, Nobilitie, or Captains, which haue to ſay to him, or hee to them. And the Councell likewiſe conferre togither among themſelues, as if they were in their councell houſe. This ended, he returneth home, and recreateth himſelfe till it be dinner time.

The Emperours ſeruice at his Table.

Hee is ſerued at his Table on this manner; Firſt, euery diſh (as it is deliuered at the Dreſſer) is taſted by the Cooke, in the preſence of his high Steward, or his Deputy. And ſo is receiued by the Gentlemen waiters (called Shilſhey) and by them carried vp to the Emperours Table, the high Steward going before. There it is receiued by the Sewer (called Erastnoy) who giueth a taſte of euery diſh vnto the Taſter, and ſo placeth it before the Emperour. The number of his diſhes for his ordinary ſeruice, is about ſeauentie; dreſſed ſomewhat groſely, with much garlike and ſalt, much after the Dutch manner. When he exceedeth, vpon ſome occaſion of the day, or entertainement of ſome Ambaſſador, he hath many more diſhes. The ſeruice is ſent vp by two diſhes at a time, or three at the moſt, that hee may eate it warme: firſt the baked, then the roſte meates, and laſt of all, the brothes.

A Table for the Nobilitie, &c.

In his dining Chamber is an other Table: where ſit the chiefe of his Nobility that are about his Court, and his ghoſtly Father, or Chaplaine. On the one ſide of the Chamber ſtandeth a Cubbard, or Table of Plate, very fayre and rich, with a great ceſterne of Copper by it, full of yce and ſnow, wherein ſtand the pots that ſerue for that meale. The taſter holdeth the cup that he drinketh in all dinner time, and deliuereth it vnto him with a ſay, when he calleth for it. The manner is to make many diſhes out of the ſeruice, after it is ſet on the Table, and to ſend them to ſuch Noblemen and Officers, as the Emperor liketh beſt. And this is counted a great fauour and honour.

His ſleeping after dinner.

After dinner, he layeth him downe to reſt, where commonly hee taketh three houres ſleepe, vnleſſe hee doe employ one of the houres to bathing or boxing. And this cuſtome for ſleeping after dinner, is an ordinary matter with him, as with all the Ruſſes. After his ſleepe hee goeth to Euenſong (called by them Vechurna:) and thence returning (for the moſt part) recreateth himſelfe with the Empreſſe till ſupper time, with ieaſters, and dwarfes, men and women, that doe tumble before him, and ſing many ſongs after the Ruſſe manner. This is his common and vſuall forme of recreation betweene his meales, wherein he moſt delighteth.

His euening recreation, or betweene meales.

One other ſpeciall recreation, is the fight with wilde Beares, which are caught in pittes, or netts, and are kept in barred Cages for that purpoſe, againſt the Emperour bee diſpoſed to ſee the paſtime. The fight with the Beare is on this ſort: The man is turned into a circle walled round about, where hee is to quite himſelfe ſo well as hee can; for there is no way to flie out. When the Beare is turned looſe, he cometh vpon him with open mouth. If at the firſt puſh hee miſſe his ayme, ſo that the Beare doe come within him, he is in great danger. But the wilde Beare being very fierce, hath this quality, that giueth aduantage to the Hunter. His manner is, when he aſſaileth a man, to riſe vpright on his two hinder legges, and ſo to come roaring with open mouth vpon him. And if the Hunter then can puſh right into the very breaſt of him betweene his fore-legges (as commonly he will not miſſe) reſting the other end of the Boare-ſpeare at the ſide of his foote: and ſo keeping the pike ſtill towardes the face of the Beare, hee ſpeedeth him commonly at one blowe.

Fight with Beares, by men put to them.

The manner to kill the Beare.

But many times theſe Hunters come ſhort, and are eyther ſlaine, or miſerably torne with the teeth and talents of the fierce beaſt. If the party quite himſelfe well in this fight with the Beare, he is carried to drinke at the Emperours Seller doore; where he drinketh himſelfe drunke for the honour of Hoſpodare. And this is his reward, for aduenturing his life for the Emperours pleaſure.

To maintaine this paſtime, the Emperor hath certaine Huntſmen, that are appointed for that purpoſe, to take the wilde Beare. This is his recreation commonly on the Holy-daies. Sometimes he ſpendeth his time in looking vppon his Goldſmiths and Iewellers, Taylors, Embroyderers, Painters, and ſuch like, and ſo goeth to his ſupper. When it draweth towards bed time, his Prieſt ſaith certaine prayers; and then the Emperour bleſſeth and croſſeth himſelfe, as in the morning, for for a quarter of an houre or there-abouts, and ſo goeth to his bed.

A deſcription of the Emperor, when the Author was there.

The Emperor that now is (called Theodore Iuanowich) is for his perſon of a mean ſtature, ſomewhat lowe and groſſe, of a ſallow complection, and enclining to the dropſie, hawk noſed, vnſteady in his pace, by reaſon of ſome weakneſſe of his limbs, heauy and vnactiue, yet commonly ſmiling almoſt to a laughter. For quality otherwiſe, ſimple and ſlowe witted, but very gentle, and of an eaſie nature, quiet, mercifull, of no martiall diſpoſition, nor greatly apt for matter of pollicy, very ſuperſtitious, and infinite that way. Beſides his priuate deuotions at home, hee goeth euery Weeke commonly on pilgrimage to ſome Monaſtery, or other that is neereſt hand. He is of 34. yeares old, or there-abouts, and hath reigned almoſt the ſpace of ſixe yeares.

Of the Emperors priuate, or houſhold Officers.

The cheefe Officers of the Emperors houſhold, are theſe which follow. The firſt is the Office of the Boiaren Coneſheua, or Maſter of the Horſe. Which containeth no more then is expreſſed by the name, that is, to be Ouerſeer of the horſe, and not Magiſter equitum, or Maſter of the horſemen. For hee appointeth other for that ſeruice, as occaſion doth require (as before was ſaid.) He that beareth that Office at this time, is Borris Federowich Godonoe, Brother to the Empreſſe. Of Horſe for ſeruice in his wars (beſides other for his ordinary vſes) hee hath to the number of ten thouſand, which are kept about Mosko.

Maſter of the Horſe.

The Lord Steward.

The next is the Lord Steward of his houſhold, at this time, one Gregory Vaſilowich Godonoe.

The Lord Treaſurer.

The third is his Treaſurer, that keepeth all his monies, iewels, plate, &c. now called Stepan Vaſilowich Godonoe.

Controller.

The fourth his Controller, now Andreas Petrowich Cleſinine.

Chamberlain

The fift his Chamberlaine. He that attendeth that Office at this time, is called Eſtoma Biſabroza Paſtelniſchay.

Taſters.

The ſixt his Taſters, now Theodore Alexandrowich, and Iuan Vaſilowich Godonoe.

Harbengers.

The ſeuenth his Harbengers, which are three Noblemen, and diuers other Gentlemen that do the Office vnder thē. Theſe are his ordinary Officers, and Offices of the cheefeſt account.

Gentlemen of the Chamber.

Of Gentlemen beſide that waite about his Chamber and Perſon (called Shilſey Strapſey) there are two hundred, all Noblemens ſonnes.

The Guard.

His ordinary Guard is 2000. Hagbutters, ready with their pieces charged, and their match lighted, with other neceſſary Furniture continually day & night: which come not within the houſe, but waite without in the court or yard, where the Emperour is abiding.

Night time.

In the night time, there lodgeth next to his bedchamber, the chiefe Chamberlaine, with one or two more of beſt truſt about him.

A ſecond chamber off, there lodge ſixe other of like account, for their truſt and faithfulneſſe.

In the third Chamber lie certaine yong Gentlemen, of theſe two hundred, called Shilſey Strapſey, that take their turnes by forties euery night.

Groomes.

There are Groomes beſides, that watch in their courſe, and lye at euery gate and doore of the Court, called Eſtopnick.

The Guard for his lodging.

The Hagbutters or Gunners, whereof there are two thouſand (as was ſaide before) watch about the Emperors lodging, or bed-chamber by courſe two hundred and fifty euery night, and two hundred and fifty more in the Court yard, & about the Treaſure houſe.

His Court or Houſe at the Mosko, is made Caſtle-wiſe, walled about with great ſtore of faire Ordenance planted vpon the Wall, and containeth a great bredth of ground within it, with many dwelling houſes. Which are appointed for ſuch as are knowne to be ſure and truſty to the Emperor.

Of the priuate behauiour, or quality of the Ruſſe people.

The priuate behauiour and qualitie of the Ruſſe people, may partly bee vnderſtoode, by that which hath beene ſayde concerning the publique ſtate and vſage of the Countrey.

Conſtitution of their bodies.

As touching the naturall habite of their bodies, they are, for the moſt part, of a large ſiſe, and of verie fleſhy bodies; accounting it a grace to be ſomewhat groſſe and burley, and therefore they nouriſh and ſpread their beards, to haue them long and broade. But, for the moſt part, they are very vnweldy and vnactiue withall. Which may be thought to come, partly of the Climate, and the numbneſſe which they get by the colde in winter, and partly of their dyet, which is moſt of rootes, onions, garlike, cabbage,

Their ordinary dyet.

and

and ſuch like things that breed groſſe humours, which they vſe to eate alone, and with their other meates.

Their drinke at their meals

Their dyet is rather much then curious. At their meales they beginne commonly with a Chark, or ſmall cuppe of Aqua vitæ, (which they do call Ruſſe wine) and then drinke not till towards the end of their meales, taking it in largely, and all together, with kiſſing one another, at euery pledge. And therefore, after dinner there is no talking with them, but euery man goeth to his bench to take his after-noones ſleepe, which is as ordinary with them as theyr nights reſt. When they exceed, and haue varietie of diſhes, the firſt are their baked meates (for roſte meates they vſe little) and then their pottage and broaths. To drinke drunke, is an ordinary matter with them euery day in the week. Their common drinke is Mead, the poorer ſort vſe water, and thin drinke called Quaſſe, which is nothing elſe (as wee vſe to ſay) but water turned out of his wittes, with a little branne meaſhed with it.

The after-noones reſt.

Drinking drunke euery day.

This dyet would breede in them many diſeaſes, but that they vſe bath-ſtoues, or hot-houſes, in ſtead of all phyſicke, commonly twice or thrice euery weeke. All the Winter time, and almoſt the whole Summer, they heate there Peaches, which are made like the Germane Bathſtoues, & their Potlads like Ouens, that ſo warme the houſe, that a ſtranger at the firſt ſhall hardly like of it. Theſe two extremities, ſpecially in the Winter of heate within their houſes, and of extreme colde without, together with their dyet; maketh them of a darke and ſallow complection, their skinnes beeing tanned and parched both with cold and with heate: ſpecially the women, that (for the greater part) are of farre worſe complections, then the men. Wherof the cauſe I take to be their keeping within the hot-houſes, and buſing themſelues about the heating & vſing of their bathſtoues, and peaches.

Their often vſe of Bath-ſtoues,

Two extremities of heat and colde.

The Ruſſe, becauſe that he is vſed to both theſe extremities of heate and of colde, can beare them both a great deale more patiently, then ſtrangers can doe. You ſhall ſee them ſometimes (to ſeaſon their bodies) come out of their Bathſtoues all on a froth, and fuming as hot almoſt as a Pig at a Spit, and preſently to leape into the Riuer ſtarke naked, or to poure colde water all ouer their bodies, and that in the coldeſt of all the Winter time. The women, to mend the bad hue of their skins, vſe to paint their faces with white and red colours, ſo viſibly, that euery man may perceiue it. Which is made no matter, becauſe it is common, and liked well by their husbands: who make their Wiues and Daughters ordinary allowance, to buy them colours to paint their faces withal, and delight themſelues much, to ſee them of fowle women, to become ſuch faire Images. This parcheth the skinne, and helpeth to deforme them when their painting is off.

At comming out of their Bathſtoues.

Womē there paint groſſely

They apparell themſelues after the Greeke manner. The Noblemans attire is on this faſhion.

The Noblemans attire.

Firſt a Taffia, or little night-cappe on his head, that couereth little more then his crowne, commonly very rich, wrought of ſilke and gold thred, and ſet with pearl and precious ſtones. His head he keepeth ſhauen cloſe to the very skin, except he be in ſome diſpleaſure with the Emperour. Then hee ſuffereth his hayre to grow and hang downe vppon his ſhoulders, couering his face as vgly and deformedly as he can.

Ouer the Taffia, hee weareth a wide Cap of blacke Foxe (which they account for the beſt Furre) with a Tiara or long bonnet put within it, ſtanding vp like a Perſian or Babilonian Hat.

About his necke (which is ſeene all bare) is a coller ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, about three or foure fingers broad.

Next ouer his ſhirt (which is curiouſly wrought, becauſe he ſtrippeth himſelfe into it in the Summer time, while he is in the houſe) is a Shepon, or light Garment of ſilke, made downe to the knees, buttoned before: and then a Caftan or a cloſe coate buttoned, & girt to him with a Perſian girdle, whereat hee hangs his kniues and ſpoone. This commonly is of cloth of gold, and hangeth downe as low as his anckles.

Ouer that he weareth a looſe garment of ſome rich ſilke, furred and faced about with ſome gold Lace, called a Ferris.

Another ouer that, of Chamlet, or like ſtuffe, called an Alkaben, ſleeued and hanging lowe, and the cape commonly brooched brooched and set all with pearle.

When he goeth abroad, he casteth ouer al these, which are but sleight (though they seeme to be many) another garment called an Honoratkey, like to the Alkaben, saue that it is made without a coller for the necke. And this is commonly of fine cloth, or Camells haire.

His buskins, which he weareth in stead of hose, with linnen folds vnder them in steed of boot-hose, are made of a Persian leather called Saphian, embrodered with pearle. His vpper stockes commonly are of cloth of gold.

When he goeth abroade, hee mounteth on horse backe, although it be but to goe to the next doore; which is the custome and maner also of the Boiarskey, or gentlemen.

The Gentlemans apparel. The Boiarskey or gentlemans attire is of the same fashion, but diffreth in stuffe; and yet he will haue his Caftan or vndercoate sometimes of cloth of golde, the rest of cloth or silke.

The noble womans apparel. The Noble woman (called Chyna Boiarshena) weareth on her head, first a kall of some soft silke (which commonly is red) and ouer it a frontlet, called Obrosa of white colour.

A coife cap. Ouer that, her Cap (made after the coife fashion of cloath of golde) called Shapka Zempska, edged with some rich furre, and set with pearles and stones. Though they haue of late begunne to disdaine embrodering with pearles about their caps, because the Diacks, and some Merchants wiues haue taken vppe the fashion.

Rich eare-rings. In their eares they weare eare-rings (which they call Sargee) of two inches or more in compasse, the matter of golde set with Rubies, or Saphires, or some like pretious stone.

Chin clothes. In Sommer they goe often with kerchiefs of fine white lawne or Cambricke, fastened vnder the chinne, with two long tasselles pendent. The kerchiefe spotted and set thicke with rich pearle.

Weather hats When they ride or goe abroad in raynie weather, they vse to weare white hats with coloured bands, called by them Scapa Zemskoy.

Necke collers. About their neckes they weare collers of three or foure fingers broade, set with rich pearle and pretious stones.

The vpper garment. Their vpper garment is a loose gowne (called Oposhen) commonly of Skarlet, with wide loose sleeues, hanging downe to the ground, buttond before with great gold buttons, or at the least, siluer and gilt, nigh as bigge as a wallnut. Which hath hanging ouer it fastened vnder the cappe, a large broade cape of some rich Furre, that hangeth downe almost to the middes of their backes.

The vnder gownes. Next vnder the Oposhen or vpper garment, they weare an other, called a Leitnick, that is made close before with great wide sleeues, the cuffe or halfe sleeue vp to the elbowes commonly of cloath of golde: and vnder that a Ferris Zemskoy, which hangeth loose buttoned throughout to the very foote.

Bracelets. On the hand-wreasts they weare very faire Bracelets, about two fingers broade of pearles and precious stones. They goe all in Buskins of white, yellow, blew, or some other coloured leather, embrodered with pearle. This is the attire of the Noble woman of Russia, when shee maketh the best shew of her selfe. The gentlewomans apparrell may differ in the stuffe, but is all one for the making or fashion.

Womens buskins. As for the poore Mousick, and his wife, they goe poorely clad. The man with his Odnoratkey, or loose gowne to the small of the legge, tied together with a lace before, of course white or blew cloth, with some Shube or long wast-coate of Furre, or of sheepe-skinne vnder it, and his furred cappe, and buskins.

The Mousicke, or common mans attire. The poorer sort of them haue their Odnoratkey, or vpper garment, made of Cowes haire. This is their winter habite. In the sommer time, commonly they doe weare nothing but their shirts vpon their backes, and buskins on their legges.

The poore man. The woman goeth in a redde or blew gowne, when shee maketh the best shew, and with some warme Shube of Furre vnder it in the winter time. But in the sommer, nothing but her two shirts (for so do they call them) one ouer the other, whether they be within doores, or without.

The Mousicke wife. On their heads, they weare caps of some colored stuffe, many of veluet, or of cloth of gold; but for the most part, kerchiefes. Without eare-rings of siluer, or some other mettall, and her crosse about her necke, you shall see no Russia woman, be she wife, or maide.

As

Their wittes and capacities

As touching their behauiour, and quality otherwiſe, they are of reaſonable capacities, if they had thoſe meanes that ſome other Nations haue, to traine vp their witts in good nurture and learning. Which they might borrow of the Polonians, and other their neighbors: but that they refuſe it of a very ſelfe pride, as accounting their owne faſhion to be farre the beſt. Partly alſo (as I ſayd before) for that their manner of bringing vp (voyd of all good learning, and ciuill behauiour) is thought (by their gouernors) moſt agreeable to that State, and their maner of gouernement. Which the people would hardly beare, if they were once ciuilled, and brought to more vnderſtanding of God, and good policie.

Ciuilitie bringeth the knowledge of God

This cauſeth the Emperours to keepe out all meanes of making it better, and to be very wary for excluding of all peregrinitie, that might alter their faſhions. Which were leſſe to be diſliked, if it ſet not a print into the very mindes of his people. For, as themſelues are very hardly and cruelly dealt withall by their chiefe Magiſtrates, and other ſuperiours; ſo are they as cruell one againſt an other, eſpecially ouer their inferiours, and ſuch as are vnder them. So that the baſeſt and wretchedeſt Chriſtianoe (as they call him) that ſtoupeth and crowcheth like a dogge to the Gentleman, and licketh vp the duſt that lieth at his feete, is an intollerable tyrant, where he hath the aduantage.

Cruelty of the Ruſſe people.

By this meanes the whole Countrie is filled with rapine, and murder. They doe make no account of the life of a man. Yee ſhall haue a man robbed ſometime in the very ſtreetes of their Townes, if hee goe late in the euening: and yet no man to come foorth out of his doores to reſcue him, though he heare him cry out. I will not ſpeake of the ſtrangeneſſe of the murders, and other cruelties committed amongſt them, that would ſcarcely be beleeued to be doone amongſt men, eſpecially ſuch as profeſſe themſelues to be chriſtians.

Vagrant begging poore.

The number of their vagrant and begging poore is almoſt infinite; that are ſo pinched with famine and extreme neede, as that they doe begge after a violent and deſperate manner; with, Giue me, and cut mee; Giue mee, and kill mee; and ſuch like phraſes. Whereby it may bee gheſſed, what they are towards ſtrangers, that are ſo vnnaturall and cruell towardes their owne. And yet it may be doubted whether is the greater, the crueltie, or intemperancie that is vſed in that Countrie. I will not ſpeake of it, becauſe it is ſo foule and not to be named. The whole Countrie ouerfloweth with all ſinne of that kinde. And no maruell, as hauing no law to reſtraine whoredomes, adulteries, and like vncleanneſſe of life.

Intemperance

No care of word or promiſe.

As for the truth of his word, the Ruſſe (for the moſt part) maketh ſmall regard of it: ſo he may gaine by a lie, and breach of his promiſe. And it may be ſaid truely (as they know beſt that haue traded moſt with them) that from the great to the ſmal (except ſome few that will ſcarcely bee found) the Ruſſe neyther beleeueth anie thing that an other man ſpeaketh, nor ſpeaketh any thing himſelfe worthy to be beleeued.

The Ruſſe odious to his neighbours.

Theſe qualities make them very odious to all their neighbours, eſpecially to the Tartars, that account themſelues to be honeſt and iuſt, in compariſon of the Ruſſe. It is ſuppoſed by ſome, that doe well conſider of the ſtate of both Countries, that the offence they do take at the Ruſſe gouernement, and their manner of behauiour; hath beene a great cauſe to keepe the Tartar ſtill heatheniſh, and to miſlike (as hee dooth) of the Chriſtian profeſſion.

CHAP. VI.

¶ If it may be ſo ordered or limited, that poiſons giuen at a certaine day, ſhall not cauſe death, vntill a time appoynted and prefixed.

This is the laſt paradoxe of the firſt Decad.

SIr, though you can much more clearely and exactly reſolue this doubt; yet notwithſtanding, ſeeing you pleaſe to vnderſtand mine aduice therein, concerning the limitation and efficacie of poyſons, at a day or time prefixed; I ſhall briefly reſolue you of my iudgement.

I haue euermore helde it abſurde and ridiculous (although it bee maintayned in vulgare opinion) that venoms or poyſons ſhould be limited to a certaine time, by empoyſoners. For, how can it be ſo, ſeeing Phyſicall medicines, euen ſuch as are moſt profitable, whoſe vertue (in knowledge thereof, is limited to the compoſition and quantitie of the doſe) cannot be apprehended, but by long and frequent experience? And that being knowne, doth not yet leaue vs any certaine act, but coniecturall: wherfore, I cannot ſee by what reaſon, an empoyſoner ſhould gaine a prefixion of time, for the efficacie of his poyſon. For, it is not lawfull to make triall, without danger, no nor without puniſhment: euen as if the action of Phyſicall receipts, ſhould be experimented vpon healthfull perſons.

A compariſon deriued from phyſicall medicines of beſt worth.

Triall of poyſons made on Dogs, Hogs, Birds, &c.

It may be alleadged, and I am of the ſame opinion too, that they approue their poyſons vpon beaſts, as Dogges, Swine and Birds, and that thereby they conſtitute rules to themſelues; hauing obſerued diuers times of death, according to the nature of the poyſons. As if the natures of men, (being the moſt temperate of all creatures) and the other were not verie farre different. Beſides, it is much more eaſie, that a preciſe and certaine houre of euent and ſucceſſe, ſhould happen vnto beaſts, then to men. For, creatures depriued of reaſon, haue very little diuerſitie (in their kinde) betweene them, feeding on one and the ſame paſturage, and being not addicted to ſundry ſtudies, and occupations: from whence enſueth, that euen by and of the ſame things, beaſts endure (almoſt) paſſions alike.

Little diuerſitie betweene vnreaſonable creatures in their kinde.

Very great & ſtrange varietie among mē, for ſeldome or neuer are two found of one and the ſame complexion.

But for men, although they agree together in kinde, yet notwithſtanding they are ſo different, as ſeldome or neuer, ſhall we find two together of likeneſſe in face: but are diuerſe in complexions, conditions and occupations or profeſſions, and no one like other among a thouſand. Vndoubtedly, I am of the minde, that in the kinde of man, there is as many differences among particulars, as there is diuerſities of kinde among all other creatures. And therefore, it ought to be helde altogether abuſiue, and noway firme, and ſuch coniecture of empoyſoners; as is very eaſie to be prooued, and made plaine to euery vnderſtanding: and vppon this hopefull perſwaſion, wee will fall preſently to our buſineſſe.

Theophraſtus a learned Philoſopher, his opinion of Aconitum.

Many haue thought and held, that Theophraſtus (a very graue and approued Philoſopher) was the Authour of this opinion, becauſe he wrote thus of Aconitum. It is ſaid to be compounded in ſuch ſort, that it can kill at a certaine time: as namely, within two moneths, three moneths, ſixe moneths, a whole yeare, and ſometimes in two yeares. And ſome affirme, that ſuch people ſhall die more miſerably, then if they could haue reſiſted longer time. For their bodies will impaire by little and little, periſhing in a daily languiſhing: whereas ſuch as die ſuddenly, haue the more eaſie death.

Theophraſtus not to be credited in this caſe.

But the authoritie of Theophraſtus, or of our ſelues, can mooue nothing in this matter; conſidering, that he wrote this, more vpon others opinion, then his own, as the words themſelues doe euidently teſtifie. And if any one deſire to know the cauſe of this perſwaſion, hee ſhall meete with a two-folde anſwere thereto. The firſt is, the ſubtile craftineſſe of men, who flatter and fondly play with their owne vices. For how many may be found, that can not ſo paciently endure, when they are reprooued in ſome euill, happening by an externall accident; as if one ſhould tell them, that it receiued originall by a bad temperature of their body, or of their owne intemperance? For, admit that nothing could be ſaide, to bee the cauſe of the firſt conſtitution, and therefore (by conſequent) the reproofe of his imperfection concerned him nothing: yet notwithſtanding, becauſe it is our owne naturally, we will conceale and couer it, yea, and fauour it beyond meaſure. So that if there happen any fault on the behalfe of our imperfection, we ſtand moſt in feare to be thereof reproued. And hence it enſueth, that we more gladly yeelde agreement, to haue the cauſe from ſome externall occaſion, then of any interiour.

Two anſwers to the triuolous perſwaſiō The firſt anſwere.

We can not indure to hear our owne imperfections reprooued.

Examples in this caſe are very manifeſt, euen in ſuch as haue leaſt knowledge, being ignorant in good Arts and Sciences, tranſported by ſimple iudgement of ſelfeloue. As aged, and the moſt part of weake witted people doe, to whom nothing admitable can be ſpoken; vnleſſe it be referred to ſome Saint, or poyſon cloſely giuen, or to the witching lookes of ſome old woman: whence proceeded the complaint whereof Virgill ſpeaketh.

The ignorāce of cauſes induceth (very often) a falſe opinion and Sorceries.

I know not by what ill aſpect of wrong,
My tender Lambes (enchanted) walke along.

For there muſt needes be probable lying, that either inſtantly, or ſoone after the poyſon is giuen, or continued in the ſureſt manner; if any length or reſpite of time can be giuen thereto.

The ſecond anſwere and obſeruation of the ſecond cauſe.

The other cauſe of this opinion, is the depraued interpretation of Aſtronomicall Theoremes or Speculations. For the proofe whereof, Aſtrologers conſtitute (which is true) the diuers manners or paſſions of inferiour bodies, to be from the diuers coniunction, oppoſition and enterchanged aſpect of the ſuperiour. From hence, the ignorant vulgar take occaſion, to ground and eſtabliſh the varietie of effects, euen vpon the leaſt differences that can bee obſerued in the celeſtiall bodies. As when they conſtitute ſome one plant, to haue power and efficacie againſt feauers; prouided, that it be gathered before Sunne riſing. This is an errour ſpread too farre abroad. For, not onely from theſe differences (triuiall, light, and of no account at all) men commonly conſtruct the diuerſitie of effects in their kinds: but alſo would haue the accidents of thoſe effects to be diuers, for the ſelfe ſame reaſon; euen as is the time to manifeſt the efficacie of poyſon. The folly (in this point) further related by Theophraſtus, he ſayth: That death happeneth in as ſhort a time, as a Plant is to be gathered. Let vs ſeeke then for a true ſolution of this Probleme, by reaſon rather then the teſtimonies of any. Which we may moſt commodiouſly doe (if I abuſe not mine owne iudgement) by beginning with the definition of venome or poiſon; to the end it may be the eaſier vnderſtood, what the matter is that vrgeth our inſtant diſputation.

The like iſt of hearbs gathered vpon Saint Iohns Eue or Vigile.

Theophraſtus his words for the ſudden enſuing of death

A definition of poiſon or venome, and what it is vnderſtood to be

We properly call venome or poyſon, whatſoeuer being receiued into the body, doth ſo fight againſt the body, as it is not to be ſurmounted; but contrariwiſe, doth ſo alter the body, as the body it ſelfe alters in diet. In all venoms there are two eſpeciall differences: for, eyther they are enemies to humane nature, by reaſon of their manifeſt qualitie; or elſe they are aduerſe thereto in their whole ſubſtance. Moreouer, ſome may kill quickely, others more tardily, euen of their owne proper nature. Such kill ſuddenly, and in feweſt daies and houres, which are immediatly carried to the profunditie of the hart. Such venoms are extreamly hot, and (for the moſt part) corroſiue or putrefactiue; the Greeks call them Septiques, endued with moſt ſubtile parts. For, colde and groſſe venomes are more ydle, and inſinuate into the veines and arteries more ſlowly.

The operation of poyſons in their owne nature.

Of ſome that deſtroy ſooner then other.

Some there are, which infect and kill the body, by their onely vapour or inuiſible exhalation. Others, that holde the prime place of atrocitie and malignitie. As certaine poiſons artificial, which haue ſo ſubtile a vertue, as being but rubbed or annointed vpon the ſtirrops, will pierce thorow the bootes of the Rider, euen till it attaine to the naked ſoale of his foote, and from thence aſcendeth vp into the body, by the ſouſpiralles or ouertures of the skinne, and ſo corrupt all the members. Bridles and Saddles of horſes may alſo be infected, and afterwards, inducted by naturall heate into the arteries and veins of the rider entring by the pores in his hands and thighes. As in like maner, Garments, Beds and Couerings may be poyſond. To theſe venoms may be referred, ſuch as kill only by ſight, ſmel, or being but taſted only (without ſwallowing or letting downe) ſuddenly deſtroying a man, without any the leaſt lingering.

Poyſoning mens ſtirrops, bridles & ſaddles for horſes, garments, beds, &c.

All venomes or poyſons bring preſent death with them, ſo as there remains not any time of reſpite, for ſuccor to ſaue the poore mans life, but he dies. I vnderſtand, that ſuch poyſons are in frequent vſe among the Turkes, and ſuch other nations. Groſſer venoms or poiſons do differ from theſe, as being ſlower in performing their action; but in the end burne very ſtrongly, bite, eat, torment, & (by their lingring) beget the greater ſtrength & cruel violence.

Such ſpeeding poyſons are in daily vſe amongeſt the Turkes and other barbarous nations.

Now there is not onely a difference of efficacie, in poiſons of diuers kinds, but alſo there happens to them as great a varietie of reſpites, to hurt according to their conſtitution and temperature, by whom they are taken. For ſome feele the harme ſooner or later then other; ſome are ouerthrowne thereby, others eſcape. Becauſe many times it comes ſo to paſſe, that the poiſons power is mitigated & ouercome, by the very complexiō of him that hath receiued it, elſe, that it is ſo ſtrōg of it ſelf, as it needeth no other counterpoyſon to vanquiſh it. So falleth it out with them that dwell in peſtilent aires, & others that Diffrence in the poyſons, and difference in their times of working.

Of bodies peſtilentially infected.

are attainted with the plague: ſome of them being ſicke, chance to die ſuddenly, others later, and other (in the end) eſcape.

A very ridiculous affirmation.

If it be ſo, it ſeemes then altogether ridiculous to affirme, that it is poſſible to giue a poiſon, which (at a day prefixed, & at a certaine time of that day) ſhall cauſe the parties death, & that the condition of the poiſon is ſo to doe. To which errour I may well referre another, ſauouring of the ſame taſte, and which we haue long ſince ouerthrowne, to wit: That medicines take the beginning of their mutation or changing from our heate. Whence it enſueth, that being groſſely preſſed, they produce their effects the later. But if I ſhould conſent to them herein, yet notwithſtanding, they can neuer come to approue their affirmation, vnleſſe it be captiouſly. For if any man argue thus: This drugge diſcouereth his power later then this; therefore he will doe it at a certaine time. The argumentation is falſe, and Ariſtotle calleth it Elenchus non conſequens: Euen as if a man ſhould ſay, A Goat is a Beaſt, therfore a Goate is an Aſſe. For, To do a thing late, and to do a thing at a certaine time, are of diuers kindes, and differ from doing a thing in ſome time.

Galen in Parad. 1. Dec. 2.

A kind of ydle argumentatiõ.

A Goate is a beaſt, therefore a Goate is an Aſſe.

Heereby it appeareth, that theſe great Profeſſours haue no other eye, but onelie on the conditions of the poyſons, as in this poynt it is very euident, for we heare no diſtinction of bodies: but onely pretence of the poyſon, whereunto they only attribute the limitation of time, and not to any complexion in the parties. Obſeruation hath beene made, that poiſon hath beene giuen at a Feaſt or Banquet to diuers perſons, all in one houre, (when friends haue merrily met together, without ſuſpition of any ſuch villanie) whereof ſome dyed ſuddenly, others died within ſome few dayes after, and ſome felt no anguiſh at all, yet euery one receiued a like quantitie.

At a ſolemne Banquet in Italie made by Cæſar Borgia.

The like we ſee to happen daily in purgatiue medicines, which being giuen to diuers perſons (euen all alike in meaſure, and all alike in preparation) they worke vpon ſome bodies very ſuddenly, others more ſlowly, others very hardly, and vpon ſome nothing at all. Moreouer, the vacuitie of ſome men is with much eaſe, others with great difficultie, grieuouſly grinding or cutting, and frequent debility of the heart. What need is there then of alleadging many men, when vppon one and the ſame man, one and the ſame medicine cannot produce the ſame effects?

An example deriued from phyſicall purgatiues.

Seeing then, that according to the diuers and vnparaleld complexion, & conformation of the body, we ſee ſuch things to happen, for the moſt part; and beſides, that the iuſt temperature of euery particular man is no way to be comprehended: how then ſhall any one man dare to ſay, how long time naturall heate ſhall reſiſt or withſtand poiſon? Say I admitted, that ſome one man ſhould be ſo expert an empoiſoner, that he could weigh (in a certainty of iudgement) the power of his poiſon, euen as exquiſitely as he weigheth muske in the Ballance: yet notwithſtanding, I will neuer graunt, that he can as exactly limite poyſon, for the nature of him that is to receiue it: but he wil faile ſomewhat of the end, or of the time by him propoſed. For, Phyſicke it ſelfe is held to be a Science, grounded but vpon coniectures, concerning what is to be preſcribed for euery man, in the proper quantitie and qualitie of meeteſt remedies. For, no man knoweth how to write or ſpeake iuſtly or properly, as Galen ſaith in the third book of his Methods. And a little after: In the Arte of Phyſicke (ſaith he) there is not anie thing or remedie, but may bee named in his kinde: but that which cannot be ſpoken, written, nor entirely appointed or ordained, is the quantitie for euery one.

The complexion and temperature of all men is incomprehenſible, neither can poiſons worke in one and the ſame manner vpon them.

Phyſick a Science grounded but on coniecture.

Hee repeateth this ſame matter many times, and to the purpoſe enſuing, as enſtructing, that euery man hath his peculiar curing, and that the naturall propertie is vnſpeakeable and incomprehenſible of an exact Science. Vulgar Phyſitians call it Idioſyncraſis, the naturall propertie, as Galen ſaith. And becauſe all confeſſe, that it cãnot be comprehended; they attribute the true Art of Phyſicke to Aeſculapius & Apollo. For the principle, and foundation (as it were) of perfect, compleate, & infallible Phyſicke (which Galen calls; The true Arte of Medicine) is the particular knowledge of Naturals. Whereupon he makes this addition. If I knew how to acknowledge iuſtly, the nature of each one in particular: I ſhould verily thinke to be ſuch a one as Aeſculapius, and to know as much in my vnderſtanding. But becauſe it is not to be doone, I am determined to exerciſe my ſelfe

Galen in libr. vbi ſupra.

ſo

ſo much, to come ſo neere him as a man may, and to exhort others therein to follow mine example.

The Art of phyſicke is more coniecturall then certaine.

If Phyſicke then be coniecturall, and not certaine in the party that prepareth or appointeth remedies to euery body, & the iſſue is not to be ſeene, but finally by a long obſeruation and experience; who can perſwade himſelfe herein concerning poyſons? For, if in the Art of phyſicke, Experience is dangerous, as the wiſe & learned Hippocrates well aduiſeth vs: it is eaſie to conceiue, how vncertain the proofe of poyſons are, becauſe it is not lawfull to experiment their vertue, both without danger and puniſhment alſo, as wholſome medicines in diuerſitie of perſons.

Hippoc. in lib. 1. Aphor. 1.

Beaſts natures are very much differing from mens.

And whatſoeuer hath bin obſerued vpon brute Beaſts, as I formerly ſaide, is very vnapt for any accommodation to a man, becauſe the natures of men and beaſts are greatly differing, as namely by this proofe: that Stares feede ſafely vpon Hemlocke, and Quailes on Helleborus, which are both phyſicke and poyſon to vs. From theſe reaſons then we may collect finally, that the Arte (if it may bee tearmed an Arte) or coniectures of empoyſoners, is to be eſteemed very erronious, and of ſlender firmnes: conſidering, that one ſelfe ſame poyſon produceth his action, ſometimes quickly, and ſometimes ſlackly; and that not ſo much by any reaſon in it ſelfe; as by the nature and complection of the body, wideneſſe or narrowneſſe of the paſſages, ſtrength or weakneſſe of naturall heate; and the plenty or ſcarſity of ſemblable excrements, & diuers other meanes.

One ſelf-ſame poyſon differeth in his operation, and in his times.

For the power of poyſon remaineth ſometimes vaine and fruitleſſe, or mightily rebated, according to ſuch bodies, as haue their faculties of the ſoule ſtout and ſtrong, by reaſon of an excellent good temperature. And Galen thinketh, that the building and compoſition of the body, is the cauſe why Hemlocke killeth a man, & nouriſheth Stares. Whereto he addeth, the ſtrength and vigour of heate, diminiſhing and ſubtillizing, in regard he is perſwaded that it happeneth ſo, that colde poyſons better and ſooner doe declare their force, when they are giuen to hotte natures. Which may appeare a Paradoxe to many: but hauing bin made moſt euidently apparant by the ſaid author, I dare let the proofe paſſe vpon my credite, becauſe his experience is warrantable.

Bodies of ſtrong and good temperature reſiſt the power of poyſon,

As for the nature of excrements, they weaken the actions of poyſons, being repugnant to their qualities. For if there be any aboundance of phlegme in the entrailes, the power of hot poyſon will bee greatly rebated: and on the contrary, hot moyſture haſteneth the action of ſuch a poyſon. Likewiſe, ouer-copious choller ſtoppeth and breaketh the ſtupefactiue venome receiued, whereas phlegme fauoreth it. And all that theſe wicked empoyſoners do know, is nothing elſe, but what poyſons onely kill, by euident condition of their qualities, and that they hurt with all their ſubſtance. Such are they as kill by corrupting or corroſion, which muſt haue time to enforce their mallice (as Galen ſaieth) wheras other do weaken themſelues by their tardying. For they do all putrifie in time, & ſo much the more, as the place is moiſter and hotter.

Of the ſeuerall action of poiſons vpon phlegme and choller, by their ſcanting or abounding.

Such then as worke by putrifying, time doth augment their action: becauſe they encreaſe the corruption, and in regard they ceaſſe not to corrupt themſelues; reciprocally they corrupt and rot the body. From whence enſueth, that death is cauſed long time after: eſpecially ſuch poyſons as are of groſſe and earthy ſubſtance. Thus you may ſee, what empoyſoners haue learned by long obſeruation.

Of poyſons that haue their working by putrifaction.

What apprehenſion empoyſoners haue of them by four means in obſeruations.

Firſt, they know how to diſtinguiſh venomes, which kill by their inſigne and notorious qualities, from other that cauſe death by their whole ſubſtance.

Secondly, that they naturally bring to any man whatſoeuer, a moſt ſudden harme, and yet doe not diſcouer their vigour, but vpon longer time.

Thirdly, that (of both the two kindes) they kill eyther ſooner or later (without any reſpect to the body) acording as they haue the moſt, or the leaſt quantity.

Fourthly, they can deale in ſuch ſort, that all poyſons ſhall be tempered according to their owne pleaſure, and make them ſweeter or ſharper, becauſe they ſhould kill the ſooner or ſlower, which is without any ſecret or myracle of nature.

Application of purgatiue drugs in phyſicke.

We vſually exerciſe the ſame cunning, in purgatiue drugges, ſetting an edge on ſuch as are dull and ſlowe, and giue them as ſpurs to further purpoſe: and contrariwiſe, wee retaine ouer-haſty penetration

Cold poyſons work ſooneſt on hot natures.

in the other, by mingling with them, ſuch as are naturally more ſlacke & tardy. But that a man ſhould limit the effects of poiſons, to a certaine day, and to a point or moment named; we hold to bee meerely abſurd and ridiculous, becauſe the nature of each man cannot be perfectly knowne (as we haue before ſufficiently declared) from whence proceedeth the moſt vncertaine tearme or time of euery poyſon, for procuring the death of a man. For euery naturall action meeteth with diuers effects, according to the diuers diſpoſition, as well of that which worketh, as of that which ſuffereth. And this happeneth, not onely by reaſon of euident qualities, but alſo of hidden and proper: whence alſo it enſueth, that the thing which doth this man a great deale of harme, may bee as profitable to another.

Effects of poyſons impoſsible to be limitted to a moment of time.

Diuerſity of effects both in the agent and patient.

Pedro de Albano (whom ſome call the Reconciler, or Peace-maker) where hee explicateth this queſtion, propoundeth: That he may do it, who hauing certainly knowne the continuance of a mans life, by the meaſure and quantity of his radicall humour: may giue him a poyſon, that ſhall conſume in ten yeares ſpace. From hence he collecteth, ſome men may bee poyſoned, that droope and dry away daily (vulgarly tearmed in Italian, Herbati et Strigati) and ſo it may bee ordered ſometimes, that poyſoning may bee limitted. But that it is to be preſuppoſed by Aſtrologye, I hardly thinke to be euer diuined.

The iudgement and anſwer of Pedro de Albano vpon this point.

Fore-ſpoken or bewitched.

I confeſſe, that all ſuch as are ſeene to droope and decay by little and little, being empoyſoned, haue a long affliction: but yet there is no certaine time when thoſe men ſhall bee taken hence. Pliny ſpeaketh of no time knowne more certaine of death, then vſe of the Sea-Hare (a venomous fiſh) bringeth, where he ſaith: Such men as (in eating) feele poyſon, and by the firſt ſigne perceiue the poyſon: ſhall dye in as many houres after, as the Hare hath liued. Now, who ſhall diuine the age of the Hare, to the ende, that the appointed houre of death, may be fore-tolde thereby?

Plin. in lib. 14. cap. 7.

A mã of more then ordinary skill to haue ſuch knowledge.

And yet if I did admit them, that a man did know how many dayes the Hare hath liued: I can neuer grant (for al that) that all men ſhall dye at one and the ſame time; becauſe one and the ſelfe-ſame poiſon, worketh diuerſly, according to the diuerſity of mens bodies, as it hath beene more then ſufficiently proued. So that it had beene much more truely ſaide (as the ſame Pliny after addeth) The ſaide poyſon can haue no certainty of time, according as Licinius Macer alſo ſaith.

Poyſon can haue no certainty of time

CHAP. VII.

Of diuers erronious and idle opinions, conceiued in fantaſticke braines, and verily beleeued, as if they were ſound truths.

PEople erre in many matters, concerning diuers creatures (haply not inuented of them ſelues) but held by elder and precedent intimation, as little alſo apprehended or vnderſtoode by them; but, perhappes, meere fictions of their owne braines, vpon ſome appearing probable reaſons. As wiſe and woorthie Poets, who haue enſtructed bad and beſtiall men, to the imitation of vertue, by witty fables and and pleaſant inuentions, which euer hath bene, and ſtill is permitted as lawfull in them, euen as the like licence is allowed to Painters, as Horace teſtifieth, ſaying:

Reports deliuered by ancient people, do carry no mean credite among many.

Poets and Painters equall power containe,
To ſay or do, what beſt ſhall like their braine.

The ſaying of Horace.

As for Painters, we ſee that they figure an Angell in the forme of a Youth, cloathed with a garment of Starres, bare headed, and hauing wings like a Bird. And the Soule of man is repreſented like to a young Infant, ſtark naked. The diuell, to haue hornes, and a dreadfull taile: And yet neuertheleſſe, theſe are but ſpirites without bodies, and cannot carry the reſemblance of any viſible creature.

The variable ſhapes giuen by Painters to many things. Angell. Diuell.

In the like manner, Hell, which is but a place, is figured with a hideous gaping throate: Death, beeing but a priuation of life, is reſembled by the Anatomized bones of a dead man, carrying a Scithe in his hand. Loue, which is but a paſſion and accident, not ſubſiſting any way of it ſelfe; is painted and preſented like a naked childe, childe, and blind; wearing wings, a Bow, and a Quiuer furniſhed with Arrowes,

The Windes. The Winds, which are but a moued agitated Ayre; are figured with mens heads, hauing their Cheekes hugely ſwolne, euen as we ſee one ſounding of a Trumpet.

As for Aſtrologers, though they want paintings, whereby to enſtruct ignorant people: yet haue they demonſtrations likewiſe, and preſentation is made of the

The twelue ſignes in the Zodiack in ſeuerall figures. twelue Signes of the Zodiack (which are but certaine Starres) yet diſpoſed into diuers figures, as one of a Ramme, another of a Bull, the third of two twinne infants, &c. And ſo the images of heauen vvhich

The figures of heauen. are out of the Zodiacke; one in forme of a Beare, another of an Eagle, others in riuers, in an Harpie, Dogge, Dragon, &c. And next the Planets, which are but ſtars,

The Planets. as Saturne, Iupiter, Mars, Mercurie, and Venus; theſe beare the forme of perſonages, in diuers habites and countenances: but the Sun and Moone are otherwiſe ſhewne and diſtinguiſhed.

Painters alſo haue euermore denoted the figure of a Starre with fiue rayons

The Starres. or beames, thereby expreſſing theyr twinckling ſplendour: although all the Starres do not ſparkle in that manner; and well wee know beſide, that they are all round in figure, without points or corporeall beams. As for the Elements, they figure the fire (which is inuiſible) like vnto

The elements Fire, Ayre, Water, Earth. our artificiall fire, which is not much amiſſe to the purpoſe. The Ayre cannot be painted, no more then heauen, cleare and tranſparant bodyes; but yet they are repreſented by a blewe or azure colour. Water is figured by Waues, and the Earth in ſhape of a Globe, rounde as a Ball.

Creatures figured in fabulous maner The Salamander. The Dolphin. Of Creatures, they counterfeyte ſome fabulouſly: as the Salamander, which is no ſuch thing as it is painted; nor the Dolphine likewiſe, as it is preſented in Armes and Deuices; Nor the Flower de Luce, as it is commonly knowne to euery one. And the Heart, be it of a man, or of other creature, it is of no ſuch ſhape as Painters giue it.

The Pellicane is figured, vvith her

The Pellican. ſharpe Beake turned vpon hir breſt, which ſhe launceth therwith, to make hir blood yſſue forth, for the noriſhing of hir yong ones, euen to the price of her owne life, dying thereby: And yet we ſee and know that the Pellican hath her beak edgeleſſe, flat, and broad; iuſtly like in faſhion vnto the Apothecaries Spatule or Slice, as being no way able to wound her breaſt. Alſo, the Greeke worde [Pellican,] ſignifying an Axe or Coopers Adge or Ads, plainly declareth that her Beake is flat, & as it ſhould be.

Moreouer it is ſayde, that the Sire or Hee-Bird, beateth the young ones, euen as with blowes on the face, or (as wee vſe to ſay) boxes on the eare, vntill they are almoſt dead; and then the Dam woundeth her breaſt, to reuiue them with her blood: blowes commonly are giuen with flat, and not pointed things.

The Phoenix. The Phœnix, being painted burning her ſelfe in a fire, prepared purpoſely for her; is much more fabulous. But al theſe things are lawfully permitted to Painters and Poets (as we ſaide before) vpon ſome good reſpect and ſecret reaſon, needleſſe to bee reported heere; making mention onely but of certaine erronious opinions, which the vulgar holde for ſure and moſt certaine, and which are the more excuſable, becauſe many great Philoſophers and ancient Phyſitions, haue defended the like opinions.

1. Of the Viper.

In what manner the Viper is ſaide to engender by hir male. IT hath bin a very ancient opinion, that the Viper ioyneth with her male, by receyuing his head in at her mouth (throgh defect of other genitall partes) and that the female by the delight ſhe feeleth, locketh her teeth ſo faſt together, as thereby ſhe biteth off her males head, and ſo conceyueth. Afterwardes, when the time for deliuery commeth, the yong ones hauing no other yſſue, and (euen as it were) to reuenge the death of theyr Father: bite and teare the belly of their mother, wherby ſhe dyeth. Here is the reaſon why it is ſaide of a Poſthumus, of whome the mother dieth in deliuerance, He is like the Viper, that neuer ſeeth his father nor mother. This hath ſomtime ſerued as an Emblem with this deuice or motto, Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri neſeceris.

Words giuen of the poſthumus.

What thou wouldſt not haue done to thee, doe not thou to another.

All this is falſe, and fauored by many, but badly; that beeing well vnderſtoode which Ariſtotle hath ſaid. The Viper (ſaith he) is conceiued of Egges which ſhe hatcheth in her bellie, and become little Vipers: they come foorth all formed, being despoyled of the membrane or thinne skinne, which contained them within the wombe; and that is their secondine. But the later-most (mooued with impatience) bite and teare that membrane, to issue forth the more hastily. For the damme or mother bringeth aboue twenty, and yet deliuereth but one daily; which maketh the hinmost impatient, and constraineth them angerly to gnawe the tunicle or membrane; but neither the mothers sides or belly, as is vainely imagined.

No Serpent yeeldeth her yong liuing, but the Viper.

Many may be deceiued also, concerning the originall and etymologie of the word, as if Vipera were to say, Quasi vi pariens: whereas it is (indeed) of Vivum pariens. For there is not any Serpent, that produceth her broode or young aliue, or liuing, but the Viper. Others lay egges, which (out of the belly) are conuerted into Serpents.

2. Of the Beauer, called Castor also.

The naturall vnderstanding of the Beauer.

IT is vulgarly helde, that this beast teareth away his testicles with his owne teeth, when he perceiueth himselfe to be pursued by Hunts-men: hauing a kind of knowledge naturally, that they seeke him only for them. Whereupon some thinke, that this name of Castor was giuen him: because he geldeth himselfe, and so (by consequent) becometh chaste, Dioſc. li. 4. c. 23.

Which is meerely false, for, as Dioscorides wrote long since; hee can by no meanes reach or touch his stones. Those are onely two tumours, which (by yeares) comes to him, & are as impostums, ful of fatte matter or suppouration, called Castoriam, which also hee can not teare away. And he is not tearmed Castor, of gelding, or of chastitie; but of the Greeke word Gaster, which signifieth a Belly, because he is full paunched, and this is nothing else, but by changing the letter G into C. Read hereupon the most learned History of M. Rondeletius, of Fishes, in the last chapter of the second Tome.

Rondelet. de pisc. tom. 2. cap. vlt.

3. Of the Salamander.

GReat errour is there also, concerning the true nature of this creature, which is said to liue in the fire, and hath power to extinguish it. From which coniecture, was taken the deuice of great King Frances, the first of that name (father of Arts and Sciences) Nutrisco, & extingo: I feed and extinguish.

Dioſc. lib. 2. ca. 5

Dioscorides hath very learnedly deliuered the contrary, and Galen also, saying: That the Salamander can resist the fire for some time; but it burneth, by tarrying any long while therein. Neuertheless, it were better to hold with Aristotle, in saying; That the Salamander is not burned in the fire, but walkes aloft vpon it, extincting both the flame and coales.

Galen in lib. 3 de Temper.

Ariſt. in hiſtor. Anim. l. 5. ca 19

Painters haue failed in true forme of the Salamander.

Experience, which is more strong then all authorities of the wisest in the world, teacheth vs, that this is a matter no way to be credited. As for the figure of the Salamander, the portraiture thereof also is meerely fabulous, and contriued by Painters, who haue thrust such an imagination vpon it; making shew also of it, to be a farre greater Beast then it is. It is like to the smaller sort of Lizzards, which frequent the walles in Languedoc, named Langroles, and in Daulphine Larmuses. But the Salamander is somwhat greater, marked with many spots. His body is full of a white moysture, and thicke like Milke, which issueth foorth by the pores of the skinne, pressing it neuer so little. Which milke or moisture is so colde, that the Salamander may (for some time) withstand the fire, but yet not long, without burning, roasting and dying, as we haue many times made good triall of. Farre is it from quenching the fire, or much lesse liuing in it: like as the Chameleon liueth by the ayre; and I iudge both alike in truth: albeit I neuer saw any Chameleon aliue to make proofe of.

Like Newtes, Askes and little Lizards haunting olde and ill-kept houses.

A description of the Salamanders resemblance.

4. Of the Shee-Beare.

IT is said also, that she produceth a piece of flesh, not hauing the forme of any creature: and afterward shee licketh it in such manner, that thereby onely shee giueth it both fashion and forme. This is but a kinde of hyperbolicall speaking, for to say truely, the yong one is very vnsightly after the birth, being all couered with foame or froth, and in such a quantity, as it seemeth indeede but a lumpe of flesh, without any distinction of parts. The Dam or Mother cleanseth it immediately thereof, by licking al the filth away; whereby by (not long after) it appeareth in the true ſhape of a creature. So may we ſee a Whelpe (or a yong Lambe newly yeaned) much muddied and beſmeared at the firſt, as it is hardly knowne at the prime view: but when the Damme hath doone her louing and naturall Office, then all the parts are plainly ſeene and diſtinguiſhed.

The Beare is brought forth a perfect creature at the first, although not so readily distinguished, as afterward.

CHAP. VIII.

A vulgar Queſtion: What Language a child ſhall ſpeake, that neuer heard any ſpeech. That a man or woman borne dumb, is neceſſarily deafe. As alſo, hee that is Nurſt among dumbe people; And not, on the contrary, that one dumbe by Nature, ſhould be deafe: And whence it enſueth, that a man is ſo tardie, in knowing howe to ſpeake.

The opinion of the vulgar people.

VVlgar people beleeue, and hold it as a thing moſt aſſured, that a man ſhoulde naturally ſpeake the Language of Adam, if he neuer learned any other ſpeech from his infancie; euen as if hee had bene nurſſed by a dumbe Woman, among dumbe people, or in a Deſert vtterly vninhabited of people, where neuer any ſpeech had beene heard.

Herodot in l. 2. Proofe made by a King of Egypt, to know which was the moſt ancient Language of all other.

Herodotus declareth in his ſecond book, that Pſammeticus, a King of the Ægyptians, was deſirous (on a time) to make proofe heereof, to the end, that he might iudge thereby, what was the moſt auncient and naturall Language, of all them that were ſpoken in the world. He cauſed two Children to bee nurſed in a Forreſt, where neuer any voyce of man was, or could be heard. After two yeeres were paſt, and they being brought before the King, ſometimes they could pronounce this Word Bec, which in the Phrygian tongue, ſignifieth Bread. Whereuppon ſome gathered, that the Phrygian was the firſt language of man.

The opinion of S. Auguſtin Aug. in Geneſ. lib. 9.

But as Saint Auguſtine ſayeth, theſe children might haue learned the Word Bec (and ſo retained it) of Goats, among which they were nouriſhed. For, as hee ſheweth in his worke of the quantitie of the Soule; all manner of ſpeaking is by hearing, and by imitation. Notwithſtanding, in his Booke of the Cittie of God, hee thinketh and beleeueth, that before the confuſion of Tongues (which happened at the building of the Tower of Babell) the Hebrew Language was naturally to all. As if words were an action proceeding from naturall inſtinct, or the ſimple and proper motion of the ſoule: euen as if they had power in themſelues (and of themſelues, with ſome naturall inclinations) to bring forth in euidence and effect ſpeech, without any enſtructing. Such knowledge is to ſucke, to cry, mourne, laugh, mouing hands and feet, & when ſtrength ſerueth, to go.

Aug in Ciuitat. Dei. l. 16. ca. 11

A refutation of the latter words of S. Auguſtine.

The Goate, Lambe, Chicken, and other ſuch like creatures, ſo ſoone as they are bred and brought forth, bring themſelues to the teates, knowing naturally, that there is their nouriſhment. Beeing grown greater, they make choiſe (among a thouſand diuers plants) ſuch as beſt digeſt and agree with their complexion. They bleate and cackle, euen from theyr production, which anſwereth to the cries of children: and this is done without teaching, or any enſtruction, or ſo much as example or imitation.

Such things as are done by inſtinct of nature onely.

Man hath the like actions and repreſentations, euen as other creatures, ſimply naturall of his owne, and without any apprentiſhip. But the worde or Speech, which is a voyce ſignificatiue, expreſſing the conceptions of a reaſonable Soule: they proceede onely and wholly from a Science or Diſcipline, which is comprehended by the means of hearing. So that it is impoſſible, that any one being deafe, from his birth, and perſeuering in the ſame deafeneſſe, ſhould euer knowe how to ſpeake, although that his tongue, and other parts thereto appointed, are moſt exquiſitely compoſed and ordayned, as none more formally can be any way deſired.

That wordes or ſpeaking proceedeth of a ſcience or diſcipline.

What then ſhall wee ſay of him that neuer heard any thing? Speech is a Diſcipline, no leſſe then that of Muſick: both the one and the other, are apprehended by hearing. From whence it commeth, that a childe (in what place ſoeuer it is nouriſhed and brought vp) apprehendeth and retaineth the ſame vulgar Language (which ſome tearme Vernacle or Maternall) whatſoeuer it be, either Hebrew, Greeke, Latine or Barbariſme; one is as eaſie to him as another. For, in hauing nothing by naturall impreſſion, he is indifferent to all: like as the colour of white receiueth all other tinctures, and ſome kinde of water all ſauours; and ſo in the like compariſons.

That Adam had neuer ſpoken of himſelfe, or naturally.

Adam could neuer haue ſpoken any naturall language of his owne, no more then we: but God inſpired him with an vnderſtanding ſoule, capable of ſuch a language as pleaſed him: As he did likewiſe to Eue; and their firſt children learned to ſpeake by them, euen as ours now do of vs.

Men naturally more enclined to euill then good.

Heere wee are to know, that from the corruption of our firſt Parents tranſgreſſion, we haue and hold al our naturall conditions and inclinations, and namely, the very greateſt imperfection that can be, of enclining more vnto euill then good, more truely tearmed Original ſinne. But as concerning ſpeech or ſpeaking, we haue it not but by aptitude & hability, euen as all other diſciplines or enſtructions.

What is truly naturall of the Soule.

That which is truely naturall of our ſoule, is enchaſed or carractred into a body of ſuch quality, temperature and complection, as man ought to haue for his perfection. For the fonde niceneſſe of birth, is like the infant in his firſt yeare, vnapt to reaſon, by the imperfection of his body, and likewiſe as they, who by accident of ſickneſſe, or paſſion of minde (as Loue and idle diſturbances) become weakly braind, fooliſh, ſottiſh, lunaticke, and mad. In all which imperfections, the ſoule is euermore her owne, remaining ſtill in her integrity: and yet (neuertheleſſe) cannot exerciſe her reaſon, by not hauing the body at her command.

The vnaptnes of children in their firſt yeares, & the effects enſuing by paſsions of the minde,

The opinion of Ariſtotle, that the ſoule hath nothing of it ſelfe, as concerning Sciences.

Ariſtotle enſtructeth (to ſingular good purpoſe) That our ſoule is ignorant of all things, and like vnto a new Table, neatly poliſhed and prepared, wherein nothing hath bene depicted or engrauen, when it was infuſed into the body of man, but ſent downe from Heauen as we beleeue. Shee hath nothing but ſimplicity, ſincerity, purity, facility and conueniencie, with inclination and aptitude to euery Arte and Science, and to all knowledge of things diuine and humane (which is the true definition of Philoſophy) Alwayes reſerued and excepted, thoſe faculties and actions, neceſſarily required in a liuing ſoule, as thoſe in Beaſts; which our ſoule exerciſeth in the body from the very beginning, and before the infant is borne, without doctrine or diſcipline (as already hath beene related.

The true definition of philoſophy concerning the Soule.

Doctrine is not requiſite in her, but for Artes and Sciences, hauing nothing in her, whatſoeuer diuine Plato ſayeth to the contrary, affirming; That the reaſonable ſoule hath knowledge of all things, when it commeth into the body: but beeing plunged and ſubmerged in the great humidity of the body, it forgetteth all. Like to him that becommeth obliuious, or (as they ſay in Greek) ſicke of a Lethargye, in regard of the Phlegmaticke humour which drowneth his braine. But afterward, in ſuch meaſure, as the body loſeth this great humidity, and drieth it ſelfe by little and little: the Soule alſo recouereth it ſelfe by paucity of degrees, and comprehendeth all things demonſtrated and ſhewne vnto her, as in remembring and acknowledging her ſelfe, and not in learning any nouelties.

The opinion of Plato, quite contrary to that of Atiſtotle, concerning the capacity of the ſoule.

This was the opinion of good olde Plato, which maketh well for ſuch as affirme, that wee haue ſome certainty of Language, which came from our firſt Parents, Adam and Eue: and that wee ſhould (in time) ſpeake the very ſame, if the other, which wee ordinarily heare in our houſes, did not preoccupate it. But in truth, our ſoule neyther knoweth, or holdeth (of it ſelfe) any Language, nor is affected or giuen to any one in particular: but enclineth equally, and is indifferent to all tongues, and in ſo good maner, as one hindereth not another, which (perhaps) a naturall tongue would, if it had any at all. At leaſtwiſe, ſome ſlippes or branches would be remembred thereof, as in ſuch, that could not altogether forget the accents, or the prolations, with ſome certaine words and phraſes of their mother-tongue.

A naturall Language from our firſt Parents Adam & Eue.

That our ſoul knoweth not any manner of language naturally.

The reaſonable ſoule then, hauing not any language of it ſelfe, is very proper and apt to comprehend, and well to expreſſe by ſound and entire inſtruments,

The happy memory of King Mithridates.

ments, all diuerſity of tongues. As it is recorded of King Mithridates, to haue ſo happy a memory; that he could well and properly ſpeake two and twenty diuers Languages.

That the voice is onely of nature, and not of words or ſpeech.

By nature, we haue no more ſimply then a voyce, common to all other creatures that breathe, and different onely in them, by and according to their kindes. For euery animall hath a proper voyce, which groſſely ſignifieth his affections or paſſions: Which is no way knowne how to be expreſſed (ſaith Ammonius vpon Ariſtotle) or repreſented by letters or ſyllables, no more then the ſundry murmures of the Sea, and of the Windes. Euen ſo, man in his prime or firſt moneths, when hee liueth ſimply as a beaſt, hath nothing but a voice onely, before he learnes to ſpeake: wherof being depriued, he is ſaid to be dumb, although he hath not loſt his voyce. Wherof Ariſtotle ſpeaketh very notably in his Problems: That Man onely is dumbe.

Euery creature hath properly a voice.

Ariſt. Probl. 57. lib. 11.

What it is to ſpeake, how it is formed, and to what ende.

Speech then is nothing elſe, but to faſhion and articulate the voice naturall, by addition of a vocall conſonance, in the compoſing and enterlacing, for the expreſſing of ſignificant words, which explicate, and (as a man may ſay) do infantize and produce the conceptions of mã: which are infinitely more diuers, and in farre greater number, then thoſe of other Creatures, exempted of reaſon and diſcourſe. And therefore it greatly behoooueth, that a man ſhould know extraordinarily, how to diuerſifie his voice, for anſwering to that which the great capacity of his ſpirit containeth.

How an infant beginneth firſt to practiſe & attaine to ſpeech.

An infant collecteth and aſſembleth diuers conceptions in his vnderſtanding, and the words which he heareth (accompanied with ſome actions) ſtriue to make ſignification of all: which he comprehendeth by little and little, and then retaineth by frequent reitteration. Afterward, whẽ his tongue is growne more firme and able; hee ſtriueth to repreſent that which he hath retained, by imperfect fumbling, and at the ende of a little long apprentiſhip, ſpeaketh like to a young Parrot, after a long time ſpent in liſtening. For otherwiſe, as well the one as the other, would haue but his branches or ſlippes, which is the naturall voyce, without any other ſignification; then of certaine affections or paſſions, as we haue already ſaid.

Lets now obſerue that which Ariſtotle ſaith, in his Hiſtorie of Creatures. Thoſe creatures which ſpeake, haue voyce alſo: but all ſuch as haue voyce, ſpeake not. For, ſuch as are deaffe by nature, are alſo dumb: whereby they may yet render a voyce, but not ſpeake one word. And in his Booke of the Sences, and their organs, where he maketh a compariſon of ſuch as are blind and deafe borne, he ſaith, Deafe and dumbe are as accidents, which neceſſarily follow one another. Alſo Alexander Aphrodiſeus produceth in his Problemes, that beeing demaunded, why men borne deafe, ſhould be dumbe likewiſe; anſwereth familiarly, They can neuer ſpeake that which they neuer heard.

Difference betweene the voyce and ſpeech. Ariſt in 4. lib. Anim. in cap. 9.

cap. 1.

Alex. Aphrod. in lib. Probl. 133.

For better confirmation of this matter, we muſt neceſſarily adde that which Ariſtotle writeth in the ſame place before alledged, concerning the Voyce, and the ſinging of Birdes, which is in part ſimply naturall, and in part of ſome intelligence and learning as his owne amongſt them. For, I will not heere inferre, that ſome man may teach a Bird, to tune another Song beſide her owne: and the enſtruction of the dammes (both he and ſhe) to their yong ones. Whereby we may eaſily comprehend, that if Birds haue one naturall ſong (which is the voyce common to all their kinde) and another taught or apprehended in time of continuing with their owne: that, they could not ſo keepe and enioy, as if they had bin immediatly ſeperated, and taken out of the neaſt. Euen ſo in like manner, an infant to be frequented with all people that ſpeake, and (by their meere conuerſation) inſtructed to ſpeake; would elſe haue none other but his owne naturall voyce, as at the inſtant of his birth, and bringing into the world.

That the ſinging of Birds is in part by apprehenſion or learning.

A child without teaching to ſpeake, could haue but his naturall voyce.

The voice (ſaith Ariſtotle) diſplaieth, what difference is ſaide to be among the languages of Beaſts & Birds, euen among them of one and the ſame kinde, in diuers places. Let the Partridge in ſundry Countries ſerue for example, hauing diuers notes; for ſome chucke or iouke, and others clacker or chirpe. And there are diuers ſmaller Birds, which chaunt no ſuch notes as their Dams doe; but being taken out of their Neſts, are quite chãged from paternall education: and ſo learne the tunes of other enſtructed Birds, or of mens voices: inuring themſelues to their notes, cuſtomes and manners. Sometime it hath beene obſerued in a Nightingale, that taught taught her Iargon to her young ones, and ſo gaue them inuitation to diuers ſongs. For, ſpeech cannot come of nature, as the voyce doth: but is to be attained by ſtudy and diſcipline. Thus you may perceiue alſo, why men make vſe of diuers Languages, albeit they are like to one another in voice, &c.

Ariſt in lib. 4. de Anim. cap. 7.

That Birds do learne diuers notes & tunes one of another, beſides their owne.

The concluſion, that men borne dumb, are deafe alſo

Me-thinks this ſhould ſeeme proofe enough, that ſpeech is a thing properly learned by the meanes of hearing, from whence it enſueth ineuitably, that ſuch as are deaffe borne, & they that neuer heard any ſpeech (without being deaffe) are dumbe by conſequent, except (by ſucceſſion of time) they doe enioy hearing, and their eares be vnſtopt; as we haue diuers times obſerued, and made practiſe of, by children that haue not ſpoken before ſeauen or eight yeares.

What difference there is betweene the ſpeech of Infants & that of Birds.

Now I come (in paſſing along) to touch a point not impertinent to our purpoſe, to wit: What difference there is in the ſpeech, which an Infant learneth of himſelfe, from that of a Parrot, a Starling, a Pye, a Larke, a Linnet, a Thruſh, a Rauen, a Iaye, and ſuch like, as they haue learned. Very certaine it is, that as their ſoules are different, euen ſo is their Language: in regard that a childe vnderſtandeth what he ſpeaketh, and would ſpeake ſo and ſo, or better if hee could, to explicate and make his conceptions vnderſtood: whereas on the contrary, a Bird hath not any intelligence, of the ſignification of whatſoeuer it pratleth. So that, if a Bird demaund, or anſwere ſometime (prouing to purpoſe) it is by hap or aduenture, and not ordinary; except it bee ſuggeſted, remembred, or elſe expreſſely made to ſpeake it.

Whatſoeuer Birds practiſe, is quite without any intelligence.

Moreouer, a Bird will alwaies adde ſome croſſe thwarting word or other, which argueth ſufficiently, that it hath not any intelligence at all. Whereupon it hath bin commonly ſaide, that whoſoeuer ſpeaketh, and knoweth not what he ſpeaketh, prateth like a Parrot. So a ſimple man may learne ſome folly, or vnfitting words, in the Germaine, Poliſh, or any other vnknowne tongue to him, and ignorantly vſe it as a ſalutation, and be derided for his labour: like others, that thinking to bee reputed learned, will vſe many Latine ſentences and phraſes, quite contrary to their owne meaning in the ſpeaking.

The ſecond Argument: whether the dumbe man by birth, is alſo deafe by conſequent.

It remaineth now to know, ſeeing the naturall dumbe man is deaffe by conſequent: if likewiſe the man dumbe by nature (by reaſon of ſome defect in his tongue, or in other parts requiſite for ſpeaking) bee alſo deaffe conſequently? Lactantius Firmianus, in his Booke of the workes of God, would haue it to bee ſo: but being too groſſe an Anatomiſt (as is eaſily comprehended by his reaſons) hee is not in this point to be credited. Alexander Aphrodiſeus, in the place before alledged, ſeemeth to ſay no: but he buildeth vpon no good foundation, when he ſaith; That there is a paire of nerues, which come from the Braine, one portion whereof goeth to the tongue, and the other to the eares. And that by this meanes, the affections of the toong and of the eares, doe eaſily communicate thẽſelues together. Alſo, foraſmuch as that one of the ſaid portions may bee offended and corrupted, without the other: it hapneth alſo, that a man may become deaffe by ſome diſeaſe, and yet (on the contrary) not be dumbe.

Lactan. in Oper. Dei li. 2. cap 7.

Alex. Aphrod. in lib. Probl. 133.

Diuers both ancient and moderne writers deceiued in this point.

But his ſuppoſition holdeth no place in this point, no more then the reaſons of ſome moderne men; following Pedro de Albano, tearmed the Peace-maker, ſaying: That the ſixt likeneſſe in the Nerues of the Braine, which mooueth the tongue, is firmely allied to the fift likeneſſe, which ſerueth for hearing. For, as I will neuer grant, that defect of ſpeech followeth deafeneſſe, by any conſent or ſimpathy of the toong with the eares, but only through want of enſtruction, which ſhould be receiued by the eares: ſo can I not conſent, that by the vice or incongruity of thoſe parts dedicated to ſpeaking, hearing ſhould any way be offended.

An eſpeciall note well worth the obſeruing.

In the acte alſo there is no likelyhood or coherẽce, conſidering that thoſe parts worke not, eyther for the integrity, nor for the conſtruction of the eares, & leſſe for the enſtruction of hearing, who (for her ſelfe) hath no neede of any teaching, no more then the ſight, or any of the exteriour ſences. And as for them, they require nothing elſe, but to be free and open, without any impeachment or hinderance, and that their obiect ſhould bee neere, within a certaine diſtance. Why then, we ſee and heare naturally, without any doctrine or diſcipline. Seeing then, that hearing neyther taketh or apprehendeth any thing of the verball inſtruments, nor nor of words themselues (as concerning her owne simple action to heare) he that is dumbe from his birth, by the imperfection of his tongue, shall not be deafe in that respect: no more, then as if from a braue discoursing man, the toong should bee torne out of his head. And it hath bene commonly obserued, that such as haue their tongues cut or slit, haue heard neuer a iot the lesse in that regard, neither found any defect in their hearing.

What the exterior ſences do neceſſarily require.

Hearing apprehendeth nothing of the verbal instruments, nor of words.

If it be true then, that the instruments of speech, conferre not nor communicate particularly with the eares, and that speaking worketh nothing with hearing, as (on the contrary) hearing doth, and is necessarie for speech; it ensueth plainely, that the dumbe by nature, shall neuer heare in that respect (supposing, that the organ of the eare or hearing, is no way therein interessed. And that the deafe by byrth, must be dumbe necessarily: although in his tongue, and those other parts, requisite for speech, there is not any defect at all. Obserue then I pray ye, that in all this purpose, I speake of birth and of Nature, indifferently, to signifie the deafe or dumbe from the beginning. And I name the dumbe from byrth, not he that cannot speake (for so wee should bee all dumbe) but hee that is not any way apte to speake.

The Authors caueate, beecause he wo'd not be misunderstood.

Let vs come now to the third point. From whence it proceedeth, that a man hauing so prompt and able a spirite, that hee comprehendeth all thinges in small compasse of time; is yet (notwithstanding) so slow and tardie, in knowing howe to speak, and articulate his voice. Whereas on the contrarie, beasts & other creatures, immediately, or soone after theyr production, haue their voice absolute & perfect, euen as well and fully, as euer they shall haue.

The third argument. From whence it ensueth, that man is at first so tardie of speech.

Aristotle in his Problemes, maketh answer heereto, saying; The voyce of man hath great diuersities in it; other creatures expresse no Letters at all, or very fewe, (as two or three onely) and without Consonants, which, ioyned with Vowels, make the worde. Speech (saith he) is not soly and simply of the voice, but is perfected and accomplished of the affection or condition of the voyce, with signification; and the affections of the voice, they are the letters. Children therefore, before they know how, or can pronounce

Arist. in lib. 11. Prob. 58. & 60

In the voice of beasts, are few or no letters at all, letters, expresse their passions (no otherwise then as beasts do) by a natural voice and no way taught or enstructed, which is common to all infants, of any country whatsoeuer. But yet speech is different in Towne and Towne, nay, in one and the same Towne or Citty, by reason of the voice artificially distinguished, thorough the great diuersity of letters coupled, and interlaced of infinite kinds; whereof proceedeth diuers words, signifying an infinity of things. Seeing then, that there are so many manners or fashions of speaking, and that (of fiue or six letters) may bee made fifty seuerall words, and al differing the one from the other: wee may easilie thereby vnderstand, why an infant formeth his voice so late, in regard of beasts; who haue their voices meerely simple, & (as Alexander Aphrodiseus sayth) most naturall of all creatures.

A childes speech hath many diuersities and difficulties in it.

Difference of speech almost in euery Citie and Towne.

Concerning the voyce of beasts. Alex. Aphrod. l. 11. Prob. 1 41

For, whatsoeuer is extreamly diuers, & must be diuersified by many differēces; cannot bee attained in any short space of time. Be it in regard of the soul, which apprehendeth the science of speaking; or be it in the toong, which ought to expres it, & requireth time also, both to break and enable the words in their vttering, as we vse to say of the hand, for instruments of Musick. Wherupon he that is dumb, beginneth at the first to mumble and snaffle in the mouth, beeing not able to make a sound of al the Lettets, nor to pronounce words with any hability; onely by reason of the tongues softnes, whereas her rudenesse requireth a new labour.

Things of extreme diuersitie craue time for their learning.

There is another doubt vpon the same purpose, which is much more vneasie to explicate, & Aristotle propoundeth it in his Problemes. From whence it cometh, that some infants begin to speak before due age; to whom commonly the words are formed, and after they haue wel expressed som words, become dumb again, and return to the first condition, vntil the ordinary terme and time of speaking? Many haue held this to be prodigious, & especially, when it is told them, that some haue spokē at the very point of their birth. Questionles, it is very rare, and hardly to be credited: and yet it may well happen by naturall reason, as thus. An infant, at the same instant it heareth, it vnderstandeth, & then it may speake. But ordinarily, hearing goeth far before vnderstāding, & vnderstanding likewise precedeth

Arist. in lib. 11. Prob. 27.

What is the reason, that some infants speake before their time, & afterward become dumbe ſpeaking: the inſtrument for ſpeech and words, is not (as yet) of ſuch temperature as is conuenient for explicating thoſe things which the ſpirit hath conceiued.

Of ſuch infants as ſooneſt practiſe to ſpeake, and yet faile ther-of afterwards.

On the contrary, ſome ſpeake much ſooner then they knowe how to vnderſtand (as we haue already ſaide of Parrats and other Birds that prattle) counterfeyting ſuch words as they heare: vntill time conuenient for them both, that is to ſay, ability to vnderſtand and ſpeake. Such children then, to whom the obiectes of hearing make much ſooner impreſſion in the ſoule, then the inſtrument of Speech knowes how to perfect: it happeneth to them ſometimes, that after they haue vnderſtood diuers things, ſodainly they pronounce them. And eſpecially after theyr ſleepe, when the ſpirits haue made themſelues more copious; they haue thē more ſtrength and impetuous vigour, to moue the tongue in diſtincter manner. But this endureth not, neither can be of any long continuance; but the infant will returne to his firſt dumbneſſe againe.

An apt compariſon of ſome conditions in our ſelues, anſwerable to childrens imperfections.

In like manner, ſometimes wee ſhall finde our ſelues ſo diſpoſed as (vvithout thinking thereon) words and ſentences will meerely flow in our mouths: whereof againe (at other times) we ſhall be ſo delayed and hindred, as wee can ſcarſely, or with any eaſie poſſibility, expreſſe things well knowne and familiar vnto vs. Euen ſo it may come to paſſe, that an infant ſhall ſpeak ſomething, and afterward his tongue returning to the firſt ordinarie condition: he becommeth dumbe, vntill the vttermoſt time of his perfection and ſtrength.

Of children becomming dumbe by deafeneſſe.

It is a contrary caſe, in an infant that becommeth dumbe by deafeneſſe, after he hath ſpoken ſome gibbridge or prittle prattle, yea ſpoken intelligibly; as we haue heard credibly reported, concerning all the male children of M. Anthony Butin (a famous Apothecary in Toloſſa, dwelling at the ſigne of the three Kings) frō which his daughters were exempted. They all ſpake, till about the age of foure years, & afterward became deafe in ſuch ſorte, as they could not heare any noyſe; and ſo (by little and little) ceaſed to ſpeake. This hapned, in regard that their hearing continuing no longer, they did eaſilie forget the little Language, which they had learned in their firſt yeares. As an infant (indeed) is very obliuious, by reaſon of his great humidity: and particularly the ſaide Butines children, who were verie rheumaticke. And ſo hauing no longer means of continuance, to apprehend and ſpeake by hearing, they became dumbe. As any one, who hath learned ſome few French or Dutch words, through want of continuing conference in thoſe Languages, forgets the little he had before. Or hee that diſcontinueth his Grammer, or ſom other Science, or playing on Inſtruments of Muſicke, eaſily forgetteth all by want of vſe.

Men learning Languages, may ſoone loſe them by want of vſe.

Theſe and ſuch like accidents hapning dayly, confirme our firſt propoſition, in fauour whereof, we haue thus largely diſcourſed. For, if one may become dumb, by reaſon of deafeneſſe, which happeneth by accident, & after he could ſpeak: who will make any doubt at all, but that the deafe by birth, muſt needes be ineuitably dumbe?

Deaf by birth, is ineuitably dumbe.

A rare example of dumbneſſe.

I will adde heereto a very notable accident, which maketh ſome-what to this purpoſe: of ſome, that by a Wounde or hurt, or ſome ſickeneſſe beſide of the braine: haue wholly loſt remembrance of all things, yea euen of ſpeech, which they learned againe by little and little, like as children do, hauing hearing at their command, and the inſtruments of ſpeech no way engaged. Graue men, and woorthie of faith, doe teſtifie, to haue ſeene ſome wounded in the head, from one ſide to the other, and euen in the eye (wherof M. Rondeletius relateth an Hiſtory in his practiſe, and the appendix to the 21. Chapter) who forgot ſo much as theyr owne Names, and were faine to bee taught all things, euen like yong children. So came they wholly to the firſt condition of an infant from birth: except vulgar ſpeech, which yet ſome of them retained. But other impreſſions of their tongues became eſtranged, concerning Artes and Sciences learned before, and thinges which they had formerly both ſeene and knowne; all quite defaced out of their ſoules, by the inundation and ruine of the harme.

Of ſuch as haue forgot all things, and their owne very names.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdome of Ireland: The Antiquity, Originall, and first Inhabitation thereof, according to the confirmation of the best approued Authors.

IN the yeare of the world 1525. the holy Patriarch Noah, began to admonish the people, of vengeance to follow, for their wicked liues and detestable sinnes; and hee prepared to builde the Arke, as thereby foreshewing to his kinsfolke and friends, the vniuersall Flood or Deluge that was to ensue, and wherewith the whole face of the earth should be couered within few yeares, except amendment grew from them in short time; all which he did before the Flood, one hundred and fiue and twenty years. But when euery man seemed to neglect his worthie admonitions; a Neece to Noah, who was named Cesara, hearing this dreadful prophesie of her Vnckle, and doubting least it would come to passe indeed, determined (with certaine friends of hers) to seek their fortune in some forraigne Region. Perswading her selfe, that if she could find a Countrey neuer inhabited, and (consequently) vnspotted with sin: the generall sentence of Gods wrath would not there take effect.

The warning giuen by Noah of the worlds vniuersali destruction by water.

Cesara, who was the neece to Noah.

Hereupon, rigging a Nauy, shee committed her selfe to the seas, sayling foorth still, til at length she arriued in Ireland, with three men only, and fifty women; hauing lost the residue of her company, by misfortune of sundry shipwrackes, sustayned in that her long and troublesome voyage. The names of the men were these, Bithi, Laigria, and Fintan. The coast where shee first set foote on land, and where also she lyeth buried, was cald Nauiculare Littus, The Shipping riuage or shore. The Stones, wherein the memory heereof was preserued from violence of the Waters, haue beene seene of some, as they themselues haue reported, but how truely I haue not to say.

Within forty dayes after her comming on Land there, the Vniuersall Floude came, and ouer-flowed all that coast, as well as the other parts of the worlde. But whereas this tale bewrayeth it selfe (too manifestly) to bee an vntrueth, if time and other circumstances be thorowly examined; I will stand no longer about the proofe or disproofe thereof. Onely this is sufficient (I thinke) to bring it out of credite, to consider: that the Art of Nauigation or sayling, was vnknowne to the world, before the vniuersall Deluge, and no part inhabited, except the continent of Syria, and thereabout.

This tale can carry no likelyhood of any truth in it.

Rab. Isaac in Gen. 5.

But to let passe such a forged fable, with the record thereof engraued in a Stone, (a deuice borrowed, as some think, from Iosephus;) it shall bee sufficient for the glory of the Irish nation in their Antiquity, to graunt, that Ireland was discouered and peopled by some of Noahs kindred, euen as the first Islands of the Worlde (if they wil needs haue it so, as the likelihood is great) according to ỳ which is set forth in their histories. When about 300. years after the generall floode, immediately vpon the confusion of Tongues; Iaphet and his posteritie (imboldened by Noahs example) aduentured by ship, to commit themselues to passe the seas, and to search out the vnknowne corners of the world, and so finding out diuers Isles in the west parts of the world.

Bartolenus or Bastolenus. Clem. lib. 1. Cambreid. li. 3

There was (say they) in that retinue, one of the same progeny named Bartolenus, or Bastolenus, who, encouraged with the late attempt and successe of Nimrod, kinseman to Ninus (then newly intruded vpon the Monarchy of Assyria) searched so farre west: intending to attaine to some gouernement, where he might rule without any partner in authoritie; till at the length, Fortune brought him and his people vpon the coast of Ireland. Heere hee settled himselfe with his three sonnes Languina, Salanus and Ruthurgus, right actiue and stout Gentlemen, who, searching the Land from side to side, and from end to end, left remembrances of their names, in certaine notable places, and named after them; as Languine, Stragruus & mount Salanga, since named Saint Dominicks hill, and Ruthurgus his Poole. Little is remembred of Bartolenus, sauing that in short space (with many hands working at once) he ridde and made playne a great part of the Countrey, ouer-growne with woods and thickets.

Languina, Salanus and Ruthurgus, the three sons to Bartolenus.

Ruthurgi Stagnum.

Thus became Ireland inhabited by this people, vnder the gouernement of the three Sonnes to Bartolenus, and their offspring, for the space of three hundred yeares. Together with Bartolenus, arriued in Ireland certain vngodly people of Nimrods race, woorthily tearmed Giants, as those that (in bodily shape) exceeded the common proportion of other men, and vsed their strength to gaine soueraignte, and to oppresse the weake with rapine and violence. That linage (Chams brood) did grow, in short while, to great numbers, and alwaies endeuoured themselues (whersoeuer they came) to beare the rule ouer others. One cause thereof was their bodily strength, answerable to their hugenesse of stature; another, the examples of Cham or Zoroastres the Magitian, & Nimrod, grandfather to Ninus. Which two persons (in themselues and progenie) were renowned through the world as victorious Princes, ruling ouer two mighty Kingdomes, Aegipt and Assyria.

Ireland first inhabited.

Giants arriued in Ireland.

Bergion the sonne of Neptune, and brother to Albion (as Iohn Bale hath it) conquerd Ireland and the Orkeneis.

A third cause also there was, namely, they repined at the blessings bestowed on Sem and Iaphet, thinking it necessary to withstand all lawfull rule and dominion: lest the curse of slauery (propheſied by Noah) should light vpon them, as at the length it did. Whereupon, rebelliously withdrawing their obedience, from their lawfull Gouernours heere in Ireland, and taking head; they set vp a King of theyr owne fashion, and maintayning his estate to the oppression of the subiects, by bringing them into continuall bondage. The successe was variable on both sides, betweene the lawfull Gouernours and these vsurpers, with daily risings and skirmishes, so much to the griefe of them, who coueted to liue in quiet order vnder their rightfull Princes: that they determined, with the chance of one generall battel, eyther wholie to subdue those prowd rebellious tyrants, or else, to end their liues in freedome, and so be rid of further misery.

Euill exampls are too quickly followed,

Rebellion against Gouernours,

A very generous and worthy resolution

But first, whereas there had growne certayne debates and enmities amongest themselues, whereby they had weakened their owne forces; they held it not amisse, to make peace together, before they put their whole state in hazard of one battell against the Giants: concluding therefore an agreement, & ioyning in league (with promise) to assist each other in subduing the common enemy. Growing to assemble their power, out of all partes of the land, and coming to ioyne battel with the Giants; after they had fought fiercely together for the space of certayne houres: victorie enclined to the rightfull part, so that the lawfull Kings preuayling against the vsurping tyrants, great slaughter was made on the whole broode of that mischieuous generation. For the Kings, meaning to free themselues from all danger in time to come, vsed their happy victorie with too great crueltie, which after turned to their owne confusion. For, sparing neyther man, woman, nor childe that came in their way, for meere despite, & fuller satisfying their intended reuenge; they vouchsafed not to bury the carkases of their slaine enemies, but cast them out like a sort of dead dogs; through the noysome stench whereof, such an infectious pestilence ensued in all places, only thorow the ayres corruption, as few escaped with life, besides such as got away by Sea.

It is not good in weakenes, to warre with strong men,

Victory ouer cruelly vsed, and with more rigour then needed.

A very strange infecting pestilence. Anno mundi. 2257.

And hereby runnes a vaine tale among the the Iriſh, that one of the Giants named Ruanus, chancing to be preſerued from this mortalitie, liued 2041 yeares, which is more then twiſe the age of Methuſalem. By this man (ſay they) Saint Patricke was informed, concerning the whole eſtate of the Countrey, and afterwards, (vppon requeſt) hauing receiued Baptiſme of the ſayd Saint Patricke: hee deceaſſed in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour, foure hundred and thirty, as in the Iriſh hiſtorie hath beene very vnaduiſedly written. But, letting that paſſe, wee finde it recorded, That an infinite number of Giants were ſlayne and deſtroyed, in manner as hath been already related: yet ſome got themſelues into lurking Caues and Dens, and kept cloſely there, till lacke of food cauſed them to come foorth, and make ſhift for ſuſtenance. When, perceiuing no reſiſtance, becauſe the Land was (in a manner) left deſolate; they waxed bolder, and when they vnderſtoode how matters had paſſed: they ſetled themſelues in the beſt parts of the Countrey, eaſily ſubdewing the poore ſilly ſoules that remayned, and ſo reuiuing their linage, they became lords of the whole Iland, keping the ſame in ſubiection, three ſcore years together.

A ſtrange report how long Ruanus the giant liued, and that hee was baptized by S. Patricke.

Some Giants left that ſaued their liues in caues & dens.

Among the ſons of Iaphet, we reade in Geneſis, that Magog was one, who planted his people in Scythia, neare Tanais, from thence, about the yere of the world, 2317 Nemodus, with his foure ſonnes, Starius, Garbaneles, Anuinus and Ferguſius Captaines ouer a faire companie of people) were ſent into Ireland: who paſſing by Grecia, and taking in ſuch as were deſirous to ſeeke aduentures with them; at length they landed in Ireland, inhabited the Countrey, and multiplied the Land, although not without continuall warre, which they helde with the Giants two hundred and ſixteene yeares. At the end of which tearme, the Giants preuayling, chaſed them thence agayne, ſo that they returned into Syria. This was about the yeare after the Creation (as by their account it ſhould ſeeme) two thouſand fiue hundred thirtie three; from which time, the Giants kept poſſeſſion of the Land (without forraine inuaſion) till the yeare two thouſand ſeauen hundred and foureteene. But yet all that time, they were not able to frame a Common-wealth: for, falling ſtill at variance among themſelues, and meaſuring euery thing by might, ſeditiouſly they vexed one another.

Theſe were all of the neereſt poſteritie to Nemodus, and named Gandius, Genandius, Sagandus, Rutheranius and Slanius. When all things were ready, and their companies aſſembled: they put to Sea, and landed at the length in Ireland; where finding the power of the Giants greatly weakned, by their owne quarrells and ciuile diſſentions; with the more eaſe did they come to the end of their owne purpoſe, winning the whole Countrey, and vtterly extirpating that bloodie generation, deadly enemies to mankinde: diuiding alſo the Iſland into fiue parts, and in each of them they ſeuerally reigning. Furthermore, to ſatisfie all ſides, and auoyde contention; they concluded to fixe a Meare-ſtone in the middle point of Ireland, to which each of their kingdomes ſhould extend; ſo that they might be equally partakers of the cõmodities, found within the Countrey ſoile.

By which occaſion, the Britaines alſo ſtept in among them, procuring Brennus, the brother of Belinus, to direct his courſe thither with the ſame Nauy, which he had made ready to paſſe ouer into Gallia, now called France, to the ayde of Segwine, then King of the Allobroges, that inuaded the Countreyes of Sauoy and Daulphinois.

Segwine king of the Allobroges.

The Britiſh Princes neuer enioyed the quiet poſſeſsion of Ireland.

But his enterprize into Ireland tooke ſmall effect, though there were other Kings of the Britaines, that got dominion there; inſomuch that Gurgwintius, or Gurguntius, the ſonne of Belinus, accounted Ireland (among other his dominions) to belong to him by lineall deſcent. Notwithſtanding, the Britiſh Princes neuer enioyed the quiet poſſeſſion thereof, longer then they held it by maine force; but were often repelled, and put to the worſe with ſeeking after it, finding there little other gaine then ſtripes, whereof they carried away good ſtore. But now to com to the Spaniards, that laſtly (vnder the conduct of foure Captaines) paſſed into Ireland, from Biſcaye, and inhabited that Iſland: it ſhall not be impertinent (following the order obſerued) to ſpeake ſomwhat of their originall, that it may the better appeare, from whence the Iriſhe nation had their firſt beginning.

In the yeare of the world, 2436. after the vniuerſall flood, 870. while the Iſraelites ſerued in Ægypt, Gathelus the ſonne of one Nealus, a great Lord in Grecia, vpon diſfauour was exiled his country, with a number of his factious friends and adherents. This noble Gentleman, beeing very wiſe, valiant, and well ſpoken: gotte honourable entertaine of Pharaoh, ſurnamed Orus. And afterward departing that Countrey, trauerſed the ſeas, and landing firſt in Portugall, after ſome bickerings with the inhabitants: at length, yet hee got (by their conſent) a portion of the Countrey, lying by the bankes of the Riuer, anciently called Munda, and nowe Mondego, where (ſhortly after) he began to builde a Citty, firſt named Brachara, but now Barſalo, as Hector Bœtius affirmeth.

Brachara now Braga or Barſalo.

After this, when the people vnder Gathelus began to encreaſe in power; thorough perſwaſion of the Spaniards theyr neighbours, they remoued into Gallicia, where they alſo builded a Citty, named Brigantium, which is now called Coruna. Finally, when they grewe into ſuch a huge multitude, that Gallicia was not able to ſuſtaine them; Gathelus, with a certain number of them, paſſed ouer into Ireland and there grew into ſuch eſtimation with the barbarous people, that for his knowledge eſpecially in Languages, hee was highly honoured. For, he not onely enriched and beautified the Iriſh tongue: but enſtructed them in letters alſo: he ſought vp their Antiquities, and likewiſe practiſed their youth in warlike exerciſes, after the manner of the Greekes and Egyptians, from whence he was diſcended.

Gathelus paſſeth into Ireland, and is there highly honoured.

To conclude, hee was ſo acceptable and welcome to them, that (to gratifye ſuch a worthy benefactor) they agreed to call the Iſland Gathelia, and after his wife Scotia. This is one opinion, but yet incredible, not onely to Humfrey Lhuid, but alſo to other learned men, and diligent ſerchers of Antiquities: by reaſon of the ſundry arguments of improbability, as well in the miſcount of yeares, as other vnlikelyhoods found therein, when the circumſtances come to be duly examined, thorowly weighed, and well conſidered. Yet certaine it is, that Ireland was aunciently named Scotia, and the people Scots, as by diuers old writings it may be ſufficiently proued: albeit, by what occaſion it took firſt first that name, or from whence they came, it is yet doubted. But to proceede with the History, as we finde it. The residue of Gathelus his people, which remayned in Spaine, founded the City of Bayon, in the Confines of Gascoigne, and replenished the Sea coastes of Spaine, with store of inhabitants. And wel-neere about two hundred yeares, after their first arriuall there (when they were againe pestered with multitudes of people) they began to fancie a new voyage: but whether at that time, or some other els, they crossed ouer into Ireland, is altogether vncertaine.

Bayon builded by Gathelus his people

Notwithstanding, sure it is, that in the dayes of Gurguntius, King of the Britains, the cheefe Gouernour of Bayon, with four Brethren Spaniardes, two of which are saide to be Hiberus and Hermion, not the sonnes (as some thinke) of Gathelus (as Hector Bœtius affirmeth) but some other perhaps, that were descended of him; who vnderstanding that diuers of the westerne Isles were empty of inhabitants: assembling a great company of men, women, and children, embarked with the same in threescore great vesselles, and directing their course Westwarde, houered a long time on the Sea, about the Isles of Orkeney. At length, they met (by good hap) with Gurguntius, then returning from the conquest of Denmarke (as in the Brittish history it apeareth) whom they besought in consideration of their want of victuals and other necessaries (being such, as they were no longer able to endure the Sea, being cumbred with such store of women and children) to direct & appoint them some place, where they might inhabite; promising to hold the same of him, and to become liege-people to him and his heires for euer.

The gouernor of Bayon, and foure bretheren Spaniards trauelled to seeke their fortune abroad.

Gurguntius coming from the conquest of Denmarke.

Gurguntius aduising with himselfe hereon, remembred, with what troble he held the Irish in subiection, & cōceiuing hope that these strangers might either subdue, or wholy destroy that vnruly generation; accepted & took those oathes of the Spaniards with hostages, & furnishing them & their ships, with all needful things; set them ouer into Ireland, where, assisted with such Britaines as Gurguntius had appointed to go with them for their guides: they made a conquest of the whole country, & setled themselues ioyfully therein.

Gurguntius appointeth the Spaniards seates in Ireland, to liue vnder his subiection.

Some write, that Ireland was (before that present) voide of all inhabitants: but yet they agree, that these Spaniards were guided thither by the Britains, & vnder such conditions as before is recited. Whereby it appeareth, that the kings of Britain had an elder right tothe realm of Ireland, then by the conquest of K. Henry 2. which title they euer maintained, & sometimes preuailed in pursuit thereof, as in the daies of K. Arthur, to whom the Irish (as in diuers histories is remembred) acknowledged their due subiection, with paimēt of their tribute, & making their appearance at the city, called in the British toong, Caer Leon. Wherunto, when their free assent, the submission of their Princes, with lawfull conquest & prescription are annexed; an inuincible title must needs be enforced.

The Irish wer subiect to K. Arthur, and payed him Tribute at west Chester.

But now to our purpose. The Spaniards substantially assisted with the Britains, setled themselues, and diuided their seats in quarters; the foure Brethren reigning seuerally apart in sundry portions, with good quietnesse and encrease of wealth: vntill pride & ambition armed two of them, against the other two; as Hiberus and one of his brethren, against Hermion and his Brother. In this dissention, Hermion slewe his brother Hiberus: of whom, at the same time (as some hold) the countrey was named Hibernia. Although some are of opinion, that it tooke name of Iron, by plentifull Mines of that kinde of Mettall, wherewith the land abounded: & so those Authors of Antiquity, which call it Ierna, name it more aptly after the speech of the inhabitants, then others which cal it Hibernia.

Dissention betweene the bretheren, such are the fruites of ambition.

Hibernia, after the name of Hiberus, as some imagined.

Proceede wee now to Hermion, who to auoyde the ill opinion of men, by attaining thus to the Soueraignty, making his way through his brothers blood most vnnaturally, and in an vnhappie Ciuill-Warre: purged himselfe to his subiects, that neyther maliciously, nor contentiously, but for his necessarie defence and safety, hee had borne Armes agaynst his brethren. And to witnesse, how farre he was from all desire to rule alone: hee appointed certaine Captaines, as Kings, to rule (vnder him) seuerall Countreyes: reseruing to himselfe but one fourth part, and the portion of Meth, allotted to the Monarchy, for the better maintenance of his estate.

No crime so manifest or detestable, that wanteth a colourable pretence to excuse it.

These

Ireland diuided into fiue Kingdomes: And one ſoueraigne Ruler ouer the reſt.

These parts appointed foorth in this wiſe, at length grew to fiue Kingdomes, Leinſter, Connaght, Vlſter, and Mounſter diuided into two parts, and ſometime to more, by vſurping or compounding among themſelues: but euer, one was choſen to bee chiefe ſoueraigne Monarch ouer them all. Thus it ſeemeth certainly, that the Spaniards of the North parts of Spaine, inhabiting about the Countries of Biſcaie and Gallicia, came and peopled Ireland (as both their owne Hiſtories, & the Britiſh do agree wholly) but from whence they came firſt, to inhabite thoſe Countries of Spain, cannot by me be auouched. For no other Writers (but ſuch as haue regiſtred the Scottiſh Chronicles) make mention of Gathelus his coming thither, with Scota his Wife, and their people, as by the ſaid Chronicles is pretended.

An hundred and thirty Kings from Hermion to Laogirius.

An hundred and thirty cheefe Kings are reckoned of this Nation, from Hermion to Laogirius, the ſonne of Nealus Magnus; in whoſe time, that holy eſteemed man, S. Patricke conuerted them to Chriſtianity. But now, while the Iriſhmen liued in ſome tollerable reſt & order, vnder their ſeuerall Kings; one Rodoricke, a Scythian Prince (with a ſmall company of men, being weather-driuen about the Coaſts of Britaine) was by chaunce caſt vpon the ſhore of Ireland. These were Picts, and the very firſt that had bin heard off in thoſe parts (as ſome good Authors haue recorded) a people (euen from their cradle) naturally addicted to contention, land-leapers, mercileſſe, fierce and hardy. They being brought & preſented to the Iriſh King, deſired Interpretors; which being granted them; Rodorick their chiefe Commander and Leader, made this requeſt for him and his, as followeth.

The firſt Picts arriued in Ireland.

The Oration of Roderick, King of the Picts, to the King of Ireland.

NOt as degenerate, or falling from the courage of our Anceſtours, but faſhioning our ſelues to Fortunes courſe; wee are become to craue of Ireland (as humble Suppliants) who neuer before this preſent, haue embaſed our ſelues to any other Nation. Behold Sir King, and regard vs well: no light occaſion cauſeth theſe luſtie bodies to ſtoope. Scythians we are, and Picts of Scythia; no ſmall portion of glory remaineth in theſe two names. What ſhall I ſpeake of the ciuill warre, that hath expelled vs from our natiue homes, or rip vp olde Hiſtories, to mooue ſtrangers to bemoane vs? Let our ſeruants and children diſcourſe thereof at leiſure. Our inſtant motion is, to grant vs ſome time of abode in your Land, for which effect & purpoſe, our vrgent neceſſity beſeecheth your fauour: A King, of a King, and men of men, are to craue aſsiſtance.

Dreadleſſe he deliuereth of what country they are, and what manner of people in the Country.

Princes can well diſcerne and conſider, how neere it toucheth their honour and reputation, yea, and their owne ſurety, to vphold and releeue the ſtate of a King, decayed by treaſon. And manifeſt it is to all men of reaſonable conſideration, that nothing more beſeemeth the nature of men, then to be moued with compaſsion: yea, euen (as it were) to feele themſelues hurt, when they heare and vnderſtand of other mens calamities. Admit then (we beſeech you) and receiue among yee, theſe few ſcattered remnants of Scythians. If your roomes be narrow, we are not many: If the ſoile of your Country be barren, we are borne and inured to hardneſſe: If you liue in peace, wee are at your command as ſubiects: If you warre, we are ready to ſerue you as Soldiors. We demaund no Kingdome, no State, no pompeous triumph in Ireland. We are heere alone, and haue left ſuch vanities behinde vs with our enemies. Howſoeuer you eſteeme of vs, we ſhall content our ſelues therewith, and learne to frame our likings to yours: as calling vnto minde, what we haue bene, not what we are.

Princes can beſt iudge how to ſuccour and releeue one anothers diſtreſſe.

Misery is very apt in making ſhewes of great humiliation.

Great conſultation was had about the requeſt of theſe ſtrangers, & many things debated to and fro. In concluſion, the Iriſh gaue foorth for anſwer, the opinion of their Antiquaries, ſuch as were skilfull in olde Hiſtories, & graue ſayings of their Elders. Whereby they gathered, that it could not be expedient for thē, to accept the Scythians into their Land; becauſe commixture of Nations in any Realme, bringeth quarrels. Moreouer, the multitude of their owne Inhabitantants was ſuch, that roome in the whole Iſle was ſcarſe able to receiue them: and therfore thoſe few new commers, beeing placed among

The Anſwere of the Iriſh King, to the Oration made by King Rodericke.

VVE haue conſidered on your requeſt, as alſo thoſe extremities vrdging thereto: And though we may not (conueniently) receiue you among vs; yet ſhall you finde vs ready in furthering ye to our neighbours. Not farre hence lyeth the great Iſle of Britaine, in the North-part whereof (being voide of Inhabitants) your manhood and pollicie may purchaſe roome, to place your ſelues at your eaſe. We ſhall appoint Captaines to guide you thither, and wee ſhall aſſiſt yee with our Forces in that Countrey. Make ready your Shippes, that yon may paſſe thither with all conuenient ſpeed.

Wiſe men preuent their owne perils by putting thē to others, ſo the Iriſh perſwaded the Picts to place themſelues in Britaine.

Encouraged by this perſwaſion, they tooke their courſe towards the North parts of Britaine, now called Scotland, where (contrary to their expectation) Marius, King of Britaine, was ready to awaite their comming, and with ſharpe battaile vanquiſhing them in field, ſlewe Rodericke, with a great number of his followers. Thoſe that eſcaped with life, & ſought vnto him for grace; he licenſed to inhabite the vttermoſt ende of Scotland. This Marius, Humfrey Lhuid taketh to be the ſame, whom the Romaine Writers name Aruiragus, who reigned about the yeare of our Lord, ſeuenty: A Prince of noble courage, and of no ſmal eſtimation in his dayes, as appeareth by that which is written of him. His right name (as the ſaid Lhuid auoucheth) was Meurig.

Marius, otherwiſe called Aruiragus King of the Britaines ſlew king Roderick

But now concerning the Picts, whether thoſe that eſcaped with life, got the Seas by King Meurigs graunt, or getting to their Ships, with-drew into the Iſle of Orkeney, is doubtfull. Wiues alſo they wanted to encreaſe their iſſue, & becauſe the Britaines thought ſcorne to match their daughters, with ſuch an vnknowne and new come Nation: the Picts continued their firſt acquaintance with the Iriſh, and (by entreaty) obtained Wiues from them, with condition, that if the Crowne ſhould hap to fall in contention, they ſhould yeelde thus much to the prerogatiue of the woman: that the Prince ſhould bee elected rather of the blood Royall of the Female kinde, then of the Male. Which order (ſaith Beda) the Picts were very well knowne to keepe vnto his time.

Heere I could enter into a long, various and friuilous diſcourſe, concerning great combuſtions, warres and bloody contentions, happening (for a very long time) betweene the Iriſh, Picts and Scots: but beeing impertinent to my intended purpoſe, and little beneficiall to the Reader; I will firſt deſcribe the parts and diuiſions of Ireland into Shires and Countries, and then proceed to ſhew, how it receiued the Chriſtian faith at the firſt.

Ireland became diuided into foure Regions; Leinſter Eaſt; Connaght Weſt; Vlſter North; Mounſter South: And into a fift plot, defalked from euery fourth part, yet mearing on each part, called thereof Media, Meeth, comprizing as well Eaſt Meeth, as Weſt Meeth. Leinſter butteth vpon England; Vlſter vpon the Scottiſh Iſlands, which face with the Hebriades, ſcattered betweene both the Realmes: wherein (at this day) the Iriſh Scot, Succeſſour of the elder Scythian, Pict or Redſhanke dwelleth. Each of theſe fiue, where they are frame-able to ciuility, & anſwer the Writs of the Princes Courts; are ſundred into Shires or Counties in this manner.

was diuided into Eaſt Mounſter, Ormond, Weſt Mounſter, Deſmond, South Mounſter, and Toonemound. Now the reaſon why Ireland was thus diuided, you haue heard already, by the fiue brethren arriuing there, valiant and Martiall Gentlemen; Gandius, Genandius, Sagundus, otherwiſe named Gangandus, Rutheragus or Rutheranus and Slanius.

Another diuiſion of Ireland into the Engliſh Pale, and the Iriſhrie.

There was alſo another diuiſion of Ireland, into the Engliſh Pale, and Iriſhry. For, whē Ireland was ſubdued by the Engliſh, diuers of the Conquerours planted themſelues neere vnto Dublin, and the confines thereto adioyning, and ſo encloſing and impaling themſelues (as it were) within certaine liſts and territories; they forced away the Iriſh. Inſomuch, as that Country became meere Engliſh, and therof it was tearmed the Engliſh Pale: which (in ancient time) ſtretched from Dundalk to Catherlagh or Kilkenny. But afterward, what by the ſlackneſſe of Marchers, and encroching of the Iriſh enemy; the ſcope of the Engliſh Pale became greatly impaired, being cramperned and caught into an odde corner of the Country, named Fingall, with a parcell of Meeth the Kings Land, the Countries of Kildare & Louth, which parts were applyed cheefely with good husbandry, and taken for the richeſt and ciuileſt ſoyles in Ireland. But Fingall eſpecially (from time to time) was alwayes ſo addicted to the chiefe points of husbandry; as that they became nicknamed by their neighbors (for their continuall drudgery) Collonnes, of the Latine word Coloni, wherunto the clipt Engliſh word Clowne, ſeemeth to be anſwerable.

The word Fingall counteruaileth in Engliſh, the race or ſept of the Engliſh or ſtrangers, becauſe they were ſoly ſeized of that part of the Iſland, gryping with their Talents that warme neſt ſo firmely; thar from the Conqueſt, to this day, the Iriſh enemy could not rouze thē thence. The Inhabitants of the Engliſh Pale, haue beene (in olde time) ſo much addicted to their ciuility, and ſo farre ſequeſtred from barbarous ſauageneſſe; that their onely mother tongue was Engliſh. And truely, ſo long as theſe impaled dwellers, did ſunder themſelues (aſwell in land, as in language) from the rude Iriſh: rudeneſſe was day by day ſupplanted in the Country, ciuility engrafted, good lawes eſtabliſht, loyalty obſerued, rebellion ſuppreſſed, & in the ende, the coine of a young England was like to ſhoote in Ireland. But when their poſterity became not altogether ſo wary in keeping, as their Anceſtors were valiant in conquering; the Iriſh language became free-dennized in the Engliſh Pale. This canker tooke ſuch deepe roote, that the body, which before was whole and ſound: became feſtered by little and little, and (in a manner) wholly putrified. And not only this parcel of Ireland grew to that ciuility; but Vlſter alſo, and the greater part of Mounſter. Albeit, of all other places, Weiſeford, with the territory baied, and percloſed within the Riuer called the Pill, was ſo quite eſtranged from Iriſhry (which was rare in thoſe dayes) that if a trauailer of the Iriſh, had pitcht his foote within the Pill, and ſpoken Iriſh: the Weisfordians would command him forthwith, to turne the other ende of his tongue, and ſpeake Engliſh, or elſe to bring his Trouchman with him. But afterward, they ſo acquainted themſelues with the Iriſh, making a mingle-mangle of both languages, that (commonly) the Inhabitants of the meaner ſort, grew to ſpeake neither good Engliſh nor good Iriſh.

Wee come now to declare, in what manner Ireland came to receiue the chriſtian faith: And finde, that immediately after Chriſts time, Saint Iames the Apoſtle & other, trauailing into theſe Weſt parts; did firſt enſtruct the Iriſh people, and teach them the glad tydings of the Goſpel. So that diuers among them, euen then were chriſtened, and beleeued: but not in ſuch numbers (as may be thought) wherby it ſhould be ſaid, that the Country was generally conuerted. Notwithſtanding, the Scottiſh Chronicles doe auouch, that in the dayes of Fincomarke their King, who departed this life in the yeare of our Redemptiō, 358, Ireland was conuerted to the faith, by this meanes.

Ireland enſtructed in the Chriſtian faith by Saint Iames the Apoſtle.

Fincomarke King of Scotland.

A woman of the Pictiſh blood (ſay they) chanced in thoſe dayes to ſerue the Queene of Ireland; which woman herſelfe beeing a Chriſtian, firſt enſtructed her Queene and Miſtreſſe, in the faith & true points of Chriſtianity, & the Queen her Husband the King, who conuerted the whole Iriſh Nation. Howbeit, by the report of the Iriſh Writers themſelues, this ſhould not ſeeme altogether true.

A Pictiſh woman conuerted the queen of Ireland to the faith.

The hereſie of Pelagius had greatly decaied Chriſtian faith in the weſt parts of the world.

For they affirmed, that their Country was rather ſtill eſteemed as one of the vnchriſtned Iſles, till about the yeare of our Lord, foure hundred twenty and ſixe: when Celeſtine, the firſt of that name, gouernd the See of Rome, who, on conference had with his Cleargie, touching the reſtoring of the Chriſtian faith in the Weſt parts of the world (greatly there decayed by the hereſie of Pelagius) vnderſtood that Ireland alſo, by reaſon of diſtance from the heart of Chriſtendome, and rudeneſſe of the Nation; had receiued little fruit at all of true Religion, a thing much to bee lamented.

Paladius made offer to go into Ireland, and therupon was conſecrated Biſhop.

Among other, that then were aſſembled to treate of thoſe matters, was one Paladius, Arch-deacon of Rome, who offered his charitable trauaile, towardes the cõuerſion of thoſe lands, whither it ſhold pleaſe them to appoynt him to goe. Celeſtine knowing the ſufficiẽcie of the man, conſecrated him Biſhop, authorized his iourney by Letters vnder his Seale, furniſhed his wants, and aſſociating to him, ſuch religious perſons and others, as were thought neceſſary to aſſiſt him: deliuered vnto him the Bible with great ſolemnitie, and other monuments, in furtherance of his good ſpeede, for ſo long and tedious a iourney.

Paladius landed in the north of Ireland, and conuerted many to the Faith.

At length hee landed in the North of Ireland, from whence he hardly eſcaped (with life) into the Iſles adioyning, where he preached the Goſpell, and conuerted no ſmall number of Scots to the Chriſtian faith and beleefe; purging alſo that part which was chriſtened, from the infection of the Pelagians, as in the Scottiſh hiſtorie more at large appeareth. He was required by the Scots, that dwelt in Britaine, to leaue the Iſles, and come ouer to them, there to enſtruct the people in the way of true ſaluation: to the which (with the Popes licence) he ſeemd willing enough. And the biſhop of Rome, the more readily condiſcended thereto, becauſe at that inſtant time, when Paladius was to depart: one Patricke attended at Rome, ſuing for licence to be ſent into Ireland.

The Scots in Britaine required the company of Paladius

Patricke ſent into Ireland, and Paladius appointed to go into Scotland.

The Pope therefore graunted, that Paladius might paſſe ouer to the Scottes in Britaine, and appoynted Patricke to goe (with authoritie from him) into Ireland, where, vpon his arriuall, hee found the people ſo well bent to heare his admonitions (contrary to their accuſtomed forwardneſſe) that a man would haue imagined, vpon ſight of their readineſſe; that the Land had beene reſerued for him to conuert. And becauſe it pleaſed God, to beſtow ſuch an vniuerſall benefite on the Land, by his meanes; wee thought good (by folowing our Author herein) to touch ſome part of the courſe of his life.

The toward. neſſe of the Iriſh men to heare Patricks preaching.

This Patricke, in Latine called Patricius, was borne in the Marches betweene England and Scotland, in a Towne by the Sea ſide, named Eiburne, whoſe fathers name was likewiſe called Calphurnius, a Deacon, and ſonne to a Prieſt: his Mother, named Conches, was ſiſter to S. Martine, that famous Biſhoppe of Tours in France. Patricke (of a childe) was brought vp in learning, and well enſtructed in the faith, beeing much giuen to deuotion. The Iriſhmen (in thoſe daies) aſſiſted with ſome Scots and Picts, were become arch-Pirats, greatly diſquieting the Seas about the Coaſts of Britaine, and vſed to ſacke little ſmall Villages, that lay ſcatteringly along the ſhore, and would leade away the Inhabitants captiue home into their Country. And as it chaunced, Patricke being a Lad of ſixteene yeares olde, and a Scholler then in ſeculer learning: was taken among other, and became ſlaue to an Iriſh Lord called Macbuaine, from whõ (after the terme of ſixe yeares) he redeemed himſelfe, with a piece of gold, which he found in a clod of earth, that the ſwine had newly turned vp, as he followed thẽ in the time of his captiuity, beeing appointed (by his Maſter) to take charge of them, and keepe them.

In what place Saint Patricke was borne.

And as affliction (commonly) maketh men religious; the regard of his former education, had ſtamped in him ſuch remorſe and humility, that beeing thencefoorth weaned from the world: hee betooke himſelfe to contemplation, euer lamenting the lacke of grace and trueth in that Land. And withall not deſpairing, but that (in continuance of time) ſome good might be wrought vpon them; hee learned the Language perfectly. And, alluring one of that Nation, to beare him company for exerciſe ſake; hee departed thence, and got him into France, euer hauing in his minde, a deſire to ſee the conuerſion

Saint Patricke placed in ſeruice with Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre.

In this purpoſe, he ſought out his vnkle Martine, by whoſe meanes he was placed wiih Germanus the Biſh. of Auxerre, continuing with him as Scholler or Diſciple for the ſpace of fourtie yeares: all which time hee beſtowed in the ſtudie of holy Scriptures, Prayers, and ſuch godly exerciſes. Afterwards, beeing renowned through the Latine Church, for his wiſedome, vertue and learning: hee went to Rome, bearing Letters with him in his commendation, from the French biſhops vnto Pope Celeſtine, to whom hee vttered his whole minde and ſecret vow, which long before hee had conceiued as touching Ireland. Celeſtine inueſted him Archbiſhop and Primate of the whole Iſland, ſet him forward with al fauor he could deuiſe, bringing him and his diſciples onward to their Countrey.

He went to Rome, highly commended to pope Celeſtine.

Patricke inueſted Archbiſh. of Ireland.

In the 23 yeare of the Emperour Theodoſius the yonger, being the yeare of our Lord, 430. Patricke landed in Ireland, and bicauſe he ſpake the tongue perfectly, and withall, being a reuerend perſonage in the eyes of all men; many liſtened and gaue eare to his preaching. And the rather, becauſe (as ſome Writers haue recorded) he confirmed his Doctrine with diuerſe miracles. But eſpecially thoſe men regarded his words before all others, that had ſome taſte of the Chriſtian Faith before, eyther by the comming into thoſe partes of Paladius and his Diſciple one Albius, an Iriſh Biſhop, or otherwiſe by ſome other. For, it is to be thought, that continually there remained ſome ſpark of knowledge of Chriſtianity, euer ſince the firſt preaching of the Goſpell, which was ſhortly after Chriſts Aſcention, by S. Iames as before is mentioned. But in continuance of time, Patricke wonne the better part of that kingdome to the faith of Chriſt.

Patricke verie reuerently reſpected by the people in Ireland.

Albius an Iriſh biſhop, diſciple to Paladius.

Laigerius ſon to Nealus the great Monarch, albeit he receiued not the Goſpell himſelfe; yet he permitted all that would to embrace it. But becauſe he refuſed to be baptiſed, and apply to his doctrine; the Biſhop denounced againſt him a curſſe from God accordingly, but yet tempered with mercy and iudgement, as thus: That during his life he ſhould be victorious: but after him, neither ſhould the kingdome ſtand, nor his linage inherit. Thence he tooke his way to Conill, lord of Connagh, who honorably receiued him, and was conuerted with al his people: ſending him afterward to his brother Logan, king of Leinſter, whō he alſo conuerted. In Mounſter he found great frendſhip, by the means of an Earle there, called the Earle of Daris, who honored him highly, & gaue him a dwelling place in the Eaſt Angle of Armagh, called Sorta, where he erected many Celles and Monaſteries, both for religious men and women. He trauelled 30. yeares in preaching through the land, planting Biſhops and Prieſts in conuenient places, whoſe learning and conuerſation, by the eſpeciall grace & fauor of God, eſtabliſhed the Faith in that rude nation. Other 30. yeres he ſpēt in his prouince of Armagh, among his brethren placed in thoſe houſes of Religion, which by his means were founded. So he liued (in all) about 122. yeares, and lyeth buryed in Downe.

Laigerius ſon to Neale the great monark of Ireland, permitted the Iriſhmen to become chriſtiās

The death of S. Patricke & his place of buriall in Downe

Now, concerning the chiefe citties and townes of Ireland, we are firſt to ſpeake of Dublin, termed the beautie and eye of Ireland. I find it recorded, that about the yere 155. three noble Eaſterlings, being brethren, ariued in Ireland, whoſe names were Auellanus, Sitaracus and Ꝥuorus. Auellanus being the eldeſt brother, built Dublin; Sitaracus, Waterford and Ꝥuorus, Limerike. Of the founder Auellanus, Dublin was termed Auellana, and after, by corruption of ſpeech, Eblana, and ſo Ptolomie calleth it. Some termed it Dublin, other, Dublinia, many Dublinum, but Authors of better skill name it Dublinium. This cittie, as it is not inferiour for Antiquity to any in Ireland; ſo in pleaſant ſcituation, gorgeous buildings, multitude of people, martiall Chiualry, obedience and loyalty, aboundance of wealth, largeneſſe of hoſpitality, in manners and ciuilitie, it is ſuperiour to all other citties and towns in that realme: whereupon it is commonly called, the Iriſh or yong London. The Charter of this citie is large, King Henry the 4. gaue it the Sword, in the yeare 1409. and was ruled by a Maior and two Bailiffes: which were changed into Sherifs, by a Charter granted by king Edward the ſixt, 1547. But it appeares by the ancient Seale of this cittie called Signum præpoſituræ, that the Cittie hath (in elder times) beene gouerned

Waterford called Menapia by Ptolomy.

Waterford was founded by Sitaracus, in the yeare 155. beeing a Citty properly builded, and very well compact. Both yong and old there are giuen to thriuing, free from factions: the men deale in traſficke, the women in ſpinning & carding; and as they diſtill the beſt Aqua vitæ, ſo they ſpinne the cheefeſt Rugge in Ireland.

The worthy loialty of Waterford.

Of this Citty Waterford it is written, to haue continued ſo loyall to the Crowne of England, that it is not found regiſtred (ſince the Conqueſt) to haue bin ſtained with the ſmalleſt ſpot of treaſon, notwithſtanding the ſundry aſſaults of traiterous attempts. And therfore the Cities Armes are deckt with this golden word: Intacta manet.

Limericke, Yuorus the Founder ther of.

Limericke, called in Latine Limericum, was builded by Yuorus, about the very ſame yeare of 155. coaſting on the Sea, hard vpon the Riuer Sennan; whereby are moſt notably ſeuered Mounſter and Connaght, the Iriſh name this Citty, Loumneagh, and therefore in Engliſh it is called Limerike.

Corke the fourth Citty of Ireland.

Corke, in Latine Corciuam or Corracium, the fourth Citty of Ireland, happily planted on the Sea: their Hauen being a Hauen royall. On the land-ſide they were ſo encumbred with euill neighbours, the Iriſh Out-lawes, that they were faine to watch their gates hourely, to keepe them ſhut at ſeruice times, and at meales. And from Sun to Sun, not to ſuffer any ſtranger to enter the Citty with his weapon, but to leaue it at a Lodge appointed.

Drogheda.

Drogheda, accounted the beſt Towne in Ireland, and truely not farre behinde ſome of their Citties: the one moity of this Towne is in Meeth, the other planted on the further ſide of the water, lyeth in Vlſter.

There ranne a blinde Propheſie of this Towne, that Roſſe was, Dublin is, Drogheda ſhall be the beſt of the three.

Roſſe.

Roſſe, a Hauen Towne in Mounſter, not farre from Waterford, ſeeming to haue beene (in ancient time) a Towne of great port, whereof ſundry and probable coniectures are giuen, by the olde Ditches, which are now a mile diſtant from the Walles of Roſſe: betweene which walles and ditches, the reliques of the auncient Walles, Gates, and Towers (placed betweene both) are to bee ſeene vnto this day.

Weiſford.

Weiſford, a Hauen Towne not farre from Roſſe, whereof no great matters are recorded: but onely that it is to be eſteemed by all the Engliſh poſterity planted in Ireland, as a Towne that was the firſt Fortreſſe and Harbourer, of the Engliſh Conquerors, doing them (from time to time) many great and acceptable ſeruices.

Kilkenny.

Kilkenny, the beſt vpland, or (as they tearme it) the propereſt dry Towne in Ireland; is diuided into the high Towne, and the Iriſh Towne. The high Towne was builded by the Engliſh, after the Conqueſt, and had a parcell of the Iriſh Towne vnited to it, by the Biſhops grant, made vnto the Founders vpon their earneſt requeſt. Robert Talbot, a worthy Gentleman, in the yeare one thouſand foure hundred, encloſed with walles the better part of this Towne.

Thomas towne

Thomas Towne, a proper Towne builded in the County of Kilkenny, by one Thomas Fitz-Anthony, an Engliſhman: thereof the Iriſh call it Ballie mac-Andan, that is, The Towne of Fitz-Anthony. But becauſe the Reader may perceiue, in what parts of the Country the Citties and cheefe Townes ſtand, I haue ſet them downe in this order.

CHAP. II.

A brieue Discourse, how those parts and Countries, commonly called, The New World, were first found: Also, by whom, and what things were there found, and seene, and brought away thence.

Caruell saying on the Spanish Seas, there fell a tempest, comming so impetuously from the East, the Windes growing still so crosse and contrary; that at length it was transpor-

The Windes and Weather will be Commanders at Sea.

transported into an vnknowne Country, which neuer was in any Carde for Nauigation. Staying there longer time, then was or could be allowed for returning; no more remayned liuing then the Pilote or Maister, and three or foure Mariners beside: who also falling sicke, by extreamitie of hunger and tedious labour, dyed also at a Port some few daies distance from thence.

In the house of Christopher Columbus died the Pilote Andaluzo.

But the Pilote, whose name was Andaluzo, dyed in the house of one Christopher Columbus, a native of Cuguero, or (as some others say) of Albizolo, a small village on the riuer of Genes, neare to Sauona. With this Colombus remayned all the Pilotes goods of the sayd Caruell, and especially the Papers and Memories of that whole voyage, reporting the height of the lands, which by them had beene discouerd, and found. Some say, that the sayd Andaluzo trafficked in Canaria and Madera, when this long and fatall nauigation happened. Others also tearme him a Biscane, which dealt with England and France: and some repute him a Portuguize, that went and came from Myrrha or India. Others agayne report, that the said Caruell went into Portugall, or to Madera, and other Ilands; but none doe assure any thing for certaine. It is no maruell then, if Authors do disagree in many points, concerning things happening, or found by graue Ancients, and that the Inuenters of them are not to be knowne; when our selues are ignorant of matters, within the compasse of so small time since, for finding the Occidentall or Westerne Isles (which we call the New-found World) and which was a matter so signall, nouell, and remarkable.

Variety of opinions concerning this Andaluzo.

Needs must many Antiquities be lost, when later times neglect all memorie.

But all agree together, that this Andaluzo dyed in the house of the sayd Christopher Columbus; who hauing (at the first) beene a Sayler or Mariner, had practised in diuers parts of the world. Afterward, hee learned diligently the measure of the two Tropickes, of the Equaror, and of the Clymates, prooving an expert Maister, in making Cardes to sayle by. And to be informed concerning the Meridionall coasts of Affrica, and of other places where the Portugalls had sayled: he went into Portugall, to the end he might make his Cards the better, and there he married. Or, as some say, in the Isle of Madera: where it may be credited (as most likely) that he dwelt when the said Caruell coasted there; and the Patron or Pilote thereof lodged in his house, where he recounted to him the voyage he had made, and the new lands by him discouered: to the end that Columbus might set them downe in his Carde, wherein he was further enstructed by him.

What Christopher Columbus was at his beginning.

Reasons of apparant likelihoode in the case of Columbus.

It is generally supposed, that Columbus was a learned man, a good Geographer, very singularly experienced in Astronomy and Cosmography; and that hee laboured to finde the land of the Antipodes, and Il Rico Cipango de Marco Polo. Moreouer, he was often heard to say, that (necessarily) by good coniectures, there was another world, which extended it selfe towards the West: whereof Plato, Seneca, and many other Authors, both Greek and Latin, did leaue to Cosmographers some good and considerable arguments. Also, that he had read many good ancient Authours, who, in the place where they discourse on the great Athlanticke Isle; make mention of a land vnknowne and concealed, more great then Asia or Affrica. And especially Aristotle, writing, that certaine Merchants of Carthage, sayling in those parts of Gibralterre, towards the West & South, after many dayes, found a great Iland inhabited, with Riuers nauigable.

Thegenerall opinion concerning Columbus, touching his sufficiency in learning and iugement.

But, after all this so diuersly deliuered, on the behalfe of Columbus, it is most certaine, that he was not learned, but of good iudgement and vnderstanding, and receiuing notice of these new Lands, by the meanes of Andaluzo; he conferred with diuers learnd and iudicious men, concerning what had aunciently beene written of other lands and worlds. And the sayd Columbus, wanting meanes to bring to passe what he so earnestly desired, because he was poore; stoode in neede of some farre greater fauour, whereby hee might discouer those lands.

The Authors further examination, and final conclusion as touching Columbus.

Perceiuing then, that the King of Portugall was hindered by his enterprize of Africa, & nauigation into the East, which he had then in readines, and that the king of Castile was busied about the warre of Granada: he sent his brother, named Bartholomew, to Henry the seauenth, king of England, a very rich and potent Prince, (who had at that present time no warres or troubles) to furnish him with fauour and shippes apt and fit for the enterprize, Kings, whose help he intended to haue mooued.

promiſing to bring him home from thoſe vnknowne Iſlands (and in ſmall time) vnvaluable treaſures. But Bartholmew returning thence without any reſolution; he began to negotiate with Alphonſus the fift, King of Portugall: of whom he could neyther haue fauour nor money, to finde ſuch wealth as he had promiſed; becauſe the Biſhop of Viſo, and one Maſter Roderick, men greatly experienced in Coſmography, contraried him therein, confidently aſſuring; that there could not bee in the Weſt, any ſuch gold or treaſure, as Columbus ſpake of.

Columbus hindered in dealing with the King of Portugall.

Beeing much diſmayed and out of comfort (yet his heart encouraging him ſtill, with hope of a happy and ſucceſſefull aduenture) and being embarqued at Liſborne: hee ſet thence to Paly de Moguera, where he ſpake with Alphonſo Pinzono, a Pylot well skild in the arte of Nauigation: there alſo he diſcouered his ſecret to to Iohn Perez, a Fryar Minor, in the Conuent of S. Frances de la Rubida, a moſt excellent Coſmographer. Theſe men encouraged him to follow his enterprize, councelling him further, to impart the buſineſſe to Henry, Duke de Medina Sidonia, and then to Lodwick, Duke de Medina Cælia, who, in his Port of S. Maria, had good and commodious meanes to prouide Shipping, and people apt for ſuch a buſineſſe. But theſe two Dukes helde this Voyage and Nauigation, for no other then as a dreame or phantaſma; euen as the Kings of England and Portugall did. In regard whereof, the poore grey Fryar aduiſed him to goe to the Court of the Catholique King, and (on his behalfe) wrote to Fryar Ferdinando de Talaueia, Confeſſour to the Queene.

Columbus though diſcouraged, will not yet be wholly diſheartened.

The 2. Dukes of Medina acquainted with this great offer, & refuſed it alſo

Columbus followed this aduice of the Fryar, and came to the Court of Caſtile, in the yeare 1486. and (by written petition) preſented both his ſight and demand, to King Ferdinand and Queen Elizabeth, who made no great account thereof; as hauing their mindes troubled, for expelling the Moores out of Granado. He grew then to ſpeake with ſome, that had neerer eare about the King, and were of moſt employment with his Maieſty, to negotiate in affaires of importance. But becauſe he was a ſtranger, meanly habited, and without any other credit, then being commended by a poore Fryar Minor: he was no way beleeued, and much worſe liſtened vnto; whereat Columbus grew very greatly diſpleaſed.

His petition to the Catholique King Ferdinand & his Queene, & neglecting where he had greateſt hope.

Alphonſo Quinta-villa, Great Chamberlaine or Treaſurer to the King, kept him in his houſe, and dietted him at his owne table, taking great delight to heare him talke of ſuch things, as he made promiſe of in vnknowne Countries. By the helpe of this Great Treaſurer, Columbus found the meanes, to haue acceſſe & audience with Gonzales de Mendozza, arch-Biſhop of Toledo, and Cardinall, who had great credit and authority with their Maieſties. This Lord brought him to the Kings preſence, and, after the caſe was well examined and vnderſtood (notwithſtanding all was eſteemed vaine and falſe, which Columbus had ſpoken off in the beginning) yet hope was giuen him of expedition, and imployment in his voyage of Nauigation, to thoſe Iſlands vnknown; ſo ſoone as the King had taken order for the war of Granado, which then lay heauily on his hand.

Some meanes of entrance for Columbus to worke by.

Columbus was promiſed ſupply by the Catholique King.

Columbus, vpon this anſwere, began to mount his hopes farre higher then before, and was then graciouſly both heard and eſteemed of all the Courtiers, who laughed and made a mockery of him at the firſt. After the ſurprizall of Granado, he preuailed ſo ſucceſſefully, that the Catholique King conſented vnto his requeſt, for paſſage into thoſe vnknowne parts: aſſigning vnto him in gift, the tenth part of the Rents and Royall tributes, in all the Lands found and conquered: but without preiudice (notwithſtanding) to all rights belonging to the King of Portugall. And becauſe the King was then vnfurniſhed of money for this expedition; Lodouico, Secretary for his accounts, lent him ſeuenteene thouſand Ducats: by meanes whereof, Columbus armed & furniſhed * three Caruels at Pally de Moguera, and in them fitted 120. men, aſwell Marriners as Soldiours.

Chriſtopher Columbus (by meanes of the Catholique King) armed three Caruels to goe finde out the New World.

His ordering of the Caruels, and ſetting foorth on his Voyage.

Of one, hee made Martino Alphonſo Pinzono the Guide and Conducter. Of the ſecond, Franceſco & Vincentio Aeneio, Brethren to the ſaid Martino. And himſelfe was Captaine and Commander of the greateſt Caruell among them; taking alſo with him his Brother Bartholmew, who (in like manner) was very practicke and well experienced on the Seas. From

Paly

Paly he ſet forward on Friday, beeing the third day of Auguſt, and held on his voyage betweene the Weſt and South, paſſing by Gomera, one of the Canary Iſlands, where he ſtayed for a ſmall refreſhing; & thence onward, followed the directions giuen him in the papers and memories of deceaſed Andaluzo.

Hauing ſayled eight dayes, he eſpied ſo much graſſe or Herbage, as if it ſeemed to be a Meadow; whereof (at firſt) he & all grew doubtfull, although ther was no danger at all, and backe they would haue returned, but that they ſaw diuers Willow trees a farre off, which gaue an euident and moſt certaine ſigne, that ſome Land muſt needs be neere.

After 8. dayes ſayling, Roderick de Traiana was the firſt man that diſcouered Land.

On the morrowe following, which was the eleauenth day of Nouember, in the yeare 1492. Rodericke de Traiana, beganne to cry out alowd, Land, Land: at which words, all ran to ſee whether they were true or no; and hauing likewiſe diſcouered that it was firme Land, they beganne to praiſe GOD, and ſung Te Deum Laudamus, mourning euen vvith great exceſſe of ioy, and proud of a hopefull proceeding.

Their fyrſt landing at Guabanay, betweene Florida & Cuba.

The firſt land which they ſaw, was Guabanay, one of the Iſles Lucages, ſituated betweene Florida and Cuba; where ſodenly they went on ſhoare, and there tooke poſſeſſion of the New world. From Guabanay they went to Barucon, the Porte of Cuba, & there tooke ſome Indians, and returning backe to the Iſle of Hayti, caſt anchor in the Port, which Columbus called Porte Royall. There haſtily they were faine to land againe; becauſe the chief Caruell ſmote againſt a rocke, and began to rift; but yet no perſon was in perill. When the inhabitants of the Iſle ſaw the Spanyards come on ſhore ſo ſpeedily, and with their Armes: they fled from the ſea ſide vp to the Mountaines; imagining them to bee the Carybes or Canibales, that came to aſſaile them.

The Indians ſeareful of the Spaniardes at their landing.

After them ran the Spaniards, as haſtily as they might, and yet could take none but one woman, vnto whom they gaue Bread, Wine, and Comfittes, as alſo a ſmocke, and other Garments, becauſe ſhe was naked, and ſo ſent her away after the reſt. She went and told her country people, how kindly ſhee had bin vſed, ſhewing them the giftes beſtowed vppon her:

A woman Indian taken & cloathed, and let loſe againe.

which cauſed them preſently to come downe againe to the Sea ſide, to ſpeake with the Spaniards, without any vnderſtanding on either ſide, otherwiſe then by ſignes, euen as dumbe folke vſe to do. They brought Birds, Bread, Fruits, Gold, and other things, to giue in exchange for Ballads, Beads, Glaſſes, Needles, Sizers, Pinnes, and other ſuch like things, to the no little ioy and comfort of Chriſtopher Columbus, who ſaluted, embraced, & reuerendly entreated the Lord of that land, being of his people called Cachico. & gifts paſſed betweene one another, in ſigne of loue and amity.

Cachico the fyrſt Indian Prince ſeene by Columbus.

The Indians brought boats of theyr owne, wherein to beſtowe the goodes of the cheefe Caruell that was broken, and brought them on Land with the Spanyards, ſo louingly, euen as if they hadde dwelt all their life time among them: falling downe in reuerence to the Croſſe, and beating themſelues on the breſts, like vnto Chriſtians.

The kind offices of the Indians to the Spaniards.

Now Columbus, thinking no time ſoon enough for his returne to Spaine, with newes to the Catholike King, of what he had ſeene and done, preuailed ſo wel with the prompt and ſodaine conſent of Cachico, and the aſſiſtance of his ſubiects: as to build a Caſtle of Woode and Earth; wherein hee left eight and thirty Spanyards, vnder the charge of Captaine Roderigo d'Arma, of Cordoua: to the end, that during his voyage, they might learne the Language and ſecrets, both of the Nation and Countrey. And this was the firſt inhabiting of the Spanyardes in the Indiaes.

Columbus, by conſent of Cachico, & help of his people, builded a Caſtle of Wood and earth.

The Caſtle being finiſhed, Columbus tooke with him tenne Indian men, forty Parrats, many Tortoiſes, Conies, and other ſtrange thinges, farre differing from ours in forme and nature, as teſtimonies of the places where hee had found them. He brought aboord alſo into his ſhips, all the Golde which the people of the countrey had giuen him, in exchange of thoſe toyes and trifles which hee returned for them. And, after hee had taken leaue of his friendly Companions, appointed to remaine there in his abſence, as alſo of Guacanari (for ſo was the Cachico or king of that Countrey named) who was verie ſorry and loath, that hee ſhould depart thence, he ſent away with two Caruels, wherin

Columbus goeth to Barcellona to the K. and Queen

The Catholike King and queene vvere then at Barcellona, whither Columbus went to ſee them; and although it was a long way, and he had many things to carry: yet notwithſtanding, they were all conueyed with him by Land, and hee was welcommed vnto the Court with great Honour. Infinite people flocked about him, to ſee the things which hee brought from the New-found Worlde, which were of extraordinary wealth and riches, beſide the ſtrange men, of ſuch colour and habit, as neuer hadde the like beene ſeene before. Some ſayde, that hee had found the Nauigation, concealed from the Carthagenians. And others affirmed it, to be that which Plato had written of to bee loſt by fortune, and by an ouer-great quantity of mudde or ſlime encreaſing in the Sea. Some other helde another opinion, ſaying, That that which Seneca had foretold was now accompliſhed, ſpeaking in his Tragedy of Medea after this manner. The time vvill come, that (manie yeares hence) New Worldes ſhall bee found, and that their Thile could not bee the furtheſt part of the earth.

The peoples variety in opinion concerning this voyage of Columbus.

Senec. in Traged. Medea.

Finally, Columbus entred the Court of Spaine, the third day of April, a yeare after he had departed thence, preſenting to their Maieſties, the Golde and all thinges elſe which he had brought from the New World; vvhereat the King, Queene, and all then preſent, meruailed not a little, to ſee ſuch rare things, all (but the gold) nouell and vnaccuſtomed vnto theyr ſight. They highly commended the Parrats, being of ſo many goodly colours; ſome of an extraordinary ſhining green, others of a liuely red or Vermillion colour, intermixed vvith many other of choiſe ſplendour, little or nothing at all reſembling them that vvere brought from other places. The Conies were ſmall, hauing their eares and tayles like vnto Rats, and their colour grizeld. Alſo they greatly praiſed the Cockes of thoſe Countreyes, beeing farre more beautifull then Pea-cockes, wondering beſides, that thoſe Countries yeelded no other Corne, and no other bread was yet fedde on there, but ſuch as was made of rootes and the like thinges. But their cheefeſt meruaile was at the men, who had little circklets or Buckles of Gold hanging in their eares, and finely pierced through their noſtrilles: theyr bodies being neither white nor black, or browne, but like vnto an Oliue colour, or boyled Quinces.

No mean admiration in the King Queene and Courtiers at the rare nouelties broght by Columbus

The Indian men wer their greateſt matter of maruell

Very attentiue was the King, to heare what a worthy Relation Columbus made, wondering greatly, that the people ſhold haue no Habite, Learning, Mony, Iron, Corne, Wine, neyther any Animall which was greater then a Dogge, nor Shippes or Boates of any bigneſſe. And much was his patience mooued, when he heard him tell, that they did eate one another, being all Idolaters. But hee promiſed, that if God pleaſed to bleſſe him with life and health: he would free them from that horrible inhumanity, and root Idolatrie out of thoſe Lands, that could bee reduced vnder his dominion and power. In like manner, hee extended great fauour and courteſie to Columbus, commanding that he ſhould ſit down before him, becauſe (according to the cuſtome of Spaine) the Gentlemen and other attendants, ſtand alwayes in the Kings preſence, for greater honour to the Royall authority.

The people did eate one another, and were Idolaters.

Obſeruance in the Court of Spaine.

Moreouer, he confirmed his grant and priuiledge, concerning the tenth part of reuennewes in the ſaide Lands, giuing him the title and Office of Admirall of the Indiaes, and made his Brother Bartholmew Lieutenant or vice-Admiral to him. All which beeing done, a Courrier or Poaſte was diſpatched vnto Rome, with letters concerning the New-found lands, to his Maieſties ambaſſadors, whom (but ſome few moneths before) he had ſent to congratulate Pope Alexander the ſixt, at his new creation, and (on his behalfe) to do him obeyſance. Which letters of full and further information, they deliuered to his Holineſſe; he not a little reioycing at theſe good newes, as the like did al the Roman Court. In regard wherof, the holy Father, with conſent of the whole Colledge of Cardinals, made a new donation to the Kinges of Caſtile and Leon, of all the Iſles and firme lands that ſhould bee found in the Weſt: with charge to ſend Preachers thither, for conuerſion of the Infidels.

Columbus made Admirall of the Indiaes.

News of theſe Indian diſcouerjes, ſent to Rome to pope Alexander the ſixt.

When

Columbus sent againe, with more power to the Indiaes.

When the Catholike King had receyued this ioyfull answer from the Pope, he sent Christopher Columbus againe, with more store of people, for further trafficking in this New-found World, and for vtter destruction of Idolatry, and adoration giuen to false Gods. For the better furtherance heerein, by Iohn Fonsequeio, Deane of Siuell, he sent eight Caruelles, making him President of those countries. He sent also twelue Priestes, of vertuous life, and good learning, with Friar Butleio Catellano, of the order of S. Benedict, who went to be Vicar-Generall for the Pope: to the end, that those Ecclesiasticall persons might preach the word of God, conuerting the people to the Faith of Iesus Christ, and do all things appertaining to the conuersion of soules.

A Vicar Generall sent on the Popes behalfe.

The King and Queene Catholi e, sent preachers and handy-crafts men into the Indiaes.

Beside all this, many Knights & courtiers, moued by the fame and desire of riches in the same Countries, and earnest affection to see them; went along with them in company, hauing diuers Artezans among them, as Goldsmithes, Taylors, Masons, Carpenters, Laborers, Fishermen, and such like persons, fit for diuers imployments.

The King caused also (at his own charge) to be bought some store of Horses, Kine, Sheepe, Goates, Swine, and Asses, that breede might there ensue of them. Great store also was sent of Wheat, Barly, and Graine of all kindes to sowe; with Slips, Sprigs of Vines, Sugar Canes, and Plants of sweete fruites, as also Chalk and Lime to build withall. In breefe, they carried diuers other things for the like needefull vses; entertaining into this seruice 1500. Soldiers, which Columbus shipt at Cadiz the 25. day of September, 1493. and good prouision of Artillery.

His second setting to sea againe for the West Indiaes.

Proceeding on in his voyage, & much more neere to the Equinoctiall then hee did before in his first passage; he came to arriue and take landing in an Iland, which he tearmed by the name of Desire, and without any staying there, won the Port D'Argent, in the Isle called Hispaniola. Passing on thence to Porte Royalle, where he had left the eight and thirtie Spanyards, who were all slaine by the Indians, becausse they had lustfully forced their wiues and done them many outrages besides. Columbus being displeased hereat, yet shewing no outward discontentment, immediately commanded his Masons & other men to fall to worke, for the building of a Towne, which (in honor of the Queene) he named Isabella.

A Town builded by Columbus, and called Isabella in honour of the queene.

He builded also a Fort or castle among the Mines of Cibao, where he established as Gouernor, Moyses Marguarito, & sent twelue Caruels thence into Spain by Antonio de Turco, which carried many grains of Golde, one especially amongst them, weighing eight ounces, which was found by Alphonso de Houieda. Hee sent likewise many Parrats, very faire and goodly, and certaine Indian Caribes, being such as fed on the flesh of men, bred and born in the Island of Acay, which hee called Santa Cruz, and hee himselfe, went with three Caruels more, to finde out other Lands: where he found Cubo on the South-side, and Ianianca, with other small Isles in diuers parts.

Columbus findeth out diuers other small Islandes

At his returne backe, he found many Spaniards dead and sicke, and some that hadde carried themselues scarsely honest with their companions: whereof he commanded some to bee hanged, and others to be well beaten, that had giuen forth euill speeches of him. By means whereof, he had some talke with the Vicare to the Pope, who had written to the King; accusing Columbus of cruelty and couetousnesse: which caused his Maiestie to send thither his Chamberlain Iohn de Aguado, who sent Columbus into Spaine prisoner, to render an account of his behauiour to the King.

Spaniards hanged for misdemeanor and Columbus accused to the king by the Popes Vicar.

Christopher Columbus obeying the kings command, went away to iustify himselfe. And arriuing at Medina del Campo (where as then the Court was) hee came before the King and Queene, presenting infinite graines of Gold to them; some whereof, weighed fifteene, and twenty Ounces a peece, with great lumps of Amber, goodly wilde Oliue trees, and wonderfull huge plumes of Parrats Feathers, vsed & worn by the Indians, beside many other strange things.

Columbus returned as a prisoner into Spaine.

He made report also vnto their Maiesties, concerning the Countries founde by him, greatly commending the Islands for their admirable riches; declaring beside, that in the moneth of December, which we hold to be the heauiest time of all Winter, that the Birds there, do then produce their yong ones on the trees; & in in March, the wilde raisins were ripe; and corne (sowne in Ianuarie) yeelded graine within seauentie dayes, Lettice and all rootes grew to be very great. Afterward, he gaue a faithfull report to the king, concerning the behauiour of the Spaniards, how he had punished some; and inflicted death vppon other, to the end, that his iustification might the more plainely appeare.

Greatly did the King both commend and thanke him for his good seruice, and knowing, that hee had doone no more then Iustice; declared him to be absolued of all imputations layed vnto his charge, furnishing him with eight shippes, for the finding out of other Countries: two whereof Columbus sent before with victualles and munition, and with the other sixe shippes, himselfe set away from Saint Luca de Barrameda, about the end of the month of Maie, in the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and seauen. And becausse fame and rumour of Indian treasure did spread it selfe, enciting diuers Pirates of Frauuce to make voyages ebroade: hee went to Madera, and from thence hee sent three shippes, by the right way, for the Island called Hispaniola, with three hundred banished men; and with the other three shippes, he went vnto the Isle of Cape de Verd, to make his voyage very neare to the Æquinoctiall, arriuing at the last in a great Countrey of firme land. On hee went coasting three hundred leagues, beyond the Cape with full sayle, and thwarting the Sea, came to Saint Dominico, a towne belonging to his brother Bartholomew, and builded on the Riuer Ozama, where hee was receiued to be gouernor, as was contained in his Letters of priuiledge and grant, which the King Catholique had made vnto him, and which hee brought thither with him. Albeit some were much displeased thereat, and his brother Bartholomew did not greatly like it: becausse (in his absence) till now, he had the care and managing of all affaires.

Columbus returneth honorably to the Indiaes.

His voyage very neare to the Equinoctiall.

Columbus hauing taken on him the gouernement, and made many enterprises against them of the Countrey, finding out many other Islands beside; grew to be enuied by the Spaniards, and in such sort, that a man named Roldan Simenes (a great Potestate or Iudge) mutined against him, and three-score and ten men more, all leagued and coniured against him, who forsaking Columbus, went to Siragua, and wrote infinite euilles of him and his brethren to the King. His Maiestie, beeing not a little mooued, that matters should be thus combustuous in the Indiaes, and the Queene taking it very heauily: suddenly sent Francesco de Bouadello, a knight of good repute, to be gouernour in those parts, and giuing him authoritie, eyther to punish or imprison the faultie.

Enuy against Columbus by Roldan Simenes and his associates, and great complaints written against him to the King.

This man came to the Island of Hispaniola, and foure Caruells with him, in the yeare, one thousand foure hundred ninetie and nine; and after hee had made inquisition in the Citie of Dominico; he sent Christopher Columbus, with Bartholomew and Diego his brethren, all prisoners to Spaine, with yron fetters on their feete. Being landed at Cadez, they were deliuered, by Commission sent from the King, and commanded to appeare at the court. Columbus readily obeyed thereto, and could so well shape his excuses (mingled with teares and sighes very passionately) that the King hauing heard him, and knowing his fidelitie, sent him againe (three yeares after) with foure Caruells, to discouer more new Countries, and this was in the yeare of our Lord God, 1502. or thereabouts.

Columbus and his two brethren Bartholomew and Diego sent prisoners into Spaine fetterd in yrons.

Columbus againe sent to the Indiaes with foure Caruells.

Columbus being come to the Island of Hispaniola, and arriuing neare to the riuer Ozama, Nicholas de Ouanda Gouernour of the Isle, would not suffer his entrance into the Cittie of Saint Dominico, whereat Columbus being much distasted, sent in to tell him: That if he might not come into the citty, which he himselfe had caussed to be builded; he would goe finde out an other Port, where he might be in better assurance. So parting thence, and coueting to search the Straits, for passing beyond the Æquinoctiall, which he had promised the King to doe: hee drew directly towards the West, withall, turning to the Cape of Niguerra, following still the Meridionall coast, returning then to Cuba, and after to Ianianca, where hee lost two Gallies, and with two other he went to discouer new lands. But not without great harmes and perills endured before, for some of his followers grew sicke, and certaine other Spaniards made warre vpon him.

Columbus denied entrance into Saint Dominico, goeth on to seek his further fortune.

Francesco

Franceſco de Porras, Captaine of one Galley, and Diego, brother to Columbus, hauing taken certayne ſmall Barkes, went towards the Iſle of Hiſpaniola: where the Natiues and Inhabitants ſeeing them; would admit them to haue no Victualls, but laide trappes and traines to kill them. Whereuppon, Chriſtopher Columbus calling ſome of them to him, reproued their lacke of kindneſſe and charity, entreating them to ſell him ſome victuals; aduiſing them further, that except they did ſuccor them, all they in the Iſland ſhould dye of the plague. And to giue them a ſigne as witneſſe of his words, he tolde them, that ſuch a day it would ſo come to paſſe; as they ſhould ſee the Moone whollie as red as bloode, and quite contrarie to her former condition.

The ingratitude of the people to Columbus in denying him victailes, and conſpiring againſt his life.

Afterwardes, when they behelde the Moone Eccliplſed, at the ſame houre of the day, as Columbus had foretolde (not knowing any rules of Aſtrologie) they verily beleeued his words. And, craving pardon of him, deſired him not to be offended with them; & brought him what victuals he could deſire. By this meanes, Columbus hauing gotten the victorie againſt thoſe Spaniards, gaue a name vnto the Port, calling it Porta S. Gloria.

The death of Chriſtopher Columbus at Valydolid in Spaine.

Returning home afterward into Spain, to yeelde an account of all that hee had done, being arriued at Valyllolid; a ſickneſſe ſeized on him, whereof hee dyed in May, in the yeare 1586. and was enterred at Siuill, in the Monaſtery of the Charter-houſe Monkes. During his life time, he was a man very patient in all his Trauailes, and in foure voyages which hee made into the Indiaes, both founde and conquered many Countries, vtterly vnknowne before: beſide, he builded a great part of the Towns and Caſtles in the Iſle of Hiſpaniola, purchaſing great renowne, by bringing to end many actions, ſo well deſeruing glory and fame; that his name can neuer be forgotten, or Spaine ceaſe to ſpeake, in giuing him ſuch true honour as he worthily merited.

The two worthy ſonnes to Chriſtopher Columbus.

He had two Sonnes, Don Diego, who was married to Madam Maria of Tolledo, daughter to Don Ferdinando, great Commandadore of Leon; and Don Ferdinando, who was neuer married, but hee had a Library, conſiſting of more then twelue thouſand Volumes, and which (at this preſent) is in the Conuent of Saint Dominico at Seuill, a worthy deede of the ſon to ſo famous a Father. As for King Ferdinand, he dyed in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand fiue hundred and ſixteene, hauing reigned fortie and two yeares, in the two kingdomes of Caſtile and Arragon: Queene Elizabeth his wife dyed before him, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1604.

Before wee cloſe vp this Diſcourſe of the New-found World, it ſhall not varie much from the matter, to ſpeake of a ſtrange opinion, among the people there naturally liuing; concerning the firſt men that euer were in the world, and likewiſe of the generall Floud or Deluge, as I doe finde it ſet downe by the worthy Gentleman of Fraunce, Anthony du Verdier, lord of Vaaprinaz, in this manner.

The peoples opinió of the firſt men in the world, & of the deluge

Among the Inhabitants of the Weaſt Indiaes, or New world, a common and generall receiued opinion was embraced with them, that (at the beginning of the world) from the Septentrionall or Northerne partes, there came a man called Con, or Conon, who had no bones in his whole body, and therefore went verie quicke and lightly, much ſhortening the wayes, abaſing the hills and mountaines, and raiſing the lowe-layd vallies, onelie with his word and will, and named himſelfe to be the ſonne of the Sunne.

Con, or Conon, a man without bones in his fleſh.

This man filled the earth with men and women, which he produced, giuing vnto them diuers fruites, and other things neceſſary for humane life. But by a diſpleaſure he receiued from them, hee conuerted the earth (which hee before had freely giuen them) into a drie and barren ſand, and tooke away the raine alſo, that it ſhould neuer more ſhowre downe, nor moiſture any place. Yet, as pittying their miſery, he left them riuers onely, to the end, that they might conſerue themſelues, in watering the grounds by theyr owne paine and labour.

A heauie diſpleaſure conceiued by Conon againſt men.

At length came one Pachamo, who was like-wiſe ſonne both to the Sunne and Moone, and (hauing expelled or baniſhed Conon) conuerted thoſe men into Cattes, and afterward created other men. The people tooke this man to be a God, and ſo he was generally reputed: vntill the Chriſtians came into thoſe countries, hauing erected a very good Temple vnto him, him, neare to Lima, it beeing the moſt renowned in all thoſe lands: becauſe of extraordinary deuotion there vſed, in regard of Oracles and Anſweres, which diuells gaue to Prieſts and Sacrificers there dwelling in diuers places. The Spaniards carried away all the golde and ſiluer (in wonderfull heapes) out of this Temple, and all the Oracles and Viſions ceaſed, diuine prayers hauing beene ſayd there, the Sacraments adminiſtred, and the Croſſe placed where the Idolles ſtoode, which cauſed no mean maruell and feare among the Indians.

Oracles and Anſwers of diuells in their Temple by Lima.

Moreouer they ſayd, that at a certaine time it rained ſo extreamely, that all the lowe grounds and lands were drowned, and all the world likewiſe; except ſuch as could hide themſelues within ſome caues, which were among the high mountaines, hauing little doores or mouthes of entrance, and cloſed ſo faſt to them, as no water could gaine the leaſt paſſage in, and therein alſo they had ſtore of foode and beaſts. Afterwards, when they felt the raine and water to be ſomewhat paſſed ouer, they ſent foorth two dogges, which returned all wet and beſmeared: whereby they iudged that the waters were not (as yet) wholly ſhrunke and gone away.

Their opinio concerning a general Deluge or drowning of the world.

Within ſome while after, they put foorth many dogges together, which returned in againe, drie and ſleeke as when they went abroade. And by this meanes they conceiued, that the waters were quite ſpent; and ſo came foorth agayne to dwell vppon the earth: where theyr greateſt paine and trauell was to kill infinite Serpents, which the mightie extreamitie of mudde and ſlime had engendred euery where.

By what meanes they gathered the ceſſation of the waters.

They beleeue an end of the world; but that a great drought ſhall goe before it, and that the Sunne and Moone (which they all adore and reuerence) ſhall looſe themſelues. And, vppon this occaſion, they make cries and lamentations whenſoeuer the Ecclypſes happen: but eſpecially them of the Sunne, as fearing then, that the Sunne, they, and all the whole World, ſhall be quite conſumed and deſtroyed together.

Their acknolegement of the worlds ending.

¶ Of the Excellencie and Dignitie of Marriage: with many ſingular and worthy examples, tending to that purpoſe.

CConcerning our preſent argument, wee haue had a chapter alreadie in our former Volume, declaring verie much good matter to that effect, but yet iuſtly deſeruing this addition or ſupplement; in regard, that nothing can be ſayd too much in the honour of Marriage. This holy inſtitution of Marriage, was made in the earthly Paradiſe before ſinne, in the time of Innocencie, when as God ſaid to our firſt Parents. Bring foorth fruit, and multiplie, and fill the earth. But it was not brought to effect, vntill the offence by them committed, and for which, they were expulſed out of the terreſtriall Paradiſe: as Saint Ierome hath obſerued in his Booke againſt Iouinian.

After the vniuerſall Deluge, God gaue command to the good Patriarch Noah againe; To encreaſe and multiplie, which is the principall occaſion, wherefore Marriage was ordayned, and hath euer ſince beene ſo generally recommended: that it hath beene, and is permitted to aged and decrepite people (free from all power of encreaſing, and out of hope of any linage) to marry: which yet is expedient for them (if I might ſay ſo) to the end, that they may paſſe theyr age the more ioyouſly, as in the kinde company of husband and wife, receiuing pleaſure, ſolace, conſolation, and comfortable ſeruices each to other. Euen as heereof we haue an example by Dauid, who (in his very olde age) tooke a yong maiden to wife, as namely, Abiſhag the Shunamite, with whom hee ordinarily lay, and ſhee ſlept in the boſome of the King, warming and comforting him, and yet the King knew her not carnally.

is as the other, two bodies, one ſoule, one ſpirit, one will, and one mutuall conſent ſympathizing in two bodies? The ſole married man and his wife, enuy not one another, but loue infinitely together, each depending vpon the other, ſhee repoſing in him, and he in her: euen as one ſelfe-ſame fleſh, one and the ſame concord, alike equally in all things, and all but one: One ioy, one ſorrow, one wealth, one pouerty, one gaine, one loſſe, and one ſelfe ſame dignitie. They are alwayes companions of one ſelfe ſame bed, one and the ſame table. Therefore they ſhall be two in one fleſh (ſaid God) and not three, or many.

Gods owne appointment in the Arke of Noah.

God would by no meanes haue in the Ark of Noah, to be any more women then men, to the end that they ſhould all be as one ſole woman. In briefe, the loue of the husband to the wife, and of the wife to her husband, ſurpaſſeth that of father and mother to their children, of children vnto the father, and that which brothers and ſiſters ought to haue together. And like as the Ring which the husband (euen as God) puts on the finger of his Spouſe or wife (as the ſoule to the Church) ought to be of golde, and round, as gold, being the moſt excellent of all mettalles: euen ſo this coniugal loue exceedeth all other, and ought to continue perpetually. And as Propertius ſaith: Omnis amor magnus, ſed apertò in coniuge maior. Euery loue is great, but in wedlocke it appeareth to be much greater. For, Father, Mother, Children, Brethren, Siſters, Couſins and Friends, all theſe are the workes of Fortune: but the Husband and the Wife are Myſteries of Almightie GOD: And man had his Wife, and Wife had her Husband, before there was eyther Father, Mother, or Children.

The incomparable loue of man and wife.

Propertius of coniugal loue.

Husband and wife before father, mother, or children.

The fruits of Marriage are of Almightie GOD, and not of Nature, from whence it enſueth, that children borne out of Marriage, that is to ſay, Baſtards, are called Naturall onely, but they which proceede of loyall Marriage, are ſayd to be Legitimate. And therefore, the opinion of Lawyers, is, That a childe borne out of marriage, hath no certaine father, but we may well ſay, a bad or lewd mother. He (ſay they) is the Sonne of the people, or elſe the Sonne of no body, that is the Sonne of an vnmarried woman. Onely marriage then (which Baldus calleth, The principle, originall and foundation of Mankinde) maketh Children and Heires certayne, augmenteth kindred, engendereth amitie among Allies, reuerenceth and pleaſeth God.

Baſtards haue no certain father, but are naturall children onely.

Baldus in C. Nonnulli col. 2. de raſc.

Holy Marriage was ſo pleaſing to the Authour thereof, that he would haue his onely Sonne, to bee borne of a married woman, and although it was his will, to be borne of a Virgine, without the ſeede of a man; yet was it not without the honour of Marriage. For it pleaſed him, to proceed from a Mother married; yet pure neuertheleſſe, exempt from any carnall ſoyling: elected to be the Arke of the Teſtament, the Buſh not burning, and the Violl of golde to containe the celeſtiall Manna; as well to declare the wonders of his infinite power, as to make that ſacred eſtate ſo much the more honorable. Witnes the preſence of the ſame ſon of God himſelfe, at the mariage of Cana in Galile, where expreſſing his gracious loue & furtherance, he conuerted water into wine, by an eſpecial and extraordinary miracle.

The great glorie done by God to the honorable eſtate of Marriage, as alſo at the wedding in Cana in Galilee.

Moreouer, there is not the name of any houſe or ſtocke, but (without a woman) it would be quite extinct; neither kinred perpetuated, family increaſed, or a Common wealth continue in intire condition, or any Empire hold, without ſuch help: which the firſt founders of the Romaine Empire approued; for, they hauing no wiues, deſired the Daughters of the Sabines, theyr neighbors, but they would not graunt thē. Whereuppon, there followed a rape or ſtealth of 683. of them, which procured a mighty & mortall warre, betwixt the Romans and the ſaid Sabines: albeit Romulus well foreſawe, that his Empire could not laſt, without women. For, the Citty being compoſed of houſes, and the Common-wealth of choſen Princes, both domeſtickes and familiers, how ſhall he gouerne a Citty, that hath not learned what it is to gouerne a priuate houſe? The Philoſopher Socrates teſtifieth, to haue learned more morall Philoſophie of women, then euer he could naturall, of Anaxagoras and Archelaus.

Aſſuredly, Mariage giues exercitation to morall Philoſophie; there is a domeſticall Common-wealth conioyned therewith, and in it ſelfe. For the gouernement whereof, a man may eaſily experiment the power of wiſedome, temperance, pietie, & al other vertues; whereby louing his wife, enstructing his children, ruling his family, protecting his goodes, ordering his house, and encreasing his race; the yeares of his life, will pace on the more happily. Whereas on the contrary, hee that seeketh to spend his life time without being married; is miserable, and worthie to be abandoned of all men.

The Lawe of Lycurgus made for the vnmarried yong men of Lacedemon.

For this cause, Lycurgus made a Lawe to the Lacedemonians, that all such as had attained vnto the age of eight and thirty yeares, without enioying women in marriage; should be banished in somer time, from all publique playes, spectacles and pastimes, iudging them as vnworthie, to be seene there amongst other in an open assembly. And in winter, they were led out naked, in the common view of the people, becaus they should be outraged and abused by words and exclamations of euery one, detested as vnwoorthie the name of men. And themselues enioyned to confesse, that they suffered these afflictions iustly, as hauing scorned and despised that religion: whereof they were preuaricators, and disobedient to the ordinance of Nature.

The Romans Law for men vnmarried til their age.

As concerning the Romans, they were not altogether so strict and seuere, & yet ordained, that such as had liued without marriage till their olde age: should bee condemned in paiment of a great summe of money to the publike Treasury, according to their quality and facultie. Plato appointed in his lawes, that such men as were not married, should enioy no honor estate, or publike dignity: but to be more charged with fines and mulcts, then any of the other Citizens.

A yong man of Lacedemon, would not arise out of his place in the publike Theater, to giue way and honour to a valiant ancient Captaine (neuer married) named Callidus, who was come thither to see the pastimes. And the Captaine growing offended at the arrogancy of the yong man because he disdained him in that manner, gaue him some words of heat and choler, whereto the yong man returned him this answer. O Callidus, thou hast not (as yet) begotten, neither occasioned the birth of any one that being now at mine age, and vnmaried as thou art, may arise hereafter to giue me place, and therefore no other esteeme is to bee made of thee. The Romaines in the time of Q. Metellus Consull, established many famous and worthy priuiledges for newe married persons; and for such as had three sons, as may be seen in the Digest, of such as had ten. And our greateſt Diuines, set downe twelue causes, the which hinder a man from marriage, and doe yet disanull marriage, although it be consummated & children procreated. As namely errour, con ition, vow, parentage, sin, to wit, of adultery or murther, diuersity & diffrence in religion, violence, prophanes in Priesthood, or profession of a false religiõ, bond and promise of contrary marriage, as being otherwise contracted, honesty, affinity, and inhability. Al these twelue, are bars and hinderances to marriage, according as Cardinall Caietane hath comprehended them in these verses.

Twelue especiall occasions that impeach and hinder marriage.

I haue a great desire to discourse particularly on euery one of these causes, if I had not such a multitude of other matters to speake of: let therefore (for this time) suffice that which hath bin said. And for such as are louers of Poesie, I referre them to the renowned Poet *Seauola de S. CHAP. IIII.

Of Partharites, King of the Lombards, who being pursued by Grimoald, fledde first to Catanus, King of the Auarians or Huns, afterward into France. And in the end after many heauy and troublesom Trauayls; was (with great honor and renowne) seated in his owne kingdome.

PArtharites was sonne to Albert King of the Lombards, who (after the death of his father) reigned at Myllaine; and Gondebert his brother, at Pauia. A strife and quarrell, growing betweene the two Bretheren, Gondebert sent sent Garibald, Duke of Thurine, towardes Grimoald, Duke of Beneuentum, a verie generous Captaine and Commaunder, requiring his assistance against Partharites, with solemne promise, of giuing him his Sister in marriage. But Garibald intending treason to his Lord and Master; perswaded Grimoald, to come and possesse the kingdome to his owne vse, which (thorow discord betweene the two brethren) was growne to weake estate, and verie neare vpon vpon vtter ruine.

Paulus Diaconus sets down this historie more at large.

Grimoald gaue ouer his Dukedome to his Sonne, in hope of a Kingdome.

When Grimoald vnderstood this, hee gaue ouer his Dukedome of Beneuentum to his sonne, creating him there as absolute Duke, and, with the greatest forces he could get together, prepared his iourney for Pauia: and in all citties and towns as he passed along, begot himselfe store of friends, for his better helpe in obtayning the kingdome. Being come to Pauia, and entring into priuate conference with Gondebert: by close practise and intelligence with Garibald, Gondebert was slaine at a Banquet, and he made possessour of the kingdome. No sooner did Partharites heare these sad tydings, but, leauing faire Rhodalinda his wife and Queene, and a yoong sonne of his (both confined by Grimoald to Beneuentum for close custody) fled secretly away, making his recourse to Cacanus, king of the Auarians or Hunnes.

Grimoald hauing made sure his Kingdome at Pauia, and vnderstanding, that Partharites secured his safetie with Cacanus: sent Ambassadours to him, to let him know, that if hee kept Partharites in his kingdome, no long peace should continue betweene him and the Lombardes, but he must expect a King as his enemie. According to this Ambassage, the King of the Auarians called Partharites to him in secret, desiring him, that he would wander whither himselfe pleased: becausse (thorow his meanes) the Auarians might not fall into the hatred of the Lombardes. And so, vpon a royall, sad and mutuall interchange of wofull lamentations on eyther side; the two kings parted, as might haue moued pitty in Marble to behold it.

Grimoald suffered not Partharites to abide with Cacanus.

A hard case, when a King is constrained to truste to his enemy for mercie.

Partharites, frustrated now of all helpe and comfort, returning into Italie againe: purposed his repaire to his enemie Grimoald, confiding on his kingly clemencie, bicause he weas left destitute of any other succour. And beeing come neare to the City of Lody, he called to a Gentleman of his, named Vnulphus, in whom his intimate trust wholly consisted, sending him before, to acquaint Grimoald with his coming, and to deale iustly for his safetie. Vnulphus presented himselfe before the new-made King, vsing such wise and honourable language to him, concerning Partharites his King and Maister, making recourse to his royall mercie, and trusting onely in his goodnesse; that he would freely submit himselfe to him, if he (with the like benignitie) would vouchsafe to embrace him.

Vnulphus a loiall seruant to Partharites

So effectually did Vnulphus deliuer his message, and Grimoald (eyther in pride or pleasure) accept it: that hee promised and sware vpon his faith, no displesure should any way be dohe to the King his maister, he might come when he would, & builde securely vpon his faith. Vnulphus, hauing brought backe this aunswere to Partharites, hee went and presented himselfe before Grimoald, meerely prostrate at his feete, who took him vp graciously, & in most friendly manner kissed him: whereuppon, Partharites beganne thus: Sith I am your humble vassaile and seruant, and knowing you to be most Christian, and a faithfull louer of pietie: though I might liue safe among Pagans, yet, building vpon your mildnesse and mercy, I am come, and heere yeeld my selfe at your feete.

Partharites presenteth himselfe before Grimoald.

Conference between Grimoald and Partharites.

Grimoald vsing his accustomed oathes, promised him, saying: By him that made me to be borne, seeing you haue put your selfe into my power, you shall suffer no harme anie way whatsoeuer; but I will take such order, that you shall liue well and honorably. So he commanded him a conuenient lodging, with entertainement aunswerable to his qualitie, and all things affoorded to him in plentifull maner. Partharites being departed from the King, to such place as was appoynted for him; it came to passe, that the people flocked and resorted daily thither (hauing formerly knowne & honoured him) earnestly desiring to see and salute him.

Grimoald his protestations to Partharites and the honorable intertainment he gaue him.

But see how ready euill tongues are to commit mischiefe, diuers flatterers and audacious Informers, obseruing the peoples kind greetings to Partharites: reported it in such maner to Grimoald, that they incensed him very strangely, perswading him, that if he did not the sooner procure Sycophants and flatterers are alwayes too neare about kings and princes.

The death of Partharites is vowed by Grimoald.

the death of Partharites, hee would bee ſhaken out of his kingdom, yea, and loſe his life likewiſe; for Partharites lodging ſeemed now, rather to be a Court then his. Grimoald beeing a man ouer-eaſie in beleefe, and led away with the leaſt perſwaſions; became ſo confounded vvith iealouſie and diſtruſt, that (neuer remembring his ſolemne oathes and promiſes) he fell into an extraordinary rage, and in extremity of heate and choller, ſwore the death of innocent Partharites, wanting nothing but aduice and meanes, how it might both ſafely and ſodainely bee effected.

One of Grimoalds owne Gentlemen bewrayed the treaſon.

Now, becauſe it grew ſomewhat late, and on the morrow the deed muſt needes be done; he cauſed (that Euening) great ſtore of delicate meates and wines to bee ſent to Partharites, purpoſely to make him drunke: that being ouercome with eating and drinking, and all his ſenſes poſſeſſed with drowſineſſe, hee might haue the leſſe care of his health, and ſo his life be the ſooner betrayed. But a Gentleman who before had ſerued the father of Partharites, and brought him theſe Iunkets from the King: ſtouping his head lowe beneath the table, as doing him reuerẽce and embracing his knee, ſecretly reuealed to him, how Grimoald had concluded his death, and that this nightes iouiall drinking ſupper, muſt be a ſolemne induction thereto.

The wiſedom of Partharites in preuenting the Treaſon prepared for him.

Heereupon, Partharites immediately, (but very couertly) gaue order vnto his Cup bearer and Taſter, to fill and bring him no other drinke all ſupper while, but ſome ſmall quantities of water onely, and in his priuate ſiluer Bowle. So that the Courtiers (who were ſent to keepe him company) quaffing and carowſing many healths of the King to Partharites, deſiring him ſtill to pledge them in like manner, as thereby expreſſing his loue to the King: Partharites accepted all their ſeuerall charges, proteſting all honor and reuerence to Grimoald, rowſſing vp cup after cup as readily as they, ſeeming as merrie as any of them all, and yet drank nothing elſe but water. Supper being ended, and the Courtiers returning back to the king, reported the iocond behauior of Partharites, and how forward ſtill he was in turning off his owne Bolle, as readily as they did theirs, and neuer refuſed to pledge his Highneſſe health, thinking him to be very farre ſpent with wine. Whereat Grimoald heartily reioycing, merrily ſaide; Alas poore ſilly Drunkard, little thinkes hee, that the Wine and his blood wil lye mingled on the earth to morrow together, in deſpight of all the friends he hath.

The beſt and quickeſt witted drinkers, may ſomtime be deceyued.

The ſame night, he ſent ſtrong guards to watch about the houſe where Partharites was lodged, becauſe he ſhould haue no meanes to eſcape, nor any frends com to giue him aſſiſtance. But the poor harmleſſe Prince, when ſupper was paſt, and al the Courtiers departed thence (remayning alone in his Chamber, & none with him but Vnulphus, and a Page that vſed to waite neereſt about, to helpe his Garments both off and on, they beeing both his faithfull ſeruants, and in whom he repoſed moſt confidence:) he diſcouered plainely to them, how peremptorily his death was concluded on by Grimoald, and what a ſtrong watch was ſet round about his lodging, ſo that now their poor Lord and Maiſters life muſt needs periſh by his treachery.

Partharites diſcouereth his danger to Vnulphus and his Page.

Vnulphus hauing a prompt and readie witte, louing his Lord deerely, & caring for no danger to himſelfe, ſo hee might ſet him free from perill: by means of certaine Blankets belonging to a bedde, and a Beares skinne which he found there in his chamber by chaunce, ſo ſubſtantially he diſguiſed Partharites, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh him from a meere Country Boore or Pezant, and his counterfeiting drunkenneſſe, made the matter to ſeeme the more likely. Vnulphus had gotten a good Faggot-ſtick, and pretending ſweating, with beating that drunken Raſcall (for ſo, and ſomtimes worſe he commonly called him) tumbled him firſt downe the ſtaires, and laſtly out of doores, labouring ſtill as if he had giuen many ſore blowes. Which when the Guardes there attending perceyued, they demaunded of Vnulphus, what was the matter? Hee anſwered, ſaying: Here is a drunken ſlaue, who while the Lordes were heere at Supper with Partharites, hath ſecretly gotten in, and ſtolne himſelfe ſtarke drunke; keeping ſuch a terrible noiſe, that my Lord (who is as drunk as hee) I feare can take no reſt, and by no meanes would I haue him to bee diſturbed.

The cleanely ſhift of Vnulphus to ſaue the life of his kingly maſter

Vnulphus cunningly beguileth the Guard, and gaineth the eſcape of Partharites.

No

No doubt at all made the Guardes of Vnulphus his words, but laughing, to ſee the ſlaue belabored ſo luſtily; ſuffered him to driue him on before him, bidding him beate ſtill, and ſpare him not. While the Guards ſtood laughing at this merry ieſt, no man needed to bid them make haſt, & Partharites being quickly got out of ſight, Vnulphus returned to the lodging, which made the Guards the more confidently perſwaded, and ſecured the King from all purſuite. Moreouer, after the Kings departure in that manner, the faithfull Page kept the doors lockt vp faſt, till Vnulphus was returned againe: where they two only remained in the chamber, praying for their Kings proſperous ſucceſſe; who arriued that night at the Towne of Aſte, and from thence (paſſing the mountaines) went into Fraunce.

Euery thing ſuted well for the Kings ſafe deliuering from his enemie.

On the morrow morning, meſſengers came from the King, to bring Partharites to the Pallace, and beating at the doore, the Page ſpake out at the windowe, ſaying: Good Gentlemen forbeare, his Maieſtie hath drunke ſomewhat hard, is very ſleepy, and therfore I pray ye trouble not his reſt. Whereto they in modeſty yeelding, went and reported the ſame to Grimoald, who well liked that he ſhould ſleep ſo long: yet ſent them againe in all haſte, and howſoeuer (awake or aſleep) to bring him away with them. The Souldiers fearing to diſpleaſe the king, came and knockt earneſtly at the doore; but being intreated by the Page, as aforeſaid, they boldely broke the doore open, & ſeeking for Partharites in his bed, found him not, which made them to demaund, what was becom of him; & the Page ſaid, he was fled.

Grimoald ſends for Partharites to the Palace, in hope to execute his will vpon him.

Preſently were Vnulphus and the Page ſeized on, and haled furiouſly to the Pallace, where being broght before the king; with vnappalled countenance, they tolde, that the King had eſcaped with life, diſcouering the maner truely how, and dreading no infliction for the fact. When Grimoald had aduiſedly conſidered on theyr faith and loyalty, he called them ſeuerally againe before him; wiſhing he had ſuch an other faithfull Page, exhorting him earneſtly, to keepe his loyalty to his Lord Partharites, promiſing to recompēce him worthily for it. Vnulphus afterwards was brought againe before him, and the king greatly commending both his wiſedome & honeſty; demanded, whether he would chuſe to liue with him in good grace and acceptance, or follow Partherites in the extremity of his fortunes? whereto Vnulphus ſaid, with an oath, That he would rather chuſe to die with Partharites, in all tormēts whatſoeuer; then liue any where elſe, with all the pleaſures and delights that the world could giue him.

Vnulphus and the Page violētly haled to Court, & the whole matter confeſſed.

The worthy anſwer of a loyall and conſtant ſeruant.

The ſame demand was alſo made to the Page, & his anſwer was the like in effect: whereon the King highly extolling theyr vnparaleld loyaltie; prayed them both, to commaund whatſoeuer his Court affoorded, & go in all ſafety to ſeek their maſter. Prouided of all things they could deſire or carry with them, and ſecuritie granted for their ſafe paſſage; they ſet onward to France, in a longing deſire to meete with Partharites; as ſoone after they did, to great ioy and comfort on euery ſide. But firſt, newes being abroade, that Grimoald had vnited peace with Dagobert King of France: it made Partharites fearful of ſome cloſe ambuſhes to be layed for him, & ſo he might be ſent backe to Grimoald again: which made him forſake France, & to ſhip himſelfe for England: all which calamities happened to him, before his two faithfull ſeruants could any where finde him.

The honorable dealing of Grimoald with Vnulphus and the Page, ſending them after their royal Maiſter.

Being on the Sea all together, and (in hope of good ſucceſſe) boūd for England, they had not paſt a full league from land: But Partharites heard a voyce, ſeeming to come directly from the ſhoare where hee took ſhipping, demanding in this maner: Speake there, is Partharites in the ſhip, or no? Partharites replyed without pauſing: Who is it that calleth Partharites? I am that moſt vnhappy man, and (bleſſed be heauen) heere I am. Tell him then (anſwered the voyce) his natiue Country calles him home, and further he may not goe; for, within three dayes, Grimoald is dead. Partharites amaſed at this ſtrange accident, required fauor to be landed with his ſeruants again; but could neuer know him that tolde thoſe tidings of Grimoalds death, which made him verily perſuaded, that it was no mortal man, but his owne good Angell, that thus enſtructed him, after his paſſing thorow ſo many miſeries.

A ſtrange and myraculous accident happening to Partharites, ſayling towards England.

Partharites returning home againe, towardes his owne natiue Countrey, hee was no ſooner arriued at the limites of Italie; but he met there with a goodly company of Lombards, with Laurell wreathes on their heads, and Palme branches in their hands, who purposely attended there for his comming, and so conducted him ioyfully to Pauia; from whence, the Sonne of Grimoald being expelled, he was there (by generall consent) created absolute King of the Lombards, within three moneths after the death of Grimoald. He dispatched Poasts to Beneuentum, in quest of Rodesinda his Queene and Wife, as also his sonne Cunibert. And being a man pious, Catholique, a great obseruer of Iustice, and charitable to the poore; so soon as he was quietly seated in his kingdome, he builded a goodly Monastery, neere vnto the Riuer Thesina, in which sometime he had concealed himselfe, when he was enforced from place to place; dedicating the Temple to Gods seruice, and in honour of S. Agatha the Virgin & Martyr, planting therein many religious virgins, and endowing it with great liberality of rents and reuennues. His Queene also, after her many troubles, and long separation frō her husband, erected the Church of our Lady without the walles, bestowing infinite rich and precious ornaments thereon. And at length, Partharites (hauing reigned eighteene yeares) changed this mortall life for a better, to the great greefe of his louing Subiects the Lombards.

A goodly Monastery buil ded by Partharites, neere to the Riuer Thesina in Italy.

Nor may we heere omit to say somewhat of Garibald, Duke of Thurine, the beginner of this poore Princes calamities. He hauing instigated (as hath bin related) Grimoald, Duke of Beneuentum, to murder Gondebert, King of the Lombards, treacherously: within no long while after, a certaine meane man, of little or no respect at all, comming to the Citty of Thurine, and vnderstanding, that Garibald would be in the cheefe Church on Easter day neere ensuing; stood on the steps of the Font for baptisme, leaning carelessely on his left arme, by a collome of the Tabernacle, being at the very entrance into the Church, hauing a weapon ready drawne vnder his Cloake. So soone as Garibald came to bee neere him; he (not fearing all the traine about him) suddenly ran the Rapier quite through his body, that instantly he fell downe dead. Such as attended Garibald; being somewhat amazed at so vnexpected an accident, pursuing the murderer, could fasten no hold on him, vntill they had slaine him, with many weapons being in his body at once. So, although he lost his life; yet couragiously he reuenged the iniurious act, committed on Gondebert his Lord & Master.

CHAP. V.

What manner of men those were and are, that be called Doctors of Sorbonne, or Sorbonnists.

I Am sure there are many, that neuer saw the goodly, rich, populous, commodious, and well gouerned City and Vniuersity of Paris; and yet diuers that haue seene it, or read the Antiquities thereof, may perhaps be ignorant, what kinde of men they are, that beare the title or name of Doctors of Sorbonne. For all other Doctors are honoured by those Cities names, wherein they receiued their degrees: As Doctours of Louuaine, of Poictiers, of Doway, of Tholosa, of Montpelier, of Pauia, of Bologna, of Tubinge, of Fribourge, and so of diuers other. But the Doctours in diuinity of Sorbonne, beare their name, not of the City where they receiued their licences and degrees Doctorall; but of the place peculiarly. A matter which hath much amazed many, & raised doubt in diuers other, that neuer had the happinesse to visit Paris; in which respect, I purpose to set down the true originall thereof, how, and vpon what occasion it came so to passe.

All Doctors, except they of Sorbonne, are instituted by names of the Cities & Vniuersities where they were graduet

It is to be vnderstood, as I haue elsewhere saide, that the course of nature will sooner faile; then people be any other but as their Princes are, as Cassiodorus saieth. King Lewis, ninth of that name, reigning King in France, whereas other Princes deuised (euen as to this day many do) how to build Palaces & vnprofitable houses, for pride, luxury and prodigality: this holy & religious King caused Churches to be erected, Hospitals, Abbayes, Colledges, & other places of piety; in imitation of whom, many of his Subiects, & other other ſtrangers did the like.

Amongſt other, there was a Diuine of the Kings houſe, his Almoner, and one of his Preachers, who was thought to bee prouided of ſome good Benefice; yet neyther enriched his kinred, or ſpent his reuenues in vanities, as too many churchmen now-adayes vſe to doe. This good man was called Maſter Robert de Sorbonne: but to relate further, of what Nation hee was, or of what Family, hath ſcarcely (as yet) beene diſcouered by any. In briefe, mooued in great pietie, and by the example of his King; hee bought a place, which vſually was called in Latine, Locum Termarum Cæſaris, that is to ſay, The place of Cæſars Bathes. And it is ſayd, that Iulian, Nephew to the Emperour Conſtantine, Gouernour of the Gaules, cauſed thoſe Bathes to be builded, and the Lodgings of Cluny, which then were without the Citty of Paris, and as places of pleaſure: according as we reade in ſome Epiſtles, which Iulian wrote to them of Antioche. The ſaide Iulian was afterwardes Emperour, ſirnamed the Apoſtata by the Chriſtians. And then, ſuch as pretended to the Imperiall Crowne, termed themſelues Cæſars: as now at this day, ſuch as are deſigned Emperours after him liuing, are called Kings of the Romaines.

The place that at this day is called Sorbonne, how, and by whom it was bought.

In this place there is apparance, that there the Cæſars Bathes were, as euidently may be diſcerned, by the channells of hewne ſtone, which were found in the yeare of our Lord God, one thouſand fiue hundred forty and foure, at the gate of Saint Iames, when Baſtions and Rampires were then made, to reſiſt the forces of Charles the fift, Emperour, who was entred into Fraunce with a mighty army. Which gutters or cõducts of water, were continued from the village of Arcueill (ſo named, in regarde of Arches builded of Bricke, as yet to this preſent are to bee ſeene; or of the Latine compounded word Aquæ ductio) and reaching into Paris. Thoſe conducts of water ſerued well for thoſe Bathes, and were needfull now to be renewed, to water the higher parts of the Vniuerſitie of Paris (which haue great neede thereof) if my maiſters the Eſcheuins, would therein employ theyr paines.

Aquæducts or Gutters for conueying of water from Arcueill to Paris.

As already hath beene ſayd, this place was builded to bathe or waſh the Romain Emperours, Conſulls, Proconſulls, and ſuch like, and was bought by the ſaid Maſter Robert Sorbonne, in the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand two hundred threeſcore and foure. If you deſire to know, to whom (as then) that place appertayned; I muſt therein confeſſe mine ignorance, although I haue made good ſearch in the euidences, belonging to that place of Sorbonne, & elſewhere (ſpecifying large rents & reuenews thereto belonging, yet much enlarged by the bounty of K. Lewis 9. king of France, and others, calling it only Sorbonne) and finding it appoynted, to maintaine a certayne number of Doctors, who ſhould reade publiquely in Diuinitie; and and alſo of Batchellers to ſtudy, there to be lodged and maintained. Whereuppon, from that time to this preſent, the Profeſſors, Batchellers, and other Students in this Colledge, did endeuoure themſelues ſo induſtriouſly, and became ſo capable; as there is hardly any other Colledge throughout all Chriſtendome, wherein may be found men ſo ready and exact in Diuinitie, as they are that belong to this Sorbonne Colledge.

Bathes for the emperors and conſulls of Rome.

Vpon what occaſion, and to what end the Colledge of Sorbonne was erected.

The Students in this Houſe, are not (as commonly elſe-where) young men, but wel ſtept in yeares; becauſe they haue read publiquely, enſtructing the courſe of Philoſophie, which is perfourmed in three yeares, in regard there are as many parts, which are Logicke, Phyſicke and Metaphyſicke. And many times ſome ſuch are there, that haue made three courſes, which are nine yeares, and employed by them in publique Lectures; before they will aduenture to ſtudy or reade publikely in Diuinitie; and therefore it is no matter of maruell, that there ſhould continually be ſuch ſingulerly learned men in that Colledge.

The Doctours and Batchellers, ouer & beſide their being great Philoſophers, are likewiſe very skilfull in humane learning, and vnderſtand the tongues, Greeke, Latine and Hebrew, ſpeaking them (for the moſt part) eloquently. They are held in ſuch reputation, that (commonly) they deale in the greateſt difficulties, and in all Eccleſiaſticall occaſions, their aduice is wholly vſed; the Colledge being reputed as one of the beſt Bulwarks to the Romain Catholique Church, and ſo accounted through Chriſtendome.

The Batchellers of Sorbonne, how they become ſo learned.

Very

Admirable disputations of the Doctors of Sorbonne, & how their order began at the first.

Very laborious are they in their disputations of the sacred Scriptures, resolute, and of great vnderstanding, and the generall disputes vsed in this Colledge, are on euery Friday after the Feasts of S. Peter & S. Paul, in the Moneth of Iune, vntill the solemnity of the Feast of All-Saints, the answerer standing there from morning till euening, and bound to answere all the Batchellors Questions, which commonly are aboue two hundred in number, euery one keeping his ranke and place: nor is there any President, to support him that answereth, whereas all other faculties do not obserue any such order. It is reported, that this custome was introduced by a religious man, of the order of S. Frances, who (to make proofe of his knoledge) kept open the Schoole all the whole day: and his fellowes, coueting after as much honour as hee had; continued the same course, so that whatsoeuer consisted in the will of the arguers and answerers, became conuerted into an inuiolable loue.

Doctours of Paris are vsually tearmed Doctours of worth and esteeme.

Learned Doctours are as Assistants there, to the end they may iudge on the merit of men, and vnderstand withall, to whom the prime places for Licences are to be giuen. And thus you see, why all Doctors in the facultie of diuinity, which receiue their degrees in that place of Sorbonne; are stiled by an Emphasis, Doctors of Sorbonne, or Sorbonnists, because that there are principall acts obserued, to approue the learning of any, that would aspire to haue the degree of a Doctor. And this place is perticularly noted, as well for antiquity (hauing bene one of the appurtenances to the Pallace Imperiall, at such time as the Romanes were Lords of Gaule, as I declared in the beginning of this Chapter,) As also in regard of the famous men, renowned for their learning and knowledge, that liue (ordinarily) in a sacred society in that Colledge. In which respect, the most part of the best Cities in France, Bishoppricks and Collegiate Churches, resort thither, to make choyse of their Diuines, to prouide them of Prebends, and other reuennues meete for such men.

CHAP. VI.

That the Law of the Emperour Seuerus, and that of Solon, for promoting any one to Office and Authority in the Common-wealth (being first informed, of a mans life & good manners) was much better then those of the Venetians, Florentines, Genewayes and Lucanes; examining after the time of their Iurisdiction is past.

Lampridius in the life of the said Alexander Seuerus.

THe Emperour Seuerus, the eighteenth, reigning in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 196. albeit that he was no Christian; yet (after the example of Christianity) wold ordinarily say: That it was great shame, to bee lesse carefull of the life of a Gouernor, or one that exerciseth the place of iudgement; then the Christians were, in the quality of their Shepheards and Watchmen ouer their Flocks. For they obserued a kinde of Siquis, or a Bill fixed vpon Poasts, wherein were set downe the names, of such as aspired to any Ecclesiasticall dignity, and examined their liues and behauiour with strictest seuerity. In the very same manner, this good Emperor, when hee intended to prouide any man for the gouernment of a Prouince, or place where iudgment was to be vsed, or whatsoeuer else appeared requisite: would first set vp publike Placards, or Bils of inscription, in diuers places about the Citty, to the ende, that if any notorious vice were knowne, or criminall cause deseruing open detection, in such as were named in those publike Placards: it was lawfull for all men, to accuse or set downe their blemishes & incapacities, that no wicked or vnworthy person, might be aduanced to such degree of eminency. Thus euery one, and all in generall were permitted to accuse; but yet on penalty of life, if it should be proued to be scandall or calumniation, and thereupon, an especiall Law was ordained and enrouled expressely.

Placards Bils of Siquis, or publike inscription fixed vpon Poasts, and to what end they were ordained.

In my poore opinion, this Law seemeth much more honest and equall, then those

The Authors comparison of precedency with present ordenations.

thoſe now adayes in vſe, with the Venetians, Florentines, Genewaies, and Lucanes, who after the time of a mans Office is expired, or, that the limitation of his gouernment ceaſſeth: do then make enquiry, to cauſe him render an account of his adminiſtration, and then proceed againſt him according to his demerits. A wicked Magiſtrate, and publike Concuſſionary or extortioner, by giuing a piece of bread to dogs barking at him, ſo to ſtop their mouths: may thus ſalue his thefts, and other depredations of his vile life.

A good aduice againſt vnlawful euaſions.

It is much more expedient, to preuent a diſeaſe, then to tarry till it come, & then to expulſe it: notwithſtanding, it is better late, then neuer, to the ende (at the leaſt) that feare of ſearch and ſyndication, may retaine Officers within compaſſe of their duty.

It is better to chaſtiſe ſinne late, then neuer.

And yet the ordination of Solon (methinks) was farre better, whereby the liues of Officers was to be examined, both before and after their authority, as we reade in the lawes ſet downe by Demoſthenes. For by examining the life and manners of ſuch, as couet or ſeeke after degrees of Offices, Benefices, Knighthood, exemptions, immunities, gifts and rewards, if they appeare to bee foule or deformed: not onely they may be reiected, but alſo directly (in iuſtice) puniſhed, & rewards diſtributed to honeſt perſons, according to the merit of euery man. And by an hermonious proportion, the purſſe ſhold be giuen to the moſt faithfull; Armes to the moſt valiant; Iuſtice degree to the vprighteſt; cenſure to the entireſt; painfull trauaile to the ſtrongeſt and beſt able; Prelacy to the moſt learned and deuouteſt. And yet neuertheleſſe, carrying reſpect to Nobility, wealth, age, and the power of euery one, as alſo the quality of their charges and offices: for it were very ridiculous, to make a Iudge a Warriour, a Prelate a common Lawyer, or a Soldiour to manage caſes of conſcience.

What kinde of men are in equity to be aduanced to places of authority.

Reſpect is the beſt rule to be ordered by.

Now for the better comprehenſion of our purpoſe in this Chapter, it is to be obſerued, that Alexander Seuerus neuer was a Chriſtian: but a worthy man otherwiſe, and when he made that Edict. As being deſirous to place good Magiſtrats, to gouerne in the Romaine Commonwealth vnder his Empire (finding it full of exacting Officers) in imitation of the Chriſtians; euen (as it is ſaide) in the ſecond time of the Primitiue Church. And when (for any perticular Church) any need appeared of a Biſhoppe, a Prieſt, a Deacon, or ſome other Officer; the Chriſtians (in thoſe times) fixed vp their Placards, ſetting downe the name of him or them, that ſought to haue ſuch office and dignity: they did it to ſuch ende, that if any vice were knowne in him or them; obiection might bee made againſt the pretendant, ſo to debout him of his requiſition and ſute.

Alexander Seuerus was no Chriſtian, yet imitated the Chriſtians in making this Edict.

And queſtionleſſe, great need there was, that this pollicy ſhould bee obſerued among the Chriſtians; for the Pagans & Idolaters then (being their capitall enemies) ſought nothing more, then ſome ſubiect or argument, whereby to iniurie and calumniate the Paſtors and Prelates among the Chriſtians, onely to make thē odious to the people. And they that were promoted vnto Eccleſiaſticall Offices in thoſe dayes, had no other ſtipend or reward, but only ſome collection of Corne and other matters, among the Chriſtians of the Churches then, to make them garments, and maintaine them poorely enough, being prouided of thoſe places, & oftentimes their beſt aſſurance was moſt cruell martyrdome. And that which made men then deſirous of Eccleſiaſticall aduancements, was not (as now adayes) to deriue thence large benefits & reuennues: for then, there were not any foundations ordained, neyther were any tenths leuied for or from them. But the Paſtours then, in a moſt ſacred kinde of charity, coueted to enſtruct the ignorant, and confirme in faith, intimidate, affrighted and diſperſed Chriſtians, perſecuted by the Romanes and other Princes, onely for the Chriſtian faith, and to encourage them for ſuffering martyrdome, according as Euſebius (who liued in thoſe times) hath written at large.

The Paſtours and Preachers among the Chriſtians were very poore in the beginning of vndertaking their charges

As for the eſtates of the Venetians, Genewayes, Lucanes, and others now exerciſed in Italy, they are not during life, as it is in France: wherein yet it is not much amiſſe, to haue information of them, vpon the expiration of their charges, to cauſe terror in their offices ſucceſſors, for beſt carriage and behauior in their dutie, leaſt a further inquiſition come vpon them. In France, eſtates and offices are exerciſed, during during life of the party in poſſeſſion: but yet with caution, that if he commit any vnbeſeeming acte, to bee inſtantly diſmiſſed, and (oftentimes) death enſueth thervpon. But before any man may bee ſo aduanced, the Statutes of France haue enioyned, that good information muſt be made, concerning the life and manners of the party to enioy it; before ſuch perſons as his Maieſty, or other ſoueraigne Iudges ſhall appoint.

The Kings of Spaine, cauſe information of life and behauiour, of any that aime at degrees and offices, before they are admitted to them. And moreouer, at euery fiue yeares end, ſometime in more, and in leſſe compaſſe of yeares very often; ſecret enquiries & informations are made, of all Officers in euery Seigneury: as in all the Spaines, the Kingdomes of Naples, Sicily, Millaine, the lower Countries of Germany, the County of Bourgongne, the Dutchy of Luxembourg, and other, & namely of the places where they exerciſe their Offices. And if the King do finde, that they miſ-behaued themſelues; his Councell depoſeth them, appointing other in their places, of whom (likewiſe) the life and conuerſation is well queſtioned. Sometimes they are put to death, but very rarely, and many times depoſed, yet without note of infamy: only giuing them to vnderſtand, that the King is not well contented with their ſeruice. Heere is alſo to be vnderſtood, that information commeth not onely againſt Officers of Iuſtice, as Aduocates, Procurators, Pregnotaries, Iudges ſoueraigne and ſubalternate: but likewiſe againſt Eccleſiaſticks, and men of warre. By which means, euery one is compelled to containe himſelfe within compaſſe of duty; and beſide, the eſtates & offices are not vendible.

CHAP. VII.

Of the reaſon and cauſe, why both ſome Princes, and alſo ſome Common-wealths, haue alwaies proſperouſly flouriſhed in the times of warre; and in peacefull dayes haue runne to decay and ruine.

ALthough I diſcourſe in this Chapter, that ſome Princes and Common-wealths haue bin very happy and ſucceſſull, in times of wars and moleſtations; and contrariwiſe, in times of peace haue become vicious, running on to ruine and deſolation: yet I neyther will, or do therby inferre, that warre is to bee eſteemed more neceſſary then peace. But I will ſhew the cauſes whereby (not all Common-wealths, nor all Princes in generall) yet many liued more vertuouſly & happily in the times of war, then in their eaſier dayes of peace. And that ſo ſoone as they came to enioy peace; they fell into ruine, vtterly loſing all their greatneſſe & ſplendour. Euen like vnto Iron, which not being vſed or handled, or whereof no frequent employment is made; ruſteth and conſumeth of it ſelfe. And this enſued by no other occaſion, but only through negligence and want of reſpect, that when they enioyed the Sunny daies of peace; no diſcreete order was taken, for inſtitution of good life and pollicie, and how to make vſe (as men ought to doe) of ſuch ſweet tranquility.

Peace is alwayes to be preferred before war in any Kingdome.

In Sunſhine dayes men haue greateſt need to feare ſtormes.

Before I come to approoue my ſayings by examples, I would firſt make a briefe relation, concerning the actions of men of warre; to demonſtrate, that it is (almoſt) vtterly incredible, that any goodneſſe can deriue it ſelfe from war. For, who is a greater enemy to the peacefull man, then the furious Soldior? To the milde, meeke countriman, then the bloody Warriour? To the Philoſopher, then the fierce Captaine? To the wiſe, then fooles? Becauſe the greateſt delight and felicity of warriors, is, to forradge Countries, rob the husbandmen, burne Towns and Villages, to maſſacre good men, to giue all licence to the wicked, to beſiege, batter, force and ranſacke houſes, to kill olde and young, to ſpare no age or ſexe, to rauiſh Wiues and Virgins, to bathe their hands brutiſhly in innocent blood, to make a ſpoile of ſacred things, to ruinate Temples, to blaſpheme the Name of God, to trample (vnder their foule feete) all right both diuine and humane. Theſe are the fruites of warre, highly acceptable and pleaſing to fiery-eyde Soldiors, abhominable to good men, & deteſtable before God. Needleſſe is it to amplifie with words, that which hath bin too well ſeene and felt in ouer-many places, whoſe very memory hath ſtartled the ſoules

The fruits are but bad that proceed from war, be it neuer ſo iuſtly followed.

Where warre keepes his reuels, all goes to wracke and ruine, without any pitty or remorſe.

soules of them in best safety, and made their haire stand on ende, that thought themselues of boldest resolution.

If then the case stand thus, and that war hath so many discommodities and mischieses waiting vppon it: how can any good ensue from it?

Further wee are to vnderstand, that when Soldiours are guided by Captaines voide of iudgement, vnderstanding and vertue: all the forenamed euils and mischieses are ordinarily committed. But if they haue a vertuous Commander, hee will carry himselfe so much the more modestly. And like as greatnesse of courage & magnanimity, is a bright flaming Beacon, leading the way to all other vertues, and exalteth Princes vnto the very highest point of honor: euen so it is vertue (onely) likewise, that most discourageth the hearts of enemies, be they neuer so potent or powerfull warriours, and (oftentimes) gaineth the victory, without a blow deliuered on either side.

Vertue is many times victorious without any blowes giuen.

Heereof I intend to set downe some examples, that in the Roman Commonwealth, and in the times of their war; there was greater store of vertuous minded men, then when they liued in peace and quietnesse. First let vs remember Furius Camillus, who hauing sent backe the children, which the Schoole-Master had brought into his Campe, to make them bondslaues to the Romanes; conquered the Citty without one blow smitten, which neuertheless was very strong, and well furnished with al warlike munition. And Fabritius, hauing sent the Physition to king Pyrrhus, that had promised to poison him, and refused the moity of his Kingdomes: although he was one of the very poorest Romane Gentlemen, and caused the prisoners ransome to be paide, which Pyrrhus had freely deliuered, not suffering the meanest of them to stand beholding to so great a King. And Scipio, who (without any paine) conquered a great part of both the Spaines: by sending a lady of rare beauty to her husband, the Prince of Celtiberia, according to the example of Cyrus. These so generous and vertuous actions, tooke away all courage from enemies, to make war any longer against such magnanimous people; who neither could conquer, nor yet be conquered, by base or vnbeseeming behauiour.

The Romanes had more vertuous men in warre then in peace.

Furius Camillus.

Fabritius.

Scipio.

Vertue can neuer conquer by cowardise.

And yet this was much better made knowne, after the great day at Cannas, when Hannibal had put eight thousand prisoners to their ransome, at an hundred Crownes each man, and one bearing credite for another: hoping vndoubtedly, that the Romanes hauing lost so many men, would not be slacke in paying their ransome. But it was flatly forbidden (by the Senates especiall decree) that not one prisoner of them al should be redeemed. Whereat Hannibal (saith Polybius) was so amazed, as all his courage quite forsooke him. Whereas on the contrary, the Romanes secured their state the better, which was shrewdly shaken, and vterly abandoned (as it were) of all friends and confederates. For the iudgement of the Senate was wise and honourable, because Hannibal, hauing so much Romane blood to spil at his pleasure, thoght to empty their Treasury of money, and draw eight hundred thousand Crownes from them, which they rather chose to spare, then to redeeme the very scum and cowards of all the Roman Army. Whervpon, and thence forward, euery one took a resolution to conquer or dye, & so became dreadfull and inuincible. And like as their hearts neuer failed them in their greatest losses; so were they neuer conquered by arrogancy in their victories. And therefore, in the time of war, the Romanes more expressed their greatnesse in courage, then in peace they could do.

Hannibal & his 8000 Romane prisoners.

The generous and vnconquerable courage of the Romanes, and grounded on good reason.

Charles the eight of that name, King of France, in the voyage which hee made into Italy, to conquer the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicily, they belonging to him, as he pretended: at the surprizall of a Citty, a very goodly Lady was brought vnto him, whom he would not touch; but sent her away (and great gifts with her) to her husband. By this acte of chastity he sped so well, that most part of the Townes and Cities as he passed along, brought their keyes vnto him, and conquered (the more easily) the Kingdomes hee laide clayme to. And yet neuertheless, this King had Ladies (sometimes) at commaund in his owne Court, albeit very secretly.

So long as Caius Marius followed war, he performed many braue and vertuous exploits therein, largely encreasing (with great great Prouinces) his Country and Common-wealth of Rome. As hauing conquered Iugurthe, King of the Numidians, and made an absolute surrender of his Kingdome to Rome: hee likewise vanquished the Cymbrians in Gaule, and the Germanes that were entred into Italy, and seauen times was he made Consull, euen in iust regard of his great deseruings. But when he ceassed from being a Warriour, addicting himselfe to idlenesse, and desiring to liue in peace: aspiring by his ambition to tyranny, he caused aboue tenne thousand Cittizens to dye wretchedly, & ended his owne life in miserable exile. And the very same did Sylla, who was esteemed one of the most fortunate men in his time; who in a ranged battaile, ouerthrew Mithridates neere to Charonea; and his Lieutenant at another time after, not farre from Athens. He vanquished also the Medes, and the Dardanians or Troyans; he put Carbo to flight, & droue him quite out of Italy; winning the battaile likewise against Marius; and so long as he followed the warres, liued most nobly and vertuously. But being returned home to his house, and liuing there in peace; hee became a tyrant and butcher of the Cittizens; so that (in one day) he commanded nine thousand of them to be slaine, promising a certaine stipend or wages, to any one that brought him a Romane Cittizens head.

The misfortune that idlenesse & negligence brought to Marius and Sylla.

Ease hath bin reputed the Nurse of tyrranny.

While Pombey managed Armes, and was a braue Commander in Armies; hee was esteemed the most vertuous man thē liuing. For he restored the Kingdome of Numidia to Massinissa, which Hiarbas had vsurped from him. He vanquished Sertorius, King of Portugall, ending also the most dangerous warre of the Pyrats, and ouercame Mithridates, King of Pontus, constraining him to slay himselfe. He warred in the Northerne parts, conquered Albania, Morea, the Henioches, Caspia, Hiberia, and afterwards (in the East) surmounted the Parthians, Arabians, and subiected Iudea beside. But afterward, the Romane people hauing no longer warre, and he returning home to his abiding; grew enuious against his kinesman Cæsar, and as by the precedent warres, the Romane Empire had attained vnto vnspeakable greatnesse: so by peace it impayred too much, onely through ciuill warre, engendred among themselues. In which respect, many people and Kings shooke off the yoke, wherein they stood tributaries to the Romanes, and so their Empire (by little and little came to decadence.

The renowne of Pompey so long as he followed Armes.

By peace the Romane Empire vtterly lost it selfe.

Great Alexander, so long as hee continued warre in the East, hee was accounted most valiant and temperate. And hauing vanquished Darius, finding none other to resist against him, he grew to such insolence; that he would be often drunk, & made himselfe so contemptible, as he became despised of his owne people, his friends and kindred, who caused him to dye by poison, hauing scarsely attained to the age of thirty yeares.

Idlenesse and negligence was the ruine of Great Alexander.

So long as the Lacedemonians had braue warlike Kings and Captaines, and found them imployment in warres, eyther, whether it were for defence of their owne Country, or for conquering others, such men as were Agesilaus, Agis, Archidamus, Brasidas, Damonidas, Euricratidas, Temistæas, Callicratides, and more such like beside; they daily prospered in all attempts they vndertooke. But so soone as they had conquered the Athenians, & pilled and polled their City vnder Lysander, and had filled their purses with money, making no more account or care of warre: the sweet ease and goodnesse of the time then seized on them, & contemning both exercise and military discipline, they became quickly ruined. For, from all former times of antiquity, they commonly imployed painfull diligence, rather by stratagems and pollicies of warre to conquer their enemies, then by power: which was more commended in * Archidamus, then any other vertue else. They alwayes shunned peace, not as disallowing it to be good, but because it continually enticed them to too many vices. For the Lacedemonian Lawes ordained, that men might walke through the City in the night time without light; because a Soldiour, most often being in war, might (by all meanes) march against his enemy, and at al houres as occasion presented it selfe, eyther by day or night. Patient also they were in all externall iniuries, as raines, windes, heats, frosts, mysts, and in greatest hungers; being euermore constantly resolued, eyther to conquer, or dye in the field. Which extremities, could not bee exercised by slothfull people, or liuing in peace.

Throgh sloth and idlenesse, the Lacedemonians vtterly ouerthrew themselues.

The

The Grecian Philosophers banished out of Rome, and the reason why.

The Romans, in those times, when they were not corrupted with forces of forren nations, banished all the Græcian Philosophers, and would not admit any knowledge of letters among them, but for their vse: and no lesse hated they the professors of questionary sciences, then their books. They would not practise or learne anie thing, but to know how they might best bee obedient to Magistrates, and endure the hardst trauels in battels, to liue or die. A Thessalian being demaunded, who were the worst conditiond people in his countrey, answe red; Such as had withdrawne themselues from Military labour and discipline.

A poet banished out of Lacedemon for writing agenst warre.

A poet, named Archilochus, being come to dwell in Lacedemon, was banished presently thence, being knowne to haue written: That it was much better to forsake the Target and Armes, then to die in warre. Among the Lacedemonians, it was an especiall obseruation, to figure al the Images of their gods and goddesses armed, holding launces in their hands, as signifying themselues to be warriors: Because they reputed nothing to be more vile & infamous, then idlenesse and vnarmed peace, being no way so goodly in apparance, as Military vertue: and therefore they paynted their gods in such forme, as themselues alwayes wished to be. Contrariwise, the Græcians Theology instructed them; to figure their gods, idle, peaceable, and lying all along. And it seemed, that the Lacedemonians had good reason so to do, bicause they imagined, that al our actions should be conformable to those of the gods: for, in painting the shapes of the gods effeminately, and so to follow them in like qualities, is to be pernitious, and vnprofitable to the Common-wealth.

The gods of the Lacedemonians were painted armd, and those of the Greekes effeminately.

So soone as Henry, second of that name king of France, had contracted peace with the Emperor, the Kings of Spain and England, with all the princes of Italy, and with the countries of high and lower Germany, they all being enemies to him: he was very shortly after slaine in a iousting, with a spield of a launce, entring in at the sight of his Beauer. All the great Captaines of France esteemd vertuous among all other Nations, in times of peace, fell to killing one an other, keeping neither faith nor promise, but proditoriously massacring their very best friends: feining assemblies about the State affaires: some vnder colour of marriages; others, by pretended feasts and banquets, proceeding on so far in this wicked course, till they killed theyr king, yea & sought to murder his successor. In brief, they leagued themselues daily one against another, and some against the State, growing into such factious and treacherous coniurations, that the French were thoght to be a most barbarous kind of people. All which had hapned, but thorow discontinuing exercise of Armes against ancient enemies, and calling them in, to despoyle them of their goods. Like as the ancient Gaules formerly did, who in meere enuy one to an other, and hauing giuen ouer the exercise of Armes, one part called in the Romaines, and an other the Almaines or Germaines, who were their vtter ruine in the end. And so they became tributaries, who were wont to bee the onely terrour of the Romaines, Græcians, Spaniards, yea, and likewise of the Germaines.

The French nation entred into long continued seditions, onely by peace.

Discontinuance of military discipline breeds no mean store of euils in any peaceable nation.

Seeing then it cometh so to passe, that some Princes, and likewise some Common-weales (as appeareth by our passed Discourse) attained to much honor, and orderd their affaires better in their storms of warre, then in the calmer seasons of peace; and because it is not possible that warres should continually endure, but Peace must, and will haue some time of sway and dominion: Let vs now see, if there be not as good meanes of vertuous containment, as well in the dayes of peace as of warre; doubtlesse it may bee done more commodiously, and the waies of compassing it I will briefly declare.

The Authour falleth to reprehend his first propositi-on, and to effectu ll purpose.

First of all, when there is no more occasion, for employing men of warre in a Kingdome or Common-weale: aduice is to be had, what Princes, friends or confederats of strangers, haue any need of men of such martiall qualitie, and thither to send them in their assistance, with charge of returning from thence agayne, when they shall bee sommoned thereto. Not onely shall the State or Common-wealth be thus disburthened of paying such wages: but also of such scelerates, as ordinarily doe follow men of warre, the more safely to commit their thefts and villanies, without checke, law, or punishment.

How Souldiers are to be dealt withall, when theyr owne wanteth employment for them.

In like manner did Charles the fifth of that name, and King of Fraunce, who

A good aduiſe to diſcharge any kingdom of theeues & wicked perſons, who are dangerous people in the times of peace.

hauing taken truce with the Engliſh, Nauarrians, and Britaines, beeing entreated by Henry of Caſtile, the Baſtard, who made warre vpon his legittimate brother for the kingdome. For Pope Vrbane had conferred the Crowne vppon him, in regard that Don Peter, king of Caſtile, had intelligence and confederacy with the King of Granado, who was of the Mahometane Religion. Moreouer, he was a tyrant, doing many things vnbeſeeming the name or credit of a Chriſtian. King Charls ſent him ſuccour of ſouldiers, vnder conduct of the Conſtable Bertrand du Gueſclin, who (by that voyage) purged France of an infinite number of Theeues, the greater part whereof were ſlaine in that warre. The like did Lewes the eleuenth, who, hauing peace with all his enemies, ſent all his ſoldiers (that rauaged ſtrangely in his kingdome) to the Earle of Richmond, who paſſed them ouer with him into England, becauſe he laid claime to the kingdome. By this meanes, hee ridde his realme of raſcality, and had ſome reuenge alſo vpon his ancient enemies.

Henry Earle of Richmond, afterward K. of England.

Auguſtus Cæſars care of his countries honor.

Auguſtus Cæſar, hauing ouercome his Competitor Mark Anthony, and hauing no further imployment for war; was not ſo improuident or indiſcreete, as to ſuffer his ſouldiers liue idle and negligently: but ſent forty Legions into remote Prouinces, and to the frontiers of barbarous nations, ſtill to ſupport their militarie diſcipline, and to keepe all occaſions of ciuill war, ſo farre off as might bee. But Great Conſtantine the Emperor, following the counſell of diuers Byſhops and Prieſtes, who were ſlenderly experienced in State affaires: threwe off his Legionaries and men of warre; which was the cauſe, that ancient Military Diſcipline became quite loſt, and opened a gate to ſuch enemies, as (afterward) inuaded the Romane Empire on al ſides. For they vnderſtood not, that Lawe, Iuſtice, and the whole State (next vnder God) are in the protection of Armes, as vnder a ſoueraign & ſaſe buckler of defence.

War ſerueth ſometime as good Phyſick, for a Commonwealth, to rid it of corrupted humors.

Yet there is one point more, very conſiderable, to ſhew, that Militarie Diſcipline ought to be maintained, and warre made, vpon good and iuſt occaſions; for there hath alwayes bene (and neuer ſhall we bee without) ſome theeues, murtherers, idle loyterers, vagabonds, murmurers, and ſturdy vagrants, which (in any Common-wealth) do hurt and ſpoyle the honeſt ſimplicity of good ſubiects, & notwithſtanding the verie beſt Iuſtice that may be vſed, yet can no countrey bee intirely clenſed of ſuch Cankers. The beſt helpe (in this caſe) is warre, to ſend ſuch vnneceſſary members farre off from home-abiding, whereſoeuer any fitting employment happeneth. Becauſe it ſerueth as a purgatiue medicine, very cordiall and conuenient, for expelling ſuch corrupted humours, out of the Commonwealths vniuerſall body. Furthermore, in times of peace, and for better enioying the benefit thereof; no tolleration is any way to bee ſuffered, of ſuch as haue not trade or vocation; for idleneſſe and negligence, cauſe too many euils in any kingdome. By this diſcourſe then may bee obſerued thoſe reaſons, why many Princes & Commonweales floriſhed in times of war, & fell to ruine in the daies of peace; the beſt meanes alſo in both of them hath briefly bin deliuered.

How Magiſtrates are & ought to cary their authority in times of peace.

CHAP. VIII

That Princes ought not to erect ſumptuous and ſtately buildings; as hoping thereby to make their names immortall.

That no man ſhould builde, vainly to immortalize his name.

SOme Flatterers cannot be ſufficiently blamed, that perſwade Kings and great Monarks, to builde ſumptuous houſes and Palaces, therby to make their names imortal, contrary to the iudgment of Count Balthazar the Caſtillian, in his booke of the Courtier, who (in mine opinion) hath highly erred, to write and approoue ſuch a vanitie. For, the end of all vertuous actions (according to the ſaying of Cicero, in the 3. book of his Tuſculanes) is honour, glory, and good renown: not a dumb building, which is copoſed of the ſweat, blood, and means of poor people. Palaces cānot moue out of the places where they are builded, nor can they make knowne the generous deeds of ſuch as erected them: And men that dwell by Cicero in Tuſcu lib. 3. cap. 7.

Men s names rumaine not by their buildings.

by thoſe places, and ſtrangers that ſee or paſſe by them, when ſome fifty yeares (or ſo) are ouer-paſſed, can ſcarcely bee informed, who were the founders, albeit their names may be engrauen vpon ſome ſtone or other matter; whereby the erecters of Pallaces and prowde Buildings, are often fruſtrated of theyr hope and intention.

Princes are aptly compared to Swallowes in theyr loue to theyr buildings.

Moreouer, if it be well pondered and conſidered, the fayreſt buylding is but a matter of frailtie, and ſubiect to no long continuance: for, when men ceaſſe from dwelling there, they runne in poaſting ſpeede to ruine and decay. And Princes are the occaſion heereof: Reſembling Swallowes, who will neuer neaſtle twiſe in one neaſt: Euen ſo, the moſt parte of Princes dwellings become deſert, like to King Frances, who buylded a great Tower in the Caſtell of the Louure in Paris, made after the auncient manner, and ruinated the body of the Lodging, by cauſing another to be erected. Afterward he builded Madric, and then agayne the houſe of Fontaine bleau, yet neuer dwelt in any of the ſayd buildings.

Example of Catharine de Medicis, not long ſince Q. Mother of Fr.

Catharine de Medicis, widdow to King Henry the ſecond deceaſſed, when ſhe was Regent (although ſhee was well furniſhed with vnderſtanding, and a Lady of great honour) yet notwithſtanding, ſhee ſuffred her ſelfe, to be ouermuch perſwaded by ſome flatterers in the Court about her: that, to render her memory to poſteritie euerlaſtingly, ſhee ſhould erect ſome goodly Pallace; whereto ſhe yielded, after a long time of ſollicitation. She had not ſeene the fourth part of the building out of the ground, but ſhee began to repent her ſelfe, ſaying: She knew well enough, that it was meere vanity, to hope for immortallizing by buildings, frayle, & ſubiect to ruine in a ſhort time, and ſo left off, from proceeding any further in ſo friuolous a buſineſſe.

The Qu. Mother of Frãce liked not the building of ſumptuous houſes, which were indeed to ſmall vſe.

The ſayd Lady had houſes of pleaſure abroad, paſſably fayre and commodious: but in Paris ſhee had not a dwelling, her children being come to age. The Louure, a royall habitation, was not ſufficient to receiue her and her traine: wherefore, ſeeing that the Court (in thoſe times) kept ordinarily at Paris: ſhee built an other of indifferent coſt, in the place where was founded the order and religion of Marie Magdalen, for ſinfull women and maides, conuerted to repentance, and tranſported the religious women thence, vnto the Abbey of Saint Mary Magdalen, beeing much more commodious for them. Reproouing the councell formerly giuen to her, ſhe would vſually ſay: That money might be better employed, in redeeming the Crowne lands, paying of debts, eaſing the people oppreſſed with grieuous taxations; then to bee waſted in ſuch vaine manner, which wordes right well became ſo great a Princeſſe as ſhee was.

This Qu. mother was reputed a very wiſe Lady.

Oftentimes ſhe commended the good Emperour Veſpaſian, who neuer builded any Pallace, but contented himſelfe with ſuch as were erected by his predeceſſours: yet did hee re-edifie diuerſe and ſundry ruined Temples and Theaters, and gaue very bounteouſly to Hoſpitalls. As the like did the Emperour Domitian, who was well ſatisfied with a ſmall dwelling: and yet builded hee the Capitole, which was greatly decayed by age, and a Temple of his owne, dedicated vnto Iupiter.

Prowde building loſt Salomons ſonne tenne of the Tribes of Iſraell.

The ſacred Scriptures tell vs, that the magnificence and ouer great ſumptuouſneſſe of Salomon, in building his pallaces and houſes, were the cauſe, that tenne Tribes of Iſraell did ſeperate themſelues from obedience to his heyre Rehoboam, and reigned onely but ouer two. I will not ſpeake here of the Temples building, for his father left him all the ſtuffe and the meanes, as needed for the erection of ſo holy a Temple. But the immeſurable expences layde out on his Pallace, for furniſhment whereof, the people themſelues ſo preſſed after his deceaſe: that they were conſtrayned to ſeeke another King, then his Sonne Rehoboam, who would continue the prodigall expences of his father in building, and ſo (of twelue partes) he loſt ten in his kingdome.

The exceeding great coſt of Salomons pallace.

It is right well knowne, by the Text of the Iewiſh Chronicles, that King Salomon abuſed the Graces and Bleſſings both of Almightie God and men: for, it was not ſufficient for him, to make walls in his pallace of the very goodlieſt ſtones, the beſt polliſhed, and moſt ſplendant in in all the world; but he would needes illumine them alſo with exquiſite colors, couering them beſides with maſſie golde, as making leſſe account of ſiluer, then hee did of leade or yron. The like is to bee vnderſtood of the planchers and floores, all made of curious and ſtrange woods, the very worſt being of Cedar and Cethin, without corruption, and ſmelling moſt ſweetly, reſembling in coulor, the beames of the Sun, being ſo ingeniouſly handled in the working, that they appeared like moſt curious ſhapes and figures, as no men in the world were able to inuent, or counterfeit the like. And yet neuertheleſſe, hee couered thoſe coſtly woods with plates of gold, enchaſed with infinite precious ſtones: ſo that the very floores ſeemed to bee ſecond ſtarry Heauens; whereby may eaſily bee preſuppoſed, what the other parts of his Pallace were.

Coſtly wood of Cedar and Cethin, wherof the planks and floores were made.

Moreouer, Salomon did not onely build one Pallace in Ieruſalem, but many more beſide in diuers places, euen as rich, or rather more coſtly then the other. As that which hee erected for his Summers recreation, in the Wood of Lybanus, abounding in all variety of vanities. In two Hals he placed fiue hundred Shields or Targets, of immeaſurable greatneſſe, and all of maſſiue gold, each Target valuing (at the leaſt) two thouſand and foure hundred Crownes, as Empolemus hath recorded. The ſaid Bucklers or Targets were beaten with the hammer, and engrauen with rare and coſtly braunched workes. He builded another Pallace in Gazer, more ſumptuous then the two former were: which was quickly ruined after his death, and at this day the places are not knowne where thoſe Pallaces ſtood. For the building of theſe, hee trauailed and moleſted his people, who reuolted from him, loſing thereby his heyre and ſucceſſour, and (wellneere) all his Kingdome; his Reigne (beſide) being full of many warres and other miſeries. Behold what goodly benefit redounded to him, by erecting ſuch ouer-ſumptuous buildings: for, the Egiptian people deſtroyed and pilled his Pallace before his eyes.

Salomon buil ded many more Pallaces beſide that in Ieruſalem, & all as rich as that.

Salomons people reuolted from him for oppreſsing them with his buildings.

Tranquillus declareth, that Nero Claudius Cæſar, the ſixt Romane Emperour, was ſo ambitious; that he deſired to make his name immortall, by the meanes of buildings, which he intended to erect, and valued the price of his life, whereof I purpoſe to ſette downe a briefe deſcription.

The vanity of Nero Claudius Cæſar.

Firſt, he would haue had all Rome to bee pulde downe, and then to be built againe at the Cittizens charges: ſaying, that the ſtreets were not ſtraite nor large enough. Heereupon, diuers leud perſons (by him ſubborned) fiered the City in ſundry places: hee intending afterward to haue it beare his name, and to be called Neropolis: which partly was put in execution, albeit the eight part could hardly bee burned, and becauſe many houſes were built all of ſtone; with engines he cauſed them to be deſtroyed. And as he perſeuered thus in ruinating the houſes, certaine conſpiracies (intended againſt him) chanced to bee diſcouered to him; which made him leaue off, and proceed therein no further. Cornelius Tacitus writeth, that hee cauſed a falſe fame to be noyſed in Rome, throwing ſcandalous aſperſions vpon the Chriſtians, as if that they had fired the city. And great likelihood there was, that this impoſture ſhould proceed from him, and to be impoſed on the Chriſtians: becauſe he was a vowed enemy to all vertuous, holy and well affected people. In which reſpect, ſo many Chriſtians as hee could apprehend, were bathed and annointed on their naked bodies, with greaſe and pitch, and then tyed to pillers, and fire put vnto them, ſo they ſeemed as flaming Linkes or Torches, for paſſengers and night-walkers through the Cittie.

The reaſon why Nero cõmanded that Rome ſhould be burned.

Cornel. Tacit. in Annal et vit. Nero. lib. 3. ca. 7

Slanderous imputations laide on the Chriſtians.

For continuance of his names immortalizing, and onely by ſuch buildings he intended; I meane to deſcribe one, another manner of thing, then thoſe which Salomon cauſed to bee erected, what ſtore of gold ſoeuer he beſtowed vpon them: whereof let the Reader be Iudge, for what is heere inſerted, I haue traduced out of the ſaide Tranquillus, who both ſaw that Nero, and his Pallace, and auoucheth, that Nero neuer did more harmes in all his actions, then in his buildings. He erected a houſe, extending from his Pallace ſo farre as Mount Eſquiline, which hee named, The Houſe of Gold: and being almoſt finiſhed, it was wholly deſtroyed with thunder and lightning falling from Heauen, and yet neuertheleſſe, hee builded it againe. It was ſo ſpacious, that it had a place for him to walke in, which was a Gallery

One Pallace built by Nero, compared with all them erected by Salomon.

The deſcription of Neroes coſtly building, called, The Houſe of Gold.

Gallery at the very entrance, containing a thouſand paces in length, hauing three rankes of Marble pillars, all made with Arches, moſt proudly glittering with goodly coulors, hauing infinite fabulous Hiſtories, and Poeticall figures. In that place alſo was a Coloſſus, of an hundred and twenty foote in height, formed after his owne effigie and reſemblance. There was likewiſe a Poole or Pond, ſeeming as if it had beene an huge ſpacious Sea: on the Bankes wherof (all round about) were ſtately houſes builded, ſo that it appeared to be a faire great Citty.

The building muſt needs containe a wonderfull compaſſe, to haue ſo many meruailes within it.

Within the compaſſe of this building, were eareable grounds, Vineyards, Paſturages, Medowes and Forreſts, with multitudes of diuers kindes of Beaſte, as well wilde as tame, encloſed within high walles, in the manner of a Parke, and formed with very arteficiall cunning. All other parts of this Pallace, were richly guilded, thickly powdered with precious ſtones, and mother of Pearle, the floores of the Halles for Dinners and Suppers, were all in-layed with Iuory, and curious wrought plates of fine gold, ſo ſubtilly turning each againſt other, that flowers and ſweete waters deſcending from the Roofe, by conuoyes of arteficiall conueiance, fell on them ſitting at the Table, & after were receiued into the floores. Among al the Halles for banquetting, there was one entirely round, which (by inimitable arte) was ſo compoſed, that it turned round night and day, like vnto the world.

Planchers & Tables of admirable cunning.

Ouer and beſide all theſe, hee cauſed a Fiſh-Pond to be made, from Miſena, ſo farre as the Lake Auerna, all engirt with Galleries: where the warme waters of the gulfe Baiæ fell into it. Beſide, he had a trench or ditch made, reaching from Auerna to Oſtia, for Boates to floate on, containing foure ſcore French miles in length, and of ſuch wideneſſe, that two great Gallies, with fiue rankes of Oares might paſſe on front. Becauſe if one ſhould mount one way, and the other come againe to meet it: they might freely paſſe without danger of touching one another.

An admirable Fiſh-pond, & a ſtrãge Ditch for Bardges.

Nor could theſe Fiſh-Ponds, Lakes, Ditches, and other deuices ſerue the turn; but hee muſt alſo haue an artificiall Sea made, which he cauſed to come from very farre off, cutting through Mountaines, Rocks, pulling downe Forreſts, and ſuch like: ſo that it ſeemed a worke of no mortall power, but as if it were done by God himſelfe. To perfect this mighty labour, he gaue command, that ſo many priſoners as could be found, were it for criminall cauſes, debts, or any caſe elſe whatſoeuer throughout the whole Romane Empire (which contained then almoſt al our Hemiſphere) ſhould bee brought to Rome, and there to bee employed in this ſeruice.

A counterfet Sea made at the charge of infinite expences.

And becauſe theſe mighty workes could not bee effected without ineſtimable expences; he impoſed on the City of Rome (without exempting people of any quality) great and extraordinary ſubſidies, and vppon the whole Lands of the Empire, wherein the Gaules (among other Prouinces) felt no meane affliction, although they were (well neere) quite ruined by the precedent warres, ſo that they were conſtrained to reuolt from his obedience. The like did Spaine, and great ſtore of the Prouinces in Aſia and Affrica, and (in the end) all Italy. Hereuppon, he ſent out ſtrickt prohibitions, that no Officer of the Empire ſhould be paid his wages, no, not the Biſhops & Prieſts, who were paied by the hands of the publike Receiuers; neither could the Legions haue their pay, which cauſed great hauock in the Prouinces whether they were ſent. For he employed all his moneyes, about thoſe admirable Workes and Buildings, and yet could not prouide ſufficient for that purpoſe.

The horrible taxations impoſed on the people, for effecting theſe idle vanities.

In regard whereof, the Senate and whole body of the people, being no longer able to ſupport thoſe prodigall expences; conſpired againſt him. Which comming to his knowledge, & he perceiuing approching danger (being forſaken of all his owne followers) fled out of the Citty, to a Country Farme belonging to one of his Libertines; where, by the help of one of his friends, he had his throate cut; for he was ſuch a cowardly ſlaue, that he durſt not do it himſelfe.

The next way to ouerthrow all together.

Such was the deſerued and miſerable end of this Emperour, which happened to him, by employing his reuenues, and the goodes of his Subiects ſo prodigally, in erecting proude buildings, and to no profite.

The end of Nero like to that of Sardanapalus.

This one worke of his, was three or foure times more coſtly, and of greater admiration, then eyther the Temple, or all the Pallaces of Salomon, King of Iſrael. Of which (as alſo of Neroes) not anie kinde of noate or memory remayneth to be ſeene, and the places are not knowne where they ſtoode. And although men commune and ſpeake of Nero; in theſe our dayes, it is not in regarde of his ſumptuous buildings, whereby hee thought to immortallize his name: but for his abhominable whooredomes, parricides, and infamous life, which hee ledde ſo long as hee liued. Whereof, at this time, I deſire not to make anie more mention: for ſo many Hiſtorians haue written therof, and eſpecially Tranquillus (Authour of all that hitherto hath beene ſpoken) as I muſt ſend them to his Volumes, which are deſirous to reade any more of his life and actions.

Neroes Pallace was more ſumptuous thé all them of Salomon.

CHAP. IX.

¶ who was the firſt, amongſt all other Monarches and Princes, that commaunded, to preſent by writing, whatſoeuer was to be negotiated with him.

EVery man of iudgement wel may thinke, that a Prince, who hath manie Prouinces vnder his charge, and giueth command to diuers people; muſt needes be much hindered, from anſwering all ſuch as are to negotiate with him. And it would be a matter vtterly impoſſible for him to ſatisfie al ſutes and demaunds made vnto him: if hee were not eaſed by ſome eſpeciall perſons, of good vnderſtanding in the State affaires, as a Chancellor, Secretary, and ſome ſuch other beſide. In like maner, that which giueth him greateſt contentment, is, when men make their ſutes to him by writing, as in theſe dayes is diſcreetely vſed: which was well inuented (and to good purpoſe) by the Emperor Tyberius, who commanded it to be ſo done, for any matter whatſoeuer, and likewiſe deliuered his aunſwers by writing. The reaſon was, to the end that nothing might eſcape, till it had beene conſidered on ſo well as poſſibly might be: For, by ouer much talking, and communicating himſelfe too often, a Prince may commit diuers errors, which will cauſe him to be miſpriſed, or meanely eſteemed. And it neuer ought to bee (as an auncient Greeke ſaid) That a Prince ſhould ſpeake any otherwiſe before the people, then as if he were in a ſtately Tragedy.

A great troble to any Prince, to anſwer many ſutes made vnto him by word of mouth

The Emperor Tyberius, the giuing of petitions was firſt diuiſed by him

But ſome may obiect vnto mee, That this is not the true ſtate of a Prince; for, in doing iuſtice to his people; hee ſhould heare theyr complaints and greeuances, vnderſtanding from each mans mouth, the vrgent occaſions conſtraining them thereunto, which are ordinarily ſuppreſſed, or elſe diſguyſed by others mannaging.

I am not of the minde, to haue him ſo conceale himſelfe, that hee ſhould not be ſeene but very ſeldome, or neuer. As now-adayes the Kings in the Eaſt Indiaes vſe to doe, and eſpecially the King of Borney, who neuer ſpeaketh, but onely to his wife and children. When hee is to ſpeake to other, hee doth it by a Gentleman, through a place made of purpoſe, where he can not be ſeene, but hath the wordes conueyed from the Gentlemans mouth to his eare, thorow the hollow paſſage of a Truncke: as hee did vnto the Ambaſſadour of the King Catholique, and as wee reade in the Hiſtories of the Indiaes.

An obiection in this caſe alledged, and to good purpoſe.

The Kings in the Eaſt Indiaes are daintie of their ſight and audience.

But although he ſhew himſelfe very little, as ſtanding vpon his greatneſſe and maieſtie; regarde is yet to be had to his quality and power. For, it is not ſeemely, that a petty Prince ſhould counterfeit the great Kings of Aethiopia, of Tartaria, Perſia and Turkie, who (indeed) will not haue their ſubiects to looke directly vpon them: becauſe, they are not ſo much redoubted for power, as they are for maieſtie, as they expreſſe ſufficiently, when they will be ſeene of their Subiects. And if ſome ſay, that the Princes of the Eaſt and South ſhould gouerne in that maner, and not they of the Weſt and North: I holde it to be all one in the maine regard. For, it is knowne well enough, that the Kings of England, Sweden, Denmarke and Poland, do containe farte more greatneſſe towards their Subiects, then the King of France,

Kings more dreaded for maieſtie then power.

Difference in the maieſty of princes to their Subiects

France, and the King of Moscouia, much more then all the rest: and yet perhappes they are not lesse, but (it may bee) better obeyed.

Good and substantiall reasons, why princes should negotiat with writing, rather then confer in person with their subiects.

Now let vs returne againe to our purpose, of conferring with a Prince by petition or writing, whereby many commodities ensue vnto him. For first (as hath already bene said) he vseth no communication by that meanes, nor shewes himselfe too familiar with his people, which contayneth him still in the farre greater esteeme.

Another reason is, that either if he will not, or cannot grant the demands mooued vnto him: if he make refusall, he can receiue no shame or disgrace therby; considering, that the written paper will not blush.

Moreouer, answere is returned with the more assured iudgment, by the time allowed to set downe the Princes Will; which cannot be so well done, speaking with him face to face. For oftentimes, he may be incited to anger, by moouing the matter disorderly, or else vppon some other occasion, whereby he may answere farre from his owne minde. Onels it may happen in some intemperate time; for all Princes are not alike in diet; & then, gifts so immense; and of such importance may be granted, as the whole State shall fare the worse for it.

Demetrius made a scorn of his subiects suites.

All which approoueth not, that hee should despise to answer requests, being made to him by his people: least it happen to him, as it did to Demetrius, who quarrelled the kingdome of Epyre against Pyrrhus. Hee hauing receyued a great number of petitions, kept them all in the lap of his cloake; and, passing ouer the bridge of a Riuer; he let them all fall downe into the water, according as wee reade in Plutarke. Whereupon, his subiects seeing themselues so contemned, conceiued capitall hatred against him: & (soone after) he was forsaken of his Army, who yeelded themselues & the kingdome to Pyrrhus, and so he won it without fighting.

Plut. in vit. Demetr.

Bold affrontings receiud by Princes, only through speaking with their people.

It hath bene obserued also, that princes, listening verbally to the sutes and requests of their subiects, haue mette with bold and insolent confronters. As the woman, who was put off day by day by Phillip, King of Macedon, in some matter of expedition which she required of him, whereupon she sayd: If thou neither wilt, nor canst do iustice: depose thy selfe, and another will giue it me: saucily seeming (by this meanes) to taxe the King with neglect and careleshesse. The very like words vsed Ioane de Pierre bussiere, a Ladie of Chambaret, to King Charles the ninth, he being in the City of Bordeaux, where she demanded iustice of him against the murtherer of her husband.

A Pirat of the sea, that was taken and brought before Great Alexander.

A certaine Rouer of the Sea was taken, who was reported, to bee the most cruell and detestable Pyrat, that euer was heard of. Alexander the Great, woulde needes see him and speake with him, to the end hee might the sooner condemne him. Wherefore he demanded of him: whence it proceeded, that he would be a Pyrate, and leade such an infamous kind of life; hauing meanes to prouide for himselfe otherwise: As to be in pay with some Warlike Nauy, where hee might receyue good respect; considering, that hee was strong, stout, and a good Soldier, as it had apeared by his passed course of life? With a bold and vndanted countenance, the Rouer returned him this answere. I am sayd to be a Pirate and Rouer on the Sea, because I sayle with a small Vessel, without any other Followers: and when I meete with another, beeing weaker then my selfe; then I make some appropriation of him. But thou that makest thy Nautgations, with great multitudes of Gallies, and other Shippes of Warre, robbing and ransacking all Maritime Townes and places, yea, and vppon the firme land likewise: Thou must be called an Emperour and a Monarch. Full well knew Alexander by the Pyrates answere, that his behauiour differed verie little from the others, and that hee deserued as well to bee punnished as hee: and therefore, beeing ashamed of so fowle a detection, he freely pardoned him.

Mounsieur of France his suite for marriage with Elizabeth Q. of England.

Frances, Duke of Aniou, and a sonne of France, not long since deceased, being desirous to settle himselfe, and to match with some Queene or Princesse that was an heyre: made meanes of marriage vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, letters passing betweene them to that purpose, and their pictures. In the end, the Queen sent him word, that she wold neuer contract with any that sought her, except shee might might ſee his perſon, otherwiſe there needed no further ſpeech. The Prince, beeing perſwaded by yong heads (as litle aduiſed in ſuch a buſineſſe, as himſelfe) and leauing the counſell of more graue experience; went into England to bee ſeene, and with a very ſlender train. But beeing well obſerued by that Lady, he was found ſo deformed by the ſmall pockes, which had left ſuch a deep driuing into his face, his noſe alſo much miſhapen, and ſome kernels riſing in his necke beſide; as might bee the cauſes of looſing the fauour of ſo fayre a Queene. Some were of opinion, that hee ſhould not haue gone, but to haue continued the treatie of Marriage ſtill by Letters; which peraduenture (at length) would haue wonne him grace and fauour.

The Arch-duke of Auſtria, & Henry Prince of Sweden much better aduiſed

More wiſely dealt the Arch-duke of Auſtria, and Prince Henry, afterwardes King of Sweden, who made ſuite alſo to the ſayde Queene to eſpouſe her, but at ſundry times, and were ſent for likewiſe to be ſeene. But they ſatisfied themſelues to treate with the Queene by theyr Letters, and not verbally: for, by this means, they wer aſſured that ſhe could not cauſe them to bluſh.

The Authors aduice vppon this Chapter.

I conclude then, that this inuention of Tyberius, was, and is very conuenient for great Monarches and Soueraigne Princes, not to negotiate by words with their Subiects; but to expedite by Writings, becauſe thereby they ſhall ſo much the ſooner diſpatch, and a great deale more equally.

Moreouer, if Princes or Princeſſes, haue any matters betweene them to diſintangle; to performe the ſame by Letters and Deputies ſent from either ſide: for by enter-view and ſpeaking together, litle good can enſue, at leaſt verie ſildom.

CHAP. X.

Of ſuch qualities and carriage, as (neceſſarily) is required to be in a Prince.

Pontanus in his booke of a Prince.

SVch as couet to command ouer any one whole Nation, ſhould firſt propounde two things to himſelfe: one is, to be liberall; the other is, to bee clement and gentle. For the Prince, which exerciſeth liberality, ſhall make his enemies to become his frends; thoſe of all other places to be his owne; and of diſloyall, faithfull ſeruantes. Hee muſt bee affable to ſtrangers, chiefly ſuch as dwell in the furtheſt parts of his Land: And as a Prince endued with clemencie, is admired of all men, and honoured as a God: So by theſe two Vertues, Liberality and Clemencie, hee is made like vnto God; becauſe his Office is, to doe good vnto all, and to pardon ſuch as are delinquents.

Of Liberalitie and clemency in a Prince.

Seuerity ought to bee mingled with mildneſſe.

I confeſſe it to bee true, that a Prince ought not (alwayes) to be facile and benigne to his ſubiectes: but that (with his facility and mildeneſſe) he may commixe a grauity and ſeuerity, ſuch as may be termed a kinde of rigour, at ſuch times as neede requireth; to cauſe feare and terror in bad liuers, and to punniſh them rigorouſly, if neceſſity enforce it, for the preuention of a greater euill. Otherwiſe, the Prince may bee the cauſe of his peoples loſſe, if hee permit too much licenſe and libertie, in the performance of diſhoneſt actions; like to Alcibiades, who thorough too much eaſie carriage in himſelfe, corrupted and ſpoyled his people. And yet ſeuerity ought to be moderated; for when it is exceſſiue, and ouer-ſharpe ſeueritie: it afflicteth Townes and Citties with great miſeries: euen as when licenſe is facetiouſly accommodated to the onely grace and fauour of the people, it prooueth to be the cauſe of their ruine, by the lacke of a leuell temperature both in the one and other.

Seuerity ouer ſharpe is the occaſion of much annoyance.

Howbeit that in time & place, acording to circircumſtances and difference of perſons, the Prince ought to vſe, eyther more ſeueritie, or ſometimes more facilitie (according to reaſon) and as Wiſedome iudgeth it fitteſt to be done, or ſpared for generall good.

Sophocles in Antig. Pomp. Trag.

Aſſuredly, in regard that the people is as a Monſter with many heads; there is great neede (as Sophocles ſayth) of a maine and ſtrong bridle. And as it is a principall poynt of Arte in a good Querrie, to make a horſe pace milde and obediently; euen ſuch is the office of diſcipline in a Prince, to render his ſubiects obedient and modeſt. And yet notwithſtanding, to do it in gentle manner, and by benigne means, not rudely conſtrayning them alwayes: but perſwading, admoniſhing, and reprehending ſometimes, not purſuing euerie ſuſpition; but conniuing in light matters, deferring a buſineſſe in time of daunger and doubt, to redreſſe it at ſome other ſeaſon, more apte and proper. For, by repreſſing and puniſhing all arrogancie and wickedneſſe; he may the more benignely entertayne the good, when humbly they preſent their afflictions and requeſts vnto him. All which is the eaſier done, by vnderſtanding the manners and ſpirites of the people, becauſe, ſuch as are of rude and harſh brain (like vnto thoſe of barbarous nations) muſt bee gouerned with more ſeueritie; then they that be of more docible nature, who ought to be mannaged with mildeneſſe and benignitie, without ſtearne lookes, or vnkinde manner of dealing.

The office of Diſcipline in a prince.

The ſpirits & maners of the people are by the prince to be vnderſtood

The complexions of men are diuers and diſſemblable, eyther by the nature of the place and ayre; or elſe by cuſtome and manner of life. The Athenians, were eaſie to anger and mercy, the Carthagenians ſad, opinionatiue and obſtinate; the Romanes great, benigne, louers of theyr Country, ambitious and couetous of glory and honor. And therefore, ignorance in the manners of ſuch as wee conuerſe withall, doth oft deceiue and diſappoint vs in our opinions and enterpriſes; wherefore, by the diuers nature and cuſtome of the people, Lycurgus was rather a ſectator of power, then iuſtice; and Numa Pompilius of iuſtice, rather then of power.

The diuerſitie and vnlikenes of mens complexions.

The diffrence betweene Lycurgus & Numa Pompilius

For, as a Prince (in ciuile actions) imitateth the skilfull behauiour of a Lutenist, who tendeth and diſtendeth their cordes of the inſtrument, to bring an accord of tune as he would haue it; ſo doth hee likewiſe follow the Chirurgian, in order and meanes for tempering with life; becauſe light infirmities hee can cure eaſily, whereas to them of more perill, hee applyeth both yron and fire. In the ſame manner, a Prince maketh vſe of the Rod and the Sword, according to the ſeuerall occurrences, and as they appeare.

Apte compariſons of a princes imitation.

It foloweth, that a Prince ought to entertaine good Lawes, and to obſerue the chiefeſt of ſuch as hee hath made: but aboue all other) to haue the honour and feare of God before his eyes. It is neceſſary alſo for a Prince to haue the commaund of himſelfe, and beare a ſtrict hand on the bridle of his owne affections: directing firſt a good courſe of life to himſelfe, to the ende, that it may ſerue as a Square or Rule, to meaſure the liues of other after his manners. For, very hardly ſhall hee commaund others (ſayth Pindarus) that hath not learned himſelfe to obey reaſon, which is the Queene of all things, and a Law, not engrauen in Marble, but in our ſpirites, commaunding to perfourme lawfull actions, and prohibiting ſuch as are contrary, and bad. Her woorthy enſtructions, wicked Kings (being ſlaues to theyr owne affections) will not immitate: For, if ſhee were their Queene & Gouerneſſe, they ſhould bee conſtrained to contemne their vileneſſe, and honeſtly to enter faire Vertues ſeruice.

For the feare of God, and maintaing of good Lawes.

A good direction giuen by Pindarus the poet.

The Pythian Oracle, by the anſwere it gaue to King Cræſus, That he ſhould know himſelfe, was not to be vnderſtoode; that he ſhould know the glory and greatneſſe of his Empire: but Reaſon, Queene and miſtris of humane life, which appeaſeth the perturbations of the minde, and reſtrayneth the mightineſſe of power: For, the Poet Horace ſayth (by way of enſtruction) that it is a matter no leſſe royall, to repreſſe appetites and affections, then to rule ouer people.

The anſwere of the Pythian Oracle to king Croeſus.

Latins regnes auidum domando

The enſtruction giuen by Horace.

And Ageſilaus gloried, that hee had learned better to commaund himſelfe, then then other. Alexander the Great, accounted it much more honeſt and glorious, to conquer himſelfe, rather then to conquer enemies. A Prince ſhould ſhunne flattery, for if he lend his eares to flatterers, he will not alwayes bee himſelfe. Credulity is accompanied with raſhneſſe and folly, and there is no greater argument of folly, then credulity: therefore a Prince ſhould not be too credulous, that is, ouer-light in beleefe, Flattery ought to be auoyded by a Prince.

Ambition alſo, which is the Mother and Nurſſe of many great euils, and the plague of Kingdomes and Commonwealths, ſhould bee excluded from the heart of a Prince. A Prince that remembers himſelfe to be but a man, and conſequently mortall, will neuer mount vp his thoughts in pride; but purſue equality. If he perceiue all things proſper, and ſucceed according as hee can wiſh: hee will then beleeue, that God commandeth ouer humane occaſions, whereof himſelfe onely hath care, and pride is highly diſpleaſing to him.

Ambition the Mother of many miſchiefes & the bane of kingdomes.

I would aduiſe a Prince, to be carefull of what he promiſeth, and to whom hee maketh any promiſe; to be reſpectiue of mens merits and their faculties, as alſo the times of his giuing promiſe, for the better preſeruation of his faith: becauſe there is nothing more vnworthy, and villainlike, then to breake fidelity, and the force of faith is ſo great, that it ought to be kept, euē with an enemy, if it be promiſed. And in regard that faith (according as our graue Auncients haue defined it) is conſtancy and truth in words and conuentions: a Prince ought to be true, and to loue truth, in regard whereof, our betters and elders ordained, and by them it was moſt wiſely inſtituted; that the Booke of the holy Euangeliſts (wherein the diuine verity is contained) ſhould daily (in the time of diuine ſeruice) be giuen to the Prince to kiſſe, to the end, that being admoniſhed thereby, to purſue and honour truth; he ſhould likewiſe remember, how ſtudious he muſt be in louing her vpright.ly.

Of care and reſpect in a Princes promiſes.

An auncient and excellent ordination for faithfulneſſe.

I could wiſh alſo, that a Prince ſhould ſuffer no man to depart ſad and diſcontented from his preſence: but with cheerfull lookes and gracious language, and ſo expreſſe himſelfe both vnto ſmall and great. Whoſoeuer knoweth his Prince to be endued with temperance, dare neuer vrge any vile or vnbeſeeming motion to him. O happy Marcus Cato (ſaid Cicero) to whom no man durſt make any vniuſt demand! He ſhall bee thought worthy of authority and ſoueraigne power, and bee reputed a hopefull Prince by his people; that ſharply purſueth wicked men, hateth the intemperate, reiecteth lyars, & flyeth (as from the plague) ſuch as aduiſe him to follow voluptuouſneſſe: for whoſoeuer takes pleaſure in crediting ſuch coūcellers; his childhood in rule ſhall be immodeſty, his youth effeminacy, and his age infamy.

Of affability in his lookes & language.

Cicero in Of ſic. lib. 1. cap. 5.

Whoſoeuer holdeth gouernment ouer the people, ought to be free from affections; for anger hindereth knowledge of whatſoeuer is good; hatred puffes him on to imperfect actions; loue blindeth his iudgement; pleaſure and inordinate will induceth him to violence; paſſion pricketh him on to reuenge; and enuy enflameth him, with a more haſty and fiery temper, then is expedient in him. One and the ſame conſtancy in courage (at all times) is moſt required and commended in a King, as well in caſes of aduerſity, as proſperity. And if God pleaſe to viſite him, with any ſcourge of his diuine Iuſtice; he ought to reioyce, and remember, that God chaſtiſeth ſuch as hee loueth; learning thereby, to ſupport all with the vertue of patience in contrary fortunes, and not to mount vp in pride, whē affaires are fitting to his owne deſires.

Perticular reſpects fitting to be in a king or Gouernor.

Of conſtancy in courage in all occaſions whatſoeuer, beſt becoming any Prince.

Sloth, accompanied with negligence, is greatly hurtfull to a Prince, which in times of ſafety, begetteth (oftentimes) feare and diſtruſt, whereof the Poet ſaith,

Otium Reges prius, et beatas
Perdidit vrbes.

Wherefore, to ſhunne ſuch inconueniences, ſome honeſt exerciſe is very fit for him; to play at Tennis (euen till hee ſweates) is wholeſome for him, and Muſicke is very commendable; ſometimes to hunt, and to ride great Horſſes is neceſſary, for which Virgill gaue commendations to Picus, King of the Latines.

For the preuention of ſloth & negligence by ſome honeſt exercifes.

Picus equum domitor, debellatorque ferarū.

Enstructions to Militarie Discipline.

ging horses, were (aboue all other) frequent with King Cyrus, for encreasing the strength of his body, and greatly seruing for the enstruction of Militarie discipline. And patience, to endure both heate and colde, is laudable in a Prince, and is many times more expedient for him, then strict abstinence from meate and drinke.

Historie and Morall philosophie fit for princes: and Poetrie a dayly companion.

It is very necessary also, that he should haue good knowledge in Histories, and (if it were possible) not to bee ignorant in Morall Philosophie, which may well be tearmed the Hunt-vice: also, to vnderstand Naturall Philosophy, the Science of Ciuile right, and Mathematicall Disciplines. He should be assiduate in reading Poets, as Homer, whome Alexander had alwayes in his hand: and Virgill, singularly affected by the Emperor Octauius Augustus. A Prince beeing endued with all these Sciences, shall receiue inestimable benefite thereby.

What benefits the prince receiueth by erudition.

First, he shall become wise; for learning begetteth wisedome; next, they will yeeld him such vnspeakeable pleasure, as no delectations can be thought or vtterd, comparable to those that come from eruditi-on: for, inquisition after trueth, is the proper worke and perfection of the Spirit. What is more woorthy in a Prince, then to vnderstand true & honest things? To discerne falshoode from trueth, and villany from honestie? In mine owne iudgement, I account an ignorant man, I will not say onely, like vnto a Statue or Image, or the truncke of a tree: but (almost) differing in nothing from a bruite beast.

Comparatiues of an ignorant man.

Councell is held to be sacred.

If the Prince himselfe be not seene in all these Sciences and Disciplines, it shall be a good quality in him, to cherish and affect the Professors of them, alwayes hauing wise and learned men about him, and to execute nothing, vntil he haue first heard the councell of them; For, Councell is a sacred thing, said Epicharmus. And he should striue to be like vnto them, insomuch as possibly he may: according to the example of many great Kings, Princes and Captains, who highly loued and maintained Philosophers, Poets and skilfull men.

An especiall looking glasse for all Kings and princes.

A Prince may perceiue, what account Great Alexander made of Aristotle, and how much he admired learned men; what dignitie and praise Pericles wonne by the institutions of Anaxagoras; and Epaminondas by the study of philosophy, who (almost of himselfe) subdued the Lacedemonians, that commanded all Greece. He may further obserue, how Scipio kept company with Panetius and Polybius, learned men; how Augustus would walke betweene Virgill and Horace; and what honours he gaue to * Arrius. Finally, what deportments were vsed by many other Emperours and Kings, on the behalfe of learned men; and, by the example of such persons, himselfe ought to performe the like. The Prince that attaineth to the issue of the qualities before remembred, and are required necessarily in him: shall reigne happily, and the people that liue vnder the lawes of such a Gouernor, will finde themselues more happy then he.

* A philosopher of Alexandria.

CHAP. XI.

¶ That the eldest Sonne ought alwayes to bee preferred before a yonger, especially in the succession of Kingdomes and Principalities, according to the Lawe of Nature. And what harmes haue followed, by doing the contrary.

IN Allemaigne or Germany, this bad custom they haue (I meane among the Noblemen,) that if they perceiue their youngest Sonnes able of spirit, and addict themselues to Armes, and not to endure any iniuries; they make them theyr heyres. And the elder, perhappes more discreete, following naturall goodnesse, & being nothing so turbulent; they make them beleeue, that they are idiotes and fooles, confining them in prison, or else appointing them to Church-seruice. This maner of dealing, hath caused much war in the Realmes where it is put in practise: and the reason is, because it behoueth alwayes, to keepe the order and commaundement of God. For, although that the eldest eldeſt Sonne be ill-ſighted, lame, crooked, and wholly miſ-ſhapen, prouided, that hee haue a reaſonable ſoule remaining in him; he is not to be excluded from his naturall right. This is not onely to holde, and take place, when queſtion is made about the right of elderſhip: but alſo, when the very neareſt male by the fathers ſide, ought to ſucceed in the crown, how much deformed ſoeuer he be. Becauſe, for one inconuenience, a good law ſhould not be infringed, and ſo daungerous an ouerture made in Monarchies. Nor ought that to be followed, or held as a good lawe, which was made by Lycurgus, commaunding, that deformed or miſ-ſhapen children, ſhould be ſlaine.

Concerning right in the ſucceſsion of kingdomes.

Heereupon, Iudgement paſſed for the Realme of Hungarie, by the States of the Countrey, againſt the diſpoſition of Launcelot, King of Hungarie: who adopted Alanus, the youngeſt ſonne of his brother, to make him King, and ſent Colomanus, his eldeſt brother to ſtudy at Paris, cauſing him afterward, to vndergoe the Orders of Prieſthoode, and beſtowed a Biſhoppricke vppon him, to depriue him of all hope of ſucceeding in the Crowne; becauſe he was ſquint-eyed, crook-backt, lame and ſtammered. Neuertheleſſe, the State and people expelled the younger brother: and would haue none other to be King then the eldeſt, who was brought backe againe, diſpenſation being graunted for his Orders, and he married.

The Hungarians held firmly for the right of the eldeſt brother.

Pompey, being gone into the Eaſt parts, to make Conqueſts, and comming into Iudea, found it full of warre, becauſe two brethren warred each with other, onely for the kingly dignity. For Ariſtobulus the younger brother, had inuaded the beſt places of the Kingdome, and quite expulſed his brother Hyrcanus: becauſe hee ſayd, that hee was not borne, or apte for Armes. Notwithſtanding, Pompey adiudged the Kingdome to Hyrcanus, and the high-Prieſthoode to Ariſtobulus, which was the chiefeſt degree next to the King; and thus the ſtowt warriour was ſtayed from proſecution of his purpoſe.

The iourney of Pompey into Iudea.

Ptolomie, the firſt of that name, King of Egipt, preferred the youngeſt before the eldeſt; Againſt the Lawe of Nations, ſaith Iuſtine, and ſo cauſed the one to kill the other. In the ſame kingdome, an other Ptolomie, named Phiſconius, at the entreatie of his wife Cleopatra, preferred the youngeſt ſonne before the eldeſt: but after the fathers death, the people repealed the eldeſt, and excluded the youngeſt, as Pauſanias affirmeth.

The equall iudgement of Pompey.

Iniuſtice in Ptolomy the firſt King of Egipt.

Pauſan. in lib. 1.

In like manner, Anaxandrides, King of Lacedemon, preferred Doricus before Cleomenes his elder brother, becauſe hee was more gentle; and yet notwithſtanding, Herodotus in his fourth Booke ſayth, That the people would not permit or ſuffer it, becauſe it was againſt the right of Nations.

King Pyrrhus making election of an heyre amongeſt his Sonnes, choſe him that had the beſt and keeneſt Sword: neuertheleſſe, after his death, the eldeſt (who was leſſe valiant) carried the inheritance away. For, whatſoeuer hardines, gentleneſſe, fayre feature and wiſedome, that may be in the younger, more then in the elder: yet it is not anie occaſion, whereby the father ſhould ſo forget himſelfe, as to preferre the youngeſt before the eldeſt, as did the father of Atreus and Thyeſtes, who would needs preferre the youngeſt Sonne, becauſe hee had better and more vnderſtanding in the affayres of State, but thereon enſued bloudie tragedies.

The great error of King Pyrrhus.

They were the ſonnes of Pelops and Hyppodamia.

Heereunto likewiſe I may adde, Lewes the Pittifull, King of Fraunce, who (at the requeſt of his ſecond wife) preferred Charles the Baulde, before his elder Brother Lotharius; whereby the Realme became embraced with warres.

Lewes the mercifull.

The like conſequence came by Robert, King of Fraunce, in preferring Henry, the firſt of that name, before his eldeſt brother, who contented himſelfe with Bourgongne; becauſe he was a coward and falſe to his owne heart.

Robert King of France.

Charles the ſeuenth, could neuer obtaine of Pope Pius the ſecond, to aduance Charles the yongeſt Sonne, before Lewes the eleauenth, although the King had then good occaſion: becauſe the ſayde Lewes made two attempts to take the Crowne, and to teare away the Scepter from his father, without anie occaſion whatſoeuer. And in very truth (as Herodotus ſaith:) Throughout the whole world, the eldeſt are aduanced to the dominion, euen amongeſt the moſt illiterate and barbarous on the earth, they obſerue the courſe of Nature.

Example of King Charles the ſeuenth.

Herodotus li. 4. Barbarous, illiterate and Sauages imitated nature.

When Frances Bizarro, a Spaniſh Captayne, conquered the kingdome of Peru, he he put to death king Attabaliba: whereof all the people were very ioyfull, to ſee him dye, that had ſlaine his elder brother, to make himſelfe King, contrary to the cuſtome of the Country, & conforme to the teſtament of the Father, who hauing two ſonnes, willed, that Gaſca the eldeſt, ſhould ſucceede him in the Kingdome, without any diuiſion.

Concerning two Twins.

There might alſo ariſe a doubt, to wit, if two infants be twins, which of them both ſhould bee reputed the eldeſt; that muſt needs bee the eldeſt, which came foorth firſt to the worlds light. Another doubt alſo may bee moued in this caſe, that if any man (not being a king) hauing a ſonne, ſhall afterward conquer a Kingdome, or ſome other ſuch like dignity, be it eyther by Armes, or by donation. It falleth out in following dayes or yeares, that he hath another ſonne; to which of theſe ſhall belong the kingdome or other honor? It is held for certain, that he who was or ſhal be borne, after that the Father became a king, in right ought to ſucceed: for the eldeſt ſon was not of royal blood, but holds of his fathers firſt conditiō, who was not then royall by nature. But the other yonger-borne ſonne, though comming long after the firſt, is truely & really a Prince by blood. Like as he is not to be accounted for infamous, and out of hope for being legitimate, who was begot by a man neuer made Prieſt: but afterward, when he commeth to vndergo the order of Prieſthood, he begetteth then another Sonne; that Son is to remaine impeached, and can neuer come to ſuch legittimacy, as the firſt borne.

Tit. Liuius in lib. 8. Bello Punici.

Another difficulty there remaineth yet vndecided, to wit, whether the ſonne of the eldeſt ought to ſucceed his grand-father, or elſe the Crown appertaine to the yonger brother (as it ſhould ſeeme) becauſe he is the neereſt to the King, & the yonger ſtandeth withdrawne in degree. It was the opinion of ſome, and this difficulty hapned for the Kingdome of Numidia, where the younger ſon would ſucceed next after his elder brother, without any reſpect to the children of the eldeſt. Heereupon, Scipio the Affricane being arbitratour, not knowing what to anſwere in this caſe, betweene the Vncle and the Nephew: gaue order, that the Kingdome ſhould be enioyed, by a combate fought betweene them, as it hath often hapned in Germany.

A pretext of inheritance decided by combate.

Now at this inſtant, the Kingdome of Moſcouia is deferred vnto the younger ſonne, after the death of the grandfather, without any regard of the ſonne to him that was eldeſt. Nay, which is more, the elder brother ſucceedeth to the yonger in the Kingdome, although hee haue ſonnes: As great Baſilius, King of Moſcouia, ſucceeded in the Kingdome after his elder Brother, who had ſonnes. And this was vſuall, not onely among the Vandales; but alſo in all the Northerne countries, according to the affirmation of Procopius, as alſo in England. And for this cauſe, Richard, ſonne to the heire & eldeſt, was defeated of the Crowne, which was adiudged by the States to Henry of Lancaſter, younger brother to the Father of Richard, in the yeare 1399. And in the like caſe, Robert of Naples, the younger ſonne, enioyed the kingdome of Naples, by ſentence of the Pope, and the ſonne to the elder brother, King of Hungary, was diſpoſſeſſed. But now adayes, this rule holdeth not in the countries hitherward, neyther doth it carrie any practiſe in the Crowne of France, ſince then when it ſo happened the ſonnes of the eldeſt are alwaies preferd before the yonger brother, and the Engliſh obſerue the ſame courſe.

Concerning the Kingdome of Moſcouia.

An vnfitting law deſerueth to be aboliſhed.

Some kings haue bin ſo ſuperſtitiouſly affected, and (beſide) very ill aduiſed, that they would needs make ſearch for the natiuities of their childrē, to giue to him the Crowne, whoſe Stars appeard moſt to fauor him. In the number of whom, was Alphonſus, king of Caſtile, who by this means would needs preferre the yoonger ſon before the elder; but he ſlew the yonger, and cauſd his father to die in priſon: by which I find, that he was but a poore Prognoſticator. Wherefore, to auoyde ciuile war, which is the ruine of kingdoms and common-weales, the law of nature, (or rather the Lawe of God) ought to be followed, which commaundeth, to conferre kingdomes vpon the eldeſt, as alwayes it was practiſed among the Hebrues: and as we further finde, that the kingdome of Iuda was conferred vpon Iehoram, becauſe he was the eldeſt, as the Scripture affirmeth. Which alſo the wiſe Lycurgus imitated; for, although the Lacedemonians had created him King, after the death of Charilaus:

Kings becomming ſuperſtitious Aſtrologers.

Alphonſus, K. of Caſtile.

yet notwithstanding, hee would not accept the crowne; but kept it, and rendred it to the sonne of the others brother, whē he was come to competent age.

The very greatest part thereof was vsed by the Scythians, Burgundians, Lombards, Hūgarians, French, Goths, and Vandales: And Rome was four times taken by the Gothes and Vandals, within one hundred thirty nine yeares. 427. Theodosius the second, youngest sonne of Arcadius, reigned at Constantinople 27. yeares, after the death of Honorius; hauing assisted Valentinian the third, the son of Constantius, and Placida, daughter to Theodosius, who reigned fiue yeares in the West. At this time, the Frenchmen leauing Franconia, began to enter vpon the Gaules, vnder Clodion their second King.

453. F. Valerius Martianus, reigned in the East, seauen yeares, and Valentinian the third (at the same time) in the West: during their Reigne, the Burgundians and other Westerne Nations, were conuerted to the Faith. The Vandals came out of Spaine into Affrica, and afterward they tooke Rome, vnder the conduct of theyr King Genserichus. Attila, King of the Hunnes, entered into Gaul with fiue hundred thousand men: deliuered battaile to Meroüeus their second King, who had ioyned with Aetius, Lieutenant vnto the Emperor. There he lost an hundred and fourescore thousand men, and fled into Hungaria, not any man beeing wounded behinde. About this time was great Arthur King of Britaine.

460. Leo the first, reigned 17. yeares, associated by Leo the Sonne of his Daughter; who after he had reigned one year alone,

476. gaue vp the Empire to Zeno his Grandsire, who reigned tyrannically 17. yeares. The estate of the Church was then very greatly troubled, as also that of the Westerne Empire. Italy had then nine Emperors in twenty yeares, who all slew one another.

493. Anastasius reigned twenty fiue years: he was an Eutichian Heretiqne, was smitten with lightning, and dyed (as a iust punishment) for his heresie. Fulgentius.

519. Iustine reigned nine yeares: hee was first a Swine-heard, afterward a Cow-heard, next a Carpenter, a Souldior, a Captaine, and last of all Emperour, gouerning very well and godly, and expelling the Arrian Heretiques. Then liued Boetius; and S. Bennet or Benedict began this Order.

528. Iustinian reigned thirty eight yeares. All his care and study, was to repaire the decayed Empire, and re-establish ciuill right; in the execution whereof, hee was seconded by excellent personages, especially by Belisarius, Narses, and Tribonianus. They first chased the Vandals out of Affrica, which they had held 95. yeares: and deliuered Rome from the Gothes, who had conquered it, & yet were once more expulsed thence by Narses.

566. Iustine the second, reigned ten yeares, beloued of all men for his liberality. Sophia his wife mocked him with Narses, the Gouernour of Italy, whereat he being offended, called the Lombardes, by whose helpe he reuenged himselfe. Now was the Kingdome of the Lombards founded by Clebus, wher reigned thirty two kings, vntill the time of Charles the Great.

The kingdom of the Lombards.

577. Tiberius the second, reigned 7. yeares: he was a very charitable man, one that loued God and his Saints, and therefore (no doubt) was beloued of him againe.

584. Mauritius reigned twenty yeares: he was descended of very meane Parentage, and (in the end) was murdered for his couetousnesse: a vice as much discommendable in a Prince, as liberality is beseeming, and maketh him renowned.

604. Phocas reigned eight yeares: and being the murderer of his Predecessor, himselfe was likewise murdered, with all his Race. Now was the contention for the Primacy of the Church, betweene Rome and Constantinople, and now was S. Gregory.

Contention for Primacy of the church.

612. Heraclius reigned thirty yeares, who was the murderer of Phocas. The fifteenth yeare of his reigne, began the rule of Mahomet, the false Prophet of Arabia, where were the Agarens & Sarrazins: to whom the the Egyptian and Arabian princes (called Soldanes) next succeeded. After them came the Turkes, about the yeare of our Lord God, one thousand and three hundred, Mahomets false doctrine (through the negligence of the Emperors & Christian princes) grewe to such an head; that it not onely poysoned Asia and Affrica, but also a very great part of Europe.

640 Constantine the third, reigned foure moneths, being a good prince, and verie young: He was poysoned by his stepmother, that her sonne might reigne.

641 Heraclion, who hauing his nose and tongue cut out, was banished two yeares after.

643 Constans, the sonne of Constantine, reigned twenty and seauen yeares: And beeing very couetous, hee was slayne by his owne followers, in the Bathes of Syracusa.

670 Constantine the fourth, reigned seauenteene yeares. Hee ouercame in one battell, thirty thousand Syracusans, and afterward fell to great wickednesse. The learned and venerable Beda liued in this time.

687 Iustinian the second, a wicked man, reigned sixteene yeares, but not without interruption, being deiected by Leontius, and Leontius by Tyberius Absimaris, who reigned other three yeares; therefore these three are sayde to reigne sixeteene yeares. Now was the beginning of the Dukes of Venice, which had beene gouerned before (for the space of two hundred and thirty yeares) by Tribunes.

The State of the Venetiãs.

713 Phillip Bardasanes, reigned two yeres. Hee was cast out of his Empire by his Lieutenant: and after that, they plucked foorth his eyes. Hee had much talke and little wisedome, disposing badly of the Empire, he became after a schismaticall Monke.

715 Anthemius, called also Athanasius the second, reigned three yeares: He was deiected from his Empire by Theodosius chiefe of his Armie, and turned into a Monastery. He had taken away the Empire, and then pluckt out the eyes of his predecessour.

718 Theodosius the third, reigned one yeare. He left the Empire, seeing himselfe to be assayled by Leo his successor, and became a Monke.

719 Leo the third, a wicked man, reigned fiue and twenty yeares. Hee was called Iconomachus, a Defacer of Images, and would not suffer the Christians to haue any in their Temples. He was excommunicated by Gregorie, and by authoritie of a Councell held at Rome, against his owne of Constantinople. Blond. in his tenth book. The Sarazins besiegd Constantinople three yeares together, in which time died three hundred thousand of the pestilence and famine.

742 Constantine, the fift of that name, the sonne of Leo the Isaurian, succeeded his father in the Empire of Constantinople, in the yeare of our Saluation, seauen hundred fortie and two. Hee was sirnamed Copronymus, becausse he would discharge his belly in the Fonts, appoynted for Christian Baptisme. Hee was an vtter enemy, not onely to the Images of Saints, but also to theyr Reliques, causing them to be burned. Hee did put to death many of the best and most respected persons, and (amongst others) two Patriarchs of Constantinople. He made warre against the Bulgarians, both by Land and Sea, Fortune smiling vpon him, other-whiles lowring. In his absence, one Artabasdus was made Emperour at Constantinople. But he receiuing news thereof, returned, and either put out, or rent foorth the new Emperours eyes, and caused his children to be slaine. In his time, there was so cold a Winter, that the Sea of Constantinople was frozen. After many cruelties, this Emperour dyed a Leaper.

743 Artabasdus, albeit he was descended of meane birth; yet notwithstanding, for the faithfulnesse, good vertues, and commendable qualities which were in him, he was liked of the Senate and Souldiers, & afterward was elected Emporour by the zealous Christians, for the hatred that euery one bare to Constantine the fift. Hee became a better louer of the Saints, and fortified the City of Constantinople against Constantine, who had beene expulsed from thence. Neuertheless, both hee and it were besieged; and the Citty beeing surprized, his eyes were pluckt out, and his children put to death.

745 Leo the fourth, was Emperour after his father Constantine the fift. He was not only heyre to the Empire, but also to his fathers vices: And his mother, who was deuout, and one that loued God, would giue giue no consent, that he should be Emperour. Hee made some attempts vpon the Sarazins that dwelt in Syria. Hee tooke the Crowne, which Mauritius had dedicated vnto Almighty God, and set it on his owne head, it being very richly beautified with rich pretious stones: But soon after, hee had an Impostume in his head, with a fiery Ague, whereof he dyed.

780 Constantine, the sixt of that name, and sonne to Leo the fourth, was Emperour after his father: Hee reigned nine yeares (very young) with his mother, who with his consent also, was perswaded by Theraſius Patriarch of Constantinople, to call a general Councell of three hundred and fifty Bishops. In a short while after, Constantine excluded his Mother from the Empires gouernement. Hee caused the eyes and tongue of Nicephorus to be pulld and cut out, hearing of a secret intention, to make him Emperour. Also he did shut vp in a Monastery, his wife Marie, who was the daughter of King Charlemaine, and then tooke a Concubine, by the councell of his Mother, who pretended that her sonne was hated of the people. Hereupon not long after, shee caused him to be taken, and plucking foorth his eyes, shut him vp in prison, where hee dyed, in the yeare 798, and then she reigned alone, about the space of fiue yeares.

798 Irene, issued from Attica, was Wife to the Emperour Leo the fourth, by whome he had Constantine the sixt before mentioned, and reigned with him nine yeares, & afterward (alone by herselfe) fiue yeres, or little more, as hath already beene sayd. She was thence expelled by Nicephorus, and sent into exile to the Isle of Lesbos, which at this instant is called Mitiline. At the time when this Lady gouerned the Empire of Constantinople, Charlemaine was sacred and crowned Emperour of Rome, (or of the West) for his vertues.

CHAP. XIII

¶ The ancient and honourable Historie of the life, fortunes and admired vertues, of faire Landgartha, the royall Queene of Norway.

IT is a case most certayne and assured, that a generous spirit, a gentle soule, and an vnderstanding filld with cheareful delicacie, is much sooner seized with amorous apprehensions; then that which is farre off from this quèint temper, and which subtillizeth the same perfection of the soule. Considering that loue, pure and perfectly naturall, being a vertue, and vertue euermore biding in such subiects, where the hearts are best and most sanctimoniously nourished, and gentle spirits hauing (I know not how) a rellish more diuine then vulgare, or apted for grosse popularitie: It followeth, without anie question to the contrary, that men, the more remarkable they are for greatnesse, gentlnes, good spirit, & illustrious blood; doe also best discourse on louely occasions, and effect them with clearer iudgement, then such as fayle in the accomplishments of the soule.

The reason why good spirits are much more amorous then dull and leaden capacities.

And, to sift this poynt the more seriously; Is it for a Clowne or peazant, to iudge on the raritie of vertues, on the singular giftes of the Spirit, of that which is beloued, and what offices and duties are in the partie affectionate? Effectes doe plainely approoue the contrary; for Poets, who are the very subtillest Painters of humane affections, that I know, and which trace Trueth vnder the distemperd colours of wittie Fables, can not better let vs beholde the picture of such an impression; then by the iudgement (so often sung) and persourmed by the Troyan, on the beautie of the three Goddesses. For, the rudenesse of the Shepheard, hauing extincted the bright beams of bloud frō his Parents, among the base and grosse thoughts fit for flock-keepers, not knowing the spirites forces, the beautie of the soule, the gentlenesse of vnderstanding, and the galliardise of the bodie it selfe, in being gouerned by interiour reason; gaue the prize (he knew not how) of beauty, by appearing in the exteriour shape of a lasciuious Lady.

It is not for the Buzzards eies to geze on the Sunnes radiant splendour.

The interpretation of the Fable, concerning the iudgement of Paris.

Beholde how farre Poeticall Philosophy extendeth it selfe, and iudge, if the sottish Shepheard degenerated not from his Parents, who should more haue cherished vertue, which liueth and continueth for euer; then that which withereth, and looseth it selfe by the steppes of age. And if that indiscreet Iudge pronounced the Sentence, in fauour of the most vnwoorthie, and lent his affections to the onlie onely tickling of deſire, full of wretched folly: ſo was he as well recompenced according to his merit, and felt in the ende, that a manly Hectors deſſeignes, ſauouring of that which is proper to the vertue of a man; was much rather to be choſen, then the light promiſe of a hurtful thing, how pleaſant ſoeuer in wiſh, and alluring the ſenſuall part of a man.

Corporeall beauty & feature in a woman, is no matter of any great moment

Alſo, to ſpeake truely, ſo many famous women, as haue honoured all the Ages paſt and ours, by effect and memory of their commendable vertues; if they had had no other rarities to renowne them, but onely beauty of the body: queſtionleſſe, their names had long ſince bin buried in a more obſcure graue, then euer time ordained for things to be forgotten. No, no, it was vertue, generoſity, height of courage, and great enterprizes; which made them immortall, and equalled their glory with the renowne of men, yea, of the moſt ſignall and illuſtrious.

Againſt the venemous tongues of ſuch, as neuer ceaſſe to taxe the reputation of ſo honourable a ſexe; no boaſt need to be made, either of ſearch into the valiancies of Semyramis, whoſe memorie is ſomewhat too farre off; neyther the incredible forces of the Amazones, the Hiſtory being (I know not how) doubtfull in the occurrences. Nor will I induce Zenobia the Aſian Queene, the dreadfull aſtoniſhment (ſometime) of the Romane Empire: whoſe wiſedome alſo was as much to bee commended, as any of the very chiefeſt Generals, her direction, pollicy and good carriage, all making her reputed (long time) for one of the Worlds Monarchs. Nor am I willing (fearing to make men bluſh, by reading how many women haue managed Armes, and with no meane felicity) to inſert Cinana, Daughter to Phillip King of Macedon, who made head againſt the ingratefull ſucceſſours of her Brother Alexander, purſuing the vtter ruine of his bloode that had aduanced them. After many foughten Battailes, hauing carried herſelfe beyond the compaſſe of man-like valiancy; in the ende, ſhe affected rather to dye, then to ſee the vtter ruine of the famous Houſe of her Anceſtors, beeing vnable any way to helpe it. I will be ſilent alſo, in ſpeaking of the braue Valaſca, a young Lady of Bohemia, who arming the Ladyes of her Country againſt their Husbands; made a happy courſe of long warre againſt the men: vntill ſuch time, as (being betrayed) ſhee crowded into the throngs of her enemies, of whom (before ſhe could be ſlaine) ſhe ſlew a great number.

Valaſca a yong Lady, entred into Armes in Bohemia, gainſt the men of the Counrry.

I will not (I ſay) diſcourſe ſo many examples, beeing ſatisfied with a Hiſtory moſt true and memorable, collected frō famous Antiquity, and from among the Ladyes of a people, heeretofore accounted very barbarous: wherein (by my ſlender opinion) honeſt Gentlewomen ſhall receiue ſome taſte of vertue, without lerning the fierce obſtinacy of any; and Gētlemen, may haue meanes to ſee and conſider, how to make choyſe of vertue in louing; and faire minded Maidens, obſerue a rule, how to contain their thoghts in loyall affection, to them whom they haue dedicated their deſires.

The Author referreth his Readers to this Hiſtory onely.

In the time when Dagobert, ſonne to Charles the Great, reigned in France, and ouer the Empire, there was a King in Swetia, named Froll, or Frollo, a cruell man, a tyrant, and inſupportable to euery one. This King, being neuer contented with his owne Royalties, began to inſult obſtinately on his neighbours Lands: but eſpecially to fleſh on the king of Norway, vpon whoſe Countries entring without challenge or defiance, he made ſuch great ſpoyle; that hauing pilled, ſacked, and well-neere ruined the whole Country, he vanquiſhed and and ſlew the King, with all his Family. Nor did it ſuffice this rauenous Wolfe, to haue ſhed ſo much innocent blood, for the glutting of his greedy deſire: but hee muſt needs alſo ſoyle his name with all kindes of cruelty and villany, inſomuch, that hee left neyther Lady of the Houſe Royall, nor any other that he could lay hold on; but he abuſed them as villanouſly, as wickedly hee had robbed other of their inheritable rights. They that were not (as yet) fallen into the gripes of this abhominable Goate, and not knowing how to ſhunne falling into his cunning and treacherous ſnares, made ſuch a priuate conſultation among themſelues by ſecret intelligence; that at length, they mette together in a corner of the deſert belonging vnto the Kingdome, to haue a more free vnderſtanding of particular grieuances, and how how they might beſt defend theyr honor and innocencie.

The noble mē of Norway ſolicite Reyner king of Denmarke to redreſſe their woful miſerie.

Newes likewiſe ran curſorily among them, that the Nobilitie of the Country (who had withdrawne themſelues into Denmarke) ſolicited King Reyner, to bring thither his forces, in reuenge of a diſhonourable iniury done to his owne bloud (for his mother was iſſued from Norway) and the Dane being eaſily ſpurred on to warre, in regarde he was very youthfull, his bloud chearefully boyling, and deſirous to atchieue honour by Armes; gaue the eaſier eare to the motion. Beſide, deſire of reuenge, to ſee his reputation ſo much intereſſed, by the tyrannies of Swetia, with pretending a right and title vnto the kingdome of Norway: Theſe were no meane motiues to incite him on the ſooner. And theſe conſiderations, gaue hart alſo to the diſtreſſed Ladies, for hope of good ſucceſſe thereby: but fearing, that matter and meanes (in this caſe) were not as yet ſufficiently ready; this intimated perſwaſion vaniſhed into ſmoake, euen (well-neare) as ſodainely as it was conceiued, being no way able to reſolue on anie thing.

Diſtreſſed honor, eſpecially in Ladies, is earneſtly deſirous of redreſſe.

At length, one in their goodly troupe, and (almoſt) one of the youngeſt, faireſt and gentleſt Virgines, and ſuch a one as had propounded to herſelfe, neuer to ſubmit vnder any Lawe, that gaue a man power ouer his wife: She, beholding the ſad aſtoniſhment of the whole company, and what iuſt reaſon they had to be ſo dreadfully diſmayed; making a reuerent obeyſance vnto them all, deliuered her minde in this manner.

A Councell called among the Ladies of Norway.

The Oration of Landgartha, to the whole Company of Ladyes.

CAn it be (faire Ladies of Norway) that illuſtrous bloud, appeareth onely in the ſtrength and dexteritie, which fondly wee preſume proper and peculiar to men: and we that haue hearts, ſpirits, bodies and members like vnto theirs, muſt make them reuengers, and defenders of our continence & chaſtity? If Fate be ſo maleuolently affected, that our fathers, brothers and husbands, can obtayne no ſuccour, to recouer their lands, and expulſe the Tyrant out of theyr territories: ſhall it therefore be ſayd, that we muſt needs ſerue the inordinate appetits of a villaine, & Frollo muſt abuſe thoſe remayning Ladies, that neuer taſted his abhominable embracements. Let Landgartha liue no longer, if ſhe be voyde of all other dueties and deuotion, then to attend the pleaſures of a Tyrant, and (without reſiſtance) ſuffer violence to be done to her honour and modeſtie.

In extreamities all means conuenient are to beſoght and vſed.

Why Ladies, the Lyoneſſe and Tygreſſe whet their clawes and ſharpen theyr teeth, to defend theyr yoong ones, and preſerue theyr liues from the Hunts mens hands. The verie ſmalleſt Bird will vſe both the Beake and Wing, to reuenge the wrong offered by rape of her brood. And we, that ſurmount the one, in ſence and reaſon, the other in ſtrength, & all in wiſedome and councell for bolde attempts; ſhall we ſuffer that a Stranger (not one iote ſtronger then our owne Countries ſtrength) ſhall make a mockery and abuſiue paſtime, of the moſt honourable Matrones & Gentlewomen in our Land? No, no, it is not for Landgartha to endure ſuch indignitie, or that (without effuſion of her blood) can yeeld to the beaſt-like Prince of Swetia.

Vnreaſonable creaturs arme themſelues in their owne defence & theirs

Are we inferiour in courage and generoſitie of ſpirit, to braue Aluilda, who ſo long time fought on the Seas, and amazed the very boldeſt warriours of the world? Are wee defectiue in any thing ſhe had? We are healthfull, young, gallant, ſtrong and rich enough, to winne whatſoeuer is needefull for vs, by ſeruice eyther on Sea or Land. And if Aluilda (moued by vniuſt means) proſperd in her actions, and had Fortune fauorable to all her attempts: can you imagine, that Heauen hath not farre fayrer ſucceſſe in ſtore for vs, hauing Reaſon and Vertue on our ſide, and vpright iuſtice to ſupport our cauſe? were our iourney to death onely, and that the ending of this wretched life, could appeaſe the Tyrants cruelty, without proceeding any further: I would be the foremoſt, freely offering my ſelfe as a Sacrifice, to ſatiate the furie of his raging luſt. If he coueted, and would haue nothing elſe but our wealth and treaſure; I would aduiſe you to deliuer all, and rather then ſpare aught, let vs goe ſeeke future fortune, and beg our bread through all ſtrange countries in the world.

Aluilda was daughter to Siward king of the Gothes, & ranged on the ſeas as a Pirat

Ah, no, no, (ſweete Ladies) hee likes our liues too well, and by taking pleaſure in them, deſireth our euerlaſting diſpleaſure. He will ſuffer ſuffer vs to enioy our wealth, for his freer wallowing in wicked dalliances, which prey is the maine purchaſe whereat hee moſt aymeth: for hee more delighteth in our Honours violation, then, by maſſacring our bodies, to become Lord of all our Iewells, lands, and inheritances. What remayneth then for our deliuerance? Shall we tarry for them that are in Denmarke, expecting when they will come to ſuccour vs? No, rather let Ladies arme themſelues, and appearing in open field; fight valiantly againſt the villaine, that ſeeketh to rob vs of our true repute. Let vs giue him plainely to vnderſtand, that effeminate perſons are more ſoft, and leſſe valiant then we are; that chaſte and vertuous Ladies are of other temper, then Souldiers mollified by baſe paillardiſe: yea that they are more truely conſtant then the Tyrant, whoſe conſcious guiltineſſe in foule offences, is his owne continuall torturing hangman. On then (valiant Princeſſes, and Ladies of no meane luſtre;) away with our wanton tires, paintings, perriwigs, and ydle deckings: Let vs change our Spindles, Needles and Samplers, into Horſes, Launces, Swords and Armour, and trie, if Frollo be as furious in warre, as hee is fierie wanton in his laſciuious Pallace. Let vs reuenge the wrongs our Parents and Kindred haue receiued; or die moſt gloriouſly, in the purſuite of ſo holy, iuſt and commendable a reuenge.

Shame and infamy waite continually at the heeles of vnbridled luſt.

A famous and worthy reſolution in a chaſte, vertuous & ſprightfull minded Virgin.

This couragious remonſtrance of the braue ſpirited Virgine, gaue ſuch bolde animation vnto the reſt of the Ladies, as (with one conſent) they made a league, vowing louing alliance, and (ſollemnly ſwearing faith, loyaltie, mutuall ſuccour, and aſſiſtance among themſelues;) Landgartha was elected chiefe commandreſſe, or Lady Generall of the Army, and well deſeruing that, or any other higher dignitie, being the motiue to ſuch a maine and important buſineſſe.

A League ſworne, amõg the Ladies, & Landgartha made the Lady Generall.

Now beganne a muſter of all the Women and Maidens, of the moſt noble and famous houſes throughout the whole Countrey: but not without much amazment in Frollo, wondering whereto tended ſuch an aſſembly. Hee, perſwading himſelfe, that they intended flight to their friends and kinred in Denmarke; ſent commaund vnto them, that (on perill of their liues) they ſhould returne home to their houſes, for enioying the benefite of their libertie; which he was content to graunt them, in regard of their beauties and gentle behauiour.

It is no common matter, that mooueth women to march in arms

But Landgartha, the man-like woman champion, hearing the peremptory commaund deliuered by the Tyrants Heralds; ſent them backe with blows and iniurious ſpeeches, telling them; that they would not take their liues, in regarde of any reſpect they had to their Lord: but onely, becauſe they ſhould let him vnderſtand, in what deuotion and readineſſe they found them, & or ſeeking ſome conuenient means and way, whereby to make him render an account for his tyrannie and cruelties.

The Heraulds & Meſſengers of Frollo are ſent back with iuſt payment by the Ladies.

When Frollo heard theſe tidings, at the firſt he made but a ſcorne thereof, laughing extreamely, at this womaniſh enterpriſe and Armie of Ladies, ſaying: They did well, to make a preſent of themſelues, becauſe he ſhould haue the eaſier way to find them, and if they came into the field; the bootie would ſuffice for his Souldiers pay, and likewiſe for their pleaſure beſide, in regarde he would beſtow wiues vppon them all, and ſaue them a labour from any further fighting. But this pleaſant humour ſoone forſooke him, and conuerted into fury, when he was aduertiſed of their being in the field, & making ſuch a ſtrange maſſacre of his men, as the like was ſeldome ſeene or heard of. Nor ſpared they the liues of any, that durſt reclaime himſelfe from following his ſeruice, which made him curſſe and ſweare, threatning them with a thouſand kinde of torments and afflictions, going now (in good earneſt) to arme himſelfe; as being perſwaded, that this feminine furie had extended ſo farre, that it was no light matter that could allay it. Hee grew alſo into ſuch ſuſpition of himſelfe, that he kept a ſtrong Guard about him: as holding but ſmall aſſurance of his life, amongeſt the armed troupes of his owne Souldiers: yet hee made many large promiſes vnto them, of the very faireſt and richeſt amongſt them, with all their lands and treaſure, to ſhew themſelues valiant and coragious, againſt this giddy headed army of women; which encreaſed daily more and more, both in number, victuals and munitions, brought continually to them from euery part.

The Tyrant made a mockerie of the Ladies preparation in arms meaning to marry them to his Souldiers Frollo prepareth himſelfe to Armes againſt the Ladies.

But howſoeuer (one way) the bad affection of the Norwegians gaue affliction

to his ſpirits, and the fauour which his owne ſubiects affoorded to this womaniſh Army, tormented his ſoule as violently on the other ſide: yet he ſeemed to ſet a good countenance on his feares, declaring no outward doubt of preuayling againſt them, though (inwardly) his cogitations tolde him dreadfull tydings. Neuertheleſſe, being already in the field; and preparing his equipage, to get the beſt aduantage he could, of the place where the Ladies were encamped: a Courtier came galloping in poaſt to him, bringing newes of the king of Denmarks deſcent into Norway, with a very potent Armie. What aſtoniſhment ſoeuer ſeized on his ſoule, to ſee himſelfe incloſed (as it were) with two puiſſant enemies, and knowing how highly he was hated, by them whom hee had ouercome and ſubiected: yet notwithſtanding, perceiuing that flight was preiudiciall to his honour; and (moreouer) almoſt impoſsible, in regard that the ways whereby he ſhould paſſe into Suetia, as alſo euery port and paſſage were in the enemies power; he reſolued, firſt to runne his fortune on the men, who being defeated, the fight would be farre eaſier againſt the women; and thereupon, in the forme of an Oration, thus he ſpake to his Army.

Tyranny is alwayes ſubiect to tormenting paſſions.

¶ The Oration of Frollo, King of Swetia, to his Soldiers.

When men be in bad actions (eſpecially in Armes vniuſtly) they ſtand in neede of good incouraging.

IF you were not thoſe valiant Gothes and Swetians, that haue tamed and beaten this kennell broode of Norwegians, and now conquered their land: If it were not your valiancie, that hath often made pillage and ſpoile of the Danes; If your inuincible force were not well knowne to the world: I ſhould then haue now entreated you, to remeber your Anceſtors, and the glorious conqueſts of your predeceſſors: I ſhould alſo ſet before your eies, how many Kings, People and Nations were vnder-yoaked, by the greatneſſe and deedes of your famous fore-goers. But, ſeeing that your proper vertue ſufficiently ſheweth it ſelfe, and auoucheth you to be the worthy ſonnes and ſucceſſours, to ſo many valiant and famous Fathers, and that your deedes are no way indebted to the glorie of their greatneſſe: Let vs goe then, gentle and worthy warriours: Let vs pace on, and giue Reyner to know, that this is no Countrey for him to reigne in, nor to deale in actions of Armes, with the moſt furious and braueſt Nation of Europe. Let vs on (bold ſpirites) to chaſe them againe, which haue ſo many times fled before vs; and let vs chaſtice the rebellion of the Norwegians, who falſifying their faith ſworne vnto vs: haue called in our enemy to their ſuccor, to quarrell with me for that, which is yours by right of Conqueſt.

The noble diligence of Lādgartha, ioyning her forces with King Reiners Campe.

In the meane ſpace, while Frollo marched on to meete the Danes, obſerue the wiſedome and diligence of Landgartha, and her Ladies, who ſtepped before him with ſuch poaſting ſpeede, that ere the time, as any intelligence could be obtayned of her departure: tydings were ſuddenly brought him, that both the Camps were ioyned together, and came mainly marching onward to bidde him battaile. Now, although this did not alittle ſtartle his minde, and intimated a ſuſpitious kind of feare, leſt Fortune ſhould turne her backe on him, hauing formerly fauored him in all his proceedings: yet being a man of high heart, valiant, and borne for Armes: he ſhewed no ſemblance of dread or diſtruſt, but rather ſtill ſollicited his men, to ſhew themſelues ſuch as alwayes they were knowne to be, and to account the ennemy no ſtronger by the womens combination; but rather to hope, that fortune had conducted them purpoſely thither, for the larger encreaſing of their benefit, and to heighten their corage againſt any, that durſt preſume to depriue them of ſo faire a booty.

Neceſſity and enforcement makes a cruenly coward valiant.

The effect of an Oration made by king Reiner of Denmarke to his folowers, in ſight of the enemies camp

On the other ſide, King Reyner, beeing come within the view of the enemie, rode among the ranks, encoraging his people, propoſing to them his right, and the inuaſion made by the Swetian. He required them, to reuenge the wrong doone to ſo many honourable houſes, vtterly ouerthrowne by the Tyrant, and to ſuſtain the cauſe of womens modeſties, for whome, and in whoſe defence, long agone their Auncеſtours had attempted rare actions of Armes, and ſpent their blood in many parts of the world. He alſo ſet before their eies, the courage and animoſitie of the Ladies, who marcht orderly vnder the Enſignes of valiant Landgartha, and to imitate by theyr force, that which weake women had vndertaken, to free themſelues from the violence of a Tyrant. Alſo, that they might aſſuredly bee perſwaded, beſide the gaine and bootie, in getting the bagge and baggage of the Swetians: himſelfe would (moreouer) vſe ſuch rewarde and courteſie to well deſeruers; that they ſhould for euer haue iuſt cauſe to commend his munificence. He declared to the Norwegians, that (for the loue to them) hee would aduenture to fight againſt Frollo, whom if he conquered, hee would ſpare him no more, then the reſt of his race formerly had doone. And therefore, to ſhew themſelues valiant, and now to bee fully reuenged on the Swetians tyrannies; ſeeing Fortune had almoſt (with great aduantage) deliuered him into their hands.

Fighting in a good cauſe is an eſpeciall encouragemēt.

Landgartha, beholding how euery one encouraged other to the fight, and obſeruing ſome rare galliardiſe, euen in the gracefull lookes of her female followers; in ſteade of further animating, thus ſhe ſpake vnto them.

Another Oration of Landgartha, made to the Armie of Ladies.

Her action, geſture and behauiour inflamed the deſires of all her faire folowers

IT is for vs (fayre Ladies) that the glorie of this battaile is reſerued, and to none elſe is due the reuenge, for our parents, kinred, friends and familiars. Men may fight (if they will) in their owne quarrell, and deale with whom themſelues thinke beſt: but the valorous Ladies of Norway, will purſue none other then the very ſquadron of the Tyrant, and there will wee die in the middeſt of our endeuour, or make this the laſt day of his miſerable life. Let our horſes ſeeme to flie among the rankes, that we may be obſerued to ſurmount the proweſſe of men, and that wee can quickely re-vnite our ſtrength againe, if any diſorder ſhould chaunce to diuide vs. Faire Fortune be our guide, and fauour vs to die gloriouſly, or vanquiſh (with hearts becoming our Sex) the onely infamous Prince in the world. In a ſpirit gentle and generous, ſee (I beſeech you) what power Diſdayne hath, to behold it ſelfe offended, and of what worth illuſtrous blood is, (touched with wrong) receiued by women and maydens, tender, ſoft, and delicately borne and bred, not inured to the trauaile of Armes, but driuen by deſire of reuenge onely. For, the rapes made on theyr violated kindred and friends: muſt needes bee now acknowledged, by the ornament which fayreſt embelliſheth our faces, and expoſeth vs to all manner of hazards, amongeſt the gallanteſt troupes of men.

The valiancie and carriage of Landgartha greatly admired by the K. of Denmarke.

King Reyner, hauing giuen the aſſaults ſignall, aduiſedly obſerued the behauiour and warelike order of the women, ſeeing Landgartha perfourme both the actions and diſcreete conduct of a good Souldier, making way through the throngs, and entring (euen in meere deſpite of the enemie) with her faire-locked troups of Ladies, into the Tyrant of Swetiaes ſquadron. Hee ſtoode as aſtonied at ſo braue hardiment, and (in this aſtoniſhment) he felt a kind of ſoftning in his manly ſoule, rauiſhing both his eyes and thoughts, with admiration & contemplation of this chaſte Damoſell: he foorthwith followed her ſighing, yet knew he not the cauſe of ſo ſodayne an alteration, and beholding her woonderfull carriage in the fight, ſaw no ſtroke returned againſt her, but it ſeemed to cleaue his heart in ſunder. Hee wiſhed himſelfe neere her, to free her from all perill and daunger; yet he tooke great delight to beholde her braue behauiour.

Keyner becommeth ſuddenly amorous of fayre Landgartha.

So long his eyes were led by this amorous contemplation, that (very ſoone after) he ſaw the Ladies preſſe on with ſuch impetuous furie, into the maine body of the battaile; and where the king of Swetia was in perſon: that (in a ſhort while) it became ſo ſhrewdly ſhaken, as, both the vanquiſhers, and the vanquiſht confeſſed, that the victory was more to be atributed to the wiſe leading of Landgartha, and valiant following of her Ladies, then to the long breathing and looſe courage, either in the Souldiers of Denmarke or Norway: for they neuer ceaſed to purſue the point, till Frollo was hewne in peeces amongeſt them; as the corrupter of blooming youth, and violater of their chaſtities, whom he ought (in honour and duty) to defend. Thus in an inſtant, Frollo payed the crueltie due vnto his diſgracefull life, & was puniſhed by celeſtiall Iudgement; for inuading the land and inheritance belonging

The orethrow of the Swetians, and death of their King by the braue valour of the women.

longing to another, and abusing the honor of so many chaste Ladies.

King Reyner attributes the victory to the valiant Landgartha, & her Ladies.

The victory won by the Dane, he freely confessed, that he enioyed it by the valiancy of the Ladies, and aboue al the rest by the wise and hardy conduct of hir, who commanded ouer the female troops. But concealing (as yet) the fire crept into his heart, and which stole on still to the verie depth of his soule; he cunningly enquired (as one rapt with amazement, among the rest, at the dexterity of this woman Warriour) what she was, of what house, and in what country she receiued her Originall? Answer was returned to him, that she was a Maiden to be married, so chast as possibly might be, as vertuous as any that liued in Norway, in blood Noble, of a famous house, and inferiour to no Ladie in wisedome. The vertue and wise carriage of Landgartha in war, hauing won the heart of this youthfull King; gaue yet a far larger entrance to loue, that left no part of his soule vnbesieged: when he heard say, that she was a Virgin Lady, and of great birth.

The kings passion encreases the more, by her commendable reports.

But becausse he could rather haue wisht her to be his louely friend, then wedded wife; he saw how short hee came of any such hope, being truely informed of her virgin modesty, standing cleere from all possibility of corruption: neither might he dare to attēpt it, seeing how respectiuely she was esteemed, affected, and reuerenced, & hardy enough to suppresse all such sinister enterprises. Moreouer, as elswhere we haue declared, though rapes had bene too common in that Scandian countrey; yet it was no easy offer to her; that knew wel how to reuenge such wrong, and had made good proofe therof so lately, in the iust infliction on a lustfull tyrant. In which respect, hauing a faire and gentle spirit; he resolued, to cloath with grace and good acceptance, whatsoeuer might appear vnequall in her, to sute with the greatnes of a King, and to satisfie his owne desires, by contracting honourable Marriage with her. And becausse common fame had noised of her, that she had concluded to keep her virginity for euer, without admitting any man to triumph ouer her chaste honor: he laboured the more to win her, & to break this vncharitable purpose in her; affecting her as dearely as his owne life; accounting her the most compleate creature in the world, & such a Iewel, as none could be more precious.

Dishoneſt desires in a king, are no meane scandall to his best deseruings other wise.

If this opinion, concerning the rare vertues of Landgartha, had alwayes continued carractered in the soule of this prince; and if he had respected her as well after the enioying her, as before hee had the happinesse to be possessed of her: she should haue receyued no occasion to complaine of him, and he neuer had stood accused of such infidelity and ingratitude to her. But (the more the pitty) there is not any thing so precious, rare, or of greatest consequence; but if a man bee possessed of it, and hath it freely at his owne command: he groweth distastefull of it; accounting his appetite loathingly glutted therewith, and nothing can seeme more contemptible to him.

What mē most couet to inioy they growe careleſſe of afterwatd.

Reyner, how great a King soeuer hee thought himselfe to bee, and how powerfull in his cheefest commands: yet, he felt himself a slaue to Loue, not daring to discouer his thoughts: he was become (contrary to precedent custom) a friend to solitude, full of passions, compassed with feares, troubled in spirit, martired in his sēnses, scarse sustaining any hope, but very coldly, and breathing forth sighs incessantly; so that all were amazed at this so strange behauiour in him. Notwithstanding, no one durst enter into such boldenesse, as to demand of him, whence came the causes of such comfortlesse sollitude. At length, hauing considered sufficiently on what he had to do, and finding the power of loue so potent, that it exceeded all possibility of resistance, as hauing a priuiledge aboue nature, and Landgartha no way to be enioyed, but by the chaste embraces of a marriage bed: he sent for the Lady and her friends, imparting his mind to her in this manner.

The perplexity of k. Reiner in his loue, & endeuor how to compaſſe it

The speech of king Reyner, deliuered to Landgartha, in the presēce of hir parents and friends.

I Know well (gentle Damosel) that it may moue some admiration in you, vppon what occasion I haue thus sent for you: albeit, the obligation wherein I stande bound to your high deseruings, might haue commanded me to do it much sooner, & yet a matter no more then reasonable. But to hold you in no longer suspense the hope I haue, & you wil continue heere in court; was the motiue to my mission, & the power I might pretend ouer your parents and frends, should wish their willing aduice to you, and enioyne you to grace vs with your company. I know what you are, and am informed of your houſe and breeding; but much more am I aſſured of your valor and other vertuous merits, by the commendable partes and ſingular rarieties, whereof mine owne eies haue bin a witneſſe. You alſo are not ignorant who I am, what my power is, and the meanes to make my ſelfe ſenſible, either of fauors or iniures, from whom ſoeuer I happen to receiue them. I confeſſe, that if there be any thing extrauagant in Loue, or ſurpaſſeth the greateſt power in man; it hath taken foundation in my ſoule, enflaming my beſt deſires to wiſh you wel: but I am vncertaine, whether you be ſo courteous or no, to take a liking or acceptable allowance of this affection, and ſo much the rather, becauſe you appear aboue the reach of other Ladies. Neuertheleſſe, if you meaſure the greatneſſe of a King, and of him that is your Soueraigne, with the luſter of your choiſe perfections: you ſhal ſee, that both theſe rarieties paired together, do make but one vnion, & the moſt excellent that any man can imagine. In breefe, all my wiſh, intent, and affection conſiſteth in this, that if you thinke good, or I may ſeeme worthy in your eye, to be a fit husband for Landgartha; I wold take you to Wife, and make you Queene of Denmarke and Norway. You may thinke heereon, it is in you to conclude all, and to whom I referre my ſelfe: for, of this my ſubmiſſion, I make your parents and friends witneſſes, calling for them purpoſely hither, to heare my motion, and your anſwer.

Woers are commonly more ſolemne in their proteſtations, then afterwardes they prooue ſound in their performances

Landgartha, who was as apprehenſiue, courteous and modeſt, as high in corage, and ſtrict in opinion: conſidering who it was that made the motion, and how much he imbaſed himſelf in the demand, returned this anſwer.

The generous and modeſt anſwer of Landgartha: to the former ſpeech of king Reyner.

SIR, although my deliberation from mine infancie, and continuing to this flouring condition of mine age, hath alwaies beene, neuer to ſubiect my ſelfe to the lawes ordained for marriage, becauſe freedom euer ſeemed more conforme to the diſpoſition of my ſpirit, then ſuch obedience as a wife owes to her husband, not that I haue vowed or ſworne to any eſtate whatſoeuer: yet notwithſtanding, hauing regard vnto the duty I owe my Prince, and ſeeing how iuſtly I may deſerue blame and puniſhment, in refuſing him that hath ſoueraigntie ouer mee and mine; I beſeech you to thinke, that your thoughts being ſo direct as they pretend declaration, and reſpecting one of ſo meane merite as my ſelfe: I am alſo the onely Maiden of the World, ready to do you moſt humble ſeruice. Thanking the great God, that ſeeing I owe dutie to the fancy of a man (albeit againſt my former reſolue) it falleth ſo ſucceſſefully, as in ſeruice to the moſt wiſe and valiant Prince, that of long time hath reigned in theſe countries. Neuertheleſſe Sir, thinke it not ſtrange, I humbly beſeech you, if I ſpeake (perhaps) more boldly then becommeth me, to vſe a ſilly virgins aduice, to take lõger and more deliberate conſideration, in a caſe ſo ſeriouſly important as this is: humane affections being ſo light in caſes of theſe and the like impreſſions; that (many times) they as ſodainely wipe themſelues out of the ſoule, as at the firſt they came to be carractered there. Not that I wil accuſe ſo great a King of leuity, nor ſuſpect his faith any way infirme: but to this end, that hauing made a neer view of my complexions, and more exactly enquired the liſt of my life; you may the better cenſure my merit, meaſuring for hereafter, what you may now moſt valew in my meannes and inſufficiency: ſo ſhall you be ſure, neuer to vnſay your owne words, or be ſory then for that which you make ſo great account of now. For know Sir, that the honor which you pleaſe to do me at this preſent, is nothing in reſpect of the great infamy, redounding then both vppon you and me, & thoſe that gaue you no better counſell in this caſe, whom it may as neerly concerne. This would be a worthy recompence, for the intire affection you beare me now, and I ſhould dedicate my life to you in deeper deuotion, remaining for euer your moſt loyal & dutiful ſeruãt.

Verie worthie aduice ſauouring of a diſcreet and, welſetled iudgement.

Conſideration before mariage is verie neceſſary, becauſe repentance afterward cometh too late.

With ſuch a graue and ſeuere countenance ſhe vttered theſe ſpeeches, that the king, amazed at her wiſedome, but more at the Maieſticall deliuery of her wordes, and freedome of ſo faire and compleate a ſpirit: ſwore inſtantly ſuch loyalty to hir, as fitted with a king and faithful husband; wherein he plainly forſwore himſelfe, as you ſhall hear in this diſcourſe following.

At

At this time the Maiden was not married to the youthfull king (who longed after nothing so much, as to croppe the fayre flower of her chastity) but shee returned home with her parents and frends again; hoping, that the heate of this royall fire, would be quailed in time, and her absence would be the meanes to effect it. But Reyner, who could not forget her that had so worthily assisted him, and whose figure was liuely imprinted in his soule: followed her to her Fathers dwelling; and, scorning to be delayd by many daies accesse, espoused her, to the vnspeakable comfort of her parents and frends, but som dread and great distrust in her self, as fearing the continnance of this feruent affection, and hauing won the heart of a King, doubted to be dispossessed thereof. Neuertheless, such was her wise and commendable carriage, as to conceale her fears with maiesticke modesty: submitting her self to the Kings delightful pleasures, and the yoake of marriage, which formerly she had contemned.

King Reyner espouse Landgartha, to the ioy of her parents, but a rant feare in her of his affections continuance.

But, as no ioyes are durable, being perpetually followed by worldly occurrences; so Reyner (being a yong, wanton, and lasciuious king) after hee had bene Father to three children by his Queene, two daughters, and a hopefull yong Prince, filled, or rather ouer-satisfied with the embraces of this poore Lady (who brought him no other dowry but bright beautie, and vertue vnmatchable in all the countrey) coueting after matter of greater moment; withdrew thence into Denmarke, leauing his truely elected spouse in Norway, not with any purpose of sending for her, or returning to her againe, but vtterly to abandon & forsake her. Being in Denmark, he heard report of the K. of Swetias daughter, whom he desired to inioy, accusing his indiscretion, that he had embased the greatnes of a king, and much blemished his royall title, by marrying with a sillie damosell: and sending a solemne Ambassage into Swetia, he obtaind (without war or any other great difficulty) her whome he coueted to enioy in marriage.

The perfidious and vnfaithfull dealing of Reiner with his fayre wife Landgartha.

Heere behold, how constant the Kings affection stoode to vertue, and howe the maske of fained loue discouered it self. He had sworne fidelity vnto his best beloued Landgartha (notwithstanding her wise & worthie aduice of inconueniences to follow) with no meane admiration of her vertues and perfections: but Vertue was then bound to the Idea of pleasure, and therefore of as little lasting, as ease hath continuance in occasions of the flesh. Beside, no sooner had he receiued answer to his minde, from the king of Swetia; but forthwith, he aduertised Landgartha of a second intended marriage, although vnlawfully; yet praying her patiently to endure a diuorce.

The poore Lady hearing this determination (althogh long time before, she had both diuined and feared such disaster) was ready to dy with conceit of greefe, to see her selfe despised, without the least occasion of offence giuen, or why he shold so vnkindly refuse her. At length, considering that the king had some reason for this repudiatiō, by seeking better aliance, which might succour him in his serious affaytes; because he had an enemy that contended with him for the Crowne of Denmark, & incited the Emperor to lend him ayd, vnder colour of becomming a Christian, if he would help him to compasse the kingdome: she began somwhat to asswage her minds perturbations, answering thē that brought her these bad tydings, thus.

Landgartha was to bee diuorced from the King her husband, without any cause of offence giuen.

The King (my friends) should not thus abuse Landgartha, because he needs not to seek any further, for strēgthning his house by stronger alliance: and well may I accuse him of lightnes, whereof I aduertised him in the beginning; and which (to my greefe) I finde now by ouer-deare experience. But if I were as reuengefull for the shame I suffer, as hee is vniust on my behalfe: I could (perhaps) finde him as busy and troublesome imployment, as shee can yeeld him pleasure, succour, or defence, with whom he hath such hast to mary. He knowes what means I haue to disease him seeing he felt part of my power in fauouring him, and should perswade himselfe, that Landgartha was neuer somuch offended by the tyrant of Swetia, as by him, who vnder the flattring name of mariage, hath wronged the modesty of her, that discerneth now, how men the greater they are, so much they think themselues dispensed withall, in breaking those Lawes, whereto they binde other in obedience.

Kings breake those Lawes, whereto they strictly binde their subiects.

Yet one thing causeth me somwhat to pardon his fault, and also to accuse mine owne indiscretion, that he being blinded by loue, and I, by ſole reuerenee vnto the name Royall: we haue both fayled in one kinde, but not equally puniſhable, his ſhame being not ſo great as mine, becauſe (being free, & without paſſions) I would ſubmit my ſelfe to the will of him, who durſt not vſe any violence towards mee; whereas he was a ſlaue to his owne cogitations, and tranſported with deſire, which maketh fooles of the very wiſeſt in the world. Let him enioy the embracings of his new elected Lady, at his own pleaſure and contentment; but I pray, (in regard of the faithfull loue I beare him, and ſo ſhall doe for euer, being ſuch as I am) that heereafter, he may neuer be ſo light & changeable in affection, leſt ſome one (of far leſſe cunning then himſelfe) make him not doe penance for wrong to all the reſt. And aſſure him, that although hee hath wounded the heart of Landgartha to death, by preferring another of much leſſe merit, and forgetting the debt, which maketh him mine by bond: yet notwithſtanding, the Image of King Reyner ſhall remaine perpetually engraued in my heart, and no accidents of the greateſt diſaſter, can euer deface the ſacred and ſincere affection, which his plighted faith ſo lately imprinted in my ſoule.

Men may run on in vnconſtant courſes til at length they chance to be ouermatched.

Goe and report vnto him, the offer of my ſeruice, and the deſire I haue to pleaſe him, inſtead of ſeeking any reuenge. Set before his eyes, not any deſpayring cogitations in mee, but vnconquerable patience. Tell him, I am not a little ioyful, to ſee my ſelfe free from ſubiection to a huſband: but yet ſo ſorie as poſſibly can be, to looſe him whom I loue more then my ſelfe, and without whom, my dayes for euer are dedicated to mourning. Report vnto him, that Landgartha will liue, not to be reuenged vpon the diſloyaltie of King Reyner; but to the end, that by the effuſion of her owne bloud, ſhe may yet make him once more to know, that ſhe is more his friend, and more carefull of his States conſeruation, then himſelfe is. Tell him alſo, that ſuch Ladies as reſemble me, haue their hearts more generouſly diſpoſed, and farre more fairely furniſhed with vertue: then baſe minded men, that alwais carry gentlenes in their looks, but villanie truly ſtamped in their hearts. For a finall concluſion, I pray God giue more eaſe to my vnfaithfull husband, then (through his diſloyalty) he leaues ſorrow and affliction in the ſoule of his loyall wife: and that ſhe who vſurpeth my place (in regard the fault is not hers) may long enioy peace in that bed, which vertue and merite once made me Miſtreſſe of, and the King taketh from me, I know not by what diſaſter, but in meere malice and hatred to mee and my fortune.

Meſſages ſent by Ladgartha to him that had forſaken her.

What greater conſtancy could be wiſhed, in the heart of the very wiſeſt Philoſopher, that euer Greece or Aſia yielded, then appeared in the inuincible ſoule of this Norwegian Lady? What deeper deſpight could be done to a worthy womā; then to reiect and throw her off, as if ſhe had beene wicked and immodeſt? Or what greater occaſion may bee giuen, for betraying a husband; then cauſeleſſe ſuſpition, and diuorce or refuſall, where reaſon and iuſtice can ſhew no cauſe why? Poets haue liuely depicted in their Verſes, the deſperate tranſports of Medea, forſaken by Iaſon, and the fearefull cruelties vſed by her, to bee reuenged on ſuch an iniury. Marke Anthony, by refuſing and forſaking the faire ſiſter to Auguſtus, attracted by fooliſh affection to blacke Cleopatra; both Europe, Affricke & Aſia, were inhumanely bathed with the blood of men, the brother endeuouring to reuenge the iniury, which was offered vnto his ſiſter and the whole Family. And tell me (I pray yee) what a wound in France was ſometime made, by the diuorce of Elianor, Counteſſe of Poictiers, and Dutcheſſe of Guienne; the meanes whereof gaue way to the Engliſh, & that they made themſelues ſo ſtrong in Fraunce?

The repudiation of Elianor, cauſed the long war betweene the Engliſh and French.

Her vertuous and charitable concluſions at parting with the Ambaſſadours.

Notwithſtanding all theſe, and many more that I could ſpeake of, we ſee Landgartha ſo humble, wiſe, diſcreete, and ſuch a louer of quietneſſe, that, hauing meanes to be reuenged on ſo high a wrong done her; ſo farre was ſhe from purſuite, heate, rage or tempeſt, that making Patience prowd of her example: ſhee offered ſeruice to him, by whome ſhe was contemned and deſpiſed, preſenting all duety to an ingratefull husband, and promiſing freſh ſupply, after receit of a former diſloyall recompence. You which are iealous of Ladies honour, and complaine of a giddie madneſſe in theyr braines, and of immortall enmity and hatred engrauen in their Soules; behold this rare woman, declaring declaring truely a Christian minde, although she neuer receiued baptisme: Of her you may learn, that Ladies haue somthing in them rightly heroycall, which men can neuer comprehend nor taste of, but by long, studious and wise experience.

Let all ſuch as depraue the ſexe of womē obſerue the incomparable vertues of Landgartha.

All Ladies are not like to Landgartha in the true vertue of patience.

And yet Landgartha stands not alone in this example, for France can make boast of many more great Ladies, that imitated her mildnesse and constancy, & of whom I could enter into a large Discourse: if French Histories were not so frequent among you, wherein you can lose no time to bee continually reading. But yet we haue not said all, that Landgartha (not hurried with iealousie, or tempested with fury for this refusall) sought any meanes whereby she might be reuenged: but in doing much more, surmounted all opinion and iudgement, giuing aide to him that had so shamefully left her, and doing good for euill, contrary to some stearne and combustious natures of her sexe, and as the sequell will more amply deliuer.

The Subiects take occasion to reuolt against Reyner

Reyner, being a Prince greatly addicted to Armes, seeing himselfe at home in peace, and that none of his neighbours sollicited him by warre; because his Subiects (being naturally giuen to warre, and inured to courses both by Land and Sea) might not liue ydle and slothfull: he permitted them to pursue their fortune, passing them into the Isles of Ireland, Britain and Scotland. Whereupon, the Iutes, and some other of the Scandian Territories, that bare him but bad affection, taking occasion by the Kings absence with his Forces; elected and created for their king, a Prince of royall blood, named Harolde, who shaping his course to the Emperour Lewes the debonnaire, that made his abiding then at Magunce, hauing receiued baptisme with his followers: was sacred and crowned King of Denmarke, by authority Imperiall, doing homage to the Emperor for his Kingdome.

Harold a christian Prince made King of Denmarke by the Emperor Lewes.

Harolde, being fauoured of his owne people, and affected by the most of them that embraced Christianity (to whom Reyner was no way pleasing) and re-enforced by a goodly band of Germanes, wherwith the Emperour furnished him, to put him in possession of his lands: went into Denmarke, to expell Reyner thence, and all such as followed his Faction. Reyner, waxing weary againe of his wanton desires, returning home secretly into Denmarke: found strange alteration since his departure thence. His owne people he encouraged to stand fast with him, called the Swetians also to his succour, and dispatching letters into Norway: requested assistance of her, from whom hee might more iustly expect warre then defence, and seuerity of reuenge for his vile dealing.

King Reyners returne home into Denmark from Swetia, and craueth assistance of Landgartha.

What would an angry heart haue done in this case? A minde neuer satisfied but in doing ill; what an opportunity had it heere to worke vpon? How would a man haue carried himselfe, hauing beene notoriously iniuried, and so faire a way set wide open for him, as neuer was the like to bee expected againe: what haste would he make now to be fully reuenged? Without all contradiction, the breach of faith is very abhominable, and wrongs receiued by Noble natures, are not easily quallified, when times and seasons shape out reuengefull meanes, such as was this waruppon the faithlesse Dane. Neuertheless Landgartha, hearing in what anguish her vnkind husband was, and considering with her selfe, that his ruine could not returne her any benefit, seeing also, that shee had two louely Daughters by him, and a Princely sonne, named Frideslaus (who afterward was King of Norway) motiues sufficient for his longer abiding with her: shee leuied an Army of sixe score Ships, euery one being worthily furnished, wherewith she intended to succour her distressed Husband, to whom shee sent tydings of her preparation and comming, in these few Lines.

The noble disposition & nature of Landgartha.

The Letter sent by Landgartha, to her Husband, King Reyner.

IF this my second duty may proue as happy, in the recouery of thy Lands & Kingdoms, as my first was against a Tyrant, and yet honouring thee with the victory: I shall account my paines well imployed, and neuer expect any other recompence. Make head brauely against the Enemy, for I am comming with all speede, to let him know, that Landgartha.

The Rebels afraid of Landgarthaes coming with her forces.

The Rebells, beeing aduertized of this ſupply from Norway, labored by all means poſſible) to prouoke King Reyner to the fight, before the comming of Landgartha, whom they knew to be wiſe, and very skilfull in the Art Militarie. And the king knowing their intention, delayed the day of battell, by marching further off from them, towards the place where hee expected Landgarthaes landing, that their two forces might the ſooner ioyne together, & then to giue the enemy battell. Which Harolde well perceiuing, and knowing, that ſuch delay would redound to his diſaduantage; he purſued after Reyner with ſuch expedition, laying ſuch traines and ambuſcadoes for him, that he compelled him to handy blowes, euen at the verie ſame inſtant as Landgartha landed.

The landing of Landgartha in Denmarke.

The fight fell out to bee very furious and bloody, and great numbers of men fel as well on the one ſide, as on the other, the chiefe Commaunders beeing fiercely animated, the one to defend his Crowne, and the other to vſurpe an eſtate, whereto he pretended a iuſt title, by reaſon of the quarrell betweene the King and his Subiects. And both of them ſtanding on the aduenture of life, as well vnderſtanding, that no fauour was to be expected, which ſide ſoeuer prooued to bee Conquerour.

The Danes put to the worſt by Harold, & Landgarthas worthy affiſtance in very great extreamitie.

Now, though the Danes that followed Reyner, perfourmed ſo much duty as warriours could do, ſuſtaining many impetuous efforts of the aſſailants; yet were they conſtrained to turne their backes, beginning to fall into rout and diſorder. By this time was Landgartha come neare to the Campe, where ſhe made a pauſe a while, to ſee which ſide behaued it ſelfe braueſt; and perceiuing Reyners men in no meane extreamity, valiantly ſhe entred amongſt the thickeſt of them, incouraging her huſbands ſoldiers on thus: On them braue ſpirits, ſet on them manfully, they are our ſpoile, as villaines not deſeruing to liue, ſeeing traiterouſly they lift vp their weapons againſt their king. On then (I ſay) vndaunted ſpirits, heere is Landgartha, who hath brought you victorie, as well againſt Harolde, as ſometime ſhe did againſt Frollo in Norway.

Landgartha encourageth the Danes againſt their enemies.

In deliuering theſe wordes, ſhe dealt ſuch bold blows amõg the Rebels, as they hardly knew which way to beſtirre themſelues. Now the battell grew to be more fierce on either ſide thẽ before: the Danes, to repaire their diſorderd flight, th'other, to maintaine their hope of victory, whereof they doubted not, but diſdained a woman ſhold depriue them of the occaſion, of wholly ruinating Reiner and his Army. Neuertheleſſe, whatſoeuer manhood Harold and his men declared in the fight, yet they were oppreſſed by multitudes, being wearie, ſpent, & cloſely followed by the Norwegians, who were freſh, chearefull and actiue, conducted by a woman of very high reſolue, and as furious in warre, as modeſt and gracious in her Pallace. Thus were they enforced to fight, not without great loſſe of the very worthieſt mẽ in the Army, and the vanquiſhed deliuered to the Conquerours mercie. But, though Reyner triumphed of the victorie, yet hee enioyed it by the fortune of her, who, albeit ſhe might boaſt of her happineſſe in war, and thereby attained to a great mariage; yet her other infelicity was a great corſey to her heart, to be diſdained where ſhe ought to be moſt beloued & eſteemd.

Harolde and his men driuẽ to flight, and the victorie remaining to Reyner by the valor of Landgartha and hir Norwegians.

Reyner now was growne ſenſible, of the ſhamefull wrong he had offred to his firſt wife, accuſing himſelfe of diſloyaltie, and deteſting his former leuitie, entreated her to take ſuch reuẽge on him, as ſhe thoght fitteſt in her own iudgement. But ſhe, being a Lady of vnmatchable mind, fearing leſt the king (conquerd by this obligation of duety to her) ſhould commit an other fault, by leauing the K. daughter of Swetia, who had brought him diuers children alſo: pardond all his paſſed iniuries to hir, & vowing her ſelfe to a widdowed eſtate of life, neuer more to conuerſe with him or any man liuing; after a ſolemne parting betweene them, ſhe returned home into Norway, to gouerne the Countrey by her diſcreete care, til her ſon Ftediſlaus ſhould attaine to yeres of rule, and whom the K. there had conſtituted as his lawfull heire.

The reconciliatiõ betwixt King Reyner and Landgartha.

The remainder of this diſcourſe, being more at large purſued by the Annaliſts of Denmarke, Swetia and Norway; I purpoſe here to conclude the Hiſtorie, which I haue in this place ſet downe, more to relate the valour, councell, aduice, good conduct and wiſdome, ſeldome wanting in Ladies deriued from good birth; then I care

care for the idle loues of Reyner, or any of his Conqueſts. To the end, that ſuch Ladies, as excell in the like vertues in theſe our times; may hold on in the purſuite of their perfections, by the honorable exãples of them, that (in thoſe precedent daies) declared themſelues admirable in their actions, & imitable for their vertues and commendable carriage.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the Bezaars Stone, which is reputed to be very vertuous and ſoueraigne, againſt all venomes and poyſons.

The Bezaar or Pazar ſtone good againſt all venomes and contagions.

THe Stone of the Bezaar or Pazer, is a true and aſſured Antidote againſt all poyſons, venomes, bytings of venomous Beaſts, infections of the Ayre; As peſtilence, carbuncles or plague-ſores, Purples, the ſmall Pox, the Meazels, and in briefe, againſt all diſeaſes popular and contagious. And becauſe experience hath made this ſtone to be in daily requeſt, and cauſeth it to be ſought for by people of good meanes; therefore ſale hath bene made thereof at extraordinary rates, and auarice being ſo great among men, hath therefore practiſed and compaſſed the meanes whereby to adulterate it, as heeretofore they did the like by Baulme or Balſamum. But before I write any further thereof, I will tell you from whence they bring it, and how it is engendred in the bodies of certaine creatures, which are like vnto Goats heere among vs; but they haue no horns, being of a reddiſh colour, and feed not but on good and wholeſome Hearbes, whereof are plenty on the Mountaines, and where they ſtartle at the leaſt noiſe of a Piece. But for our better vnderſtanding this Hiſtory, I will inſert a ſmall parcell of a Letter, written from Peru by a Spaniſh Gentleman, to Monardus a Phyſition of Hiſpalis, dwelling then in Seuill, whereby we ſhall perceiue how they are found.

Whence the ſtone is brought and how it is engendred.

¶ The Letter of a Gentleman reſiding in Peru.

Hunting of the Bezaar in Peru.

THe fifteenth of Iune, 1568. being at the exerciſe of hunting, with diuers of my friends, among the Mountains in this Country of Peru, continuing at the ſport for the ſpace of fiue dayes, and hauing ſlaine ſome of the Beaſts called Bezaars; we diſſected their bodies, to finde the ſtones. But it beeing a matter impoſsible for vs to do, becauſe wee were not vſed thereto: we demanded of the Indians, which we had brought with vs thither to attend vpon vs; in what part of the body we might ſooneſt finde them; whereto they made vs anſwere, that they knew it not. But a young Indian Lad, aged about tenne yeares, and being then in our company, ſhewed vs where it was, and we found it in the firſt ſtomacke, where the food of the Beaſt falleth down, to be ruminated or chawed afterward. Which when the Indians ſaw, they would haue killed the Boy, as being offended at his inſtruction giuen vs: but we would not ſuffer them to doe him ſuch violence, and although they are ſubiects to vs Spaniards, yet they are our deadly enemies. Notwithſtanding, while we followed our paſtime of hunting, they got the Boy aſide and ſlew him, and afterward ſacrificed him, as we were giuen to vnderſtand.

In what part of the Beaſt the ſtone is found.

He that ſeareth, hateth.

The Indians hold thoſe ſtones in great eſteeme, placing them for Ornaments in their Temples, which they call Guacas, adorning alſo their Images with them, and many other things beſide, as Gold, Siluer, precious ſtones and rich Iewels. And I repute it a matter of ſome admiration, that this Beaſt is not found in any of the hither Indiaes, but in the Mountaines of Peru, neyther could I ſee them any where elſe: albeit I haue trauailed through all the Kingdomes of Mexico and Peru. In the Prouinces and Iſles of Maranon, Florida, and the Weſterne Iſlands, I haue beene diligently informed, and by the Indians heere among vs, vppon vrging them to what vſe theſe ſtones are proper: And they haue aſſured mee, that they are ſingular againſt all venomes, eyther applied outwardly, or receiued inwardly; but eſpecially againſt all harmes of the heart, and it expelleth wormes out of the body. Being put into wounds, made by impoyſoned Arrowes (as heere it is too much in vſe) it is an aſſured healing, and no other remedy could be found for it, but that onely.

In

Stones are in ſome Beaſts more, and in other leſſe, according to their yeares.

In the firſt Beaſt that we diſſected, wee found in a Bagge like a little Purſſe, 9. ſtones, which Nature had there engendered, onely by the benefit of feeding on good and wholeſome hearbs: and in all thoſe which we diſſected afterward, we found in ſome more, in others leſſe, according as they were aged in yeares. It is to be noted, that although they are found alſo in Beaſts of the ſame kinde, which brouſe and feede on the Plaines: yet they are not ſo vertuous, as in thoſe bred vpon the Mountaines.

Nicholas Monardus a Phyſition of Seuil

Thus you ſee in briefe, what was written by this Captaine (and indeed a very worthy Gentleman, liuing then in the Indiaes) to Nicholas Monardus, a learned Phyſition, and dwelling in Seuill; whereby may be vnderſtood, how and frō whence theſe ſtones proceede. Now wee will heare what the Portugals ſay, who haue made their conqueſts farre off frō thence, to know, whether they agree with the Spaniards in this report, or no.

Of other Stones of Bezaars, deſcribed by the Portugals.

Garcias d'Orta a Portuguize, Phyſition to the Viceroy in the Indiaes diſcouered by the Portugalles, ſaieth, that in Corazine, and in the Countries of Perſia, there is another kinde of Goates, of meaner greatneſſe, which they call Pazans, in whoſe ſtomack or bulke are found ſtones of the Bezaar, the beginning of them beeing a ſmall little ſtraw, growing on to a certain greatneſſe, by recouering many coates or tunicles: whereof ſome are found to bee as big as our common Beanes, others as Acornes, and other of more or leſſe quātity, ſmoothe for the moſt part, and in colour reſembling a darke greene. The greateſt, becauſe the rareſt, are more ſought for then the leſſer ſort, by them of the Country where they are found, as reputing them to haue the moſt vertue. He reporteth, that he ſaw one which weighed fiue Ducates, and which was brought into Portugall, that would not be bought for threeſcore Ducats, albeit it was more worth whence it came: and in all thoſe ſtones which are brought out of the Perſian Countries, a little ſtraw or ſtalke is found in the very midſt of them, as hath beene often approued.

A Bezaars ſtone that weighed fiue ducats, brought into Portugal

This Stone (ſaith he) is not found in Perſia onely, but alſo in Malaca, and in the Iſle which is named Vaccai, not farre off from the Promontory of Comorina. For, as they can betray thoſe Beaſts, ſo they kil them, and being well ſalted or powdred, they ſerue as good prouiſion for their Armies. In many of them are found very great ſtones, vnknowne to the people there inhabiting, or why the Portugalles labour ſo much in ſearch of them: which (indeed) is more for the ſaid ſtones, then any loue they haue to the fleſh, although it is very ſauoury.

Countries where Goats are found that haue the Bezaars ſtōes

Difference betweene the Bezaars ſtōes of Peru and Perſia.

The Bezaars ſtones which come from Peru, haue no ſtrawes or ſtalkes in the midſt of them; but onely a little cauity or hollowneſſe, wherein may be found ſome thicke duſt or ſand, which is of far greater efficacy then the ſtone it ſelfe. I haue ſeene fiue graines of this ſtone (in a little water of Mugwort) giuen to a Gentlewoman, who had beene ſeuen dayes in child-birth trauaile: and ſhe was inſtantly deliuered of a childe dead and putrified. At the Caſtle of Luke, in the lower Lymoſine, there was a great peſtilence, wherof (in leſſe ſpace then foure & twenty houres) dyed three perſons: afterward it tooke hold on the reſt of the houſhold, which were eighteene in number. Each one receiued two graines of this ſtone euery morning, with a little water of Aenula Campana, continuing ſo for ſeuen daies ſpace together, and not any one dyed afterward, or became further touched with the peſtilence. Diuers beſide, that had carbuncles and ſores, by vſing this ſtone, preſerued their liues: It is very good alſo in application, to botches, byles, and all irkeſome paines or ſwellings.

Vertues approued of the Bezaars ſtone

A cure of byting by a Serpent on a gentlemans leg.

A young Gentleman, with whom it was my chance to be bathing in a Riuer, was bitten in the leg by a Serpent, ſo that his leg was become very black, and greatly ſwolne: hee was aduiſed, to take foure graines of Bezaars ſtone, with a ſmal quātity of Roſe-water, and a graine alſo was put into the wound; which cauſed the ranckling and paine to ceaſſe, and he was fully cured within twelue dayes ſpace.

Hiſtories of rare vertues in the Bezaars ſtone.

Monſieur le Vicomte de Conborn, and Lord of Chaſteauneuf, Lieutenant for the King in Lymoſine, reported to me, that he was touched with a peſtilential Feauer at Paris, and whereof many dyed, of euery quality, age and ſexe, and abandoned of all Phyſitions. By the aduice of his Father in law, the Marſhall de Biron, he took Bezaars ſtone for ſome few dayes, & within in a little while after, he recouered, grew to indifferent ſtrength, and was much more luſtily diſpoſed, then any of them that had beene offended by the ſame diſeaſe, to the no little admiration of all them, that had knowledge of him and his ſickneſſe.

An obſeruation among the Inhabitants of the Iſland of Ormuza.

The Inhabitants of Ormuza (an Iſland that is moſt rich, ſituate vpon the red ſea, and ſubiected to the Perſian) after they haue purged themſelues in the Spring & Autumne: vſe to take ten graines of this ſtone, in as many ſpoonefull of Roſe-water, for fiue mornings following each other, by which meanes (they ſay) their health is ſoundly preſerued, and youthfull diſpoſition maintained. Againſt an inueterated ſcurffe on the head, or body, a loathſome itch, the wilde ſcab, called S. Martins mange, and (aboue all) againſt a confirmed ladry or leproſie; there is not any remedy like to this. As can well bee witneſſed by a Prelate of Languedoc, liuing at this day, who would haue ſlaine himſelfe an hundred times, and throwne himſelfe out of windowes (if hee had not beene carefully reſpected) onely beeing tormented with that diſeaſe of S. Martine. But by vſing this ſtone, which hee tooke three Months together euery morning, and good gouernment otherwiſe directed to him; hee is perfectly recouered. Now let vs ſee how true and naturall ſtones are to bee diſcerned, from ſuch as are counterfeit, and meerely adulterated.

Loathſom diſeaſes cured by the Bezaars ſtone.

How the Moores diſtinguiſh the true ſtones from falſe.

The Moores are exceeding skilfull in knowing them, and eſpecially, from what parts they are broght, in the doing wherof, the Moore will lay one in the palme of his hand, and cloſing it then faſt together, he will breathe or blow ſtrongly into his hand: if hee feele his breathing to paſſe through his hand, he is aſſured then, that the ſtone is falſified. A great number of them are oftentimes to be ſolde at Liſbonne, the cheefeſt Metropolitane City of Portugall, where is one of the moſt frequented Portes in al Chriſtendome. And ſuch as there buy them, content not themſelues, with this order of triall made by the Moores: but dip a twirled thred in the iuyce of a very venomous hearbe, which there they call Balistera. Then paſſing it thwart the foote, or other part of any Beaſt (as of a Dog) with a Needle, hee ſo leaueth it in the wound, vntill ſuch time as he feeleth thoſe accidents, which commonly ſeize on them that are poyſoned. And when he is perceiued to draw neere death; then to make him ſwallow three or foure graines of Bezaars ſtone, mingled with water: if it preſerue his life, it is an apparant ſigne of the ſtones goodnes and perfection; but if not, it is adulterated.

Experiment made in Liſbourne for the true knowledge of the Bezaars ſtone

The Beaſt in whoſe body theſe ſtones are found, in Perſia and other parts of that Climate, as in Comorina (according to the writing of Garcias d'Orta, who had ſeene of them in diuers places) hath horns bending backward; but thoſe in Peru haue none at all. Theuet ſaieth, that they haue but one, and that the skinne of the ſaide Beaſt is kept, to be laid to the ſtomacke of man or woman, poſſeſſed with any paine or anguiſh there, and to procure digeſtion, and that (without all queſtion to the contrary) this skinne healeth all ſuch diſeaſes, although the perſons bee aged and decreipt. Moreouer, that he ſaw a ſtone of the Pezar, or Bezaar, in the cuſtody of the Greekes Patriarch of Cayro, which was as big as a good great Nut: if it were ſo, that ſtone was worth no meane ſumme of money. It were a thing miraculous, to finde a ſtone of ſuch greatneſſe; & yet he further ſaith, that an Arabian Captain had it giuen him, becauſe hee was ſecretly conuerted, and became a Chriſtian.

The variety of hornes borne by this Beaſt.

Some thinke Theuet to be greatly miſ-informed in this matter.

It is not to be thought, that this ſtone hath beene knowne but within ſome ſmal compaſſe of time; becauſe antiquity ſpeketh of it more then fiue hundred yeares ſince. For proofe whereof, Raſis, an Arabian Phyſition maketh mention thereof, though not relating from whence it was brought, or where it is to bee found: yet he affirmeth, that it reſiſteth all kindes of poyſon, and that hee made experiment thereof vpon a childe, that innocently had eaten a venomous plant, called Napellus, which cauſeth death immediately; and yet by giuing him a ſmall quantity of this ſtone, his life was preſerued. This ſtone hath beene ſo highly eſteemed, and eſpecially in thoſe precedent times; that, as it is reported by Abdara Narach, an Arabian Doctour in phyſicke, who was then at Cordaba, about thoſe later yeares, when the Sarracins made their vſurpation in Spaine: he ſaw a Bezaars ſtone, in the hand of

The Bezaars ſtone knowne in times of great antiquitie.

Proofe made vpon a childe that had fed on a poyſonous hearbe.

of one of the children of Amirama (a great and diligent obſeruer of Religion) for which he gaue in exchange, a very goodly houſe which he had in Corduba, equall (well neere) to a Princes Pallace. And the ſaid Abdara further ſaieth (alleadging the forenamed Raſis) that this ſtone being worne about a mans necke, and kept ſo neere to the heart as may be; defendeth it and the party from all infection, & no poyſon can offend the body of him, that hath it thus about him.

Abdara Narach, a skilfull Phyſition of Arabia.

Seeing then, that this Stone hath ſo many good and ſingular vertues in it, methinks, men (of meanes and worth) ſhold ſildome or neuer be without it, for a preſent ſuccour in ſuch weighty infirmities. Beſide, Apothecaries of skill and iudgement, ſhold euermore be wel prouided of them, becauſe Phyſitions continually preſcribe it in their directions, which they would not do, if they knew men to be vnfurniſhed of it. For more aſſurance is to be repoſted in it (next to the aſſiſting power of Heauen) then in Treacle or Mithridatum, the confection of Alkermes, & of Zacinth. As is too well knowne by many barbarous Kings; gouerning in thoſe Regions, where the Beaſts are bred that engender theſe ſtones, repoſing ſuch confidence in them, and making ſo precious eſtimation of them; as they cauſe thē expreſly to bee brought from all parts. And when they are poſſeſſed of them, it is a difficult caſe to get any one from thē: which partly is the reaſon, why they are ſo deare and rare to be had.

The Authors friendly aduertiſement to the reader.

The admirable ſoueraignty of the Bezaars ſtone in compariſon of diuers other preſeruatiues.

Heere the Reader likewiſe is to bee aduertiſed, that ſome of theſe ſtones are not pointed, or ſharply cornerd; but blunt, edgeleſſe and rounded, like to the little fingers ende, or as an Acorne. And although ſome are found to be great, yet commonly they are but as our ordinary Almonds, and not pointed. They haue alſo diuers foldes or lappings, one wrapping ouer another, like vnto Onions, all ſleecke and ſmoothe: for if you finde thē otherwiſe compacted, they are to bee reiected as falſe and counterfeit.

All Bezaars ſtones are not alike in forme & proportion.

One of theſe ſtones was preſented to Charles the ninth, King of France, hee being then at Molins, which he cauſed to be eſſayed vpon two perſons, that had deſerued ignominious death, & both of them hauing poyſon giuen them to drinke. One of them was holpen by the ſtone, who neuertheleſſe dyed; and the other that tooke it not, dyed alſo. The ſtone being broken, was found thicke and maſſiue, not diuided by Spherical robes or foldings, and was throwne into the fire: And the giuer, who expected to deriue ſome great recompence from his Maieſty; had nothing at al, but frowning looks of the King, and the Queene his Mother, for his reward.

The diſcourſe of a falſe ſtone giuen to Charls the ninth, K. of France.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the generation of Pearles; where, and how they are found; from whence they are brought; and of their value and eſtimation.

IHaue read many Authors, to be reſolued aſſuredly, concerning the generation of Pearles: but I could finde none of one conſent, or agreeing together, and namely, ſuch as frequent the Indiaes in theſe dayes, are diuers and doubtfull alſo in their anſwers. For ſome ſay, that they are engendred in Fiſh-ſhels, like to thoſe of our Oyſters heere among vs, but much greater, and ſomewhat longer. And when they are deſirous to conceiue (vrged thereto by nature, and at a certaine time) they open of themſelues, to ſucke in and draw the dew of heauen: when, if the Ayre bee cloudy or lowring, then they engender troubled Pearles; and if it be windy, they cannot conceiue, ſo long as the wind continueth. But how fabulous this is, I refer to others iudgement: becauſe in one and the ſame ſhels, are found Pearles trobled, cleare, & of diuers colours and formes.

Authors agree not in the generation of Pearles.

Great difference in the generation of Pearles.

Others ſay, that the proper birth and production of the Oyſter, is by egs, whereof they are produced, and that the Pearls come forth of the ſand and grauelly duſt, whereby they are nouriſhed, & wherein they hide themſelues: which grauell refineth it ſelfe, & encreaſeth in them, as the graines of the Raiſin in the Grape. And this ſandy ſeed ſoftneth it ſelfe, the Oyſter being in the water: but ſo ſoone as it is out of the water, it hardneth of it ſelfe, as we may ſee daily: and this is another opinion of our Pearles production.

Another opinion of their generation, contrary to the former.

The

The Egyptian Merchants report how Pearles are engendred.

The Merchants of Ægypt, that at this day Traffique with them, and bring them from the Perſian Sea, make men here beleeue that negotiate with them: that perls are engendred in the ſtomacke of a flatte Fiſh, round like to a Trencher-plate, and as big as a common plate, which is found on the ſhores of Nilus; and that it drinketh the dewe of heauen, as wee formerly ſayd of the Oyſter, all which is a meere fable. And although the Egyptians of theſe dayes know the matter truly; yet notwithſtanding, meaning to mocke ſuch as are ignorant in theſe things, they publiſh lies for apparant truths. Aroſthenes ſayth, Pearles are engendred in Oyſters, as certaine white and ſolide graines are in the Fleſh of Swine, which we vſe to tearme Meazels, & is made of a clammy ſlime, congealing and hardning of it ſelfe. Which I thinke to be very likely: For, beeing at Paris in the yeare 1566. and (in aſſiſtance with others) at the diſſecting of a womans body, long troubled with a diſeaſe in the reines, in each of the reines was found a ſolide ſubſtance or body, as big as a cõmon Peaſe, gliſtering, cleere and round, like vnto Pearles.

Variety of opinions concerning the generation of Pearles.

Chares the Mitilenian ſaith, Pearles are made of the bones of the Oyſter; but therein he is much deceyued, becauſe the bones are alwayes in ſeruice to ſtrengthen the body: but Oyſters haue no need of bones: and likewiſe Pearles are not found in all of them; and if they had bones, then they would be found in all Oyſters.

The iudgement of Chares of Mitilen

Americus Veſputius, in his booke of Indian Nauigations writeth, that he obſerued the opening of many, & out of ſome certaine Pearles, which had not attained (as yet) to their maturity and perfection, being in ſome pretty ſtore or number: but yet thoſe Pearles periſhed of themſelues, and came to nothing. But in them that were more aged, Pearles were founde in the fleſh of the Oiſter, eaſily parting from it, and thoſe were the beſt. And they that are found in them ſo aged and ancient, were wrinkled and very darke; which is likely to be true, if we do well conſider thereon.

Americus Veſputius recorderth what himſelfe had ſeene.

Of Pearles found among rockes.

It is a meere Fable, which ſome haue divulged, that Pearles are found among the Rockes, by reaſon of many fiſhes laying their Egges, and becauſe they cleaue to the fleſh, or to the ſhell; but this happeneth very rarely. For, all Oyſters are not apt to procreate Pearles, but onely ſuch as are rude, white, and pointing, like to the teeth of a Combe; which the Perſians call Cherippo, cleere and verie ſmooth within: of which ſhelles are made Cups, Boxes, Spoones, and other very ſightly things. Some are found in other kinds of Oyſters; but they are neither ſo great, nor ſo good, as theſe that the Cherrippo produceth, which ſome haue termed mother of Pearles.

Of the Perſian Oyſter called Cherippo.

Heere we may note the variety of opinions, concerning the production of Pearles, the knowledge whereof is much concealed: for Oyſters keepe alwayes at the depths of the ſea, becauſe their ſhelles are great, and therefore they are ſo deepe in the ſea. If ſometimes they are founde neerer to the ſhores, it happneth by tempeſts of the ſea; alſo they ſwim heere and there, to ſeeke their beſt nouriſhings; which when they haue found, there they ſtay, vntill they haue eaten all they can find. Then if they ſenet, or perceiue ſuch as ſeeke for them, they will faſten themſelues ſo ſtrongly to the rockes & ſtones, ouer-couering one another: as very hardly can they be forced thence, but oftentimes labour is beſtowed in vaine, and they left there, as being immagined to be ſtones.

A reaſon for the variety of opinions in this matter.

They are fiſhed for in ſtore of ſundrie Countreyes and Regions; but the goodlieſt and thoſe moſt common, are fiſhed for in the Iſle of Baharem, an Iſland bigge enough, and well peopled; being ſubiect to the Viceroy of Ormuze, and is neere to the Cape of Maſsina, in Arabia Fœlix, & there is no meane fiſhing for them. In the Iſles of Maniolæ alſo, is continuall fiſhing for them (they beeing as good there, as thoſe of Baharem) and the Iſle ſeated on the Perſian Gulfe, an hundred Leagues or thereabout, from Calicuth, and almoſt throughout the inner India. In the Iſle of Zeilan, in the Iſles called Veiques, and ſo thorowe the great Empire of Mexico. At Tarate, more then in any of the forenamed Iſlandes, and in the Iſles of the New World, they haue beene fiſht for in ſuch plentie: that the Cacico or Prince of the ſaide Iſle, made a preſent of a Casket full of Pearls, to Gaſpar de Morales (a Spaniſh Commaunder) which weighed an hundred and ten pounds. He promiſed beſide, to giue yearely a Quintall weight of Pearles, as a Tribute to the Emperor, and (among them) ſome were as great as ſmall Nuts, others as big as Nutmegs; & one (aboue the reſt) was found to weigh ſixe and twenty Carrats, and another one and thirty: it had the ſhape of a Muske-Peare, being very perfect and orientall.

The admirable greatneſſe of ſome pearls and of extraordinary price and value.

A Merchant, being named Peter du Port, bought the ſaid Pearle of Gaſper de Morales, for eighteene hundred Ducates of gold, and after he had bought it, hee could not ſleepe for melancholy, and inward griefe he conceiued, becauſe he had giuen ſo much mony for a ſtone: yet hee ſold it againe on the next morrow (& for the ſame price) to Pedrarias d'Auila, for his Wife, the Lady Iſabella Bouadillia, who alſo ſolde it to the Empreſſe, Madame Iſabella. A Iew, named Daniell, bought of a country peazant of Baharem (no long time ſince) a Pearle, of the greatneſſe of a Musket Bullet, for no more then the ſumme of eight ſhillings; and afterward ſold it to a Lord in Sclauonia, for three thouſand Crownes. There was a preſent made to Fernando Magellano, in one of the Iſles of the Molucques, of foure Pearles, each one of them being as big as a Pigeons Egge; and they were eſteemed worth an hundred thouſand Crownes, at the leaſt.

In our neerer Seas they fiſh for Pearles, & finde ſome ſtore.

Returning now to our former purpoſe, which was to diſcribe where Pearles are found, I ſay, that not onely they fiſh for them in the fore-named places: but likewiſe in all other Seas, bee it eyther of the South or Occeans of Peru, the Antarticke, Florida, Canada, Guinea; yea, euen heere in our neerer Seas, of England, Scotland and Denmarke; but in ſome place they are better, fairer, greater and rounder, then in other. And namely in ſome parts of France, as at Rouen, Dieppe and Rochelle, where ſome are found very rare and paſſable. Now let vs obſerue, how, and in what manner their fiſhing is for them.

How and in what manner they fiſh for ſuch Oyſters as haue pearls in them.

Such as are appointed for this manner of fiſhing, entring into their Barques; and (leauing ſome to tend and haue care of them, and to keepe the Oyſters after they are brought to them) leape by great numbers into the Sea, remaining ſometimes vnder water halfe an houres ſpace, before they be ſeene againe, and ſo continue at the bottome: hauing ſtrong pockets, or ſmall twiſted nettings hanging about them, wherin they put their Oyſters. Which being thus taken, they aſcend aboue water againe, and are receiued into their Ships: where hauing a while taken the ayre, and ſtrengthned their bodies with ſome ſuſtenance; they put on their wrappers againe before their faces, which commonly are thin waxed toylets, as fine as the bladders of Swine, that they may the clearer ſee in the water. Fiue or ſixe times in a day, thus they throw thēſelues into the water, and towards night returne home with their takings, I meane ſuch Oyſters as they hope to finde Pearles in.

Men & womē ſlaues that attend on the ſeruice.

Vpon the Sea-ſhore there are a great number of ſlaues, as well women as men, who as often as the Oyſters are brought on land; fill their Scuttles and Baskets, made of Sea Ruſhes, carrying them to Veſſels full of freſh water, wherein when the Oyſters haue continued foure and twenty houres ſpace, and feeling a contrary ſauour to the Sea-water; they open of themſelues, and ſo ſoone as they are open, the Pearles ſunder themſelues from the fleſh of the Oyſters. Afterward, the Merchants emptying the ſhels out of the veſſels, finde all the Pearles in the bottom of the freſh water, and thus they gather the Pearles of Peru, and likewiſe in other places. Neuertheleſſe, they are not the hundred part ſo good, nor ſo fair, as thoſe of Baharem and Maniolæ: And obſerue withall, that Pearles are not found in euery Oyſter, but in ſome few, in other more, ſome breeding the greater, other ſmaller.

In what manner the Pearls are ſeparated from the fleſh of the Oyſter, & how they differ in goodneſſe & greatneſſe.

The Pearles being thus taken, ſometimes they eate the Oyſters, and otherwhiles they throw thē away, as being wearie and ouer-glutted with them by too frequent vſe. Theſe Fiſhers are ſlaues, ſeruing (for this purpoſe) the Chriſtian Merchants, Maronites, Iewes or Indians, which traffick in Baharem: and according to their taking pearled Oyſters, ſo are they cheriſhed and reſpected by their Maſters euery night, which maketh euery one ſtriue to be moſt beneficiall by his paines. Some-times the Seas are ſwolne more high & boiſterous, then the Fiſhers wold haue them to be, becauſe then it is an hinderance to their tarrying long vnder water; and then they make prouiſion for them-

The ſlaues reſpected by their Maſters, according to the benefit by their ſeruice.

themſelues in this manner. They haue a corde, at each end whereof they faſten a ſtone, which cord they binde about their backes, and ſo ſincking downe into the Sea, by the weight of thoſe ſtones, they continue firmely vnder water, and gather the Oyſters at their eaſe: and when they would mount vp to the Shippe, lightly they caſt off the ſtones, and ſwimme nimbly in their riſing. Such as would meddle in fiſhing for theſe Oyſters, it behoueth them to be very expert in ſwimming and diuing; becauſe many drown themſelues, through want of taking winde, or elſe are drawne into the depth of the ſea, by huge and mighty Fiſhes, which there they met withall, and then by no meanes can eſcape drowning.

The induſtrie of the diuers or fiſhers vnder water to finde the beſt Oyſters.

Marcus Paulus ſaw this kind of fiſhing in the kingdom of Vara, which is in India, where it was performed in the ſame manner, and he ſayth, that they fiſh not but in the moneth of Maie, and then the Peaſants or Boores are ſet on worke by the Merchants. The King hath his Tenths or Tithes, and certain Sorcerers or Enchanters, there called by them Abraiamins, haue the twentieth part, and the Peazants haue their payment in money. Here you muſt know, that without theſe Enchaunters, they that fiſh in this manner for Oyſters, ſhould bee deuoured by certaine greedie and venemous fiſhes, as Crocodiles, Whales, and other ſuch like deuourers: but they coniure them in ſuch ſort, that they eſcaped from them without any daunger. But when night commeth, and the fiſhing muſt be forborne till the morrow; the Enchaunters releaſe and make their coniurations to ceaſe: onely to preuent theeues, who elſe (in the night time) would plunge and diue into the water, knowing they may doe it ſafely without perill, and ſo carry away the pearly Oyſters, and fruſtrate the Merchants of their expectation.

Marcus Paulus an eie witneſſe of this maner of fiſhing for pearls

Moreouer, there is no people in all the Countrey, that can enchaunt thoſe terrible fiſhes, or doe know the words belonging to this coniuration, but onely theſe Abraiamins. And it is to be noted, that all ſuch as trafficke in this fiſhing; doe not cauſe the Oyſters to open themſelues in freſh water; but in ſome Countries, they open them with little knines, or ſharpe pointed bodkins. And in many other places, as in the Indiaes lately diſcouerd, they ſet their Oiſters ouer a fire, and ſo by heat procure them to open, by which meanes they finde the Pearles: but then thoſe pearles appeare of a reddiſh colour, and carry no chearefull water.

Of inchanters whoſe coniurations doe great ſeruice in the fiſhing for pearled Oyſters.

All Countries not alike in opening the oiſters for their pearles.

Alſo it is to be obſerued, that all pearls are not white of themſelues naturally, but in ſome places they are found to bee red; as in the Iſland of Zipangrie, ſcituate in the Eaſt Indiaes, according as the ſaid Venetian Paulus reporteth. And yet there they haue great plentie of them, very ſingularly excellent, both for greatnes and roundneſſe: and in thoſe Countries, they are of dearer value, price and eſtimation, that thoſe white do carry no compariſon with them. Somewhat I can ſay of my ſelfe, that I haue ſeene ſeauen redde pearles, and no more, belonging vnto the late deceaſſed Dutcheſſe of Valentinois; which had a moſt goodly luſtre, and I was (for a while) perſwaded, that they wonne that colour by ſome artificiall meanes: but after I had read the Diſcourſe of Marcus Paulus, then I became to be of another opinion.

All pearles be not white naturally of theſelues: but ſome redde pearles haue excelled the white in price & eſtimation.

Heere likewiſe will I inſert a great ſecret in nature, and (in my minde) very meruailous, reported to mee by men of good credite, that haue ſeene the fiſhing for thoſe Oyſters, and found it true by their owne experience. In a certaine ſeaſon of the yeare, theſe Oyſters of pearles, doe belch and caſt forth a red and blood-like moiſture, in great abundance: ſo that many (of the beſt in iudgement) among thoſe barbarous people, imagined them to ſuffer a fluxe of menſtruoſitie, as other fiſhes in the ſame Ocean doe. Theſe Oyſters haue their paſſages, like to all other fiſhes in Seas or Riuers, ſo that in ſome places great ſtore of them is to be found, and within a while after, a rare matter if tenne remayne there to be had, but all are fallen downe aboue tenne miles further off. Sometimes, they which fiſh in an other Countrey, where ſcarcely one is left: on the morrow or next day, ſhall light on more then euer was there before.

A ſtrange kind of moiſture iſſuing from thoſe pearly oyſters at a certaine ſeaſon of the yeare.

Oyſters continue not in one place.

The Perſians haue moreouer inuented an other manner of fiſhing, more commodious, and of leſſe charge and perill. By making of hurdles of Oſiers or Palms, well knit together with ſtrong bindings, in ſuch manner as the fiſhing obſerued in our Xantonge Seas for Casserons, vsing certaine Rakes, which rash into the Sea sands, and when they find the beds of Oysters, so force thē enter into those hurdls. Others walke aloug amongst the Rockes and Stones, which appeare aboue the water, where oftentimes, they finde some of those Oysters, so fast knit to the Rockes or Stones, as very much labour can scarcely get them off, without breaking the rocke or shell of the Oysters, and then taking from thence the Pearle, so soone as the shell is broken; for otherwise it diminisheth, and doth loose the true and naturall colour.

A later inuention of the Perſians in fiſhing for their pearled Oyſters.

Barbarous nations made no account of pearles in elder times.

The Indians, Arabians, Persians and others, in auncient times, made no more account of Pearles, then of ordures and corruptions which the Seas cleered them selues of, during the seasons of their turbulence and boyling. But now wee haue so well enstructed them, in knowledge both of the worth and profite, that they can skill of the goodnesse, and value of things in such sort, as they will sell those commodities at rates deare enough. The Ægyptian hath beene quicke witted alwayes, as hauing knowledge in good letters of longest continuance, addicting his studious contemplations, to vnderstand the secrets of Nature: so that Pearles and precious Stones, at all times hath tasted of his approbation and esteeme. The slaues and basest peazants in the Isle of Baharem, and other adiacent partes of firme Land, neighbouring vpon the Sea; haue oftentimes found Nacres and Oysters on the shoares, beeing dead, and yet they made search into them, and often they found very fayre and also rich Pearles.

The wisedom and long continued experience of the Egyptians.

Plinie saith, that Oysters haue a King amongst them, according as the like is affirmed of the Bees, Antes, and a guide allotted to the Cranes, and that this king is elected and chosen (by being the very fayrest and greatest) to take a carefull charge of all the rest: And that is the Oyster, which the fishers or diuers couet most to finde, being then assured, that the rest will not feare to followe. Atheneus alleadgeth another Fable, as thus: That they doe striue to reuenge themselues on the fishers, by opening their shells so to catch holde of their fingers. But such opinions are meerely friuolous, and they which ordinarily fish in the Oyster-Seas, make a mockerie of such reports. Beside, our Naturallists stand in doubt, whether Cockles, Scallops, Muscles, Oysters, and such like shell-fish (liuing in the water) haue any part of vnderstanding. And, by the same reason, if they haue the meanes of withdrawing themselues, vpon sight of the fishers comming, or from any other fish (opposite or contrary to them) endeuouring to eate and deuoure them.

Plin. li. 12. ca. 17. A king among the Oysters. and yet it is doubted, whether Oysters haue any vnderstanding, or no, and a great question among the best Naturallists.

There is a fish, which is very opposite to the Oyster, being tearmed by the Persians, Taruphall, or Taball, and is of the bignesse of a midling Salmon, hauing a hard skinne, yet without scales, and his finnes of an azure colour. This fish hath a little head, a sharpe nose or snowt, seruing for his mouth, which is full of sharp teeth: and these pearly Oysters are his delicious diet, liuing (almost) by no other kind of foode. When he is desirous of feeding, he watcheth till such time as the Oisters beginne to open, as oftentimes they doe, beeing in the Sea: whereof making his aduantage, and thrusting in his nose, hee deuoureth the fish quickely, leauing the shell quite emptie. The fishermen of the Islands, labour diligently to catch this fish, and first of all they open her bowells, wherein they finde store of very goodlie Pearles: then feede they on the fish, because it is dainty and delicate meate. The fewer number of Pearles they finde in an Oyster, so much the greater and fayrer they are, and where they chaunce on anie store, they are the clowdier and small. Some are found to be so little, that they can not bee drilled by any meanes; and therefore they call them Seede-pearles, which are purposely kept for Apothecaries, who imploy them according to their owne knowledge and experience, or as they are aduised by the Physitian.

Taruphall, or Taball, a fish contrary to the pearled Oisters, liuing by feeding on them.

The Taruphal hath plenty of rich Pearles found in his belly.

The most commendable forme and shape of the pearl, is said to be that which is roundest; yet that in fashion of a Peare or Akorne, is not much worse; and next to these is that like to a little Nutte: nor doe they reiect such as are writhed and wrinkled, nor the very smallest; but all are employed and made vse of: the best for the richest people, and the other for them of lower qualitie, becaus they are worne by all degrees of persons, as well men as women, in regarde they are growne to be so

Of those Pearles that carrie most commendation by their shape.

A doubt and demand, what the reason may be, that Pearles shold exceed gold and siluer in value and estimation.

so common. No Prouince doe I know, whereunto more Pearles are brought, then into Spaine, and next into France, within some small compasse of time, which makes mee so much to maruell at them the more.

In briefe, Pearles haue surpassed the riches of gold and siluer, and of Emralds brought from foorth the Indiaes. And yet I would gladly know the reason, wherefore our graue Auncients made such estimation of Pearles; considering they knew them not to haue any medicinable vertue, and in regard also, they grew quickely olde, as we plainly perceiue, when they haue lost their lustre, clearenesse and whitenesse. For my selfe, I cannot imagine what should be the reason, except it be in regarde of their whitenesse, which is not common to other precious stones: and I perceiue, that no account is made of them, which are of another colour, although they be of the self-same substance. Some haue enstructed mee in an other reason, to wit, because they haue beene brought from the new-found world, and likewise, that in times past, they fetcht them from very farre remote Countries, which needs must vrge the more affection to them, because they come from farre hence: Or else wee make such deare estimation of them, in regarde that (many times) they cost the liues of men in fishing for them, as partly we haue before reported. The greatest Pearles are called in Latine Vniones, because sildome or neuer we shall light on two, that are alike eyther in greatnesse, roundnesse, or splendour, or answerable in weight: for wee finde them alwayes separated one from another, and not ioyned together; And the lesser sort they vse to call Marguerites.

The reason why the greatest Pearles are called in Latine Vniones.

After that the Merchants haue them in their power, they permit them to bee perused by diuers people, wherein the Indians and Persians are the best exercised, as beeing naturally enclined thereto by frequent practise. Nor do Pearles continue still in one and the same condition, for the truth is, they will fade, wither and waxe light by course of times: especially such as are caught after the full Moone. But being kept in the floure of Rice, mingled with Bay-Salt, they will recouer their former beauty and weight. But they which are caught deepest, and in the new Moone, are neuer subiect to any such inconueniences.

The Indians and Persians haue the greatest skill in Pearles.

Pearles will decay & waxe light.

The flesh (as they vse to call it) or body of the Pearly Oyster, is most wholsom, and of great nourishment; excellent good against melancholy, and for such as language, or are in a consumption, and also for Hectiques and Tisicks. But the Indians make no vse of Pearles in their medicines, although the moderne Physitions of the Arabes and Moores doe, which hath beene learned of them by some of ours, and vsed in all cordiall medicines, being good also for the eyes, finely beaten into powder, and held as an especiall preseruatiue for the sight.

Pearly Osters good for diuers diseases.

Katherine the Widdow to Duke Leopold.

Emperor Charles the fourth, alſo broght an Army againſt them. In like manner, in the warre of them of Baſile, againſt Katherine of Bourgongne, the widdow of Leopold, in the yeare one thouſand, foure hundred, and nine, the Bernians & they of Solleurre ſent ſuccour: the other Cantons imploying themſelues carefully, to accord them with the houſe of Auſtria. Moreouer, at the time of the councell of Baſile, when as Lewes the Dolphin of France, brought a great Army into Germany, to breake the councell, and made warre on the Switzers, by the inſtance & working of the Duke of Auſtria, who had procured him to come: the Switzers maintained and defended the citty and councell, againſt the encountering of a ſtrange enemy; as an example very remarkable, it beeing not aboue ſixteene yeares, ſince they had coaped with great troops of the French. True it is, that they all (well neere) loſt their liues there: but yet they did ſo weaken their enemies troops, that he tooke part with thē which fled faſteſt.

The Dolphin of France brought an Army into Germany.

They being thus auoyded, the men of Baſile ioyned their forces with the Switzers, and ſo made warre together on the Duke of Auſtria. In like manner, when Charles, Duke of Bourgongne, made himſelfe ſo terrible, and affrighted all the world, they of Baſile ioyned in alliance (for ten yeares) with Strasbourg, and other citties on the Rhene. Afterward, with Sigiſmond, Duke of Auſtria; Renê, Duke of Lorraine, and with the Cantons. In this warre they ſhewed themſelues both faithfull & valiant, for their confederates. Finally, a great warre being moued betweene the Emperour Maximillian, the Switzers and Griſons: they of Baſile remained neuters, without giuing ſuccour to eyther ſide, nor receiued their Garriſons; but they furniſhed them both with victuals and munition. In this war there was a battaile giuen (almoſt) againſt the walles of Baſile, afterward at Dorneck, where the Switzers wonne a faire victory ouer the enemies, whom they did beat backe to the gates of Baſile. But during all this war, the cittizens of Baſile fauoured equally both the one and other ſide. To conclude, by the diligence of Lodouico Maria, Duke of Millaine, the Ambaſſadors on both ſides met at Baſile, & peace was made betweene the Emperour and the Switzers.

The Baſilians ioyne with the Switzers againſt the Duke of Auſtria.

War betweene the Emperor Maximillian, the Switzers and Griſons.

The Switzers allowed well of this expedient, in the men of Baſile during this warre, and the Emperor Maximillian (for his part) ſeemed not to improoue it. But the Noble-men, who were deadly enemies to the Cantons, held Baſile (almoſt) in the ranke of a foe, becauſe the citty did not then ſhew it ſelfe openly, as an enemy to the Switzers; and not onely the ſubiects to the houſe of Auſtria, but many more, who till then had beene cittizens; with-drew themſelues to the Count of Ferrara, and about Montbeliard, into Halſatia, and to Briſgow, countries appertaining to them of Auſtria. Being in thoſe places, they ceaſſed not to outrage (both with words and deeds) the inhabitants of Baſile, who being moued with ſuch indignities; the yeare after the war ended, to wit, one thouſand, fiue hundred and one; made a perpetuall alliance with the Cantons, and ſo were left in peace with their neighbours, who ſtood in awe of the Switzers ſuccour.

The Emperor and the Switzers no way diſtaſte the dealing of the men of Baſile in the warre.

CHAP. XII.

At what time Schaffouſe was receiued into the number of the Cantons; and the antiquity thereof.

SChaffouſe, accepted the very ſame yeare, to be nũbred among the cantons, is not of ſo great age and antiquity. It is ſeated on the Riuer of Rheine, within Germany, and yet notwithſtanding, the Bridge is in Swetia. In the time of the Emperor Henry the third, the Counts of Nellenbourg builded there an Abbey, which ſtandeth yet to this day, and it is thought, that it gaue a beginning to the cittie: as likewiſe the citties of S. Gall, Lucerna, and many more in Germany, haue deriued their originall from Abbeyes. The Rheine is alſo another cauſe of the citties encreaſing, continuing ſo for ſome thouſand of yeares ſince, beneath the citty, where wherewith it is (in a manner) encloſed. It falleth downe from a very great height, with ſuch a dreadfull noyſe, and remounting vp againe into the ayre ſo vehemently, that it maketh there a continuall fogge or myſt. And for this cauſe, and the vncapableneſſe of any Boats to paſſe there, all ſuch as deſcend downe the Lake of Conſtance, and from Cella on the Rheine, are conſtraind to diſcharge at Schaffouſe; which hath beene conceiued by many, to giue that name to the Citty, to wit, of a Squiffe, or of a Boate, which the Germanes call Skiff, or Schiff, thence to bee tearmed Schaffouſe. Neuertheleſſe, the vulgar ſort, taking vp a falſe etymologye of the word Schaff, which ſignifieth a Sheepe; haue grounded their opinion ſtrongly thereon, and forged Armes alſo of the ſame nature. There is a great tole or cuſtome gathered in this Citty, eſpecially for the paſſage of Salt: which appertained in ancient times, and before the foundation of the Citty, to two Noble Families, to wit, of Turn, and of Stad, which remaine yet to this day at Schaffouſe.

No Boates able to paſſe the water at Schaffouſe.

Concerning the name of Schaffouſe.

A great Tolle or Cuſtome for ſalt.

Schaffouſe at liberty at the firſt, but afterward alienated by the emperour.

At the beginning, the principall dominion or ſway of the City, belonged to the Abbot, who elected and choſe one halfe of the Magiſtrates; but (by little) and little) they exempted thẽſelues from his gouernement, and obtained many good priuiledges and franchiſes of the Emperors. But Lewes of Bauaria (weakened by long warres) could not pay the Duke of Auſtria, ſuch monies as he ought him, according to an agreement made betweene them, which cauſed him to alienate and ſell Schaffouſe, together with ſome other Townes, and ſo (by that meanes) it became diſmembred from the Empire. After that time, Schaffouſe remained ſubiect to the Dukes of Auſtria, for the ſpace of foureſcore and fiue years, euen vntill the councell of Conſtance: for then Fredericke of Auſtria, becauſe hee brought Pope Iohn the two and twentieth out of the councell, was baniſhed by the Emperor Sigiſmond, who cauſed him to bee ſo narrowly purſued, that all his goods were partly pilled, and partly confiſcated to the Empire, without any other meanes of helpe.

Schaffouſe ſubiected to the Dukes of Auſtria for 85 yeares.

In this warre, Schaffouſe became reunited to the Empire, and the cittizens (hauing giuen a good ſumme of money, to the Emperor) obtained great priuiledges vnder Letters patents: and therein was plainly expreſſed, that (thence forward) their Citty ſhould not any more be alienated from the Empire. But Frederick the third, of the houſe of Auſtria, being Emperor: laboured to ſubiect it againe, and that the citty of Schaffouſe might remaine to his ſucceſſors. And therefore hee permitted Duke Sigiſmond, to compell the cittizens to ſweare fidelity to him; which they refuſed to doe, but with exception of their priuiledges, and they would not receiue the Princes Ambaſſadors into the citty, but vppon that condition. Contrariwiſe, the Ambaſſadors preſſed them earneſtly, to oblige themſelues to the Prince, without any exception, and propounded certaine Articles, for the maintenance whereof, they required oath: threatening the cittizens with very great harmes, if they would not yeelde to that which they demanded of them.

Schaffouſe vnited to the empire again, and great priuiledges grãted thereto.

The men of Schaffouſe, ſeeing the Ambaſſadors perſiſt ſtill in their opinion: to make good their owne part, receiued the Switzers Ambaſſadors into their citty, and made alliance (for ſome yeares) with them of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris, ſo that the Ambaſſadors of Auſtria returned backe, and performed iuſt nothing.

The Switzers Ambaſſadors receiued into Schaffouſe, & alliance made with them.

Before this, they of Schaffouſe were in good amity with the Switzers, and from the yeare, one thouſand, three hundred, forty fiue, made alliance (for ſome time) with them of Zurich. But becauſe they were Subiects to the houſe of Auſtria, againſt whom, the Switzers had (well neere) continuall warres: they could not then entertaine firmely this amity, but were compelled, to go in war againſt the Switzers, vnder the Enſignes of the Auſtrians. But after this laſt alliance, they were very good and faithfull friends vnto the Cantons, and bare them company in many warres and battailes. For immediately after the alliance began:

The Switzers had continuall warre againſt the houſe of Auſtria.

began: the Auſtrians came and aſſaulted the Switzers, and namely them of Schaffouſe.

The Cantons made war on Sigiſmond of Auſtria, by the Popes command.

It came to paſſe, that the Cantons (obeying the command of Pope Pius) made war with Sigiſmond of Auſtria, which being pacified, they of Auſtria tooke Armes againe, becauſe Mulhouſe and Schaffouſe had ioyned themſelues with the Switzers, who ledde a great Army to the Count of Ferrara, and into the quarters about Montbeliard. At the ſame time, Peregrin de Hewdorff, accuſed them of Schaffouſe in the Imperiall chamber of Rotuille, and ſollicited ſo much, that they were put to baniſhment from the Empire. Among others, he charged Iohn and Conrad de Fulach, brethren & cittizens of Schaffouſe; of a noble and ancient Family, who ſometimes poſſeſſed a Caſtle, neere vnto the downefall of Rheine, whence Albert of Auſtria had expelled them, but ſoone after they entred it againe by intelligence. In regard whereof, they & the other cittizens that maintained their iuſt quarrell, were proſcribed. In this war the Cantons ſent a good Garriſon vnto Schaffouſe.

The men of Schaffouſe accuſed by Peregrin de Hewdorff.

Incurſions made on the Auſtrians lands, by them of Schaffouſe.

While theſe helpes and ſuccours laſted, the cittizens made diuers courſes into the lands about, appertaining to the houſe of Auſtria; as in the Mountaines of the black Foreſt, in Hegow, Kleckgow, and other limitrophing lands of Suaba and of Baſile. Finally, hauing laide ſiedge before Waldshout, which is a Towne at the entrance into the Blacke Foreſt, where the Riuer of Ar falleth into the Rheine, and which was vnder the Auſtrian gouernment, peace was made; wherein they of Suaba were exempted, & ſtood baniſhed from the Empire, at the purſuite and charges of Sigiſmond. Thus then the Cantons hauing experimented in theſe warres, the faithfulneſſe of them of Schaffouſe, and knowing well withall, what commodities they receiued from ſuch a citty, ſeated in ſo apt a place on the confines of Swetia; And reciprocally, the men of Schaffouſe, feeling themſelues to be deliuered from their enemies, by the good aſſiſtance of the Switzers; they thought it very expedient, both for the one ſide and the other, to prolong the alliance. And accordingly, in the yeare 1479. they made an alliance for twenty fiue yeares following: wherein were comprehended, the men of Vri and Vnderuald, with whom Schaffouſe (till then) had not any particular acquaintance.

A new alliance of Schaffouſe for 25. yeares, made with the cantons.

The tenour of this alliance, is (almoſt) anſwerable to that of the ancient Cantons. For in the firſt place, they binde thẽſelues to aide one another. Afterward, they eſtabliſh a forme of iudgement, for reconciling or auoyding ſuch differences, as ſhould happen between them of Schaffouſe and the Cantons. Then followeth in what manner debts ought to be paide, & what meanes are to be vſed in ſuch caſes. Then for the puniſhment of homicides, or men-killers. The laſt Article concerneth the new & ancient alliances, to wit, the one ſide ſhall make no new alliance, without the will and conſent of the other: And that the auncient alliances ſhall alwayes be eſteemed of moſt aduantage, & to precede all the other.

A breefe of the Articles and conditions of the alliance.

After all this, the warre of Bourgongne hapned, and ſome yeares conſequently, that of Suaba, mooued by the Emperour Maximillian, againſt the Switzers. In both theſe warres, they of Schaffouſe did their duty exceeding well, furniſhing men and money for the weale-publike: by which meanes, they entred into the good grace of the Cantons, much more then euer they did before, and wonne great honour. Alſo, the yeare after the laſt warre, to wit, 1501. they made perpetuall alliance with the Switzers, and were enrolled in number of the Cantons, obtaining the 12. ranke or roome.

Schaffouſe is reckoned for the twelfth Canton.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the warres of the Switzers, ſince ſuch time as they came to be in number of the Cantons, and making them twelue.

After that Baſile and Schaffouſe were numbred with the cantons, and that they were 12. during the alliance which they had made with King Lewes the 12. in the yeare, 1503. ſome among them (in great number) went for him in the war of Naples, without leaue neuertheleſſe, and againſt the Edicts of their Magiſtrates. As the Switzers and French might brag of ſmall happineſſe, in the firſt warre of Naples, Wars in Italy, the Frenchmẽ & Switzers not fortunate in the war of Naples.

Naples, vnder King Charles the eight: so their fortune prooued little better in this last warre. They, who (during the first warre) were left in Garrisons, in strong places and Fortresses of the Kingdome; dyed of diseases for the most part. Such as escaped in this warre, in recompence of their trauaile, brought home to their owne houses, that villainous contagion of the Pockes, which afterward was tearmed the Spanish disease, the Neapolitane euill, and the French Pocks: At the last war they were ouercome in two battailes, and lost a great number of their men. The yeare 1507. the Cantons sent succour vnto the King, who (by their meanes) made himselfe Master of the field, which the Genewayes had planted in a Mountaine, that commanded ouer their citty, which (soon after) yeelded it selfe.

The spaniards brought it first out of the Indies into Christendome, & bestowed it on the French, at the siedge of Naples.

At the same time, the Emperor Maximillian demanded men of the Switzers, and they promised him a leuye of 6000. men, prouided, that he should not leade them against the King of France, their allie: but because he would not accept this condition, the leuye remained, and was not made.

An honorable minde in the Switzers, not to beare arms against their Allie.

Soone after, to witte, in the yeare 1509. the league of alliance betweene the King of France & the Switzers, tooke ending, and the Emperor, Pope Iulius the 2. the Kings of France and Spaine, leagued themselues together, and made warre on the Venetians, wherin the Switzers serued the King of France for wages. The yeare following, Pope Iulius made alliance with the Switzers, by the meanes of Matthew, Cardinall of Sion, who immediately after the alliance concluded, led sixe thousand Switzers into Italy; vnder pretence of defending the lands of the Church, against the Duke of Ferrara. But his true intent was, to surprize and expell the French out of Millaine. The Switzers hauing discouered his purpose, would not follow the Cardinall against the French, and their Lords had likewise forbidden them: so that the Pope sent them into Swetia, without paying them their wages, wherat they were very highly discontented.

The Cardinal of Sion a warriour and capitall enemy to the French

In the yeare 1511. perpetuall alliance betweene the Switzers, the houses of Austria and of Bourgongne, was renewed. On the other side, the Ambassadors of France desired the Switzers to renew the alliance with their King: but the most part of them were displeased, because so soone as the first alliance was expired, the King had denied them all their payes and yearely pensions.

The Switzers offended with the King of France, about their payes & pensions.

And albeit that a very great number among them, were no sound well-willers or friends to the Pope, who likewise had not payed them: yet notwithstanding, fearing leste hee should excommunicate them, they durst not allie themselues with the King of France, who then was enemy to the Pope. Hereupon, hapned a disgrace to be done them by the French, for they had taken at Lugano, a Herauld of the Switzers, with letters from the Seigneury about him: first, they drowned him, and to despight the Switzers, the Coate of Armes, which the Heraulds and Officers to the Cantons vse to weare, they solde at open port-sale, or out-cry, as we commonly call it.

Great wrong done to an Officer of Armes.

The Switzers, in the very strongest of winter, led their Army ouer the Alpes, where hauing burned some Villages, they returned backe againe, without performing any other memorable deed. But the yeare following, Pope Iulius (who had lost a great battaile at Rauenna, at encountring there with the French) called them to helpe him, and therefore they sent into Italy, an Army of twenty thousand mē. They beeing ioyned with the Venetians (then reconciled to the Pope) tooke at their arriuall Cremona and Pauia, driuing the French out of the whole Dukedome of Millaine, so that nothing remained to them, but onely the Castle of Millaine. In regard of these worthy exploits, the Pope gaue the Switzers the title, of Defenders of the Church; enriching their Standards with diuers Images, and publikely gaue to the whole Nation of the Switzers, two great Standards, which they call, Paner, that is, The Sword and Bonnet, as a noted marke of liberty. Maximillian Sforza, re-establisshed in his paternall domination by the Switzers succour: made alliance with them, and gaue to the Cantons Lugano, Locarna, Mendrisa, and the Vale of Madia.

The Switzers reuenged on the French in very notable manner, and called, Defenders of the Church

The Sword & Bonnet, signes of liberty.

He gaue also to the Grisons, their confederates, the Vale Telina or Volturena. Likewise Charles, Duke of Sauoye, whose predecessors had particular alliance (long time before) with some of the Cantons:

Great gifts bestowed on the Cantons.

made alliance with all the Switzers, for 25 yeares after following.

The King of France is denied to bee leagued with the Cantons.

In the ſame yeare, the King of France ſolicited the Switzers, to become agayne allied with them: but becauſe hee would not ſet free the Caſtle of Millaine, and ſome diſcouery was made beſide, that his Ambaſſadors laboured to corrupt ſome particulars by gifts, and to buy theyr voyces for faire money layde downe; they were commaunded to depart out of the Leagued countries; and ſo the warre was renewed again. For the King ſent a great Army into Italy, vnder the conduct of the Lords of Triuulſe and Trimouille, who beſiedged Maximillian Sforza in Nouara. Hee was then accompanied vvith foure thouſand Switzers, to whoſe ayde, eight thouſand more were ſent. Their vantgard being arriued at Nouara, and they within being ioyned with them, they gaue the battell to the French, vanquiſhing & driuing them out of Italy. Guichardin the Italian, an Hiſtorian much renowned, writes that the Switzers won ſuch honor by this victory, as many haue made no difficulty in equalling this happy ſucceſſe of theirs, with (almoſt) all the braue exploites of the Greekes and Romanes. Notwithſtanding, the field was deere enough bought by them, becauſe fourteen hundred Switzers were there ſlaine, and the moſt part of them by the Cannon, before that they could come to handye ſtroakes. Which made the people of Swetia to murmur in many places, and all blame fell on them that tooke part with the French: ſo that diuers withdrew themſelues from Swetia for a time onely, and two only had their heads ſmitten off in thoſe mutinies and commotions: for the reſt, all was well pacified, without any effuſion of blood.

The victorie of the Switzers ouer the French at Nouara, very famous.

An Armie of Switzers, by counſel of the Emperor, entred into France thorowe Bourgongne.

After this victory of the Switzers, the Emperor Maximillian, quitting the amity and alliance of the King: aduiſed the Switzers, to enter France by Bourgongn, with an army of ſix thouſand men; wherto (wel-neere) ſixteene thouſande other voluntary ioyned themſelues, together with ſome troopes of horſe belonging to the Emperor, vnder the conducte of the Prince of Wirtemberg. There they beſieged Dijon*, the capitall City of all Bourgongne. But the Lorde of Trimouille, an olde Captaine, beeing not of ſtrength to defend well the place, agreed vvith the Switzers, on conditions, that the King ſhould acquit whatſoeuer he pretended to the Dukedome of Millaine, and paye them (at certaine appointed times) ſixe hundred thouſand Crowns; for aſſurance whereof, he gaue them foure Lordes of marke, as hoſtages, with whom the Switzers departed thence immediately.

* Dijon.

Meanes made to get the Switzers gon out of France

Nowe, although it was a matter moſt palpable and notorious to all men, that this compoſition warranted the kingdom becauſe that Dijon being taken, the Switzers might haue run vp ſo farre as to the gates of Paris, or ioyne themſelues there with the Engliſh; and beſide that king Lewes hadde not a ſufficient Army to make head againſt them; yet notwithſtanding, he would not ratifie his compoſition. For he would not admit (by any meanes) that his rights to the Dukedome of Millaine, ſhould be ſo much as talkt of. The Switzers ſeeing themſelues thus handled, and highly offended with ſuch ſlye trickes: threatned to kill the Hoſtages, except the confirmation might be brought within a certaine time. Neuertheleſſe, the winter grew extreame vpon them, and yet they reſolued to re-enter France in the month of Nouember: But the King ſent his Ambaſſadors, who laboured (by all meanes) to make a perpetual peace with the Switzers. In the meane while, they coulde no way ioyne, becauſe the conditions which the King propounded, were very vnreaſonable: which was the cauſe that the time ſpent it ſelfe in dayes and deliberations, in meere talke and friuolous diſputes, whereby the enterprize of marching into France, was quite broken. Concerning the reſt of theſe meetings and aſſemblies, they were thus conſidered on, that in the month of December, the ſame yeare, they of Appenzel were added to the Cantons number, and held the thirteenth place.

The King of France refuſeth the former compoſition agreed on by Trimouille.

Much talkt on and nothing done.

CHAP

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the Originall of Appenzell: how it tooke that name. The Lawes, Customes, & maner of gouernment there obserued.

A description of the situation of Appenzel, and the villages therto belonging.

APpenzel is the name both of a Country, and of a Village. The country is situated somwhat aboue S. Gall, betweene the high Mountains, and on the Frontiers of the Grisons country. The inhabitants liue (scatteringly) in Villages, and among the number of them, there are eight chiefe and principal, which haue euery one their Temple or parish church. The maine head of all is the village of Appenzell, whereof all the rest of the countrey beareth name. This Countrey was sometimes vnder the gouernment of the Abbots of saint Gall, and because they alwaies vsed to dwel in the chiefest town or village, wher they builte a very strong Castle, named Claux: the village was therefore cald Appenzel, which in Latine is, Abbatis Cella: that is to say, The Chamber or dwelling of the Abbot.

Abbatis Cella The Abbots Chamber or dwelling.

The inhabitants of Appenzel buy their liberty.

The people of Appenzel aimed at liberty, first by armes, and after peace made, they bought liberty for themselus & their children, by meanes of a great sum of mony, which they paied to the Abbot. They had wars which continued seuen yeares, against Cuno de Stouffen, Abbot of S. Gall; to whom the townes about the Lake of Constance, and belonging to Frederick D. of Austria, the bishoppe of Constance, the Count of Wirtenberg, & many Counts & Gentlemen gaue succour. Yet they of Appenzel would not yeeld themselues for all this, but being ayded by the Cittizens of S. Gal (who, at the beginning, were partakers with the Abbot, but afterward ioined with them of Appenzel, won som battels, tooke fiue Townes, and more then sixty Castles, part whereof were quite ruined. In this war, they leagued themselues with the Switzers, who were enemies vnto the house of Austria. Some say, that they allyed themselues with Suits and Glaris only; but others doe maintaine, that it was with Lucerna, Vri, Suites, and Vnderuald. This Warre tooke ending in the yeare, 1408. and by meanes of the Emperour Rupert, agreement was made betweene them of Appenzel and their enemies, in the City of Constance.

Their league with the Switzers.

This being done, the men of Appenzel framed a forme of gouernment to themselues, which yet they hold vnto this day. For till then, each village had her ensign, and her estates apart, or by it selfe. Now there was but one Ensigne, one assembly of their estates, and one Councell, composed of the most honest people, and the notablest persons in all the Villages thoroughout the countrey. Then three years after the peace was made, the Abbot of Saint Gall attempted a new suite against them: but then they made alliance with Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, Vnderuald Zug, & Glaris, which so offended the Abbots of Saint Gall, as, about the yeare one thousand foure hundred twenty fiue, Henrie Mansdorff (then Abbot) preuailed so far, that they of Appenzel were proscribed by the Emperour, and excommunicated by the Pope. Banishment was no great hurt, or inconuenience to them in any manner whatsoeuer, because the countrey (being round engirt with Mountaines, and not Trafficking almost with any bodie) no inuasion could bee made vpon them. As concerning the excommunication sent from the Pope, they resolued in an assembly of al the country, not any way to care for it. And therefore they expelled all the priests (that obserued the command of the Pope) out of their Countrey, and vvould not permit them to administer the Sacraments: amongst all which they killed but one.

Their form & maner of their order and gouernment, first by themselues, and afterwards in due fashion.

People are banished and excommunicated, because they maintain their countries liberty.

The Abbot of Saint Gall, perceiuing that this course did him not any seruice; and that (on the other side) the men of Appenzell ranne verie fiercely vpon such, as durst tearme them to bee excommunicate, and ruined the Castelles of manie Gentlemen: Finally, by helpe of the Bysshoppe of Constance, and the Noblemen of Suabi, hee accused them before the Electours of the Empire, imploring theyr helpe and aide in this extreamitie. The Electors sent to the Switzers, and to the Cities of Suaba, that they ſhould bring them of Appenzel vnder obedience. But the Switzers would not make any war on their neighbours and fellow cittizens: but rather laboured to make peace, which was agreed on foure yeares after this excommunication, the men of Appenzell hauing beene (before) ouercome in two encounters, by the Count of Toggenbourg.

Warre made vpon the Noble-men by them of Appenzell.

This peace laſted not long, for the Gentlemen, neighbours to Appenzell, about the Lake of Conſtance, aſſembled a great number of horſemen, wherewith to inuade them of Appenzell. But they diſappointed their hope, and got before them; poſſeſſing themſelues of Rineck, & of the Vale of Rheguſce, in the year, 1445. The Lords of Hagenwill, who helde that country in pawne or pledge: cauſed them of Appenzell to be cenſured with baniſhment, by the Imperiall Chamber eſtabliſhed at Rotuille. But gaining nothing by the bargaine, they ſolde them their right, for the ſumme of ſixe thouſand crowns, and tooke off the cenſure. In the yeare, 1452. they made perpetuall alliance with ſeauen of the Cantons, and (after that time) ioyned themſelues with the Switzers, in the warres againſt the Dukes of Auſtria, of Bourgongne, and the league of Suaba, wherein they ſhewed themſelues both faithfull and valiant. Afterward, in the yeare, 1513. they were receiued into the number of the Cantons.

When anger helps not, patience muſt preuaile.

Appenzell receiued into the Cantons.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the alliance made betweene the fiue laſt Cantons; And a breuiate of their Articles, binding them together in confederacy.

ALL the latter cantons, except Baſile, long time before their receiuing into this ranke, were allied to the other ancient Cantons, and then afterward, at ſundry times they were receiued and numbred with the cantons, according as wee haue noted already.

What rights and priuiledges belonged to the Cantons

Now thoſe Cantons doe hold this right aboue their confederates, that they deliberate, and giue aduice in their dayes of conſultation, for all occaſions concerning (in common) the common-wealth of the Switzers. They haue a ſhare or part, in all commodities and diſcommodities of the comminalty. They gouerne (in equall authority) all the Baliwicks by them obtained, and partake equally and publikely, all booties gotten in warre. For the reſt, the Articles of alliance of the old Cantons, and latter with the firſt, are almoſt alike.

Articles of alliance of the latter cantons with the former.

The firſt and principall Article, concerneth mutuall ſuccour or aſſiſtance, wherein there are diuerſity of clauſes. The Cantons which ſhall be called, ought to ſuccour their aſſociate or companion, without any fraud or delay. If a Canton be ſo ſuddenly engirt by the enemy, as he cannot call the other, neither by Letters nor Ambaſſadors; yet ſhall not they forbeare (for all that) from giuing ſuccour, and in as ſpeedy manner, as if they had receiued expreſſe aduertiſement. If the latter Cantons doe conceiue, that a wrong is done vnto them; yet notwithſtanding, they ſhall mooue no warre againſt any perſon, without the will and conſent of the olde Cantons. If their enemies will debate their cauſe in iuſtice, and accept the Switzers for their Iudges, or others of equall and indifferent iudgement: the Canton may not attempt to purſue his right by Armes. Euery one of the Cantons, at their owne charge and expences, ſhall come to ſuccour the other, and ſend ſuch numbers of men as they would haue, and according as they ſhall ſee it commodious, wherewith the other Canton muſt content it ſelfe. In like manner, the limits are preſcribed, wherein the auncient Cantones ſtand bound to ſend helpe to the new: And the limits are the confines of the Cantons, as they then ſtand. There is likewiſe mention made, concerning charges and expences, at the beſiedging and battering of Townes and Caſtles. And the Lawes agreed vpon at Stantz, touching the partage of booties, which alſo are heerein confirmed.

The limitation & bounds of ſuccour to be ſent.

The ſecond Article declareth, what kinde

Of differences betweene two Cantons or many.

kinde of courſe is to be obſerued, if a difference do happen between two Cãtons or many: But wee ſhall ſpeake in our ſecond Booke, what forme of iudgement is in the caſe to be kept. Moreouer, there is mention made, concerning actions in caſes of iniuries betweene particulars, and what Iudges they are to take note of in that kind. Then for the exacting of names: Concerning commerce, and free Trafficke, and what bargaining ought to ſtand free for buyers, as well on one part as the other. That no Canton ſhall receiue the citizens and ſubiects of another Canton: till they be firſt left at liberty, by them vnder whoſe dominion they were before. That the new Cantons ſhall not make alliance with any whoſoeuer, without conſent of the olde Cantons. If war is mooued betweene the old Cantons, the latter ſhall remaine as newters, and labour onely to agree the parties. Each Canton ſhall keepe his or her ancient priuiledges rights, and cuſtomes in their true integritie.

No ſubiects of one Canton to be entertained by another Canton

Behold the principall conditions of the latter alliances, wher namely it is decreed that the new Cantons ſhal not moue any warre, without aduice of the old, neyther refuſe that which is right, nor any honeſt condition of the countrey; and other ſuch like things, concerning warre, are eſtabliſhed fully. And becauſe that the moſt part of the latter Cantons, are vpon the limits and euen out (as it were) of Swetia; they ordained, that no one ſhoulde attempt to make any warre, except it were for ſome matter of very great importãce: and ſo much the rather, becauſe it is very hard to conduct and maintaine an army in thoſe quarters.

CHAP. XVI.

Heere we are to ſpeake of the Switzers wars in Italy, when the French vndertooke to recouer the Dukedome of Millaine, &c.

The death of Lewes, the 12 K. of France, after whome ſucceeded Frances de Valois.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thouſand, fiue hundred, & fifteene, King Lewes the twelfth dyed. He had newly ſought by his Ambaſſadors, the amity and alliance of the Switzers. Neuertheleſſe, in the meane time, he made great preparation for war, pretending to recouer the dukedome of Millaine. Frances de Valois, his kinſman, and his ſonne in law, came after him (as ſucceſſor) to his crown; who following the deliberation of his father, had alſo his minde and eye fixed on the Millaineſes. The Switzers (on the other ſide) allyed with the Emperour Maximillian, Ferdinand King of Spaine, Sforza Duke of Millaine, and with Pope Leo the tenth: vndertook to defend Millaine againſt the French. Wherefore, after they vnderſtood the King of France his preparation they ſent (at their firſt leuy) ſix thouſand men to the Duke of Millaine. Afterward, the tenth of Iune, they made another leuy of 13000. men, which they ſent alſo to ioyne with the firſt.

The Switzers attempt to guard Millain againſt the French.

King Frances paſſed ouer the Alpes in the meane while, by vnaccuſtomd waies, ſhunning the Garriſons of the Switzers, which were vpon the vſuall paſſages, and entred into Italy, with an Armie verie potent, of French and Germaines. This was the reaſon that the Cantons ſent twelue thouſand men more thether, ſo that the campe of Switzers onely, conſiſted of one and thirty thouſand men. Now, although the Kings troopes were well prouided and reſolued, yet they woulde not hazard any thing, nor ſet vppon ſo great an Army of Switzers: it being ſuch indeed as hardly (at any one time) had ſo manie euer before beene in the field. Hereupon by their Deputies, they began to treat on peace with the Colonels of the Switzers: who likewiſe (for their part) were not far off from it in diſpoſition, becauſe they conſidered, that their confederated princes did not march on roundlie vvith them.

The Camp of Switzers, was 31000. men in number, and neuer ſo many of them ſeene before in the field at one time.

For firſt of al, their wages was not paid them, according to promiſe. Moreouer the Emperor had not ſent his companies of horſemen, as he ſtood bound to do by the confederacy. And contrarywiſe, he had not prohibited the Lance-Knightes (which hee might haue done in regard of his authority) from going in ſeruice with the King: but ſuffered them (by troopes) to depart from Germany, and enter into France. Finally, although the forces of the Pope and King of Spaine were neere-

Reaſons inducing the Switzers to liſten topeace when it was moued.

yet

yet notwithſtanding, they could hardlie be perſwaded to paſſe the Pau, and ioyne themſelues with the Switzers. Beſide, there were meſſengers gooing and comming betweene the French and them, & from them to the French. Wherefore, the Switzers ſeeing themſelues vvithout money, and forſaken of their Conſortes: made peace in the village of Galleras, with the Deputies to the King of France, vnder honeſt conditions. Which hauing bene confirmed by ſome Cantons, immediatly twelue thouſand Switzers took their way to Coma, and returned home to their countrey, without tarrying for the reſt, who likewiſe prepared to depart the next morning. But the Duke of Millaine would not accept the conditions of this peace; and the Cardinall of Sion, (a great and perpetuall enemy to ỹ French) laboured by oblique meanes, to break & fruſtrate all.

12000. Switzers part home to theyr country, without the reſt of their cõpanie.

It came to paſſe, that by cunning tricks and plottes, the thirteenth day of September, the Switzers of the Guard to the Duke of Millaine, and ſome others beſide offended with the King, in the night time brake in vpon the French, ſending worde inſtantly to aduertiſe their companions, in what danger they were, and intreated their preſent ſuccour. The other, imagining that it would be a great ſhame vnto them, to forſake their friendes in ſuch a neede, and being made to beleeue withall, that the French had begunne this broyle, went with all their troopes to aſſiſt them. The fight was very ſharp on all ſides; but the night parted them. In this charge was ſlaine Frances, the Lorde of Bourbon, the Lord of Imbercourt, alſo the Count of Sancerre, the Prince of Talemond, ſonne to the Lorde of Trimouille, the Lords of Buſſy d'Amboſe, and manie other: which made ſome to holde opinion, that the Switzers were Maiſters in this conflict, and a brute ran thorow Italy, that they remained conquerours. But the very ſame night, the King hauing mounted his Artillerie on their carriages, leuelled the battalions of the Gaſcoigns and Germaines, re-aſſembling the horſemen vnder their Regiments, and ſending Bertelomeo d'Aluiana with the Armie of Venetians: very earely in the Morning, he gaue battaile to the Switzers, whom he vanquiſhed, after they had loſt manie of their men.

A hot & fierce fight between the Switzers & the French wherein the Switzers wer ouerthrowne in the end.

Read the lord du Bellay, in the firſt book of his Memories.

The Switzers ſeeing the victory in a contrary hand, withdrew them-ſelues to Millaine; yet in ſuch ſort, that their retreate ſauoured not of flight. For, they brought backe the Artillery which came out of Millaine, and marched in ranke of battaile, hauing their wounded Men in the middeſt among them, and going but a very ſoftly pace: yet in all the French Army, not a man, eyther Horſe or Foot, durſt purſue them. On the morrow, hauing lefte the Duke of Millaine fifteene hundred men, to ſtrengthen his garriſon in the Caſtle, they returned into Swetia, by the way of Coma. But, by reaſon of their foile, the French recouered the dukedom of Millaine.

The retreat of the Switzers backe to Millaine.

The Emperour Maximillian conteſted hardly to take it from them againe, & the yeare following, he ledde into Italy (to effect that hope) an army of Germans and Switzers: but he could doe nothing, and ſo was glad to come backe again immediately. As for the King of France, hauing well felt how deare a price this victorie coſt him: he neuer ceaſed till hee hadde made peace and alliance with the Switzers in the end. Perpetuall peace, betweene the French and the Switzers, was made in the yeare one thouſand, fiue hundred, and eighteene, the laſt day of Nouember: and the alliance was confirmed three yeares after, to wit, in Anno one thouſand, fiue hundred, twentie and one. The Articles both of the peace and alliance, are ſet downe in their due place, heereafter following.

CHAP. XVII.

A Diſcourſe, concerning the Alliance of the Switzers, with the King of France.

AT that very time, all the Cantons, Zurich onely excepted, made Alliance with the King of France. And, although they of Zurich were earneſtly

Certaine reasons why the mē of Zurich refuſed to be allied with the king of France neſtly ſollicited by the reſt, to ioyne in this league with them: yet for all that, they could neuer bring them to the point of yeelding to this alliance. In the firſt place, the yeares going before, Mathew, Cardinall of Sion, who came verie often to Zurich: by his Orations and perſwaſiue ſpeeches, had wholly eſtranged them from the French. On the other ſide, Huldrich Zuinglius, being then a principal miniſter at Zurich, in his ordinary preaching and Sermons, ceaſed not to turne the people, from taking wages to goe in warre ſeruices. Shewing by arguments & remonſtrances of great weight, that it was not lawfull for a Chriſtian man, to ſet himſelfe to ſale for a price of money, and go ſhed the bloode of ſuch as are (oftentimes) innocents, and neuer did him any manner of wrong. He ſayd, they ought to follow the manners of the ancient Switzers, who (by their manhood) had planted liberty in their countrey. All which while, they wholly eſtranged themſelues from ſuch courſe of liuing; their liues wer maintained by their trauell; neuer binding themſelues vnto any Prince, neither hadde they any freedome that was to be ſold.

The allegations of Huldrich Zuinglius, why Chriſtian men ſhould not make themſelues hyrelings in warre.

And as hee had words verie readie at command; ſo he approued by great ſtore of ſound reaſons and arguments, that ſuch alliances did but eneruate & meerely proſtitute the liberty of the Switzers to forraine Kings and Princes. So that the men of Zurich, being (otherwiſe) people of peace, and little addicted to martial affaires; were much mooued with his ſpeeches, and abhorred this new League. On the other ſide, the Captaines that hadde bene in the warres in the times of King Charles the eight, and Lewes the eleuenth, diſſwaded them from the league, as being farre vnlike to the alliances with former Kings. For, in precedent times, after that the Switzers had well vnderſtood & comprehended the occaſion of the war; they made choiſe of ſuch Captaines and ſoldiers as they ſhould ſend to the king, according to their promiſe. But in the Newe League, the Cantons neither choſe Captaines nor Soldiers, neither cared vvhat became of all; what the occaſions of the warre were, nor whether they vvere iuſt, or no. But, if the King were to deale with any people, he choſe ſuch Captains of the Switzers as himſelfe pleaſed, and cauſed them to come whether he thoght good. By which meanes, the Cantons had not any power ouer their Men for warre, except they might counter-mand them, when any warre was moued in the country.

The men of Zurich were peacefully minded, and little giuen to warre.

Taxations impoſed vpon the new legue

Moreouer, many ſaide, that this newe League was contrary to the ancient and perpetuall alliances of the Switzers. For, in the firſt Article they ſtand bounde, to guard all the Prouinces of France, againſt all enemies whatſoeuer they are. True it is, that the firſt alliances were exempted; but immediately is added, that if the ancient allies begin to make warre vpon the French, the Cantons ought to ſend ſuccour to the King, againſt the other: wherupon enſued (as it ſeemeth) that if any one of the Cantons, or of the Confederates, could not haue reaſon (in friendly maner) of the King of France, and would purſue his right by Armes; the other Cantons are bound to warre on him, according to the new League, and contrarie to the promiſes of the ancient alliances.

Articles concerning the ancient and perpetual Alliances of the Switzers.

Moreouer, it is not any long time, ſince the Switzers denied theyr troopes to the Emperor Maximillian, alleadging (for their excuſe, becauſe he would haue had them ſerue at his Corronation) that they were occaſioned (for many reaſons) to keepe their men of warre (as then) at home in their owne countrey. Therefore it appeared to them verie vnfitting, that they ſhould then allye themſelues with the King, who would make a Leuye of them, ſo ſoone as the alliance was concluded.

The Switzers denyed their troopes to the Emperor Maximilian, and vpon what cauſe.

They conceyued alſo, that it would be farre off from theyr auncient grauity and magnanimity, if they ſhould league themſelues ſo ſtrictly with the King of France; of whom (but a yeare and an half before) they had written vnto the Electors of the Empire; that it was no way expedient that he ſhould gouern the affayres of Germanie, ſo that if he ſhould be elected Emperor, they were not minded to giue him obedience. And, as concerning the commodities of the alliance, which many did make lowd proclamations of: there vvere others of opinion, that the profite would fall into ſome particular purſes, and eſpecially of ſuch, as enriched themſelues by the penſions of Fraunce; but the Commonwealth of the Switzers would be no way benefited by the bargaine, as very easily was to be proued.

mon-

Arguments very considerately alledged by the Switzers, against ioyning in League with the King of France.

For in the first place, the country had no neede of any strange horsemen or infantery, hauing worke enough to doe in nourishing their owne breed for that imployment. Moreouer, the hope of helpe, and money from France, robbed the Switzers of all their true force and courage. In following the example of their predecessors, they were best to let their hope leane and rest vpon God, to serue and honour him in sincerity of heart, and vprightnesse of conscience. That not onely hope in God, would faile and diminish by such a League, but also it was to be feared, that it would very strongly break and corrupt their ancient manners, cause all husbandry to cease, giue ouer honest trades and exercises, and engender nothing but idlenesse. And then is easily known what followeth; dissolution in diet and apparrell, drunkennesse, whoredomes, adulteries, thefts, and blasphemies. For these are the fruites of warre, and the Arts that are lerned in the armies of strange Princes.

The fruites of war in forrain Princes seruices.

For a finall conclusion, the euent and successe of precedent alliances, haue both instructed and guarded many (especiallie the men of Zurich) to weigh well & consider on nouell combinations. For, albeit that some fewe did sufficient seruice to the nation, as that which was made against the Duke of Bourgongne: yet notwithstanding, the most part of those alliances, brought it into great extremities. Because in such straunge warres they lost many of their people: or els in those coũtries, they were rudely hurried and agitated, by factions and seditions. For these reasons, and diuers other considerations; the inhabitants of Zurich could not (as then) be induced to ally themselues with the king of France.

Some former examples wer not altogither warrantable.

But the other confederates, who were not of any such opinion, maintaind what they did, by reasons enow. First, they declared, and would prooue it, that euery voyage in war was not condemned by the word of God: but that many holye persons had made wars; wherein they were ayded and succoured by others, as in like manner they had assisted their Allies. Secondly, that the war of the Switzers was not mercenary nor vendible; because they went to the seruice of a King onely, (with whom they were ioyned by an honest alliance) with the will and consent of their Lords.

Arguments for alliance of the Switzers with the K. of Frãce, against those formerly alledged by the of Zurich.

Thirdly, that if the King should moue a warre, which all men knew to be vniust; then it remained in the power of the Lords of the Leagues, to deny him succour. But if the occasion were doubtfull and vncertaine: the souldier had nothing to doe to make any curious inquisition thereof: it only appertained to the King and his Councell, to render a reason for it. Fourthly, that the Switzers Countrey was greatly peopled, but narrow, hard, & barren in many places, and could not furnish so many men with nourishment: wherefore the commodity was not to be condemned, which the King had offered voluntarily.

The Switzers countries stored with people, but very barren.

To these we will adde, that the Switzers ought to consider, with what neighbors they were enclosed, som wherof enuyed them, and others pryed into their Liberties: so that it was both well and wisely done, to fortifie themselues with strange succour against them, and that trust and hope in God, did not prohibite the vse of humane assistance. Also, this was a means to traine vp the Switzers in martiall discipline, which is necessary for all Commonwealths: and in regard whereof, warlike people haue euermore beene highly respected. Finally, although that some alliances haue discommodited the Countrey; yet notwithstanding, the Switzers haue sped well in the more part, especially, in those which they had with the kings Lewes the eleuenth, Charles the eight, and Lewes the twelfth. And therfore they must needs expect a happy yssue of this which they contracted with a King powerfull & fortunate.

Martial & militarie Discipline very expedient for all Commonweales.

This was the discourse then made concerning aliance with the French: as I learned of my predecessors, which liued in those times. The selfesame question hath bene often and seriously debated & handled, euen in my time, by men well grounded in the affayres of State, to whome (as yet) I referre the further knowledge of the case.

And first, The Abbot of Saint Gall. CHAP. XVIII.

Another Discourse of the Author, concerning the associates in particular maner.

HItherto wee haue shewne what the Cantons & confederates are, making vp a whole body of the Switzers Commonwealth, and what hath beene the estate and condition of euery one of them before they were leagued. Also, for what causes, at what times, and with what conditions they assembled themselues in a body politicke. Now we will discourse of the associates of this Commonwealth, according to the same order: and we will heere shew, wherefore, when, and vppon what conditions they allyed themselues with the Cantons. And becauſe the Abbot, and the Citty of Saint Gall do holde the first ranke, wee purpose to begin with them.

The City of S Gal tooke name at first of one Gallus, a Gentleman of Scotland.

Gallus, of whom the city of Saint Gal hath taken name, was a Gentleman of Scotland, and Disciple or Scholler to an Abbot, named Colombanius, with whome hee came into France, and thence transported himselfe into Germany, to a place called Tuggen, neere to the Riuer named Limagus, at the mouth of the Lake of Zurich. There he preached the Gospel with great zeale and affection, to the people of the Countrey, then bewitched vvith diuers kindes of Idolatry. Hee continued (soone after) at Bregents, at the mouth opening of the Lake of Constance: next, at Arbonna, and in diuers other places of Swetia, for the space of sixteene years, or thereabout. Gonzo Duke of Suaba, hauing called him to bee Byshoppe of Constance; he would not accept that charge: but councelled the Duke to giue it to one of his schollers, named Iohn, whom hee thought to be more fit for the place. As for himselfe, about the yeare six hundered and thirty, he retired into the Mountaines, aboue the Lake of Constance, into a very solitary place; and in the very same plot or square of ground, where the Citie and Abbey of S. Gall now standeth: hee builded a little Cell or house, wherein he spent the rest of his dayes, with som of his schollers, in the studye and meditation of holy matters.

Gallus refused to be byshop of Constance, and preferred one of his schollers to it.

After the death of S. Gall, his schollers liked well to liue in that place, and according to his manner of life: neuertheleſſe, without making profession then of anie certaine rule or order. But the Kinges of France, and the Dukes of Suaba, taking delight in their deuotion, did them many kinde Offices: where by the number of these religious men encreased, & (by little and little) the small silly house of saint Gall, became conuerted into an Abbey. For foureſcore yeares after the death of S. Gall, they requested Counte Bertrand, Gouernor of the countrey for the Kinges of France, that hee would giue them an Abbot. He sent them a Priest, named Omer, bred and brought vp in a Colledge, called Coire of the Grisons, and towardes Pepin, Prince of France, sonne to Charles Martell: who following the aduice of his father, establisned this Priest the first Abbot of Saint Gall, and then (first of all) the Monkes made profession of the rule of S. Benet.

The death of S. Gal, & succession of his schollers, and his litle house becomming an Abbey.

Omer a priest the first Abbot of S. Gall.

Af-

After that time, the abbey became verie rich and powerfull, ſo that the Abbot of that place, was ſette in number of the Princes. And in ancient times, he was vnder protection of the Emperours, who tooke the Gentlemen of Suaba to be Gouernors of this abbey. Afterward, warre being kindled betweene the Abbot, and them of Appenzel: the Monkes well perceiued that their Conuent ſtood in neede of ſome good Protectours, becauſe the Townesmen or Cittizens of S. Gall, who were (as within the abbey) ioyned with them of Appenzell, who were alſo fauored by many ſeruants of the Abbot.

The Abbot of S. Gal deſires to be receiued into the number of 4. Cantons, and to bee ordered by them.

For this cauſe Gaſpar de Landberg, then the two and fiftieth Abbot (by the aduice and counſell of the Monks) requeſted the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suites, and Glaris, to receiue him into their alliance: eſtabliſhing them patrons, fathers, & defenders of his freedom, & of al his goods, poſſeſſions, vſances, and priuiledges. This right is perpetuall, and at all times, and as often as a new Abbot is to be elected; hee promiſeth this accord, and that al the places of his Seigneury, ſhall alwayes lye open to theſe foure Cantons, and they to haue free acceſſe thither. And if diffrence ſhal happen between him and any other: he ſhall commit it (continually) vnto the hearing of the foure Cantons, and be iudged by them.

Landberg the Abbot beeing dead, Huldrich ſirnamd the Red, ſucceeded after him.

The ſucceſſour to Landberg, named Huldrich, and ſir-named Le Roux, added to this firſt alliance, that the foure Cantons ſhould ſend (one after another) one of their Councell, that ſhould remayne two yeares with the Abbot, to bee Captaine of all his country. He gaue aſſiſtance in pleadings and iudgements, & the moity of all fines remained to the Switzers. Moreouer, it was ordained in this allyance, that in all warres the Abbots ſubiects ſhould goe to the ſuccour of the 4. Cantons. As concerning that vvhich Abbot Huldrich renewed, and the League alſo, ioyning himſelfe more ſtrictly vnto the foure Cantons, the cauſe was thus. Sometimes before, the Citizens of Saint Gall, they of Appenzel, and the ſubiects of the Abbot, had conſpired together, and ruined the abbey of Roſach, which the Abbot had newly builded. So that the foure Cantons hauing ſent for the other Cãtons to theyr aſsiſtance, reſeated the Abbot in his rites, and reprooued his aduerſaries very ſtoutly. This aſſociation endureth yet to this day, and although al the Cantons are not at agreement with the Abbot, as concerning matter of Religion; yet notwithſtanding, according vnto the articles of alliance, they ſend him a Captaine, who manageth and gouerneth ciuill cauſes, conſeruing (in this regard) the rights and priuiledges of the Abbot.

Abbot Huldrich renewed the league with the four Cantons, and more ſtrictly.

Couenants of alliance kept, though not in Religion all alike.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Towne or City of S. Gall.

THE Citie of Saint Gall, oweth her originall and encreaſing to the Abbey, and hath beene enfranchiſed by the Emperours, who vnited it to the Empire, and gaue it many priuiledges and immunities. In the time of the Emperour Arnould, the citie began firſt to be encloſed with walles: as fearing the courſes and ſurprizals of the Hungarians, and both it and the Couent were vnder the Empires protection. The cittie was ſubiect vnto the Abbey in many things: meane while, the citizens had their rites, which they augmented by their induſtry, & by means of the Emperors liberalities.

The Abbey began and increaſed the city of S. Gall.

Now, when the number of cittizens, and the riches of the Abbey beganne to increaſe: many debates and contentions alſo tooke Original, betweene the abbot and the citizens. Oftentimes, the Townes round about it, and the Imperial chamber, would ſet them at agreement again. Sometime likewiſe, they were glad to ſatisfie the Abbots demands with money, and encreaſed their liberties, by buying their rightes of him. But when they of Appenzel moued warre againſt Abbot Cuno de Stouffen; the men of S. Gall beganne to take part with the Abbot, and got nothing for their labour but blovves, vvhich cauſed them (ſoone after) to make alliance vvith them of Appenzel. This vvarre being ended, and ſome other after, abbot Landberg, being made a fellow-Bourgeſſe vvith with foure Cantons · the cittizens of S. Gall, to maintaine themſelues by the like expedient, entred perpetual alliance with Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris. This alliance was ſworne on the Eue of S. Iohn Baptiſt, in the yeare, 1454. And they of Saint Gall made a publicke banket for the Ambaſſadors of the Cantons, whereat were preſent aboue fifteene hundred men. Before this alliance, they were leagued with ſome Cantons for certaine yeares: as with Zurich, Conſtance, and Schaffouſe, in the yeares, 1312. and 1347. And at other times often with Zurich and Conſtance. Afterward, with Zurich, Berne Vri, Suits, & Vnderuald, in the yeare 1329. But I haue purpoſely omitted thoſe alliances made for ſo ſhort times, contenting my ſelfe onely with this laſt mentioned, which continueth to this day

CHAP. XX.

Of the Leagued Griſons.

Concerning the antiquitie of the Griſons, beeing ſometime called Rhetians, of the captain Rhætus.

IT is generally agreed on that the people of the Griſons are very ancient. For ſome ages before the birth of our Sauior Ieſus Chriſt, the Tuſcans beeing driuen from their houſes bythe Gauls they poſſeſſed the Alpes, vnder conduct of their captain, named Rhætus, for whoſe ſake they called themſelues Rhætians. Heretofore this country extended it ſelfe greatly in length & largenes, ſo that the Romane Emperors made two Rhætian Prouinces, named the firſt & ſecond Rhætia: which comprehended not onely the Alpine regions, but alſo a great part of Suaba & Bauaria. Now, it is well knowne, that this firſt Rhætia beginneth at ỹ ſourſe of Rheine, & taketh a ſufficient great quarter of the Alpes, and all the valleyes on both the ſides. Almoſt all the people ther are (to this day) called Griſons; and in former times they were tearmed Gris: as likewiſe the Allmains gaue them the ſame name, & call them beſide, Graw pundter, that is to ſay, Leagued Griſons. For, in regard that theſe Rhætians are Leagued, not onely with the Switzers, but alſo among themſelues, and that of verie long time, we call them Leagued Griſons, & ſom times the Switzers names them ſimply, Pundter, that is, Confederates.

Diuerſitie of names giuen to the people of Rhætia.

Three ſeueral Leagues of the Griſons.

Wee are to obſerue three leagues of the Griſons. The firſt tooke name of her antiquity, and of the ſcituation of the countrey: for they called it, The High League, or high Griſons. It containeth nine teene Communities or Fellowſhippes, among whom (heeretofore) the Abbot of Diſſentiſſ, and the Baron of Rhætia, & the Count of Miſauk held the cheefeſt ranke:

1. The High Leauge, or high Griſons.

but the families of the 2. latter are expired. Neuertheleſſe, among them in common, they which poſſeſſe the Caſtle of the ancient Barons of Rhætia, are called Lords of Rhætzurs, a title which (ſome ſhort while after) the Lordes of Marbrée took; and after them, they which are named Plantes. They of Tauetſcher, Liuiner, and Maſoxertal are the principall people of this league.

2. The league of gods houſe or of the Hoſpitall.

The ſecond is called, The league of Gods houſe. I thinke it to be ſo termed, becauſe the byſhop of Coire is comprized in this league. It alſo comprehendeth nineteene Communities; two whereof doe ſpeake the Germane Language; the other, vſe the Rhætian or Griſon, which is their mother tongue, & cometh neere to the Italian. The principal people of this league are the city of Coire, which is the biſhops See. Alſo they of Pregaul and of Engadin, out of which countries run two renowned riuers, to wit, Etſch and Inn.

3. The league of ten iuriſdictions.

The third league hath ten Communities, and is called, The League of ten Iuriſdictions. Therein are comprized them of Rhuchemberg, and of Tunleſch. The former two leagues had (at the beginning) amity and alliance a certaine time, vvith the Cantons neereſt to them. For, in the yeare, 1419. the Byſhop, the Chapter, & the cittie of Coire, made Allyance vvith them of Zurich for one and fiftie yeeres. Alſo, they were ſometimes allyed vvith them of Glaris. And the Griſons of the high league, wer long time confederated with them of Vri. Then after, with them of Gods houſe they made a perpetuall alliance vvith ſeauen of the Cantons. But the thirde League is not comprized in this alliance, and yet notwithſtanding do Seuerall all iances, & at ſeuerall times.

entertaine this amity and society with the confederates, euen as firmely and faithfully, as if they stood solemnly bound thereto.

Alliance of the Grisons with the Switzers, and vpon what occasions.

First then, in the yeare 1497. the high league, more properly called, The Grison league, made perpetuall alliance with seauen Cantons: and the yeare following, the league of Gods-house ioyned it selfe with them, by this occasion following. Some yeares before, the league of Gods-House had had certaine great differences, with the dwellers in the county of Tyroll. In the end, by the will of the Emperour Maximillian, it was decreed; that the parties should chuse an equall number of Iudges, to take knowledge of their variance, and that Thomas, Bishop of Constance, should be Arbitrator aboue all the Iudges. But while the Councellers to the King delayed to end this discord, the Bishop of Constance dyed: and in his stead, Maximillian subrogated Fredericke, Bishop of Ansbourg. But the Kings councellers taking no knowledge of this other Arbitrator, prolonged (from day to day) the decision of the suite, as before they had done: all this while molesting the Grisons, and charging them still with nouell impositions.

A great difference between the league of Gods-house, and them of Tyroll.

The Grisons depute two of each league for ending their cause.

They perceiuing no cessation, deputed two of each league, and sent to Inspruk, insisting, that this difference should end, according to the order of the Emperour Maximillian. Which the councellers pretended not to know, albeit diuers of them, and (among the rest) the chanceller was present when the decree was set downe. Yet notwithstanding, because the Deputies should not bee sent backe without answer; they assigned a day at Velcure, in Lent the next yeare ensuing. In the meane while, they of Austria planted Garrisons vpon the Frontiers, and strong Artillery in diuers places, making (vnder hand) their preparation for warre. For they had appointed that day expressely, because they would set vpon them at vnawares, & vtterly ouerthrow the Grisons, no way standing on their guard: wherein the Bishop of Coire lent his helping hand to them of Austria. But the league of Gods-House, hauing discouered the enemies intent; sent men to the cantons, who kept then a day at Zurich, and gaue them to vnderstand this eminent danger.

Cunning tricks, and fit for such to vse, as desire to oppresse the peoples liberty.

The Ambassadors declared, that beside the olde quarrels, new differences were moued, betweene them of Austria and the Switzers, so that there grew an appearance of warre: therefore for the profit & security both of the Switzers & Grisons, it seemed good, that they should be allied together. For by that meanes, the Grisons shold easily expell the enemy out of their country: although they gaue them but little ayde, or almost none at all. On the other side, the Switzers should haue a Bulwarke to back them, and so might the more strongly make head against the enemy. The Cantons, who had bin well affected to the Grisons before, and knew those Mountaine-bred men, to bee a warlike disposed people, and how beneficiall this alliance wold be both to the one and other: concluded and established a perpetuity of loue with the Grisons, in the yeare 1498. and the Moneth of December, and the Articles of the alliance are these that follow.

An offer of alliance betweene the Switzers and Grisons.

A perpetuall league of loue with the Grisons.

The Articles of alliance, betweene the Switzers and the Grisons.

For friendship and assistance

1. First, that they shall be friends, & giue mutuall succour one to another.

Agreeing of controuersies.

2. The second Article concerneth the agreeing of differences, which may happen betweene confederates.

No selling of debts.

3. The third is, that no man shall giue or sell away, those actions that he hath against his debter, or the answerer, or surety for him.

For food and trading.

4. The fourth concerneth victualles, according to one anothers trading: And to bee freely in the Markets, without standing bound to pay any new tributes.

For new alliances, & making of peace.

5. That neither the one nor other side, shall make any new alliance, wherein these Articles shall be comprised, but with exceptions: And that in times of warre, the one side shall not make peace, except the other be therin comprehended also.

These are the Articles and principall points of the alliance. But the yeare following, the warre of Suaba happened, wherein the Grisons valiantly defended their Frontiers, against the men of Austria. And by the ayde of their people, many times in like manner, and by the assistance of the Switzers, diuers braue battailes were were wonne againſt the enemy. Yet after theſe victories hapning on either ſide, peace was (at length) made in the citty of Baſile, with the Emperor Maximillian; in which peace, the Griſons are alſo compriſed. By this meanes, the beginning of the alliance was wholeſome and happy to both parties, and afterward, in many wars where the Switzers were preſent, vnder wages of ſtrange Princes their confederates: the Griſons alwayes marched as kinde companions with them.

Peace made in the citty of Baſile, for the Switzers and Griſons.

It came to paſſe, that in the yeare one thouſand, fiue hundred, thirty and one: Iohn Iaques de Medicis, who afterward was Marqueſſe of Marignano, getting vſurped poſſeſſion of the Caſtle of Muß, vpon the Lake of Coma, and hauing taken Clauenna from the Griſons, forraging the country thereof: many Cantons, according to their league of alliance, ſent ſuccour to the Griſons: by meanes whereof, the enemy was ouercome at laſt, and driuen far off. In our time, the Griſons were allied with the French, and with the cantons of Swetia, and went to warre together for the King: yet in ſuch ſort neuertheleſſe, that they ſend oftentimes a regiment ſeparated of the Switzers, & which hath his Colonell & Captaine in chiefe.

CHAP. XXI.

The Alliance of the Valaiſians, or people of Valois.

THE name of Valaiſians, or them of Valois, comprehendes three diſtinct people, encloſed within the moſt high Mountaines, and dwelling in the Valley, from the ſourſe of Rheine, ſo farre as the Lake * Lemanus. They were anciently called Viberines, Seduſians, or Seguſians, ſome ſay, Sebuſians, and Veragrians. At this day, the Viberines and Seduſians, are called the high Valaiſians, and are diuided into ſeuen Dioceſſes, or Wards of ten Pariſhes. The Veragrians, or lowe Valaiſians, are ſubiects to the other: but the Biſhop of Sion is Prince of all the country, hauing the ſoueraignty both temporall and ſpirituall, and he is called Count, or Gouernor of Valois. We haue deſcribed in another Tract, apart by it ſelfe, not onely this Valley, but likewiſe all the moſt remarkable things of the Valaiſians.

A deſcription of Valais or Valois.

* A Lake of the Allobroges by Geneua and Lauſanna.

The Biſhop of Sion is Count and Gouernor of Valais or Valois.

Fiue Wardes or Dioceſſes of the Valaiſians, made firſt alliance with Lucerna, Vri, and Vnderuald, in the yeare 1417. They were then in warre againſt a Biſhop, named William de Raron, and his Father Guiſcard, whom they had (by a popular tumult) forced from their houſes. The Bernians gaue aſſiſtance to the Biſhop and his Father, who were of their Bourgeſſes: And for this cauſe the Valaiſians deſiring to haue ſuccour elſewhere: allied themſelues with the fore-named 3. Cantons. Now fearing leſte this might be an occaſion of breeding quarrell betweene the Bernians, and the three Cantons allied with the Valaiſians: the other cantons, who were as neuters to the buſineſſe, laboured ſo earneſtly, that the difference was pacified, and the Lords of Raron re-eſtabliſhed in their goods. Before this alliance, the Valaiſians had made one (for the ſpace of ten yeares) with them of Berne, in the yeare 1250. Againe, after this warre, they contracted another alliance (for certaine time) with the Bernians. But in the yeare 1475. they made a league defenſiue and offenſiue. And in the ſame yeare when wee wrote this Hiſtory (to wit, 1575.) an hundred yeares being expired, after the beginning of this league: they renewed and confirmed it on eyther part, by magnificent Ambaſſadors. Two yeares before they were leagued with the Bernians, they made a certaine agreement with them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderuald.

Guillaume de Raron and Guiſcard his father.

Contracted alliances of the Valaiſians with the Bernians.

To conclude, in our time, vpon great differences mooued, concerning matters of Religion, Ceremonies, life and manners of the Cleargy, whereof reformation was required, Swetia being diuided into contrary parts; Adrian, Biſhop of Sion, and ſeuen Wardes of the Valaiſians, in the yeare 1533. made alliance with ſeauen Cantons, in the Towne of Fribourg, which Cantons made profeſſion of the Roman Religion, as namely, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderuald, Zug, Fribourg, and Solleurre. In this Alliance (ouer & beſide that which is vſed in the other) it was especially agreed, that they should aide one another, to maintaine the vsed and approued Religion, to wit, that of the Romane Church, against all them that would depriue or violence it.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Rotwill, or Rotuill.

Opinions concerning the name of Rotwill, or Rotuill, which is an Imperiall Towne or Citty.

SOme haue imagined, that Taxgatium, whereof Ptolomy speaketh in his Geography, was Rotwill or Rotuill, which Glareanus calleth Erythropolis, hauing changed the Aleman or Germane word, into a Greek word: but they much deceiue themselues. For Ptolomy placeth Taxgatium in the country of the Grisons, and Rotuille is scituated beyond Danubius in Germany, on the left side of the Riuer Nicra, and very neere to the Spring-head of both those Floods or Riuers. This citty is sufficiently renowned among the Imperials, for therein is a chamber of the Empire, which is vulgarly called Hofgricht, whereunto all the round neighbouring countries resort, for causes of appeale. Such as are contumacious, and fayle of their appearance there; are sent (by sentence of the Iudges) into banishment from the Empire. It is said, that this chamber was established by the Emperor Conrad the third, and that it is 424. yeares since.

The first alliance of them of Rotuille with the cantons.

The first alliance that they of Rotuille made with the Switzers, was in the time of the Emperor Frederick the third, in the yeare 1463. This alliance was renewed diuers times betweene them. At last, in the yeare 1519. they contracted perpetuall alliance with all the Cantons of the Switzers. During the warre of Suaba, they of Rotuille (engirt with enemies on all sides) shewed themselues alwayes faithfull to the Switzers; offering them amiably and liberally all their riches and men: which the Switzers could not accept, but onely desired them, to defend their citty against the enemy. Now in regard that Rotuille is scituated along the limits of Swetia, and that succour cannot bee brought to one another, but with danger, considering, they must passe through other mens lands: the alliance speaketh expressely, that they must be carefull for drawing any war vpon them, or vpon any of their confederates.

Rotuille is scituated thorough the midst of Swetia.

A breuiate of the Articles of alliance betweene them and the Cantons.

And first of all; It is said, that they may not make war with any whosoeuer, without the knowledge and consent of the Cantons. They shall giue no succour to any person out of Swetia, without the will and consent of the Cantons. Moreouer, if they would haue reason by Arms, for any iniury or out-rage done vnto thē; they must attempt nothing, but by aduice of the Cantons. If their enemies will vndergoe iudgement, such as the Cantons shall thinke to be honest and equall: the men of Rotuille must also consent therto. If warre chance to bee moued among the cantons; they of Rotuille are to follow that part, which the most part of voyces do allow. The cantons are to conserue (with all their power) the Imperial chamber of Rotuille; which (in the mean while) shall vse no authority against the Switzers, or any of them. And if any stranger shall cite or summon thether a Switzer; they are to make knowne, and he likewise, how farre he is to bee defended by priuiledge. In breefe, they are not to molleſt any Switzer in that iurisdiction.

The Imperiall Chamber of Rotuille, to be powerfully defended.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Mulhouse.

MVlhouse is a Towne in the county of Ferrara, or (as some do hold opinion) in the Territory of Basile. It is thoght that in ancient times it was called Ariabinium. For in the Guide or Director of wayes, appointed by Antonius Augustus; this place is set betweene Augusta Rauraca (which is Basile) and Vruncim, which some do thinke to be called at this day, Ensheym; then Mount Brissac, Heluetum, and Strasbourg are named. In times of antiquity, Mulhouse was in number of the Imperiall townes: but the Bishop of Strasbourg was Gouernor thereof, also of the Towne

The situation and nomination of Mulhouse.

Mulhouse one of the Imperiall Townes.

Towne of Colmar. It came to paſſe, that warre happened betweene Raoul of Habſpourg, and the Biſhop of Strasbourg, wherein Mulhouſe was taken from the Biſhop, & the Caſtle ruined. After which time, Mulhouſe was againe re-obtained, and numbred among the Imperiall Cities and Townes.

Her firſt alliance with the Switzers, was made about the yeare 1464. For in regard that the neighboring Gentlemen molleſted the Towne, and narrowly watched all occaſions to aſſault it: the cittizens made alliance with them of Berne, for fifteene yeares, as alſo with Fribourg and Solleurre; and by meanes of the Bernians interceſſion, the other ſeuen Cantons tooke the Towne into their protection. Which proued ſo diſpleaſing to the Noble-men, that theſe priuate enmities conuerted themſelues (ſoone after) into open warre: which cauſed the Switzers immediately, to ſend and plant Garriſons in Mulhouſe. Afterward, all the Cantons brought their troopes into the field, and came with great aſſiſtance to releeue Mulhouſe.

Aliance made with Berne for fifteene yeares, and other.

In the end, hauing beſiedged the towne of Waldshout, appertaining to the houſe of Auſtria: they compelled the Gentlemen, to come to ſome equall conditions of peace. Afterward, they of Mulhouſe were receiued for fellow-Bourgeſſes with them of Baſile, and thereby more ſtrictly vnited to the Switzers. Nine yeares after, the 19. day of Ianuary, they made alliance with all the thirteene cantons. The conditions were all alike to the alliance of Rotuille, as well in regard of warres, as leagues with ſtrangers.

Alliance with all the thirteen Cantons

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of Bienne.

The ſituation and eſtate of Bienna.

Bienne is at the ende of a very pleaſant Lake, abounding with plenty of fiſh & round engirt (on all ſides) with goodly Vineyards. It is vnder the gouernment of the Biſhop of Baſile; and yet it enioyeth lawes and regiment a part by it ſelfe, as alſo liberall frāchiſes and priuiledges.

The firſt alliance of the of Bienna, was made with the men of Berne, in the yeare 1303. to ridde the country of certaine robbers and theeues, which wandred there in ſo great numbers, as almoſt no way had any ſecurity for paſſage. In this alliance, they of Strasbourg, Baſile, Fribourg and Solleurre were alſo comprized. Three years after, in regard of ſome great differences, which they had with their neighbours: they made a particular alliance with the Bernians. Their third alliance was made in Anno 1352. and fifteen yeares after, becauſe Iohn de Viana, Biſhop of Baſile, (a man of turbulent ſpirit) wold not ſuffer any of his neighbours to liue in quiet: they of Bienna, deſirous to prouide for their owne eaſe and tranquility, ioyned themſelues more ſtrictly with the men of Berne, by giuing each to other the right of fellow-Bourgeſſes. The Biſhop very angry at this vnion, muſtred together ſome troopes of horſe, and (at vnawares) ranne vpon them of Bienna, and clapt vp in priſon the Authors of this aſſociation.

Iohn de Viana Biſhop of Baſile, a man troubleſome to his neighbours.

When the men of Berna heard of this deede, they came to ſuccour their fellow Bourgeſſes, tooke (by force) the Caſtle, which the Byſhop had in Bienna, ſet the priſoners at liberty, and made warre vpon the Byſhoppe, as alſo on them of Solleurre, his aſſociates. In this warre, they tooke and ruined many places, which were in ſubiection to the byſhop.

Of Geneua.

Eneua is the laſt and vtmoſt Cittie of the Allobroges, of which (amongſt other of Antiquity,) Cæſar hath made mention in his Commentaries.
